SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

[French text]

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

I have the honour to welcome you to the Second Session of the 29th Parliament of Canada.

In addressing you for the first time, I should like to express my feeling of honour at having been chosen Her Majesty's representative in Canada. As I said at the time of my investiture, the office which I have the honour to hold has a continuous history of three and a half centuries. I am anticipating with pleasure the opportunity to travel in Canada and to meet citizens from all walks of life.

We look forward to the visit of Queen Elizabeth, The Queen Mother, for whom all Canadians have a great affection. She will be in Canada from June 25th to June 30th to present new colours to the Toronto Scottish and to the Black Watch (Royal Highland Regiment) of Canada; Her Majesty is Colonel-in-Chief of both regiments.

[English text]

I speak to you at a time of serious disturbance in the international economic situation, arising from problems of supply and price of certain commodities, particularly oil.

Most countries, developed and developing, witnessed significant economic expansion in 1973. The economic prospects for 1974 seemed, until recently, no less encouraging. The reduction of the amount of oil exported by some of the major producing countries and the increase in price has brought a sudden and dramatic change in this situation.

For the developing countries of the world, the increased cost of oil has in many cases wiped out the small margins on which they depended for economic development and better means to support their growing populations. For the industrialized countries, of which Canada is one of the few close to being self-reliant in oil and energy generally, it means that many of them will incur large balance of payments deficits and will have to find means of financing them. For the world as a whole, it could mean an over-all reduction in demand with a consequent depressing effect on economic activity.

The Government attaches the highest importance to solving these problems through concerted international action and co-ordination of national policies. The meeting of the major oil importing countries was a first step in this direction. It will be followed by meetings with the oil producing states and the developing countries. The United Nations, the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and other international organizations will also become actively involved.

In working toward a solution of these international economic problems the major consuming countries must recognize the legitimate aspirations of all the producing countries to utilize their resources to assist in their own national economic development. But the developed world, as well as the resource-rich countries of the developing world, must also take increasingly vigorous steps to reduce disparities between themselves and the less developed and less fortunate nations.

While the developments affecting the supply and price of oil are in part the product of special circumstances, the underlying situation thus set in relief is much more general. Food prices have risen sharply as a result of the growth of world population on which has been superimposed serious crop failures in a number of countries. The prices of other internationally-traded commodities have also increased following the simultaneous upsurge in economic activity in all industrialized countries. The increases in the food and commodity sectors have moreover, led to increases in other prices producing generalized inflationary pressures.

No country has been immune from the increase in prices experienced in 1973 and which is continuing in 1974. The phenomenon is worldwide, not an isolated one affecting this or that country alone.

All countries, including Canada, have rejected a deliberately planned slowdown in economic activity as a means to fight inflation. Some have turned to income and price controls. These attempts have on the whole not been successful.

The Canadian economy, perhaps more than any other, is closely tied to international trade and markets. The principal inflationary pressures have come from outside the country. It would have been singularly inappropriate under such conditions to have resorted to general income and price controls and the Government rejected them for these reasons.

A principal responsibility of the Government and one of its main policy objectives is to maintain high levels of income, production and employment. This policy should in itself help to overcome some of the supply problems which are causing prices to rise. But in addition, and more immediately, the Government's policy in dealing with inflation will be to step in, as it has done in the past, and take specific measures to increase the supply of certain goods and services, to protect those who are not able to protect themselves against the effects of inflation, to cushion consumers against sudden and disruptive price increases of essential commodities, and to prevent any group or groups from taking undue advantage of the current situation at the expense of others.

In the case of oil, the Government has been concerned about the individual hardships caused by the rise in prices and about the over-all effect of the increase on the economy. Nonetheless, for Canada to become self-reliant and be protected against abrupt changes in supply, prices must be such as to encourage the exploration and development of non-conventional and frontier oil resources. The Government must ensure that a sufficient part of the funds generated by higher prices will be used for such exploration and development. It will introduce legislation to create a national petroleum company which will assure greater Canadian presence and participation in these and other activities. It has announced the extension of the pipeline from the western oil fields to Eastern Canada and the establishment of a single Canadian market which will guarantee an outlet for domestically-produced oil.

In furthering these longer-term objectives, the Government has a duty to manage the economy in the interests of all Canadians, and in particular to moderate the inflationary effects resulting from the oil crisis. It has sought, in co-operation with the provinces, to make sure that the difficult transition to higher oil and energy costs occurs in an orderly way so as to not cause unnecessary disruptions in economic activity, employment and prices. To this end, it must ensure that the price of domestically-produced oil does not increase at an unreasonable rate and that the price of oil be the same in all parts of Canada subject, of course, to transportation costs. Legislation will be introduced to ensure that the responsibilities of the Government in these respects can be effectively discharged.

Discussion with the provinces on the Government's objectives and on the best means of achieving them is continuing. The Government will make every effort to reach agreement on arrangements that will discharge its responsibilities in a way that is fair to the provinces where the main sources of the oil and gas are located as well as to consumers in the country as a whole.

At the same time as there is increasing concern about shortages in the supply of energy, it is apparent there is an inadequate supply of food in many parts of the world. In some countries the situation has reached critical proportions. In Canada there have not been such serious shortages but international market pressures have forced our food prices upwards. It is clear that this country's production must be increased. The Government is developing a policy on food based on the following objectives:

—an adequate and dependable supply of quality food for a growing population in Canada enjoying a rising standard of living;

—reasonable food prices:

—for the consumer, in not requiring an undue proportion of income for Canadians to secure a sufficient and balanced diet,

—for the producer, in providing a return adequate to encourage production of food items which can be economically and efficiently produced in Canada;

—a continuing supply and increasing production of those food products in which Canada has a competitive advantage for export to commercial markets and also for a contribution to international food aid programs.

The Government's objectives will guide a re-assessment of existing programs in the areas of agriculture and fisheries. The Government will wish to consult with provincial governments, consumer groups and producers.

The producer must be ensured a fair income for his work. His confidence in long-term market opportunities is an essential element in the Government's policy. The producer should have access to all markets in Canada. He will also be encouraged to expand food exports.

The consumer must be ensured a fair value from his dollar. He must be protected against disruptive increases in the price of essential foodstuffs caused by international market demand. Guarantees against unduly low prices to producers must be coupled with guarantees against unduly high prices to consumers.

[English text]

In the long term the continuity of domestic supply must take into account optimum over-all land use in Canada and especially the trend to diversion of productive land for non-agricultural purposes. The Government intends to enter into discussions with the provinces since they are vitally involved in this question.

As positive steps in the achievement of adequate supplies of food at a reasonable cost, measures directed in the main at increasing food production will be laid before you in the following areas:

—guaranteed loans and other forms of assistance to both farmers and fishermen to assist them in purchasing or modernizing their equipment;

—amendments to the Export and Import Permits Act to provide the Government with better means to stabilize the Canadian market;

—improving the availability of manpower for food production;

—assistance in the construction of new storage facilities;

—research to make it possible to increase production, improve quality, and lower costs;

—improvements in harbour facilities for fishing fleets;

—incentives to increase Canada's catch of unexploited stocks of fish;

—advance payments on crops to assure producers of timely cash receipts;

—an agricultural stabilization plan to encourage rational production decisions;

—assistance to young farmers to provide sufficient financial incentives for them to establish themselves in farming;

—better veterinary training facilities;

—a prairie grain market insurance plan;

—improvements in Canadian grain rail transportation capabilities;

—increased availability of reasonably priced feed grains;

—incentives to increase the production of livestock necessary to provide for Canadian and export markets.

As part of the Government's economic management, a major element in the policy to mitigate inflation is to increase production and supply: many measures have been indicated with respect to energy and food. Of course, Canadians must strengthen their economy in other ways to expand employment opportunities and achieve a greater degree of control over their economic affairs.

Measures will be proposed to aid small businesses, both financially and by providing better counselling services by the creation of a Federal Business Development Bank. Steps will be taken to ensure further processing of resources in Canada. The Government will encourage the development of the petrochemical industry based on the upgrading of Canadian resources and better access to world markets. Amendments will be proposed to the Bank Act in order to permit provinces to participate in the ownership of banks. An amendment to the Export Development Act will be introduced to encourage further expansion of Canada's foreign trade. Proposals will be made to ensure Canadian control of the computer communications field. Amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, directed at encouraging competition, will be put before you.

The development and use of technology is also essential to the Government's approach to increasing national economic production. Steps will be taken to obtain greater returns from industrial research and development as well as technological innovation in Canada.

Scientific knowledge and its application is a keystone to meeting the challenges facing Canada, including those in the areas of food, energy or industrial development. The objective of the Government's science policy is the rational generation and acquisition of scientific knowledge and the planned use of science and technology in support of national goals. The Ministry of State for Science and Technology will be developing national science objectives as a basis for exercising enhanced advisory and co-ordinating authority within the Government. Two new granting councils will be formed, one for social sciences and humanities and the other for natural sciences.

The Government attaches great importance to regional development. Many of the measures to be introduced during this session were discussed at the Western Economic Opportunities Conference, and will be of benefit to all areas of Canada. Transportation in particular is a key factor in regional development. A number of measures will be taken in the larger context of ensuring that Canada's transportation capability supports the Government's national goals and is safe and efficient. Steps will be taken to end any discrimination in freight rates. A new ports policy will be developed to ensure an effective and comprehensive port structure in Canada in a framework where a high degree of local involvement in management and improvement of ports can be established.

Other measures will be taken to increase production and employment through providing workers with improved access to available jobs, and employers with improved access to Canada's manpower. These steps will relate employment policy, immigration policy and the activities of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The Government will be working together with the provinces in developing a community employment policy in a social security context for those Canadians who have particular and continuing difficulty in getting and keeping employment. Amendments will be introduced to the Unemployment Insurance Act as a part of a comprehensive review of the plan undertaken in the light of the experience of the last few years.

In the domain of social policy the Government is playing a vital role to achieve a more balanced pattern of urban growth and to increase the quality of life in our cities in co-operation with the provinces and municipalities. Improved means of public transportation are indispensable to the achievement of these urban goals. Measures will be introduced to establish a National Urban Transportation Development Corporation to co-ordinate and market the development of required new technology in this field. You will be asked to consider measures to assist provinces and cities in the relocation of railway lines and terminals and in the redevelopment of these areas for purposes that will enhance the environment of many of our cities and towns.

Provision of adequate shelter at reasonable prices in a satisfactory neighbourhood environment has been a continuing concern of the Government, and levels of funding to meet this objective are being reviewed. Substantial assistance to rural and native housing programs will also be proposed. The sewage assistance program will be revised to make it more effective as a means to increase the supply of serviced land. The Government will introduce measures to increase the protection available to consumers in the housing market.

The Government has taken many measures to improve the status of women in Canada since the Report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. Amendments to the statutes of Canada will be placed before you for the purpose of providing equal treatment for women. The legislation to be introduced creating a Federal Commission on Human Rights and Interests will include provisions to protect women from discriminatory practices. Regulations governing government employees will be amended to remove all possible inequities based on sex. Crown corporations will be asked to undertake positive action to encourage the assignment and advancement of more women into responsible positions within their administration. The Government's objective is to create a society free from discrimination.

List of Legislation

The federal and provincial governments have agreed that the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans should be further amended to provide for increases, beyond 1975, in the levels of income upon which contributions may be made, and in the pensions which will be paid. Legislation will be introduced to remove the earnings test now required for people aged 65 to 69 from the Canada Pension Plan. Finally, federal and provincial ministers have agreed that the provisions which now accord differential treatment to men and women under the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans should be removed.

You will be asked to consider other legislative proposals.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. PETER STOLLERY AND SECONDED BY MR. IRÉNÉE PELLETIER

The House proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier), that the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Hon. Jules Léger, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

My first privilege as mover of the Speech from the Throne is to take this opportunity not only to extend the thanks of this House to His Excellency the Governor General but also to take this opportunity to congratulate him upon his appointment and wish him well as he begins his vice-regal duties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, it is also appropriate to wish Madame Léger well in her new duties, so important to the success of this office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: Canada is fortunate to have in our vice-regal couple two people who have spent most of their adult lives in the honoured service of our country and who bring the experience and enlightenment of many years spent in a variety of often difficult and sensitive diplomatic postings abroad. I am sure that I express the feelings of all members of this House in wishing them well.

[Translation]

May I also be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to express my gratitude and, I am sure, that of all Canadians, to Mr. and Mrs. Michener for the dash with which they revived those traditions it behoves the Governor General of Canada and his wife to personify.

I am sure I speak on behalf of all the hon. members in expressing my thanks to two very likeable Canadians for a job well done. May they now enjoy many years filled with joy and serenity, assured that they will always be dear to the hearts of all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) selected me to do this job of moving the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I was in central America.

An hon. Member: Where was he?

Mr. Stollery: He was in his office in Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stollery: If hon. members would listen for a moment, they might learn something. Often when I want a fresh look at things I like to go out and think a little bit, as we all do once in a while. I get my bike out and pedal off to see if the old stamina is still there. And it is. I often do it to take a look around, and I would recommend it to some of my hon. friends opposite.

I carry in my saddle-bag a bundle of the latest statistical material relating to the countries I am going through, in this instance the countries of the central American common market, so that I have some indication of what I am looking for and what it means. For example, when in the charming country of Guatemala my curiosity leads me along country roads through villages and picturesque countryside, I am aware that one-third of the population lives totally outside of the money economy. I am aware that the average annual income is $350. I am aware that last May, 17 persons were killed when soldiers tried to prevent 1,000 landless peasants from taking possession of the land. For cycling is not just an exercise and sweating around in the hot tropical sun; cycling brings back something that in Canada we have lost because we spend so much of our time in automobiles cut off from the outside. It brings back that perspective that is found only in the art of smelling things; and there is a great deal to smell around here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: You have to smell the fresh manure in the early morning streets from the horses and ponies. I am sure many of us remember that same smell here in Canada many years ago. One better understands the value of Canada's recent $5 million loan to the government of Belize when you smell the urine in the tenements and the raw sewage that flows through every creek and every barrio.

I have found that when travelling in a car or bus you tend to get back in and ride on to some air-conditioned hotel and very quickly forget some of the realities of the outside world. But on a bicycle you understand a little better, particularly as the tropical day gets hotter and hotter. The rutted, rotten dirt roads mean a great deal more when you choke on the dust as the sugar cane trucks swirl by. I recommend this to some hon. members opposite. Ten or 12 hours a day like that for a few days is very good for the soul.

This, Mr. Speaker, was the environment I was in when I was contacted and given by the Prime Minister this honourable job of moving the address in reply to the throne speech. Of course, it was an honour for me to be selected for this job, but it was an honour that made me reflect, as I grabbed my stuff and headed for home, what a wonderful country Canada is, a country where an average man like myself can become a member of parliament, spend a year and a half in the most interesting work that I can think of in the world and meet some of the finest people in this country, the other members of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Stollery: For I do believe that the highest honour to which a Canadian can aspire is that of being elected by his fellow citizens to the House of Commons. But, Mr. Speaker, it is also a heavy responsibility.

[English]

It is traditional, Mr. Speaker, in this type of speech to talk about one's constituency. That is well known. As the member for Spadina, I have the good luck to represent one of the most interesting areas in Canada, downtown Toronto. The fact is that Spadina riding is almost synonymous with downtown Toronto. It is difficult even to visit the city of Toronto without visiting my constituency. That is where many of the hotels are, the shopping, a great part of the waterfront and so many of the things that make Toronto a great city. Toronto city hall, in my constituency, is where so many community political decisions have been made in recent years. This is such a liveable city that it is envied by people across North America and by students of city planning around the world.

The name Spadina, as is known to many hon. members and to many Canadians who live far from Toronto, is the name of the defunct Spadina expressway, that landmark which has become synonymous with the questioning of growth and with the questioning of values of city life and the way we in the cities are growing. I was connected with that issue and in fact it was one of the things that led to my involvement in politics and my own personal decision that if one is going to have strong opinions on issues, the only choice is to become involved in politics in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: Spadina is a famous immigrant riding as well, different from nearly all the other immigrant ridings in this country such as those represented by my colleagues, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Walker), the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming), the hon. member for Saint-Michel (Miss Bégin), the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), the hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa (Mr. Trudel) and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Basford). Spadina is unique because it is a receiving area for immigrants. For over 100 years people have been coming into the riding in waves: first from England, the people who gave the name to Kensington market which the Prime Minister visited a couple of years ago, then people from central Europe at the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth century, and more recently it has become the home of many thousand Portuguese and Chinese. The last census registered 33 languages in this constituency.

However, the unique factor is that the people tend to come into the area, spend their first years in Canada there, and then as they adapt to Canada they tend to move on. It has probably the lowest citizenship rate of any riding in the country. It is common knowledge that this is one of the reasons Spadina, with a population of some 90,000, has only about 27,000 voters, one of the eighth or ninth smallest voting populations in Canada. Curiously enough, many of these voters are not immigrants. In fact, in the riding I represent is located the largest apartment shopping complex in the world, with 1,000 people in one building.

I have always been interested in Canada's immigrant policies, even before I became a member representing an area which has this traditional involvement with immigrants. It has been my personal belief, reinforced by my travels to more than 100 countries in the world, that a country is made better by the influx of many people from cosmopolitan backgrounds who bring with them new ways of life to refresh the culture and the social environment.

All these things make us better people, more conscious of the wider world around us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: It is common knowledge that our Prime Minister enjoys a great deal of prestige outside Canada as well as in Canada. I should like to take a moment at this point to congratulate the Prime Minister on his successful intervention with Russian authorities on behalf of Mr. Eugene Lenko in Kiev.

[Translation]

During the adjournment, a few weeks ago, the world has witnessed an example of repression when Soljenitsyn was dispossessed of his Soviet citizenship and sent into exile. I am sure several of us hope that the government of that great nation which is the U.S.S.R., will some day liberalize its policy with respect to human rights and allow its subjects a greater freedom of expression.

[English]

Many of us must hope there will be more instances where the Soviet government will release members of families of Canadians who live in the Soviet Union, and that the sort of thing done in respect of Mr. Lenko can be done more often. Again I congratulate the Prime Minister.

It seems to me that in the Speech from the Throne which we have received from the Governor General there are three main themes, three important concerns of all Canadians—the supply of energy, the supply of food, and economic opportunities for the west.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: Here in Canada we have a unique energy situation, one that is more complex than in almost any other country.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Stollery: If you will listen for a minute, you might find out. In other countries of the world the energy situation is simple; either you are a consuming, energy-short nation or you are an oil exporting nation. Canada is both a consuming and a producing nation. This situation requires from the government of Canada policies which are quite different from any other country in the world. The announcement in the throne speech of an international petroleum company to assure greater Canadian presence, participation in and control of the petroleum industry is an important statement. We Canadians have been fortunate, and just how fortunate had not occurred to me until I was in central America.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stollery: As many members will know, the countries of the central American common market have a close economic connection with Florida. The usual things for a traveller to read to get his news, in addition to the local Spanish newspapers and El Nacional, the Mexican newspaper, are the English papers from Miami. It brings the seriousness of the situation very much closer when you read a newspaper which says the local gas stations are only open two or three hours a day, and that cars with odd numbers on their licence plates can get gas on odd dates and cars with even-numbered licence plates can get gas on even dates. Imagine a situation in which it becomes newspaper headlines that the state of Florida is getting an increase in its quota of gasoline, a commodity which is so important to an area dependent upon the tourist industry.

About a week ago last Sunday I visited a small town in Costa Rica with a friend who had a car. To discourage people form using gas on Sundays and to encourage them to use the buses, all the gas pumps had padlocks on them with big official stickers. It occurred to me that we were very, very fortunate in Canada, where this sort of thing has not happened, as I surreptitiously went from gas station to gas station with a plastic pail in an attempt to buy a gallon of gasoline, giving them the story, which was very difficult, that I might become a regular customer.

We have been fortunate in having an energetic minister to handle this complicated situation since it started to develop, and it is with great confidence that I read how the government proposes to continue to expand its policy in order to assure gasoline and other forms of energy to all Canadians at equal prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: This is a most important issue which will be resolved, and it seems to me that this government has taken and is continuing to take steps to resolve it in a way that will put Canada in probably the best energy position in the industrial world. We have been fortunate in our natural resources and fortunate in having a government that is planning to use these natural resources to the benefit of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Stollery: It seems to me that world food shortages and energy problems are closely interrelated. Both issues are linked with the commodity situation and are dependent upon international goods and foodstuffs markets. It is therefore particularly timely that this Speech from the Throne should present the provision of reasonable and reliable supplies of foodstuffs at decent prices both for the consumer and the producer as one of the major concerns of this government. The more one reads about the complexity, if not the intricacy, of food markets, about the progressive internationalization of these markets, and the way they elude national legislations, the more one is puzzled by this serious problem.

[English]

The price of food in this country has been seriously affected by the fact that the United States dollar has been effectively devalued by approximately 27 per cent since about 1967. That is a truly astonishing reality. The United States dollar has dropped by nearly one-third its value in relation to the currencies of most other countries. For example, it has dropped 36 per cent in the past year compared to the Japanese yen. Unless we should be financiers, most of us do not pay much attention to figures of this type when we see them on the financial page of a newspaper. We might read the Wall Street Journal or scan the Globe and Mail financial section, but it requires a grounding in economics for these figures to have meaning to a layman like myself.

Over the past year I acquired a grounding in economics and undoubtedly will attain more in the coming year. Of course, the effective devaluation of 27 per cent in the United States dollar affects the life of every Canadian. When Japanese automotive companies or television companies, German steel companies or whatever, sell goods to the United States, which after all is still by far the largest trading area and consuming market in the world, they are paid in United States dollars. What do they do with those United States dollars? The company or industry is interested in protecting its purchasing power. This is a perfectly legitimate interest which has nothing to do with speculation, although the speculators, who I am sure many governments would like to get, artificially accentuate the situation.

The holding of United States dollars today is no way in which to protect your purchasing power, based on the facts. Who wants money that has been devalued by 27 per cent over the past few years, when one may have to buy iron ore, rubber or copper with it and have to exchange that money in order to pay bills in the money of the country which produces the iron ore, the copper or the rubber?

With the political situation that exists in the United States it would be difficult to have great confidence, in the near future, in the United States dollar. So, of course, companies and industries holding cheapening currencies often invest in the one commodity that always maintains its value—food. They buy food futures and drive the price of, say, soybeans, upward. The price of this commodity normally is about $80 a ton, but now it is from $450 to $600 a ton and it has been as high as $700 a ton. We know this type of activity has existed in respect of oil and gold, driving the price of gold from somewhere in the range of $30 an ounce to $175 an ounce. Of course, this is done in respect of food and prices are driven artifically higher which, as I have said, affects the purchasing power of every Canadian.

The Speech from the Throne explains that the commodity price rise is a worldwide phenomenon and mentions this serious disorder in the international economic situation. In that vein the speech proposes reasonable food prices for the consumer and the producer. As I have said, the value of commodities in some of the producing countries has been wiped out by the increase in the price of petroleum. On the other hand, there are countries such as Malaysia which have had a sudden increase in their wealth because of increased commodity prices and some self-sufficiency in respect of petroleum products.

As Canadians, I think we have the right to be resentful if our prices are artificially manipulated by speculators. On the other hand, in all conscience we cannot object too strongly to paying a fair price for some of the items which we import. We cannot object to an increase in the standard of living of deprived field workers in some tropical countries who earn 20 cents or 50 cents a day. As consumers, we cannot object too strongly to paying fair prices to Canadian food producers so long as we receive fair value.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, I have learned a good deal since I became a member of parliament and arrived in this great school for Canadians. Probably the most important thing I have learned has been something of the differences and disparities in this great country of ours. When one reads about regionalism in the newspapers, it does not seem to be very important. However, when one comes to this House of Commons, hears of the various interests represented here covering all areas of Canada and sees the representatives of 265 constituencies in one room, this is a great education to a person as a Canadian.

From Toronto it is a long way to Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Calgary and Vancouver. Last year, when beef prices increased, I prepared a paper for my constituency in the form of a newsletter. I tried to explain some of the difficulties farmers had in producing grain and beef. I think I learned a great deal about the west in the course of discussions with officials of the Department of Agriculture—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stollery: —and other members of parliament regarding the complexities of life of the western farmer about which, of course, I was not aware.

Toronto is a consuming and manufacturing area. Several months ago while attending a meeting I was fascinated when listening to a series of speakers on the difficulties related to transportation in western Canada and some of the inequities. Until then I did not understand that decisions which are made in board rooms affect every westerner. The price of manufactured articles, which is decided to a great extent by the cost of transportation, is not as closely controlled by government as it might be. It was made very clear to me that there is something very wrong about the transportation system in this country. All the complaints I have heard in this House have not been merely political complaints but have been related to some very real problems with which we must deal.

For years I have believed that in the national interest, transportation costs should not cause great disparity in any country. Many countries of the world which operate on this precept know that transportation costs are not as important as national unity. When I speak of Canada, I include the Arctic. If we are to encourage development, transportation costs must be subsidized. I note that in the Speech from the Throne there is a clear declaration that steps will be taken to end discrimination in freight rates. I hope this will be well received in western Canada.

Mr. Stollery: Canada's approach to international politics has always been, since the days of the late Lester B. Pearson, admired by the world. I am sure it must come as a pleasure and something of a surprise to learn that we are not just respected because of our diplomatic leadership: Canada nowadays is also respected as a financial power and as an important trading nation in the world. International organizations such as the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development treat Canada with great respect. It is unusual that a country is first a diplomatic power and second a financial power; usually things are the other way around. But today our percentage of world trade is greater than that of Italy, and in the OECD we are considered in the same group as Britain, Germany and France, the middle industrial powers. Our percentage of world trade in manufactured goods has increased tremendously over the past few years. We are no longer considered to be hewers of wood, and we have not been for some time.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) should be complimented on his incentives to business which have boosted manufacturing investment to record levels and already have produced many new jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: Critics say that we should stop exporting our raw materials and process these materials here in Canada. That is what our policies are aimed at. In fact, in the general area of manufacturing we may be on the threshold of the biggest technological breakthrough in our history if the government of the United Kingdom continues its interest in 18 Canada deuterium-uranium reactors—and it will not matter which government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: The Speech from the Throne mentions our interest in solving the problems of international economic disorder through some of the international organizations, the United Nations, the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, etc. This is in keeping with Canada's international approach over the past decade.

The Speech from the Throne suggests that there will be no price and wage controls. Surely, Mr. Speaker, that policy has proven so bankrupt in the two major countries which have tried it, the United States and the United Kingdom, that we should put it to death for a while.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: The United States is facing the worst inflation in its modern history after three years of the Nixon formula. In the United Kingdom, inflation is running at 15 per cent and wage controls have been a disaster to the country. Britain has been socially divided and the controls have been completely ineffective.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must remind the House and the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) in particular that his time has expired, unless he has the consent of the House to proceed. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stollery: It could almost be said that the wage and price control policy in the United Kingdom has caused more strife than any policy in the recent history of that country.

[Translation]

As it was stated in the Speech from the Throne, controlling prices is quite a difficult proposition, while it is all but too easy to control wages. Hence, controlling prices and wages amounts to controlling wages only, as the British experience has shown.

[English]

In that country, the hourly-paid worker has been set against society at large, and that can never be a healthy thing for any country. The Canadian government has taken the position that we need policies to protect the working poor, to protect those least able to look after themselves, which is how it should be.

In the last session much was done. The Canada Pension Plan and the Old Age Security Plan have been indexed every three months, and of course family allowances were increased to an average of $20 per child. Certainly all neutral observers take this as the reasonable road to combat inflation, and that is the road this government has taken—not a road which discriminates against one sector of the economy, inevitably the hourly-paid worker, and pits that sector against the rest of the country.

This Speech from the Throne is short and to the point. It covers specific areas to be dealt with by the government. As a Liberal backbencher, I find the point about this Speech from the Throne that is so gratifying is that it reflects to a great extent the views of the Liberal Party members of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: Before I was elected it was a common enough remark that if you were elected as a Liberal, and the Liberal Party formed the government, you as a backbencher were ignored. That is categorically not true. Many government policies put into effect since I have been here have been initiated from within the ranks of the Liberal Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: They are the result of a great deal of consultation with Canadians from all walks of life, and that is how it should be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, it is a great honour to be chosen by the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) and his colleagues of the Cabinet to second the motion for the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

This honour is reflected on the constituency of Sherbrooke and on the entire area of the Eastern Townships. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that, regardless of political affiliations, the people whom I have the honour of representing in the House recognize the privilege which is mine today and share this happy moment with me.

This task holds even more interest in view of the fact that the mover of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne is one of the young members of parliament who can express themselves admirably in both official languages of our country and who also speaks with great fluency the language of Cervantes. I am talking about the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery). I congratulate him for giving us such an example of perfect multilingualism.

I also share this pleasant moment with my parents, brothers and sisters in Acadia, because even though I represent a Quebec constituency in the House, I have always been proud, Mr. Speaker, of my native province, New Brunswick, and of the charming village of Saint-André de Madawaska, where I was born and spent the best years of my life. I am therefore very proud, Mr. Speaker, of my Acadian origin. Acadians—it is appropriate to note—have written one of the most moving pages of our Canadian history. They are a people who, in spite of the upheavals of history, be they old or new, have always kept the pride of their forebears and have greatly contributed to the economic, social and cultural development of the Maritimes.

For 22 years, a native Canadian has held the important position of chief of State and representative or Her Majesty in Canada. Following in the footsteps of great Canadians like Vincent Massey, Georges Vanier and Roland Mitchener, His Excellency Jules Léger brings to the prestigious position of Governor General of Canada a long experience as a diplomat who, with great ability, distinction and dignity, served Canada abroad for more than two decades. In the name of my constituents and in my own name, I wish His Excellency and Mrs. Jules Léger a happy and fruitful mandate.

Mr. Speaker, it is customary that the mover and seconder of the Address in reply refer to their constituency, its wealth, beauty and characteristics; it is a fine custom. However, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that my colleagues will not bear me a grudge if I somewhat deviate from the tradition to deal firstly of course with the Sherbrooke constituency and secondly, to make some personal comments on a problem in which I am interested and which concerns an increasing number of people, that is poverty in Canada and throughout the world.

To describe briefly the many attractions of Sherbrooke is almost an impossible task. The third largest centre in Quebec—after of course the metropolitan areas of Montreal and Quebec City—Sherbrooke is often called the Ville Reine des Cantons de l'Est, a city of almost 90,000 inhabitants.

Sherbrooke and the Eastern Townships make up an agglomeration of more than 200,000 inhabitants, an area comprising nine federal constituencies that claim, like Gaspé, Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean, the Mauricie and the Laurentians, the title of the most picturesque part of the Beautiful Province.

From a geographic standpoint, the original feature of the Eastern Townships is that they are the only urbanized area in Quebec (between Hull and Quebec City) to be situated outside the axis of the St. Lawrence River. It is a hinterland dominated by Sherbrooke which comprises nearly 60 per cent of the urban population of the area.

In short, Sherbrooke and the Eastern Townships are a town and an area of a rather important size which is endowed with institutions, customs and features of its own; in a word, which has a personality of its own and which makes it different from the other areas of Quebec and Canada.

The Sherbrooke constituency is endowed with two institutions of high learning, which is a unique feature in Canada.

● (1450)

Bishop's University, one of the oldest English-speaking institutions in Quebec, is more than a century old. Bishop's University is an institution which has greatly contributed to the educational, economic, social and cultural advancement of the eastern townships and of the province of Quebec.

The University of Sherbrooke is a young university, which after barely 20 years of existence enjoys a most enviable prestige throughout the academic world. The University Medical Centre has gained during recent years the reputation of being one of the most progressive medical centres in Canada. We also have two CEGEPs, Sherbrooke College and Champlain College, as well as several educational institutions. In our region, the tertiary sector is obviously the better organized. All these institutions are greatly responsible for the development of our youth, the most impressive potential for the Eastern Townships. Youth is a considerable force that we endeavour to develop ever more. We realize that the economic, social, and cultural development of a region, province or country must take maximum advantage of the energy, the enthousiasm and the eagerness of all the elements of society, mostly that of youth; otherwise we deny ourselves a strong momentum which can often spell the difference between failure and success.

For a few years now, Sherbrooke has developed increasingly, through the establishment of an industrial park which has attracted a number of new industries, some of which having received grants from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Despite this economic revival, Sherbrooke's secondary sector remains weak. We believe however that in the new agreement between the Quebec government and the federal government regarding areas or regions requiring economic assistance, Sherbrooke and the Eastern Townships will be one of the major priorities.

Sherbrooke is also the seat of an archdiocese, the centennial of which we will be celebrating this year. You are all invited to the celebrations which will be taking place to mark this important event.

Sherbrooke is also an area that is rich in history. Inhabited successively by the Abénaquis, the Loyalists and the French, this region was the birthplace of many great figures in Canadian history. Among the many people who have contributed to the development of Sherbrooke and the Eastern Townships, one must mention Sir Alexander Galt,—

[English]

He was the first member of parliament for Sherbrooke, minister of finance in Sir John A. Macdonald's first cabinet and one of the Fathers of Confederation.

[Translation]

—and a no less important figure from our area who was one of the greatest politicians of our times, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent.

[Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke).]

Sherbrooke and the Eastern Townships, finally, are a city and a region where French Canadians, English Canadians and new Canadians have been living in harmony for two centuries and can, in many respects, be set up as an example in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the people in Sherbrooke and the Eastern Townships are proud, industrious and hospitable. To know them is to like them, and to learn how to like and appreciate them, there is nothing better than to visit them.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, in his inaugural address, the late President John F. Kennedy said:

The world is very different now, for man holds in his mortal hands the power to abolish all forms of human poverty and all forms of human life.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when one speaks of the poverty problem in the world, there is no need to dramatize: the problem itself is dramatic enough. The fact that 16 per cent of the world population has 72 per cent of the world income and that 54 per cent of the world population has only 8 per cent of the world wealth gives us at once a fairly good idea of the gap between rich and poor countries.

The great problem of our time . . .

—said Nehru,—

. . . is not the division between communists and capitalists, but between poor and rich countries.

That difference, it should be pointed out, appeared after World War II, when most European economies, ruined by the war, received from the wealthiest country in the world, and at the time surely the most powerful on earth, the United States, $20 billion to build up their economy.

It is only after that rather spectacular recovery of Europe that we actually realized that African, Asiatic and South American countries were far behind the developed countries of Europe and North America.

Considering that developing countries have a yearly economic growth rate of 3.6 to 4.5 per cent, while in developed countries that rate is 5 to 8 per cent, one can readily realize that the gap is widening. Three quarters of the world population are undernourished and that, paradoxically, in spite of excess food productions in certain countries.

It has been said over and over again that food products should be shared more equitably. It is a fact that food-deprived countries are faced with enormous financial difficulties. Industrialization is essential to the advancement of underdeveloped countries. This is possible only through capital investments. But the income of most of these countries results from the sale of raw materials, the prices of which have constantly gone down since 1949 on world markets. These countries which must borrow money are already over the threshold of indebtedness. Subsidies and grants are not enough in themselves to ensure the sound economic progress of these countries.

Mr. Speaker, there is the serious problem of reduction in international assistance, a reduction identified by the OECD and resulting from the difficulties with which the more highly developed countries are faced and which have the tendency to overreact whenever prices on financial markets fall by 1 or 1½ per cent.

Perhaps the current energy crisis will give us one more reason to justify the present very slight effort made by most industrialized countries to help the underdeveloped nations. And yet the economic and energy potential of Canada and that of our neighbours to the south at the international level is enormous. Under all forms of energy Canada is currently using the equivalent of eight and a half tons of coal per capita per year. This is twice the consumption of western Europe and U.S.S.R. It is 160 times that of Asia and Africa.

We are among the most advanced and richest countries in the world. Proportionally, we are producing and consuming more than any nation in the world. Proudly and jealously, we are showing off our wealth to the world.

As a highly scientifically, technologically and technically developed country, Canada with a few other privileged nations has a major responsibility towards the international community and refusing it might have catastrophic consequences for the entire world.

Because of the enormous development of communications in most leading countries, it is no longer possible not to know what is going on at the other end of the world. Every day the underprivileged countries are apprised of our actions.

Obviously, we must admit that poverty is not only the most serious problem of this decade but also the most serious of the twentieth century. People are starving in the midst of affluence.

There is no way this problem can be solved through philanthropic solutions. Individual solutions are of no avail. No campaign against starvation calling for people's charity is efficient.

Underdevelopment is a political, economic and social problem that will not be solved without thorough and radical transformations in the economic, social and mental structures of peoples.

If Canada must constantly meet one of the greatest challenges that ever was, that of living close to a giant while keeping its political, economic and cultural identity, along with our American neighbours and a few other privileged nations of the earth, we are faced with the greatest challenge of the century and perhaps of history: helping the Third World escape the vicious circle of underdevelopment. Without being pessimistic, we must recognize that world peace is impossible when two thirds of mankind are starving.

If the often remarkable successes and feats of Canadians at home have helped enormously in making our country one of the most advanced in many fields, it is imperative that Canadians as a nation give particular attention to poorer and less fortunate countries.

● (1500)

[English]

Mr. Maurice Strong, former president of the Canadian International Development Agency, in one of his speeches declared:

There are three overriding influences determining our age, one is the space race, one the nuclear arms race and the third, the development race; Canada has no role to play in the first two, but in the one of the developing countries we can be a major power. We know what development means because we have done it here ourselves.

The future of the international community will depend on what rich countries will do to assist the poor ones.

Through rather complicated calculations based on realistic data and time projections, A. P. Thirnall has tried to establish how long Third World countries would take to catch up with the existing per capita income in Common Market countries. The results give food for thought.

In order to equal the existing income in countries of the European Economic Community, Peru would need 359 years, Uganda 356 and Pakistan 1,350. And the per capita income of the Common Market countries is much lower than ours.

Mr. Eppler, Minister of Cooperation of The Federal Republic of Germany, stated recently that the efforts of the rich countries for the economic and social development of poor countries have been so far much too limited and without any follow through and he stated the following:

Aid to the Third World is not a hobby for a few mislead idealists, an indulgence bought to set one's conscience at rest, a compulsory drill for bored politicians, a guarantee of exports for industrialists—but an ambitious attempt to try and make life a little more bearable for all on the "earth" space ship in order to stop it from becoming unbearable for all—an investment for a common future because that future will be common or will not be.

Economic and social development of underdeveloped countries, without being an absolute guarantee for peace in the world, would help considerably to develop greater solidarity and consequently truer international security. On May 29, 1968, the right hon. Prime Minister stated in a speech delivered in this House on the subject of Canada's participation in international co-operation, and I quote:

We accept as a major responsibility of top priority Canada's participation in the program for the economic and social development of developing countries. We will be looking at all possible means to increase the value of our aid programs by concentrating on areas and projects where our bilingualism, our own know-how, and our experience, resources and means make an efficient and truly Canadian contribution possible.

Mr. Speaker, Canada's international effort in recent years increased steadily and I am convinced we must maintain the present progress.

While continuing our efforts towards the economic and social development of our own country we should not forget our responsibilities and duties towards those who share this small planet with us.

On October 4, 1965, before the General Assembly of the United Nations His Holiness Pope Paul VI after stating that development was the new name for peace and modern technology could contribute considerably to the solution of some of our most serious problems, concluded his statement in the following manner:

[English]

Now the hour for a halt is upon us, a moment of meditation, of reflection, almost of prayer; a moment to think anew of our common origin, our history, our common destiny. Never before has there been such a need for an appeal to the moral conscience of man as there is today, in an era marked by such human progress. For the peril comes neither from progress nor from science; on the contrary, properly used, they could resolve many of the great problems which beset mankind. The real peril is in man who has at hand ever more powerful instruments, suited as much to destruction as to the highest conquests.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there are also poor people in Canada. There are poor people in each and every wealthy country. As a matter of fact, this may sound somewhat paradoxical, but no nation in the world, however developed it may be, has yet succeeded in eliminating the problem of poverty.

The task that the Canadian government undertook, namely to reduce poverty as much as possible, is an extremely difficult one. In 1966, President Johnson undertook to fight poverty and had a special budget prepared with a view to eliminating it within ten years. Those ten years are almost over and the fate of the poor, according to a recent survey, shows that their position is worse than before.

Economist Leon Keyserling, with whom John Kenneth Galbraith and Sargent Schriver had established the famous Freedom Budget in 1966, said recently, and I quote:

[English]

Manifestly, poverty is not a problem of economic costs.

Here in the United States, it is a problem of not having the political and the social and the moral will to place poverty high on the priority list—

[Translation]

And a little further, the economist said, and I quote:

[English]

Here in this country, where there can be no economic, nor technological excuse for it, poverty is not only a private tragedy but in a sense a public crime. It is above all a challenge to our morality. Materially as well as spiritually, a society afflicted by poverty deprives all of its citizens of security and well-being.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the wealthiest country in the world, spending huge amounts, did not succeed in eliminating poverty. If rich countries endeavour to solve at home the problem of poverty, obviously governments must make increased efforts in order to close as much as possible the gap between the rich and the poor.

It has to be noted that Canada acts as a pioneer in this field. Canada is the only country in the world that set up a department whose primary objective is to alleviate as much as possible the disparities that exist between the richer and the poorer regions.

One must also emphasize the fact that Canada is the only country that has, in the past few years, substantially increased and continuously readjusted pensions, allowances and income supplements paid to the most disadvantaged people in the society, that is to say large families, older people, war veterans, etc.

If one of the great principles that has guided the government has been a fairer distribution among the various areas of our country, it is only normal that this should be reflected at the individual level by better living conditions. Incidentally, it should be pointed out that some tax cuts were granted for the benefit of low income families and individuals.

Mr. Speaker, I have the clear impression that we are at a turning point in our history and that every Canadian must realize that the elimination of poverty is one of the worthiest and noblest objectives of any government.

The speech from the throne that will be before us in the next days is well in line with the position of the Canadian government: to eliminate practically all poverty in our country.

The Speech from the Throne announces measures directed at aiding producers and consumers alike, at providing for special assistance to small businesses, at ensuring further processing of raw materials in this country. Greater emphasis will be laid on regional economic expansion and on upgrading the quality of life in urban centres. Measures will be introduced for increasing expenses in the research, industrial progress and technical innovation fields. There are, of course, assistance programs for the farmers; all in all, the aim is to achieve a better distribution of our resources. All these, Mr. Speaker, are concrete measures which reflect the effort of this government to reduce the gap between developed and less developed areas of our country, between the wealthy and the poor.

The time has come for all Canadians, without exception, to do whatever they can to suppress poverty. It is high time, Mr. Speaker, besides, of course, the measures that may be introduced by the federal and provincial governments, that the wealthy people in Toronto help those less fortunate in Moncton. That people in Vancouver help people in Saskatoon. That people in Halifax help people in Rimouski and that people in Montreal help people in Prince Edward Island.

[English]

In his inaugural address, President Kennedy said:

If a free society cannot help the many who are poor, it cannot save the few who are rich.

Nature has not distributed its riches evenly in all areas of the world and yesterday's rich could be tomorrow's poor.

There was a time in the history of Canada when New Brunswick was the most prosperous province. There was also a time in the history of our country when Quebec was considered the most progressive area. Yesterday, it was Ontario, today it is Alberta and British Columbia. Tomorrow, perhaps it will be Newfoundland, Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

For more than a century, England has dominated the world on the commercial, economic and financial levels. Such was the case in other periods for France, Spain and Russia.

Two world slaughters which cost humanity 50 million human lives, some minor monetary crisis, a minor energy crisis were sufficient to make powers of yesterday experience enormous difficulties from which they may not be able to get out without the help of their friends and their neighbours.

If, on the international level, we want to reduce disparities between rich and poor by further sharing the riches of the earth, the same principle will obviously apply first to every country.

Technology enables us to believe that within a few decades sea resources will perhaps constitute the most important riches of a State. Thus, Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island may well become enormous supply sources for Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

At the rate industrialized countries are polluting our planet, drinking water will perhaps become the object of the greatest demand in Canada. In that case, Quebec could become the main supply source of drinking water for several Canadian provinces.

If, as provinces and as individuals, we share our wealth and resources, we will alleviate the disparities that now exist in several areas of the country and, at the same time, we will contribute to relieve the social pressures often aroused by poverty. Because of the poverty which exists in the world and in Canada, it is the duty not only of nations and governments but of every man to assume its responsibilities.

To be a man . . .

—Saint-Exupéry said—

. . . is precisely to be responsible; it is to feel ashamed before a hardship that did not seem to be in your control; it is to be proud of a victory that your friends have gained; it is to feel, when laying a stone, that you are contributing to build the WORLD.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my constituents I wish to express, once more to the right hon. Prime Minister, my gratitude for this privilege and I am happy to second the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1974-75

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE TREASURY BOARD

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1975, was presented by Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the main estimates for 1974-75 are made up of $22,023 million in budgetary expenditures and $1,275 million in loans.

On the budgetary expenditure side, the estimates are up $2.4 billion over forecast expenditures for 1973-74, more than three-quarters of the increase being attributable to changes in the amount for statutory items.

Much of this increase occurs in payments to those particularly vulnerable to current inflationary pressures, whether because they are raising families or are on fixed incomes or are at least partly dependent on welfare. Thus, the most prominent component of the increase is for the family allowances payments which are expected to cost $1,836 million in 1974-75. There are also much higher outlays expected for the Canada Assistance Plan and for veterans pensions and allowances.

The estimates book also records a forecast of $3,432 million for old age security and guaranteed income supplement payments.

At the Western Economic Opportunities Conference the federal government put forward a number of proposals, some of which are being put into effect through expenditures in these estimates. Most prominent among the latter are expenditures of about $43 million for the first year costs of programs of highway improvement and highway and railway development.

Faced with the necessity to increase Canada's energy supply, we are anticipating loans for the building of a CANDU reactor as well as a new heavy water plant. Funds will also be made available for the building in Cape Breton of a coal plant worth $8 million, in order to facilitate the marketing of the coal produced by the new Lingan mine. Finally, other funds are earmarked to increase the government's shares in Panarctic Oils Limited.

Three years ago the government issued for the first time a booklet dealing with the estimates and called: How Your Tax Dollar ls Spent. It is designed to better inform the public on how the government uses its revenues. Copies of the 4th edition will soon be distributed to hon. members and will also be available to the public free of charge upon request at any Information Canada Centre. The special theme this year deals with the Public Service which plays an essential role at the service of Canadians.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the minister has made a fairly lengthy statement on a very complicated subject without having made it available to any member of the opposition before delivery, it is absolutely impossible to make any worthwhile statement in reply. I can only say that I regret that the minister has not followed his own previous practice and that of his predecessors in office. If a statement is to be made on the tabling of main estimates, as is being done at present, the minister should extend to us the courtesy of making available a copy of the statement at least on entering the House, if not beforehand. The way those opposite are behaving these days is rather nonsensical, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, obviously the time for detailed comment on these estimates will be after we have had a chance to peruse them and perhaps to understand them.

I am interested in the assertion of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) once again today that it is the government's practice these days to give us more information about the spending of the government than used to be the case. I still find that hard to believe. The bigger the Blue Book gets, the less understandable information it seems to contain.

Since we have been presented with this volume and with the minister's statement without any prior warning, the only comment I wish to make is that I do not like it when increased expenditures seem to be blamed in the main, as I thought the President of the Treasury Board did today, on the increase in social security, veterans' pensions and allowances, welfare payments and so on. I insist that these payments are not charges against the treasury or the government. They are an attempt by society to move to some extent in the direction of equalizing the positions of our people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is one of the best things that organized society does—to collect from those who have in order to make it possible for those who have less, or those who have nothing, to enjoy something of the standard of living society as a whole is now able to produce. We are concerned about the waste that no doubt we will find in these estimates, but we welcome the improvement in social security reflected in the book the minister has tabled.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, like our colleagues in the opposition, we have regretfully heard the minister's statement without having received any advance notice nor a copy of the statement itself so as to be able, in essence, to look at it in order to make the necessary comments.

We shall therefore refrain from making any comment for now, but be assured that when the discussion of the estimates is possible we shall take part in it and that no advance notice will be required from the minister.

WEST COAST SALMON STOCKS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 to seek the consent of the House to move a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the allegations that Canada is taking a weak stand in the discussions with the United States about the interception of the salmon stocks of each country on the west coast, and the need to explore those allegations and refute them, if necessary. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry be authorized to conduct an inquiry into all aspects of the relationship between Canada and the United States regarding stocks of salmon, with particular reference to the discussions that have been taking place between our two countries recently with respect to an agreement relating to the salmon stocks of each country.

PROPOSED INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, there is a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the growing rumours that the consumer price of bread will shortly be raised by four cents. In view of the fact the Food Prices Review Board has recommended that only half that projected raise is justifiable I should like to move under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis):

That this House instruct the government to take all the steps necessary to ensure that there be no increase in the consumer price of bread beyond, at the maximum, the two cents considered justifiable by the Food Prices Review Board.

That in view of the extreme concern of farmers in Leeds and Grenville counties resulting from the outbreak of brucellosis among cattle in the area, this House requests the government to enunciate a clear policy on the matter of whether or not to vaccinate cattle against this disease in place of the present so-called de-emphasizing program, and also this House requests the government to bring compensation payments for cattle necessarily destroyed because of brucellosis more in line with current market values.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—MEASURES TO PROTECT SMALL INVESTORS AGAINST EROSION OF INVESTMENTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. the Prime Minister relating to one or two aspects of the government's anti-inflationary program not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. First, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has any measures in mind to enable the ordinary, small Canadian saver or investor to protect himself or herself against the kind of erosion in the purchasing value of his investment that was suffered last year, 10 per cent, in face of a similar threat this year? Can the House expect the Prime Minister to present any measure which will offer some safeguard to the small Canadian saver?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe it was indicated in the Speech from the Throne that we are very much in favour of taking specific action in specific cases. The Leader of the Opposition asks me if we have measures in mind. Yes, Mr. Speaker. The cabinet is looking at various approaches. As to when they will be announced, I am afraid the Leader of the Opposition will have to exercise his usual patience.

Mr. Stanfield: No doubt, Mr. Speaker, this will unfold as the universe unfolds.

Oral Questions

CANADIAN CRUDE OIL—POSSIBILITY OF EXTENSION OF PRICE FREEZE BEYOND APRIL 1, 1974

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is now the intention or within the contemplation of the government to extend the freeze on Canadian crude oil beyond April 1, although it was indicated at the energy conference that the freeze would come off on April 1 and the Prime Minister said, I believe, that what he called a reasonable price increase would take place? Is it now contemplated that the freeze will be extended?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition is talking about continuation of the present freeze, the answer is no. There is no contemplation of that being continued past April 1; but, of course, it is in the government's plans to ensure that there will be a freeze in the sense that there will be a lower price in Canada than the world price. In that sense we are going to ask for the co-operation of the provinces, the industry and, hopefully, of the opposition parties in supporting the government so that Canadians will pay a lower price than the world price.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROPOSED INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in the area of the cost of living I want to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he is contemplating any action to make certain that the increase of four cents in the price of a loaf of bread proposed by the Bakery Council will not take place in view of the recommendation of the Food Prices Review Board that the increase ought to be no more than two cents per loaf?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that the government's position with respect to unjustifiable food price increases has been confirmed in the recent Speech from the Throne. The Food Prices Review Board is, I understand, currently reviewing the situation in order to come up with a final report on the implications of what has been proposed by the industry. We will certainly be prepared to assume our responsibilities once this information is available to us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, no one can help but be struck by the minister's commitment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: I would ask the minister exactly how he proposes to assume his responsibility in view of the fact he has refused to produce to Parliament legislation that would give either the board or him authority to roll back an unjustifiable price increase?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, we have demonstrated our commitment in the past to deal with these kinds of matters and we will be prepared to do so again.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is much use pursuing this particular minister.

DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES ON PREVENTION OF INCREASE IN PRICE OF MILK

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to pose a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of reports that there may be an increase in the price of milk. In view of the discussions the minister has had and the agreements he has reached with the agencies of a number of the provinces, may I ask whether there have been any further discussions with regard to the subsidy or any form of action by the government to avoid an increase in the price to the consumer of milk, a product so essential to the health of Canadians, particularly children?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have had consultations with several of the provinces. Several provinces have stated they are desirous of increasing the price of milk because of increased input costs. According to the agreement we signed with them, if they can prove to us they require increased prices because their costs have gone up and the increased cost of input to them varies from 5 to 10 per cent, we immediately open negotiations with them. We have allowed the province of Quebec—I believe it is the only one—a two cent a quart raise in their price, but the federal subsidy of five cents a quart still stays in position.

RISING COST OF LIVING—SUBSIDIZATION OF CONSUMERS

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the staggering rise in the cost of living, specially that of food, does he plan to subsidize consumers in order to make up for the erosion of the purchasing power of Canadians and so give them access to Canadian production?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If the hon. member is alluding to the subsidies granted in specific cases, the answer, Mr. Speaker, is obvious since the government has already acted and will continue to act to that effect as long as it is deemed necessary. If, on the other hand, the hon. member means general subsidies to be granted all consumers for all sorts of reasons, then the answer is no.

[English]

PROPOSED INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—POSITION OF MINISTER

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has the minister discussed with the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board the question of the proposed increase in the price of bread? If so, has he satisfied himself that the four cent increase in the price of a loaf of bread announced by the Bakery Council of Canada cannot be justified? If so, what immediate steps does he propose to take?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have received the interim report which was issued by the board to the public. I will be anxiously awaiting the results of the work it now has under way so that the government as a whole can take decisions in this matter, the program being one that is administered, of course, by the Wheat Board.

Mr. McGrath: Has the minister satisfied himself, and if not, why not, that this four cent increase in the price of bread cannot be justified?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think we should take a serious view of any major increase in the retail price of bread at this time. We would want to assure ourselves that any increase implemented by the industry was fully justified on the basis of increased costs and did not come from an increase in the price of flour which was supposed to have been stabilized by the subsidy program administered by the Wheat Board.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the failure of the government's flour stabilization or subsidization program to have the desired effect and in view of the skyrocketing cost of sugar, which is a further contributing factor, what immediate steps does the government propose to take to prevent further increases in this staple foodstuff?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member recognizes that this program has helped to prevent increases in the price of bread which would have otherwise taken place. As I said in answer to other questions and as was committed in the Speech from the Throne, we are certainly prepared to carry out our responsibilities where and when necessary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members have supplementaries. Perhaps for the moment the Chair might recognize the right hon. member for Prince Albert and return to supplementaries on this subject later.

GRAIN

PROVISION OF BOXCARS TO TRANSPORT WHEAT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister reporting for the Canadian Wheat Board. Farmers all over western Canada are being pressed to deliver their wheat so that the Wheat Board can carry out its responsibilities under international agreements and the like. However, cars are not available. Figures I received for last week, and I ask whether they are correct, indicate that the number of railway cars is 7,800 behind the target of the Wheat Board for west coast delivery and 4,811 cars below the target for delivery to Thunder Bay.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman might now like to ask the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I find that sometimes the government has not looked into these things and I have to give them information.

● (1430)

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask what is being done to secure the necessary cars. The farmers are being urged on the one hand to deliver grain but there is no place to deliver it.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, farmers are being asked to deliver wherever there is a possibility of their doing so. There is, of course, significantly more space in the elevator system as a whole in the prairie region at this time this year compared with the same time last year. There are real difficulties facing individual farmers in areas where snowfall has been heavier than normal. This has no doubt led to problems of farm delivery in some cases. We are asking every participating section of the industry, the railways, the elevator companies and the farmers, to do their utmost to ensure the maximum amount of grain movement. Either the failure of the grain to come in or failure to move it forward can become an impediment to Wheat Board sales.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No snow job like that can cover up the government's failure. Let that be clear. Despite all the explanations the minister has endeavoured to place before the House I ask him, what is he doing to ensure a supply of cars? I suggested to him before—he brushed it aside but again I press it—that a boxcar controller be given authority by parliament—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might be given an opportunity to reply to the right hon. member's supplementary question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I had not finished my question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: That is precisely what I was afraid of.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I did not wish to interrupt the right hon. gentleman but I was hoping he would soon reach the point where he would ask a question so that the minister might be given an opportunity to answer and we might be able to proceed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am trying to get an answer from the minister: I know he needs protection against questions. I ask him whether he will now give consideration to bringing before the House a measure giving power to a freight car controller to direct the railway companies to make cars available to this important sector of the economy and providing for prosecution and stern penalties in the event of failure to comply?

Mr. Lang: We are indeed prepared to consider every step necessary to ensure that the railways carry out their responsibilities effectively rather than simply making up excuses. No doubt, very real problems have arisen. On the other hand, I say to the right hon. gentleman that I know he has difficulty in appreciating that we have already moved so much grain this year that we have almost exceeded the amount moved at any time during his administration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The farmers will not be misled by that eye-wash.

PROVISION OF BOXCARS TO TRANSPORT WHEAT—COMMITMENT BY RAILWAYS TO MEET TARGETS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): In view of the fact that officials of the Wheat Board are concerned that they will not be able to meet the export targets they now have before them, and since many elevator delivery points in western Canada are congested, has the minister held a meeting with officials of the CNR and the CPR and is he able to tell the House that he has received any commitment from the railroads to meet the targets to which they have agreed with respect to Vancouver and Thunder Bay?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): We have held such meetings. I am not yet satisfied with the commitments I have received.

PLANS TO COPE WITH FARMERS' INCREASING INPUT COSTS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture following the first series of questions asked today. Since the farm input price index for Canadian agriculture has increased over the fourth quarter of 1972 by some 20 per cent for the country as a whole—24 per cent in eastern Canada and 14.9 per cent in western Canada—will the minister tell us what specific plans the government has prepared to cope with the ever-rising input costs which farmers are experiencing?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The measures were outlined in the Speech from the Throne yesterday.

Mr. Murta: The minister tells us they were outlined in the Speech from the Throne yesterday. I would ask him to refer specifically to that part of the speech in which those measures were outlined so that the Canadian people might be better informed.

Mr. Whelan: I have been preparing the ground for some 15 months. We planted the seed yesterday and I hope that before the crop comes through the ground—

An hon. Member: What about fertilizer?

Mr. Whelan: —I shall be explaining this in greater detail when I speak in the House later.

TRADE

STATUS OF CUBAN ORDER FOR LOCOMOTIVES PLACED WITH MONTREAL FIRM—INQUIRY AS TO ORDER FOR AUTOMOBILES

Mr. Ed Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the minister aware that the government of Cuba has placed an order for 25 locomotives with a Montreal firm? If so, can he inform the House whether the sale is to be proceeded with and, if not, why not?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am aware that the Cuban government is interested in placing such an order. I am also aware that the company's American directors are encountering some difficulties. Representations have been made to the United States government to which we have not yet received a formal reply.

Mr. Broadbent: My supplementary arises from a related matter, namely, that the government of Cuba has changed its policy concerning the importation of North American-produced automobiles of the type once made only in Canada and the United States but now also manufactured in South America, and has recently placed orders in Argentina for automobiles produced by General Motors, Ford and Chrysler. Can the minister tell the House whether such an original order was placed in Canada and, if so, were his officials involved in the negotiations surrounding such an order? If the answer is yes, can the hon. gentleman tell the House what position the government took?

Mr. Gillespie: I have already stated we are aware of the interest of the Cuban government in making a purchase of Canadian-manufactured locomotives.

Mr. Broadbent: Automobiles.

Mr. Gillespie: I am unaware of any interest on the part of the Cuban government in placing an order for Canadian-made automobiles.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

TYPE OF REVIEW OF OPERATIONS OF COMMISSION

Mr. Frank Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I would not want him to be unhappy because I did not put a question to him on the first day.

An hon. Member: Big deal!

Mr. Ellis: In light of the minister's statement in Quebec that there would be an inquiry into the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the reference in the Speech from the Throne to a comprehensive review of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, would the minister now indicate the extent and type of the inquiry and the timing?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): As the throne speech indicated, amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act will be introduced during this session as part of an ongoing, comprehensive inquiry based on our experience in the past few years. It is not an inquiry in one sense, but rather a deep analysis; an evaluation of a very significant program and it is under way at the present time.

Mr. Ellis: I gather from what the minister says that he does not intend to hold a public inquiry. I want to bring one point to his attention—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member should ask a question.

Mr. Ellis: Would the minister not agree that the cost of administration alone would justify an inquiry?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think it is in order to ask a question in those terms; it is in the nature of an argument.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

POSSIBILITY OF ACT BEING DISINCENTIVE TO WORK—SAVING TO TAXPAYERS UNDER LEGISLATION TO BE INTRODUCED

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to a question asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Hastings. As a result of the comprehensive review related to the Unemployment Insurance Commission, can the minister advise whether there have been any specific studies in relation to this review to determine the relationship between high unemployment, high UIC benefits and the high job vacancy rate? In other words, has the minister been able to determine whether in fact the act as presently constituted is a disincentive to work and, if so, what is the answer?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I can quite categorically say that if this is an attempt to focus entirely upon unemployment insurance as the only potential factor in respect of work-ethic erosion, I think it is most unfair and too narrow. One surely would have to examine a great many other factors such as job barriers, employers' attitudes, changing attitudes toward work, education, wages and working conditions and a whole series of other things and recognize that this problem is not peculiar to Canada but exists in nearly all countries of the western world.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would remind hon. members that we will be running short of time soon and perhaps we should limit the number of supplementaries at this stage. The hon. member will be recognized for a last supplementary question.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the minister does not have to adopt an argumentative attitude. I asked a simple question and I have not received an answer yet. I should like to ask him a supplementary question. When he brought in Bill C-125 last session he indicated it would save the Canadian taxpayers $100 million. I am sure he must have some figures in respect of the pending legislation. I should now like to ask if he can advise the House how much the Canadian taxpayers will be saved if and when this bill is introduced as contemplated in the throne speech? Has he any figure in that regard?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, when the bill is introduced in the House I will try to make available all possible information to hon. members.

DISPOSITION OF GEORGE DERBY HOSPITAL LANDS BURNABY—NEGOTIATIONS WITH MUNICIPALITY

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the fact the province of British Columbia has given permission to the municipality of Burnaby to negotiate a deal for the George Derby lands in Burnaby, will the minister advise whether he will negotiate with the municipality and turn this land over at a price comparable with what the federal government paid for it?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, negotiations are presently going on between our department and the province of British Columbia in respect of a possible transfer. I do not have the authority to transfer the George Derby lands to the municipality. However, I am meeting with Burnaby officials tomorrow and I am prepared to discuss the matter.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Does he think a deal could be made in respect of the George Derby lands

COLLINS BAY—FAILURE OF DOUGLAS BOOTH TO RETURN FOLLOWING TEMPORARY ABSENCE PASS—PAROLE SYSTEM

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General which arises from the recent escape of a prisoner who was convicted of murder and given a sentence of life imprisonment in accordance with the law. I think the Solicitor General will know the answer as I spoke to him about the matter yesterday. Has that person been recaptured or is he still at large at the present time?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to Mr. Douglas Joseph Booth who was in the Collins Bay minimum security institution, I can say that he is still at large.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: He was out on a temporary absence pass and failed to return on February 23, 1974.

An hon. Member: He is probably in the gallery.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: This man had been given 16 previous temporary absence passes which had all been observed with the exception of one when he returned late, but voluntarily. He has been in minimum security since 1971, and he has been in prison now for eight years.

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the fact that this is of concern to all Canadians living in urban centres, is the minister now prepared to adopt a system whereby the Parole Board would have jurisdiction in respect of the release of people who have been charged and convicted of murder and given life imprisonment under the new amendments to the code in order to avoid this type of mistake and mistakes like the Head case?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, we have already taken the decision to have all long-term absences, that is, more than three days, handled by the Parole Board, and there are no more back-to-back passes. We have already amended the law so that no person who has been convicted of murder can be considered for day or temporary parole until he has served seven years. This man had been in prison for eight years and had a good record in prison.

SUGGESTED CURTAILMENT OF EXPORT OF CERTAIN BUILDING MATERIALS TO IMPROVE DOMESTIC SUPPLY

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of serious shortages of certain essential building materials, is the minister considering measures to curtail the export of these materials in order to improve the supply position on the domestic market?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that there are shortages among some important building materials. Some of these have been caused by strikes or transportation problems which are temporary—

An hon. Member: And by the weather.

Mr. Gillespie: —and some as a result of a lack of plant capacity. I am also informed that a number of important plant expansions are under way or projected at the present time which will increase supplies. In view of the fact that the lumber market has been easing recently I do not propose to take any action at the present time.

AIRPORTS

MIRABEL—TYPE OF PUBLIC GROUND TRANSPORTATION TO BE PROVIDED

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, I shall ask my question to the Minister of Public Works.

Would the hon. minister inform this House—

Mr. Speaker: Gentlemen, order please. I recognize the hon. member for Joliette.

Mr. La Salle: I thank you, Mr. Speaker; you are understanding as usual.

Would the hon. Minister of Public Works inform this House if, at the opening of Mirabel airport, the bus service will be the only public ground transportation system provided to international passengers between Montreal, Dorval and Mirabel airport?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, if I understood correctly, this question should be asked to my colleague, the Minister of Transport who has jurisdiction over Mirabel airport.

Mr. La Salle: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I had precisely pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that in the absence of the Minister of Transport, I thought that the Minister of Public Works was familiar with the matter. So I shall ask my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the hon. Minister of Transport, my good friend from St. Boniface.

Is the Parliamentary Secretary able to answer the question I asked before to the hon. Minister of Public Works?

[English]

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, while the minister is not in the House, I can say that he is in his office at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): He has asked me to answer on his behalf. In respect of the particular question asked by the hon. member, I should like to tell him that I will bring the matter to the attention of the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO FORMULA TO COMPENSATE COMPANIES IN LIGHT OF PRICES PAID FOR IMPORTED OIL

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has his department prepared a formula for compensating the oil companies for the prices they are paying for imported oil? Can he give the House any information regarding the formula? What is the anticipated cost per month and what is the price per barrel upon which the formula is based?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions in this regard but an appropriate formula has not yet been finalized. It would be the intention of the government to present a measure to the House for the specific purpose of appropriating the funds necessary to provide a cushion to eastern Canadian consumers against the increased prices.

CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON FORMULA TO BE USED WHEN CRUDE OIL PRICE FREEZE EXPIRES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the Prime Minister's statement earlier today that the present price freeze will end at the end of March and that a new formula will take its place, may I ask the minister what consultations are going on at present with the provincial governments, both at the official and ministerial levels, and whether the minister has any plans to meet the ministers of the various provincial governments involved?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): There have already been consultations at the official level and the Prime Minister will be meeting a number of the premiers from the producing provinces in the very near future specifically to discuss this question.

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE ANNOUNCEMENT OF INTERIM PAYMENT

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Having made the announcement that the initial price for grain will be raised, will he also announce the interim payment for all grain that has been delivered until now? Will he make the announcement immediately rather than wait until the fall?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when we indicated that initial prices were going to be raised for the balance of the crop year and, except in the case of barley, restored to approximately the same level on August 1, at the same time we announced that adjustment payments worth about $400 million would be made as soon as possible and that is some time towards the end of March or the beginning of April.

SPORTS

MEASURES TO BLOCK WORLD FOOTBALL LEAGUE ENTRY IN TORONTO

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the minister's recent statement regarding the government's intention to block the World Football League's entry in Toronto, can the minister advise the House as to what measures he proposes to take to initiate this move and if in fact legislation will be introduced regarding this matter?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that all necessary measures will be taken to that effect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: I did not expect anything better from the minister at this time, but I have a supplementary question. Keeping in mind every Canadian's opinion on "Canadianizing" football in this country, can the minister advise the House if he is prepared to take steps to make a greater Canadian content in the Canadian Football League compulsory and, if so, when and, if not, why not?

Mr. Lalonde: There again, the hon. member will have ample opportunity to discuss this issue if and when steps are required to be taken.

Mr. Bell: How about baseball?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. Paul's.

POSSIBLE PROHIBITION OF NATIONAL FOOTBALL LEAGUE FRANCHISE IN MONTREAL

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. Would he indicate, if he is going to introduce legislation or take measures, whether he would also include a prohibition against any National Football League franchise going to the Montreal Olympic stadium after 1976, and would he also indicate whether he has had assurances from Mayor Drapeau along this line?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member to read my speech in that respect. He might learn a few things.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Oral Questions

CONSULTATION WITH COMMUNITY-OWNED CANADIAN FOOTBALL TEAMS TO PREVENT ENTRY OF WORLD FOOTBALL LEAGUE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of representations that I believe have been made to the minister from community-owned football teams in Canada and in light of the statement he made subsequent to that, can the minister advise if he is presently consulting further with community-owned professional football teams in Canada to obtain their views as to what methods the government can and should take to prevent the World Football League from operating in Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, obviously the government will have to accept its own responsibilities in that respect and make its own decisions in what we consider to be the national interest. I am in consultation with the president of the Canadian Football League who happens to be a gentleman from Edmonton, Alberta, and represents a team that is community-owned.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEAKAGE OF CLASSIFIED INFORMATION—ACTION TAKEN AGAINST PERSON RESPONSIBLE

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, as long ago as November 16 I inquired of the Secretary of State for External Affairs what action he had taken following the disclosure on November 5 in the House that classified information had been made available improperly to a member of the House. I should like to ask the minister now whether there has been a dismissal from the Department of External Affairs or CIDA following this unusual performance?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there has been a resignation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): My supplementary question is to ask the minister whether he will provide reasons to the House why a resignation was accepted rather than charges being pressed because a member of the public service failed to honour his word under his Oath of Secrecy?

Mr. Sharp: I think that some of the reasons will be fairly clear. We did not consider that it was necessary to dismiss this official or to take action against him, since he was prepared to resign. So that there would not be an unnecessary blot upon his character in looking for another job. We accepted this way out which I think is the "liberal" way.

Mr. Speaker: There are three or four minutes left before the end of the question period. If the hon. member has a brief supplementary question he might ask it, following which I will see the hon. member for Rimouski.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): My brief supplementary is to ask the minister whether he is satisfied that this form of dealing with the matter will preserve the integrity and usefulness of the Canadian foreign service?

Mr. Sharp: The Canadian foreign service was not involved in this particular case, and I am satisfied that we took the right action under the existing circumstances. I can imagine other circumstances under which a different kind of action would have been appropriate.

In view of the impact of sugar prices on many food commodities, would the hon. minister inform the House of the measures he intends to take to put profiteers to reason?

FISHERIES

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING QUOTAS AND SEIZURE OF CATCHES IN LIGHT OF HARDSHIPS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the hardships imposed on Canadian fishermen because of the implementation of an order in council on January 15, 1974, is it the minister's intention to amend the regulations as they apply to Canadian fishing quotas and especially as these regulations apply to the seizure of fishermen's catches?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the answer essentially is no. I might also point out to the hon. member that the quantity of fish taken was roughly the same last year as in 1972 and incomes were up about one-third.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will be recognized for a supplementary, followed by the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

Mr. Crouse: Fishermen are required by law to handle the catch when it is landed on deck. So I ask the minister, what steps is he planning to take to protect the rights of all individual fishermen working on the deck of a dragger since these fishermen have no authority whatsoever to determine the area in which the captain decides to carry out fishing operations?

Mr. Davis: This question is one of detail. I will inquire into the matter and get in touch with the hon. member.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF DECISION TO CLOSE RESEARCH CENTRE AT SUFFIELD, ALBERTA

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence and refers to last week's announcement by the minister of the closing of the defence research activities at Suffield, Alberta. In view of the hardships imposed on some 184 families in that community who are affected by this decision, and in view of the tremendous loss of business activity in the Medicine Hat area due to this proposed action, will the minister now consider an immediate review of the local circumstances involved in this decision with a view to possible indefinite postponement of the announced closure?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice that he intended to ask this question. I believe he is aware that the research establishment at Suffield has been phasing out for several years. My announcement last week was simply to confirm that the phase-out would continue for another three years and that the research activities will be terminated in 1977. However, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the personnel involved will have their positions protected as far as possible and we will make every effort to see that the people he is concerned about are successfully relocated.

IMPORTATION OF TURKEYS FROM UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR TARIFF PROTECTION FOR WESTERN PRODUCERS OR IMPORT CONTROLS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that American turkeys are now coming into Ontario, thus driving down the price of western Canadian turkeys by 3½ cents a pound, is the minister prepared to give the western producers some tariff protection, or is he planning to impose import controls on American turkeys?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have received a brief from the new Canadian turkey marketing board and at the present time we are considering the representations they have made to us.

IMPORTATION OF DES-FED CATTLE FROM UNITED STATES—STEPS TO PROTECT CANADIANS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns the thousands of American cattle that are being imported into Canada weekly. As these cattle can be fed DES, a food additive which is banned in Canada, what steps has his department taken to protect the Canadian people?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in the United States the decision to ban DES has been thrown out of court. No cattle fed DES will be coming into Canada for at least six weeks, or possibly two months, because producers in that country will just be restarting their program now. They have plans to add the DES supplement to their cattle feed, but they are not going to do that and ship the cattle to us the next day. We are watching the situation, and we will meet with the Minister of National Health and Welfare later today.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached or gone beyond the end of the question period but perhaps the Chair would be allowed briefly to recognize the hon. member for Shefford and the hon. member for Edmonton West and then call orders of the day.

FINANCE

SUGGEST REMOVAL OF SIX-MONTH LIMIT ON LOANS TO PROVINCES BY BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

In view of the fact that the Speech from the Throne recognizes and decides in favour of the formerly brilliant premier of British Columbia as regards provincial participation in bank ownership, does the minister intend to use this same opportunity to admit the necessity of eliminating the six-month limit on loans currently granted to the provinces by the Bank of Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might elaborate on this question when introducing shortly legislation enabling the provinces to invest in chartered banks in Canada. As stated by the hon. member, it is a coincidence that the author of this proposal is today in the galleries.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ATTEMPTED REFORM OF INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND AND EFFECT OF GOLD MARKET ON CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister tell the House if he is going to make a statement on motions in the very near future, or possibly in the forthcoming debate, giving in detail the position of attempts to reform the International Monetary Fund, the results of the abortive conference in Rome, the related question of the effect on Canadian currency of the wild gold market, as well as all related matters?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be speaking in the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, but whether I should explore all these matters through a more detailed statement on motions is perhaps something that I will have to judge later.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Wednesday, February 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stollery for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to associate myself with the tributes paid by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) to His Excellency the Governor General and Her Excellency, and to extend to the Governor General and his wife the best wishes of the members of my party.

I would also like to extend our greetings to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of this country, because to whatever extent the good fortune of the country is measured by the calibre of the people who devote their working years to the public service, then to the fullest of that extent Canada is indeed a most fortunate country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the members of the treasury benches will not take that remark too personally.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That's a very nice compliment.

Mr. Sharp: Just continue in the same vein.

[Translation]

Mr. Stanfield: At the beginning of this new session, I would like to salute you, Mr. Speaker, and assure you of our sincere co-operation in carrying on satisfactory proceedings in the House. You have before you an official opposition more vigorous than ever—especially since our Quebec membership has increased by 50 per cent since Tuesday—and especially determined to play fully its parliamentary role not only as a critic of the government but also as a potential government. And since the past is a guarantee for the future, we rely greatly on your fairness and usual impartiality to enable us to perform our duty in all its rigour.

Before coming to the heart of the matter, allow me, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the mover and seconder, the hon. members for Spadina and Sherbrooke (Messrs. Stollery and Pelletier). They have brilliantly discharged a difficult task even to the extent that their interventions were almost more significant than the main paper itself.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

[English]

Sir, we meet at this time under the threat of a very severe dislocation of the world's economy, a threat to economic stability and economic progress arising from restrictions placed on the export of oil by some oil producing countries and from enormous balance of payments problems created by very substantial increases in the price of crude oil. These balance of payments problems are faced by most oil consuming countries. This situation poses great problems not only for the world but for our own country. Unless ways can be developed, through collective action, to enable countries to continue policies of reasonable growth, country after country may be forced to retrench, to slow down in order to avoid collapse leading quite possibly to difficulties for trading partners and therefore a reaction in our own economic conditions in Canada and, at worst, leading to a general, worldwide economic depression.

● (1510)

This is a severe problem for developed countries, but underdeveloped countries which must import their energy are threatened with catastrophe. This matter is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I was happy to see it there, but I sensed nothing in the throne speech indicating the depth of concern that I believe this impending or possible catastrophe should evoke. Nor did I see any indication of any proposals to meet the horrendous problems for the relatively poor countries which must import their energy or, indeed, for developed countries which are faced with substantial threats of dislocation.

I suggest that this problem facing developed countries which are large importers of energy, and underdeveloped countries which must rely on external sources of energy, presents the greatest challenge to western leadership that the western world has faced since the end of World War II.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I am not happy to say that it is difficult to feel confident that such leadership exists today. I do not expect Canada to supply all the answers or to take all the initiatives, but we are in a rather unique position to show leadership. Because individuals and companies have found petroleum in Canada in sufficient quantities to make us, for the time being at least, relatively independent in the sense that we export about as much as we import, we are in a position of relative independence and therefore are in a position to be somewhat objective and to offer leadership in that sense.

I am not sure that we are doing very much more than being smug. I hope to hear in this House very shortly definite statements by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) as to precisely what Canada is proposing by way of collective action to assure stability and, indeed, continued progress in trade among developed countries, and precisely what we are proposing to head off these tremendous problems faced by underdeveloped countries which must import oil at vastly increased prices. I would have more confidence in Canada's contribution toward reducing these economic problems if I saw more evidence that the government had a deeper understanding of our domestic problems and, above all, a real determination to face the problems that exist within our own country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The essence of what needs to be said by me, on behalf of the official opposition, as the government is about to be faced with its first test of confidence in this new session can be boiled down to very few words; in fact, one word pretty well does it, and that word is "failure".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I refer to failure to attack the root causes of domestic inflation, failure to deal adequately with the effects of that inflation, failure to subdue and control its own aggrandizement, failure to open itself and particular programs to the scrutiny of impartial inquiry, and failure to maintain order and justice in our economy for the ordinary Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Worst of all, on so many counts, is the failure to even try. This is the real failure of leadership, the failure to dare to perform at the level demanded by the challenges and opportunities before this country today. One even gets the impression that the government has failed to comprehend what is going on in this country. The government is living in some world of its own without contact with anybody else in this country except perhaps its own backbenchers. The question that arises is not simply where is there an adequate response to the problems facing Canadians today, but where is there some indication that this government is sensitive to the human indignities and injustices created by these problems?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Why will not this government commit itself to correcting as many of these situations as possible, as quickly as possible? The word from the government side is that they will step in as they have in the past and use specific measures. Surely that is just another way of saying that they will twitch if they are being poked. The government promises to step in to cushion consumers against sudden and disruptive price increases in essential commodities, and to prevent groups from taking undue advantage of the current situation.

Mr. Speaker, how can we take that kind of situation seriously, in view of what we see going on in the country? What assurance can the average Canadian worker, the average wage earner, take from a statement like that? We have no idea what this government defines as essential commodities, let alone what it believes would represent a disruptive price increase. How can we expect the worker in Canada to have any confidence in this kind of statement when he knows very well that during 1973 the increase in the cost of living rose faster than his earnings, and he fell behind.

The government stresses some proposals regarding food production incentives. They are needed, but this is a pretty belated conversion on the part of an administration which just a few short years ago was discouraging production and has never devoted proper attention to increasing storage capacity. Are they really concerned yet about doing our part to help feed the world? Are they really concerned this time around because there is an almost biblical justice in the price we are now paying for their short-sightedness. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) knows what I mean by this. He knows how emphatically we told him that LIFT as a thing unto itself was wrong economically, wrong socially and wrong morally.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: As helpful as any incentives to food production and improved storage and related facilities may be, these are surely long-term operations in terms of having a stabilizing effect on prices. As Lord Keynes said quite a number of years ago, "In the long run we will all be dead". I ask the government, Mr. Speaker, what it intends to do for the ordinary Canadian in our economy. In the absence of a comprehensive program, the government appears to be ready for more selective subventions and more selective interventions. These seem to be the government's chosen alternatives. Yet nobody on the treasury benches seems to be able to tell just how far we will go down that road and just how many thumbs will be used to plug how many holes in how many dikes.

● (1520)

We are told that we shall see a further unfolding of the universe. That was apparent in the House this afternoon during the question period. Perhaps we shall see that when the budget is presented. The Minister of Finance has been talking recently about a budget being brought down perhaps in April, perhaps in May or perhaps some time in the long run. In the present state of policy or, rather, lack of policy in this country, this is not good enough. It is clear that we need an earlier budget, almost an immediate budget, so that we can see what specifics the government has in mind to provide some further relief for the Canadian people.

A good many initiatives could be taken to protect in a more humanitarian fashion those who cannot protect themselves. I consider deplorable that none is included in the list of government measures, and I am very much afraid that the victims of this state of things would not judge with kindness a parliament which is merely letting the government mark time and insinuate that it might take action in the future.

I intend to keep today to some very important items, as far as I am concerned. The members from my party will deal with some other aspects in the course of the debate.

The group of citizens we are most concerned about is that of retired Canadians. To what extent does the upgrading of Canadian pensions cope with the realities of life for retired people? When it was decided to upgrade the old age pensions, we indicated that the Guaranteed Income Supplement should also be escalated in line with the requirements of the most deprived retired people. We know that all citizens must spend 90 per cent of their income on food, clothing and lodging, that is to say, on the necessaries of life. It is a fact that the prices of these necessaries increase more rapidly than those of other goods and services. Therefore, would it not be logical and more equitable to make the escalation of the Guaranteed Income Supplement more in line with the unvarnished reality.

[English]

Why should the federal treasury continue to extract the federal sales tax on clothing purchased by our citizens on fixed incomes? The government claimed in the last budget that the removal of sales tax on children's clothing had some beneficial effect in holding down the prices of these articles. Why can we not remove the federal sales tax on all clothing?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Also, consider what inflationary housing costs are doing to our citizens, especially the aged, and what is happening to their savings, if they have any. As to housing, I recall that just one year ago the Minister of Finance liked to talk about housing in terms of increasing supply. Now, one year after the budget which he presented at that time, housing starts are declining and the vacancy rate for apartments has dropped to a level where an unscrupulous operator can pretty well charge whatever the traffic will bear. Let there be no misunderstanding as to why my joy is restrained when this government talks about fixing everything by increasing supply in the long run.

In the area of housing, even scored against its own expressed aim of increasing supply, the proven result of government policy is one of dismal failure. In the wake of this policy, social priorities are becoming more and more distorted as we have seen housing becoming more and more an investment shelter for those who can swing the financing. Then to cap this disgrace, the government has continued in the past and continues today to profiteer in the operation by way of a flat rate sales tax which sees government revenues go up as the cost of building materials in this country goes ever higher. Obviously, as part of any effective anti-inflation program this tax on building materials should be reduced, preferably eliminated altogether.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I say to my hon. friends opposite as earnestly as I can that we in this country cannot continue to permit this continuation of spiralling housing costs. We cannot permit housing costs to rise at the rate at which they have been rising. I do not accept the idea that it is beyond our power in Canada to bring some degree of order into the price of housing in this country. The cost of shelter has reached absurd heights. The rate of price escalation is absurd and must be stopped.

I spoke about our older citizens and what inflation is doing to their savings. This erosion, this confiscation, applies not only to older Canadians. The time for action is now, not some months hence, not when the universe unfolds, not in the long run. We must do something now to protect the savings of diligent people who have done without today in order to put away something for tomorrow so that they may protect their families and prepare for their retirement. How can hon. members opposite sit there so quietly when ordinary Canadians who may have set aside a few dollars lost ten per cent of the value of their savings last year and may lose a further ten per cent this year? Their savings may lose 20 per cent of their former purchasing power in the course of two years. Why do members opposite sit so quietly and allow this to go on?

I believe that the proper place in which to commence bringing some relief is in relation to Canada savings bonds. I suggest that those bonds should be indexed. There are many Canadians who cannot afford the luxury and the time it will take for the Minister of Finance perhaps to take another trip to Truro, see how this can be done, say how it cannot be done, why it cannot be done and then come back and do it. I read a remark attributed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who said that he did not want to subsidize those who hold bonds at the expense of the ordinary, little fellow. I have news for the Prime Minister. Most holders of Canada savings bonds are little fellows. They are not looking for a subsidy; they are looking for simple justice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, there are things that can be done to ease the impact of inflation upon those Canadians who have not the muscle which comes from being part of a large organization or who do not have the independent financial backing which will enable them to just comfortably ride things out. There are things that can be done, and these are some of the things that are on my priority list. I do not know, but it may be that the kinds of omissions I have mentioned are among the unforgivable omissions which the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) noted with regard to the government's announced program. As time goes on this afternoon, I know we will get a fuller explanation of what is an omission and when, if ever, it may become truly unforgivable.

• (1530)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I hope the Prime Minister will give us further information today as far as his anti-inflationary policy is concerned. We have had some reassurances about where he does not stand. He has told us a bit about his view for the long run, but that is about all. I say that the Prime Minister does a great disservice in any fight against inflation when he states we are probably heading for about the same terrible rate of increase in prices this year as last year and says there is really very little his government can do about it.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Stanfield: In my judgment, that kind of statement can have only one effect. That effect will be to further stimulate the development of a vigilante attitude in Canada where everyone does the best he can to protect himself because his government is not trying to protect him. This, of course, will further feed the fires of inflation.

I thought the Minister of Finance made a good point when he said we should not go around saying things that take on a life of their own and lead to psyching ourselves into a recession. I make this same point to the Prime Minister now he has taken the line that we are foredoomed to a higher cost of living and the government is helpless to protect the country: I say the line taken by the Prime Minister can only psyche us into further harmful inflationary expectations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I think it would be difficult to exaggerate the importance of the pyschological side of inflation, the expectation aspect. This, of course, is why my colleagues and I continue to propose and urge, now more than ever, the adoption of a temporary program of across the board control of prices and incomes to give Canadians a breathing space in which we can all dedicate ourselves to squeezing a great deal of these inflationary expectations out of our economy. Surely we can do this for ourselves in a way which takes account of our trading interrelationship with the world but does not see us slavishly hand-wringing and saying, "It's the world, you know. There is nothing we can do about it." There is no easy, simplistic solution to inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I have persistently and consistently stated that we do not propose controls as a cure-all but as one measure, a necessary measure at this time, among others. Surely we have sufficient will and ability as Canadians to do something about our own domestic inflation. I believe we can, and I know that we would if we had at the centre of our national affairs an administration with enough imagination and enough intestinal fortitude to risk its own comfortable position in the course of putting forth an honest effort.

The Prime Minister blames the official opposition for the failure of the government to act in the last session. His first version in this blame game was that the Progressive Conservative Party somehow stonewalled Bill C-125, resulting in its not being passed. Yesterday he suggested we were divided on the bill and this is why it did not move forward. I am confident that if the Prime Minister thought we were divided on the bill, he would not have brought it forward in the first place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The bill was presented for first reading and soon thereafter, for perfectly sincere reasons, my friends in the New Democratic Party indicated they would not support it and would vote against it. Shortly after that the bill was dropped. There were no conversations with me or my House leader to determine what our attitude toward the bill might be. The government simply shelved the bill, and later in the session the minister emphasized that there was never any need for the bill anyway. As to the bill itself, I agree with the minister because it was largely a cosmetic operation. We want to see a full-scale, independent inquiry into the unemployment insurance program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I am not talking about a witch-hunt and I am certainly not talking about some kind of internal review. I want to see an inquiry which really gets to the roots of the program and comes up with real answers to a number of basic questions relating to the administration. Are the fears expressed about abuses justified? Are the claims made by many that they wait long periods for benefits justified? Is there adequate co-ordination between the unemployment insurance administration and Manpower? Are there disincentives to work built into today's unemployment insurance program? In asking that question, I would disagree with what the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) said here today. If there are, they are not the only kind. That is not the point.

Are there disincentives built into this program? If so, what are they and what should be done about it? These are surely legitimate, vital questions to be asked about a new program which in its first couple of years of operation has been costing an amount equivalent to an annual levy of $100 per head for every man, woman and child in the country instead of the $20 which was forecast by the government at the time the measure was presented to the House.

I spoke of cosmetics a minute ago. Cosmetics always suggests theatrics to me. We have seen some dazzling displays of theatrics by the government in its pursuit of the politics of energy. The amazing orchestra involved in this performance was placed very prominently on the stage, the members not feeling comfortable down in the pit. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) moved from the fiddle, to the drum, to the trumpet in arranging and rearranging his own orchestration. While the minister was moving about in this virtuoso fashion, the Prime Minister kept changing the music on the stands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The Minister of Finance made an appearance once in a while, usually on small percussion instruments, notably the triangle. The fellow who really brightened up things was the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer). This re-emergence into the public spotlight was highlighted by the minister's expressed intention to get the oil out of the Alberta tar sands at an even faster rate than many of his former charges used to get out of jail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The minister sang out the praises of his own version of a CANDU, the Hermann Kahn-do.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Try that again.

Mr. Stanfield: I simply suggest that my hon. friends opposite are a little slow. I apologize for being too fast for them.

● (1540)

Mr. Stanfield: In any case, when this disorganized show reached the first intermission, it was announced to the audience that anybody who was unappreciative was probably alienated from federalism.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Sir, we can have a little fun about these things, but they are deadly serious. The whole performance has been ludicrous. It is certainly a serious matter that the government should have left such a trail of uncertainty and bitterness as the legacy of the road show put on in recent months.

We are no further ahead now than we were two months ago with regard to very important aspects of our petroleum policy, including what the government envisages in the way of a national petroleum corporation. Perhaps this mystique is intended to create the illusion that this national petroleum corporation is some kind of magic wand. Of course, it is not. It is no solution in itself either for our short-term or long-term needs, and it is no substitute for proper arrangements with the producing provinces or appropriate policies to increase Canadian participation in the private sector of the petroleum industry. Let this be very clear: any action the government takes with regard to oil or energy policy goes far beyond simply affecting future supplies of petroleum in this country. The government's actions, its attitudes and its behaviour will have a profound effect on the very future of our country.

In closing, let me return to my opening observations with regard to inflation. The government of Canada says it is impotent to act except, of course, in the long run; unable to protect either the ordinary Canadian or the national interest. I do not want to be unfair. Some people dignify the position taken by the Prime Minister by praising his candour. In my opinion it is not candour on the part of the government; it is callousness. There is no more critical issue confronting this country than the present challenge to our economic system. I say to you, sir, that I am weary of the argument that Canada cannot do anything because, it is said, Great Britain cannot do anything or President Nixon cannot do anything. If income policies are so hollow, if they have proven to be so inappropriate, why does the Liberal Party in Britain, which seems to be making such a come-back, support an incomes policy? I am tired of being told we cannot do something in this country because President Nixon may have failed, or somebody else may have failed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Incidentally, the price performance of the United States in the last couple of years has been significantly better than ours in this country. There can be no question that inflation at the rate of 10 per cent or more a year presents a threat to the personal security and well-being of millions of Canadians. And there is surely no one so comfortable and secure as to be protected for long from the consequences of an eroding currency, diminished personal savings and failing public belief in the system of enterprise itself.

Why would anybody, apart from the comfortable few, continue to support an economic system in which the cost of housing escalates beyond their means, in which the cost of essential food and clothing absorbs more and more of personal income and where the value of their savings, in which the investment of their pension or retirement income is continually being diminished, is stolen from them by the rest of the community, in effect? There are many in the political process today who do not believe in the economy of enterprise, and while I do not for a moment question their sincerity, I do question their wisdom. There are others who pay lip service to the system of enterprise but who categorize excessive inflation and high unemployment as either international phenomena or acts of God.

As far as I am concerned, no government worth its salt can wash its hands of its responsibility to make every effort to redress the hardship which falls upon so many who are otherwise helpless. No government worth its salt can escape its responsibility to muster the general population in a shared national program of restraint, discipline and co-operation which will meet this challenge and overcome it. Surely restraint and discipline must start with the federal government itself. There must be leadership by example. In this new session of parliament we shall demand that new government programs be subject to an inflation test. In the form proposed, will the suggested program contribute to inflation? We have had presented to us today estimates which the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) suggested were about $2 billion higher than the estimates last year. The proper comparison is to compare the estimates introduced today with the original estimates introduced a year ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: One then finds that the difference is not some $2 billion—although that is no mean figure, for most of us at least—but it is about $3,629 million.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Stanfield: I want to take a further opportunity to look into these figures before commenting on them at any length, but I just point out that the minister's reference is most misleading. Knowing him as I do, however, I am sure it is quite unintentional.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: In fact, then, the estimates as introduced today are not 10 per cent higher than a year ago; they are about 20 per cent higher—one-fifth higher. We shall again be pressing the government to revise its thinking in relation to certain taxes which have an adverse psychological effect as well as an adverse cost effect in times of high and rising inflation. The Prime Minister, with a shrug or toss of his head, with a wave of his hand maybe, can settle if he likes for a further 10 per cent increase in the cost of living, or 15 per cent, if that is what it should be. Those who are inclined to agree with him—and there are those who are inclined to agree with him, whatever he says—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: —must know that such an attitude consigns numbers of Canadians to a shortfall in life's essentials and to the inevitable denial of their reasonable expectation of the benefits of their own labours. This attitude in itself contributes to the inflationary psychology by reinforcing inflationary expectations.

● (1550)

We in the Conservative Party have not only proposed measures to combat inflation but, more important, we have the will to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Perhaps this is because we believe that what Canada has achieved to this day has been because men and women have been free to launch their endeavours and to seek their rewards, to run risks and to profit from their enterprise. What we have advocated, what we argue for and what we espouse is to reward savings, not confiscate them; to encourage investment, not to confiscate it; to curb taxation, not to increase it. It is our policy to encourage private ownership of homes, of farms and of profitable enterprise and to maintain confidence in the value of personal initiative.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It is a fundamental article of faith to our contemporary philosophy to see social justice fulfilled. There is no mention of this, strangely, in the Speech from the Throne. We want to see social justice fulfilled as it can only realistically be fulfilled in an environment of national order and national purpose. Inflation that is uncontained means injustice and growing disparity for millions of Canadians. We have to decide, and very soon, whether it is an acceptable truth that the achievement of a stable economic system is beyond the competence of our free institutions. I, for one, believe in the capability of a free people to respond to any such threat or challenge to their well-being.

I believe the present condition of the country requires the reassertion of our faith in our institutions. There are many ways to give expression to our faith. One of them, surely, is to say to ourselves and to others that this country can enjoy more responsive leadership and government, and to believe that Canada is not beset by problems of insoluble, global magnitude but is in fact a country confronted by unique and rare opportunities. Nothing was ever achieved under the slogan "It can't be done". We do not support that attitude of resignation and we will not support it in this parliament.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner)—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wagner: You are nervous.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I read in the newspaper today that the government had come back to face parliament with great confidence. I have never seen such a nervous-looking bunch.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I move that the following be added to the address: "We respectfully affirm to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers do not possess the confidence of this House".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I recognize the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Boy, you must be nervous.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to hear the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) describe members of this caucus as being nervous. I think this kind of misunderstanding of the mood of the House is quite the same as his misunderstanding of the mood of his own caucus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Before disagreeing further with some of the arguments put forward by the Leader of the Opposition, I should like to join with him in saying that it gives me great pleasure today to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) are among the youngest members of the House, in terms of seniority, but they have both established impressive reputations for very hard work and a very conscientious approach to the constituents concerned, to the business of this House, its committees and its caucus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I think it is traditional, Mr. Speaker, to say that one cannot help but be hopeful about the future of this noble institution of parliament when one sees contributions of such high standard and potential made by members from various parts of the country. I would want to add that one cannot help being very encouraged and very gratified by the fact that these young Liberals have spoken in a way which indicates that the spirit of Liberalism is very much alive and very much on the march in this country and in this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We are beginning the second session of the twenty-ninth parliament at a time, Mr. Speaker, when the rapidly changing circumstances of the family of man are making unprecedented demands upon the wisdom, the courage and the foresight of national governments all over the world.

As the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) pointed out, seldom has a year been so marked by sweeping changes and unpredictable events as was 1973. Few countries were unaffected; fewer still could disregard the lessons of those events.

We have learned that in a world of trading nations grown closely interdependent, no state, no matter how strong economically, is immune from disruptive pressures in strategic commodities.

In a world where law and its moral foundations are too often held in disrespect, we have learned that no society, no matter how democratic or politically mature, is guaranteed stability if elements in it become greedy, or unmindful of the rights, dignity and needs of others.

We have learned that in a world where terrorists and hijackers are protected by some governments, no community, no matter how peaceful, can safeguard the physical security of its inhabitants without their co-operation and understanding.

Here in Canada, Mr. Speaker, a growing population, better trained and educated and with higher expectations than ever before, a society increasingly urban-oriented and industrialized, has imposed its own strains upon nature and upon every social institution from the individual family to Parliament.

We are surrounded by changing circumstances in every facet of our individual and collective existence. Mr. Speaker, I might be tempted to say that the one thing that does not change is the usual complaint of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) about a situation which he cannot resolve himself. It is a bit nostalgic, Mr. Speaker, to hear the same clichés and the same feelings of frustration invariably voiced by the Leader of the Opposition each time he rises to speak.

In the midst of change, Mr. Speaker, it is important for us as Canadians to understand the present reality so that we can control our future direction as a nation.

What is the Canadian reality? We are unquestionably a most fortunate people. Through no virtue of our own we find ourselves living in what, in relative terms, is the richest country in the world.

We can grow on our land more than we can eat. We can take from the sea more than enough for our needs. Perhaps alone amongst the industrialized nations of the world we possess adequate supplies of energy. Below the ground we have an abundance of minerals which world demand is making increasingly more valuable.

We are a strong and prosperous people, with human and natural resources sufficient to make us the envy of every nation.

It could not escape the notice of those who observed the federal-provincial energy conference last month that our primary problem as a nation is not war or shortages or famine, as it is in many other countries. Our problem is the equitable distribution of our most abundant wealth, and of the developmental opportunities which flow from that wealth.

It is important for us to understand our problems in the context of our strength, to know that we are in a better position than any other country on earth to create the kind of society we want for ourselves and our children.

Yet, despite our very high standard of living, there are continuing problems which Canadians expect a strong central government to remedy.

[English]

Although we are a prosperous nation, there are many Canadians who are poor and in need of help. There are many who, through no fault of their own, find it difficult to make ends meet. There are many who need better housing. There are regions which need help to provide jobs for their people. There are areas where better transportation services are needed for the efficient and economical movement of people and commodities.

In the past, Liberal programs have responded to these needs through such things as income support measures, urban development and housing policies, transportation subsidies and regional development funds; and now, once again, the House is debating the outline of a Liberal legislative program designed to respond still further to these and many other needs of Canadians.

Of all the problems facing Canada at the present time, however, the most personal, the most pervasive and the most difficult to solve—I was glad to hear those words from the mouth of the Leader of the Opposition or, rather, that thought if not the words—is the rising cost of living. Every Canadian, indeed every person in the world, is affected by inflation. Some are hurt very badly as they see their limited incomes steadily eroded by rising prices, parents as they learn of increases in the price of children's shoes and clothing, married couples as they see the cost of housing rising beyond their reach, elderly people whose diet is restricted by rising food prices.

Such social inequities should not exist in a country as rich and as prosperous as Canada. That it does exist is a challenge to us all, certainly to this government, particularly those of us who occupy positions of public responsibility in various areas of the public sector. It is a challenge to those in a position to influence public opinion, to those who exercise leadership in labour, management and the professions, to the powerful in all sectors of our society. The whole community, I would suggest, has some responsibility for creating an economic climate where many are hurt and the weakest suffer the most, for tolerating and even encouraging a social climate in which the ideals are not the conservation and sharing of limited resources but, rather, the stimulation of even greater consumer demand with everyone wanting to take more from society and to give less.

We cannot change such ingrained social attitudes overnight, but we can take hope from the evident desire of many younger members of our society to become more responsible stewards of the bounties of this land and to subordinate selfish interests to the cause of social justice.

It is the continuing intention of this Liberal government to bring about the equitable redistribution of our national wealth, to give to the weak who cannot protect themselves against inflation and to take from the strong who should not be allowed to profiteer from inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: Why didn't you say that three years ago?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot identify the hon. member who talks about three years ago, but I understand he is in the NDP. I would like to recall, for those of them who were in this House three years ago, that they sat on their hands when this government brought in a white paper on tax reform—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —a white paper that I must confess was somewhat more progressive than the law which finally passed this parliament. They were happy to sit back and see the pressure groups in this country hammering away at the government on that white paper while, as I say, they sat smugly warming their hands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Don't wash your family linen in public.

Mr. Trudeau: It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that even as a majority government it took us months and months to get our income tax legislation passed through this House because these people made no gesture to support us on its more progressive measures, those that had first been brought forward in the white paper. I hope that next time we bring in some progressive legislation they will feel it is a good thing to support us, because this time they know that if they do not, they will have to respond to the people immediately rather than wait until later.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I would say that Canada cannot insulate itself absolutely from the adverse effects of worldwide disruptions in the price and supply of essential commodities, but we can and must ensure—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some disagreement in the NDP caucus between those who were here three years ago and those who arrived only last year. Let them read Hansard for that year and see what happened.

Mr. Stanfield: Again, I don't think a family should wash its dirty linen in public.

Mr. Trudeau: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, all Canadians must share as equitably as possible both the burdens and the benefits resulting from the new economic paradox of our times. To underline the strength of our commitment, may I remind the House that it was a Liberal government that increased pensions and family allowances and tied both to the cost of living. It was a Liberal government that provided subsidies to limit increases in the price of bread and milk. It was a Liberal government that indexed personal income taxes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: A minority Liberal government.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Tory Party sometimes complains about our not listening to some of their suggestions. Surely they should be satisfied—

Mr. Stanfield: Oh, very.

Mr. Trudeau: —in view of the fact that the people of Canada in their wisdom decided not to entrust them with the responsibilities of government, and thankful for the fact that the government entrusted with those responsibilities should take the very best ideas from them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It was a Liberal government that indexed personal income taxes, that insulated our petroleum—

Mr. Grafftey: A Liberal socialistic coalition government.

An hon. Member: What's next?

Mr. Trudeau: Next, Mr. Speaker, is to inform the members opposite that it was also a Liberal government that insulated our petroleum market from worldwide distortions and—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —used tariff and other trade policy measures to lower the price of many goods to Canadian consumers. We will not allow the sharpest effects of inflation to fall upon the weakest members of our society. We will not allow corporate profiteers and gougers to pile up unearned windfall profits at the expense of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, let no one think that a Liberal government, this Liberal government, will not use the considerable power at its command to uphold the public interest in the absence of voluntary restraint on the part of those who otherwise might be tempted to exploit the people of Canada. Perhaps some of the people on the other side will now leave the centre of the road, where they are trying to appeal to their affluent supporters and to academic supporters, and instead support a really liberal-inclined government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I also find it important to commend those whose performance has been responsible and restrained in this society. I find it appropriate at this time to destroy the myth that the cost of labour has been a dominant factor in contributing to the present inflationary round in Canada. That is not true. It is not the average working man who has exerted excessive upward pressure on prices. Certainly, labour over the past year in Canada has demanded and has received higher wages and better fringe benefits. No one can blame them for that. But the essential consideration is that labour in general has not used its great power in such a way as to impose an unfair economic burden on the rest of society.

Mr. Speaker, I believe in giving credit where credit is due. Inflation is not a new problem. It is the rate of increase which is new. During the past two years an unprecedented round of price increases and shortages of food and industrial raw materials has sent shock-waves throughout the entire world economy.

Because a fifth or more of Canada's gross national product originates in foreign trade, we have certainly not been immune from the adverse effects of worldwide economic pressures largely beyond our control. Nevertheless, Canada's performance in relation to other industrialized countries has been slightly better than average during the past three or four years. The Canadian dollar is among the world's strongest and most sought after currencies. This reflects the judgments of the money markets of the world on the Canadian economy. Our economy is buoyant and we have the confidence of knowing that economic trends in a resource-hungry world are moving in our favour. It is this which the Leader of the Opposition took such time to describe in one word—the word "failure". Surely here again we have the nostalgia for clichés coming back all the time. Had the Leader of the Opposition only yesterday looked at the figures published by Statistics Canada, he would have seen that the rate of real growth last year was the greatest in 17 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: You have to go back 17 years to equal it. Statistics Canada also revealed that we created more jobs last year than in any year of our history.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if that can be described as failure by the Leader of the Opposition, and if the government can be blamed for that kind of failure, then we are willing to take credit for that kind of failure.

● (1620)

Mr. Trudeau: I think this is what every unbiased observer in Canada or abroad would call success, Mr. Speaker, and not failure. But I am not particularly surprised at the misunderstanding or misrepresentation of events, because again today the Leader of the Opposition, misunderstanding or misrepresenting—unintentionally, I am sure, because probably he did not refer to or see the words he ascribed to me—indicated that I was talking about 10 per cent when I talked of a rate of inflation last night on TV. I have his words. He indicated that "the Prime Minister is himself encouraging Canadian people to encourage further inflation at a rate of about 10 per cent per year. He said that." Mr. Speaker, I did not rise on a question of privilege, but I should like to inform the Leader of the Opposition that I did not say that and he is mistaken.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

An hon. Member: Resign.

Mr. Trudeau: Note, Mr. Speaker, I do not ask the Leader of the Opposition to withdraw and I certainly would not want him to resign, because I have myself seen reports of what I was alleged to have said in Toronto. They were erroneous reports. They were unusually erroneous, because the Canadian Press is usually accurate, I believe. But they were quoting what I had said about, I believe, the problem of western alienation and the attitude of Albertans to federalism. I must inform this House and the Leader of the Opposition, who was made bloody-minded by that misquotation, that those were not the words I used. I would be happy to send the Leader of the Opposition a transcript of my words as it has been sent to members of the press gallery. I hope that the several editorials that were drawn to my attention based on these misquotations will cease being written, because the editorial writers should realize what this kind of thing does to the mind of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: I will add this to my collection of your misquotations.

Mr. Trudeau: They inflame him beyond control, Mr. Speaker. He used out in Alberta, I believe, the word "bloody-mindedness"; he used the word "angry". He is using today the word "vigilante". Surely these are rather demagogic accusations to be in the mouth of a man who says that the causes of inflation are largely psychological.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I think there are a few inflationary circumstances existing in the words and ideas of the Leader of the Opposition. He is inclined to efface his feelings a little bit more than reality warrants.

Given these facts, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that our remedial action against inflation must take place on four fronts.

First, we must continue to protect those of our citizens who are most vulnerable to the effects of inflation, particularly pensioners and low-income families.

Secondly, we must continue to apply special selective measures designed to modify the impact of inflation upon Canada and Canadians—measures such as the indexing of income taxes, the oil export tax, subsidies on consumer products such as milk and bread, and controls on the export of certain commodities.

Thirdly, we must continue to take appropriate action to ensure for the Canadian consumer a secure and adequate and reasonably priced supply of those commodities, particularly food and fuel, which we ourselves produce for domestic and foreign markets. Top priority must be given to the elimination of damaging and unsettling fluctuations in the supply and price of our domestic products.

Fourthly, we must continue to seek the co-operation of other countries in reaching agreements which, as far as possible, will assure for Canadians a secure supply of imported commodities at reasonably stable prices.

Therein, Mr. Speaker, lie the main thrusts of the Throne Speech which has been placed before us. Its proposals in relation to food and energy are aimed directly at the problem of supply—at ensuring the healthy growth and stability of the production and marketing process.

[English]

With regard to our oil policy, the federal government sees it as its duty to manage the economy in the interests of all Canadians and to moderate the inflationary effects resulting from the oil crisis. To this end, we are discussing with the provinces a domestic and export pricing structure directed toward three objectives: first, to protect the Canadian consumer; second, to encourage producers to explore and develop our non-conventional and frontier resources; third, to give the producing provinces a fair return for the value of their resources.

In insisting upon a federal share of the increased revenue deriving from higher oil prices, this government is not trying to stake a claim to provincial resources. Neither are we quibbling about the specific pricing and taxing mechanisms to be employed. But we are insisting that the government of Canada be allowed to discharge its duty to all the people of this country.

Where there are actual or potential conflicts between the interests of the producing companies and individual consumers, or between the producing and consuming provinces, there is a clear and fundamental obligation of the federal government to intervene in the over-all national interests. To intervene effectively we must have the financial capacity to direct the economy toward national goals and to spread the burden of higher prices evenly across the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I do want to lend emphasis to that point, Mr. Speaker, because I think that many of the Canadian public, both on the producing and consuming side, have been led to see in this a quarrel of jurisdiction over natural resources. That is not the way we view the case and we are not using constitutional arguments in order to make a grab at anything. We are just explaining to the Canadian people what could be the effects of the oil crisis which exploded in the Middle East and which had dire consequences for the economy of the world. Here I would use the words used by the Leader of the Opposition just half an hour ago when he was talking about the effect upon world economies of the present situation. He referred to the deleterious effect.

● (1630)

Mr. Stanfield: It was longer ago than that.

Mr. Trudeau: I stand corrected; it was longer ago than half an hour: obviously, the Leader of the Opposition used that phrase earlier in his speech. Nevertheless, the point is the same. This is not a jurisdictional quibble. This is a duty discharged by the government of Canada to ensure that the kind of disorder and disruption, which has been brought upon the economies of many nations which could not find within their own borders policies to stabilize the impact of disruptive prices, does not take place in Canada. Canada does have power to avoid such disruption and it is in the discharge of its duty to manage the whole economy and to keep inflationary pressures down—this was eloquently pleaded by the Leader of the Opposition—that we are stating the oil policies which have been made known to the Canadian people.

If we abandon our duty in this regard, the alternative would be massive economic disruption leading to much more severe inflation, unemployment and regional disparity. In this regard, Mr. Speaker, we know our duty and we will not retreat from it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Our food production policy will encourage the farmer and the fisherman to increase and improve the supply of those foods which we can produce efficiently and economically in Canada. By working toward the stability of prices and incomes we will be helping our consumers, and we will also be giving to our producers the security they need to get on with the job of growing as much as they can for our domestic and export markets and for our foreign aid programs. The Leader of the Opposition made an eloquent plea for those programs at the beginning of his speech. I indicate to him now, again, that we are in agreement with him, although I am not sure from which side the ideas were stolen.

It is the cause of inflation that we are dealing with, not just the effects. Hence, we on this side of the House have earned the right to be suspicious of simplistic palliatives such as wage and price controls which attack the symptoms rather than the illness. It has been demonstrated in the United States and the United Kingdom, for example, that price controls, while offering some temporary relief to consumers, had the far more serious and damaging effect of drying up the sources of supply. The result of such controls has been a temporary fixed price for scarce and sometimes unobtainable products, followed by a surge in price when the controls are inevitably lifted.

I had a quotation from Mr. Nixon who is reported by the press as having said that price and wage controls had been found wanting. However, rather than quote authorities which I understand are rejected by the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Stanfield: Do you need a good tape?

Mr. Trudeau: —I am tempted to recall what I think must be the earliest joke I ever heard. The story involves a lady who went into the grocer's and asked if she could buy a pound of bananas. She was told they were 25 cents a pound: I believe those were the figures used in my childhood. She complained that down the street bananas were selling for 20 cents a pound. When asked why she did not buy her bananas down the street, she said, "They are all out of bananas." The grocer then said, "When I am out of bananas, I sell them for 15 cents a pound."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is a simplistic story, perhaps the earliest one I recall and probably the earliest which I was able to understand. However, simplistic stories serve to illustrate simplistic solutions and to underline them.

It is the necessity for flexibility in a period of rapid economic change which makes me dubious about the across the board, blockbuster type of controls suggested by the Conservative Party. Blockbusters are practical instruments if you have a block to bust. The problem is that inflation is not a homogeneous block. It is a shifting mass of moving and competing factors, all of which are not amenable at the same time to any single corrective action.

I much prefer a system such as we have been using during the past many months: selective measures applied to selected goods and services in different ways and at different times as the occasion warrants. It is a sensitive system, appropriate to a society seeking to control change in the most effective manner. The government has applied such selective measures in the recent past to milk, bread, oil and some petroleum product and we will not hesitate to use other counter-inflationary measures as they become necessary.

We will not hesitate to go after the so-called big guys in the marketplace if action is necessary to protect the Canadian consumer. The people of Canada know that it was a Liberal government and a Liberal minister which secured from the powerful oil industry a freeze on the price of oil and petroleum products. It was a Liberal government which imposed the export tax on oil, ensuring that the people of Canada have received so far over $300 million that otherwise would have gone to the oil companies, the big guys, as windfall profits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The Tories say they would apply a 90-day freeze to incomes and prices and during that time they would look for less drastic and more permanent measures. Mr. Speaker, this has been the siren song of the Leader of the Opposition ever since the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) reversed his stand last February.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister if he will forgive me because I have to leave this chamber to keep an important commitment. I assure him I will not ignore the speech. I will read with great interest the rest of his speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the Leader of the Opposition told us on this side that he had a commitment and he would have to leave at this time. I certainly understand the circumstances of his leaving as I, on several occasions, have had to leave in the middle of speeches made by the leaders of various other parties. I, too, had longstanding commitments to keep, so that his leaving is understandable. I just hope that when he is at the $100 per plate dinner tonight at Toronto he will not complain about the disincentive to work which is created by unemployment insurance benefits.

I was saying that for several months we were prepared to listen with interest to what the Tory Party, if it ever formed the government, would do after the 90-day freeze was over. Surely after a year we should be entitled to know what is going to happen after the 90 days. Surely this is the best demonstration possible of their inability to spell out effective, long-term solutions.

● (1640)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We are all in favour of a 90-day study period if you do not know what is going to happen after it, but we do not feel we need that study period because we as a Liberal government have been applying corrective measures now and will continue to do so.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I have spoken about the economic cost of the type of control advocated by the Tories which is beginning to be known as Tory wage controls.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: However, there is a social cost. I have been disturbed, Mr. Speaker, by the tendency of some advocates of general controls to try to convey the impression that controls could be imposed at negligible social cost to the people of Canada. This is disturbing to me because it smacks of political opportunism.

It is less than honest to dwell expansively on the pleasant prospect of fixed consumer prices, while at the same time diverting attention from the not so pleasant prospect of fixed incomes. It is less than honest not to tell the public that wage controls have their own set of injustices, that they apply most inflexibly to blue-collar workers whose pay can be easily monitored, and most flexibly to white-collar workers who can be given a salary increase under the guise of an artificial job reclassification. As to the possibility of sophisticated abuse by landlords, professional and self-employed people, it is self-evident.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: This is not said as an attempt to argue against the theory of controls. I am looking at the political aspects of it now. I think those who talk about controls as a simple measure should take the trouble to recognize the dignity and the right of their audience to know the difficulties I have just pointed out. For those reasons, income controls risk hurting the small and the poor more than they do the big and the rich; and while that might be of minor concern to the more conservative governments and political parties, it is of great and fundamental concern to this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We do not believe that the workingman should be expected to bear an unfair share of the cost of solving the problems of inflation, and that is why we will ask him to treat with great skepticism any argument for general controls which does not set out all the facts, the pleasant as well as the unpleasant, those with political appeal and those without.

Aside from the 90-day freeze, what else does the Leader of the Opposition offer as an alternative to the proposals the government has put forward? He offers an energy policy which omits all the essential and potentially controversial details. He offers his concern about the impact of inflation upon Canadian individuals, families, communities and institutions, a concern which I know is sincere, a concern which is common to us all. What he does not offer is a package of workable solutions to inflation and the many other problems we face as a country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I heard the Leader of the Opposition say this afternoon, to the great applause of his supporters, "We have the will to do it." Of course, Mr. Speaker, they have the will. They have shown us that ever since the day after the election. They have the will to be the government. They just do not have the means to govern, that is the trouble.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition calls for leadership, but surely he is not showing leadership. He is just inviting us to drift in a sea of uncertainty. He reminds me of a marooned sailor drifting helplessly in a life-raft in the middle of the ocean. When he sees a great ocean liner go by, he offers to rescue the ocean liner on condition that he be allowed to be captain of the ship. I draw a similar parallel to allude to the goings-on in the New Democratic Party. It has to do with an ocean liner but the parallel is a bit different. It has to do with seagulls. Because they were squawking and making a lot of noise, they thought they were actually running the ship.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What else do seagulls do?

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: It is the French equivalent of pulling someone's leg.

[English]

The people of Canada have a right to know where political parties stand on the issues of the day. The Conservative leader stands before the people of Canada and says, "Give me your support. My heart is filled with good intentions." We have told them where the Liberal Party stands.

The people have the right to know the fundamental philosophy and guiding principles upon which our policies are based. These, Mr. Speaker, are the principles of this Liberal government, the principles which are set forth in the Speech from the Throne and which will be reflected in the measures we will introduce before Parliament during this session.

We believe that Canada needs a strong central government to protect the national interest, prepared to stand up to provincial or regional interests with the confidence that it has the backing of the people of Canada.

We believe that the benefits of our wealth and the burden of our national problems should be shared equitably by all the people, wherever they may live.

We believe that Canadians are entitled to a sense of security, confident in the knowledge that they and their government can control the changing circumstances of our collective life, rather than be the victims of change.

We believe that Canadians should control activities within our borders which have a significant impact on our growth as a nation.

We believe that Canada must take full advantage of its potential to be self-reliant in the basic needs of life.

We believe that the government has a right and a duty to intervene whenever it is clear that private enterprise is unlikely or unable to act in the national interest.

We believe that individual Canadians, especially those least able to protect themselves, have a right to be protected from the consequences of events over which they have no control, and protected as well from intimidation by big business, big labour or big government.

Those are the principles upon which our legislative proposals are based. That is the philosophy of this Liberal government in the important areas I have discussed today.

Mr. Speaker, we have presented to the House a Throne Speech which I believe is a solid working document, worthy of occupying the attention of hon. members throughout this session. It is a document which responds to the need for strong federal leadership in uniting Canadians in an attack upon our common problems.

It is a document which will help millions of our citizens to plan for the future in an atmosphere of security and optimism. It is a worthy agenda for a Parliament which has already done much more than was expected of it by those who predicted its early demise.

It is a document which commends itself to those hon. members who believe, as I do, that our common task is to make this Parliament work—work hard and effectively—for the good of Canada.

● (1650)

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I can understand why the supporters of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) applauded him for so long. If you would permit me to say so, he spoke today as though he was not bored with his own words, and that was a very pleasant experience.

Much of what he said will be extremely useful to the New Democratic Party and to me. It was evident he was rehearsing in preparation for his electioneering, when the time comes, during which he will take credit, single-handed, for all that the last session of parliament accomplished. Let me tell him, Mr. Speaker, that even though he said those things with a straight face, I could tell that he did not believe in them. He sounded incredible to me, and I am sure the people of Canada will not believe him either.

If I might be permitted to give him some advice—it has been suggested by many that I have been doing so for more than a year—I would say to him that the less arrogant attitude he has shown during the last session might work better during the next election and that the people of Canada might appreciate more honesty from the Prime Minister in admitting that the accomplishments of the last session—and, I hope, of this session—were those of a minority government in co-operation with New Democrats and others.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: As to the suggestion that some of us might be seagulls, I would say to the Prime Minister that at least a seagull is a beautiful bird, one whose flight is beautiful to watch, whereas there are fish in the ocean that are not worth catching, let alone watching.

I do not think I have ever, either in this chamber or anywhere else in my experience in politics, in the law or in contact with people in Canada or across the world, heard a statement further from the truth or more convoluted than the Prime Minister's attempt to blame the New Democrats for the fact that Mr. Benson and the Liberal government scuttled their own white paper in 1971. One really does need some quality or other—I do not know how to describe it, but perhaps "gall" or "insensitivity" or a combination of those words might do—in order to make a statement of that kind.

I have a clear memory of the back benchers of the Liberal Party running all over Canada in 1971 apologizing for the white paper and telling the people to oppose it. Some of them are still sitting in this chamber. What did the Prime Minister himself have to say? Dealing with this white paper on taxation, trying to explain why his government scuttled it, he said in the course of a television program on December 28, 1971:

> I concede your point, too, that it is likely we heard more from the vested interests than we did from the Liberal taxpayer who did not have the high-paid lawyers to speak for him . . . I suppose in participatory democracy there will always be someone whose voice is louder than others.

That was a true statement, but there was one important omission. The Prime Minister should have said, "It is likely we have heard and listened more to the voice of vested interests than to the voice of the taxpayer." This approach to the problems, described as seriously as the Prime Minister described them, baffles me. It baffles me when I hear him say, I am sure with sincerity, that his government does not believe the workingman should carry on his shoulders the burden of the fight against inflation. Those are not his actual words but that is roughly what he said. As I listened to those words I recalled what his majority government did in 1969 when it created massive unemployment in its fight against inflation. If that does not mean the workingman carrying the burden, I do not know what does.

I am happy to accept that the Prime Minister may have changed his mind and I am glad to admit that any person who is willing to change his mind and who is capable of changing it is a person who ought not to be attacked. But he ought not to speak in a way that suggests that never, as Prime Minister, has he tried to place the burden of fighting inflation on the workingman, because in fact no other government ever did this so heartlessly as did the Liberal majority government in those years.

I agree with both the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) about the seriousness of events both national and international at the present time, and about the fact that we are meeting, in the second session of this parliament, at a time of crucial developments not only in this country but around the world. This is why I intend to try to deal with what I believe to be the contradictions and the dangers of our present system, which in my view are in major part responsible for the difficulties which face us.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who thinks that our difficulties, the difficulties of Canadians, the difficulties we face today do not result from war, shortages or famine.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Our problem—these are roughly the Prime Minister's words—is the problem of fair distribution of our tremendous wealth. I agree entirely on this.

● (1700)

[English]

Because I am in agreement with the Prime Minister's statement about what our problem is, I will try to deal with it in a way which my colleagues and I understand. The Leader of the Opposition said—again I cannot quote him, but these are roughly his words—one of the difficulties he finds is that the present government does not even begin to comprehend what is happening in Canada today. I agree with him in that, but my problem arises from the fact that the Conservative Party—and his speech showed this—fails to comprehend what the present situation is all about. In the competition of failure to understand, I am not at all sure that the Conservative Party does not win by a mile. In fact, in spite of all his speeches and statements, the Leader of the Opposition, as the Prime Minister pointed out, has not yet brought forward any such understanding or any program based on it.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, at the opening of this parliament in January 1973, the New Democratic Party decided to support the minority government in order to enable hon. members to fulfill the responsibilities given to them by their electors. We used our influence—I want to remind the Prime Minister of this—during the last session to have legislation and policies passed which we thought would benefit the Canadian people. And now, even those on my right who were eager to defeat the government a year ago claim for themselves the achievements of this Parliament because they know polls show that most Canadians applaud our decision, as well as the legislation which came from it. I think that given the success of the last session, hon. members of all parties must pursue the same efforts, that is to say they must run Parliament to produce constructive legislation and policies. We do not want to play politics as far as the Speech from the Throne is concerned. Our energies will rather be directed towards an evaluation of the bills resulting from the speech.

[English]

Having said that, let me emphasize that we want progressive action and a concerted effort to deal with the difficult problems facing every Canadian. I suggest that a failure to come to grips with these problems, even though the problems are not easily soluble, will mean a failure of this parliament and a failure of this country.

The task before all of us is certainly difficult, but that means in my mind that our determination must be correspondingly expanded to see that parliament does not fail the Canadian people. I suggest to you, sir, that history often produces moments which illuminate the conditions of a society more clearly than at any other time. I say this is one such occasion—and that it is such an occasion is graphically underlined by a Gallup poll published in several newspapers yesterday. The poll reported that almost half the Canadian people fear we are heading toward another depression despite the apparent affluence which now surrounds us.

The basis of this fear is easily identifiable. In half the country we face potential petroleum shortages and higher prices in spite of the fact that we have Canadian reserves sufficient to meet all our needs from coast to coast. We are told that food prices must continue to rise because of shortages, in spite of the fact we have one of the most productive and comprehensive agricultural industries in the world. We have a host of supply operations which plague the home building industry, despite the fact that the timber and raw material reserves in Canada are the envy of the world. In short, the incomprehensible contradictions that spell economic hardship for too many, and constant juggling of family budgets for almost all, have raised the spectre of a system almost completely out of control.

The individual family knows that its income can no longer keep pace. Today, as members of this House know, Statistics Canada research reported that in the last half of 1973 wages and salaries fell behind the rise in the cost of living by a full percentage point. Yet at the same time the same family has watched in awe the parade of profits strutting shamelessly across the financial pages of our newspapers. Even the hard-boiled editors of these newspapers admit that these increases in profits are embarrassing. The level of increase in corporate profits is almost unbelievable. I cannot accompany their parade with 76 trombones, but each one of the figures demands, "Hey, look me over".

The Prime Minister said, not once but several times during his speech, that his government would not permit profiteering and gouging of the people. I hope he is right. I hope his words are not merely said for their effect on the House and on the people of Canada, but that they reflect a determination that will result in legislation and action in this parliament and during this session.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Increases in profits have already been unbelievable and unjustifiable. Let us look at a few of them. In the resource industries we find that the increase in profits in 1973 over 1972, by Falconbridge Nickel Mines, was 770 per cent; International Nickel, 107 per cent; Abitibi Paper Company, 260 per cent; Gulf Oil, 58 per cent. This is not limited only to the mining and petroleum industries. In the food processing and retailing industries, an area which hurts the Canadian family most directly, we find that George Weston enjoyed an increase in profits in 1973 over 1972 of 86 per cent, with an increase in revenue of about one-quarter or one-fifth of that percentage; M. Loeb had an increase of 73 per cent for a 40-week period; Canada Packers had an increase of 36 per cent for a 39-week period, and Schneider's showed an increase of 45 per cent during a similar period in 1973 over 1972.

Looking at real estate—I am going to give only one example—Cadillac Development Corporation showed an increase in profits of 59 per cent in nine months. Keep that in mind when I get to the subject of housing. Our "poor" banks that were at last permitted to use their money for mortgages in housing did not show an increase of 700 per cent in profits in 1973 over 1972, but Toronto-Dominion had an increase in profits of 25 per cent, and during the five years from 1966 to 1971 showed an increase in profits—I give this from memory—of around 85 per cent, while the Banque Canadienne Nationale showed a 52 per cent increase in 1973 over 1972. I could go on for some time giving many figures just as startling and just as damning.

I am not suggesting that high corporate profits are the only cause of rising prices, but I do say they expose unjustifiable gouging of the Canadian consumer. I am glad to hear the Prime Minister undertake to end this unjustifiable gouging in the future. I regret that even this minority government did not have the courage to end it in the past.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I do say that parliament can act to reduce the level of price increases by taxing excessive profits and by selective price controls on basic materials such as steel, lumber, nickel, lead and zinc, just as we have done in the case of oil. These enter into the production of goods which Canadians need and consume, and every large firm—most of them multinational—which mines and produces these minerals and materials from the minerals has made immense profits in the last 12 months or so, and every one of them is continuing to raise prices totally without justification and at the expense of the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I want to make clear that we continue to reject the unjust and unacceptable proposal of over-all freezes and controls that the Conservatives still throw at this House and at the people of Canada. These have not worked anywhere else and they would not work in Canada. But at the same time we also reject the resignation and inaction of people who say that nothing can be done. We believe that a great deal can be done, not to eliminate inflation but to reduce the rate of the rise in the cost of living and to reduce the gouging by the corporations of the ordinary Canadian family.

Profits are a measure of what the corporate establishment takes from society directly. But Canadians are also aware that in addition to this rip-off at their expense as consumers, the corporations, many of them foreign-owned, enjoy a tax rip-off which compounds itself annually, a rip-off that costs the ordinary Canadian taxpayer hundreds of millions of dollars each year. By the end of 1973—I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and every member of this House to recognize what this means—the corporations, again many of them foreign-owned, held in their coffers the incredible amount of $4.7 billion in deferred taxes, most of which will never be collected by the public treasury. The Minister of Finance shakes his head. He should be ashamed of himself for suggesting that my statement is not right. He knows it is a fact that except for the small, penurious companies, the large corporations are not likely ever to pay back these deferred taxes.

At this point I should like to quote from the 1972 annual statement of Shell Oil. It said that it was not showing its deferred taxes in its accounts because it did not recognize them as a liability and did not expect ever to have to pay them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Every accountant, every auditor in this country and indeed in the United States knows that that is a fact. I remember vaguely that there was a report from one auditing firm suggesting that these deferred taxes should not be carried on the books because it was dishonest to suggest that they were a liability when in fact they would likely never be. I suggest that even a modest interest rate of 8 per cent or 9 per cent on this $4.7 billion would produce revenue of about $400 million a year. By gad, we could do much with this huge sum. For example, we could reduce the burden of the harassed individual taxpayer by $70 or $80 a year, instead of letting these corporations have $4.7 billion without interest.

I say to you, sir, that not until we rein-in the runaway power of the corporate monoliths can Canadians expect to regain economic sovereignty in their own land or move to build viable economies in the many regions of disparity, or take the steps domestically that can and must be taken to contain and restrain the upward rush of the cost of living.

My colleagues and I are fully aware that many elements of the cost of living are beyond national control. But we also know that many other elements of this worldwide bogey can be controlled if there is the will and the desire, and I suggest to you that this parliament must not lack either.

I want to give an example of big business domination, an example that every housewife in Canada knows about. I ask hon. members to consider for a moment sugar, an item essential in every kitchen across this country. The price of sugar rose 35 per cent in the month of January alone, and that brought about a 47 per cent increase above the price of a year ago. Obviously, such an increase affected the price of every foodstuff that has a sugar component, and this in turn must have been an important factor in the consumer price index for January.

There is no doubt at all in my mind that Canadians are paying an unjustifiable price for sugar. Why? Because we have failed to control the sugar cartel dominated by three majors in this field. I remind the House that those three companies—Atlantic Sugar, Redpath Sugar, and St. Lawrence Sugar—were convicted only ten years ago, in 1963, of price fixing and collusion. The same three companies are again before the courts on the same charges, despite their earlier convictions, fines and restraining orders. The court documents estimate that the price fixing activities of this sweet little trio has cost the Canadian consumer $125 million in about a decade.

One can forgive the harassed shopper who asks why in God's name these companies were not hauled into court long before this. Indeed, I ask, why have we not taken the action necessary to break up their monopoly which has fixed prices, prevented competition and conspired with foreign firms to guarantee their rip-off? I answer that the reason we have not taken such action is that Liberal and Conservative governments alike have had neither the will nor the desire to curb corporate power in this country.

I would ask you now, sir, to look at my favourites in the corporate rip-off family, the royal family of corporate chicanery, the petroleum companies which have had untrammelled freedom nct only in this country but in most other countries in the western world. These multinational brigands—and I say to you, sir, that the word is not too strong—have cost every nation dearly. Yet, what price Imperial today?

Even my friends on the right, even the leader of the Conservative opposition, have come to the conclusion that maybe we should take an informal look at the oil companies, I think he said, and the terrific windfall gains they are enjoying. Here in Canada they control our industrial lifeblood. They pay next to nothing in income taxes. In fact, they are enjoying interest-free loans which now amount to more than a billion dollars, and they charge for their products not in relation to cost but, as a top Imperial Oil officer recently said, what the market will bear. I say on behalf of the NDP, that the time has come to say to these companies that the people of Canada will bear it no longer.

Mr. Lewis: I think it is right to say that most Canadians recognize that some increase in the price of petroleum products is unavoidable, and that most of them are prepared to pay such an increase on two conditions—two conditions which we support. One is that the increase in the price of Canadian produced oil be reasonable and not the exorbitant international price, and the second is that the revenues from such price increases do not line the pockets of the multinational corporations but go into the public treasuries, both federal and provincial, to be used for the development of new sources of energy for future generations of Canadians.

I say to the Prime Minister that no policy which establishes a national petroleum corporation only to be the handmaiden of the large multinational companies, to assist them retain their control and maintain their profits, can be acceptable to any thoughtful Canadian and will not be acceptable to thoughtful members of this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: On behalf of the New Democratic Party, I say to members of this House, in accordance with the resolution my party adopted at its convention last July, that the developments of the past year in the petroleum sector of our resources have shown clearly that petroleum and its products should be treated as a public utility, serving not the interests of Exxon and the other international giants but serving the interests of this country and its people to whom these irreplaceable natural resources belong.

[Translation]

It is absolutely clear, Mr. Speaker, and we emphasized that during the last session, that the Food Prices Review Board is a complete failure. The New Democratic Party had suggested to the government to establish a board provided with powers to reject any unjustifiable price increase but the government preferred to create a powerless board. The efforts of that board are laughable except that it is at the own expense of the Canadian consumer. Here is an example: recently the board realized that a 4 cents increase in bread prices was unjustifiable and it could not do anything to stop the increase but to issue a press release. The New Democratic Party still believes that the board could be useful to control food prices if the government would want to provide it with the necessary powers to roll back any unwarranted price hike.

[English]

Probably the most significant cost of living area—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Since at this point the hon. member's time, as provided by the Standing Orders, has expired, perhaps I should ask if he has unanimous consent to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lewis: I am grateful to you, sir, and to the generosity of my colleagues in the House.

Probably the most significant cost of living area in which Canadian legislators can immediately do something, if only the will were there, is in the field of housing. As parliamentarians it must be our duty, in this session, to stop tinkering with this basic right of Canadians, to stop treating housing as an economic mechanism, to stop relying solely on the profit incentive and to begin to give housing the social significance it demands and always has demanded.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I notice that the Leader of the Opposition said something to the effect that he did not accept that we cannot put order into the housing situation. He did not go on to say how he proposed to put such order into the housing situation, but I agree with him that we ought not to accept the present situation. I do not have the time—I have already exceeded my allotted time—to quote the outrageous prices now demanded for homes, for mortgages, for rents in the new sterile tenements that stab our city skylines, or the usurious rents charged for the unkempt older buildings in city cores. All of us are too familiar with the $40,000 house that a year ago was worth $30,000, or the family income of $20,000 a year now needed to manage a first mortgage. I do not have to elaborate those facts.

I say that this parliament can and must take steps to end the rampant land speculation that is a blot on every community. We must take bold steps and make far greater sums available for public assembly of land to stem further gambling with this basic right. Our housing programs will have to be far more imaginative and much broader than any previously advocated by Tory and Liberal governments or we will stunt the family development of several generations. And precisely because this is a parliament of minorities we have the opportunity to replace past policies and to launch new approaches for the provision of shelter for Canadian families.

I therefore say, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, let us have the courage to enact legislation that will require financial institutions to make available an adequate percentage of their annual investment for completing homes at a mortgage rate not exceeding 6 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: And let us have the courage to make regulations governing such a program so as to provide priority for the 6 per cent mortgages for families in the middle and low income brackets. If someone suggests that this would create inequities in respect of those who already have mortgages at higher rates of interest, or with respect to renters, the obvious answer is that the taxation system can be adjusted to relieve the victims of usurious mortgage rates.

What I am trying to say—I hope I have succeeded—is that if we as Canadians are going to come to grips with the economic difficulties we face, we will have to go to the roots of what we call our system. Without fundamental change, without action to curb corporate power, particularly the control of multinationals, we cannot meet the challenge of the seventies. We risk allowing more and more of our people to fall below the standard of living we have come to accept as fair and equitable. For our society is still riddled with inequity and plagued by unnecessary poverty.

If there are members in this House who have any illusions about the distribution of wealth and income in this country, let me cite a few figures which underline the devastating inequalities which still darken the face of Canada. I want the colleagues of the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) to convey to him some of these facts in view of his fatuous statement about the little fellow owning Canada Savings Bonds in this country. He ought to look at some of the facts before he makes that kind of fatuous statement. I deal with statistics before 1970 because they are the latest available, but I have no doubt that the present situation is at least as bad and probably worse.

The fact is that more than half Canada's families and individuals—to be exact 53.5 per cent—had no saving deposit in any bank at all in 1970 and that 13 per cent of all the people in Canada held 55 per cent of the total deposit value.

The fact is that 80 per cent of Canadians did not even own a single Canada Savings Bond. But the little fellow, says the Leader of the Opposition, owns Canada Savings Bonds, the 20 per cent being the little people of Canada and the 80 per cent the big people of Canada, according to him. Mr. Speaker, as I say, 80 per cent of Canadians did not even own a Canada Savings Bond in 1970, but 4 per cent of Canada's people owned 65 per cent of the total bond value distributed. As well, 86 per cent of Canadian families and individuals did not own any stock at all, whereas 2 per cent of all Canadians owned 64 per cent of total stock value.

Perhaps the most important, most telling, most revealing statistic of all is the fact that the top 10 per cent of Canadian families and individuals on the income scale receive more in salaries and wages than the bottom 50 per cent. Nothing can be clearer. We have extreme inequities in our country, inequities which make it impossible for most Canadians to retire from the labour force after a reasonable lifetime of service.

My colleagues and I are proud to have participated during the last session in the enactment of a series of laws which resulted in a substantial increase in old age security pensions and veterans' pensions. However, the old age pension scheme still does not provide enough to meet in full justice the needs of older citizens.

I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, that we the privileged of society have a tendency to forget that most jobs which are necessary for the good operation of our society are monotonous jobs which provide no personal satisfaction or esthetic reward. Picking up other people's refuse is neither a pleasant job nor one that pays. A man or a woman who must work at this kind of job for thirty or forty years is entitled to retire at 60 if he or she wishes to do so. And in order to do that society must assure them of a reasonable rate of pension because I am convinced that a great many Canadians who would like to retire at 60 do not have the means to do so.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, it is impossible in 30 or even 40 minutes to touch on all the areas with which I should like to concern myself today, but in concluding I want briefly to mention two other matters. I want to declare my deep disappointments in the government's failure even to mention the north of Canada or the native peoples of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: This is a heartbreaking failure, particularly because there are so many vital questions affecting the destiny and future of our native peoples. It is to me totally incomprehensible how the minister responsible could have permitted such neglect, a neglect that is as insensitive as it is dangerous not only to the native people but to the future democracy of this country.

The Speech from the Throne uses many words about agriculture, regional disparities and freight rate injustices. We have heard these words before. We have heard them many times and in many parliaments presided over by Liberal and Conservative governments. But the fact is that insecurity for the farmer remains, that the disparities grow across this country and that the national transportation policy of Canada continues to be a glaring failure under whatever minister presides over the department.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that we of the New Democratic Party want this parliament really to act, to stop being satisfied with words and to act so that the west, the east and the north of Canada may enjoy the same standard of development now enjoyed by the centre of our country.

I believe that the challenge that faces Canada now is the capacity of parliament and government to curb the powers and irresponsible actions of the corporations. Many of them have interests outside Canada because they are multinational. The challenge lies in our capacity to take effective steps to tax the exorbitant and excessive profits of the corporations; to make the corporations at last pay their fair share of the funds needed to run the country and to carry the social programs which alone give us the right to describe Canada as a civilized society. Above all, Mr. Speaker, we must take control of the Canadian economy out of the hands of the multinational corporations which treat our country, as they treat every other country, merely as another source of exploitable natural resources.

It is my firm belief that in this session we must, on behalf of all Canadians, reassert government leadership and direction over the economy by new methods of social planning. Failure to do this will be failure to come to grips with the cost of living, with family security and with our economic future. I say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it will be a failure not of the Canadian people or of Canada; it is the future of the Canadian people and of Canada that will be seriously affected by the failure of this parliament to act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne (Messrs. Stollery (Spadina) and Pelletier (Sherbrooke)) who, according to the custom, have had the privilege to open this debate and, I must admit, they have carried out this task with spirit. If the Speech from the Throne had as much substance as theirs, Mr. Speaker, I would probably make different comments.

I listened with surprise to the Prime Minister's speech that I qualify as a political speech. And the interventions from the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) will be forgotten because for a long time he has been repeating the same thing. All that he is saying is, in effect, that if he were in power he would do better than the Liberals.

As far as the NDP is concerned, their members are again boasting for making the government work as they wish. Mr. Speaker, in view of the present situation in Canada, I wonder if it is the interest of the New Democratic Party to brag about their friendship with the Liberals.

Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleagues and I have just returned from a tour of our own ridings as well as neighbouring ones in the province of Quebec. We have met people from every walks of life: industrialists, professionals, labourers, unemployed people and even people on welfare.

I suppose that some hon. colleagues from the other parties have made the same experience, that is, to return to the people to find out what they think in order to better express their feelings to the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, this experience proved very rewarding to us because it has shown us some of the good and bad aspects of a number of legislative measures.

● (1740)

Following that, we had meetings in order to pool our experience. We want to be unbiased in the House. I think too many members in the House are playing politics more or less honestly and that delays our progress.

Excellent measures are brought forward in the Speech from the Throne and I wish to congratulate the government. It was about time we began for instance to encourage people to keep their farm.

We are anxious to see the content of the bills. Mr. Speaker, as I said a while ago, we are going to assume, as during the first session, an unbiased and honest stand, and go through what is brought forward in order to improve if possible certain pieces of legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is my duty to state in the House the measures we do not like. After all, the Parliament of Canada is the place to say what goes wrong in our country, to try to improve conditions and solve problems.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the rising cost of living is Canada's greatest problem. The cost of food, of clothing, of housing, of oil, everywhere we must face the gloomy picture of inflation. Prices increase and the individual's purchasing power cannot cope with that increase.

In Lotbinière and other ridings I have met people with fixed incomes and salaried people who are completely overcome by price increases and who cannot face those increases.

I would like to deal with those Canadians who are building our country and who are called medium or low income people. When they get their pay cheque on Friday as often stated by the leader of the Social Credit Party (Mr. Caouette), the stub of their cheque is longer than the cheque itself. The balance is then clearly inadequate to meet the increasing cost of living.

This problem is most serious and I am disappointed that the Speech from the Throne did not include or announce specific measures to help those people.

Mr. Speaker, when a father of two, three or five children with a fixed income of $100, $125 or even $150 a week walks into a shop, a grocery or drives into a gas station and must pay the same price as everyone, this is revolting.

This worker, with his purchasing power, gets fewer commodities for the same working hours. This is currently due to our way of thinking and an individual's income has always been based on the value of his work; he is paid a salary in proportion to it and he is told that with that money he will be able to meet his food, lodging and leisure requirements.

Even though the workers have today the same working potential as in 1971, they get about the same income but fewer commodities in return.

Now we are told that the quality of life in Canada is improving, that our goods are better, that their quality is excellent. Mr. Speaker, if the individual does not earn an adequate income to encourage him to continue to work, he is caught in a vicious circle, he becomes a second-class citizen and he then becomes dependent on a whole series of welfare measures which are extremely costly for all governments.

Mr. Speaker, the citizen is discouraged, because if he works hard, he does not earn enough to meet his obligations. In addition, this is more serious, as a result of inflation his money having less value, he gets less for his dollar.

Mr. Speaker, hence the many welfare measures bringing the individual under the control of the rotten Canadian bureaucracy. Finally, this individual becomes an entirely second-class citizen.

The Social Credit Party of Canada has long identified with the consumers; for quite some time, we have been telling the government that there should be measures to help the consumers directly, not necessarily by controlling prices, but by protecting the consumer against abuses and specifically by helping him buy products.

Compensated discount is a measure which, while not controlling prices, restrains them by helping consumers buy something that their purchasing power no longer allows them to buy. Members of this House find it funny when we mention compensated discount because it is a Social Credit measure. When we ask for direct help for the consumer through an increase in his purchasing power, some members of this House find it funny and say that we should not help the consumers. And now because this has become a major problem, everyone is talking about a guaranteed annual income, and even those who used to laugh at the Social Credit are talking about it; there are even some tests going on in the present system.

Mr. Speaker, the meetings that we have had in our constituencies confirm entirely the statements contained in some newspaper clippings. I would simply like to read you the titles of a few articles. I invite my colleagues who laugh at the Social Credit Party to listen to these titles taken from newspapers that are basically defending their system and to see if all goes well with their system about which we must not laugh and which we must certainly not attack.

Here is an article from the December 18, 1973 issue of La Tribune:

THE PRICE OF CLOTHING WILL GO UP

Good news for everybody! Another publication gives the profits of oil companies for 1973: British Petroleum made $135 million; Exxon (Esso), $638 million; Gulf, $210 million; Mobil, $231 million; Shell, $413 million; Texaco, $307 million.

● (1750)

Those are the profits of the petroleum companies. I shall say more about this later.

I have here an article published in the magazine Actualité and entitled "Where will shortages and inflation strike in 1974?" It tells a sadistic tale of increasing prices to prove that nothing has gone up.

I also have here an editorial from La Tribune entitled "The Year of Frustrated Hopes". Another newspaper entitles an article on housing and higher prices "Ottawa agrees with all provinces save Quebec". The newspaper Le Nouvelliste carries the heading "Violent Sally of Liberal Member for Longueuil in House of Commons—Petroleum Companies Can Even Have Government Change—Olivier". In La Presse I read this "Bread—4 cent Increase"

Everything is just fine, Mr. Speaker, in the Liberal and Progressive Conservative system. Who is responsible for the petroleum crisis? The producing countries or the great multinational companies?

I have here another article which gives the consumer price index based on Statistics Canada data. I quote:

The consumer price index reached 155.5 in November 1973, that is 9.3 per cent more than 1972. Food prices went up 18.2 per cent. This graph shows the rise in consumer price index, based on 1961 prices from 1941 to November 1973.

And then we are told, Mr. Speaker, that all's well in the best of worlds.

Another newspaper reports the following, and I quote:

Sugar—another high increase item.

And on the same page:

The oil increase will cause the price of . . . vegetables to rise.

I have here another article and I will just quote its heading:

22% increase in housing.

Here, analyses are made on consumption.

Here is another article from Le Nouvelliste which will surprise many people. I am sure that no one suspected that and I quote:

Oil firms subscribed $49 million to Nixon's campaign.

In La Tribune of January 2, 1974, there is an article headed "Oil: Quebec disadvantaged". In the December 24, 1973 issue of the same paper, one can read the following heading: "Inflation and unemployment cast their shadows over expectations for Canadian economy."

In the same newspaper of December 20, 1973, we read that:

Although the average salary has been increased by $12.08 from October 1972 to October 1973, it was not compatible with the 9.3 per cent rise in the cost of living for the same period.

This, Mr. Speaker, proves what I have just stated. And to add to the picture, La Presse of February 16, 1974, informs us that we have now 240,000 unemployed people in the province of Quebec—9.5 per cent.

In that respect, here is the conclusion reached by the right hon. Prime Minister and offered as a Christmas gift. I quote a headline of the December 23, 1973 issue of La Tribune ". . . It is a distress sign of the Earth . . . ". These are the now famous words of the right hon. Prime Minister about the oil crises. "A distress sign of the Earth". It is self-explanatory. No solution, just a statement. But in the meantime, Mr. Speaker, this does not prevent the oil companies from making profits. Our Food Prices Review Board, under the presidence of Mrs. Plumptre who is overpaid at $40,000 a year, establishes simply that prices increase and cannot do anything about it.

Mr. Speaker, people in our ridings do not tolerate this anymore. We were told to fight in this House to convince the government that powers be given to the board, that measures be taken to prevent abuses and to end the exploitation of those who cannot afford such a critical inflation which is out of control.

I want to attract the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister who honours us with his presence to remind him that the individual's purchasing power is a most important issue. As I was reading the speech terminating the last session, I noticed in fact that the Prime Minister believed "that the productive capacity of the economy had reached its physical limits in Canada", in other words, that production was at a maximum level.

Also, the right hon. Prime Minister cannot ignore that Canadians from coast to coast are totally excluded from the economic flow, and because of their lack of income are unable to keep up with these cost-of-living increases.

Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister will also recongize that for the last 10 years at least, successive government measures have all been directed towards production growth. They invested in production through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Industrial Development Bank. It has been announced in the Speech from the Throne that a new federal bank will be established. I do not want to judge the value of these programs, but I simply want to enumerate them to suggest to the government that large amounts were invested in production but that not much has been done yet as regards consumers, Mr. Speaker. A few efforts were made, such as the old age security pension, family allowances, but when the latter are granted, Mr. Speaker, they are taxable so that the purchasing power at the end of the year does not increase. They even made some calculations and, in some cases, they will give people, through family allowances, less money than before. Why? Because they are taxed.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people want to build their country. Five years ago, for instance, when we passed in this chamber some measures designed to discourage agriculture by imposing controls and quotas on production because there was a surplus, the problem, consequently, did not lie in production at that time, Mr. Speaker, but in the distribution of products. There are people who are exploiting and abusing our wealth, Mr. Speaker—and I say so while I strongly believe, as my colleagues, in private enterprise—who take advantage of the situation and who exploit people and who, therefore, make us believe that there is in Canada a shortage of products, which is not true. Everybody must admit that there is no shortage of products in Canada. We have enough oil. We have enough wheat. We have enough milk producers. We have enough cheese. We have adequate supplies of almost all commodities that we need in order to secure a good quality of life. What we need, Mr. Speaker, is a distribution system that would be equitable and fair for all Canadians.

When I am told that there is concern about that problem I will have to part with those people and discuss very strongly because that is untrue. For example, there is talk about the oil policy at a time when supply is very high. It will have taken a crisis, it will have taken hand-outs from the government to oil companies for them not to increase their prices, it will have taken an extraordinary crisis to realize that we have resources in the west but, on the other hand, that there was a shortage of products so that we have high prices for those products. Who pays for that, Mr. Speaker? The people.

In Canada we have what is needed and because we did not foresee the use of those resources we ended up with one policy and two sets of weights; in other words, Quebecers are now paying more for oil than all other Canadians. Is that fair? The problem is in the distribution of that resource that is oil and that distribution should be thought out by the government so that all Canadians wherever they live will be treated on an equal basis. Such is not the case now and Quebecers among others and the rest of this country are paying for that policy.

Let us take, for example, wheat which was controlled. There was a time when producers were even paid not to sow, not to produce. We have now been told that there is an alleged shortage of products. That finally results in high prices. Who pays for that policy? Again the other part of this country because we did not set up any distribution system so Canadians would actually be treated on an equal basis.

In other areas it is the opposite; the west is charged higher prices than Quebec and that, Mr. Speaker, is also not acceptable. We Social Crediters say that the problem is not in the production. The needs are there. Nor is the problem in the consumption. People are not crazy, they can select the quality of product they want. The problem lies in a sound distribution of these products, of this wealth across our country. Secondly the difficulty is to have a sufficient purchasing power to buy these products in order to meet our needs.

Mr. Speaker, this is briefly how I see the present situation and those people who are most affected by it. I repeat, and I will never repeat it enough as long as I feel that this message is not understood, the ceiling is for those people in the low and middle income brackets.

Mr. Speaker, the problem lies in the distribution of wealth and as long as we will not really tackle this problem by setting up effective organisms rather than puppet organisms of control like the Canadian Wheat Board, for instance, which makes prices increase, controls production and forces the Quebec people or other Canadians to deprive themselves, things will get worse and worse.

Mr. Speaker, like my leader, the hon. member for Témiscamingue, like the right hon. Prime Minister, we believe in Canada that Canadians can build the country; we believe Canada is a very large country in the world—you just have to travel to see it—in spite of its very low population. At the same time, we see nothing wrong with the unemployed, Mr. Speaker, with people who live on welfare, with an alleged scarceness of products which is an excuse for their high cost. At the same time, workers pay enormous taxes to support people who would like to be productive but who are not given this opportunity. I think the situation is too serious to let it deteriorate further.

I think the second session give us a marvellous opportunity to grapple with this problem outside the political tracks.

Mr. Speaker, even if the Progressive Conservatives told me they were going to do better than Liberals, I would not believe it. They were already in power and they did nothing better. Even if the Social Crediters were there it remains to be proved that they would do any better. I think it is time to be honest in this House. Even if the Liberals told me that things are going well in this country that people enjoy a nice living and security I would also say it is false. Mr. Speaker, you just have to go with people. Even if the New Democratic Party members told us the same thing, it would be false.

I think there is some good in every party. If we were to be honest there would be good ideas to pick up on both sides of this House, we should adopt some ideas of the Social Crediters. Since we speak about product distribution, we find that strange. Mr. Speaker, I should be ready to go anywhere in Canada to support this principle because now everybody feels in his wallet the effect of the distribution problem and the dissatisfaction that occurred.

I should like to ask a little favour of this House, Mr. Speaker. I see it is six o'clock and if I had two or three minutes more I could finish my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

• (1800)

Mr. Speaker: The House agrees.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to concentrate my comments on that matter because in our opinion it is a great problem in Canada, a problem which requires a global solution.

I think that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would have the support of all parties in the House if he could conceive with the co-operation of all members a fair and just distribution system of our resources for all areas in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, we are here to work hard, we want to be effective and objective, and we say to the government that we are ready to co-operate, that we are ready to work very hard to support it or any policy aimed at solving the resource distribution problem, so that we could be proud to be a Canadian, from British Columbia or from Quebec, in order that the measure could be the same everywhere in Canada, also in order that every Canadian could take advantage of our fantastic resources. To that extent, we are willing to co-operate. But if they refuse to support that position, we will protect the people who have no income. Then, Mr. Speaker, we will have to withdraw our support to the government.

With such an honest position and to prove to the government that we are serious, in conclusion I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), the following sub-amendment:

That the period be replaced by a comma and the following words added:

"particularly for not having taken effective and immediate measures to stop the increase in the cost of living which seriously affects persons on low and medium incomes."

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to move that motion because I know that it reflects the views of the great majority of Canadians who are only too willing to build their country and expect to be encouraged, stimulated and supported by their government and our party.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

[English]

At 6.04 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, last spring I spoke in this House putting forth the voice of the new west. I want to return to that theme tonight as I consider the real meaning of the energy crisis for mankind today.

First may I offer the sincere congratulations of the people of Edmonton-Strathcona to our new Governor General and to wish His Excellency and Madame Léger health and happiness as they begin their arduous travels across the land representing Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth. They will be following the illustrious tradition of dedicated service this country received from that stimulating and widely acclaimed couple, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Michener.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell you once more my appreciation for the admirable way in which you and your officials have steered the debates of this assembly in a parliamentary context which is all but calm.

I also congratulate the mover (Mr. Stollery) and the seconder (Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke)) of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne and more particularly the hon. member for Sherbrooke who has displayed such a fine understanding of Canada's responsibilities towards the international community.

Speeches like the one delivered by the hon. member for Sherbrooke restore my faith in the willingness of members of all parties and from all regions of the country to co-operate for the common good of our society.

[English]

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not want this praise to go to the government's head, for the gap between what the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) was talking about and the program of the government as outlined in the throne speech is so wide that they might as well be in different worlds.

The throne speech gives only lip service to the vigorous steps that must be taken to "reduce disparities" between the rich and poor nations. It gives only a superficial glance at the reasons for these disparities, which are the central issue in the world today. The government rather contents itself with enlarging its own bureaucracy, seen in the creation of at least four new national bodies, as the supposed solution to the problems of our times.

The people for whom I speak certainly want our domestic problems of high inflation and high taxation solved, but we look beyond our own special interests and borders into the larger scene of our whole country and, indeed, the world. In Edmonton-Strathcona we want two specific advances that will bring about a more secure Canada: first, the use of arbitration to replace strikes in labour disputes involving essential services should be made compulsory; and second, the government should promote the formation in each province of an advisory council on technology, with representation from business, labour and the professions, to ensure that technological benefits are received by all mankind.

These are two steps that will help the west and all of Canada to develop in a way that contributes to economic and social stability. We want the economic discrimination against the west to stop so that the west can develop and play a stronger role for the good of Canada. That is the spirit of the new west that I represent.

We want to participate in the development of a modern Canada in which decentralized decision making restores the vitality of all our diverse regions. It is through the application of genuine decentralization, in the constitutional division of powers, the spreading out of federal government departments, and better intergovernmental relations, that the country can be pulled back from over-dependency on federal government programs. What we want in the new west is the chance for all Canadians to develop their opportunities.

It is time to bury the canard that the west, and particularly Alberta, is alienated from the rest of Canada. Nothing could be farther from the truth. It is time for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to stop promoting the alleged opposition of Alberta to the national interest. Nothing could be farther from the truth. It is time to cease the slander that western members of parliament have come here to obstruct parliament and not share in the creation of a better society. Again nothing could be further from the truth.

No, the west is not alienated from Ottawa, parliament, the Liberal party or even the person of the Prime Minister. What the west is alienated from is this government that has demonstrated it is hopelessly incapable of managing the economy. We are alienated from a government that has thrown hundreds of thousands of Canadians out of work and savaged us through inflation. We are alienated from a government that relies on massive social spending which is keeping tax levels excessively high.

There is a modern spirit in the new west that rises above pettiness, that refuses to be diverted from the great problems and potential of the times we live in. We are not looking for easy answers; rather, we want to share in formulating the right questions. For in looking beyond short-term and narrow interests we can identify three principal issues responsible for escalating international tensions today: resource exploitation, population and terrorism.

This winter's energy crisis has triggered great questions, for suddenly the experience of a limited oil shortage brought home to north Americans and west Europeans the previously unimaginable possibility that our way of life might not be indefinitely sustainable. Economists and ecologists have been telling us for years that our resources are limited; but as long as the heating oil arrived, the gas pumps flowed and the electrical gadgets hummed, no one took them very seriously. Now we know that we are vulnerable to the turning of a spigot. The jolt we have sustained is a blessing in disguise, because it is refocussing our minds on a new necessity: survival without abundance.

The ideas of progress, creative growth, expansion, surpluses, inexhaustible resources, have been synonomous with the development of western man since the industrial revolution. Science and technology have been the driving forces behind us. This is true no matter whether people live under a capitalist or a socialist system of government.

Industrial civilization is predicted on expansion. When our economy is not growing, we are in trouble. Growth has thus become an end in itself. Bigger is better. More and more harnessing of inanimate physical energy through the application of science to technology enables the economy to grow and the gross national product to accelerate at 7 per cent a year. And all of this is the hallmark of a successful society. Or is it?

How do we account for the barrage of confidence-shaking events that have filled us with a sense of unease and foreboding during the past decade? The Viet Nam war was only one of many such events. The explosion of street crime, race riots, bombings, bizarre aeroplane hijackings, shocking assassinations, government intrigue at the highest levels, have brought home with terrible impact the recognition of a barbarism hidden behind the amenities of life. How do we account for the failure of the present middle aged generation to pass its norms and values along to its children? The ubiquitous use of drugs, the extreme sexual relation, the unprecedented phenomenon of "dropping out," especially among the children of the most successful classes, all have added their freight of disquiet and disconcert to the mood of our time.

Nor should we adopt a superior attitude in Canada because we have been spared so far the extremes of reactions to the age of discontinuity. If material progress and the quantity of life are the source of happiness, why is it that five million Canadians still live below the poverty line? Why have crimes of violence doubled in the past decade? Why are so many resorting to alcohol and other drugs to help them contend with the challenges of existence? Why are we becoming unbalanced as a country, millions congesting in a few metropolitan areas while vast regions suffer population decline?

Today we find a growing number of observers attributing this disorientation to a regression of ethical values directly traceable to the voracious demands of industrial expansion. Progress has been simplistically graphed and calculated in terms of ever escalating numbers. Capital gains have to be turned back into the system to create further growth, as though the cycle could never end.

In such a thought pattern, human cogs could easily become labour input and eventually secondary beneficiaries of progress. The health of the economic system, demanding unlimited growth, achieved top priority in government planning. It has been assumed that people would accommodate themselves to the system and prosper, and that those who could not, those who became casualties, would be taken care of by remedial social legislation. The value of man for his own sake has been sublimated by the value of man as an instrument of progress.

In this mockery of values, the life of greed has become a virtue. As Arnold Toynbee tells us:

> Modern man has been induced to overcome traditional scruples about giving freer rein to human greed by a doctrine that has made greed look respectable.

For it has been argued that the selfish pursuit of individual, sectional or national economic advantage is socially beneficial. The unleashing of greed, of acquisition and affluence for their own sake, has been the psychological driving force behind the modern way of life in the technologically developed countries.

It is this ethic of growth by exploitation that has rendered the designation "Third World" a misnomer. There is now only a first and second world—the first world of the rich and the second world of the poor, and the gap between them is widening. In all the contradictions of our time, none is more difficult to grasp than the fact that technology has made it possible for the world to become a global community—which is good—and that within the community the preferred position of the minority enjoying most of the resources and wealth is producing anger, terrorism and revolutions—which is bad.

The argument that a civilization directed to material improvements is unable to satisfy the human spirit has been regarded as some kind of poetry. Pleas for social justice, domestically and internationally, have attracted but a handful of adherents. Statements that the quantity of life syndrome should be replaced by a quality of life ethic have been put off as philosophies to be approached gradually. The business of the day, politics as usual, must go on because, after all, growth is the standard and band-aids are the remedy for breakdowns.

Now, however, thanks to the energy crisis we have suddenly come up against a hitherto inconceivable prospect: maybe unlimited industrial production and economic expansion will have to come to an end. Maybe the rich of the world have over reached themselves. Maybe a whole new assessment of how we live will have to be made, and made exactly.

It is no longer an intellectual, philosophical or religious exercise to consider the role of man on planet earth; it is a hard headed, pragmatic necessity because human survival is at stake. The Arabs have done us the favour of forcing us back to the age old question: Who is man and what is his future?

We can get an overview of the human predicament by examining, first, resources. The availability of resources is necessary to sustain industrial output. In the developed world, industrial output, growing at 7 per cent a year, doubles in a decade. If we project this growth rate for another 50 years, the demand for resources will have doubled five times, requiring a volume of resource extraction 32 times larger than today's. Looking ahead over the ten doublings of a century, the amount of annual resources requirements will have increased over a thousand times.

Closer to home and more comprehensible perhaps is the simple fact that Canadians today consume energy at a rate approaching five times the global per capita average, or some 47 times the Indian per capita average—the result of a high standard of living, large scale resource extraction, a rigorous climate and the great size of the country. Whatever the next century brings, over the next 35 years the world will consume more metals and more energy since the dawn of human history; the energy mix and the rate of growth of consumption have already been determined. We in the western world have irresponsibly and immorally demanded the lion's share of the world's resources, and I see no sign of this thirst slackening. It is not solutions to local shortages this winter and next that should preoccupy us but long range planning, since present growth cannot be sustained indefinitely.

Second, we should examine population. The conditions of exponential growth are especially observable in population. Barring some global holocaust, world population now appears certain to exceed six billion by the year 2000. It could reach 7.4 billion if the trends in growth established since world war II were to continue unmodified until that time. Even with population control programs it is difficult to visualize human numbers levelling off until well into the next century, because almost 40 per cent of the world's population today is under 15 years of age. Thus the potential for births is very high. It is now generally anticipated that at least 800 million people will be added to the world population in the coming ten years. Moreover, the present ratio of 30 to 70 between the population of the rich and poor nations will swing inexorably to 10 to 90.

The continuation of such growth constitutes what many now consider to be the overwhelming threat to the future wellbeing of man. What are the consequences of adding 75 million to the earth's numbers this year—of populating the equivalent of the United States in three years, or of populating another China in less than a decade? And, of course, the impact of population growth is intensified by the rising expectations of all men, rich and poor, and the desire of every nation to expand its industrial base. Urbanization compounds the population problem. The one billion urban dwellers of 1960 will become three billion by the year 2000, requiring the equivalent of building 70 new cities yearly, each housing one million people.

Any commodity in over abundance tends to lose its value, and the brutal fact is that people have become a commodity. Because we have disregarded the elementary, universal quality of human dignity, hundreds of millions today live in abject poverty, are illiterate, are ravaged by disease and are chronically malnourished. Their lives have a bleakness and hopelessness difficult for us to comprehend. What worth is the individual in such circumstances? How valuable is the human person? The current famine in the southern Sahara has produced a tragic comment on technological man: the undernourished children of a tribe in Chad were too weak to resist an outbreak of diptheria. None the less the tribe elders pleaded with UN officials not to send drugs. Starvation, they said, would be too slow a death; let diptheria rage.

The impoverishment of the human spirit and the cheapening of human life have profound consequences now that technology gives man the technical power to shape his own future. It is a myth to believe that the problems of under development will be solved simply through the implementation of birth control programs, although I believe that acceptable ways of stabilizing world population must be found. Birth control measures are too often mistaken for true family planning. I believe that the mentality which we have in the western world, which favours reducing the number of people in the world so that we will not have to reduce our share of the world's goods, is the wrong mentality.

Sharing what the world community possesses is a prerequisite to stability. Before introducing massive birth control programs into the various countries of the world, considerable investment is needed in the key sectors which determine economic growth. Giving priority to the population problem, over and above the economic and social one, means we are bound to fail.

It strains credibility to suggest that the interlocking problems of population growth, urbanization and energy demands will not lead to extreme social disorder. Greater shortages of basic goods, including food, deeper poverty and more environmental damage are ahead. Is it possible that we, in our affluence, can blithely consign millions more people to a human state comparable to the worst regions of India or Pakistan without sowing the seeds of massive revolutions? At the very least we can expect the rise of authoritarian governments whose demands for social changes will not stop with family limitation.

Today the political winds blowing across Latin America are nationalist and authoritarian. Right-wing military dictatorships hold power in Brazil, Chile, Bolivia and Uruguay. Argentina is experiencing a neo-Peronist threat to freedom. The political and military strife we now see within and between nations will escalate as the universal social-economic situation deteriorates.

Third, warfare. The good work of the United Nations notwithstanding, there is not the slightest reason to hope that we can escape mounting terrorism, revolutions and international warfare if we continue on our present path. Sheer desperation will drive individuals, bands of terrorists and nations to fight for survival. Nothing is more basic in human nature. The picture of two men fighting over the last gallon of gas in a Florida service station is but an amusing reflection of the spectre of inevitable wars of redistribution. When to this age old manner of deciding who gets the spoils is added the modern factor of nuclear weapons, the prospect is grim.

Even small nations, or groups within nations, possessing no fully developed industrial base can gain possession of nuclear weapons. They will be a by-product of atomic power plants that will soon be common around the world. These warheads will not require complicated delivery systems but can be easily smuggled into enemy harbours or cities.

If a band of desperadoes in California can kidnap the Hearst heiress and demand massive food distribution to the poor as ransom, it does not require much conjecture to envision the developed world being blackmailed by nuclear terrorism, even by small groups, demanding the transfer of large amounts of wealth to the poverty stricken world. Our world pattern is undeniably producing terrorism. Airplanes and airports, even in this country, are not safe today without the tightest security. Why should we regard whole cities as any safer? What have terrorists got to lose?

I am not purposely trying to paint a grim picture of humanity in the days ahead just for its shock value. Rather I am trying to show that the energy crisis of the past few months is but the tip of an iceberg whose dimensions and power can now be charted. Put as plainly as possible, industrial man has constructed this mammoth iceberg which threatens to capsize us. We may think our accomplishments are magnificent, but the truth is that never in the history of the world have the times been so dangerous.

Of course, it would be folly to think that we are helpless. For population growth, war, environmental damage and the use of technology are all social problems originating in human attitudes and capable of solution by alteration of our behavior. Thus, says Robert Heilbroner, in an analysis he calls "The Human Prospect":

> —whether we are unable to sustain growth or unable to tolerate it, there can be no doubt that a radically different future beckons. In either eventuality, it seems beyond dispute that the present orientation of society must change.

Well, now, what is to be done? Without backing away from the bleak picture I have sketched, I reject any implication that all these complications amount to a death sentence on mankind. Neither do I wish to offer any bromides. There is a way out if we apply our knowledge and willpower. That, of course, is a very large "if".

It is certainly the job of politics, religion, philosophy and the academic world to animate us. I do not think any of us alone can do the job, the scope of which is totally unprecedented. I believe there is absolutely no hope if politics remains devoid of spiritual principles as a priority, and religion remains aloof from deep involvement in the human condition.

We must not think that we are struggling here alone in the darkness. Great minds are at work on the problems before us. But solutions in the practical order will be possible only when we have recovered the direction of man who lost his way long before the age of future shock.

Twenty years ago Walter Lippmann pointed us in the direction of a truly human society with his call for the revival of a "public philosophy." In a public philosophy the highest laws are those upon which all rational men of goodwill, when fully informed, will tend to agree. All men, governors and governed, are always under, never above, these laws which can be developed and refined by rational discussion.

The revival of the public philosophy—

Lippmann says

—depends on whether its principles and precepts, which were articulated before the industrial revolution, before the era of rapid techological change, and before the rise of the mass democracies—depends on whether this old philosophy can be reworked for the modern age. If this cannot be done, then the free and democratic nations face the totalitarian challenge without a public philosophy which free men believe in and cherish, with no public faith beyond a mere official agnosticism, neutrality and indifference. There is not much doubt how the struggle is likely to end if it lies between those who, believing, care very much—and those who, lacking belief, cannot care very much.

To give a vivid projection of Lippmann's public philosophy we can look at our environmental dilemma as but a symptom of the much deeper problem facing us. No one decided to dehumanize life with crowding, traffic jams, noise and squalor. No one decided that air pollution and dying waterways should be the price of unlimited growth. No one decided these things, but neither were they accidents. They are what we have done because we have assumed, unconsciously, that we had the right, indeed the obligation, to do them. But now we are forced to change our thinking from plunderers to stewards.

How, then, does Canada fit into this global perspective? As Maurice Strong observed at a recent meeting of the Canadian Club in Ottawa, the question is going to be raised as to the rights of 22 million people to a substantial fraction of the world's land area, fresh water, agricultural and fish resources, and mineral wealth. Although we may regard our natural resources as an heritage to be dispensed and utilized at our pleasure, other less fortunate members of our global society may tend to view us as custodians of natural wealth to be shared more generally for the good of men.

With the broader and more rapid dissemination of information around the world they are going to expect more from us. The present rate of population growth, as I have indicated, really means that in the next few years production and growth rates will have to increase by factors of 10 to 15.

Given the environmental disruption, the increased economic and energy costs, and the mineral finding rates that this implies, such massive development hardly seems likely on a time scale of three or four decades. In other words, the tremendous gap that exists today between the rich and the poor, between the developed and the under developed, does not seem likely to become very much smaller in the year 2000. Rather, given the present course of events, it seems that there will be greater shortages, deeper poverty, and more environmental damage than society experiences today. The have-nots in world society will not tolerate such conditions.

Canadians will not, however, simply be facing difficult situations of external origin. Failure to look beyond the immediate future can lead to internal problems of a vexing nature. Once again the energy situation provides us with a good example. Even though we like to think we are going to become self-sufficient from the production of oil in western Canada, if our present growth rate persists, then in the 1980's we will still be suffering a deficiency in oil production, given the methods that are now being used.

Three variables bear on the extent to which the supply short-fall will develop over the coming decade: the finding rate for conventional oil in western Canada; the rate of oil export to the United States; and the extent to which the rate of growth in domestic demand can be modified. These are not perfectly clear.

Whether or not Canada subsequently re-establishes its net self-sufficiency in oil depends upon the rate at which the Alberta oilsands are developed beyond 1985; it depends upon the future availability of oil from frontier regions; and, most important, in the final analysis it depends upon the degree to which Canada views this as a desirable goal.

Such problems of national concern, of which future oil supply is but one example, will require for their handling a spirit of co-operation between the provinces and the federal government, which spirit is at present lacking. Lengthy debates over short-term interests and problems are not conducive to attacking the longer term difficulties which we face. Moreover, I suspect that the bickering exhibited by officials and politicians at the international and the national level over frequently inconsequential issues tends to promote feelings of cynicism and demoralization amongst the general public.

There seem, then, to be several factors mitigating against our chances of anticipating and successfully overcoming the fundamental and rapidly worsening problems of world society. One is the unwillingness of both government and individuals to look beyond immediate term interests. Another is the feeling of cynicism or perhaps helplessness engendered in the individual in witnessing the failure of man's institutions to deal with the complex social problems of today. The individual tends to be overwhelmed by, or indifferent to, problems which seem completely beyond his capability of either understanding or solving.

It is, then, to a considerable extent the responsibility of government and parliament to overcome this indifference and to provide strong leadership in anticipating and, most importantly, educating people about the fundamental issues facing society today. Feelings of provincialism or nationalism, although useful to some degree, must ultimately be submerged in a concern for the broader affairs of society. For, after all, there is little that happens in the world today which is not reflected more generally throughout society. If humanitarian reasons alone do not prompt us to feel concern, there are very good pragmatic reasons for not ignoring the immense problems facing society today.

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, I would like to record my personal congratulations to the mover (Mr. Stollery) and the seconder (Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke) of the motion. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) has that rare ability to be able to introduce humour into his speech to emphasize the point he is making and to hold the attention of his audience. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) included in his remarks an illuminating reference to the poverty that exists in the world today, not forgetting the poor people in Canada. May I underline his statement that it is imperative that Canadians as a nation give particular attention to poorer and less fortunate countries.

I would also like to add my congratulations to our new Governor General and wish him an enjoyable and rewarding term in office. His Excellency, Governor General Jules Léger, spent his youth and was educated, as was his brother, His Eminence Cardinal Paul Emile Léger, at St-Polycarpe, in the county of Vaudreuil, the county I have the honour to represent.

Many noted persons in public life have come from the county of Vaudreuil, a county named after the Marquis de Vaudreuil, who left his mark on the city of Montreal at the beginning of the 18th century. A former and very competent Speaker of this House, the Honourable L. René Beaudoin, represented the county for 12 years.

However, we are especially proud that a former Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the second Liberal Prime Minister since confereration and our first Prime Minister born in the province of Quebec, was the member from the county of Soulanges, which now forms a part of the much larger county of Vaudreuil.

Last year the town of Vaudreuil celebrated its bicentennial. Canada may be a relatively young country but in counties such as that which I represent there is a wealth of history of which we can be very proud.

I want to discuss today my thoughts on the Speech from the Throne. The intention to expand employment opportunities and to increase employment through providing workers with improved access to available jobs is particularly necessary today when there are such great regional disparities that show some areas of the country with effectively zero unemployment whilst other regions have serious unemployment problems. Not only must there be a greater effort to match the unemployed to the available jobs but a substantially larger program must be introduced to provide the unemployed with the skills necessary to fill the available positions.

[Mr. Roche.]

Particularly in the lower age bracket where youth have already spent some time as a part of the labour force, the opportunity must be offered them to acquire the skills necessary to give them permanent and more productive employment. Training-on-the-job programs should be expanded to include classroom instruction and controlled courses in industry and commerce. These courses would last from one to two years and a participant would be required to show adequate progress at predetermined intervals.

Greater use should be encouraged of the program that pays the transfer costs to transport an unemployed person to a job opportunity in another area. For the unemployed that are past middle age, legislation must effectively eliminate discrimination. I will come to this point again when I discuss human rights.

I am particularly pleased to see that there will be amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I personnally believe that a benefit limit of $100 per week should be reimposed and the qualification period should be lengthened. There should be greater encouragement, through revised tax measures, to take temporary or part time employment and at the same time much stiffer penalties to encourage full declaration of part time earnings.

I am most pleased that this session will see amendments to the Bank Act. The Canadian banking system is substantially non-competitive and is run from Bay Street. This statement will bring vehement denials from our chartered banks but almost 100 per cent agreement from the banks' customers. The opportunity for provincial participation will bring greater consideration of regional needs. Increased competition in the banking industry is an absolute necessity if the present antiquated and uneconomical practices are to be eliminated.

In a related area, I note that proposals will be made to ensure Canadian control of the computer communications field. The private citizen is and should be genuinely afraid that the fantastic, and certainly beneficial, advances in computer technology can leave him exposed and uprotected. There is no doubt in my mind that insufficient attention has been paid to the provision of an adequate number of trained personnel to handle the computer hardware and software being sold and leased today.

We live in a world where many of us are unaware that changes are inadvertently being made to our accounts kept on computer records. Persons remitting mortgage payments are blissfully ignorant of untraceable errors that can leave them still owing large sums at the completion of the time period at which they believe their mortgage would be paid off. As one man said to me last week, "I took it for granted the computer did not make errors". When he, in casual conversation with his bank manager, discovered an error in his account, he naturally wondered for how long there could have been similar errors.

We must ensure that easily erasable records, as has been amply demonstrated south of the border, should be duplicated and also printed out in permanent format before changes, corrections and erasures, intentional or otherwise, can be made.

Whilst on the subject of computer records, it is essential that tough legislation be introduced to protect the privacy of the individual. No information that can in any way be considered detrimental to an individual should be communicated to a third party without the prior knowledge of the individual concerned. Information, even though itself accurate, can, because it is incomplete, be at the very least misleading. Everyone must have the automatic right to correct or explain credit and character records.

Canadian control of the computer communications field should receive all party support. Similarly no member is likely to argue against the requirement that boards of directors of foreign controlled companies should be 51 per cent Canadian. Not one multinational or foreign controlled company executive to whom I have spoken has argued against such a regulation.

However, these gentlemen have unanimously rejected, as have executives from wholely Canadian companies, the provision that employees be excluded from the listing of the 51 per cent Canadian content of a board. This is a distinctly anti-Canadian provision that will accelerate the brain drain to the United States whilst serving no useful purpose whatsoever in this country.

I am pleased to see included in the throne speech the provision that additional measures will be proposed to aid small business. Also to be underlined is that steps will be taken to obtain greater returns from industrial research and development as well as technological innovation in Canada.

In the pharmaceutical industry, for example, we must face the issue of whether, in our desire to press for the lowest cost drug of an acceptable quality, we are prepared to write off the Canadian industry. If many provinces follow the example of Manitoba we could become an importer of the major part of our drug requirements.

In the field of agricultural research we must redirect our thinking and give greater concentration to research that will aid and encourage our youth at the university level. These young people will be the backbone of our future agricultural development.

It is imperative that there be greater encouragement to our inventors and scientists, and patent legislation must reflect our wish to see ample reward for new ideas.

In noting that legislation will be introduced to create a federal commission on human rights and interests, I want to refer to an earlier remark I made concerning employment of middle aged persons. We must include in any such legislation provisions that will prevent discrimination on the basis of age. Thus no employee should be excluded from a position because of a restrictive pension plan. It is completely contrary to our concept of fairness that a competent prospective employee should be barred, because he is over 50 and the company has a compulsory pension plan, which he would be unable to join.

Furthermore, the government should consider methods by which pensions can be made portable from plan to plan in order, also to protect the older members of the work force. In this respect it is, in my opinion, highly immoral that an employee should lose moneys contributed by a company on his behalf to a pension plan if that employee resigns or is fired before he has a vested interest in the plan.

It is equally unjust that a prospective employee who has passed all other qualifying tests should be refused employment because a doctor's examination shows that he does not meet the requirements of the company's medical plan. I am ready to accept that special positions require a certain level of fitness—air line pilots, for example. However, to exclude a capable person from a sedentary position in a financial institution because of a minor physical defect is grossly unfair. Such discrimination must be prevented by legislation.

It is commendable that the provision of adequate shelter at reasonable prices is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. In this connection there are two points I want to make. At the present time our domestic building material manufacturers are protesting their export markets even though there is a critical shortage of certain building materials in Canada. The supply houses are repurchasing these same materials in the United States and bringing them back to the domestic market. This practice is not only wasteful but is obviously inflating prices at a time when price increases are a cause for serious concern.

I also want to suggest that the human rights legislation referred to earlier should include provisions to free the individual from the restrictive practices of unions in the field of apprenticeship training. Union control of the number of trainees has created labour shortages in several trades in the construction industry that are adding unnecessarily to the cost of housing. Union legislation may be under provincial jurisdiction, but human rights are a federal responsibility.

I should like to make brief reference at this time to the conduct of business both in this House and in the various committees. One of the unfortunate aspects of our media coverage is the emphasis on the question period. The press gallery is then full. For the debates that follow there remains only the "on duty" press representative who may not be greatly interested and, in all honesty, is not likely to find too much to interest him. Similarly in committee, press coverage is spotty at best. This tends to give the country a somewhat unrealistic view of the work of the members. Undoubtedly our own conduct is a contributing factor.

I am inclined to agree with the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) that the preoccupation of members should be less directed towards the next election and more towards the passage of legislation beneficial for the country. Incidentally, I mention the county of Bellechasse, even though it is represented by an opposition member, as it is the county of birth of my wife's mother.

However, returning to the subject of House business, I sincerely hope that changes to our rules will help to eliminate wasted time. There is certainly a monumental task facing us and maximum efficiency is required of all of us.

The official opposition were complaining, for example, of the lack of time to discuss the supplementary estimates. Yet a perusal of the record will indicate that tardiness and poor attendance by the opposition lost this committee 15 per cent of its available sitting time. On one occasion the official opposition had only one member present which, together with the eight government members, was not enough to form a quorum. When the government holds only eight of nineteen seats on a committee, Mr. Speaker, and when one of the eight is a non-voting chairman, there is absolutely no reason why the resulting legislation should not be the best possible product of the several points of view represented in this House.

The official opposition have, in fact, amply illustrated their committee control by arbitrarily terminating debate, using a closure procedure which they have themselves found so distasteful in the House on certain previous occasions.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Herbert: I want to make one closing remark to the official opposition. If you want to illustrate to the people of this country that you have the ability to govern, stop being hypocritical. When you talk of inflation, produce constructive and specific ideas. Read the speech made by Chairman Earl McLaughlin to the Royal Bank's last annual meeting. All of us supported the social legislation passed by this House in the last session. Let us not turn our backs on it by indirect reference. This government's accomplishments in the last session, despite its minority position, make us all very proud. Co-operate and make this session equally good for Canada.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is true that during 1973 this parliament enacted a number of pieces of very worth while social legislation. I refer in particular to the increases that were made in the pensions and supplementary benefits paid under the Old Age Security Act, to improved family allowances, to improvements in pensions and allowances for veterans, and to other, similar measures. I also have in mind the arrangements which were made for escalating almost all pensions that come under government jurisdiction, namely to increase them not just by 2 per cent per annum but by the full percentage increase in the cost of living.

As I say, all of us in this House can regard 1973 as a year when we did a pretty fair job in the field of social security. I want to say that I am not unduly concerned when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) tries to take the full credit for that legislation to the Liberal party. The fact is the people of Canada realize that a great deal more was done in one year in this parliament of minorities than would normally be done in five or six years in a parliament in which there is a government majority. The people know why we got some good legislation in 1973.

However, I want to say that I am deeply concerned over the almost complete lack of reference to this whole area in this session's Speech from the Throne. The government is already acting as though it did enough with respect to social security in 1973 and so it can just coast along, leaving this question alone in 1974.

I recognize that in the Speech from the Throne there are one or two references to the Canada Pension Plan where improvements will be made. I am also aware of the discussions about welfare policies that are taking place among the health and welfare ministers of Canada and the provinces. However, as far as this session's Speech from the Throne is concerned, one gets the impression that the government thinks that nothing needs to be done this year in the social security field. I challenge that proposition as strongly as I can.

I say to the government and to members in all parts of this House that already the values that were added to pensions and other social payments last year are running short of today's cost of living. Already those who are on the receiving end of these various programs are justifiably feeling the time has come for still further adjustments.

It is not good enough to say that arrangements were made in 1973 to escalate most pension benefits by the full percentage increase in the cost of living, as though that is all that needs to be done. There are two things to say about that. First, in most cases the base itself was not high enough. Second, welcome though it is that the escalation is not limited by a 2 per cent ceiling, it is still a fact that the escalation is always a few months behind.

A few days ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) put out a release about the automatic increases in old age security and the guaranteed income supplement that will take place in the month of April, a few weeks hence. That increase will be based on a rise in the cost of living that began in the month of November. In fact, it is based upon the cost of living in November, December and January compared with the three months immediately preceding the month of November. When pensioners do not get an increase in their pensions until the end of April for the purpose of meeting the cost of living increase of the previous November, they are always getting behind. Therefore, I call upon the government and this House to shake off any lethargy it may feel about this issue.

I call upon the government and I call upon the House to realize that the pensioners of Canada very soon will not be saying "It is wonderful what you did for us in 1973." They will be saying "Why did you forget us in 1974?" Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I plead that in this session of parliament this House must put on the government the kind of pressure that will force it to act in this important field.

When Notices of Motion and Private Members' Public Bills appear on the order paper in a few days, hon. members will see among those Notices of Motion one in my name which calls on the government to give consideration to increasing the basic amount of the old age security pension to $200 a month, payable to all. I urge that this be taken very seriously. That figure is already becoming a minimum figure for pensioners, provided they meet certain tests, in a number of our provinces. Surely no one can argue that anything less than $200 a month is an amount upon which anyone can live in Canada today.

My resolution that will appear on the order paper in a few days not only calls for the pension paid under the Old Age Security Act to be increased to $200 a month. It also calls for the pension age to be lowered to 60 under both the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan.

As hon. members are aware, this matter came in for a good deal of discussion during the session of parliament that occupied 1973. When it was under discussion, whether in this House or in the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, there was wide support for the idea that the time had come to bring down the pension age. Whether we do it all at once or whether we do it a year at a time is open for discussion, but it is important that we get started.

I am disappointed with one of my favourite ministers. There are not very many over there whom I can call favourites, but there is one for whom I have a good deal of fondness and respect, the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I deeply regret the statements he has been making that suggest that nothing can be done in that area at this time. I recognize the validity of his contention that there are other areas that have to be attended to as well and that we must deal with the problem of the inadequate income of the working poor, and I am glad the minister is meeting with his counterparts in the provinces to grapple with that issue.

I am proud of the fact that in my province of Manitoba, under the joint auspices of the federal and provincial governments, an experiment is being undertaken with regard to a guaranteed annual income directed toward this very goal of improving the income status of those who are working but whose incomes from their employment are inadequate.

The readiness to face up to that problem, however, is no excuse for trying to slough off the other one, namely the problem of getting the pension age down to 60. I know it is not very long ago that the pension age was 70. I can remember that in my first speeches of this House, more than three decades ago, I argued that the pension age should be brought down to 65. Some people will ask "Are you never satisfied?" That is a good question. They know the answer.

The point I make is that as conditions have changed, the rat race of industrial life and economic struggle is such that there are all kinds of people—they write me every day of the week—who find it almost impossible to keep going physically, to make ends meet until they are 65, and my mail every day contains urgent pleas that I use my voice in this House of Commons to get pensions payable at age 60.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I insist, Mr. Speaker, that this is a goal toward which we must work and it must apply to both the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan. I am prepared—indeed I have advocated it in the past and I so advocate it in the resolution to which I have referred—, to make pensions payable under the two pieces of legislation I have mentioned between the ages of 60 and 65, only to those who are out of or who leave the labour market. We should be prepared to apply an employment test similar to the one we provided under the Canada Pension Plan for those aged between 65 and 69 but which is very shortly to be removed from that age bracket. I submit it would be a decent and humane response to the pleas we are receiving from all over the country to say to persons who are out of the labour market or who are prepared to leave it that they can draw the full old age security pension at any time after the age of 60 and that they can draw that portion of the Canada Pension Plan they have earned up to that age at any time after age 60.

I have a great many interests in the field of pensions and I intend to speak to as many of them as time will permit tonight. I think I place the two suggestions I have just laid before the House, raising substantially the amount of the basic old age pension—I suggest $200 a month across the board—and lowering the pension age, at the top of the list. I say to my good friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and I say to the members of cabinet as well as to all members in all parts of the House, that this issue will not go away. Just as I was sure many years ago, when I started out arguing for the removal of the means test, when I argued in favour of raising the amount of the pension and for lowering the age requirement, that we would win those battles, I am equally sure we will win these two battles for a higher amount and for 60 to be the pension age.

But let it not be necessary for some of us to fight for another 30 years to win these things. They are possible of achievement now, and they should be brought into effect right away. So, Mr. Speaker, I call upon members to give serious and favourable consideration to the proposition that I am placing before the House and to the motion which will appear on the order paper in a few days' time for amendments to these two statutes, the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan, raising the basic amount of the old age pension to $200 a month, and lowering the qualifying pension age under both pieces of legislation to 60, on a voluntary basis so far as each individual is concerned.

I move on to say that I think there are further improvements which should be made with regard to the pensions of retired public servants, retired members of the Armed Forces, retired R.C.M.P. personnel and others. We have made improvements in this area quite dramatically in the last few years. It was a good move we undertook last year in removing the 2 per cent ceiling from the escalation clauses so that the pensions now rise every year to meet the full amount of the cost of living increase. But, as with other pensions, that escalation is delayed. It is assessed only once a year. It can be 10 or 11 months behind the time the cost of living starts to go up. There are the difficulties faced by retired R.C.M.P. and Armed Forces personnel arising from the fact that the escalation does not start until age 60 except in certain special cases. I think those difficulties should be resolved.

I wish to use these few minutes I am devoting to retired public servants, retired R.C.M.P. and Armed Forces personnel and others to highlight an issue which applies to these groups and which also applies to all pension groups. That is the question of the amount of pensions paid to widows. We have accepted for years, for decades, that somehow a pension belongs to the man and that he should get 100 per cent of it. If his wife dies he carries on to draw the 100 per cent. However, if he dies first we think we are being generous to accord a 50 per cent pension to the widow. In the case of Members of Parliament we have done a little better. We have provided them with a 60 per cent pension, and certainly no widows' pensions should be less than we provide for our own widows.

However, I am questioning even that limit of 60 per cent. Surely, when a pension is earned and the husband and wife have been a team, it is their pension. Just because one dies first rather than the other should not result in a different rate of pension. I submit, therefore, that whatever pension is paid to the pensioner himself, let us say the husband, that same rate of pension should be continued to the widow.

When members opposite talk about ending discrimination against women, I suggest that they talk about ending this problem. I suggest it is no longer fair in an age in which we talk about equality to carry on this kind of discrimination against widows. Again, I am conscious of the mail I receive every week and of the scores of cases of which I know personally involving widows who are left with 50 per cent of what the husband's pension was and who find, especially with today's rising costs, that they have to upset their whole way of life because of that reduction. On the other hand, if the wife dies first the widower carries the full pension and can ride along just as he did before. I submit that this is a correction which needs to be made in the whole area of public service pensions where the federal government is in control. It should be made in other places as well, but surely where the federal government has control is the place to start.

I move on now to say a few words about railway pensions. In the main I have to talk in this chamber about Canadian National pensions because the Canadian National is ostensibly owned by us, although I think the Canadian Pacific has just as much responsibility to the public as the Canadian National in consideration of what we have done for that railway over the last century or so. If therefore wish to talk about railway pensions.

Last summer, as hon. members will recall, there was a dispute as a result of which we spent a few days of special sittings in parliament and passed legislation putting the workers back to work. One of the issues in the dispute was that of pensions, and when Mr. Justice Hall was appointed as arbitrator on the wage issue a side appointment was made, namely that of Dr. John Deutsch as a commissioner to inquire into the pension question. We knew then very clearly the limits of Dr. Deutsch's commission. All he was empowered to do was to assess the percentage value of the pension changes which had been won in the negotiations in relation to the total wage package. He had no authority to review railway pensions as a whole and he had no authority to improve the position of retired railway workers already drawing their pensions. A great many of these people took hope in the thought that since a famous man like, Dr. John Deutsch had been appointed the commissioner dealing with railway pensions, something would be done about those pensions. I have had to write scores of retired railway workers defending Dr. Deutsch, pointing out that this was not his commission, and that all he had the right to do was make that one very narrow judgment.

During the course of that debate last summer the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) admitted that the assignment given Dr. Deutsch was a very narrow one. He said that at an early date he would appoint another commission to go into the broad question of railway pensions, in all their aspects.

A few days or weeks ago in Edmonton the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) repeated that promise, but we are still waiting for this to be implemented. I implore the Minister of Labour not to delay any longer. As a matter of fact, Canadian National retired workers for a number of years have had a 2 per cent increase each year but have not even had that for 1974, and nor is there any sign of it. All other government pensions are now being escalated by the full extent of the cost of living increase and railway workers should get that as well; yet so far in 1974 they have not had any sign of any escalation at all. It is a crime that these employees are having to wait to find out what is going to happen. They have been left out and forgotten, and I call upon the government to face up to this issue and deal with it just as soon as it possibly can.

Another area of pensions that this parliament must deal with is the whole question of how private pensions operate. Far too many of them fall short, and most of them fail on the important point of escalating pensions after retirement. I insist that the Pension Benefits Standards Act be amended in many respects, and one of the things that is required is that every pension plan have in it provisions for the escalation of pensions after retirement. There must be further provisions to make sure that pension funds are safe and that people get value for what they put into them. As a matter of fact, the day may well come when these private pensions will have not only to be integrated and made portable, but brought more directly under the aegis of the federal government.

More and more individuals are realizing the shortcomings of private plans. I am amazed, at some of the people who have spoken to me, people who do not have any interest in my particular political philosophy, and who have said to me: "Stanley, why don't you speak up for an improvement in our private pensions plans?" I certainly do, and I think this is an issue with which this parliament must deal.

I should like to say a few words about another area of pensions, and I refer in this instance to war veterans. Here too we did fairly well in 1973, though not enough to jump for joy, boast and all of that, particularly when one considers the sacrifices which were made and the fact that we are falling a long way short of the promises made to these Canadians. However, we did improve the basic pension for the disabled under the Pension Act, and we did make improvements in the War Veterans Allowance Act.

However, as an example of something I think is most unfair, I draw attention to the treatment which has just recently been accorded recipients of war veterans allowances who are 65 years of age or over. As hon. members know, war veterans allowances, like disability pensions under the Pension Act, are now escalated annually by the full percentage increase in the cost of living, and that increase takes place in January. Hon. members also know that old age security and the guaranteed income supplement are escalated by the full percentage increase in the cost of living, but that escalation takes place every three months.

On December 10, not many weeks ago, I asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) a very specific question. I asked him whether the necessary arrangements were being made so that veterans 65 years of age or over who were receiving both old age security and the guaranteed income supplement on the one hand, and the war veterans allowance on the other, would get both the escalation payments due in January, the one on the OAS-GIS being quarterly, and the one on the WVA being annually. The minister's answer on December 10 was that those arrangements were being made.

On January 3 I asked again whether arrangements had been made so that those veterans 65 years or over would get the escalation in both parts of their income, and the answer was: "Yes, those arrangements have been made" Things have not worked out that way.

What has happened is that veterans 65 years of age or over who are in receipt of both OAS-GIS on the one hand and WVA on the other got the January increase in their OAS-GIS, and fortunately they were allowed to keep it; but their was veterans allowance stood at precisely the same level with not one cent of an increase. The promise made to me by the Minister of Veterans Affairs on December 10 and January 3 was not reflected in the order-in-council that was passed or in what happened to the veterans themselves.

So while we boast about the fact—and the government does this all the time—that at least those who are in need or on fixed incomes are getting an escalation of their incomes in accordance with the rise in the cost of living, here are veterans, of all people, 65 years of age and over, and veterans' widows, whose income is made up in the main of two elements, OAS-GIS on the one hand and WVA on the other, and who are receiving the escalation on only the OAS-GIS portion. In other words, the cost of living may have gone up three or four percentage points during a certain period of time, but they receive a three or four percentage point increase on only a portion of their income. In other words, they are being shortchanged. I dislike shortchanging being perpetrated on any of our people, indeed on any of our retired people, senior citizens, railway workers or any others, but I think to shortchange our veterans 65 years of age and over and veterans' widows is really incredible and unthinkable.

Those on disability pensions, if they have enough that they do not have to fall back on war veterans allowance, of course get the full percentage increase in their disability pensions. If they are over 65 years of age and are getting both a disability pension and old age security, they get the escalation on total income. But this special group of people in particular need, the burnt-out veterans, the veterans who cannot prove that they were actually hurt or disabled in a conflict but spent their time in overseas service, do not get the escalation on their full income because of the faulty way in which that order in council was drawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Bell: Carry on for another 10 minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall only be a few minutes longer. Before you found it necessary to draw my attention to the passing of time I was pleading that this sort of shortchanging of people, retired persons in particular, is a crime in any area. But I think it is particularly pernicious when it happens to veterans, and especially when it happens to veterans who are in that group known as burnt-out veterans and are the recipients of war veterans allowances.

● (2120)

In a month or two there will be another increase in the old age security and guaranteed income supplement. It will not be very much this tme. That puzzles me. It seems to me that the cost of living is going up much faster than these increases are. But I suppose they will get that increase in their old age security and guaranteed income supplement and the Department of Veterans Affairs will say to us that the veterans got an increase, so what are we complaining about. What I am complaining about is the hypocrisy of the government boasting that they are indexing the incomes of those who are in need—pensioners, those on fixed incomes—not just by 2 per cent but by the full amount of the cost of living. The fact is that there is one particular group for whom this is not being done and it is this group of veterans who are in receipt of war veterans allowance and are over 65 years of age.

I dislike the fact—and I protested it with my colleagues in all parties when this proposal was brought in—that these persons were forced to go on the guaranteed income supplement, that they were not permitted to draw the full amount of their assistance from the funds of the War Veterans Allowance Board. At any rate, that was done and we are stuck with it, but I do plead that this be looked at again.

Perhaps my main reason for mentioning the fact that a change is coming in April is to recognize the fact that when that change comes another order in council will be necessary to permit these veterans to keep the increase that they will get in old age security and guaranteed income supplement. I call upon the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) to persuade his cabinet colleagues to correct this situation. I think that is where the trouble is. I do not think it lies with him. I think he has the interest of the veterans at heart, but he has colleagues who think of veterans as welfare recipients on whom they can cut down a bit and save money. I hope he will persuade his colleagues that when the order in council is written in April to take care of the next increase in old age security and guaranteed income supplement, it will be drawn in such a way that these veterans will be permitted to get the increase in the war veterans allowance that came into effect in January but which they did not get.

While the minister is dealing with his cabinet colleagues on the whole question of the war veterans allowance, I hope he will also impress upon them very strongly the request by veterans for the removal of the March 31 deadline on the Veterans Land Act. There are only 31 days to go. I remind the minister and the government that this House of Commons on November 9, 1973, passed unanimously a motion of mine made under Standing Order 43 calling upon the government to give consideration to continuing the Veterans Land Act beyond March 31 and making it possible for veterans to get holdings even if the only reason they want those holdings is to establish homes. Surely those who fought for this land are entitled to a piece of it. It should not be cut off because of the deadline that is in the legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister thus far has simply said that he is still considering it. I give him credit for the the fact that at no time has he by word of mouth or in a letter said that the answer is final. But neither has he given any great hope that that deadline can be lifted.

Appeals are coming in from veterans all over the country with regard to this matter, and while perhaps this is slightly at variance with the theme of my remarks tonight, which has focussed on pensions throughout, I submit this is part of the standard of living of retired veterans. If the government is not prepared to do as much for them as we want done in terms of pensions and allowances, surely the government can keep alive the Veterans Land Act. I would not just postpone that March 31 deadline; I would remove it altogether. Surely as long as any veteran who has served this country wants assistance to get a piece of this land on which to live, this parliament would want to support the veteran in that claim.

I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs to read carefully the letters that he is getting from some of the veterans organizations on this issue. I say again: I know where his heart is. I think it is with the veterans, and I am aware of the problem he has with some of his colleagues, notably the ones who sit between him and the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The extremes are not bad, it is what is in the middle. Oh, there is the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who has just come in. He is not between them because he is in the front row. He has great influence and I am glad he came here to hear this part of my speech. I hope he will use that influence in favour of the veterans with respect to this issue, just as I hope he will use his influence with respect to the other issues about which I have been speaking tonight, if I can prevail upon him to read the parts of my speech that were made while he was not here.

I thank hon. members of the House for their courtesy in giving me these extra few minutes. I am sure that some of my friends will say to me: "My, you made a speech on pensions, imagine that. That is something new". It was new when I first made speeches on pensions back in 1942 and 1943. But there have been many of them and we have come a long way since then in all these areas. Pensions in those days were $20 a month payable at age 70 with a means test. Widows were not covered under the War Veterans Allowance Act. There was no Canada Pension Plan. We have come that distance because some of us believed that the things we were fighting for were right and that if we stuck with them we would win.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I take the position tonight that we are right in asking for a substantial increase in old age security and the lowering of the pension age to 60; that we are right in asking for equal treatment for widows; that we are right in asking for immediate consideration of the problems of railway workers; and that we are right in asking for a fair deal for our veterans right down the line. I welcome the feeling of support that I sense in the House tonight for these remarks that I have made, and I call upon the government to come through.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure always to follow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) particularly when he speaks about veterans pensions. I have a conflict of interest as a 30 per cent pensioner and I want to encourage him in his program as far as he wishes to go.

First, I should like to congratulate my colleagues, the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier), who acquitted themselves so ably yesterday. I also want to say how good it is to be back and to see your smiling countenance here in the House after the recess, Mr. Speaker. I think it is important that this recess took place. It was the best one I have had since I have been in the House of Commons. We had a long and grinding session and by the time we left we were a little worn out, I think. I think it is important that everybody is back refreshed. When I came back the other day I felt like a stranger in Ottawa. I think that is good because for a while we were beginning to think that this was our home, this was where the real world was. We went back to our homes and the real world and we are enriched once more.

I think the recess was particularly important because all of us accomplished a great deal of work. We now have our constituency offices. I urge those who have not opened them to do so as quickly as possible because it will give them a further contact with their constituents and a further opportunity to serve them. It is extremely important to have a fully staffed constituency office. It has put a heavier workload on us but it has also given us an opportunity to serve our constituents, one that we have not had before. When we are not here in session and are home in the recess we can continue our liaison with Ottawa easily and we are happy about that.

However, my comments will be on the throne speech. I should like to say frankly that I am particularly pleased with the throne speech of yesterday. Our newspapers kept on saying that we should not expect very much, and I did not.

However, I was pleasantly surprised because I thought it contained a great deal. It responded very much, and addressed itself to the issues of today to which we must respond. They are gut issues; they are bread and butter issues. I have not heard too much carping about "too little, too late." In sum it is the sort of thing where people address themselves to the issues as they are.

We are trying to deal with a fundamental difference in our approach to inflation, which is articulated in the throne speech, and which is certainly evident in the speeches made in relation to it. What is being attempted is to get to the root causes of inflation, some immediate term, some long-term, but no bandaid approach, to fight that which we can tackle domestically, and to come to grips with the greater portion of it, which we all admit is a world problem, in the best way that we know how.

We are to deal with the whole question of oil, oil imports and oil prices. We are to address ourselves, really in a quite innovative way, to the problems of providing food through our agricultural industry in this country; and I think it is a particular credit to our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) that so much original thinking has gone into the Speech from the Throne in relation to farming.

We are to deal with housing, and we are to take a serious look at the unemployment insurance plan. We all recognize, at least I hope we do, that we have something great here, something that could be true social legislation. It is not without its problems, and some of them are major as we well know, but the fact is that we have to refine the processes and the program. There is a great danger, however, that those who unthinkingly criticize it are endangering one of the most valuable pieces of social legislation that we have now; so what we are going to attempt to do in this session is to improve it and make it even better.

We will address ourselves further to the problems of small business. I am impatient to see the transformed Industrial Development Bank come into operation, to provide one-stop banking services for small business.

An hon. Member: It was promised last year.

Mr. Danson: Yes, and I am still impatient to see it.

We are to come to grips with welfare, and to fight in a meaningful way for strengthening the position of women in our society and economy. In that respect I was very impressed by the Law Reform Commission under Mr. Justice Patrick Hart, which recently addressed itself to the problems of the family courts.

There is just one thing I would like to suggest here to the Law Reform Commission and to legislators. This refers to the deserted partner in an estranged marriage, usually a woman, and often a mother. Under existing circumstances an award is made by the court, and all too frequently the other partner, usually the husband, does not meet his payments. Frequently when the wife tries to chase him he moves to another jurisdiction, sometimes to another province, sometimes to another country, and she is left in a particularly vulnerable position. She has to hire lawyers and search her husband out, and because she has not received her payments she may have to go to work. Thereafter she may have to leave that work to pursue the legal procedures in relation to her missing payments.

All this is terribly unfair and I would urge that we, together with the provinces, acting in concert right across Canada—so that we do not get into jurisdictional disputes, and so that the deserted wife or mother does not suffer from such jurisdictional disputes—stipulate that when a court award is made it is to be paid by an arm of the Crown, so that payment is assured to the mother, the wife, or to the husband, as the case may be. Then it would be up to the Crown to make certain that the husband acts, that he pays his alimony, that he pays the award made into a Crown fund. If he is delinquent the authorities would go after him and, if they cannot find him, then the fund would pay.

If the report of the Law Reform Commission is correct, welfare payments in this one area alone amount to $1 million a day. Such a fund, if established, would reduce these welfare payments substantially. I do not say that a scheme like this would reduce them completely, because usually alimony payments are not enough and it is necessary for further assistance to be provided. But the soul destroying experience that these women have to go through in this process is one that should not apply in our society today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: My wife told me to say that, Mr. Speaker. But it is something quite serious, and in a civilized and so-called advanced society we should not allow such a situation to exist when we can remedy it so easily. I urge this on the Law Reform Commission and on the ministers responsible for the legislation.

The Speech from the Throne goes on to mention improvements in the Canada Pension Plan in greater recognition of women's role in our society, and then goes into the whole question of science and technology. Mr. Speaker, all of these things may not appear to have very much to do with inflation itself, but they do help to make society more productive and thus, in my view, more competitive. As I see it, the only way we are really going to beat inflation is to produce, to be as productive as, or more productive than, our trading partners, to keep our productivity up and our costs down so that then we really will not have a problem with inflation.

The one matter that concerns most of us about the so-called oil crisis is the alternate uses of energy and the alternate sources of energy available to us. I am afraid that at least here in Canada we are becoming a little complacent about the oil shortage, because in effect we have got it made. This is one of our problems. We have got so much going for us, that all we need do is get used to living with the higher prices. Of course that is not nice, but we are able to adapt much more so than other countries.

We have other sources of energy that previously were not considered economic. The primary one in Canada is the Alberta tar sands. We knew these tar sands were there. We knew they were not economic to develop at existing world prices for oil, but regrettably they have now become economic for development.

While we have a short-term energy crisis we are aware, now more than ever before, that we have the ability to resolve it on a long-term basis and, I think, on a world scale. It requires only the will and the commitment of the resources to do so. The oil producing states have made us aware of the great opportunity Canada has to upgrade its economy with existing resources.

It is not generally realized that Canada possesses massive coal reserves, primarily in Alberta and British Columbia, which offer a further major energy source for us. The remoteness of these reserves from the major eastern industrial centres, the transportation costs, plus the access of western users to our oil and gas producing areas, have retarded the development of these coal reserves. The major exception is the coal being shipped in large volume to Japan. The coal which eastern Canadians do use is usually imported from the more accessible American coal fields in Pennsylvania and West Virginia. Certainly that applies in Ontario in respect to coal used by Ontario Hydro.

These coal reserves offer a major ace in the hole for Canada, and give western Canada still another resource on which it can build a significant industrial economy in the years to come. The coal, like western oil and gas, can be converted in the west, with its valuable by-products being shipped in a more sophisticated form to the rest of Canada and, when in long-term surplus, to the rest of the world, naturally at the higher prices that more refined processing brings with it.

This is one indication of how the current crisis has made us aware of the necessity to develop alternate energy sources. With coal, the supply and the technology are largely available to us. Other resources with equal or greater potential require new technology or further development of existing technology. Nuclear power is one of the most obvious, and even existing technology becomes more competitive with escalating oil prices. Canada has both the technology and the uranium reserves. I think we have been fortunate in "hanging tough" with the CANDU, which some people thought was a mistake. They thought we were on the wrong track with our heavy water process but it turns out that we seem to be right. Other countries are now looking at us with great respect and great interest.

There are other limitless renewable resources of energy. Solar energy potential is so great that the harnessing of only a miniscule amount dissipated daily can provide all the heat and power required for our needs. That is easy to say, but you have to harness it and store it.

The processing of human and animal waste is another source of an almost infinite nature. We thought this was sort of funny. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) has been saying it for some time. Pig farmers in England have been driving their cars on the methane gas produced from pig waste and from garbage. It is a serious source of energy. If any of you have heard of the explosion of buried garbage dumps, that is caused by the methane gas which is generated in the decaying process.

An hon. Member: You sound like an expert in the field.

Mr. Danson: I am not an expert but I am interested and I would like to become expert. I think we should all address ourselves to these problems because they are rather important.

The capturing of tidal power and conventional hydroelectic power of a non-depleting nature has ecological impact which makes it imperative that we approach it only with very special care and sensitivity. There are some great experts like the Rothchilds. I always say they have water on the brain because they always see things in terms of water resources and power. Also we see some bad ecological effects from rather good programs, such as the Aswan Dam. We should be able to avoid these in the future.

The options are many but the task itself is massive. No one can say which is the best, the most economical, and the most environmentally desirable. One type may be best for Canada but not for other nations, and the reverse is also true. The developing nations' needs and technology may require different responses than those of the industrial nations.

Today I was at lunch at the home of the Indian High Commissioner and was interested to meet a young commercial attaché who told me that in India, where they have a very serious energy problem—not the result of luxury as only 8 per cent of their gas goes into cars and trucks, some going to make simple things like kerosene which the ordinary person in India uses for cooking, the remainder being used for industrial processes—the additional cost of energy for them is of great importance. But it is something which they must face and which I think we must face.

I also learned that they have massive coal reserves in India. That is something I never knew. I did not know I was going to be speaking tonight—although I knew I was going to speak in this debate—and I was going to get the figures. With a population of some 500 million in India, they have reserves which, this young attaché says, could last them hundreds and hundreds of years. In any event, they appear to be massive. So you can use technology for gasification. Sometimes these embassy parties are not all bad. An attaché from the South African embassy told me that a high percentage of their oil and gas is produced from coal. It is higher cost. They import some, but they still produce a major portion of their requirements from coal. So the technology is available around the world, if we could just harness and refine it.

The whole task must be approached with the same urgency and allocation of intellectual and material resources that produced the first atomic bomb and the space programs in the United States and the U.S.S.R. It is a major, massive commitment of resources on a greater scale than we have seen in the past. In this case, fortunately, it is for peaceful purposes and for all mankind. I think it offers a unique opportunity for international co-operation and sharing that has not heretofore been realistically existent. No time should be lost, I suggest, and I think Canada can play a significant role. Indeed, I think we can take the initiative, take the lead and act as the catalyst for this program in the world today. It does not matter who gets the credit, though we are in a good position as we are well respected in this field internationally. We have an energetic energy minister who can take the ball and run with it so I think we could really do a great service to mankind.

The project must include all interested nations, and particularly those with a resource potential or scientific capability. All technological input must be pooled and the results acceptable to everyone. Needs, resources and potential techniques should be defined and the tasks allocated. It might be sub-divided with designated nations, or groupings of nations, forming the nucleus for the specialized research efforts and taking the lead. For instance, Canada might be the centre for all the nuclear development or perhaps the heavy water development, or we might take the lead in coal processing. The United States could take the lead in solar energy, as that is a massive one. The common market might join forces in the field of animal and human waste. Eastern European nations, the socialist states, if they come into it—and I think they should—could co-ordinate coal processing. The Scandinavian countries could take on hydro-electric development, the Soviet Union could perhaps take on natural gas, and Japan could take on oil technology. I think we could learn a great deal from them.

None of these nations would have a monopoly, nor would they necessarily provide the greatest input in the area of their responsibility. They would provide the administrative, co-ordinating and publishing functions of the efforts of scientists and engineers in all participating nations. Teams would be operating throughout the world and the scientific cross-pollination could result in major break-throughs and immense spin-offs in developments which are quite unpredictable at this time. For example, a great deal of our computer technology is a result of the requirements of the space program. There are sophisticated metallurgical processes as a result of this program. There is transistor technology too. Do hon. members remember about five years ago when we used to have tubes in our radios? We do not see those any more because we have transistors. This is part of the scientific, technological and industrial fallout from all of these programs. We can see it in our own country in programs like the CF-100 or the STOL aircraft. There is technological fallout and skills which come as a result of these programs, and people are using them on a much more refined basis than ever before.

It is even conceivable that the United Nations, through a new agency and a secretary general for energy, could be the catalyst for something like this. I think it deserves that sort of priority. The important thing is to have the will, to get the ball rolling on a scale and with a degree of urgency that has never before been conceived, with the participation and co-operation of all nations. It is rarely that a world crisis can benefit all people and all of the nations on this earth by the harnessing of the natural and human resources which are the heritage of everybody on earth. I would urge consideration of this suggestion by this government, by this country and by the entire world.

There are other things in the throne speech which give food for thought. One was the greater utilization and more refined use of manpower. I have been concerned that some 50 per cent of our work force is under the age of 25. This is the result of the baby boom. I do not know why we did not see them coming. I think they still took nine months in those years, but somehow we did not calculate their arrival. We saw them coming through our public schools and our high schools, through our universities and into our work force, but we were surprised every time. Members of parliament will be standing in this place in the year 2005 or 2015 saying "Who are all these people who are getting their old age pensions?" They will be products of the baby boom that we started in our passion.

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself!

Mr. Danson: Well, I have done pretty well and I have no complaints. This gives us the fastest growing labour force in the world, and this group will be with us, being absorbed into the work force, until 1980.

As a result of this there are many serious problems. Some of you may have read—certainly the people in the Toronto area will have,—about a 16 year old girl from Elliot Lake who hanged herself in a cell in Toronto's dirty old Don jail. Now you wonder what has happened to this girl (a) that she was put there, and (b) that she was so distraught that she hanged herself. You see the reaction of the judge, Judge Addison, a humane sort of person who is sick and sorry from what he sees has happened—not because of his fault—trying to allocate the blame, trying to be blamed. I could not help but wonder about her parents up in Elliot Lake. They had a little blond child—I do not know if she was blond—on their knees and I am sure there was a very proud father who wanted to see her through school and marriage and have grandchildren. Yet he probably saw her wracked with drugs through an over permissive society, and she just disappeared from the scene. She was a babysitter in Toronto and was accused of stealing Christmas gifts from the place where she was sitting. She had been in constant trouble. What sort of trauma affected this girl? What has happened to our society when we can let this sort of thing happen? I think this touched people in our area very deeply. On the surface, it appears that the girl stole some Christmas gifts. That was pretty mean. This was a 16 year old girl. What is happening in a society which can produce this sort of thing?

I suggest that we have not moved fast enough. I think we have done a great deal by introducing programs such as Opportunities for Youth, Local Initiatives, the Company of Young Canadians and other imaginative programs. We have let the kids do their own thing. Really, what they need desperately is some help in doing their own thing. I think some of the organized institutions in our society were pretty staid. They were not communicating with these kids. But they have learned and they have been shaken up. That is why certain agencies have become involved with our imaginative and bright youth in giving us great programs.

These kids grew up in a gentle and kind society which allowed them to do what they did. They had a secure base from which to work and they had time with which to work. I do not know if we are all the same, but when I was growing up you looked after yourself or you were not looked after. That was not so terrible. I was told that it was terrible. I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) the other day talking, on a program, about the depression. Some people said the depression was terrible; others thought it was fun. I did not even know we were poor. I just thought that is how things were.

We have tried to channel the activities of these kids, but we have not done it quite correctly. I do not think we should be ashamed, not at all. I think we have tried very hard. However, when we do these things I think we must use some sort of structure and guidance. Speaking as a father, of course, I have seen the necessity for this. Your little boys grow up and you think they are adults and know what they are doing, but there are times when you realize that they are not. Then you realize that all of us need both someone to talk to and guidance based on experience. That is why during the recess I talked about a national youth service, a voluntary service which might use, perhaps, the infrastructure of the armed services for organization, transportation and accommodation. I raised this matter because it has concerned me for some time. I am sure members have heard me speak about this before. The response to the idea was almost incredible.

People across the country heard me with interest. I have done surveys, both in my constituency and across the country, which show a very high rate of receptiveness to the idea. One survey I did involved the subject of compulsory service. I compiled some figures which I have before me tonight and to which I will refer in order to give some rough totals. Approximately 71 per cent of the people were in favour of a compulsory service. If you want to extrapolate and include those who had some reservations about a compulsory service, the figure for those in favour would be between 80 and 90 per cent of those surveyed. Of those in grades 1 to 8 who were surveyed, 76.9 per cent were in favour of a compulsory service. I am talking about a service you enter voluntarily. Of those who were in grades 9 to 13, 75.1 per cent were in favour. Of those who had technical college education, 78.4 were in favour. Of those with university education who were surveyed, 62.8 were in favour. If we look at the rest of the country we will find that the figures are amazingly consistent. The degree of receptiveness is a little higher in Quebec than the rest of the country. Generally, this idea was very well received.

Such a service would harness the energy of our youth, the enthusiasm of our youth and their desire to be of service to their country, and they would be doing something which would be extremely worth while. I like the voluntary aspect of the service, because I think it is very important for people to want to be in it. I would put a hooker in that relating to unemployment insurance, which I shall deal with if I have time. Fundamentally, the program should be voluntary. If you make the program totally compulsory you would need to bring to it all the apparatus of military discipline. I do not think that is so bad. I had five years of it and survived—some of it behind bars, true, but I survived. However, that sort of program is not really what we are looking for in this country today.

If the program is voluntary, if it is well accepted and well motivated, the greatest punishment would be if you were kicked out of the service. Because the service would be voluntary, people would want to perform well. The kids involved in the program could move to other parts of the country and mix with other socio-economic groups. There could be a great Anglophone and Francophone interchange. They could meet other elements in society which sometimes we do not meet.

Think of the jobs these kids could do. I have listed them. They could include the development and maintenance of national, provincial and municipal parks and recreation areas; work with handicapped, aged and native peoples. On second thoughts I would not include the native peoples generally as I think native people should work for native peoples. They could work with peoples of other disadvantaged groups. They could be involved in environmental clean-ups, and food and erosion control. They could work on forest fire prevention and on cleaning up, and could build fire breaks and access roads. They could be involved in agriculture, particularly in harvesting. They could work in the development and staffing of youth hostels. I just do not see why these things cannot be done. One could go on and on with such a list.

The commitment should be a serious one, say for one year's service. If you do well, perhaps you could be allowed to stay another year. Maybe the service could develop an administration, infrastructure and leadership of its own. The armed forces could give assistance in transportation, accommodation, administration and that sort of thing. Then, if you are really good and you want to stick at it, you might be allowed to stay a third year and maybe serve overseas.

That is the sort of program which I think could give purpose to our youth and give guidance and some sort of structure to those who want it and need it. A program like this would make kids feel that they are paying their dues to the society which has reared and educated them. There could be educational benefits when they have finished. For instance, those benefits could involve an equivalent period, say, or even double that period, at some educational institution. The possibilities are limitless. The need is there. There is a gap in our society which we are just beginning to identify. We have been searching and trying to find solutions. I do not say there is an easy answer. I think if we are genuine, people will respond genuinely, as they have responded to the participatory programs we have had.

I admit that these programs did not all work out well. Some of them worked very well, some of them worked out badly and some were disastrous. The mistakes we made were not for lack of trying. I would rather see us making mistakes by trying to do something than not doing anything at all.

I suggest that this idea should be considered seriously. It requires a pilot program. It should not be a Mickey Mouse program. The concept should be on a scale sufficiently large to get the program going. Then it can grow and we can build on it. We should only build with people who want to be in the program. It will be slow going at first, and because of that more people will want to be in it. It will be something like the summer employment program which really involves cadet training for the Armed Forces.

I think the kids will want to take part in the program. I suggest we can do as much with the kids who would take part in this program as we have done with kids who have taken part in the cadet training program. The program or service would be useful for kids who have left high school and have not yet taken up their university or business life. They need a break, they need to become mature and to be exposed to other people in society. Perhaps they need to get their hands dirty and to have their backs aching. They will not mind that. I am sure they will want the challenge. We have not been providing it for them. Mr. Speaker, I urge that my suggestions receive the most serious consideration by all members in the House. I see that it is ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being ten o'clock, the House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At ten o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We realize this motion is not debatable, but I do have what might be called a Baldwin caveat, named after the illustrious member for Peace River.

In view of the fact that none of us is really happy about the way estimates are handled in committee, we hope that no restrictions whatsoever will be placed on the appearance of civil servants before committees. We also hope we will go back to our old roles and that the Macdonald doctrine that was instituted and dug up in December of last year will be once again thrown on to the scrap pile. We trust we will get down to business and that civil servants, without any inhibitions, will be able to go before committees and help us deal with these estimates properly.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member rise on a point of order?

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I merely wish to make the same comment as usual. It concerns a document we have just received and which was printed in English only. I wish to indicate to the mover of this motion that, from now on, we should like to have it in both official languages, namely with the French translation.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

TIME OF VOTE ON SUBAMENDMENT TO ADDRESS IN REPLY TO THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point in connection with the business of the House later today. Under the rules a vote would normally take place at 4.45 p.m. on the subamendment that has been moved. It has been suggested—I believe agreement has been reached to this effect—that the bells might be rung at 2.30 p.m. and that the vote be taken following the ringing of the bells, with the understanding that there will be some compensation for debating time that might be lost during the taking of the vote, and that this time be added at the end of the afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: The understanding of the Chair is that the bells will ring at 2.30. It is not clear whether the President of the Privy Council was going to suggest that there be a limit on the ringing of the bells.

● (1110)

Mr. MacEachen: Fifteen minutes, Your Honour.

Mr. Speaker: The bells will ring for fifteen minutes, so that the vote will be at 2.45. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF MOTION TO REMOVE CUSTOMS DUTIES ON PETROLEUM PRODUCTS AND EXTEND TARIFF REDUCTIONS INTRODUCED IN BUDGET OF FEBRUARY 19, 1973

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of the last session the House had not completed consideration of two sets of proposed tariff reductions. Pursuant to Standing Order 60(1), I wish to table a notice of a ways and means motion which combines a previous notice of October 23, 1973, removing duties on certain petroleum products and a notice of January 10, 1974, extending tariff reductions introduced in the budget of February 19, 1973. These proposals are reintroduced without change.

GRAIN

PROVISION OF BOXCARS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, as a result of grain exports lagging by 34 per cent, terminal elevators half full, elevator space at country elevators either non-existent or at a minimum because annexes cannot be filled with tough grain, railway companies 130 million bushels behind in grain shipments, and the minister and the Wheat Board making an appeal for grain even though agents cannot accept it, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton), under the provisions of Standing Order 43:

That the whole question of grain movement be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to make an emergency study with a view to recommending to the government and the Canadian Transport Commission that they order the railways to allocate sufficient cars to move grain in order that full advantage can be taken of the buoyant market.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TELEVISION PROGRAM, "THE NATIONAL DREAM"—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the urgency of my request for leave to propose a motion pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43 arises from the fact that this is the last sitting day before March 3 when one of the proudest creations of this parliament, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, launches a new television series. Having been privileged to see a preview, I propose to move:

That this House offers its congratulations to the CBC on its production of the TV program series entitled "The National Dream", which amongst its other accomplishments so vividly portrays the arduous, and at times hilarious, activities of some of our most distinguished predecessors in the Place, as they laboured to make Canada truly a nation extending from sea to sea.

Perhaps one of the spiritual descendants of Macdonald or Mackenzie—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has indicated what his motion is. I am willing at this point to inquire whether there is unanimous consent under the terms of Standing Order 43.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a very urgent matter.

In view of the serious doubts regarding energy shortages, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House take this opportunity to study without delay the necessity of special legislation to order oil companies to divulge their exact surface and underground oil reserves as well as the selling prices to gas stations.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent; the motion, therefore, cannot be put.

VETERANS LAND ACT

PHASING OUT ON MARCH 31, 1974—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43. The government's intention to phase out the Veterans Land Act on 31 March, 1974, denies to the veterans of Canada their rights under the veterans charter and breaks faith on a commitment made by government in the name of the people of Canada.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Madill):

Price of Bread

That this House order the government to introduce a motion to effect a delay in phasing out the Veterans Land Act until an assessment can be made of the results of a survey being carried out on the effects of the phase-out, and to determine by reference to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs that the action contemplated is in the interest of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GRAIN

PROVISION OF BOXCARS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent necessity. It has to do with the failure of the two major railways to move sufficient supplies of grain to Vancouver and Thunder Bay to meet present and future export requirements and the inability of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to assure this House that our target for grain sales will be met this year. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight):

That the Standing Committee on Agriculture meet forthwith, and that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and officials of the Canadian National Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway be asked to appear before that committee in order that the movement of grain by rail may be fully examined.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

PROPOSED INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Food Prices Review Board yesterday afternoon published a full report on the matter of bread price increases I should like to move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House instruct the government to take all steps necessary to ensure that the threatened rise in bread prices does not exceed, as a maximum, the levels recommended by the Food Prices Review Board.

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and in a case of urgent and pressing necessity, I ask unanimous consent of the House to move:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 5, this House grants leave of absence to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso so that they may travel to Westminster in order to provide vital advice to certain members of the House of Commons there.

DISPOSITION OF GEORGE DARBY HOSPITAL LANDS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I also rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the recent announcement by the Minister of Health for the province of British Columbia that the provincial government was not interested in acquiring any land outside the hospital grounds of the George Darby Veterans Hospital in Burnaby, British Columbia, in view of the fact that federal government lands at Jericho in the city of Vancouver were returned to that city for the original purchase price, and in view of the fact that 9,000 residents of the municipality of Burnaby have petitioned for the return of the said lands, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Nelson):

Mr. Speaker: This motion also requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

VETERANS LAND ACT

PHASING OUT ON MARCH 31, 1974—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am still here and I should like to present a motion under Standing Order 43. Perhaps the government House leader, who is also still here, might second it for me.

My motion, Mr. Speaker, relates to a matter concerning which the House has already rejected a motion this morning, but because it is in more general terms and because I have left out anything provocative I earnestly hope the House will consider it. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen), or by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs be authorized to consider the implications of the phasing-out of the Veterans Land Act and to make any recommendations with respect thereto.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1974-75—AMOUNT OF INCREASE OVER 1973-74—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Last summer and subsequently he called upon his own colleagues to exercise restraint with regard to the preparation of estimates. I should like to ask the minister whether the approximately 20 per cent increase in the estimates tabled by the President of the Treasury Board yesterday complies with or is consistent with the policy the Minister of Finance was calling for, or whether these estimates with their 20 per cent increase in expenditures perhaps represent a change in the policy of the government and the Minister of Finance?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the House were to compare the main estimates tabled yesterday by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, with the main estimates for last year, it would be seen that the increase in expenditure amounts to 11 per cent.

An hon. Member: No, 18 per cent.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am talking about forecast expenditures.

An hon. Member: No—the main estimates.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): As my colleague explained yesterday, the increase in the estimates is primarily attributable to the increase in statutory items and the increase in items which were destined and meant to protect those in our society on fixed incomes and with families, by larger transfer payments to protect Canadians from erosion of their purchasing power. I can say to the hon. gentleman, as the government has said on several occasions, that we do not intend to fight inflation in this country on the backs of the poor or the weak.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, it is pretty hard for the Minister of Finance to fight anybody when he does not know what he is talking about. I should like to address a question to the President of the Treasury Board. This is a matter of record. Is it not correct that the estimates tabled yesterday by the President of the Treasury Board are some $3,621 million above the corresponding estimates tabled one year ago or about 19.6 per cent? Is that not correct, and is it not clear that the Minister of Finance does not know what he is talking about?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the President of the Treasury Board to reply to the question but I am sure the hon. Leader of the Opposition will appreciate that a question in those terms is hardly in order. From a procedural standpoint I will perhaps disregard the last part of the question and assume that the minister will reply to the first part.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is asking whether the figures in the blue book tabled yesterday are correct. They are. Sometimes the arithmetic he applies to them is correct and sometimes it is incorrect. What he is endeavouring to do is to make assumptions regarding the future course of supplementary estimates in the current year. The government, in every year, endeavours to prepare as farsighted and complete a plan of expenditures as is possible. In the last year, the year 1973 that we have just been through, there were, as I think the hon. Leader of the Opposition will agree, rather extraordinary economic dislocations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: The weather.

Mr. Drury: These called for quick and substantial measures. The government provided those measures and this led to substantial modifications of the estimates' plan laid down much earlier in the fiscal year. He is then comparing, in a sense, apples and oranges—

Mr. Bell: Rotten eggs!

Mr. Drury: —given the two different sets of circumstances.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Here comes a lemon.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I just want to make the point that the minister spoke for several minutes, clearly avoiding, clearly refusing, to answer the question I asked him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Stanfield: I put the question to the minister again, Mr. Speaker. Is it not a fact that the difference between the estimates tabled yesterday and the corresponding estimates introduced by the government one year ago is not some $2 billion, an increase of about 11 per cent, but some $3,629,000,000 or nearly a 20 per cent increase? Is this not correct? I ask the minister very bluntly to answer that question and not prove himself guilty of trying to cover up the facts.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, rather than try to follow the arithmetic, and I did not write down the figures the Leader of the Opposition gave, I will refer to page 1-16 of the blue book of estimates which was tabled yesterday. The main estimates for 1973-74 tabled one year ago were as follows: On the budgetary side, expenditures were $18,393 million; on the non-budgetary side they were $803 million, rounded. In the current main estimates tabled yesterday, expenditures on the budgetary side are $22,022 million and on the non-budgetary side $1,274 million. I will not try to do the hon. gentleman's arithmetic.

Mr. Fairweather: Now, subtract. You are hoist on your own petard.

Mr. Drury: The hon. gentleman asks me to retract.

Mr. Fairweather: No, subtract.

Mr. Drury: There is nothing to retract in those figures.

PROPOSED INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE GOVERNMENT WILL ACT ON RECOMMENDATION OF FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that also involves some arithmetic. I hope members will concede that it is relevant to the ordinary taxpayer and consumer of Canada. It arises from the fact that yesterday afternoon the Food Prices Review Board released a study of the projected bread price increase in which it stated categorically that the increase should not, at maximum, exceed two cents. Is the minister now prepared to give the House an unequivocal assurance that he and the government are prepared to act and implement the recommendation of that board?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have been discussing this matter this morning on an urgent basis with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, the report just having been received by us late yesterday. I think we should see what the bakery industry is willing to do on a voluntary basis first, and I think we should have that response as quickly as possible. I want to repeat the commitment given by the Prime Minister in his statement last December, and confirmed in the Speech from the Throne, that the government is prepared to take appropriate action. Members will recall that the Prime Minister's statement last fall was that we would first see what voluntary action the parties are ready to take. I think they should make a response as quickly as possible.

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, as none of the predicted increases are attributed either by the board or by the bakeries to the cost of wheat, may I ask the minister why consultation was required with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board? Arising from that and as a consequence, may I repeat my previous question to the minister. Is he prepared to give categorical assurances based upon the facts before him and the assurances which were contained in the Speech from the Throne three days ago?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think I can only confirm the assurances which have been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne and previously. I again say that I think we should see what response the bakery industry is prepared to make to the report that came out late yesterday. I hope they will make their response as quickly as possible.

Mr. Grier: Surely the House is interested in the response of the government and not in the response of the bakers. My further supplementary question arises from the report. Does he intend to investigate the suggestion contained in the board's report that certain operations of the bakeries and the Bakery Council of Canada may be resulting in interference with the proper operation of the market and represent restrictive trade practices?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, this morning I drew these comments in the report to the attention of the acting director of the combines branch. I can certainly confirm that if he feels that under the law a question has been created about a possible breach of the act he will take the appropriate action.

REPORTS OF FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD ON RETAIL FOOD STORES AND EGG MARKETING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact the minister is not prepared to commit himself on the report of the Food Prices Review Board dealing with bread, may I ask him whether he is now in a position to tell the House what action the government took on the report of the Food Prices Review Board with regard to its retail food stores survey, released in November, and the charges recommended by the board at that time? Also, what action has the minister taken on the recommendations in the board's report released in January regarding egg marketing in Canada? Surely the minister has had enough time to study those two reports.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. At my request the Food Prices Review Board sent us 159 instances of possible breaches of existing law. A review indicated that 119 of them did not have anything to do with any existing law. The remaining 40 were investigated. As a result, 22 charges were laid involving six different stores. The remaining instances mentioned by the board are dealt with in stage one of the competition policy bill which I presented to the House on November 5. I hope the House will get down to debating and deciding on this bill as soon as possible. With regard to the report on egg prices, I think my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, will be pleased to give some information to the House on that matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Champlain.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, surely we are going to hear from the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rises on a point of order to suggest we should hear from another minister. For the moment, I think we should attempt to complete the first round of questions. Perhaps the hon. member will not mind if I recognize the hon. member for Champlain and return to this question later.

ENERGY

SUBSIDIZATION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT OF OIL EXPLORATION IN QUEBEC

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Could he tell us whether the federal government is granting special aid to the Quebec government or to private companies to spur oil exploration within the province of Quebec?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, no special funds have been granted by the Canadian government to that province.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister.

Could he tell us whether the Quebec government or some private companies have made him a request to that effect?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think that neither the Quebec government nor any private company have made such a request to the Canadian government.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Will he tell the House whether he is aware that a company by the name of SOQUIP is now conducting oil explorations in Quebec, more specifically at Joly in the riding of Lotbinière?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As the right hon. Prime Minister said on December 10 last, we plan to set up a national oil company to achieve the same objectives as those of SOQUIP in Quebec.

ATHABASCA TAR SANDS—INTEREST EXPRESSED BY JAPAN IN FINANCING DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I welcome him back after his trip to the Middle East where he represented Canada well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like to know whether the government is giving any consideration to loans from foreign sources, to wit, Japan, to secure some $20 million to develop the Athabasca tar sands? What consideration has the government given to this matter?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have received a note from the government of Japan indicating in the most general terms the interest of that government in discussing with the government of Canada the development of the Athabasca tar sands at such time as we deem it appropriate to seek the involvement of other countries. As has been mentioned several times, we propose to have further discussions with the province of Alberta in this regard, but the tempo of development we would seek for the oil sands, given the increased demand in Canada in the next decade, would not, as we see it at the moment, leave very much oil available for export.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was this message received since the Minister of Supply and Services made a statement in Vancouver welcoming such investment? Was that note received from the Japanese government since that time?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Speaker. That has been the position for some time. I think I would have to say that the Minister of Supply and Services, as in all things, is an enthusiast.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the Minister of Supply and Services had available knowledge of this note, was he speaking with the authority of the minister and the government or does the minister think the Minister of Supply and Services should stay with his pots and pans and Sani-flush?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for St. John's East and the hon. member for Skeena have supplementaries to a previous question.

REPORT OF FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD ON EGG MARKETING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to my previous question and it is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture. What action has the government taken with regard to the recommendations of the Food Prices Review Board concerning egg marketing, which were released in January of this year? The first recommendation suggested that the price of eggs in Canada be lowered without delay to reduce the present excess margin over cost while maintaining a fair return to producers. The board also recommended that exclusive marketing be taken away from the CEMA and the egg marketing board. What action has the government taken on these recommendations? My question is all the more urgent because—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, it has been six weeks since the House last sat and the government has taken no action on the recommendations of this board which is costing the taxpayers $2 million a year.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government has taken action according to the powers or obligations vested in the Minister of Agriculture and the Farm Products Marketing Council which reports to me. Under that legislation I asked them to make a thorough study of this Food Prices Review Board report. Parliament vested the power to do that in the Farm Products Marketing Council and that is what they are doing. The report will be made public as soon as it has been completed. They are working on it at the present time and it should be finished shortly.

PROPOSED INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO ACTIVITIES OF FLOUR MILLING COMPANIES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs with regard to the prospect of an increase in the price of bread. Will the minister cause an inquiry to be made into the activities of the flour milling companies which own a great number of bakeries and are able to pad the price of flour and make it appear as though the cost to the baker is more than it actually is? Will the minister investigate that type of situation?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to see that the hon. member's comments are drawn to the attention of the director of the combines branch so that, if there is a basis for action to be taken under the Combines Investigation Act, which is the authority for such activity given to me by parliament, that action can be taken.

FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

INCREASES IN 1974-75 BUDGET—POSSIBILITY OF NEW POWERS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It arises from the disclosure in the 1974-75 estimates that the budget of the Food Prices Review Board will amount to $1.9 million for the next fiscal year, an increase of 90 per cent. Does this added expenditure indicate any new powers for the board?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The board will continue to carry out the mandate given it under the Inquiries Act in line with the recommendations of the Committee of the House on Trends in Food Prices.

Mr. Lawrence: I asked the minister whether the increased expenditure would mean any new powers for the board. I was not talking about the existing set-up.

Mr. Gray: My answer was clear, I think. I will try to shorten it if the hon. member had difficulty with it. The answer is no.

GRAIN

SHORTAGE OF BOXCARS TO MOVE GRAIN—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Norval Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In light of the failure of the railways to move grain to Vancouver where presently 12 vessels are waiting and ten more are expected next week, and since the railways have fallen 14,000 cars behind the targets set by them on January 6, would the minister inform the House and the country what action the government is prepared to take if this crisis continues?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have been holding intensive discussions at the official level and with management concerning the problems that have arisen. The hon. member is quite right when he says that the railways have fallen behind the targets they themselves established as being reasonable for this period. This raises serious questions about an adequate explanation for such conduct even given the limitation upon the number of cars available in the country as a whole. One can appreciate that very difficult winter conditions have impeded the operation of the railways because of the tremendous amount of power required for snowplowing in the prairie region and also because of time out spent by power units affected by snow conditions. The question is whether the railways are doing all they can to overcome these difficulties and how quickly they will mobilize every possible part of their resources in order to overcome the over-all problem and get us back on target.

POSITION OF WORKERS' AVERAGE WEEKLY EARNINGS IN RELATION TO CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister based on the latest figures released by Statistics Canada which indicate that Canadian workers are encountering a progressively deteriorating situation. In light of his speech yesterday, I would ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that average weekly earnings in December, 1973, were down by approximately $5 compared with November earnings and were only 5.9 per cent higher than those of December, 1972, while the consumer price index moved up over the same period by 9.1 per cent thus eroding any gains made by Canadian workers? If the Prime Minister is aware of this situation, is the government prepared to introduce specific measures which will offset inflation to a level at which a worker can regain the purchasing power of his dollar?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will stay around for the rest of the session he will see what action the government is taking to deal with this situation.

Mr. Alexander: Since the Prime Minister does not wish to answer the question and since this is a responsibility of the Minister of Finance, can the minister advise us whether the budget will contain any new measures to ensure that any increases in wages will not be eroded by a high rate of inflation? Can the Minister of Finance give us that assurance?

Mr. Diefenbaker: He can't.

An hon. Member: No arithmetic needed.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's seatmate says no arithmetic is needed and I can understand why he would want to say that. I think the House is entitled to look at the figures not only of the average wage as against the cost of living, where there has been a slight falling behind—

Some hon. Members: Slight?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —but to take into account also the figure of real disposable income, that is to say, the income of the average Canadian after discounting inflation, discounting taxes, adding transfer payments such as family allowances and taking into account the reduction of taxes in my budget of last February. Thus, for 1973 compared with 1972 the average Canadian, in terms of real disposable income, was 6.8 per cent better off.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me this is debate between the hon. member and the minister rather than questions and answers and perhaps anticipates the debate to take place following the question period. However, the hon. member will be recognized for a supplementary.

Mr. Alexander: I appreciate the lecture the minister gave. I posed my question to him on the basis of information disclosed by Statistics Canada which shows that the purchasing power of the Canadian worker has been eroded by high inflation. Does the minister propose to bring in by way of a budget measures which will protect the Canadian worker in the event of higher wages being received? That is all I am asking.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I was doing my best to reply to the hon. member's question in the same terms as those in which he put it to me. I got my figures from Statistics Canada, too.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES—PROVISION OF INFORMATION TO WESTERN PREMIERS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the Canadian Transport Commission has not yet turned over to the western premiers the information concerning freight rates promised to them by the Prime Minister some seven months ago, may I ask whether the right hon. gentleman can tell the House why this has not been done and when the western premiers are likely to get the information that was promised them?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport, who unfortunately is ill, did report to me that he had met with the western ministers responsible for transport and that they had discussed this very matter about a month ago, I believe, and had reached a satisfactory conclusion as to the way in which to proceed.

Mr. Orlikow: Since the western premiers indicated yesterday that they are not getting the information, which can only be supplied voluntarily by the railway companies and they are not co-operating, is the government considering bringing in the necessary amendments to present legislation to require information on freight rate costs to be made available regularly as requested by the western premiers?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member has pointed out the nature of the difficulty. The commitment we made at the Western Economic Opportunities Conference was based on the assumption that there would be co-operation from the railway companies in this matter. There is some difficulty in getting these figures under the law as they interpret it, but we are still attempting to ensure that we will get their voluntary co-operation and that we will not be obliged to bring legislation into the House. However, if the government does feel it has to obtain legislative authority from the House I hope we will receive quick and spontaneous co-operation from all sides.

Oral Questions

VETERANS LAND ACT

REQUEST THAT MARCH 31, 1974, EXPIRY DEADLINE BE EXTENDED

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veteran Affairs. In view of the many resolutions received from veterans organizations across the country which indicate that the overwhelming majority of some 900,000 veterans are in favour of extending the March 31 expiry deadline for the Veterans Land Act, can the hon. gentleman tell us what action he is taking and whether we can expect an extension of the deadline to meet the views of hundreds of thousands of veterans?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this matter is under review. I will bring an answer to the House in the near future.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the minister has been giving the same answer for the past year, in view of the fact that a commitment has been made in the name of the people of Canada by past Prime Ministers that no veteran will ever be able to say that Canada has broken faith, and since there was never any indication that anything under the veterans charter would be phased out, would the Prime Minister use his good offices to ensure that the deadline will be delayed until it can be determined that its imposition is in the best interests of Canada's veterans?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have received testimony from veterans' organizations, including statements in their official publications, that the present government has done more for the veterans than any other.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I think it has been demonstrated that the present Minister of Veterans Affairs is equally one who has brought forward action which has been wholly supported by the veterans and I am confident he will continue to do so.

● (1150)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the point when I must seek the co-operation of hon. members to limit the number of supplementary questions because we are approaching the end of the question period. I will recognize the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe on a supplementary question, followed by the hon. member for Drummond.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question I should like to direct to the Prime Minister. Granted that the veterans of Canada are well treated, the proposed action respecting this phase of the veterans charter is going to deny over 100,000 veterans the right to build homes. Even though the government is doing what it can to provide houses, this action will throw another 100,000 into the mainstream and the set-up we have under the veterans land administration could relieve that problem. I would ask the Prime Minister to reconsider and give a yes or no answer to my question whether he will take this necessary action to delay the phasing-out?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have heard the member's arguments and I have heard them before. All I can do now is to support the position of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and express my confidence in him.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Which is nothing.

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO INCREASE FARMERS' INCOME

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Since Quebec has only had in 1973 9.2 per cent of the Canadian farm income, which constitutes a decrease of 6.2 per cent compared with 1969, when Quebec had 15.4 per cent of the farm income, could the minister tell the House whether he intends in the near future to take steps to enable Quebec agriculture to take an equitable share of the national farm income?

Mr. Léopold Corriveau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I take notice of this question on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture who will be pleased to answer it as soon as possible.

Mr. Boisvert: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture.

Could he tell the House whether he intends reviewing the government's dairy policy in order to give some impetus to agriculture in Quebec and take it out of its present stagnation, because at the present time, the situation is untenable for Quebec farmers?

Mr. Corriveau: Mr. Speaker, I think that at the present time, the cabinet and the Department of Agriculture are working very hard to find new orientations for the dairy industry. I think that in a few days the Minister of Agriculture will be happy to announce the new dairy policies of the government.

PLANS TO OVERCOME DEFICIT IN FULLY MANUFACTURED PRODUCTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Will he take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House what plans the government intends to introduce early this session to overcome the serious situation brought about by a $5.9 billion trade deficit in fully manufactured products in this country during the first 11 months of 1973?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have been reviewing recently the trade statistics for the past year. We had a very substantial surplus on merchandise trade, close to $2 billion. The figures also reveal that there has been an over-all increase in our exports of better than $5 billion, an amount greater than total exports when the questioner was the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as the minister in his smart-aleck way completely avoided answering my question I will repeat it. Will he take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House his plans for overcoming the serious situation brought about by a $5.9 billion deficit in fully manufactured products, products which provide jobs for Canadians?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the hon. member that about a year ago the House took very important action from the point of view of supporting Canadian manufactured and processed goods. I am referring, of course, to the reduction in corporate tax rates, one of the most significant measures taken. I should also like to remind him that if he looks at all the figures he will see there has been a very substantial increase in exports of fabricated products during the same period.

GARRISON WATER DIVERSION PROJECT—FEDERAL REPRESENTATION AT MEETING BETWEEN NORTH DAKOTA AND MANITOBA GOVERNMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. Were any federal government representatives at the meeting held in Winnipeg between the Manitoba and North Dakota governments regarding the Garrison diversion?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there was an observer from my department present.

Mr. McKenzie: As the Manitoba government has agreed to let the diversion proceed, does the minister also agree in view of the fact it has been reported that it will seriously degrade water quality in Manitoba, and in view of the fact the Secretary of State for External Affairs has stated that meetings are to be held between the Canadian and United States governments regarding this diversion?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, several submissions have been made to Washington through the Department of External Affairs, all of them in opposition to this project in the United States. We have had some assurance, at least from the State Department of the United States, that it too is opposed to it.

PRICE OF HOME HEATING OIL IN OTTAWA AREA

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs concerning the price of home heating oil in the Ottawa area. I believe the minister was made aware of this problem some three weeks ago. In view of the fact that Gulf and Imperial Oil are shipping home heating oil by pipeline from Toronto to Ottawa and that the price is 27½ cents a gallon in Toronto and 34½ cents a gallon in Ottawa, although transportation costs amount to only 1.7 cents a gallon, what action does the government intend to take to roll back this unjustifiable price increase for consumers in the Ottawa area?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have been discussing this matter with officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources who have been conducting an analysis to determine the extent to which the price can be linked to oil from western Canada as distinct from oil which I understand is continuing to come from the east. It may be that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is responsible for that program, may have some further information to provide following his return.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Does the government intend to launch an investigation into this violation of the price freeze on western Canadian oil production, since the oil comes from western Canada, and investigate also why consumers of home heating oil in the Ottawa area are forced to subsidize this price increase?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, sir.

ACTION TO ASSIST BEEF PRODUCERS IN LIGHT OF IMPORTS SELLING AT BELOW CANADIAN COST OF PRODUCTION

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, this is a supplementary question. In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, because of the importance of the matter I should like to direct the question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that imports of beef into Canada are now at a market price below the actual cost of production on Canadian feedlots, many of which are either closing down or contemplating such action, will the minister indicate whether the government contemplates any action to bring relief to these producers, and what this policy might be?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Of course, Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing the situation as we have done ever since the market was rendered unstable by the American lifting of controls. We have the matter under constant review.

RADIO ENGINEERING PRODUCTS COMPANY LIMITED—INQUIRY AS TO SALE AND RECOVERY OF INDEBTEDNESS TO CROWN

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce concerning Radio Engineering Products Company Limited, a company situated in New Brunswick which the government found necessary to take over in order to protect itself in relation to loans to the company and an indebtedness of $4.5 million. Has this company been sold and, if not, are steps being taken to sell it? What steps are being taken to collect the $4.5 million indebtedness to the Crown?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government acquired a majority of the shares of Radio Engineering Products Company Limited with the object of retaining significant technological skills in Canada, to provide continuing employment in northern New Brunswick, and to improve and stabilize the financial position of the company in order that it might be resold as a continuing business operation. The company has recently gone through a difficult period, largely the result of the level of business. Recently some useful headway has been made in diversifying the company's operations, and significant progress has been made in negotiating contracts for future production. I am hopeful that this process will continue.

Mr. Hales: The minister did not answer my question as to what steps have been taken to collect the indebtedness of $4.5 million.

Mr. Gillespie: As I have indicated, Mr. Speaker, the resources of the company are modest. An effort has been made to sustain the company and to put it in a fully competitive position.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FAILURE TO FLY FLAG OF FREE UKRAINE AT OTTAWA CITY HALL—POLICY OF DEPARTMENT

Mr. Joe Hueglin (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, may I address my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On January 22, contrary to the custom of recent years, the flag of the Free Ukraine was not flown at Ottawa City Hall. As this break with custom was based on the initiative and advice of the minister's department, is it to be considered that this unfortunate precedent will be applied to the flags of all peoples whose homelands are now included within the Soviet Union—the Latvians, Estonians and Lithuanians as well as the Ukrainians?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman may know, there is no law in Canada about the flying of flags. When the Department of External Affairs is asked for its advice, as it sometimes is, it cannot, of course, endorse the flying of any flags other than those of governments which are recognized by Canada. That is the only advice we can give. But it is only advice. People can do as they wish since there is no law on the subject. One has to make a distinction, of course, between countries. For example, Canada does not recognize the incorporation of the Baltic states into the Soviet Union, which is quite different from the position of some of the other countries to which the hon. member is referring.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Niagara Falls will be recognized for a supplementary, after which the Chair will call orders of the day.

Mr. Hueglin: It is, then, very clear that the minister's department was approached by the mayor rather than the other way round?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, that is my understanding. We do not look around and say that a certain flag should not be flown. If we are asked for our advice we must give it, of course, in terms of our relationships with other countries. I would hope, too, that when municipalities decide what they are going to do they will observe the ordinary international courtesies.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. The hon. member for Scarborough West is rising on a point of order.

BILINGUALISM

STATEMENT IN GLOBE AND MAIL ON COST—REQUEST FOR CORRECTION

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order or a point of privilege which Your Honour might consider procedurally inappropriate but which nevertheless is extremely important in substance to this House and to the country. In the Globe and Mail this morning there is a news article on the front page which states in its body and in its headline that we, the parliament of Canada, are about to spend $8.56 of every $100 on bilingualism.

The simple fact is that we are going to do nothing of the kind. The report in the Globe and Mail is out by a factor of 10. I wonder whether the President of the Treasury Board, for the sake of the record of this House and of the understanding by the people of Canada of a very important but nevertheless very sensitive policy of this House, would clarify whether he or his department gave this miscalculated information to the Globe and Mail or whether it came from Statistics Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a point of order. It is perhaps a question that might have been raised in the question period. The Chair has no objection to allowing the minister to reply to the hon. member's question, but since the question period has expired this would have to be done with the consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think we have been having trouble with our arithmetic today. In this case, as the hon. member has pointed out, a Toronto newspaper, the Globe and Mail, has correctly reported information obtained from the blue book and from Treasury Board that roughly $188 million will be spent in support of a variety of bilingualism policies of the federal government.

However, the author has gone on to conclude that $188 million out of the total of the estimates represents 8.56 per cent of the total sum, or $8.56 for every dollar.

Some hon. Members: Wrong again.

Mr. Drury: That is misleading, and perhaps it has misled the Leader of the Opposition. I hope the Globe and Mail will make every effort not only to correct but to acknowledge correction of this statement.

Mr. Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member for Don Valley, the hon. member for York West is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I want only to interrupt for a moment, as chairman of the Toronto Liberal caucus, to recognize the mayor of the great city of Toronto who is sitting in the Liberal gallery this morning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I owe it to the House to remind hon. members that it is entirely out of order to bring to the attention of the House the presence of distinguished Canadians or distinguished visitors. This was done yesterday by one of the gentlemen to my right. I thought I should not say anything, but if we are going to get into the habit from day to day of recognizing the many distinguished people who visit our galleries, then we may find ourselves spending as much time recognizing visitors in the galleries as we do on Standing Order 43 motions.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Thursday, February 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stollery for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto by Mr. Stanfield (p. 31) and the amendment to the amendment by Mr. Fortin (p. 45).

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commence my remarks by congratulating the mover and seconder of the Speech from the Throne; by offering my felicitations to the Governor General and wishing him every success in his term of office, and by congratulating the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) on his brilliant address yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Indeed, may I also congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on his fine performance as well as the other leaders of the parties in this House.

Actually, the question whether or not one is prepared to support the Speech from the Throne really depends upon whether or not one can decide from what is said that this government has the vision and imagination to solve the economic problems that are facing Canada, problems which indeed are prevalent in the world today. There is no question that the world today is experiencing its greatest economic challenge since the 1920's. Clearly this is a period when we need imagination, enthusiasm and the ability to adopt new ideas in order to cope with the current economic situation. I was pleased to see that attention was given to this particular matter in the speech.

The economic difficulties facing the world today are very clear and apparent to everyone. They began to emerge last year when a rapid and dramatic change came about in the supply of energy to the countries of the world. The problem has manifested itself in two ways: in terms of supply and in terms of price. The supply problem is most apparent in those countries that depend upon foreign oil from Middle East sources—countries such as Japan, the countries of the European Common Market, and to some degree the United States. As a consequence of this supply problem, there will probably be a slowing down in the rate of economic growth of these countries during the course of the present year.

More important, perhaps, in the long run it will lead to a different allocation of resources in those countries. But far more important than the supply problems which are generated by the situation in the Middle East are the payment problems. Under the pricing policy of the Middle East it is clear that payments will be in the neighbourhood of $75 billion. The simple fact is that those payments cannot be made under any type of conventional system such as has been in the past. Indeed, for some countries, such as India, which is going to have to use half its exports to pay for oil, the payment problem is beyond comprehension.

The point I want to make is that no one is suggesting that we will find a solution to the international economic problems in the old conventional methods of the past. No one is saying that we can have simple changes in the value of foreign exchanges which will clear the payment problems. Indeed, we have to hope that out of meetings such as were held in Washington a few weeks ago, and in Rome at the start of the year, that new economic policies will be developed that will make it possible for these problems to be solved. Because no one knows whether the problems can be solved, there is probably more uncertainty in the world today, so far as economic policy is concerned, than has existed for many, many years.

The reason I mention this problem in world international economic affairs is that I believe that, just as we need new and imaginative methods to solve the problem of international payments, we also need new and imaginative solutions to the economic problems that we have in Canada. The question that you have to ask yourselves, and which every member of parliament has to ask himself when he looks at the Speech from the Throne and the suggestions in it, the broad generalities that are there, is: can we have confidence that this government has really understood the changes that are taking place in the Canadian economy.

We must ask ourselves whether we can have confidence that this government knows the changes in economic policy that have to be made in order to deal with those problems in an effective fashion. I think it was Talleyrand who once said, "How sad it is to live in the middle of a revolution and not know that it is going on". We know that a revolution is going on in terms of economic policy making at the international level. The immediate impact of the oil price changes have made that very clear. But we seem to be unable to recognize that in the development of our domestic economic policies we have also had a revolution in the structure of our economy and the way in which the economy is working. Unless this is perceived, it is very unlikely that we will solve the economic problems of the present, let alone those of the future.

In the Speech from the Throne we do not see anything about a new industrial strategy for Canada. There is nothing in it about a resource policy for Canada, nothing on pricing policies, nothing on a trade policy and, most important, nothing about solving the most important problem we have in Canada today, that is the problem of inflation. In fact, there is only one issue in Canada today and that is the question of what we should do about inflation and the increasing cost of living, because there is no way in which we can solve any of our other problems until we get inflation under control.

Does anybody really believe that we can do anything about the housing problem in Canada until we deal with inflation? Does anybody really believe we can solve the problems of regional disparities of income before inflation is lowered? Does anybody really believe we can solve the problem of income distribution before the problem of inflation is solved? We cannot. The same is true of the problems of poverty. The critical thing that must be done in this parliament is to come to grips with domestic inflation and come to grips with it now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Gillies.]

Mr. Gillies: Otherwise, we are wasting our time here. Moreover, if we do not solve the problem of inflation and if we allow inflation to continue at its present rate, whether it is 9.1 per cent or 10 per cent, the fabric of our society and of our economic system will not survive. The people of Canada will simply not put up with an economic system and with a government that is unable to limit inflation. I think it was Lenin who said that if you wish to destroy an economic system first, you debauch the currency. That is what we are doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Actually, the inflation problem will be solved and inflation will end in Canada at some time. It will come to an end in Canada in the traditional business cycle fashion. If we do not get inflation under control in this country, we will end up with a collapse of our economic system, a rise in unemployment, and a depression possibly of the dimensions and kind we have had in the past.

What can the people of Canada make of a government which states in the face of the inflation rate we have now that nothing can be done about it in the short run, although something might be done about it in the long run. The people of Canada will not accept such a proposition. What can the people of Canada think of a Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who goes on a television program and says that there will be an increase in the cost of living in 1974 as high as in 1973. The implication of such remarks are that the people had better protect themselves against inflation because the government cannot protect them.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Gillies: What are the people of the nation to think of a government that is not prepared to try hard to do something about inflation?

What is the government's excuse? The government says that it really cannot do anything about inflation in Canada because it is a world-wide problem. Certainly, there is inflation around the world. Every country in the world is suffering from inflation, but there is a fundamental difference between the inflation that is being experienced in Canada and the inflation experienced in many other countries of the world. We have isolated ourselves so far from the impact of the great increases in oil prices which are so inflationary in other countries, but more importantly our inflation, unlike inflation in other countries in the world, is not caused by the fantastic increase in the cost of our imports, which is the case in Great Britain, Japan and many other countries. The inflationary impact in our country caused by the world-wide inflationary situation is due to the increase in the price of our exports. This is something we could do something about, but we have not. So, to suggest that we have an enormous inflation in Canada because of world-wide conditions and to try to pretend we have the same problem as Britain or Japan is absolutely wrong.

If you look at the statistics on price increases in our imports, you will see that prices have been up about 8.2 per cent until the oil situation. The price increase of our exports is about 14.5 per cent, and of course the general increase in prices is about 10 per cent. No one can say that if we want to do something about inflation we cannot do it because of world-wide problems. The reason we do not do anything about it is that we do not want to do so, we do not want to disrupt some of the patterns and traditions of the past. What we have decided to do is not to isolate ourselves in any way from the international forces that add to inflation in Canada.

What one would have thought would have been done a year ago, or two years ago, essentially was to allow our exchange rate to rise. But we did not do so. We kept the exchange rate floating with the American dollar, but it has been a very peculiar type of float, as the leader of the NDP likes to point out. It was a float designed to maintain parity with the U.S. dollar, because any time capital movements took place that might have changed the exchange rate, the money supply or the interest rates were changed.

When the U.S. dollar was devalued our dollar was also devalued, at a time when any rational policy would have been designed to slow down export demand in the face of rising prices. Instead, we assisted in increasing the demand by following economic policies which assured that the Canadian dollar would stay in parity with the American dollar. What we have done has been to allow the prices of our export products to rise domestically in face of world demand, and the government seems willing with some exceptions, to accept world prices on the domestic market. It has done nothing to slow down the demand situation by operating with a really flexible exchange rate, as one would have expected it to do.

We moreover, have not really looked at the question of whether or not our policy of exporting everything we can export, of trading for trade's sake, is really what we should be doing in this changing world. Surely, the message in the change of the Arab oil policy is that we have to begin to think seriously about the use of our non-renewable resources. Does it make sense in Canada today to sell our resources at the highest price to the highest bidder? Not only does this have enormous inflationary effects but it also raises the question of whether it is a moral position to take. Are we really prepared to let our resources go to the highest bidder? Do we really want the rich countries to become richer and the poor countries to become poorer because we are willing to let our resources go to those countries which can pay for them under any conditions?

The government contends that it will try to solve the inflation problem in Canada over the long run with some type of supply policies. Mr. Speaker, we remember our experience with the government's previous supply policies, with its policy of killing chickens to raise the price of eggs, and with its program in the west to reduce the production of wheat. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is really concerned about supply problems, if he thinks supply is the answer to inflation, then why doesn't he do something about supply problems now? Why doesn't he slow down some of the exports of our raw materials? Why does he not have them processed in this country? Why doesn't he have a supply policy right now?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: It is absolutely wrong to suggest that inflation in Canada is induced entirely by external forces. That is not true. If we want to do something about the problem we can do it if we only have the will, the courage, and the imagination to move.

At the same time as we have had this failure to do anything so far as supply is concerned, we have followed a fantastic expansionary domestic monetary policy. By and large inflation is a monetary phenomenon. I completely and absolutely agreed with the member for York South (Mr. Lewis) yesterday when he made the statement that it is wrong to say that inflation is caused by increases in wage rates. It is not. The increase in the money supply, in the dimensions that we have experienced in the past few years, guarantees that we are going to have increased inflation. Over a period when production is being increased by 17 per cent or 18 per cent, you cannot increase the supply of money by 50 per cent without having an inflationary situation. You have to make a distinction between fiscal and monetary policies, a big distinction. But the government has never been prepared to make a distinction, to recognize that the impact of monetary policy is primarily on prices, and that the impact of fiscal policy is primarily on output.

It is quite conceivable that monetary and fiscal policies can work in opposite directions, but we have had inflation induced in this country by an increase in the money supply unmatched by any other industrialized nation in the world in modern times.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the government asks people across this country to be restrained in their expenditure patterns and policies. But today, depending on how you work out the figures we find that the government, in a year when the inflation rate is 10 per cent, is increasing its expenditures by—pick your own figure—20 per cent.

Mr. Stanfield: Be fair; it is only 19.6 per cent.

Mr. Gillies: By 19.6 per cent. It defies the imagination. Doesn't the government really want to do something about inflation? To increase expenditures by that dimension in an inflationary period makes no sense at all.

The reason we have so much inflation in Canada is government policy. The government's own policy has created most of the inflation that we have in our economy. The question is, why do we have these absolutely ridiculous things going on? It is almost a psychological problem, but actually I suspect it is more of a political problem.

When you think about it, Mr. Speaker, the reason has to be that the government was so bruised by the policy it followed two or three years ago, a mistaken policy, of slowing down the economy to try to fight inflation—in the process creating 7 per cent unemployment, the highest unemployment rate in the industrialized world at that particular time—that it has frightened itself into following another mistaken policy. There is no question that inflation did slow down at that time, but as a consequence of that policy the government apparently has decided it can do nothing at all about the demand-management side of the inflation problem. It is so frightened that something may happen to the unemployment rate that it will not act. This makes no sense. If the economy moves up, with reasonably full employment, you get inflation if you keep putting more money into the system, and if you keep on increasing government expenditure.

No one, least of all the party to which I belong, has any interest in trying to control inflation by creating unemployment. This would be a stupid and a morally improper policy; bad economically, bad socially and bad politically. But this does not mean that the government has to throw away one whole aspect for dealing with inflation as this government has done. The government is afraid to slow down any sort of excess demands in the economy and, as a consequence, inflation continues. It will continue in Canada this year even if it drops in other countries; it will continue because of the policies the government is following. It is creating inflation; you have to have some demand management policy or inflation will grow.

With a 10 per cent rate, it is inconceivable that we do not have some sort of demand-management policy. We have no supply-management policy, no demand-management policy, no exchange rate policy, no monetary policy and we wonder why we have inflation. The government is creating it and it will continue this year at a rate equivalent to last year.

My final point is that the inflation problem will not be solved in Canada unless we try to perceive Canada and the economy as it really is. Unless you perceive the nature of the structure of the economy within which you are operating, there can be no solution. It is important to see reality. What are the realities in the Canadian economy at the present time? What is the first reality? We are in the middle of enormous inflationary expectations in this country. Does anybody at all believe that we are today in an economy with normal expectations? Why is the price of gold at $185? Why is the cost of houses in Toronto increasing at the rate of 27 per cent or 30 per cent per year? We are in an economy that is operating on inflationary expectations. If you try to apply policies in this economy that are based on the assumption that expectations are normal, they will fail.

The first thing any government has to do is try to break such inflationary expectation? That is imperative. But the evidence we have had in the last two days gives no confidence that the government will even try. Anyone who reads the Speech from the Throne will have to conclude that it is a program for more inflation, not less. The Prime Minister says it is inevitable.

Second, it is imperative to look at the realities of the structure of the economy. We have made economic policy in this country, and other countries too, since the end of 1945 in terms of monetary policy, fiscal policy and so on, on the basic assumption that we are operating in a truly competitive economy. The reaction is anticipated from policies is the reaction expected in a competitive economy. We have not had that type of economy for a long time and we do not have it now. In a period of inflationary expectations where prices are established not primarily by operation of supply and demand but by administrative pricing decisions, what is going to happen? You are going to have escalating prices that perform no economic function in the system at all.

Does anybody in this House really believe that an increase in the price of housing in Toronto this year of 27 per cent generated a greater increase in the supply of housing this year than a 5 per cent increase in price would have? Does anybody believe that the profit reported today by corporations are necessary to generate new investment in the future? No. Why are these thing coming about? It is because there is no competitive force operating in many areas of the economy. Whether we like it or not, large portions of price setting are done on an administrative basis. There is no countervailing power. If we do not recognize this in the making of economic policy, there is no chance that economic policies will work.

What do you do under these circumstances? The first thing is to break the expectation and give an indication that the government is serious about fighting inflation. That is why in our party we have said that one of the first essentials is to try to gather everyone into the effort against inflation. We believe it is essential to have a short-term freeze on elements of the Canadian economy in order to indicate to the Canadian people that we are serious about doing something about inflation.

Yesterday the Prime Minister said that such a short-term freeze could operate successfully in the short run, although it created problems for the long-run. The director of the program in the United States confirms this view. No one really suggests that a short-term freeze is not successful in slowing down expectations and bringing a slowdown in the rate of inflation in a country. But everyone says that if you do not follow it with an incomes policy, an economic policy, a competition policy and so on, it will not work. They are right. At the same time, it is quite clear that if you follow only a monetary policy or fiscal policy alone, it will not work. What you need is the combination in the economy of an incomes policy, a monetary and fiscal policy, and an exchange rate policy developed together. A question is, are you better off to try to deal with the profit situation with an excess profit tax or some sort of incomes policy? It is quite clear that you are better off with an incomes policy, not only because of the fact that sometimes you can hide taxable costs, but primarily because what you are trying to do is not collect more revenue for the government but to keep prices down.

I was astonished yesterday when the Prime Minister said that he did not know what an incomes policy was. It is quite clear what an incomes policy is. You establish in your economy a permissible level for profits, a level high enough to permit continuation of investment in the economy. It is as simple as that. You do not have to have rates of profit increase by 30 per cent or 40 per cent in your economy to get new investment.

It is unfair for the government to say that they are going to ask everybody to do something about inflation when the government itself is not doing anything about it. It is spending more. It is not going to get effective action through voluntary controls. What you have to do if you want to get inflation under control is establish an incomes policy in conjunction with the private sector and in conjunction with labour and consumer groups.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might indicate what his conclusion will be because his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Gillies: You cannot expect, in a period of inflationary expectation when there is no competitive force operating, to get these prices under control. It will not happen. We must have an incomes policy. I have never heard anything like what the Prime Minister said yesterday about the effects of income policy on low income groups. The only thing I ever heard that was more outrageous was the suggestion that the NDP was not supporting the Carter tax reform. There is not one scintilla of evidence anywhere to suggest that an incomes policy works against people in low income brackets. How can a Prime Minister who presides over a government which has permitted inflation to take 10 per cent away from the people in Canada in the last year oppose an incomes policy on grounds that it is going to hurt low income groups. Such a suggestion is absolutely outrageous.

● (1240)

The fact is that inflation destroys people in the low income brackets. Under inflation, income is not transferred from high income to low income groups; it is transferred from low to high income groups. Inflation destroys the middle class and those in low income brackets, and to try to make a case for some political reason in this country that an incomes policy is going to hurt those in the low incomes brackets is absolutely ludicrous.

Mr. Alexander: It is irresponsible.

Mr. Gillies: It is irresponsible. If we do not have an incomes policy, these people in this country will be terribly hurt. They are being hurt, now.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must inquire whether there is unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue.

An hon. Member: Two minutes.

Mr. Speaker: I must bring to the attention of the hon. member and of the House that we ought to recognize at least two more speakers between the present time and the time of the vote. Those members would include the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). We are running short of time.

Mr. Gillies: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I feel very strongly about this issue. In conclusion, I say that we, in this House, cannot allow inflation to increase. We need not allow inflation to increase. We can put policies into effect which will lessen inflation in this country. We are not at the mercy of international whims in this matter. I believe that if members in this House are aware of the plight of their constituents and really want to represent the people of Canada, they will vote in support of the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, having read and re-read the Speech from the Throne where several pieces of legislation are announced, and in view of that list of measures, we cannot now judge their value because we are not yet aware of their content and cannot say whether they will solve Canada's present problems.

I shall limit my remarks to the present economic situation in Canada and not to any measures in particular. I would also like, Mr. Speaker, to support my colleague, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) who has moved a sub-amendment in the House, yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, considering the almost utter confusion that now exists in Canada and on account of which all Canadians, and rightly so, do not know where they are going, everyone is asking himself the same question: Where are we going? What is going to happen with the prices rocketing as they do? What is going to happen with the inflation that the government had promised to check? We realize today its deplorable flop. It just poured more oil on that inflation blaze. Socialists look at the present inflation with satisfaction because it places all individuals on an equal footing, that of the poor, because inflation has reduced those who possess to the same position as the dispossessed ones.

Last Sunday evening, I was listening to the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) on a CBC broadcast, as he was interviewed by a well-known socialist, Mr. André Payette, husband of a CBC employee, and who gets a salary of more than $75,000 a year. Mr. André Payette asked the right hon. Prime Minister what were his immediate objectives for 1974. The Prime Minister replied that he wanted the removal of social inequalities.

Mr. Speaker, to remove social inequalities in Canada there is no better way than the inflation we know at the present time. With inflation, social disparities will vanish because it will dispossess everybody and there will be no more social inequalities, because everybody will be in the same position, namely among the people dispossessed by the state and possessed by trusts and finance.

That is why the right hon. Prime Minister declared that he could not reduce inflation, first, because he is the servant of those who created inflation and secondly, because he wants equality for all through the removal of social inequalities and that in his opinion, the best way to achieve socialism is to let inflation dispossess everybody.

What will come out of the present energy crisis that was artificially created? To solve it, the federal government will give $400 million to the multinational corporations that created the artificial crisis.

Under the false pretext of shortages, multinational gas and oil monopolies will make in 1974 the biggest profits in their history while at the same time oil tankers loaded at full capacity cannot unload in the port of New York because tanks are full and because the governments which are at the pay of multinational companies sing the false song of artificial shortages.

What will happen, Mr. Speaker, with our savings which melt like butter in the saucepan of inflation? What will happen with these shortages of various materials which get more and more acute because our production system is eaten away by the cancer of finance and held tight in the tentacles of finance and monopolies? What will happen in April or May when farmers will have to borrow money from banks at an interest rate of 12½ per cent to buy the seeds whose price will vary between $13 and $90 a hundredweight, and this in Canada, in a country producing various seeds.

Mr. Speaker, this spring several farmers will have no money left to seed and others will not want to seed anymore under such conditions. Next fall the products will still be rarer and more expensive, hence prices will go up more quickly than the useless cataplasms of a government walking on economic crutches.

Prices go up more quickly than pensions, allowances or salaries. Prices go up with the elevator while incomes climb up the stairs. From day to day there is an ever widening gap between incomes and costs and as those costs excede incomes, debts increase tremendously each day. The steering wheel of our economy is broken. We are told about the shortages of gas, oil, sugar and all the by-products of gas and oil. The United States are about to impose compulsory rationing; Canada, as a "good economic sheep", will follow suit the very next morning.

In view of this confusion, in an effort to cheer themselves up and excuse their ineptitude, the right hon. Prime Minister and hon. members of the Liberal party, walking on economic crutches, compare the situation in Canada with those which prevail in underdeveloped countries. They say that we should rejoice because our lot is better than those of India, Pakistan or Ethiopia. Canada is not deprived of rain or water. Our crops have not been destroyed by earthquakes or droughts. And yet, hon. members of the Liberal party are about to articially create an economic drought. Canada is not lacking in fertile land and Canadian farmers have known for a long time how to benefit from science, technology and progress.

In Canada, we no longer use pickaxes for farming. You surely have to be blind or an invalid with economic crutches to compare the economy of Canada with that of countries which have not yet reached a high level of science and technology and where the work and production methods are less advanced than those used in Canada in 1874. The Liberals are satisfied with comparing our economy with that of countries which have not yet reached the point of carts and horses. This truly shows their economic inability and shows that they are still using the economic methods of 1874, which means that they are at least a hundred years behind as regards technology.

Mr. Speaker, the beavers of Canada have not progressed in 100 years. They build their dams on our rivers and creeks in the same way as in 1874.

They did not make any progress from the point of view of the economy, production or working methods. However, in Canada, beavers are ahead of the Liberals from the economic standpoint because they are building dams. When the dams are completed, they do not owe one cent to anybody. They build dams without getting into debt. When the dams are completed, they own it without any debt with the bank. They have the assets without any liabilities. When they build a dam, they do not go to New York on a raft as the Liberals do by air to borrow so that they can build a dam. Beavers never had to discontinue the building of a dam as Mr. Bourassa did in James Bay for lack of money. The beavers can build without entering into debt whereas Mr. Bourassa and the Liberals can build only thanks to debts made in New York and elsewhere.

In 1974, the Canadian economy is under the total control of banks and monopolies which are branches of banks. The banks, their "economic tentacles", and the monopolies have completely destroyed our capitalist system of private enterprise in Canada. And yet some ignoramuses are still claiming that we are living under a capitalist system and take pleasure in denouncing a capitalist system which no longer exists.

A true capitalist system is a system under which anyone can become and remain the owner of a capital or any other asset, a system under which the government is encouraging everyone to remain the owner of some kind of capital.

Governments today, particularly the Liberal government in Ottawa, are doing their best to dispossess everyone to the benefit of banks and monopolies under the pretence of reducing social inequities.

We are living under a monopolistic system which in terms of economics is called economic liberalism.

In Canada, private enterprise is nearly bankrupt and the capitalist system has disappeared. It has been stifled by monopolies. Money and credit stem from and are controlled by banks and production is controlled by bank subsidiaries. The price of sugar is controlled by a world monopoly rooted in England. Food products, such as potatoes, fish, beef, even beans and pork are controlled by food monopolies that buy the whole production from producers who are financed and controlled by banks.

The potato monopoly, once it has taken over the exclusive control over all potato production, creates an artificial shortage of potatoes, increases and establishes prices, exploits consumers after ruining producers.

Jamaica is a sugar cane producing country. The whole sugar production is bought beforehand by the English sugar monopoly which exports entire ship-loads of sugar from Jamaica whereas the slaves who produce sugar cane do not even get one teaspoon of sugar to put in their coffee in the very country where this product is more than abundant.

The same thing occurs in Cuba, as well as in Jamaica since it is a banana producing country. Cuban people are loading ships with sugar to be exported whereas they have rationing coupons for sugar in their pockets.

In Canada, the same thing is happening with regard to potatoes. The same occurs in relation to fish in the Maritimes and British Columbia, and to wheat in the west, since a federal monopoly, namely the Canadian Wheat Board, controls the price of wheat and sells to communist China at a price that is three times cheaper than that paid by the poor Quebec farmer on the Canadian market. Canada is a wheat producing country and within a few days, bread will sell at 50 cents a loaf. Potatoes are now sold $10 a hundred weight, and sugar $30. In Cuba, that is called Communism. In Canada, they speak of economic liberalism. The difference between them is as follows: in Cuba, the government has an overall control, whereas, in Canada monopolies control everything including the government.

Banks have a monopoly over money and the creation of credit, and their branches, the monopolies, control the balance of our economy. We live in a monopolistic, not a capitalist economy. The 300 chairmen, presidents and directors of the ten Canadian chartered banks control as directors the 800 largest Canadian companies or multinational monopolies.

The Royal Bank of Canada alone increased its assets by $3,600,000 in the last 12 months. Its branch, the Royal Trust, a trust company, heads real estate transactions in Canada and the control over the security and bond portfolio.

The people built Canada and they own the liabilities, the debts. Monopolies handled the figures and own the assets. In face of the control over production by monopolies and the parasitic exploitation of producers by multinational monopolies there is a solution, Mr. Speaker, and it does not come from those who led us into the present confusion because they are part of it.

Social Crediters have the solution. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call it one o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair. The House will resume at 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I was saying earlier that Social Crediters have the solution to the problem of monopoly control in Canada. And this solution lies in the following principle, namely that any new production should be financed with new interest-free credits.

If this principle were applied, Mr. Speaker, the tentacles of monopolies would simply be cut off and they would lose all economic life-blood, namely the parasitic profits that they suck like bloodsuckers.

The application of this principle, would enable producers to remain in control of their production up to the consumption stage. They could then plan their own marketing while living off their products while waiting for consumers.

Producers would no longer be at the mercy of monopolies that buy up production at ridiculous prices in order to be able to pay their perpetual debt to the banks which own or control monopolies. If this principle were applied, monopolies would become useless for the same reason that a finance company does not do business in a district of millionaires where it would be useless. It could not do business for lack of customers to exploit.

Contrary to what socialists claim, it is not necessary to nationalize monopolies, and replace them with an even more dangerous state monopoly, because it would hide behind legislation and bureaucracy. If this principle were applied, producers could do their own marketing and dispose of their own goods by selling them directly to consumers.

There is no need to nationalize and control monopolies by creating price control boards appointed by them. You only have to remove the need for them. Anti-trust legislation is powerless against monopolies because it can easily be evaded and the firms found guilty of collusion can easily afford any fines that may be imposed on them by passing them on in the sales price of the next production.

We cannot either curb the monopolies, since until today they have subdued the producers and the governments whom they finance.

Mr. Speaker, when production is completed and ready to meet the consumers' needs, there is a delay between finished production and ordered consumption or sale to consumers.

Finished production is ready for consumption and is called inventory. Inventories account for billions of dollars temporarily capitalized of which monopolies only, as subsidiaries of banks, can bear the financial cost.

We have to look at what is going on in the various sectors of production to find that producers are at the mercy of monopolies which buy their products at a ridiculously low price and sell them on the market at an exorbitant price, for they have set themselves the prices, exploiting the producers when they buy the products, and the consumers when they sell the products for consumption.

This exploitation of producers and consumers by monopolies specialized in every production sector is one of the main causes of inflation. In order to remedy this situation, producers must keep control over their production up to the consumer's level if we want to achieve a good economic balance of prices based on competition which disappeared because of the exclusive control of monopolies specialized in every sector of production. Producers should not be at the mercy of parasitic monopolies which, through the credit they are provided by their "mothers", the banks, get rid of all competition during the period between the end of production and the start of consumption.

For instance, New Brunswick potato producers have like other producers plentiful crops and bank debts. As they cannot benefit from new interest-free credits to fund their new production of potatoes, sooner or later the bank manager ask them to reimburse their loan even before production gets to the consumer. I have seen myself buyers representing the potato monopolies being given all the credit they need by the bank and buying from the producers their potato crops at the price they choose to give since the producer is unable to compete for his loan makes him dependent on the banks. The same situation applies to maple syrup producers in Beauce or elsewhere.

Monopolies intervene autocratically between production and consumption. This is the reason why there is a tremendous rise in food prices at the consumer level. Monopolies take control over production and then control consumer prices. When production is ready for consumption it has become socialized since it can serve society immediately. It must be financed by a social credit, a new interest-free credit to enable the producers to live off their products while waiting for consumers and to prevent parasite monopolies from wedging in between producers and consumers. That new interest-free credit would be reimbursed by the producer when he sells his produce.

Maple syrup and potato producers could organize themselves to sell their produce. All categories or groups of producers, local or regional, could do so.

That, Mr. Speaker, is true economic corporatism, healthy competition, real capitalism and private enterprise. Competition would be stimulated by enabling more producers to produce and small producers to compete with the large. Thus monopolies would become useless in the midst of producers, just as finance companies are amongst millionaires.

For example, a 1974 car built in 1973 is ready to be sold to a consumer in November 1973, while it is actually purchased in November 1974. A 14-month period elapsed between the end of production and the consumption or sale to the consumer. This means that the consumer must pay at least $700 in interest to the finance company which has financed the car when it was in stock, to say nothing of the financing costs incurred by the consumer who must buy on credit, which makes about $1500 in interest being paid for the financing of the car in stock before and after the sale to the consumer. The same applies to farm machinery and in all areas of any type of production.

The small efficient producers are at the mercy of monopolies. There is no more competition between producers, for monopolies have been set up between the producers and the consumers. Prices increase continually at the will of monopolies, and the producers, not earning a reasonable profit, stop producing. Products become scarcer, as is the case at present, and we find ourselves in a period of galloping inflation.

Economists looking for solutions on the mountain of problems of their own creation see the mountain and are up in the clouds, while the solution is under their very nose, but they took the solution for the mountain. They are looking for the solution on the mountain of problems, they are looking for the fly on the mountain although it is under their nose which they take for a mountain.

Mr. Speaker, if we had to find tomorrow a solution to our economic problems, it would be a nightmare for economists who are in perpetual search for a solution, for when the solution is found, they would have to produce goods instead of making or maintaining our economic problems. Economists, always in quest of solutions, would become unemployed unless they would direct their abilities and experience to more productive areas than that of creating problems, of causing the economic chaos in which Canada finds itself at present.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to join the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and other members to congratulate Their Excellencies Mr. and Mrs. Jules Léger on their nomination to this high function and to express them my best wishes.

I am convinced that like his predecessors, His Excellency Mr. Léger will distinguish himself as Governor General of Canada.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

[English]

May I at the same time express my congratulations to the urbane and eloquent hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), my neighbour from downtown Toronto when he is not in Central America, and also one of my electors I understand, who in moving the address made such a significant speech.

[Translation]

Let me congratulate also the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier), one of the foremost figures of this great Liberal team of the Eastern Townships.

[English]

This seems an appropriate occasion to review some of the events on the energy scene in the past year, and also to talk about some of the current problems which will be faced during the current parliament.

At this time last year, my department was busy putting the finishing touches on a report on the energy situation in Canada, a report which was published in June of 1973. Its analyses provided a basis of information upon which Canadians and this parliament could make some decisions about basic energy policy. It established a basis of understanding concerning the fiscal, economic and social characteristics of the Canadian energy system immediately prior to the world events which suddenly thrust Canada and the world into an energy crisis during the latter part of 1973.

This crisis, which is still underway, centres on world oil supplies and on the aspirations of the major oil exporting nations. For Canada's part, it has threatened supply shortages and greatly increased prices for imported oil. This crisis has, however, served to focus immediate attention on the importance of new national energy policies reflecting the federal government's responsibility to ensure adequacy and equity in energy supply and pricing in the interests of all Canadians.

The crisis has clearly demonstrated the duty of the federal government to take effective action to determine the balance of priorities between energy producer and consumer needs, and among the various regions of Canada. Fortunately, the energy policy study and the detailed analyses which went into it permitted the government to meet this mandate from a very considerable base of knowledge.

Commencing early in September 1973, a series of important policy initiatives have been taken to ensure both the adequacy and equity of supply for Canadians, as well as a degree of insulation from the international prices for oil, prices which have been dictated by the policies of oil exporting nations rather than by the customary economic factors of supply and demand. The federal government initiatives have not been limited to measures relating solely to the immediate oil crisis, but rather have extended into forward looking policies for all energy forms. Perhaps I might just briefly review these.

They have included a price restraint policy on Canadian crude which has benefited all our consumers of this oil and the manufactured products produced by industries based on Canadian oil; a price control mechanism on imported oil to ensure that only actual increases in purchase costs are passed on to Canadian consumers; the extention of the Canadian crude oil pipeline system into the Montreal market area, which is underway, and a proposal has also been put forth for an all-Canadian pipeline in the future; an oil export tax has been imposed to ensure that the difference between the lower Canadian price for crude oil and its return from export markets flows back to the Canadian public through the federal and provincial governments; the establishment of an energy supplies allocation board to ensure our capability to respond rapidly and effectively to any future deterioration in world oil supply and the proposed establishment of a national petroleum company to expedite the search for and development of new petroleum resources. We have proposed, in that context, the expenditure of $40 million on oil sands research and technology to permit full and rapid development of that resource. The proposals have also included a system to use oil export tax revenues and federal funds to ensure that during the period to the end of March of this year there will be no widening of the east-west price differential on oil, and a proposal for a one-price oil system in Canada which, from the first of April this year, will keep Canadian prices at less than international prices but which will provide the revenues necessary to first find and develop new resources and to offset the higher costs of oil imported into eastern Canada.

An office of energy conservation has been established to develop short and long-term plans for a more prudent and efficient use of our energy resources. A federal government task force has been set up to ensure an effective system of establishing and following priorities for research and development of new energy sources and improvements in existing technology. Federal financial assistance has been offered for the development of stronger regional electric transmission links to improve security of supply and to minimize utility costs.

Federal financial support has also been offered for the first nuclear power unit in any province, and for a second unit if regional benefits and security of supply result therefrom. A new export policy for uranium has been proposed, designed to ensure future Canadian supplies and to obtain the maximum possible benefit from exports. Programs have been proposed to speed up the development of a national inventory of our uranium resources so that this work would complement the on-going appraisal programs of oil, gas and coal resources.

These and other measures have the ultimate objective of Canadian self-reliance in the energy context. With the assistance of the petroleum industry in Canada, it has been possible to overcome the short-term supply problems this winter, and the longer range measures which have been announced will increase our degree of self-sufficiency in the future.

We recognize that increasing energy costs will be difficult to avoid. But the measures which have been taken on oil costs have had the effect of avoiding a 12 to 14 cents per gallon price increase in fuel oil and gasoline east of the Ottawa valley, and a possible 20 cent increase across the country, had international prices been allowed to prevail in Canada. Pricing proposals for the period commencing April 1 will allow the price increases which are necessary to ensure future supplies, but will establish a pricing structure across Canada which will vary only as the result of transportation costs.

Both for the present and for the period after April 1 Canadian consumers must be protected from the tax increases which have been imposed by governments of the producing countries. The purpose of the price cushion will be to protect from such increases and not more. It will not, in particular, be permitted to secure a higher margin of profit to the refiners. So that while the higher cost paid for crude oil by the refiners due to foreign taxes will be reimbursed, particular care will be taken to ensure that public funds are not used to do more than cushion the consumer against such costs.

For the purpose of authorizing such payments in the February-March period, my colleague the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) will be bringing forward a supplementary estimate to cover this period. Of course, in the period from April 1, following discussions with the provincial government, further legislative measures will be put forward to provide this same cushion.

All of the measures which have been taken have had to be compressed into a much shorter time frame than we would have liked. At the time of the publication of our energy report, I outlined plans for a phased transition allowing ample time for full discussion and debate of the options available to us. But because of pressure of external events we have had to move quickly in some cases, and we still remain in a position of some emergency in dealing particularly with the question of price.

This brief review of recent events relative to energy supply and demand in Canada and of the policy actions being taken by the federal government is made at a time of unprecedented change in the country's energy economy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. minister permit a question at this point?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few minutes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just one short question. What is the estimated cost, the amount that will be in the supplementary estimate to cover the particular expenditure to which the minister has referred?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I must say to the right hon. gentleman that this will depend on the actual tax cost imposed by the various sources, but we are talking of a sum that will not be lower than $240 million for the two-month period. Depending, as I say, on what the tax cost from the exporting countries will be, it may be as high as $300 million, perhaps even more.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) noted in his opening statement on January 22 at the first ministers conference on energy that not since the world collapse of 1929 has an economic event struck so quickly and on such a scale, or produced so potentially dramatic a difference in the lives and fortunes of Canadians in different parts of the country. The more than fourfold increase in the world price of oil in such a short period of time has had even greater impact on most other countries of the world. An event of such magnitude, above all, highlights the federal responsibility to act fairly in the interest of the national economy and to ensure a just distribution of opportunity throughout Canada.

In meeting this responsibility, the federal government must not let so much of the gigantic new revenues associated with greatly increased oil prices accrue in one region that equality of opportunity and reduction of disparity become impossible in Canada. It is for this reason that a portion of the new revenues is being used to cushion the impact in eastern Canada of the huge increases in oil import costs, thereby assisting eastern Canadian consumers. This is in keeping with the objective of our Canadian community of sharing the benefits and the burdens of any such price or supply change so sudden and so great that it could seriously disrupt the national economy. The task is a major one, requiring the full co-operation of all provincial governments, but at the same time recognizing the federal government's mandate to develop and co-ordinate policies that directly affect the lives and welfare of all Canadians.

Taking this problem from the national context and putting it into the broader world context, I should like to refer to certain consultation that I have had during the past months with governments of oil consuming countries, particularly the United States and the United Kingdom, and with the two largest Middle East producers, Saudi Arabia and Iran.

As for the Middle East, my conversations there had two main purposes: first, to explore at first hand the factors which could affect the future price and security of supply of OPEC oil; and, second, to explore the interest of Middle East nations in nuclear energy and, in particular, the CANDU nuclear system. On the surface it may appear odd that oil rich nations would show an active interest in energy created out of nuclear power, but it represents a recognition on their part of the finite nature of hydrocarbon resources, a recognition which makes it attractive for them to move now to develop an electrical supply system that is not dependent on petroleum.

With regard to these conversations I can report briefly as follows. Regarding security of supply, I have received assurances that Canada is not on an embargo list and that the Arab nations do indeed recognize the different character of our oil supply and oil dependency situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The price trend for oil, however, is not at all clear. Some nations, notably Saudi Arabia, appear sympathetic to the need to move back somewhat from the present price levels at the international level, but others maintain that there is a need for further increases before the true market value of this commodity is reached.

At this point in time it is rather difficult to predict what will be the outcome of the discussions on the international price of oil. The OPEC members will be meeting around the middle of March, both for the purpose of discussing the price level that they will observe after April 1 and also for the purpose of concerting their position in relation to the meetings of the United Nations General Assembly and possibly discussions with the oil consuming nations.

The dramatic increase in international oil prices has, of course, been of serious consequences for every importing nation, but most serious of all for those developing countries which are not themselves oil producers and which run the risk of seeing at one stroke the progress they have made through development assistance lost because of an increase in the price of oil. The Shah of Iran has recognized these difficulties.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): —but pursuant to a special order made earlier this day, it is my duty at this time to interrupt the proceedings and put the question on the amendment to the amendment. All those in favour of the subamendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment Mr. Fortin which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, immediately before the decision just taken, I was discussing the reaction on an international basis to certain discussions we had with regard to the oil price and supply question. I had referred to the difficulties that the developing countries, which are not themselves oil producers, have in meeting the drastically increased cost of oil and had started to make reference to proposals which the Shah of Iran has put forward. His first proposal was for a bilateral credit to assist India in the difficulties it will have from the balance of payments standpoint in meeting its obligations for oil. The second proposal was put to the managing director of the International Monetary Fund and to the President of the World Bank. It was to set up a special fund for the purpose of defraying the expenditures, and thereby helping the developing countries with their balance of payments problems.

In general terms, the producing countries that I visited looked with some hostility on the meeting which took place among certain members of OECD and Washington—

Mr. Stanfield: Could the minister indicate whether this would be a loan to the developing countries—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: Would this be a loan to the developing countries or a grant or what?

● (1500)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Before we hear the minister, I think I should say that we ought to proceed in good order. I do not intend to refer to anybody in particular; however, if any member wishes to ask a question he should always address the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for the question. The assistance to India will be a long-term soft loan, a credit, in effect, which in due course would be repayable. The proposal with regard to the fund would be, in essence, on a grant basis. The shah's proposal is that the 12 OPEC countries, the 12 developed countries plus 12 to be selected from among the recipient developing nations, would form the board and that the first two groups, that is the OPEC countries and the consumer countries, should be responsible for annual contributions to the fund, contributions which could aggregate about $3 billion. These could be used on a grant basis for assisting developing countries with specific projects. Of course, there would be certain balance of payment benefits associated with these as well. We understand that we shall be hearing further from the Iranian government and from the officials of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank on this question.

Rather than reducing the international oil price, the Iranian government would propose to use some of the benefits derived from the higher prices for the purposes of providing this kind of assistance. In this respect there is a difference of opinion between the producing nations. The view of the government of Saudi Arabia, as expressed by the minister of petroleum in that country, is that the price should be reduced. At this point it is difficult to say what the outcome will be, except that there will be a meeting of the OPEC nations about the middle of this month. We may then obtain a better indication as to whether there is any prospect of the price being brought down, a move which in general terms this government would favour.

My visit to the oil producing countries came at a time when there was an announcement by several of the developed countries of bilateral barter deals with the oil producing countries. Canada has supported the viewpoint that in the long run, barter deals favour the strong against the weak, that is to say, favour the developed, industrial countries which have the means to secure oil, against the weaker, developing countries which do not have the same advantages. It is for this reason that I did not seek any kind of barter arrangement with the governments to whom I spoke, whether with respect to exchange of nuclear technology or any other technology.

The CANDU nuclear technology which we have developed is receiving very widespread interest among countries planning nuclear development. Recently, the British government decided to examine the possibility of purchasing nuclear power systems from foreign sources in the light of less than satisfactory results from several varieties of reactors developed in the United Kingdom. It was on that basis, and with the support of the Ontario minister of energy and officials of AECL and Ontario Hydro, that we took the opportunity of the House being in recess to press the case of the CANDU reactor on British ministers and officials.

A decision on this question has, of course, been postponed as a result of yesterday's election, and perhaps postponed for longer than we thought at the time, but we anticipate that within a matter of months a decision will be taken whether the British will proceed by way of the light water, essentially American reactor, the steam-generated heavy water reactor which has been developed by the British themselves, or possibly the CANDU system.

We stressed with the British officials the industrial opportunity which CANDU offers, not only in British and Canadian markets but in third world markets where it has an industrial potential. The low operating costs and independence of natural uranium supply are distinct pluses in favour of the Canadian system. We presented the same argument to the shah and officials of the government of Iran. That country is planning the development of no less than 20,000 megawatts of nuclear power, a development which would seem to give Canada a first-class opportunity to penetrate that market in years to come.

Turning to the international scene, hon. members will also be aware of our recent and ongoing meetings with energy officials of the United States on both a bilateral and multilateral basis. As a result of these exchanges, I feel that the views and particular problems of the respective countries are better understood and appreciated than they were before. As we enter a period of scarcity of energy around the world, it is critical that the United States as well as other major energy consuming nations recognize that the Canadian resource base is not the panacea that some tend to think it is. We must not confuse resource potential with proven and economic reserves of energy in this country.

We must also take into account the tremendous challenges that would be posed to the Canadian economy by financial, labour and materiel needs in developing our resources. I think this is generally recognized in the United States. I think, at the same time, that we have indicated our willingness to assist in so far as these limitations will permit us to do so.

I should note here that the upcoming United Nations special debate on primary commodities will present an opportunity for member nations to put forward their views on the size of the world resource of such materials and also how they should be husbanded in the face of rapidly escalating demand. I hope the debate will focus on the present wastage of these resources and the extent to which conservation measures will soften the future shock which we face.

May I now say a few words on the subject of the national petroleum corporation. As the House knows, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced last December 6 this government's intention to establish such a corporation. We feel that events since that announcement have strengthened the argument for such action, and enabling legislation will be introduced as soon as possible in this session. While the major thrust of this corporation will be in the form of exploration in the frontier areas, we are of the view that it should also contribute to the development of the large petroleum resource existing in the Athabasca oil sands both through mining techniques and through in situ extraction methods. Developments on the world oil scene over the past few months have also highlighted the potential role of such a corporation in future if government to government dealing becomes the customary manner of securing oil supplies from overseas.

I should like to clear up some misunderstanding which may have occurred following the Prime Minister's announcement regarding the $40 million which will be provided for research and development on the oil sands. The suggestion has been made that the $40 million represents the government's maximum financial commitment to the corporation. But that is for the oil sands research only. It is anticipated that as the corporation develops, the investment of hundreds of millions of dollars will be required over the early years of its operation. The government looks to this corporation to increase the Canadian presence in the petroleum exploration business and, subsequently, in petroleum production.

The corporation will, in addition to its own exploration activities, seek to participate by way of joint venture with smaller, Canadian-controlled firms which currently find it difficult to sustain the costly and lengthy exploration effort that is required, particularly in frontier areas. It may also, if appropriate, acquire firms currently active in the oil industry in Canada. Foreign investors have not been, and will not be discouraged from making investments in this industry, either alone or in co-operation with the new corporation, so long as they are compatible with Canadian interests. Canada does have, however, the financial and other capacities necessary for a more significant role in the exploration and development of its oil and gas resources, and this corporation will advance Canadian involvement in this particular area. The required investment will in due course lead to the development of more wealth in the hands of Canadians.

A final word of caution is this: the development of oil resources, particularly in the frontier areas, is an operation not free from risk. The government has enjoyed some success from its investment in Panarctic, but it should be understood as well that there will be some losses from exploration. Results cannot be expected overnight, but we expect that over the longer period of time a substantial contribution can be made both to Canadian incomes and security of energy supplies for Canada by the establishment of such a national petroleum corporation.

I express my appreciation to the House, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to complete my remarks after the vote.

● (1510)

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, just slightly more than a year has passed since the government presented its first throne speech of the twenty-ninth parliament of Canada. Being a new member at that time, I found the words of wisdom reassuring and positive and for a while had indeed thought that a minority government would truly be an effective one. At that time I listened with great interest, and even a bit of hidden enthusiasm, to the promises made but never delivered. It seems that the government probably borrowed the advertising gimmick so cleverly stated by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) last year, "Promise her anything, but give her Arpege," and used poetic licence and changed it to, "Promise them everything, but give them inflation". Therefore, I have absolutely no reason to believe that any of the promises, though they are not nearly as far reaching, made in this week's throne speech by the same government will ever be initiated, let alone carried out.

As we all know, inflation is a very serious problem. As a matter of fact, it is the number one priority as far as this party is concerned. To have inflation rise at an astounding rate of more than 9 per cent in the last year proves that either the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his government do not consider inflation to be their top priority, or they are obviously unable to cope with the problem, or both. Inflation affects every Canadian from coast to coast. When the government continually fails in any manner to effectively attempt to control this cancer, and when this same government continues to govern in its all too obvious arrogant manner by not even considering valid suggestions made by the opposition, one gets the feeling of corruption and immediate change is necessary.

In the meantime, however, Canadians continue to see prices rise astronomically, meat becomes a luxury, housing almost put beyond reach of the ordinary person, while income taxes take a bigger and bigger slice of their pay. Government staff is increasing daily. Empire-building is rampant. Budgets are being prepared as if there is no end to the tax money available and every consumer in this country is being forced to pay for the short-sighted policies that have become all too commonplace in the Liberal government.

As I have pointed out, the inflation problem is of top priority within this party and as well is of grave concern to every citizen of this country. I could continue on this subject at length, but I would only be repeating what our leader so eloquently stated in this House yesterday, and the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) earlier this afternoon.

This government not only promises legislation which it seldom delivers, but even more, they are known for their grandiose announcements, creating as much fanfare as possible. There could be no better example than the most impressive ceremony on April 15, 1972, at which the Prime Minister and the President of the United States signed the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement here in Ottawa. It was designed to restore and protect water quality in the Great Lakes and the rivers which flow into them.

Let me point out that because of the fact my own riding of High Park-Humber Valley lies on the shores of Lake Ontario, and because the once clean Humber River flows majestically through it, bringing waste, filth, as well as poison into the garbage dump which was once beautiful Lake Ontario, I can state very emphatically that the agreement signed by the heads of these two great nations seems to have become a joke which falls into the same category as most of the other Liberal promises.

This agreement, among other things, was to have programs in place by 1975 designed to achieve its objectives. It was to have achieved completion by 1975, in all municipalities, of effective waste treatment facilities, including phosphorus removal, strengthening of regulations to control discharge of sewage, garbage and other waste. We are all aware this has not been the case, unfortunately, and the individual who knows this better than anyone else is the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) who himself took part in that great flag-waving ceremony in the spring of 1972.

Somehow, due to inflationary problems of this country, pollution has taken a back seat in importance and it seems that all attempts for improvement have failed to materialize. I have tried on numerous occasions to bring this serious problem to the attention of this House on behalf of my constituents as well as millions of concerned Canadians who find it harder and harder to live by our waters. For example, on October 17, 1973, I asked the Minister of the Environment if adequate staffing and funding would immediately be provided for the proposed clean-up, as the IJC had admitted the lack of same, and if he was prepared to accelerate steps to prevent the continual discharge of water pollutants into the Great Lakes before it was too late. The minister's answer was typical; he said:

Yes, I am glad to give the hon. member that assurance.

That was more than four months ago, and to this date we have had no improvements whatsoever. Rather, we are witnessing a continual deterioration of the whole situation, not only on the American side but, unfortunately, here in Canada as well. Immediate steps must be taken in order to curb the deplorable infection of our Great Lakes and rivers by adequately staffing and funding organizations established for the proposed clean-up; and the government must, along with the United States, step up its originally scheduled program.

Over a year ago during the election campaign I, along with every other Conservative candidate, stressed the displeasure of the majority of Canadians at the very high and unacceptable unemployment insurance deficit. As recently as last week I sent out a questionnaire to my riding with two questions regarding the Unemployment Insurance Commission. They read as follows:

1. Do you believe that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is functioning satisfactorily?

2. Do you believe that there should be a full investigation of the Unemployment Insurance Commission operations?

The answer was an overwhelming 99 per cent against the Unemployment Insurance Commission functioning satisfactorily, and 99 per cent favouring a full investigation into other operations of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I have received over 1,500 replies to date, Mr. Speaker—1,500 Canadians from every walk of life and every political party from my riding, alone. I am satisfied that this statistic speaks for itself.

Again, as our leader has already made public, an inquiry into this whole matter is needed, one which really gets to the grass-root problems. Like most Canadians, I am sick and tired of the fact that the government continues to allow individuals to take advantage of the plan at the expense of the workingman and that it is virtually handing out unemployment and welfare money on a silver platter. I am sick and tired of the fact that a $500 million deficit or more is now estimated, up from $174 million at the end of 1972. The need for improved legislation in this field is of prime concern to virtually every Canadian who is fed up with the free-loaders and welfare grafters who continue to sponge off the honest toils of honest men.

During the past year our party has continually attacked the government on this matter, hoping that promised legislation would finally be enacted. In fact, legislation dealing with this very matter was prepared, with the promise of a tighter and tougher Unemployment Insurance Act. However, at the request of the NDP and because of the Liberal need to bow to their every wish, those plans were withdrawn and shelved indefinitely. This was only because of the fear the government has of offending the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and his pack of followers and losing their support.

These are but a few of the priorities facing us today, with inflation heading the list. I could touch on numerous other important matters that are of great concern to Canadians, such as the energy crisis, the abortion issue, drugs, alcohol, housing, and so on. However, as the spokesman for this party on matters relating to physical fitness and sport, I would be remiss in this obligation if I did not dwell on a matter of vital importance concerning the 1976 summer Olympics to be staged in the city of Montreal, specifically the obvious discrepancies surrounding the awarding of the American television rights by COJO.

Let me preface this statement by once again reiterating this party's support for the games. We believe now, as we did when the Olympic financing bill was finally passed, that there is a great opportunity for Canada and Canadians to benefit by hosting this prestigious international event. We must remember that the Olympics belong to Canada. They can reflect Canada to the world and they can bring to Canada a sense of pride and unity.

There can be no question that the initial stage of the lottery and coins sales are showing signs of success. I would like to take this opportunity to compliment those involved for their efforts and wish them continued success, in particular Mayor Drapeau without whose initiative the whole new Olympic concept could not have been initiated.

As I have pointed out on numerous occasions, it is not the intention of this party to wash its hands of financial responsibility and to sit idly by and permit federal funds to be in any way wasted or mishandled in the staging of this event. It is our firm and absolute intention to remain as watchdogs for the taxpayer. It was for this reason that on January 11 of this year I moved in the House a motion having to do with statements that the contract for television coverage involves an alleged gain by the Quebec Liberal Party.

On the same day I asked the Prime Minister to initiate an investigation into the many discrepancies and allegations surrounding the contract. The Prime Minister's reply was that it was not his government's responsibility. I hear members of the NDP yelling from my left that we voted in favour of the Olympics bill. Obviously they did not listen to that part of my speech in which I asserted earlier that this party supports the Olympic idea and believes in it, as it did when the financing bill was passed.

In fact, we support the Olympics taking place in Montreal. Personally, I believe Montreal to be the city best able to cope with the multitude of circumstances which arise during the staging of games. However, I want to remind the government and the NDP that more than a year ago I suggested decentralizing some of the events so that we could utilize existing centres, thus saving millions of the taxpayers' dollars while at the same time giving thousands more Canadians an opportunity to participate.

As I was saying, when I asked the Prime Minister to initiate an investigation he replied that it was not his government's responsibility. Mr. Speaker, it is inconceivable that the Prime Minister would even dare suggest that the federal government has no responsibility in this matter and that it falls under provincial jurisdiction.

Let us consider briefly the history of the awarding of the Olympics to Canada. As far back as May 21, 1969, the Prime Minister wrote a letter of acceptance to the International Olympic Committee welcoming the games on behalf of all Canadians. The position taken by the International Olympic Committee when in receipt of such a letter of government approval is that the signature implies previous knowledge of the financial planning of the games as well as of national financing plan where necessary. From that date until today, everyone connected with the Olympics, including Commission-General Rousseau, has stressed that the 1976 games do not belong solely to Montreal nor, indeed, to the province of Quebec, but that they belong to all Canadians and to all of Canada.

Is the Prime Minister now saying the federal government is absolving itself of all responsibility toward ensuring the success of the 1976 Olympics? What about the federal facilities COJO is utilizing in connection with the games, including the Post Office, the Mint, security personnel and immigration offices, not to mention the financing bill or the host broadcaster, the CBC, which alone has a budget of more than $50 million? These are all federal agencies directly connected with the government and provided for the use of COJO and, therefore, for the Olympics. Certainly the use of any one of these branches is sufficient to warrant federal supervision, if not direct control, during the games.

In these circumstances, members of this House as well as taxpayers generally are entitled to a more responsive and accurate reply from the Prime Minister. The fact that the federal government has committed more than $100 million of taxpayers' money to COJO, apart from the financing bill, means beyond doubt that the government must show concern and leadership in any of its dealings with COJO or in any involvement undertaken by it.

Now let us consider specifically the facts surrounding the signing of the television contracts for exclusive rights by the American Broadcasting Corporation to televise the games. Facts suggesting impropriety abound in this whole matter. One of the prime reasons for holding an investigation would simply be the manner in which the entire contract was negotiated by COJO. Were any other department or agency involved in a similar matter, the people responsible would immediately be discharged. The fact that no tenders were called should be sufficient ground in itself for holding the federal inquiry. But there is more.

Consider for a moment the chronological events surrounding the final awarding of the rights. The fact that no competitive bidding took place is a matter of record but, ironically, as late as December, 1972, both CBS and NBC were told by Rousseau and Desrocher that there was to be bargaining in good faith for the television rights. Yet the record will show that as far back as late November, 1972, the ABC and COJO had in fact settled on a $25 million agreement with respect to those rights. On December 14, 1972, almost one month later, CBS received an invitation from Desrocher to attend a meeting in Montreal to discuss bidding which would take place on December 20 and 21 of that year. On the same date, NBC was meeting with Mr. Rousseau in Montreal to discuss the same contract negotiations for the 20th and 21st of that month. Both CBS and NBC were not only prepared but eager to bid on the rights for these games. I quote from a letter addressed to me by CBS television network dated February 13, 1974, and signed by the vice-president, Sports, William C. MacPhail:

> The CBS television network was very much interested in the U.S. television broadcasting rights to the 1976 summer Olympic games to be held in Montreal. We had numerous contacts with the Olympic Committee—written and oral—notifying them of our interest in the acquisition of these rights.

I will come back to that letter in a minute or so. Up to this point there had been no agent on the scene and negotiations had been conducted directly between ABC and COJO. However, one Marvin Josephson of International Famous Agency of New York city came on the scene, and the American Broadcasting Corporation found it was no longer dealing with COJO directly, as in the initial stage, but was dealing with an intermediary in the person of Mr. Josephson. So let us consider these facts. First, an agreement had already been signed in secrecy between ABC and COJO without an agent.

An hon. Member: Secrecy?

Mr. Jelinek: Yes, secrecy. It was not announced. As a matter of fact, it was even denied by agents of COJO. Now an additional fee of $375,000 is paid to Josephson, an American, to negotiate a contract which has to all intents and purposes already been negotiated.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Jelinek: Later, Mr. Al Eagleson, a well known lawyer from Toronto who had just successfully sold the television package covering the Canada-Russia hockey series, as well as other sports events, protested the fact that an American agent had been given the right to negotiate on behalf of COJO, adding that he as a Canadian would have done it at no cost to COJO. It is ironic that at no time did COJO or ABC or any of the networks seek the services of Mr. Josephson in their negotiations or, for that matter, of any other agent to act on their behalf.

It is imperative that the federal government investigate the connection between the entrance of Mr. Josephson on the scene and the fact that the chief negotiator for the TV rights was one Mr. Paul Desrocher, a well known financial agent for the Quebec Liberal provincial party. Mr. Desrocher, chairman of COJO's subcommittee on television is also, coincidentally, chief organizer for the Quebec Liberal Party and Premier Bourassa's senior adviser. Add to this the fact that it was imperative for Josephson, as a matter of prestige, to secure this coup on behalf of his company, if it was to break into the sports field—something it had never done before—and that the making of money was secondary to the actual gaining of the contracts. This is what he told me face to face in an interview I had with him recently.

In light of this development and my suspicions regarding Josephson based on further comments by numerous sources in Quebec, I took the liberty to write a letter to ABC dated January 30, reading in part as follows:

> I believe that at no time were the negotiations conducted by ABC in obtaining the exclusive television rights ever shady or illegal or in any way improper. I do, however, want to reiterate my belief that somewhere along the line, funds did in fact find their way into the Quebec provincial Liberal coffers as a result of the completion of this contract.

Prior to the meeting which was to have been held in Montreal on December 20 and 21, CBS was informed that ABC had signed a contract and that it was pointless for them to show up in Montreal. I have a letter here from the CBS television network signed by the vice-president, Sports, William MacPhail. It reads in part as follows:

> In December of 1972 we were informed that a meeting would be held in Montreal with COJO for the purpose of negotiating. Later we were informed that COJO had set dates of December 20 and 21 for these meetings. On December 19 we were informed that a contract had been negotiated and signed between COJO and ABC. In view of this, we deemed it inadvisable to attend the meeting and so informed COJO.

I want to stress the point that Mr. MacPhail makes here in respect of this contract that had been negotiated and signed between ABC and COJO before December 19. Three days previous to this, on December 16, NBC was notified by COJO and ABC had indeed received the rights that all three major U.S. corporations had originally been invited to bid on, yet COJO, weeks after the agreement was finalized, had the audacity to pretend to stage a charade, open-bid meeting knowing as a fact that an agreement had been finalized with ABC. As a result of this, NBC sent a long telegram to Lord Killanin, president of IOC, on December 19 outlining their position and their concern regarding the mishandling, in their opinion, of this entire matter. Lord Killanin eventually stated:

Future television negotiations will be conducted jointly by the organizing committee and the IOC board.

We must keep in mind that up to this time the organizing committee has done all the negotiating on its own throughout the history of the Olympics. Then we have the public statement by the vice president of ABC of last Friday, as follows:

If I am to criticize the Montreal organizing committee on any part of it, it would be over not immediately announcing the contract when we reached first agreement almost a month before the announcement.

Much earlier the NBC made the following public statement:

NBC continues to believe that the procedures used to award American television rights to the 1976 Olympic games are contrary to the best interests of the people of Canada, and the American television audience and the games themselves. The organizing committee's unwillingness to follow the procedure of open bidding raises serious questions which are still unanswered.

Finally, on January 3, after all these contradictory statements, a joint announcement was made by COJO and ABC announcing that officially ABC had been awarded the television rights to the 1976 Olympics, notwithstanding the fact that the ABC board of directors in November, 1972, had approved the $25 million fee for Olympic coverage, which also was approved by COJO, subject to certain conditions that had not yet been completely finalized.

In an article published in the Montreal Star in the latter part of January, 1974, serious allegations were made concerning a request of direct payment of money to the Quebec Liberal Party for the rights to negotiate the television contract, as well as an NBC internal decision to bid considerably higher than $25 million. Most assuredly, statements with such serious implications are not made without regard to factual sources and to this end I quote an affidavit by the author of the Montreal Star article. It is as follows:

I, John Robertson, am willing to testify to the accuracy of all statements, including those attributed to others, carried under my byline in the Montreal Star in columns and news stories involving the sale of the North American TV rights to the 1976 Olympic games to the American Broadcasting Company.

Beyond this, Mr. Robertson in his own investigation over the past year has documented evidence to support most of the allegations I have brought forward. His documentation on its own proves beyond doubt that serious irregularities did indeed take place. Statements that moneys did in fact find their way into the Quebec Liberal coffers have been made by more than one source, including numerous statements made to me; but no documented proof regarding this matter has been made available.

To those critics who insist that total proof be brought forward before an inquiry is conducted, let me answer by saying that if we had all the proof, the inquiry in order to get to the full truth would not be necessary. There is just so much that any private individual can do without a public investigation. Quite obviously, I do not have the power to subpoena records and I do not have the power to call witnesses to testify under oath. Without these powers we cannot have definite proof, and a shroud of suspicion will remain over this entire affair. I have proof, however, that not only did COJO sell the rights to ABC without open bidding; they also gave them a separate agreement guaranteeing that they would be able to match any competitive bid within 30 days in the event bidding did take place.

By far the most serious piece of documented evidence I can provide is the fact that two top officials of COJO as late as December 14, 1972, some weeks after ABC had secretly acquired the rights, personally invited both NBC and CBS to come to Montreal to bid for the rights when indeed they had in fact already been sold. I repeat, the fact that they had planned to conduct this charade is proof enough that COJO tried to cover up after selling the rights secretly in order to create an illusion of open bidding.

The facts here are obvious and speak for themselves. I have made very clear the federal government's responsibility in this matter, particularly as it relates directly to several federal ministries. The contract itself paves the way for an alternate in case of an investigation and the resulting voiding of this contract by either the provincial or the federal government or by COJO itself. The entire matter in which the contract between COJO and ABC was drawn up is more than a little suspect in its make-up.

I have presented this House with documented statements involving serious conflict in times and dates, and I have presented further evidence of statements from the major U.S. television networks. With these documented facts and their surrounding discrepancies, I personally once again call upon the Prime Minister to initiate an immediate investigation, without hindering any progress to the eventual staging of the Olympic games, to once and for all clear up a situation which if left unsolved can only leave each Canadian suspicious of the entire Olympic ideal.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, for the second time since I was elected I have been exposed to a Speech from the Throne, and when I use the word "exposed" I think I allude correctly to the state of affairs in the Liberal Party and the Liberal government. I have the distinct impression that the government has run up to the public, flashed open its trenchcoat to reveal its new clothes but, much like the emperor of the Hans Anderson fairy-tale, there is nothing to show—indeed, not even the bare essentials.

The crisis of the cost of living in this country requires more substance than has been offered. For instance, it is not adequate that the government promises "reasonable food prices" when prices have been steadily rising without government intervention. The people in my riding are suffering now, never mind tomorrow. I shall read some letters which I have received from constituents over the past two weeks, to give hon. members an idea what people are up against in a real way at this time. These are the real problems, not the problems of the ivory tower where unresponsive, indecisive, banal clichés are rolled out like so much confederate money. I should like to take this opportunity during the debate on the Speech from the Throne to give real voice to the feelings of the people of my constituency.

Mrs. Valerie Barry of Nickel Centre wrote to me as follows:

I have never before this year regarded myself or my family as being poor as we have found this year. I have two children and there are thousands of people who have considerably larger families. My husband quite often works 14-16 hour days and yet I cannot afford to buy the proper kinds of food for my family. At one time if you wanted fancy foods, you expected to pay high prices for them. Now we cannot afford staples. Speaking for my own family, I have not purchased any beef for three months at least. The reason being by the time we buy bread, milk, potatoes and other groceries there is not any money left for steak or pork chops or things that I feel every Canadian has a right to. We live in the richest country in the world and yet we are deprived of eating proper diet due to ridiculous prices. As our representative, I hope that perhaps you can help us by at least working to give Mrs. Plumptre's committee some authority to get us some changes.

● (1540)

Mr. McCaughey, from Garson, writes to say:

Dear Sir:

Re the high cost of living, here is one who is very concerned with it. The Prime Minister doesn't seem to care what becomes of the voters. They will be too weak from malnutrition to get out and vote if this continues.

Instead of bread going up, why not hard liquor, cigars and cigarettes. Children eat bread, not liquor. I am on a fixed income, but I did get a raise on the Canada pension. I can get along, but it's one raise after another on staples that worries me. Why not bring the cost of living down, and then they wouldn't need to hand out these raises and everyone would benefit.

Here is a letter from someone who signs himself, or herself, "A plea for help":

Dear Sir:

Just took a few moments to sit down and write you this letter about trying to raise and feed a family of six children plus two adults. To feed and clothe, upkeep of a home is almost impossible. Sure they say that prices are according to your take home pay. Well, I say baloney to that.

Just for one instance, let's take food, which everyone needs to survive, and I don't mean steak, just a simple pot of home-made beans for a family of eight. My husband paid for 12 packages of 14 oz. (less than a pound each) $6.33 December 27, 1973, less than two months ago. And I can assure you that is used up in no time at all. Weston split-peas, one package, 16 oz., 51 cents, which was 36 cents less than a month ago. Also rice, white sugar just to name a few; also potatoes which are the main vegetable on the table.

As you have a family of your own to raise, I am sure that you will agree with me that it is a hardship to manoeuvre with no relief in sight. Even people with no children have difficulty in making ends meet where food is concerned. Clothes can be made out of hand-me-downs, or purchased at the Salvation Army, but there is no substitute for food.

Either eat or starve. We have a choice. In closing, I hope that this letter will be joined with many more in this same situation that we are in trying to raise and feed a family.

This is a letter from Mrs. Katherine Thomas of Val Caron:

This price increase is completely ridiculous. We all have heard it is caused by world food supplies. I am sorry, but I am worried about my family. It is getting harder and harder to feed my children healthy, nutritious meals when my husband's wages don't keep up with the rise in the costs of food and clothing for children. If it is hard on us with a comparatively good wage, what are the senior citizens and people classified as "poor" eating?

Please help and do something about it. Your party out of all can, with the balance of power, even if it brings an election. Maybe if an election is going to be called, a lot of things will come more clearer.

Mrs. Plumptre can't do anything and unfortunately is taking a lot of criticism which should be against the politicians who could do something but apparently don't care.

Sugar has gone up terribly, white beans, spaghetti and eggs. Good heavens, I am sure all these don't depend on anchovies off the Peruvian coast.

Take action now or I am positive the next election will prove that this is the major point in the voters' minds.

Mrs. Jennie Williamson, of Naughton, Ontario, writes as follows:

Dear Sir:

I am writing in regard to the high cost of living. My husband is a pensioner; he is 67, I am 60. We also have a 16-year old boy attending Lively high school.

As I'm sure you must know, groceries have gone "sky high". White sugar has risen from $1.43 for ten pounds to $2.54 since last fall. Honey has gone from 89 cents to $2.09. Now, how much more does it cost to keep bees today than it did three or four years ago?

I believe Dominion Stores showed a profit of 90 per cent, the highest of any chain store. Why is there not more investigating in this regard.

I would like to know what Mrs. Plumptre is doing. How could anyone on $40,000 know anything about the needs of a family on less than $5,000? What a waste of $40,000. Why can the tax not be eliminated on all clothing? Also essentials like toilet paper, soaps, cleaners, etc. My husband (Earl) worked hard all his life, and never drew unemployment insurance in his life and was never unemployed and had to retire at 62 because he has trouble with his back and legs.

Please try to do something to try to raise pensions and bring down the cost of living.

Yours truly,

Again, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. Is the hon. member rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Alkenbrack: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Does the hon. member agree to accept a question?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, at the end of my address I will entertain questions. I might point out to the House that this is the people of Canada speaking, and when the people of Canada are speaking I think it important they be on the record of the House of Commons.

Then, from Mrs. Sylvia Cheviette of Sudbury I have this letter which is addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau):

Dear Mr. Trudeau:

As the head of our country you must get plenty of complaints, but I must add one more. Isn't there anything you can do to stop the increases in all prices? All companies and stores seem to have great profits when they give out their figures. The feeds are going up for animals, fertilizers also. This means the farmer can't afford to keep a farm, and with many of them going out of business we will in a few years time have a lot less food. We have potatoes in the Valley and other areas, and when they go into our stores they charge the same that they charge for P.E.I. or N.B. potatoes. How can the prices be the same? I've spoken to some farmers and they say they don't get the difference, so where does it go?

Milk went up from 22 cents a can to 26 cents. Sugar has gone up from $1.59 to $2.69 for ten pounds, bread also. These are just a few and it's getting worse all the time. Soon we won't be able to eat because we will be getting a stub with no amount on the cheque as the deductions are getting bigger, and then the money you do get can't be stretched all that far because the prices are getting impossible.

Please take some kind of action before we are unable to eat at all.

This is a letter from the Waters women's institute in Waters township.

Dear Sir:

We are very concerned about the abrupt rise in prices for the following food items: sugar, white beans, soda biscuits, rice. We would like to have the Food Prices Review Board investigate why the prices have risen on items mentioned and if possible an answer in the news media of what they discover.

Next is a letter from Mrs. Joan Callack, of Whitefish in my riding:

Dear Sir:

It's been on my mind for a long time, I thought it's about time I did something about it, or perhaps you can do something about the problem of high prices on food, clothing, etc., etc.

My husband works every day, has a steady job, yet all we get out of his wages is our roof over our heads and groceries that last from one payday to the next, and barely at that.

We have four children, one of which attends secondary school in the next community. Also, he turned 18 years of age one month ago. We are not able to clothe this student decently. Youth allowance did help, kept him in jeans, but $20 does not buy a very good pair of shoes, though. We are doing our best but it's just not doing very good.

The next letter is from Mrs. Harrison of Chelmsford:

Dear Sir:

I would like to know when is it going to end, the price of food going up. Every time we're going to the store, it's gone up. Something must be done. All we hear is talk, but nothing being done.

Here is a letter from Mrs. G. F. Maxam of Garson:

Dear Mr. Rodriguez:

... I wish to say how disturbed I am at the rising cost of living, especially food. No doubt you will be inundated with mail concerning this state of affairs.

My husband will be retiring this spring, and although some but not all provisions are made for our welfare, I and many others wonder when it will all end. Granted, there will be only two of us, but there are those with four to six children who will find it very difficult.

Here is a letter from Mrs. Rowland of Val Caron in my riding:

Dear Mr. Rodriguez:

... We are very concerned about the rising prices on everything. I am sending you a copy of the letter I am sending Mrs. Plumptre in Ottawa, and how about going down there and trying to check things up and get an investigation going or something to bring those prices down so we can live a decent life?

Here is a letter from Ray Lagare of Val Therese, Ontario:

I would like to write a few lines to you concerning the high cost of living. In a country as wealthy as ours there is no food shortage as emphasized by the government. Some items in the large chain stores are up as much as 300 per cent in a short while, but our wages will go up a small 3½ per cent on the 10th of July. How can we manage with a family when the cost of living is increasing steadily at such a fast rate?

I think that you should stand in the House with your colleagues and tell Mr. Lewis that he has given the Liberals enough time to look at the situation through their famous Mrs. B. Plumptre and her prices review board.

I am sure the Canadian people are fed up with this kind of beating around the bush while the prices are skyrocketing.

And so the letters come from individuals and from organizations. On the other hand, all these people are aware that while they struggle to buy food and survive on their income, the food companies and other corporations in this country are not forced to engage in the same struggle. The Weston company, with its finger in the Loblaw "By gosh, the price is right" pie shows an increase in profit of more than 80 per cent. Profits for the Canada Packers and Schneider's companies are up 36 per cent and 45 per cent respectively. Dominion Stores' profits were up 30 per cent over the nine months period ending December 15.

Even Mrs. Plumptre is starting to tell the consumer some disturbing things, as in the case of the unjustified increases in the price of bread. But I need not enumerate all these, for the profits increases situation in this country has reached the point where it has become a personal affront to every Canadian who is living on a fixed income, a low wage, a middle-level income or those who are unemployed.

This is where the term "free enterprise" becomes a rather interesting description of the system under which we are living. Free enterprise for whom? No one but the companies. While the Conservatives pay homage to free enterprise on the one hand, they propose on the other hand to institute wage and price freezes. They do not propose a profit freeze but, rather, would simply freeze the prices at their inflated levels and freeze the already inadequate wages of the working people who cannot cope with prices as they are—and this despite the experience in Britain and the United States.

Not only have the companies of this country benefited from the corporate welfare lumped on them by the Liberal government, and the Conservative government before them, but they have now wrapped up the free enterprise corner in such a way as to trap the Canadian people. Where is the free enterprise in having no control over the wages coming into your pocket for a hard day of work? Where is the free enterprise in having no control over the expenditure of that money? Where is the free enterprise in paying out every cent to keep food in the body and a roof over a family?

In return for having to pay to exist, can we look around and say that this level of existence is for a good cause? Can we assure ourselves that the poor are being helped, that our aged and our disadvantaged are living decent lives, that our children will be free to pursue their own goals because of the planning that is being done today? Can we look around and find just one group of people who are benefiting from this crisis other than the directors who sit on the boards of the companies whose profits are skyrocketing?

What is this story that nothing can be done? Surely, while a part of inflation is imported, the elected representatives on this country have the brains collectively to resolve a major portion of the country's current problems. Surely, it is not enough to admit that the government is capable of administering during the booms but incapable of governing through the lower periods or the busts. The capability to govern does not exist unless it exists and works in times of crisis such as now.

Now I would like to turn my attention to my own area, generally speaking. What about the issue which the Prime Minister said in 1968 he would strive to eliminate, namely, regional disparity? Here we are, six years later and umpteen throne speeches later—the latest one on Wednesday of this week—and what is said about regional development? The throne speech contains only one line on the matter which is as follows: "The government attaches great importance to regional development".

I live in and represent a regionally underdeveloped area in northern Ontario, Nickel Belt. Indeed, all of northern Ontario is considered a regionally underdeveloped area. This area has 12 representatives in the House. In 1968, 11 of the 12 were Liberals. Today, nine of the 12 are members of the governing party with specific and responsible positions. One is a cabinet minister, one is chairman of the Liberal caucus, one is deputy whip, and several are chairmen of standing committees or parliamentary secretaries.

We who live in northern Ontario are well aware of the regional disparity between our part of the province and other parts of this country, and indeed the southern part of Ontario. It is a fair comment to make that northern Ontario exists as a colony subject to a centralist administration in Toronto and a monstrously unresponsive government in Ottawa. I have often heard it said that northern Ontario has been the backbone of federal Liberal support in Ontario. Why then do you continue to treat us in northern Ontario as the backside of Canada?

Neither is the Ontario government exempt from the responsibility of developing northern Ontario. After all, out of the 16 provincial seats in northern Ontario, the Tories hold eight, with several cabinet ministers among them. But in case you think I overstate the problem, I draw the attention of the House to the Toronto centred region plan prepared for the provincial government and accepted by the Tories as official government policy. The Toronto centred region plan states:

> There are certain reasons for the centre of development being in the Toronto centred region. They are primarily
> (i) the primacy of Toronto in social, economic and cultural life,
> (ii) the relation with other major cities in Canada, especially Montreal,
> (iii) the relation to the major markets in the United States,
> (iv) the manufacturing of the resources from northern Ontario and distribution to United States markets . . .
> The Toronto centred region population will reach eight million by 2000 A.D.
> The Toronto centred region will remain the financial, manufacturing, cultural and communications centre of Ontario and Canada, and will relate primarily to the United States.

There it is, the official view of northern Ontario as seen by the Tories who rule us from Toronto. We who live here know that northern Ontario is the repository of the mineral wealth of Ontario and indeed of Canada, yet the share of the work force in secondary manufacturing is well below the provincial and national levels. We do not have oil, but we have uranium owned by that great Tory who ran for the Conservative Party federally and was defeated. He spent $92,000.

About 30 per cent of the northern Ontario work force is employed in forestry or mining. The remaining 70 per cent is involved in the service industry. This is below the accepted ratio for service employment to other employment. Even the growth prospects under present circumstances are appalling. In the period 1966 to 1970, according to the provincial department of natural resources, mineral wealth increased approximately 70 per cent, while employment in that field increased by 5.3 per cent. This is corroborated by the Economic Council of Canada, which states that the projected growth of mining employment has been estimated to be marginally less than the growth of mining production. Indeed, Mr. J. Edward Grubb, president of INCO, speaking a few months ago in New York, stated that last year, 1973, production at INCO's operation will be accomplished by mining the highest quality ore now; in other words, high-grading ore.

Inco did it, going from a work force of 18,000 in January, 1972, to a work force of 13,000 by the end of 1973, and with its profits up 100 per cent to a whopping $227 million. Falconbridge, the other "godfather" in the Sudbury basin, had a 770 per cent increase in 1973. Indeed, when one reads what the resource industries have made in northern Ontario one is left breathless when considering the underdevelopment in that part of the country. The Abitibi company had an increase of 260 per cent, and Noranda Mines 75 per cent.

What about the federal government's view of northern Ontario? Look at the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. It was set up in 1968 and was headed by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) at a time when the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) was minister of transport. They have been playing a game of musical chairs. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion said the following to the Standing Committee on Regional Development, on April 10, 1973, four years after DREE had been established and northern Ontario had been designated as a special area:

> Northern Ontario has experienced a growth rate in population of less than 1 per cent per year throughout the decade of the 1960s, slightly below the average for the Atlantic region. It tends to be characterized by a dual economy comprising urban centres such as Thunder Bay, Sault Ste. Marie, Sudbury, North Bay and Timmins, where incomes are at or above national averages, and rural and remote areas and resource towns, where incomes tend to be substantially below the Canadian average and where economic growth depends almost entirely upon primary resource production.
> The general social and economic climate in northern Ontario suggests that special efforts will be required if there is to be a significant increase in the employment and value of production derived from the extensive natural resource base and an increase in the viability of some of the urban centres.

As recently as this week the minister announced the signing of a general development agreement with the province of Ontario in which it is stated—and this is what we have to look forward to in northern Ontario:

> Other subsidiary agreements involving regions within northern Ontario are under discussion. The first of these is for northwestern Ontario and is a regional economic package which might include resource development roads, an industrial complex feasibility study and infrastructure in selected growth centres. A second will pertain to northeastern Ontario.

We have had the study route, Mr. Speaker. Thousands upon thousands of studies have been done on how we can diversify secondary industry and undertake development in northern Ontario. That is all I have heard since coming to this place. The problem has been studied to death. The time has come for action.

One of the themes we got from DREE last year was on decentralization. But what have we found since? We have found that DREE is not decentralized into northern Ontario. As a matter of fact, it is recentralized into Toronto. Anybody who has lived in northern Ontario knows the bias displayed by northern Ontarians toward southern Ontarians. To centralize an office of DREE in Toronto, supposedly to help develop northern Ontario, shows crass treatment of the situation. Indeed, the government's concluding observation in its interdepartmental report regarding DREE's performance in northern Ontario specifically states at page 10:

> In light of these circumstances special efforts may be required to strengthen existing resource industries, encourage diversification where viable opportunities exist, and assist in the social adjustment process for those who choose to leave the communities.

The federal government ought to be looking at policies which would develop northern Ontario industrially. In this light a minerals policy which would provide for the establishment of a national minerals corporation, that would take into its portfolio the resources of Ontario, particularly northern Ontario, so that their development could take place for the benefit of our people, would be a great help. There are many reasons why our resources should be owned by the people. These include the creation of employment, the provision of revenue so that the quality of life can be improved for the people who live in the region where the resource is located and who help to mine and produce it and, thirdly, through public ownership of our resources we can maintain our economic independence.

In 1972 the Science Council of Canada released a number of reports dealing with innovations and the structure of Canadian industry. I quote from Study No. 23, which was one of the background studies for the council, as follows:

> Canada's great area of strength lies in its natural resources. With competition as keen as it is in the world today, each country must seek to take maximum advantage of those areas in which it has some comparative advantage. This, however, must not be interpreted to mean that we should further accelerate our already precipitous rate of resource extraction. Unquestionably this latter approach, coupled with massive infusions of foreign capital, could keep our GNP rising for a number of years; but before the children of today could reach middle age most of the resources would be gone, leaving Canada with a resource-based economy and no resources.

Our resources must be used as a lever in the industrial development of the province and to add more value to mined resources before exporting them. There is no coincidence in the fact that our resources, by and large, are controlled by foreign corporations and that there is little product development in the province or indeed in the country. I quote further from the same Science Council report:

> Alcan does a large part of its product development in the U.K., Inco does most of its product development in the U.S., Johns Manville . . . all of its asbestos development in the U.S., Andy and Harmon . . . silver product development in the U.S., and Engelhart . . . all research on platinum is performed in the U.S.

The Science Council continues:

> Therefore, in order to succeed in building on our resources, it will be necessary to correct this very fundamental weakness. It will be essential for Canada to develop and exercise product engineering and design capability, and this at all levels, from end product to resource.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired under our Standing Orders. However, if there is unanimous consent he may continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

Mr. Rodriguez: The private sector has failed to do what is necessary, that which not only I but the Science Council of Canada believe is critical if we are to create employment in manufacturing industries in parts of the country like my own. As long as the corporations are allowed to exploit our resources with the goal of maximizing their profits, they will never voluntarily create a viable secondary industry in this province or in this country.

Secondly, I think the government ought to consider developing northern Ontario as one special area, providing infrastructure in all municipalities where development is needed. Thirdly, often when incentives are considered, we think of incentives to corporations and business. We never think of incentives to individuals except when we want them to move from one part of the country to another. I think incentives should be given to individuals living in northern Ontario, for example, through a graduated taxation system. Such graduated tax scales could include sales taxes, personal income tax, OHIP premiums, etc. In some areas of northern Ontario there should be no gasoline tax.

Combined with incentives to individuals there should be disincentives to the wealthier parts of the province and the country, for example, southern Ontario. Those disincentives could take the form of taxation on primary resource exports, higher freight rates on shipping raw material out of the north and very cheap rates on shipping the finished product to some market.

The idea of transportation, Mr. Speaker, leads me to my fourth point. There is no reason in the world why my part of the country, northern Ontario, should be the highest freight rate area in the country. Between Levis, Quebec, and Armstrong, northern Ontario, freight rates on the CNR are the highest in the country. On the provincial government's railway, the ONR, freight rates were cut by 18 per cent. This government ought to instruct the CNR that they should cut the freight rates on that line, and ship the finished products out of northern Ontario, by the same percentage. It is interesting to note that it is much cheaper to ship raw materials out of northern Ontario than it is to ship finished products. One example is iron ore pellets. It costs $8.60 to ship a ton of iron ore pellets from Copper Cliff to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; but if you were to ship a ton of fertilizer to Toronto from Sudbury it would cost $90.80 per ton. These discrepancies can only serve to lock us into being hewers of wood and drawers of water for time immemorial.

Mr. Speaker, I make a fifth proposal to the government of an over-all industrial strategy for northern Ontario. There is no over-all industrial strategy. It seems to be always on an ad hoc basis, with the north condemned forever to being the receptacle of the raw resources. My sixth proposal is that we need a comprehensive and cohesive transportation policy in northern Ontario. We cannot have Air Canada dropping out of service from Sudbury to Timmins, or Sudbury to North Bay, without replacing that service with some kind of comprehensive program where transportation for moving people around my part of the country would be enhanced and facilitated.

Mr. Speaker, lastly I propose to the government a permanent secretariat for development in northern Ontario.

This secretariat would be resident in northern Ontario and it would comprise provincial and federal personnel from the area. There ought to be an ongoing body which would oversee development in northern Ontario and to which the people of northern Ontario could apply for redress or improvement in their living conditions.

These are only some of the proposals I make to the government with respect to development in northern Ontario which has been sadly neglected over the past 100 years. I remind the government benches that the Prime Minister was very concerned about eradicating regional disparities. We have very serious problems with respect to regional disparity, and I think it is time they were looked at. It is obvious that members on the government side who represent this area have not been raising the issues.

With regard to the pipeline, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) recently came to northern Ontario with some minions from the area and suggested a review of the route of the pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal. That is just a palliative to the people of northern Ontario. The decision was made by the cabinet. Mr. Speaker, I call on them to reconsider that decision in light of the kind of development that can take place in northern Ontario. We have been ignored too long. I call on the government to pay attention to the present situation and to take action now to correct some of these discrepancies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack) wishes to ask a question, but the only extension of time can be for the hon. member to complete his speech. Is it agreed that the hon. member should have the right to ask a question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, during his speech the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) read letters from constituents complaining about and protesting the spiralling cost of living under this government. I now ask the hon. member why he voted against the subamendment only one hour ago which indicated lack of confidence in this government in the words "... because it has not taken effective and immediate measures to stop the increase in the cost of living".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There is a very simple rule that one does not reflect upon a vote that has already taken place in the chamber.

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I should like at the outset to congratulate His Excellency the Governor General and thank him for having accepted his new responsibilities in that public service spirit that he has shown throughout his extraordinary career. As for Her Excellency Mrs. Léger, who always admirably supported her husband, we already see the stamp of her extraordinary readiness of wit and of the great warmth of personality in everything she has undertaken during the short time she has discharged her duties.

I hope I may also express the great satisfaction I find in seeing again Mr. Speaker in the Chair to preside over our debates. He shows great ability and tactfulness in the fulfilment of his duty. He succeeds in moderating our debates. He even manages to curb the eagerness for criticism which is of course the essential part of this House, provided those criticisms do not in their overzealousness, go beyond their purpose, which is to serve the people. The Speaker helps a great deal to bring our debates to the level required by the high responsibility of this House. I am also delighted to find around him the team that supports him and contributed so much to the success of the last session, which is of good omen for the session we shall now go through.

It is in accordance with the usual practice to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I must say that I am doing so today most sincerely and not only to comply with a practice of this House.

They demonstrated with exceptional eloquence their concern for the welfare of all those we are here to serve, and behaved in the best of parliamentary traditions.

While listening to them, I could not refrain from thinking that the backbenchers on this side of the House are filled with talents and, like the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I find this very encouraging and feel that, as long as the Canadian people is willing to assure us of its trust, this party in the House has the necessary personnel to come up to its expectations.

The extraordinary contributions of our members to the proceedings of the committees of the House is ample proof of this. I have been told that 77 hon. members took part in 626 meetings of the parliamentary committees which were created and in operation during the last session. Mr. Speaker, that means exceptional regularity of attendance made necessary, of course, by the existence of a minority government. The parliamentarians from this side of the House met that great challenge with honour and deserve to be lauded for their sense of service and fellowship.

They have decided to serve their constituents here although, as many of us, they would have liked to be with them more often. All of us in Parliament have suffered from not being able to communicate with our constituents as much as we would have liked.

As far as I am concerned, during the session, I had to cancel four or five meetings that had been organized in my riding in order to fulfil my parliamentary obligations. Of course I did so most regretfully, but parliamentary duty came first. You will tell me that Parliament is in minority for everybody and that my remarks are irrelevant but I would like to remind you that absences do not have the same effect for the opposition as for Cabinet members, who are vested with the initiative right of government and with the responsibility of parliamentary stability.

Our duty was undoubtedly to be here, in the House, I admit it. But is parliamentarism better served by the attitude of the opposition which takes advantage of circumstances, with many members being absent one day and reappearing the next day in number in order to force, through mean calculations, Cabinet members to be isolated from their constituents?

For if our duty lies clearly within this Chamber, it is also very important as far as the people are concerned, since we have the responsibility of maintaining contacts with the people who have elected us, of consulting them on the way they would like us to conduct the affairs of state and since we have the duty to inform them of what is happening in the House of Commons, because we are not working here for us but for them.

The Member of Parliament, the parliamentarian is so much more efficient in the House of Commons as he has the opportunity from time to time to go back to those who have elected him in order to try to understand what their aspirations are.

As a new parliamentarian, I must admit that every time I have had the opportunity of meeting the people, when I accepted to speak before a few groups, I was always enhanced and renewed by these experiences, for it is obvious that a politician is renewing only at the source of his mandate. Voters are the source of his mandate. He has the duty and the responsibility of maintaining contacts with voters.

The situation of the minority government, mainly the situation created by the opposition party, certainly prevented us from discharging this portion of our responsibilities. Because it is not as some like to say that it is by sitting on the opposition benches that one renovates oneself politically speaking. This is obvious after a session such as this one, when one sees that the opposition parties did not succeed since it is said that they are in the best possible situation to renew themselves. They did not succeed in suggesting coherent measures to deal with the problems we are facing.

But it is because, in spite of difficulties, we have kept government initiative that we still have the right, during this second session, to keep on governing.

I would like to deal very briefly with another aspect of opposition and namely that of parliamentary holidays. I do not know of any Parliament in the world sitting as long as ours. Under conditions which we all know, the opposition took advantage of our minority situation to make our task even more difficult. For example, by ignoring the school vacations, they have pursued sterile debates to try and break the morale of hon. members who saw the days passing by without being able to take turns as the opposition members did and spend some time with their families.

Particularly in Canada, the size of which is such a geographical challenge, an agreement should allow those of us from both ends of the country to meet our family obligations. The children of those hon. members have the same rights as other children and I am convinced that Parliament could meet this reality if it were not for the prejudicial game of the opposition members.

Some hon. members made the sacrifice of their holidays which they had scheduled with their family and I still remember one of them saying during a meeting:

[English]

It means a lot to me, but I would give it up because I know that this government has maintained its will to govern.

[Mrs. Sauvé.]

However, Mr. Speaker, these are situations about which we should agree so that it may be possible at least to practice this profession, which is a great one, in somewhat better conditions. I hope that the opposition has come to the end of this hide-and-seek strategy and that during this second session it will consider the House as a place of work rather than a trap to grasp power.

In this House, we discuss bills, but we can do it well only if we refer to what the people are thinking. To be able to do so, we must go among the people from time to time.

My main objective, Mr. Speaker, is of course to tell my colleagues about the part of the Speech from the Throne which deals with my department and, with your permission, I shall now talk about the business of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology and, more specifically, about the intention expressed in the Speech from the Throne to reinforce the mandate of this department.

The foundation of liberalism has always been to remain within the path of history and to favour a concentration, based upon circumstances, on the natural forces of society for the advance of humanity. From that point of view, scientific activity played a leading part and was one of the major forces in the changes since the last war.

Over the past decade, the awareness of the impact of science and technology on evolution has led us, and ours is not the only country, to re-examine that area of government expenditures. Even here, in Canada, numerous studies have been initiated on this problem. Among others, there was the Glassco Commission whose terms of reference did not include this but however it did consider that problem, the Mackenzie report, the Gendron report and, more recently, the Senate investigation on scientific policy presided by hon. Senator Maurice Lamontagne. The OECD has also initiated studies on the impact of science and technology on changes. It is perhaps the results or impact of major scientific research programs of the major industrial countries which have drawn attention on this area of government expenditures.

Arising from the success of those scientific programs which were called "Big Science", many countries have set up, as we did, a department whose function is to coordinate the research endeavours within the country and to make those endeavours contribute to the national objectives. In this respect, we ought to congratulate Senator Lamontagne for having conducted his inquiry with such strength, in spite of many criticisms at times, for in some circles what he was trying to do was very little understood, and for having wanted to make the whole country understand with this inquiry how important was the scientific activity. Senator Lamontagne's report represents six years of hearings during which groups interested in this area of activity have submitted briefs and made their opinions known. The hon. senator has published many works in which he has given us an exhaustive analysis of the state of science and technology in Canada and by which he has made us able to make comparisons with some other countries, since it was somewhat difficult to assess objectively, without any point of comparison, whether what we are doing is consistent with what is going on in other countries. He gave us the opportunity to compare with other countries. Moreover, because of his familiarity with the Canadian situation, he pointed out the weaknesses of our research network, whether inside government, in the universities or the industry, as well as the mechanisms linking this research network. The interest given by Senator Lamontagne to this question has surely contributed to the establishment of the ministry, and even today, through his studies, he has thrown much light on the ways and means to fulfill our mandate of Minister of State for Science and Technology.

Naturally, this study was a comprehensive revision of all government spending activities and this reviewing process has, in certain circumstances, troubled somewhat the scientific community. It is understandable that it should fear changes—everyone does—that it should question its necessity, that it should be afraid that new directions will disturb its projects. But in my opinion, the scientific community is in a better position to accept revision, because it is for scientists a professional fact-of-life in a way. It is the essence of scientific activity, and for this reason we have carried on this re-evaluation at a sufficiently slow pace and with great confidence, because we are certain of being understood by the scientific community. Of course, during that reassessment, we have held many consultations and I had the opportunity on several occasions to appear before groups of researchers to explain specifically what the government intends to do under the mandate granted to the Ministry of State for Science and Technology.

In the Speech from the Throne, the government is reasserting its intention of carrying out some recommendations of Senator Lamontagne and taking the necessary steps for the development of a scientific policy in Canada.

[English]

In the 1960s the world witnessed a dramatic growth of scientific activity. The international scientific race had begun, and with it realization that any concerted effort in scientific research must be tied to national goals. It was a new philosophy that was injected into the scientific activity whereby scientists were allowed to go about doing their own little thing. It became apparent that governments had to look to scientists to help solve problems of modern society. Good ideas to solve problems are not sufficient, or even useful, by themselves. Their impact has to be researched and their course prolonged into the future so we will know exactly to what that good idea will lead us. In that process, of course, new ideas will emerge in many cases which are related to the kinds of solutions for which we are looking.

Governments face the responsibility of studying the different options available to them. We now know that several options arise in the solutions to certain problems which face modern society. We can choose which options suit us best. Governments now have the responsibility to set up a mechanism by which they will be in a better position to make those choices. We now choose our futures because we have many futures ahead of us. However, we must set up the machinery to make those choices adequately. It is in order to be in a better position that the government is now suggesting the mandate of MOSST be reinforced. I quote a portion of the Speech from the Throne:

> The development and use of technology is also essential to the government's approach to increasing national economic production. Steps will be taken to obtain greater returns from industrial research and development as well as technological innovation in Canada.
> Scientific knowledge and its application is a keystone to meeting the challenges facing Canada, including those in the areas of food, energy or industrial development. The objective of the government's science policy is the rational generation and acquisition of scientific knowledge and the planned use of science and technology in support of national goals. The Ministry of State for Science and Technology will be developing national science objectives as a basis for exercising enhanced advisory and co-ordinating authority within the government. Two new granting councils will be formed, one for social sciences and humanities and the other for natural sciences.

Certain profound and important changes in public attitude toward science and technology have taken place since the 1960s. For a long time science and technology were fields which the taxpaying public supported without asking too many questions. The relationship between the taxpayer and the scientist was similar to that of a patient toward his doctor. If that relationship has changed, so has the relationship of the public toward the scientist. Taxpayers and politicians alike are no longer as prepared to finance increased scientific expenditures without the opportunity of closer public scrutiny of their activities and of participating in the decisions related to this activity. In some areas this is often perceived as a threat to science; it is perceived as a possible intention of brigading science into meeting government or political objectives.

I reiterate that the whole mandate of the ministry does not mean there is a denial of financial assistance nor of the importance of curiosity-oriented research. Nor is it a repudiation of the basic freedom of the scientist to choose his own field of research. It is a recognition of the high level of government involvement in financing research and development programs.

The people of Canada expect, and rightly so, that scientific resources should be used to solve problems of national concern. The concerns of the people and their representatives must increasingly become the concerns of the scientific community. Subjects such as environmental protection and alternate sources of energy are fields that can have a profound effect on the quality of life and are thus examples of areas where increased attention by the scientific community is indicated.

The science policy cannot be confined to specialists, be they scientists or legislators. The whole population must enter the debate. They must participate in the different choices we will want to make. In proposing these measures, we are attempting to reinforce the mandate of the ministry. We are attempting to balance the needs of the public with needs to maintain and enhance a viable and productive research and development sector within Canada.

Science policy has been described in the throne speech as "the rational generation and acquisition of scientific knowledge and the planned use of science and technology in support of national goals." This is at the base of the mandate of the ministry. As the throne speech indicates, my ministry is to have a strengthened role. Its advice will increasingly be taken into account by cabinet in relation to policies dealing with scientific and technical concerns, many of which will originate from operating departments while others will obviously be initiated within the ministry. Its impact will also be markedly increased in relation to the assessment of scientific programs and associated expenditures.

An arrangement has been worked out between the ministry and treasury board so that the ministry will be provided in advance with full information of scientific expenditures of the various departments. It will have a chance to review and assess these expenditures and it will have the responsibility of giving its advice to treasury board. Just as important, this process will lead me to publish a report on scientific expenditures at the same time as the main estimates, so that the public at large may have an opportunity to discuss those expenditures. This will afford an opportunity for all those interested in doing so to enter into discussion as to the direction expenditures in connection with science should be taking. We will develop guidelines concerning these expenditures and advise individual departments as well as treasury board in connection with specific programs. Publication of this report will offer one of the primary means of analysis.

I should like to say something about the co-ordinating mandate given to the ministry under the terms of which, when a specific area of research does not fall clearly under one department, the Minister of State for Science and Technology is called upon to act as a co-ordinating mechanism so that the departments concerned can get-together in a multi-disciplinary fashion. Our purpose is to ensure that federal scientific resources are used in the best possible way for the betterment of the quality of life in Canada. Basically, what the Speech from the Throne is saying is that the role of the ministry is being reinforced by the review assessment arrangements which have been made between ourselves and treasury board. As applied to research being carried out inside government, the objective is to ensure more cohesion and avoid overlapping.

The government also subsidizes outside research, and this comes under the same general mandate. The ministry will be asked to suggest means of improving funding structures. It will be asked to provide a definition of the roles of the National Science Council, the Science Council of Canada and the Defence Research Board. We have suggested the creation of new granting councils so as to correct imbalances between various disciplines.

Since time is running out, I think I should address myself to an area of scientific research which a number of studies have categorized as the weakest inside government. I am speaking of research and development grants in the field of applied research. Canada does grant more money for fundamental research than it does for applied research, and the imbalance will have to be corrected. This does not mean we shall deprive one sector for the sake of the other. If we do have something good going for us, that is to say an outstanding capability in fundamental research, my firm belief is that we should maintain it. Certainly, though, special attention will need to be paid to the field of applied research. Studies have shown that industrial research and development is weakest relative to other areas of endeavour, and this weakness has probably led to our poor performance in the area of high technology.

[Mrs. Sauvé.]

I think the hon. member who spoke before me made reference to this point, and a question on precisely this subject was directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) yesterday.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the minister, but the time allotted to her has expired. Is there unanimous consent that she be allowed to complete her speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Yewchuk: No.

Mrs. Sauvé: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was about—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Again I must ask the minister to excuse me. I believe the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) has a point of order.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, when you asked whether the minister should continue her speech, I said no.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will put the question again. Is there unanimous consent for the minister to complete her speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Yewchuk: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimity.

Mr. Bell: May I ask Your Honour to try once again? There has been latitude given to members on both sides of the House. Next week, perhaps, we should follow the rules strictly; but today, certainly, I am sure our members will agree to the minister being given an extra minute or two. We ourselves, yesterday, were given considerable latitude.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I again present the request to the House. Is the minister given unanimous consent to extend her remarks?

Mr. Yewchuk: No.

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I shall try to be brief.

Mr. Yewchuk: I said no.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister apparently did not hear the "no" which I heard. She has not been granted extra time.

Mr. Bell: That's women's lib. for you!

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would offer the congratulations of all my constituents to His Excellency Governor General Jules Léger and to Madame Léger. I trust good health will be afforded them so they will be able to devote their lives to enhancing the spirit of good will among all Canadians.

Experience has taught me that I should never enter into a debate with those of the opposite sex.

Mrs. Sauvé: Why not?

Mr. Towers: I should like to congratulate the minister on the latter portion of her speech, but I take exception to the earlier portion in which she referred to debates in this House as being sterile. The only reason for debates in this House being sterile is the government's failure to act or to take the initiative on the basis of the advice offered during those debates.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), while he is a fine gentleman, stated on February 28 that more was accomplished in the first session of this parliament than would normally be accomplished in five or six years. My response to that observation is to express disappointment that the previous session produced so little, due to lack of leadership and good management by the the government. If parliament did such a good job in 1973 to the extent that it exceeded five or six years' work, it is not surprising that Canada is in its present state of distress and hardship. We must remember that 60 per cent of our current inflation of over 9 per cent has been induced by this government—in other words, over half—and all the mumbling and jumbling of words by government members to try to say otherwise cannot alter that fact.

Canadians are entitled to, and expect, efficient administration, but their hopes are fading fast, particularly when the cost of government itself continues to multiply without any attempt to cut expenditure or to consider the sacrifices many taxpayers are forced to make to meet tax demands. Let the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) remember that it was the taxation policy of government which divided and destroyed the 12 tribes of Israel and has destroyed empires since.

Let me give a few examples to illustrate the lack of planning, and mismanagement during the first session of the twenty-ninth parliament. When the crop insurance bill, Bill C-129, was presented to the House the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wanted it pushed through without debate. Apparently he does not have any idea of the requirements of an appropriate crop insurance scheme. It would be more sensible and just to leave that type of legislation to people who do know what is necessary to provide an adequate system of protection for farmers. Even the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) travelled across this country condemning members of the official opposition for questioning the bill, suggesting we were holding up its passage because we were asking the minister to consider our proposals which were sound and proper. Evidently he never intended to use any of our suggestions in spite of the fact that he knew they would have been of benefit to the Canadian producer.

The bill was passed in its original form, with the result that producers within the province of Ontario do not receive any extra protection for their crops, and those in other provinces gain very little. Bill C-129 certainly does not give the minister much on which to hang his hat, if through it he is supposed to improve production and protect the agricultural industry. It is to be hoped that legislation to be introduced during this session will be of a wider range and more in line with what is required.

In addition to the weaknesses of Bill C-129, the government failed to provide adequate policies on energy, agriculture, expansionism in industry and manufacturing, an efficient unemployment insurance program, transportation, and numerous other matters. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is of the opinion that the legislation introduced in the previous session reflects good government, he does not know what is required of government or of parliament and his feelings are very different from mine.

Government is probably the biggest business in Canada today. If any other business was administered on the basis on which this government is administered, its life would be very short indeed. I agree with the government member who said he would not stand for election in the next campaign because, he said, "I still happen to believe that no one, including government, should spend more than they take in". He said that his views were not fresh in this modern world. However, like the hon. member, I would rather be termed old-fashioned than disinterested, arrogant and unaware of the problems and wishes of the people I represent and of Canadians in general.

At the western economic opportunities conference, representatives of the federal government did not have anything to offer. All the western premiers knew the needs and desires of their provinces, but this government again failed to present any suggestions or ideas to meet their demands. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) did manage later on to set up a confrontation between his government and the province of Alberta on the energy issue by his irresponsible conduct and attitude. If the Prime Minister had been at all concerned about the interests of the provinces in this country and their retention of natural resources, he would have removed that minister from his portfolio.

During the national energy conference, the maritime provinces were justifiably disturbed by the discrepancy in the cost of energy to their provinces compared to that in the central, manufacturing area of Canada. The producing provinces were worried lest they would not receive value for their natural resources. I ask the Prime Minister whether he considers it just to take a natural resource—I am thinking primarily of oil—away from a province and then, before it is used, allow the provincial and federal governments to levy a tax on that product. It would seem to me reasonable that the producing areas should receive maximum value for their product and the federal government could find its revenue elsewhere.

The minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board promised to bring in legislation which would provide an equitable selling price for feed grain across Canada, and at the same time correct the inconsistencies in freight rates. He did introduce a policy on grain, but he did not present any regulations to correct the freight rates situation. So until the next crop year the western producer of red meat is being placed at a severe disadvantage. Feed grains move east at Crowsnest rates, plus feed freight assistance; western meat goes east at regular domestic rates, leaving the western producer with a loss of approximately $5 per hog compared to his eastern counterpart. On an annual prairie production of four million hogs, this alone means a disparity of $20 million in the western provinces.

In the 1973 budget the federal government started to meddle with the beef industry by removing the import surcharge. Last August, without any warning and while parliament was not in session, this government created a chaotic situation for all beef producing provinces by imposing a surcharge on beef exported to the United States. This is another example of an inept government causing hardship through inconsiderate interference.

On that particular day I was having lunch with the manager of a western Canada packing plant. We knew that the cabinet was meeting to make a decision. When the manager asked me if I thought the federal government would impose controls, I said that I hoped not because there had already been too many government controls put into effect. My feeling was that such action would not achieve anything but would disrupt the industry, and that surely the Minister of Agriculture would be wise enough and would have sufficient influence on cabinet to prevent this move. I naturally thought that, should the government decide to place a tax on beef going to the United States, this would not come into effect in the middle of a week. However, as everyone knows, that is exactly what the government decided to do. It announced controls on beef exports late on Monday evening. That asinine move at an inopportune time cost producers of beef thousands and thousands of dollars. One man lost $5,000 on just one shipment. Had he not been deprived of that $5,000, it would have counteracted to a degree the losses he is experiencing today.

The Minister of Agriculture must know very well that there are many feed lots in western and eastern Canada which are only partially in use. Let me impress upon this government that there will be fewer animals in feed lots this coming year than there have been for a long time. People do not forget, nor can they overlook the careless handling of their very livelihood by a mismanaged government which panics and reaches decisions without regard for the implications and hardships which follow.

I would urge the government, for the benefit of all Canadians, to recognize the seriousness of the situation faced by the red meat industry. The inequity the government has created in the hog industry as between east and west has resulted in hog producers cutting down production. In the hog industry, apparently the proper ratio is the slaughter of one full grown sow to 20 market hogs. In the past several months the ratio has been one sow slaughtered to 13 market hogs—quite a cutback—which means that we will be short of pork in this country. The cattle industry is in the same position. People are fed up with the meddling and unnecessary interference, plus the lack of consideration and sound policy on the part of the federal government which would encourage production, at a time when the world is hungry and there is a 5 per cent shortfall in the production of grain.

Canada imported over 70 million pounds of beef last year. In 1974 the amount will no doubt be greater. In 1972 this country imported under 30 million pounds of butter. For 1973 the estimated figure is in the neighbourhood of 50 million pounds. Milk production dropped by 5 per cent last year also. Where does this government think it is leading the Canadian people, or where is it pushing them, when we cannot even supply our own requirements, with all the potential and the ability that we possess to produce?

[Mr. Towers.]

Problems within agriculture are mounting. Farm labour is in short supply and producers are becoming discouraged because the government does not care enough to provide an atmosphere in which the industry can survive. All we can do right now is to await with anticipation the legislation that the Minister of Agriculture is supposed to be bringing forth. But we in the official opposition wish to warn him now to take note that we will continue to scrutinize his proposals to see whether this time there is anything that can benefit the producer and consumer. When production decreases, the producer suffers and every consumer suffers. Vast numbers of Canadian consumers are now suffering and can only look to additional hardship as a result of the inefficiency of this leaderless, "don't care" government.

Why is this government not doing something now to alleviate the bottleneck in the grain industry? What does it need to see the light? Twelve ships are waiting at the west coast to load grain. The grain is not there. There will be ten more ships docking next week. Demurrage charges are mounting. Elevators are plugged. Farmers are anxious to move their grain before spring break-up and seeding commences. This government sits on its hands in Ottawa while the Wheat Board asks farms to deliver their grain. Anyone in the know realizes why there is frustration within the agricultural industry.

When the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) announced the current local initiatives program, he asked members of parliament to co-operate so that the program could fill the need in the most deserving areas. He requested advice on projects which would be most suitable. I know that some members would not have anything to do with this controversial program due to previous examples of poor judgment and abuse which they could not stop no matter how hard they tried. But I believed it to be my responsibility to try to offer some advice, to help my constituency and to help the minister. His request was complied with: a constituency advisory group was set up and there were several projects to submit. In November of 1973 I informed the minister, through his staff, of three projects that I considered to be worth while to the communities concerned, and I Informed him by letter directed to his office. These were projects from which there would be continuing benefit; in other words, the money would not have gone down the drain.

In order to try to get these three projects approved—and they do not go beyond the total allotted to my riding—I made numerous telephone calls and finally contacted a member of his staff. But I ran up against a stone wall and the three projects have not yet been accepted. On countless occasions calls were placed to the minister directly and the promise given that he would return my call. I am still waiting for that call. Four months have passed and I have not received an answer for my constituents. They are waiting and so am I. No other business could function or remain solvent under such sloppy management; and I do not conduct my constituency business in that manner either.

Add this frustration to that faced by producers, manufacturers, small businesses, the construction industry, the legitimately unemployed and you have a vague idea how a power-hungry, couldn't-care-less government carries out its duties and responsibilities.

The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) gave sound advice to the government, but apparently they do not intend to follow his advice. What about inflation, anyway? Obviously, the government members do not have any proposals of their own to curb the rising cost of production. As an example, last winter we saw a rise of from 100 per cent to 150 per cent in the price of anti-freeze alone. We have seen a fearful rise in the cost of food. Sugar alone is up 50 per cent. What will this do to beekeepers who require vast quantities of sugar to provide for hives until the productive season commences? This perhaps will answer the question of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), who raised the same point this afternoon. I received a call from a constituent who will need 15 tons of sugar. What will this 50 per cent hike do to the price of honey?

A contractor asked me for information on the continually spiralling cost of construction material. He was considering a contract to extend over 18 months and involving $500,000, but was afraid to enter into a binding agreement without any control being placed on the skyrocketing rise in price for the material required.

Let me give you an example, Mr. Speaker, of the prices of different types of material. In December, 1973, the price of two-inch pipe per 100 feet was $112.50 in February of 1974 it was $211.20, a 90 per cent increase in price. Three-inch pipe in December was $150 per 100 feet; in February it had risen to $251.20. Four-inch pipe was $159 per 100 feet; in February it was $310. As I said, Mr. Speaker, that is a 90 per cent increase in four months. How can this contractor submit a contract and feel financially safe?

On top of that, there is a shortage of material. He normally orders 100 tons of sheet steel one year and 200 tons the next year. Normally he uses 150 tons of steel. In January, February and March he ordered 100 tons of steel; he received no allotment. For April, May and June he ordered another 100 tons of steel; he was allotted 40 tons. How can these people survive in conditions such as this and with a government that stands idly by and allows this sort of thing to take place? What can such soaring costs do but hamper home construction, industry, in fact any type of business, not to mention the wage earner who finds himself with less to spare for food and other necessities of life as each month goes by?

We all know how important it is for a young couple to be able to acquire their own home. At today's prices, most newly married couples cannot even save the down payment. And if they are fortunate enough to squeeze out the down payment after much scrimping and sacrifice, they cannot meet the monthly payments. When they look ahead and realize that they will be paying three or four times the contract price for their home due to high interest charges, life immediately becomes less interesting and they have a feeling that they will be plodding to pay for most of their lives. If homes were available at decent or reasonable amounts there would be fewer social problems. Young families should not be compelled to live under circumstances that place pressures on marriages and where children enter the world with unhappy, disillusioned parents.

Surveys conducted on crime have revealed that the majority of offenders come from environments of uncertainty, and in some cases have parents who were burdened beyond their ability to meet the demands that society had placed upon them. Those of us who have never had to stop to think about purchasing a home, or who have never felt insecure in our family life, perhaps cannot visualize what the day to day scrimping, worrying, never-ending anxieties can do to a person's general outlook. I do not think it would be unfair to say that the federal government could cut some of the many millions of dollars it now proposes to spend on government structures, which are certainly not needed. Renovations, expensive trappings for offices, multiplication of staff, uncalled for trips by government officials and public servants could total several million dollars.

Almost daily we have new reports of fantastic plans for growth in buildings and other government expenditures. I do not believe this is at all necessary at a time when so many taxpayers are finding it impossible to even purchase food and other daily requirements. A cutback in unnecessary government spending would be a step in the right direction. This is a step this government has never been prepared to take, but I hope that it will be taken during this second session of the twenty-ninth parliament. There must be a start some time—and it should be now during this serious time of inflation in the year 1974.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

At 5:12 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

TRADE

LAW GOVERNING FOREIGN-OWNED COMPANIES LOCATED IN CANADA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerns the immediate danger of the loss to Canada of a sale of locomotives worth $25 million to Cuba and the potential loss of much more in the early future as the result of the failure of the government to make unequivocally clear that all companies operating within Canada are to trade according to priorities established by the government of this country and not to be subservient to foreign law. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House instructs the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) to make a statement in this House within 48 hours asserting the primacy of the above-stated principle for all foreign-owned companies located in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROPOSED INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I am sure the matter is of such importance that the Prime Minister will be familiar with it in any event. I should like to ask whether the government has taken appropriate measures to prevent unreasonable increases in bread prices? Can the Prime Minister tell the House what action the government has taken since last Friday?

● (1110)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Since last Friday?

Mr. Stanfield: Since last Friday when the minister spoke.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The minister has been in communication with many of the important sectors of the baking industry. He has secured assurance from some of them that they would not increase the price by four cents. He is in the process now of trying to nail down this agreement, as it were, and I am certain he will want to report on the good news if indeed it materializes as we hope it will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who has now entered the House. I should like to ask him specifically what action he has taken to prevent an unreasonable increase in the price of bread and, more specifically, whether he has told the bakeries what bread price increase the government considers to be appropriate and will permit and, if so, what price increase has been authorized?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Friday afternoon I asked the Bakery Council to transmit to their members my request that they not increase the price of bread beyond the level considered acceptable by the Food Prices Review Board until they have held further meetings with the board. I have just received a message, which I will attempt to paraphrase, from the Bakery Council of Canada.

"Many bakery companies have agreed to restrain their increases to every extent possible. Other bakeries have already incurred cost increases of such magnitude they are simply unable to agree to any change from their action for even a week. They recognize, however, that competitive market pressures will undoubtedly force restraint. In the Bakery Council's overall assessment of the situation, therefore you can expect the general restraint of one cent per 24-ounce loaf through the month of March. This would indicate a move of two cents per 24-ounce loaf in most markets and three cents a loaf in some. This would be broadly in line with the Food Prices Review Board recommendation." The council completes its message by saying it "shall proceed to resolve a further meeting with the Food Prices Review Board as quickly as a satisfactory meeting format and date can be arranged."

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: Big deal!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the response seems to be a little vague in some respects with regard to any assurance, can the minister indicate to us what position the government is in fact taking, whether the government is simply leaving it to the further discussions that are to take place in the hope that something satisfactory will happen, or is the minister indicating to the industry what price increase the government considers to be acceptable?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend's question is really hypothetical. I can just reiterate the message I have received from the Bakery Council to the effect that "in the bakery council's overall assessment of the situation therefore you can expect the general restraint of one cent per 24-ounce loaf through the month of March." They conclude by saying that they will proceed to have "a further meeting with the Food Prices Review Board as quickly as a satisfactory meeting format and date can be arranged."

PROPOSED INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—PURPOSE OF FURTHER MEETING BETWEEN BAKERY COUNCIL AND FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Food Prices Review Board had in its possession prior to the publication of its report the confidential financial statements of the bakeries, would the minister indicate to the House what purpose is to be served by a further meeting between the Bakery Council and the Food Prices Review Board unless it is to permit the Bakery Council a further opportunity to bamboozle both the government and the board into permitting an increase which at this point they have publicly stated is not justified?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Food Prices Review Board issued a report stating what increase in the price of bread it considers justified. It seems to me there would be good grounds for allowing the Bakery Council a chance to state its position and discuss it with the board so that any further action that would be required would be taken in light of that further discussion. I think the important thing to note is the message I received from the Bakery Council indicating that in its view there would be restraint for the month of March on bread prices to the level considered acceptable by the Food Prices Review Board.

Mr. Grier: In view of the fact the assurances from the Bakery Council quoted this morning by the minister have a hole in them large enough to drive a bakery truck through, may I ask the minister what steps the government is taking to equip itself with the power to force a roll-back either of these prices or any other prices which in the view of the board are not justified and which the retailers and wholesalers are unprepared to roll back?

Mr. Gray: The Prime Minister stated last September and in August, if I am not mistaken, that the government would be prepared to take further action where there were unwarranted price increases, as determined by the Food Prices Review Board, which the parties were unwilling to correct voluntarily. I think the important thing to do is to see the results of this effort that has just been announced. Certainly this is not the time to announce a further policy in this regard, not until we have seen the results of these efforts.

POSSIBILITY OF VIOLATION OF COMBINES ACT BY BAKERIES—LEGISLATION TO PROTECT CONSUMERS AGAINST FURTHER INCREASES IN BREAD AND MILK PRICES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if during the course of his discussions with the Bakery Council on Friday he discussed with them the implications of the Combines Investigation Act? I ask that question in view of the reference made to this by the Food Prices Review Board in its report. May I also ask the minister why he did not contact the Bakery Council when the Food Prices Review Board first reported on February 18?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all, the Food Prices Review Board report of February 18 was stated to be a preliminary one. I personally thought it advisable to consider what further action should be taken in light of their more complete report, and promptly on its receipt action was taken.

With respect to the first part of the question, I certainly did not think it proper to go into the type of area my hon. friend has mentioned. I said in the House on Friday that that aspect of the Food Prices Review Board report has been drawn to the attention of the director and certainly he is in a position to carry out his responsibilities under the law.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the fact the minister has not received a total commitment from the Bakery Council and in view of the anticipated increases that can be expected not only in bread but in milk as well, I ask the minister what immediate steps the government proposes to take in a legislative way to protect the consumers of this country from any further increases in these two very basic staple foodstuffs?

Mr. Gray: The government will be prepared to take appropriate action where necessary as it has demonstrated its commitment and ability to do over the past months.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We should try to complete the first round of questioning. If hon. members have more supplementaries on this subject we might return to it later.

Oral Questions

TRADE

CUBAN ORDER FOR LOCOMOTIVES PLACED WITH MONTREAL FIRM—RESULTS OF REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last week I asked the minister if the government had been attempting to facilitate the sale of locomotives to the government of Cuba and he informed the House that some communication had taken place between our government and the government of the United States. Is he now in a position to inform the House what the results of that communication were?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have no further word at the present time.

APPLICATION OF CANADIAN RATHER THAN U.S. LAW TO SUBSIDIARIES OF AMERICAN COMPANIES OPERATING IN CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister follow the example of Argentina which declared unilaterally that corporations operating within its borders, whether they are subsidiaries of United States companies or not, must operate according to Argentinian law, which led to American subsidiaries in Argentina going to Cuba last week on their own without consulting the United States and obtaining rather substantial orders for their products?

● (1120)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): So far as I know, Mr. Speaker, corporations in Canada do obey Canadian law. If the hon. member has some evidence that they do not obey Canadian law, I would like to have it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will be recognized for a second supplementary, following which the Chair will see the hon. member for Roberval.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the fact the firm in question in Montreal did exactly what firms now operating in Argentina no longer do, namely, consult its parent body in the United States before proceeding to sign a contract, would the minister assure the House that this is not in fact the general operating procedure for firms within Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, that, of course, is a different question. I can assure you that the government of Canada, at all levels, has been making representations to the United States government. My colleague, the Minister of Finance, has been in touch with his counterpart in the United States. My department has been in touch with the State Department. Dr. Kissinger has been away. The matter has now been brought to his attention, and we hope it will have a good outcome.

QUEBEC—PETITION REQUESTING SUBSIDY FOR PURCHASE OF SEED GRAIN

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Can he tell us if he is aware of a petition signed by all the farmers of the Roberval-Lake St. John area asking for subsidies for the purchase of feed grain this spring? If so, did he give a positive answer to this request?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I did not catch the translation. Did the hon. member say feed grain or seed grain? I do know a request for aid of some kind has come in from the farmers of that area, but I am not in a position to say what action is going to be taken.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I was speaking of seed grain. Everybody knows that this year we are in short supply due to the weather. We are worried about seed grain.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of their request, but no action has been taken up until this time. We are consulting with the provincial authorities.

AIR TRANSPORT

CRASH OF TURKISH PLANE IN FRANCE—SUGGESTED PROVISION OF DEATH PENALTY IN CASES OF INTERNATIONAL TREASON

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. While as yet there is no direct proof that the awful air tragedy which occurred yesterday in the crash of a monster Turkish aircraft in France was caused by international revolutionaries, this is suspected. In recent cases it has been established that there seems to have been a war declared against innocent pilots, crews and passengers on airliners. In view of the fact that the taking of a fellow human being's life in war is justified, and as this is war that is taking place today against innocent people, has any consideration been given by the government, in collaboration with other governments in the western world, to providing that in cases of international treason such as this the penalty shall be death?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman knows, Canada has been in the forefront of the countries that have been trying to get effective international action. We are prepared to take all measures necessary to prevent hijackers operating from Canada. We have been endeavouring to get agreement that there shall be no safe haven for hijackers. This would be the most effective measure that could be taken. Unfortunately we have not been able to get the agreement of all countries in the world.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, as one who has been an avowed opponent of capital punishment within one's own country I ask this question: Does the minister not consider that this, the latest of several tragedies and the greatest of all, demands not only that the wrongdoers shall not have refuge in any country but that each of the countries within the western world should in fact regard what has taken place as international treason and thereby subject to the penalty of death?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all share the abhorrence of this dreadful crime that has been committed, if in fact it has been committed as the hon. gentleman said—but the problem is not the punishment; it is bringing these people to trial anywhere in the world.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A very weak answer.

TRADE

CUBAN ORDER FOR LOCOMOTIVES PLACED WITH MONTREAL FIRM—BASIS FOR CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary arising out of the answers given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby regarding possible trade with Cuba. If I understood what the minister said, it was that the Canadian government was making representations to the United States government regarding a possible deal. May I ask the minister on what basis it is necessary for the Canadian government to request the intercession of a foreign government in an export deal between a Canadian company and some other country? Is it not time for this kind of thing to end so far as Canada is concerned?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It ended under my administration.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I entirely agree with the hon. gentleman that this kind of action is most undesirable and does not promote good relations between our two countries. But may I say to him that it is not any law of Canada that has been broken but it is a law of the United States that is in question. Americans are being prosecuted in the United States, or could be, for actions taken in Canada. I agree with him that this is most reprehensible, but one has to change the laws of the United States, not of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: It ended under my administration.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. When the hon. member rose on a supplementary to the previous question we were on a question asked by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I believe the hon. member for Edmonton West has a supplementary to that question, following which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Dauphin.

AIR TRANSPORT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, reverting to the question asked by the right hon. member for Prince Albert and bearing in mind the concern the minister expressed about the difficulties of apprehending and bringing these people to trial, surely all that is involved is the law within Canada relevant to incidents of this kind. Does the minister not agree that what we do in Canada is not dependent upon what is being done abroad and that the answer is a change in the law of Canada for this particular type of heinous crime?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, whether capital punishment should be restored for a crime of this kind is for the House to decide, but to change the law in Canada would not prevent a Turkish airliner from being destroyed in France, resulting in 350 people being killed. Changing the law in Canada is not going to change that, I regret to say.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PRICE INCREASES—MINISTER RESPONSIBLE FOR STUDY AND ASSESSMENT—GOVERNMENT GUIDELINES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. In the Speech from the Throne the government stated that it would "cushion consumers against sudden and disruptive price increases in essential commodities". Can the Prime Minister tell the House which member of his cabinet has been given the over-all responsibility for the study and assessment of such price increases?

Mr. McGrath: Not the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, that is obvious.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would repeat the position stated by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, which is the position I took last August and September, that if we have to bring in legislation it will be brought in in the name of the government by one of the government ministers.

Mr. Ritchie: Has the government laid down the general guidelines that will apply to determine what is "disruptive" and what are "essential commodities"? Have these criteria been established with regard to any increases in prices of commodities as of now?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member refers to my statement he will see, I believe, what he calls general guidelines. The nature of the disruption, its magnitude and its effects on the Canadian economy are, of course, matters for political judgment. I hope the opposition party, as well as the government, recognizes, for instance, in the case of oil, that there have been disruptive events which have caused undue rises in the price of oil internationally.

DAIRYING—INCREASES IN PRICES OF FEED GRAIN, SEED, BINDER TWINE AND OTHER FARM NECESSITIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. With the cost of feed grain, seed, binder twine and many other farm necessities rising by 100 per cent to 300 per cent, what steps is the minister proposing to prevent the complete disintegration of the dairy industry in Canada?

• (1130)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I held ongoing meetings with the dairy farmers while parliament was in recess. I have made a submission to my colleagues that will be dealt with shortly, as I promised the dairy farmers of Canada, because I realize the importance of this industry to our nation, as I think all Canadians do.

Mr. Ellis: I know the minister has been talking about this matter, but will he tell us whether he will support the requested $2 increase in the industrial milk price?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we agreed with the dairy farmers of Canada to submit a ten-year program for the dairy industry, not a year to year program. That is the end toward which we are working.

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO COMPEL USE OF SEAT BELTS IN AUTOMOBILES

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that at a recent meeting of the federal and provincial health ministers mutual agreement was reached that the compulsory use of seat belts would indeed cut traffic deaths by 700 annually in Canada, could the minister inform the House whether a concrete consensus was reached at that meeting to have such legislation introduced in the provincial legislatures, as I understand that such legislation falls under provincial scope?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there was unanimous agreement among the provincial ministers of health that such a measure would be appropriate. Obviously, this is a matter for the ministers to raise with their provincial colleagues in each cabinet, and it would be up to each provincial government to decide if and when such a measure would be implemented.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED FLOODING OF SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES—JOINT POLICY

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. It involves the Skagit River problem in British Columbia. I have given notice to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell the House what federal-provincial negotiations relating to terms of settlement of the Skagit River issue with Seattle have taken place since June, 1973?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a great deal of negotiations has taken place. I cannot say that negotiations have been completely concluded, but I can say, to reassure those who are concerned about the flooding of the Skagit, that the federal government is presenting before the Federal Power Commission of the United States, before the deadline of March 15, a very substantial brief against the flooding. As of this day I cannot indicate whether or not that will be a brief presented with the support of the government of British Columbia, but the federal government is presenting that brief, regardless. If the hon. member wants to ask a question closer to the deadline, perhaps I may have further news for him regarding the nature of the presentation.

Mr. Fraser: I thank the Prime Minister for his answer. I wonder if he could be a little more definitive in telling us whether, at the present time, any joint federal-provincial policy on a basis of settlement has been achieved?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I suppose it would be fair to say that there is, presumably, agreement on the part of both that the Skagit should not be flooded, but the way in which the representations should be made to the Federal Power Commission has not been agreed on by the government of British Columbia. The position of the federal government is that the two principals in this question are the government of British Columbia, which has received over a period of many years compensation from the city of Seattle in lieu of the flooding in order to pay in advance for the flooding, and the city of Seattle. The federal government is acting particularly as an authority in international dealings. We are attempting to put the case for British Columbia as strongly as we can because we are irrevocably opposed to the flooding. Whether British Columbia wishes to support us in this presentation has not yet been determined.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings has a supplementary to a previous question. He will be recognized for that purpose and the Chair will then see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

POSSIBILITY OF FORGIVABLE LOANS AT LOW INTEREST RATES TO ASSIST FARMERS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture following the question put to him by the hon. member for Hastings. Keeping in mind the statement in the Speech from the Throne with regard to assisting farmers, does the minister anticipate that forgivable loans at low interest rates will be part of the legislative package he will be presenting to Parliament in the near future?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would be wrong if I said it has not been considered, but it has not been finalized, either.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

RECIPIENTS OF WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES, OLD AGE SECURITY AND GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT—PROVISION OF COST OF LIVING INCREASES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the fact that on both December 10 and January 3 the minister said that the necessary steps would be taken so that veterans in receipt of old age security and the guaranteed income supplement on the one hand and the war veterans allowance on the other would get the cost of living increases in both those benefits which were due in January, whereas the order in council permitted them to get the OAS and GIS increase but not the WVA increase, will the minister say whether this question is being reviewed?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this matter is being reviewed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

MEDICAL RESEARCH COUNCIL—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN BUDGET EQUIVALENT TO RISE IN COST OF LIVING

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and is related to the Medical Research Council. In view of the serious cutbacks in medical research in Canada and in view of the possible brain drain resulting from the lack of funds, will the minister give his assurance that the moneys allocated to the 1974-75 budget of the Medical Research Council will be increased by an amount at least equivalent to the rise in the cost of living, calculated on the total expenditures in 1973-74 including the belated $1 million grant which of course was far too little and too late?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is entitled to his opinion on this matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS TO FRANCE AGAINST BOARDING OF "GREENPEACE III" BY FRENCH SAILORS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the government's announced grant of $12,000 to Captain David McTaggart of Vancouver to enable him to return the Greenpeace III to Canada, and in view of the minister's statement in the House that he has been pressing the Greenpeace case with the French government, will the minister now tell the House what official action has been taken by the Canadian government to protest the boarding of this Canadian vessel and what has been the response by the government of France?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have made presentations to the foreign minister of France on a number of occasions. My department has made direct representations to the government of France through the embassy. We are now in process of deciding in which way to press our case against the French government and the decision has not been finally made.

IMMIGRATION

REASONS FOR REQUIREMENT OF FIRM JOB OFFER OR POSSESSION OF SKILL NEEDED IN CANADA

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the minister responsible for immigration. It is based on the fact that he has produced some important changes in the regulations regarding immigrants. Immigrants are only to be admitted if they have a firm job offer or if they possess a skill needed in Canada. Keeping in mind that there is a task force working on immigration and that the minister has been asking for suggestions from the Canadian people, can the minister tell us why he was in such a rush to bring in these changes? What was the main reason? Has he concluded there will be a higher level of unemployment in Canada this year? What was the main reason?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the interim changes in the points system, which were made by regulation, came about after five or six years of no change in the initial point system as developed, I think, in 1967. We made the decision to make these changes, based on analysis of the pattern of employment and other matters affecting immigrants over the last three or four years. The information has been made available to us recently. We know that there is a higher incidence of unemployment among immigrants who have no occupational skill capabilities. With the increasing number of applications from abroad we thought that this would be the propitious moment to make the change. It does not preclude, of course, further adjustment, as the ongoing, more profound immigration policy review is completed.

Mr. Alexander: Is it the intention of the minister to continue arbitrarily to change the Immigration Act and/or the regulations notwithstanding the fact that he has a task force looking into this matter and has requested suggestions from the Canadian people? In other words, has he abandoned the task force and has he concluded that suggestions from the Canadian people are meaningless?

Mr. Andras: No, Mr. Speaker. There would be no way in which I could arbitrarily change the legislation even if I so desired, which I do not. It would be subject to the will of the House. The regulation change is, as I said, an interim change. I do not think that we should wait to effect any improvements that have appeared to us to be wise until the task force completes its work and until that results in legislation, which, as I have indicated publicly, will probably not be until 1975. In the meantime, it appeared to be wise to make these changes.

HEALTH

AMOUNT OF FUNDS PROVIDED TO MEDICAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that government spending on unemployment insurance is $100 per capita compared with only $2 per capita for the entire medical research program, will the minister say that steps are being taken to avoid the financial crisis situation at the Medical Research Council, as it has been described by medical and scientific organizations across Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the hon. minister to reply. However, it seems that many of the questions members put before the House appear to invite statements from ministers. I respectfully suggest to hon. members that this kind of question should be placed on the order paper. If ministers were to be allowed to respond to this type of question by making general statements, I assume that members to my left and others might protest that we were taking up too much of the time allotted for the question period. The minister should be allowed to indicate whether he proposes to give this information by way of a statement when the rules make it possible for a minister to do so.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity of meeting representatives of the Medical Research Council on several occasions, and, following these meetings, $1 million more than had been provided at the beginning was added to the budget of the Medical Research Council. The council advises me that, as a result of this amount, it will be able to maintain the same level of research as last year.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER CONSUMER COUNCIL WILL REPORT PUBLICLY

Mrs. Grace McInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the charges of the former chairman of the Canadian Consumer Council that faceless senior civil servants hiding behind the skirts of the minister are effectively varying the idea of a council that would report openly to the public instead of secretly to the minister, does the minister intend that the revived council will protect consumers by open reports or does he intend to set up a body whose opinions will be those of his department?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, its job will certainly be to help the consumer and its opinions will, hopefully, be those of the members of the council. The hon. member will be able to assess the potential of the council when an announcement is made about it in the next couple of weeks.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will be recognized for a supplementary and then the hon. member for Egmont.

Mrs. MacInnis: In view of the importance of assessment before the event rather than after, and in view of the fact the minister will be setting up this revived council within two weeks, will he in the meantime make a ministerial statement to the House on the functions and powers of this proposed revived council?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think the appropriate time to do that will be when the membership of the council is announced.

MANPOWER

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROJECTS—NATURE OF CONSULTATION ON PRIORITIES—REASON FOR DISCONTINUANCE OF CONSTITUENCY ADVISORY GROUPS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It is with regard to the letter sent to all members last week concerning the selection of Opportunities for Youth projects this year. In view of the surprising change or reversal from the previous decision-making process both for LIP and OFY where there was involvement of people from each of the constituency areas in the decisions on priorities with regard to projects, will the minister indicate why this reversal took place and whether this will not create an enormous number of problems for his department and, in addition, place Members of Parliament in the position of having to decide the priority of projects, which I think would be most improper?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the practice under Local Initiatives, we gave very great weight to the recommendations of Members of Parliament, although the finalization in the main was through constituency advisory groups. Quite frankly, we did not set up the advisory groups for OFY this year because of two practical problems. One is the question of time in getting the processing finished. The other is the question of the amount of money spread across the country. However, we will be consulting local people through our departmental officials and we will be consulting Members of Parliament to get their views, although I will take the ultimate responsibility for approval or rejection of any project.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In order to alleviate the considerable fears among young people that this whole situation will involve a considerable amount of politics, either at the bureaucratic or partisan level, is the minister willing even at this late date to receive submissions from various members with regard to setting up acceptable constituency groups to avoid this kind of influence peddling from in fact taking place?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there will be influence peddling. I would certainly find it very difficult at this stage to readjust to make constituency advisory groups possible. I would be delighted if the hon. member would get in touch with me and give me specific recommendations that can be looked at, although we have to get on with the process of getting these projects under way.

FUNDY TIDAL POWER—AVAILABILITY OF REVIEW COMMITTEE REPORT—ALLEGATION BY NOVA SCOTIA PREMIER OF INEXCUSABLE PROCRASTINATION

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Prior to the recess the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources informed me that the re-examination report on Fundy tidal power would be made available shortly after the first ministers' conference, probably about the end of January. Unfortunately the minister is not here today. Following the first ministers' conference the premier of Nova Scotia accused the federal government of inexcusable procrastination as far as the re-examination report is concerned. Will the Prime Minister consult with the premier of Nova Scotia to bring him up to date on the facts in relation to the re-examination report and when it will be made available?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member a date. The House does know that very shortly after the first ministers' conference the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources departed for Washington and then proceeded on a very important tour of the oil producing countries in the Middle East. It is no doubt because of this that the delay has taken place. As to this morning he had a meeting in Montreal and has been delayed by the weather. He is due in the House any moment. I hope he will be able to give the hon. member an answer either later today or some other day.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will be recognized for a supplementary and then the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Coates: In view of the fact it took the premier of Nova Scotia nine months to appoint representatives to the re-examination committee, will the Prime Minister advise whether prior to the premier of Nova Scotia making his statement about inexcusable procrastination he had consultations with the Prime Minister with regard to when this report will be made available?

Mr. Trudeau: None that I know of, Mr. Speaker, but here again I would defer to the minister.

RECOVERY OF CANADA PENSION PLAN OVERPAYMENTS—AVAILABILITY TO DEPARTMENTS OF INFORMATION ON INCOME TAX RETURNS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. In light of reports that some 3,400 recipients of Canada Pension Plan payments are being made the subject of recovery of alleged overpayments based upon examination of income tax returns, will the minister advise why, when the Department of National Revenue is charged with the collection of contributions to the Canada Pension Plan and the Department of National Health and Welfare is responsible for payments, officials of the Canada Pension Plan payment section have access to income tax returns, or will the minister indicate to the House whether information can be obtained from income tax returns by any department of government?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): No, Mr. Speaker. I will be glad to look into the particular problem the hon. member mentions. It has not been brought to my attention, but I will be glad to discuss it with my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

POSSIBLE CONTINUATION OF GRASSLANDS INCENTIVE PROGRAM TO ENCOURAGE BEEF PRODUCTION

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that, despite recent demands that producers go into all-out production of grain, many producers are still interested in putting marginal land into grass, can the minister inform the House whether the grasslands incentive program, which was to end this year, will be continued so that farmers can maintain their beef production, a matter of interest to the consumers of Canada as well as to the beef producers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a decision will be made on this question in a few days.

OIL—MEETINGS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN PREMIERS—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE SAME ARRANGEMENTS WILL BE MADE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Is the Prime Minister meeting the premier of Alberta and the premier of Saskatchewan, and will he be meeting them together? Will he also assure the House and the country that, whatever deal is made with the two producing provinces and with the two premiers representing those provinces, the same deal will be made in view of the fact that Saskatchewan is implementing a special tax which the government of Alberta has not implemented?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the first part of the question, I have been and will be meeting several premiers separately, both from the producing and from the consuming provinces. There has been no attempt to make a deal, as the hon. member suggests; there has been an attempt to work out a solution that would be acceptable to every part of Canada. Every premier as well as myself, of course, will have this very much in mind when we are pursuing our talks.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister give us a little idea, in light of the remarks made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in which he seemed to approach the matter in an atmosphere of confrontation, what figure he has in mind that every Canadian from sea to sea will pay, apart from the cost of transportation, for Canadian crude oil?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am sure I could give the hon. member a little idea, as he puts it, and I am also sure that he might have a little idea himself. But that is not the essence of the matter. We are meeting to try to reach, not agreement on the federal point of view or on the provincial point of view but an agreement that will reconcile all points of view. That is why I reject the hon. member's suggestion regarding the federal government's approaching this in a spirit of confrontation. At the federal-provincial conference in January and since we have tried to reach an agreement by agreement rather than by confrontation, and this is our spirit still. When we are asked questions, as we often are, like: What will you do if you do not get an agreement, we answer that the federal government will take its responsibility as it should. But it is rather unfair to press us to this hypothetical position and then say that we are looking for a confrontation. We are looking for an agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members are seeking supplementaries but the question period is over. I might mention that to some extent the Chair has given priority to members in the first and second rows to my left today. A number of hon. members have been seeking the floor, such as the hon. members for Carleton-Charlotte, Victoria, Moose Jaw, Red Deer and Sault Ste. Marie. There is, of course, one prominent member in the second row who was seen but not called on to ask a question today. I thought I would mention that an effort will be made by the Chair tomorrow to see hon. members who have not been seen today.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Friday, March 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stollery for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto by Mr. Stanfield (p. 31).

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government in the Speech from the Throne once more recognizes agriculture as an all-important industry in Canada, important to all Canadians. We need a nation of properly nourished people before we can do anything else. But agriculture is also one of the largest industries; it keeps the economy buzzing and keeps thousands of Canadians employed in all Canada. It is also one of the most complex industries. This is particularly true in regard to relations between industry, farmers and all levels of government.

The federal government is taking the lead in establishing a national food policy for farmers, for which farmers have been asking for years and years. The objectives of this policy are the basis of Liberal agricultural policies. The government's food policy has been set, first, to make sure that Canadians continue to have an adequate and dependable supply of wholesome food and, second, to ensure that food continues to be available at prices that are reasonable for the consumer and adequate for the farmer. Canadian consumers should not have to spend an unduly high proportion of their incomes in order to get a sufficient and balanced diet. Spending one-fifth of one's income on food is a very reasonable proportion to spend to keep oneself at a nutritional level that is the best in the world. Canada's record has been outstanding because Canadians spend less of their incomes on food than do consumers in almost any other nation in the world.

However, farmers need reasonable prices to provide adequate returns to encourage continued production on a steady basis of the foods that should be produced in Canada. The record in this regard is improving, but in some cases farm prices for some commodities are once again in the vise of the cost-price squeeze.

The third objective of the government's food policy is to develop a continuing Canadian supply and increasing production of those foods that give Canada a competitive advantage for the home market, for commercial export and for international food aid programs.

[Mr. Speaker.]

There are many programs directed toward achieving these objectives. Farmers' net incomes and returns have improved. The net income of farmers in the last calendar year is estimated to be in the neighbourhood of $3.4 billion, almost twice the net income received in 1972. That is fully 70 per cent better net income than the one record year attained in the Conservative years. Realized net income is expected to increase more than 50 per cent for producers this year over 1973. Production is increasing in many areas. Canadians have a plentiful supply of food and the value of our agricultural exports has been increasing. At the same time, low income families are being helped to meet increased food prices through increased income assistance payments and the indexing of these payments through programs such as increased old age pensions, veterans' allowances, family allowances, and reductions in income tax.

Consumers want assurances of more stable food prices, and producers want increased assurances of adequate and stable incomes. Not all producers have shared in the general improvement in net income. In addition to these basic facts there is also concern about transportation inadequacies, lack of storage and a conscious need for market development and research.

In each of these areas the government has definite plans. We propose to develop new and better price and income stabilization programs for farmers. When farmers have better assurances and guarantees about prices and incomes they are more willing to invest in producing the food that producers want. That, in turn, provides consumers with a more stable supply of food at steadier prices.

The changes that we propose relate support levels to changes in production costs, increase minimum support levels, increase the number of commodities supported, and reduce the length of the base period used in calculating support levels. The farmers of this country are going to be made aware that their labour through a crop season will not have been in vain.

A special national farm income stabilization plan for prairie grain growers will be introduced in times of favourable prices, which for the grain growers is the present time. The fund will be built up by contributions from farmers and the government, and whenever farm income falls below a certain point the farmers will receive payments out of the fund to increase their incomes. The funding operation will smooth the boom and bust cycles that have plagued not only the farmers but the prairie farm economy and the economy of the nation as a whole. I think everyone in all cities in Canada should take note of the fact that when we have a healthy agricultural industry with agricultural prosperity this in turn ensures that the entire nation makes better use of its natural and human resources.

The two-price wheat system on wheat for human consumption in Canada will be in effect for seven years, guaranteeing farmers a market at a set price at a level farmers never dreamed of even two short years ago. At the same time, consumers are being guaranteed a steady supply of flour, bread and wheat at a steady price. Consumers should know that producers are now contributing directly to lower bread prices in Canada by agreeing not to gouge the last dollar per bushel out of Canadian consumers. That is a measure of the willingness of our farmers to help the consumer, being able to recognize a good thing at hand and able to look ahead and weigh the consequences. Some may wonder what I mean. Let me point out that the world price of wheat right now is $1 over what the domestic consumer is paying, so in reality you can say that the farmers are directly subsidizing the consumers by approximately $1 per bushel for all wheat that goes into the production of flour in Canada.

An hon. Member: Tell that to the western farmer.

Mr. Whelan: I think you are forgetting that there are some of us who farm in western Ontario and other areas who are producing the same grains, with about 90 per cent of that production going to domestic use and only 10 per cent being exported. Therefore, on a per capita basis these farmers are contributing perhaps much more.

The government also intends to change farm credit legislation to make it easier for young farmers to start farming.

An hon. Member: That is a Conservative policy.

Mr. Whelan: I note that an hon. member suggests this is a Conservative policy. I note that he has been reading some of my speeches and is adopting some of my ideas.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: Some of them have been made a part of their programs, and I hope the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) will go along with that. He seems to take some pride in lambasting a group of people who are trying to help in the egg marketing field. I have heard him say nothing about other marketing boards, two of which are in his province and have done an excellent job on behalf of fish producers there. They have actually increased the income of fishermen to a level they have never enjoyed before but to which they are entitled. I should like to hear the hon. member say something about that at an early date.

About 62 per cent of Canada's farmers are 45 years of age or older and will reach retirement age during the next 20 years. We often hear Members of Parliament, who should know better, harping about the income farmers are receiving, knowing full well that anyone can still enter agriculture if he wants to work on an average of 77 hours a week and receive less income than those working an average of 33½ hours a week. Anyone can still go into agriculture; it is not a closed shop. This is a great part of our society which receives a great deal less in relation to hours of work and the investment.

We need young farmers for the future. Improvements in price and income stabilization will be a great help, and there has been a trend as a result of certain measures for young people to take the step and go back into the agricultural industry.

Young farmers also need long-term credit to set up farm operations that will provide a reasonable level of income. As Minister of Agriculture it is not my intention to recommend that anybody enter agriculture with its high risks and the amount of capital investment required without some guarantee of a reasonable level of return.

The government will provide long-term credit under certain conditions. The government is proposing a further three-year extension of the Farm Improvement Loans Act under which farmers can obtain government-guaranteed loans to purchase and modernize equipment. Individual borrowing limits will be raised in keeping with the cost of topnotch machinery and equipment. Parliament will be asked to guarantee greatly increased funds available under this program.

Hon. members know that I believe orderly marketing is a goal that benefits farmers without costing consumers any more in the prices they pay for food. Some people in this House and in this city who are not farmers like myself do not seem to be convinced about this yet. They do not realize that we have the most efficient group of people in the world producing food. That is something they must realize or they cannot expect to have these people continue to produce food for them.

No one can dispute that disorderly marketing causes extreme price fluctuations, strains on storage, disrupts handling, breaks down the operation of transportation facilities and creates a need for surplus processing facilities which then lie idle or under-used for a good part of the year. Meanwhile, much produce is wasted for lack of appropriate handling while some markets and people go short six months later, with prices rising as a result. This is especially true when we do not have Canadian-produced food and our markets and people are dependent upon imports.

We have some economists in this nation, and even some Members of Parliament, who think we should produce until produce is coming out of the farmer's ears and then hope we will find markets for that produce. Such a philosophy does not lend itself toward a guarantee of any kind of production stability, and that is something I will not adopt in respect of the agricultural industry in this nation. Meanwhile, a great deal of produce cannot be marketed, and that is why our storage program is now what it is. I intend to extend our programs in this regard in the coming months.

Everyone knows that I am not a professor of economics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Thank God for that. I was recently shown a record an individual kept in respect of the world's best known economists. The astounding fact is that not one of them had ever been right.

Mr. Stanfield: They are all different, so some of them must be right.

Mr. Whelan: The getting in and out of production, the tooling-up of expensive machinery only to let it stand and rust one or two years later, repeated on a large scale from farm producers to the retail shelf, are eventually paid for by the consumer in higher food prices. One does not need a degree in anything to understand that.

We are, therefore, taking measures to improve marketing, among them the cash advance payments system which has worked so well for prairie grain growers. The government proposes to increase the cash advance maximum payments per farmer and extend the system itself to all farmers across Canada for storable crops.

To complement this program, the federal government will extend its assistance program for the construction of new storage facilities. In many regions storage facilities are not adequate today, while in other regions storage is outdated and better facilities that have been invented should be constructed. Storage construction assistance is now being provided for specialized fruit and vegetable storage, and this program will be continued and extended to other suitable crops. The farmers of Canada will benefit through better market prices, and consumers will benefit from the increased supply throughout the year, through better quality food kept in topnotch storage facilities. Our research people have proved that some commodities can be placed in proper storage and taken out in just as good condition as they went in, or in some instances even better. This will provide the consumer with more stable prices and more even prices for the producers.

Other measures will be taken to improve our marketing system, including the encouragement of forward contracting and the establishment of marketing agencies to serve export markets. Grain transportation facilities throughout Canada are to be improved through assistance in the repair of existing boxcars, the purchase of more hopper cars, a study of grain freight costs and steps to ensure that existing hopper cars are being used as efficiently as possible.

The Export and Import Permits Act is to be amended to encourage further processing of raw food products here in Canada. The change will mean that, under certain circumstances, the Canadian market will be better protected for certain Canadian products when supplies are not adequate, for the greater benefit of the Canadian economy as a whole.

Dairy producers are having problems because of skyrocketing input costs. It is evident they must receive a price increase for milk soon, and I believe the major portion of that increase must come from the marketplace. Let those who believe that farmers should shoulder the burden of low-priced milk for the families who are less well off than most of us consider, first of all, that it is the duty of all of society to make sure the less fortunate get milk, the most healthy food in the world. Second, if the marketplace price of milk is not increased there will be less and less milk produced. Last year milk production in Canada dropped 4.7 per cent, the sharpest decline since 1920, and in New Zealand, that great dairy country, production is dropping even faster. The same thing is occurring round the world. This all amounts to the fact that in order to be a dairy producer one must work seven days a week, on statutory holidays such as Christmas and New Years and even on St. Patrick's day. Many people object to that way of life in return for the little income they receive. Therefore we must rearrange the whole dairy industry in time if we want to produce the most lifegiving substance we have that is the cheapest thing we buy in a bottle, milk, which we take for granted.

[Mr. Whelan.]

The cow is the most amazing machine ever placed on the face of this earth. No scientist or engineer has invented anything as capable as a cow. It can take the plain roughage given to it and produce one of the most healthful foods in the world. The only way Canadian dairy producers have been able to carry on is because of the co-operation of the provincial and federal governments and their breeding programs. The production of one cow in a period of 15 years has increased by nearly three times what it was.

I have a word of caution for Members of Parliament who have been quite vocal in their criticism concerning brucellosis. I have checked the actual figures with respect to brucellosis. Many farmers depend on the livestock export market for their income. Because of the statements made, so far as I am concerned without any real factual evidence, some of the importing countries have been alarmed and have made inquiries about whether or not they should still be buying cattle in this area. I can assure them that the amount of brucellosis in this area is nothing to be alarmed about. It is something to be concerned about and we are concerned about it. However, I repeat that we have the most disease-free animal population of any agricultural nation in the world.

The market for Canadian livestock producers over the past year and again at present is a very uncertain one. Producers were first faced with exorbitant increases in protein costs, then the United States price freeze, now a technical court decision disallowing the prohibition of the use of DES south of the border. Those international influences play havoc with our food production in Canada. I am heartened to hear, Mr. Speaker, that a city slicker like the mover of the reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), recognizes the strain under which agriculture is because of high international finance and the international speculators who are having a field day at the expense of the world's consumers of staple goods. I might mention in this regard one of the staple goods, sugar. The price of sugar has gone up approximately 400 per cent in a little over three months. I am sure that not very many sugarcane workers in the world will receive very much benefit. There are some people in Canada who think we should get sugar as cheaply as we can regardless of what effect this has on the part of the world from which the sugar comes. I do not believe that. I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for having brought this sore point to the attention of the House so clearly and simply.

The market for meat and livestock products is expanding rapidly not only here in Canada but also abroad. The government is therefore developing a new livestock strategy to guarantee the producers' margin in meat production. We are also pushing ahead with meat research which is being expanded and, with more support, expanded veterinary training facilities.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I think the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) has a vested interest here. More support is also being given to research. New research programs will be undertaken in over-all food production, quality improvement, product development, mechanization and meat production. The aim is to increase production, lower costs, improve quality and develop new outlets for Canadian produce. History has shown that the money the federal government spends for research benefits both consumers and farmers and, in the long run, consumers benefit the most.

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) asked what the government is prepared to do to cover the increasing input cost of farmers. The direct answer is to provide an atmosphere in which farmers can get maximum cash income to give them record net income returns. Cash income increased by 26 per cent in 1973 and 1972 which itself increased 18 per cent over 1971. Because input costs have increased proportionately less than cash income, we ended up last year with a record net income as I indicated earlier, an income away above anything the opposition members were ever able to produce when they were in government. Net income is expected to increase by another third in 1974 over last year. That will be made possible because we are keeping an eye on the admittedly rapid rising input costs.

Having taken considerable time of the House to explain the Liberal agricultural policy further, I must say I am pleased to note that members of the Conservative Party are ready to adopt the many initiatives this government is putting forward under the Liberal food policy, and so I perceive little difficulty when I present this legislation to the House.

In summary, let me say it is clear Canadian consumers are enjoying the biggest food bargain in the world. They are being served the highest quality food with ever-increasing built-in convenience, and they pay the lowest percentage of their income for food of any people in the world. Canadian farmers have improved their productivity and efficiency faster than our economy as a whole to make that bargain possible.

You know, Mr. Speaker, that other phases of society are not as productive as agriculture. We might consider that less than 7 per cent of our people produce all the food that is produced in Canada. Also, a tremendous amount of this food is exported. All we have to do is compare that with the situation in China where there are over 840 million people, 80 per cent of whom are engaged in the production of food and yet they do not produce enough for themselves. This is why we must be thankful we have the farmers we have in Canada. We also must be very cautious that we do not do something that would discourage them. I do not think we encourage people by criticizing them and watching what they do. I have some reservations about the Food Prices Review Board in this instance and how that part of society which is the most productive and has made available to society the highest quality food in the world at the most reasonable prices is watched more closely than any other part of society. I think we must be very cautious.

Many Canadian farmers have not received adequate incomes for their work, their investment and their skill, but farm incomes have finally shown a major improvement. The federal government is prepared to take important steps to make sure farmers hold on to that improvement and can lay the groundwork for an even better future. That will depend on the members of this House, the members of the provincial governments and the farmers of this nation.

The Canadian food bargain can continue in the future but only if farmers receive support from society as a whole and by this parliament. The programs the government has implemented and the ones outlined in the Speech from the Throne offer the government support that is needed.

● (1220)

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, would the minister be prepared to answer a question with respect to a matter he raised?

Mr. Whelan: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baker: I share the minister's concern about brucellosis, and he and I have discussed this, but I also want to point out respectfully to the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rose for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. Baker: Has any consideration been given by the government to increasing the compensation payable to farmers whose herds are stricken with brucellosis, and would this action be independent of the provincial government or in concert with the provincial government? Could he answer that question? There are many farmers in my area who are very concerned about the matter, and I am sure the same is true in Mr. Speaker's area.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, last year about this time we doubled the compensation for purebred and grade cattle, fully realizing the extra cost of replacement stock, etc. I have made a submission to increase the compensation paid for cattle and as soon as it is dealt with I will be making an announcement.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by joining the other speakers in the House who have congratulated the mover and seconder of the address, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier). I was particularly interested in the speech of the hon. member for Spadina because it was in that riding in 1945 that I first offered myself for parliament. At that time I gained great experience but very little else because I was nosed out by a mere 6,000 votes by a man for whom I have the greatest respect and liking, the present Senator David Croll. I was so short of workers that I was out on election day and at the end of it I was supervising the counting of votes in a polling subdivision. When I came back to the main committee room I found I was behind by 2,000 votes, and I never looked back from then on.

In the next few minutes I would like to deal with a subject on which the government has chosen to remain particularly silent over the past two or three years. I refer to the question of inflation which, as we see now only too well, is increasing at an annual rate of more than 9 per cent a year and gives every indication of exceeding 10 per cent during 1974.

Although recent Gallup polls show that the people of Canada have reached the highest consensus of the past 20 years in regarding inflation as the most serious problem facing our country, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet refuse even to discuss it, let alone put forward positive policies to deal adequately with it. Thus, because of the state of petrified immobility which the government insists on maintaining it is up to the members of the Official Opposition as usual to put forward positive suggestions for dealing with this serious problem in the hope that the government may be pushed into taking action which is so long overdue.

First of all, what has brought about this steadily increasing inflation which has reached such alarming proportions and gives every indication of getting worse and worse as the years go on? Primarily it is the fact that during the past four years the Bank of Canada, on the instructions of this government, has increased the money supply, which is the amount of currency in circulation plus the deposits held in chartered banks, from $28 billion to $48 billion, an increase of 70 per cent, while real growth in the economy, which is the level of production, has increased by only 23 per cent or less than one-third of that amount. This very large excess of purchasing power over the volume of goods available for sale has been the primary reason why the level of prices has risen at such an alarming rate during that four-year period.

In addition to this demand-pull inflationary pressure on prices, we have also had a cost-push pressure which has been brought about by a very natural demand by workers for higher wages in order to meet the ever-rising prices of the products they have to buy in order to live. Both kinds of pressure have pushed up price levels at an ever-increasing rate with nobody really gaining and those on fixed incomes being hurt very severely.

Although the government last year introduced increases in family allowances and old age pensions in an attempt to ease the burden of those most severely hit by rising prices, we all know very well that these periodic corrections lag far behind price increases and therefore do not deal adequately with the problem. The only real answer to this problem is a reasonably stable price level which does not increase by more than 3 per cent a year, the average yearly increase in the cost of living during the past 75 years, an increase with which we have learned to live both personally and also with regard to our ability to sell our products competitively in the Canadian market against foreign competition and in the export market, on which we rely so heavily, against foreign competition. The most important reason why we must control our rapidly rising prices is that if our price level increases faster than those of our principal trading partners, our products will become less and less competitive with foreign goods being offered in Canada and in the export market, with the very obvious serious results that are bound to follow.

So I think it is clear that we must take very definite steps to keep prices in this country from rising at a greater rate than 3 per cent a year. I think it is also obvious that the only practical way to do this is to bring production up to a level where the demand for and supply of products are approximately equal.

How can this be done? It can only be done by the government offering incentives to industry and agriculture which will persuade producers that it will be worth their while to make the usually heavy expenditures necessary to expand production by the very considerable amount necessary to do the job. As we know, most producers are reluctant to make these expenditures because of the uncertainties of the future, and they need worthwhile incentives to persuade them to do so. Most producers today will say: Unless you make it worth my while to go out and expand my plant and my equipment and pay the heavy interest charges of today in order to make those expenditures, if later, in two or three years time, I am to find that demand falls off and I am left holding the bag and cannot pay those high interest charges on machinery and plant that are not being used, then I will not make those expenditures. But, Mr. Speaker, if the government makes it worth while for producers to make those expenditures, then they will be made.

Because we cannot sit idly by and watch the present spiraling inflation continue during the considerable period of time it will take to bring production up to the desired level, controls must be introduced to keep prices within reasonable bounds during that interval. The Official Opposition has urged a 60 to 90 day prices and incomes freeze, during which guidelines will be established for prices and incomes to keep them from rising at a greater rate than that required to hold the cost of living to an annual increase of approximately 3 per cent. It is estimated that these controls will need to be maintained for between 18 months and two years while the government's incentive program for bringing production up to the desired level is brought into being and made effective. Once this has been accomplished and production is brought up to or approximately up to the level of purchasing power, then, of course, the control program will no longer be needed and will be discontinued.

Let us ask ourselves what kind of incentive program should the government bring in to induce production to rise to the necessary levels? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) says that the measure which he introduced in his budget on February 19, 1973, is the incentive that is needed to do the job. That measure, as we know, reduced corporate income taxes for manufacturers and producers from 49 per cent to 40 per cent. But, instead of requiring those who receive this tax benefit to spend it on expanding their operations, the minister greatly reduced the effectiveness of his incentive by allowing the recipients to dispose of it in whatever way they wish. They can expand their operations, put the money into the company's reserve, or pay it out in extra dividends.

The ineffectiveness of the minister's program has been demonstrated by the fact that during the year before the minister introduced his incentive this country imported $4.3 billion more of manufactured products than we exported, but during the year following the introduction of the minister's incentive the country imported $5.9 billion more of manufactured products than we exported. So we see that in one year imports increased by nearly 40 per cent over what they had been during the year before the minister introduced his manufacturing production incentive. We see that other countries have greatly increased their sales of manufactured products to this country while our proportion of sales of these products declined considerably. With that kind of economic planning by government is it any wonder that this government is incapable of controlling inflation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Because of these alternatives for spending the $300 million which lowering taxes to manufacturers and processors cost the remainder of the taxpayers of the country in a single year, the money that the minister has handed out to manufacturers and processors has not been spent in an effective manner and his and the government's objective of increasing production to the desired level has not been achieved. Inflation, as we know only too well, has continued to rise at an ever-accelerating rate.

What is needed to get the economy moving at the necessary accelerated pace to stop this steady increase in inflation? If a government wants businessmen to do something which it believes necessary for the good of the country, it must not simply hand them a gift in the form of a tax reduction and hope that they will make use of that incentive in the way the government would like them to do. That just does not work, and I speak from 20 years' experience as a manufacturer and six years' experience in dealing with businessmen as a member of a government. What a government must do is to tell business what it wants to accomplish, and that it will reward efforts to bring about that aim in direct proportion to the effort that is made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: To increase production by the very substantial amount necessary to bring it up to the level of today's greatly inflated demand, the government must introduce incentives to bring about five important things. The first is lower labour costs, the second is increased productivity, the third is more research and development, the fourth is more export sales, and the fifth is more processing of primary products here in this country.

I outlined, in some considerable detail, my ideas for introducing practical incentives to induce substantial improvements in these fields when I spoke on this subject at the University of British Columbia on October 11 last, and I sent copies of my detailed suggestions to the press and to the Minister of Finance. The minister was generous enough to tell me that he found them very interesting indeed. Time does not permit me to outline the details of these proposals to the House today, much as I would like to do so, but I would be very glad to send a copy of them to any member who would like to have one.

In conclusion I say to the government and to the minister: either adopt the proposals I have made for increasing production or, if you disagree with those specific proposals, then bring in ones which you consider to be preferable to them. One thing is certain, and that is that inflation will only be cured by the introduction of incentives to bring production up to the level of the greatly increased money supply that the government's policies have brought about. There is no other way to do it. This must be done. If production does not rise to that level, we will simply keep on bidding against each other for the short supply of products available to us and the price level of those products will continue to rise at an exorbitant rate as the bidding goes on and on and on, as it is today.

The time is long overdue for this government to stop gazing with a blank stare at the Canadian economy and professing that nothing can be done, as it has professed for the past two or three years. It is time for the government to deal with the country's No. 1 problem. Mr. Speaker, I say this to the government: if you cannot deal with this problem, then move over, because we most certainly can.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words today about a very important subject, one that has not received the attention it should, especially from Canadians. This is the subject of ocean policy; it is the important subject of the extension seaward of Canada's limits, Canada's opportunities and Canada's responsibility.

Mr. McGrath: It has not received much attention from the government so far.

Mr. Davis: Coastal states all over the world are making a very good case for the better management of the resources close to their shores. Canada has been leading the charge in this respect. We believe that we have not only made substantial progress in the last few years but will make even greater progress before the end of the seventies.

We are pushing our limits seaward, pushing them to the edge of the continental shelf, to the continental margin, to the margin including the slope. We are extending our resource base and adding to it by between one-quarter and one-third. We are adding immensely to the total area of land and sea for which Canada is responsible. Our area in acreage terms is being increased by 40 per cent over little more than a decade.

This is a remarkable accomplishment. It is remarkable when one realizes that Canada in its land mass is the second largest country in the world. The extension of our area of responsibility on the face of this globe by 40 per cent is a great achievement. It gives rise to many new opportunities in the future and adds immensely to our responsibilities as a member of the United Nations.

Our continental shelf—the shallow waters overlying the shoulders of the shelf, the shoulders of our Canadian land mass—is immense. We have the world's biggest continental shelf and it is the wise management of that continental shelf, both of its renewable resources and its non-renewable or mineral resources, which is vitally important to our future and indeed, to that of all mankind.

Over our continental shelf swim many species of fish, few of which are caught at the present time. We have, off our east coast and our west coast, many of the world's finest fisheries. These must be managed more intelligently. They must be managed on a sustained yield basis and therefore wisely if we are to look after our own food needs, let alone those of countries which need our foodstuffs to survive.

We have only begun to work down the living pyramid of fish resources. We have only been chipping at the tip of the pyramid, taking the most readily catchable species. There are large quantities of fish protein available to us and to other nations if we manage wisely and well, if we fish more economically and harvest more species, and if we use the latest techniques for raising the income of our fishermen.

We have barely scratched our offshore wealth in so far as minerals are concerned. We have the world's biggest continental shelf. We are bound, knowing the geological structures which are favourable, to find a great deal of oil and natural gas close to our shores. So we gain in this area, the area of non-renewable or mineral resources as well.

We are taking over these great resources, making them ours from the management point of view and, indeed, an ownership point of view, with very little effort and very little attention. Most Canadians are oblivious to these important developments because most of them live in half a dozen large cities which are concentrated along the United States boundary. They are not aware of what is going on in our outlying areas, along our coast, in the north Atlantic, in the north Pacific and in the Arctic area as well. Here is where the action is in terms of the extension of our boundaries; here is where we are increasing our resource base fantastically and in a remarkably short period of time.

We have done well to stake our claims early. We have led the charge in establishing the rights as well as the responsibilities of the coastal state. The United Nations has been unable, so far at least, to insist upon the wise management of offshore resources. Until the United Nations, or a regional body, involving many nations, can shoulder this task of wise management of resources, it is up to the coastal state, the nation with the most obvious current interest, the most intimate interest in those resources, to make sure that they are preserved, that they are conserved, that they are managed on a sustained yield basis, that the stocks of fish are not depleted, that the minerals offshore are not ripped quickly from their beds and too much left wastefully for posterity to try to recover.

We have pushed out our limits. In the early sixties our seaward limit was three miles; in the late sixties our fisheries lines were extended 12 miles seaward from our shores and in 1970 we began to draw straight base lines from headland to headland, from major promontory to major promontory. We also drew fisheries closing lines which enclosed all of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and made it Canadian, enclosed all of the Bay of Fundy, all of Queen Charlotte Sound and Hecate Strait on the west coast. By drawing the straight base lines and measuring 12 miles outside, we increased Canada's area of responsibility by more than 15 per cent.

I have said our area of responsibility will be extended by 40 per cent. When our limits are extended to the edge of the continental shelf we shall, physically and economically, be 40 per cent larger than we are now.

Members who are familiar with the needs and problems of our fishing communities will want me to refer briefly to the concept of the 200-mile fisheries limit. Most of the nations, the members of the United Nations which will be convening in Venezuela in August, 1974, will be arguing for a 200-mile fishing limit. Canada's approach, of course, will be that it favours a 200-mile limit but that our limit should be more than 200 miles wherever the limit of our continental shelf, the extent of our continental margin, is more than 200 miles offshore. The principal area where our continental shelf reaches out more than 200 miles is the Grand Banks. There, our continental shelf, in places, extends as much as 400 miles seaward from Newfoundland. Our basic fisheries policy, therefore, calls for a limit of 200 miles from shore and for more than 200 miles where the edge of the continental shelf is more than 200 miles from land.

This big reach seaward by Canada casts shadows in many directions. By controlling oil drilling rigs, we will better be able to control pollution from gas and oil operations near our shores. By controlling our fishery, that is, the operation of fishing vessels as well as processing plants, we will not only be able to maintain our fish stocks in a healthy state but, as well, discipline those who sail through our fisheries waters and discharge pollutants—I am speaking of pollutants discharged from freighters and tankers—of various kinds. Ocean dumping will be easier for us to control. Oil spills will be less frequent because we will insist on Canadian standards. Ships passing through our more ecologically sensitive areas will be better built, better managed and better operated than ever before.

While I am on the subject of shipping I should add a cautionary note. Ours is a big country. Distance has always been a major problem. It is a big cost factor both from a transportation and a communications point of view.

We must encourage mobility wherever possible. We do not want to hold up shipping unnecessarily. We must not badger our neighbours who sail their ships close to our shores on their way across the Atlantic or across the Pacific. So, we must be reasonably flexible in our thinking. We must push out our limits, especially our resource development limits, limits connected with the fisheries, oil and gas, but we must also conduct our affairs in such a way as to minimize the hindrance to shipping, a hindrance which our laws and regulations would otherwise bring about. Limits applying to the resources and their exploitation, relating to the edge of the continental shelf, to the 200-mile concept with respect to fisheries, and mining must not be seen as applying necessarily to shipping. We must make sure that the shipping industry is careful in its operations and that it is non-polluting. On the other hand, we must not introduce policies, laws and regulations which hinder mobility, which hinder shipping unnecessarily. I am speaking not only of ships visiting Canadian ports but going into United States ports and ports of other countries as well.

I am all for zoning. We are busy zoning our sensitive offshore areas. We are not only securing our outer limits of control, and here I am speaking of the continental shelf, but we are also identifying those parts of the shelf which are unique from the biological point of view. We are pinpointing the sensitive spots. We are describing on detailed maps many thousands of square miles in which offshore drilling must be banned, where certain kinds of fishing should be outlawed, where shipping must either be slowed down or, indeed, prohibited, and where land-based industries must be prevented from discharging their wastes into rivers that flow directly into the sea.

Let us take a typical example, that of the big oil tankers. Like big trucks in a well run municipality, they should be confined to certain shipping lanes, certain express routes, so to speak. They should be kept out of our parks, that is, our offshore parks and our biologically sensitive areas. Trucks are not allowed to blast through residential areas. Following this analogy, these big tankers should stay away from our built-up areas and, certainly, from our high value recreational areas. They should avoid bays, inlets and straits where the value of waterfront property is high. They should certainly avoid those narrow waters where the likelihood of accidents is high.

They should stay out of our precious inland seas where nature on her own has difficulty in dealing with oil spills. They should be confined to certain shipping lanes on the high seas and in approaching a Canadian port they should be guided and controlled by the interests of living things and of living communities. They should bend to the dictates of our living environment, of our wild living things, as well as people who make their homes along our shores. May I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the Chair. The House will resume at two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at one o'clock, I was referring to the need to map and zone our offshore areas so to indicate where shipping may or may not pass, where drilling for oil or natural gas can take place and where it cannot take place and to indicate sensitive areas near our shores with a view to prohibiting certain industries from locating near by.

The government has to work closely with industry in this regard. We do not know enough about the effects of pollution on the living resources of the sea. We do not know enough about the effects of oil on ice. We do not know enough about the climatic consequences, even of flying big jets over our northern ice pack at 40,000 feet in the wintertime. Therefore, we have to be very careful. We have to work closely with industry. We have to measure things as they are; in other words, develop baseline data. We must launch pilot projects and measure what their effects are before and not after we allow large-scale operations to proceed.

We are proceeding carefully. For example, we have banned oil drilling from the Georgia Strait on the west coast. We are making sure that the necessary environmental studies are carried out in the Beaufort Sea before drilling can proceed on the north slope off Alaska. There won't be any new chemical industries operating in our coastal communities unless they incorporate the latest technology for keeping their harmful effects to the minimum. There won't be any estuaries paved over for port development if we can help it. There won't be anything like as many waste products discharged into our rivers and from there into the sea. By far the largest volume of pollutants entering the sea originates with big industries, cities and towns, hence into our rivers and into the sea.

Some hon. members may be skeptical about our determination to zone areas, particularly areas offshore, and make sure that the more sensitive of these areas are protected from the ravages of industry. They may be skeptical about our determination to cut back on land based pollution. They are not sure we can hold on to our continental shelf from the point of view of drilling for oil. They are skeptical about our ability to gain a 200 mile limit for fishing. They do not think we can control shipping, but we must.

I can't understand this defeatism. I am optimistic on this score. I believe that the continental shelf will continue to be ours in so far as oil and gas are concerned. I believe we will have a continental limit for our fisheries and that we will be able to control pollution within the same 200 mile plus zone.

What evidence can I give you to support my optimism? I can point to joint ventures which are now being explored by foreign corporations and in consultation with Canadian companies. Why are these foreign corporations trying to get inside our enlarged Canadian fishing zones, for example? Why are they talking about turning over some of their catches for processing in Canada if they do not believe we will be successful in obtaining greater jurisdiction over the waters and shelf near our shores?

When we drew our long fisheries closing lines across the mouth of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, we set a number of events in train. We gave other fishing nations notice and told them that we would negotiate phasing out agreements. One after another Norway, Denmark, the United Kingdom, France, Portugal and Spain came to terms. Broadly speaking, they agreed to get out of the gulf by 1976. That seemed a long time off in 1971, but it does not seem so long in 1974. We agreed that they could return, or that some of their vessels could return, for five years, while there was some life left in them. They got a period of depreciation which they claimed was customary, but not one year, one month or one week longer.

This phasing out process will undoubtedly occur with respect to our broader continental shelf limit as well. There will be a phasing out period for nations which have fished close to our shores. But as long as they continue to come to our waters they will have to fish according to our rules. They must confine themselves to quotas well within our concept of sustained yield in our waters.

I said that a number of countries are already bowing to the inevitable in this regard. Poland, for example, has been negotiating with a Nova Scotia firm to bring their herring catch in the North Atlantic to Nova Scotia for processing. The Norwegians are negotiating with a Newfoundland company to help catch capelin in the North Atlantic. Their catch will be processed in Newfoundland. Spain is interested in a joint venture on the Grand Banks. The Japanese are also visiting Canada with a view to setting up joint ventures that will allow them to continue to operate for a time in waters that are generally regarded as international waters today but which will become part of Canada's own responsibility tomorrow.

We are prepared to talk to these foreign interests and to enter into pilot projects. But we are not prepared to make long-term commitments say, for more than a year. We are interested in knowing more about their fishing methods, the kind of fish they catch, and the nature of the processing which is required to serve their markets.

We are much more interested in operations that will provide opportunities for employment for Canadians who process on shore. We are also determined, taking the longer view, that Canadians will catch more of these fish, thus phasing out the operation of foreign vessels near our shores. We are determined that our fishing vessels will be built in Canadian yards, and that the fish products caught by Canadians will be processed in Canada as well.

As for foreign ownership, our Canadian fishing industry today is overwhelmingly Canadian: it is 85 per cent Canadian owned and controlled. I should like to see this figure increased, as I am sure many hon. members would. This is why we are insisting on the Canadian ownership of individual vessels. In some of our fisheries, fisheries that have been limited in size because of limited resources, we have adopted a ticket of entry approach. The boat is the ticket of entry. Canadians own those boats, and there is no way in which those boats can be allowed to slip into foreign hands.

Perhaps I should put it another way. Unless a company can prove that it is 75 per cent or more owned by Canadians, that 75 per cent or more of its shares are owned in this country, it will be unable to expand. It will not be able to add to its existing fleet by buying up tickets of entry, Canadian boats. It will not be able to expand its fishing capacity relative to that of other Canadian companies, firms, partnerships and individuals in this country. It will not be able to catch a larger share of the fish that is available to our own, over-all fishing fleet.

Why do I stress this point, Mr. Speaker? Because a large Japanese firm, Marubeni, recently bought shares in one of our west coast fish packing companies. The Canadian company had 100 boats, or tickets of entry, in our limited west coast salmon fleet. There is no way in which a foreign corporation should be able to take over one of our fisheries. There is no way in which foreigners should be able, in effect, to get inside our new fishing limits, and gain control, in this case exclusive control, of the right to fish in this country.

In the case of that particular west coast fish packing company, 51 per cent Canadian share ownership will not be good enough. It will have to be 75 per cent plus before it is again on the same basis as other Canadian fishing companies. Either that, or they will have to be satisfied with 100 boats in a 6,000 boat fleet. The company will not be able to grow; it can only decline. It cannot expand its fishing operations until it qualifies as a Canadian company again.

I have dwelt on this question of joint ventures for several reasons, Mr. Speaker. First, I wanted to prove that a number of the most aggressive long distance fishing nations now see the 200 mile limit as a reality. Second, I want to tell hon. members what I have already told our fishing industry a number of times, namely that we have a 75 per cent Canadian ownership rule and that this will be enforced rigorously from now on. We are going to look after our resources on the continental shelf. We are also going to make sure that they are harvested by Canadians in Canadian-owned vessels, and that the products are processed in this country as well.

This is an aggressive approach. It is an aggressive stance to take. But we are moving in the nick of time. We are pushing our limits out before, and not after, the living resources of our continental shelf are over fished and other countries begin to look covetously at our oil. We are moving on the ownership front before we have a foreign ownership problem in Canada, not afterwards. We are pressing out our limits in the interests of conservation. We are insisting that our renewable resources be cropped on a sustained yield basis, not decimated by the foreign fleets as in the past. We are also making sure that the oil companies take the long view in so far as the management of our offshore minerals are concerned.

What other attitude can we take, Mr. Speaker? The coastal state has the biggest stake in the wise management of its renewable resources. The United Nations cannot look after these resources for it. Multinational commissions are often influenced unduly by distant water countries, whose attitude typically is one of moving in quickly, taking everything they can and getting out again. This does not make sense.

I am one of those who believes that economics has its place. Looking far enough ahead, economics will be compatible with sound environmental management. We in Canada must move with the grain of nature. We must move out, among other things, to the edge of the continental shelf. We must insist that the whole of the continental shelf and slope is ours from a management point of view and from a harvesting point of view.

We are in the process of expanding our limits, pushing them out. As I said at the outset, we are increasing our land area out to sea by as much as 40 per cent. We are encompassing great resources, resources that are needed not only by Canadians but by all mankind. I believe that Canadians, in taking these steps, will not only be looking after the needs of future generations of Canadians, but the best interests of all the worlds peoples as well.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to five pieces of legislation which are being brought forward this session. Two pieces of legislation among these were tabled today. These bills will be considered by hon. members and, I trust, passed quickly. Some of them can be passed with little debate because they are simple bills indeed. There is a bill to make guaranteed loans to small fishermen. There is a bill to amend the Fisheries Act, having to do with foreign ownership, among other things. There is a bill to amend the Fisheries Development Act in respect of better storage facilities and increased production of fish. There is a bill called the Environmental Contaminents Act, and ocean dumping legislation. I commend these bills to hon. members and trust they will be passed in this session. Then, we will be on our way toward establishing much wider limits seaward from Canada and taking on more responsible and wise management of these limits for the benefit of mankind.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member can only ask a question with unanimous consent, since the minister's time has just expired. Will the House allow the hon. member for Victoria to ask the minister a question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McKinnon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I noticed that the minister almost completely ignored his other role in respect of the environment. Will the minister assure the House that when oil spills occur from ships and when the federal government, whose responsibility it is, is unable to identify the source, the federal government will at least pay for the cleanup rather than expecting the municipal governments to assume what could be enormous costs?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I think I can assure the hon. member of that. Several years ago amendments were made to the Canada Shipping Act which provided for the collection of large sums of money. That money is available for compensation to those who are affected by oil spills.

Mr. McKinnon: Would the minister then explain to the House why the Department of Transport turned down the request of the municipality of Oak Bay for compensation for cleaning up an oil spill there some two months ago on the grounds that they could not identify the ship which spilled the oil?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member have a chat with me. Perhaps our departmental can do people something about it.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in the throne speech debate, and I wish to associate myself with my leader and other colleagues in extending congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address, the hon. members for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier). Working under very difficult conditions they gave good accounts of themselves, which is a tribute to the constituencies which elected them to parliament.

In the "Tale of Two Cities", by Charles Dickens, we read:

> It was the best of times, it was the worst of times, it was the age of wisdom, it was the age of foolishness ... it was the season of Light, it was the season of Darkness .... We have everything before us, we have nothing before us.

I suppose that reasoning could be well applied to the throne speech, depending upon where you sit in this Chamber. One thing is certain, the year 1974 has sent its signals well ahead and it shapes up as one of the most critical years in decades. Even in the best of times, Canadians would find it difficult to get their ship of state back on an even keel after the storm-tossed buffetings of inflation and unemployment in 1973. But, as 1974 unfolds, it becomes apparent that stiff new challenges are facing Canadians in every part of this country.

Not only is a recession threatening us, but the throne speech, the estimates and the 1974-75 booklet entitled "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent" gives a clear indication to anyone reading them that Canada is in need of a national leader and a national party that has the desire and the willingness to give sound government to this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: Rarely in the memory of most Canadians has this country entered a peacetime year under so many stresses and uncertainties. The restrictions placed on the export of oil by some oil exporting countries have eroded the economic stability and economic progress of the United States, while at the same time hamstringing Canada and most of Europe. International alliances are weakening and balance of payments deficits for many nations are reaching awesome levels. A grain shortage in far away Russia has, along with the mismanagement of this government with its bungling administration helped to push up the price of food, especially bread, in our supermarkets to new heights.

Nationally and internationally, 1974 is to be a time of trial. In times like these, it seems to me the commonsense approach to our problems would be for the federal government to provide some leadership to our people, while practising some restraint in its spending programs. However, unfortunately the opposite is true for we see at page 18 of the government's spending program a proposed expenditure for this year of $22,023 million, which is $2,388 million higher than last year's figure, and $12,151 million higher than the figure listed for 1967-68, the year the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office. Those are not my figures, Mr. Speaker, those are the figures put forth in the booklet "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent".

During this period of time our population increased by a little more than 2 million people, which indicates the inefficiency of this Liberal administration, and should be viewed with concern by anyone, including Liberals who truly have this country's interest at heart. Nothing that I can say and no figure that I can quote would indicate more clearly the failure of the Trudeau administration in its efforts to govern Canada.

When speaking during the debate on the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister stated some very evident truths. He said, as will be found at page 32, that Canadians live in the richest country in the world; that we can grow more on our land than we can eat; we can take from the sea more than enough for our needs; we possess adequate supplies of energy and below the ground we have an abundance of minerals. In fact, he said that we have human and natural resources sufficient to make us the envy of every nation.

I agree with those words of our Prime Minister, but this statement raises some very disturbing questions. Why, in view of our abundance, do the latest figures released by Statistics Canada indicate a progressively deteriorating situation for the Canadian worker? Average weekly earnings for the month of December were down approximately $5 from the month before and were only 6 per cent higher than in December 1972. When compared to a cost of living increase over the same period of more than 9 per cent, it is indeed obvious that whatever the workingman has managed in salary increases has been more than eroded by inflation.

Why, in view of our abundance, was it necessary to tax those who are working almost $2 billion for unemployment insurance benefits in 1972 and more than $2.2 billion for unemployment insurance benefits in 1973? The increased cost of the program has nearly tripled the cumulative deficit of the employer-employee account and resulted this year in an increase in worker and company contributions to the plan. In fact, in 1974 we must pay $923 million for last year's unemployed, and the same amount is proposed for the year 1974-75. Why is this necessary in a country as rich as Canada?

Why, in view of our abundance, are housing starts declining, and why have housing costs escalated to such absurd heights that our young people, as well as our middle-aged citizens, cannot any longer afford a decent apartment, while the purchase of a home is out of the question without making a lifetime commitment to pay the mortgage? In view of our abundance, why did food prices continue to increase last year by more than 14 per cent, and why is a further 10 per cent increase predicted for 1974 by the President of the Grocery Products Manufacturers of Canada? In view of our abundance, why are feed prices soaring and why is milk production declining? Why are our farmers leaving the land? In view of our abundance why did the ordinary Canadian, who may have set aside a few dollars for his old age, see the purchasing power of those dollars eroded by almost 10 per cent last year, and why should he face another 10 per cent loss in their value this year?

Surely, there must be answers to some of these questions, but obviously we are not going to get them from the apologists for this government who sit to your right on the other side of the House, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister stated when speaking in this House that inflation is not a new problem. He said it was the rate of increase which is new. He went on to say that during the past two years an unprecedented round of price increases and shortages of food as well as industrial raw materials have sent shock waves throughout the entire world economy. It is easy to blame the world for your follies and failures. The world is a very big place. I would point out that international inflation only accounts for approximately one-third of our total inflation. Furthermore, the domestic, self-induced portion of our inflation has been escalating continuously since the last quarter of 1970 when the Prime Minister said "inflation is licked".

This explains the lack of confidence by the majority of Canadians in the Prime Minister's leadership and in his government. It explains the reason we have moved a vote of non-confidence in this government. One of the key reasons for our inflationary spiral can be found in the estimates, and in the booklet "How your tax dollar is spent 74-75". The new estimates show government expenditures at an all-time high and rising rapidly. The same is true for the numbers in the public service, and the amounts that they are paid. In round figures, federal civil servants are now receiving more than $4 3/4 billion a year, a jump of 50 per cent in the last five years. And there are now about 60,000 more of them than when the Prime Minister froze the growth of the civil service in 1969. If this can happen under a freeze, heaven help us if we ever experience a thaw. Unless the Prime Minister and his cabinet set to work to remove some of this fat from the system, our ship of state will have such a big crew there will be no room for any of the passengers.

The Prime Minister complains in his speech that we, as the official opposition, do not offer any workable solutions to inflation and the many other problems we face as a country. In answer to that charge, Mr. Speaker, we have offered a number of solutions to the government concerning our inflationary problems, but they have apparently been unacceptable, due to the difference between our political concepts and our priorities as compared with those of the government. For example, we have suggested that the government reduce taxes, especially the federal sales tax, on all clothing and the tax on building materials. This would be very helpful to the Canadian textile industry and to the construction industry as well as the potential homeowner. However, in order to cut back on taxes the government would have to curtail its expanding bureaucracy which it states in its 1974-75 booklet stands at 500,000 men and women—and obviously this is something it is not prepared to do. It would have to eliminate Information Canada, something it is not prepared to do. The government is not prepared to cut taxes because the system it is establishing will eventually make all Canadians subservient to the federal government.

From pupil to principal, from pauper to prince, all must come hat in hand to wait and to beg for assistance. Any business developments in Canada today must wait until any changes in transportation policies are made known, must wait until the government's DREE grant policy is established, must wait until the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) approves of the site, and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) determine the taxes to be levied, retained or written off in that particular area. That has resulted in complete stagnation insofar as industrial growth is concerned. This process is costly as evidenced by the increase in estimates. This process is costly in lost production, in lost wages and man hours, but this system gives tremendous power to the government. Every time this power increases, and it is bound to increase under the measures proposed for further government manipulation as stated in the Throne Speech, we as Canadians lose a little more of our basic individual freedom. When we look at this year's estimates, there should be no doubt in anyone's mind that the government's wasteful extravagance and its money supply policy have been the main cause of our inflation. When a government prints money to pay its own bills, and covers that deficit by causing an excessive increase in the money supply, this action triggers inflation.

I would point out also that domestic inflation is created when the rate of credit expansion exceeds the physical capacity of the nation to produce goods and services. This was touched on by my colleague the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) when he spoke in this debate. The supply of money in Canada increased by more than 70 per cent from 1970 to 1973 which is a jump unparalleled in recent history. The responsibility for this growth in the money supply rests entirely on the shoulders of the federal government, and either the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance had a complete misunderstanding of what they were doing or they knew runaway inflation would be the end result and they just did not care. Obviously, if the Bank of Canada had maintained a more moderate and constant increase in the money supply and the government had practised spending restraints, the inflationary trend in Canada could have been held to a minimum. It is not too late now to start controlling inflation. I have already indicated some of the steps that could be taken.

In addition to these we must obviously increase supplies of many commodities in order to deal with the shortages which surround us on all sides, and in order to slow down the rapid increases in prices which result from shortages. The soundest way to accomplish this is to pursue policies which will encourage investment in new productive capacity in this country. This is one of the cornerstones of Progressive Conservative policy; it is what we mean when we say we will develop an incentive society in Canada, where initiative is rewarded and where labour may enjoy a greater share of the fruits of their efforts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: We must recognize that workers look at their take-home pay when they bargain for increased wages. In light of this fact further increases in taxes, especially on our workers, will only create further tax-push inflation. This is why our leader and all members of our party are calling for a decrease in taxes. Surely, the achievement of a stable economic system is not beyond the competence of our free democratic society. What is required is the will to do it. At the present time the government has no anti-inflationary policy. Our ship of state is drifting in a fog of uncertainty. The Prime Minister spoke of marooned sailors, life rafts, great ocean liners and sea captains. Speaking as one who has lived a lifetime by the sea, I would remind the Prime Minister that many a captain has been replaced by the owners if he was found to be incompetent. However, this action is generally taken when the ship comes back to port, so we as Progressive Conservatives are looking forward with considerable anticipation to the day when Captain Trudeau and first-mate David Lewis—or is it the other way around—finally bring their ship to port and the owners, the Canadian people, have a chance to voice their opinion through their vote on the progress of our ship of state.

The Prime Minister knows about our wealth as a nation. He obviously knows about our problems, but what is truly unfortunate is that he does not have an adequate solution to offer for these problems at the present time. The Throne Speech states, among other things, that the government plans a re-assessment of existing programs in the areas of agriculture and fisheries, and that assistance will be provided to those engaged in these primary industries in purchasing or modernizing their equipment. This afternoon when speaking on this matter the Minister of the Environment spoke of Canada's new ocean policy, and said the extension seaward of Canada's responsibilities would add immensely to our mineral reserves and our fishing resources, in an area approximately 40 per cent the size of Canada. The minister said this new area, under our control, would provide increased fishing opportunities and enable our fishermen to earn a better living.

Five pieces of legislation are to be brought forward. These will be examined carefully by our party. No one would disagree with the concept announced by the government and the minister, but concern has been expressed by many fishermen over the manner in which these policies are presently being carried out. For example, over the weekend of February 15 and 16, the officials of the Department of the Environment seized the catches of four fishing trawlers and a longliner at Lockeport, Nova Scotia, and charged them with overfishing haddock. Under the regulations as laid down by Order in Council under date January 15, 1974 certain quotas were established for Canadian fishermen under the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Regulations. Among other things the regulations state that a fisherman, operating in a specific area of ocean, may catch and retain fish of a certain species if the quantity does not exceed 5,000 pounds or 10 per cent of the total weight of fish on board his vessel. Furthermore, the regulations state that when fish are seized, the protection officer shall take custody of them and sell them with the proceeds being paid to the Receiver General.

This was the course followed in Lockeport, Nova Scotia. However, the minister must have had second thoughts about holding the money which belonged to the captain and crew, for the following week the gross stock was returned to the owners, while the captains charged were required to post a bond in the amount of $1,250 as a guarantee that they would appear in court for a hearing on March 14. The fishermen had a name for this. They called it federal piracy in port.

This action on the part of the government raises many questions. First of all, the order in council of January 15, 1974 was never brought before parliament, was never submitted to the Fisheries Committee and was never debated or examined by the representatives of the people of Canada. Obviously, it was drawn up by bureaucrats who have never visited the Atlantic coast and who are obviously not aware of the problems faced by our fishermen. For example, it is impossible for our fishermen to carry out their fishing operations on the banks adjacent to Lockeport without catching more than 5,000 pounds of haddock or 10 per cent of their gross stock at this time of the year.

It is also unfair and unjust to draw up a regulation which penalizes the fishermen who work on the deck of a dragger by confiscating their share of the catch. I would point out to you, sir, that these men have no choice in determining the area in which a fishing dragger will carry out fishing operations. They must follow the captain's orders, and if a seaman lawfully engaged on a ship refuses to process the catch, if he is guilty of wilful disobedience to any lawful command, he is liable to imprisonment for a month under the Shipping Act. In view of this fact, the Order in Council of January 15, 1974, chapter 16, part 3, should be amended. In fact, the entire regulations and the penalties imposed for infractions should, in my opinion, be reviewed and no action taken against Canadian fishermen until we are reasonably certain that foreign fishing fleets are abiding by the ICNAF regulations.

When the Canadian fleet was operating on Browns Bank, no less than 13 pair trawlers of other nations were reaping a fishing harvest from the same bank which is an area of the Atlantic coast that is well known for its concentration of haddock. However, we do not have adequate surveillance to police our Canadian fishing grounds, and until this oversight is corrected, I believe we should increase the permissible percentage of haddock per catch for Canadian fishermen. There is no doubt in the minds of many fishermen that our present surveillance, especially of foreign fleets, is inadequate. In order to do this work effectively, we require immediately at least three ships off the coast of Atlantic Canada that are 200 feet in length, drawing a minimum depth of 14 feet.

Looking to the future, they should have ice breaking capabilities, a forward speed of 25 knots, and they should carry a helicopter. They should be able to carry out fishing operations when needed. With these three ships, we could have two on patrol stations at all times for two week periods, and we would then have a better knowledge of the scope of operations of the foreign fleets operating on our continental shelf. These ships would of course be available for coastguard service whenever our own or the ships of other nations were in trouble or distress off our shores.

I hope that the plight of our Canadian fishermen will be given every consideration at this time by the minister and that no action will be taken against them for doing the only thing which they are equipped to do, namely carrying out fishing operations in order to provide for their needs and those of their wives and children.

Like the mover of the address, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), I also spent some time during January visiting foreign countries. I have always believed that events which happen externally have a great influence upon our country and our people, and the only way to learn about conditions within a country is to visit that country and speak to its government members and its citizens. One of the countries I visited was Taiwan, and when I landed there on January 6, 1974 along with three colleagues from the House and our wives, we learned that we were the first representatives of the Canadian people to visit this country since October 13, 1970, the date on which the present government in Canada decided to recognize Peking as the government which represents all China. Since October 13, 1970 there has been no contact, other than trade, between any Canadian government officials and the representatives of the government of Taiwan.

Obviously we are turning a blind eye and a deaf ear to the representations made by the government of some 15 million free Chinese. In addition, we are making it extremely difficult for businessmen in Taipei to secure a visa for 30 or 60 days to visit Canada, with applications via our Hong Kong office taking approximately six months. The same businessmen can secure a visa overnight from the American embassy in Taipei if they wish to visit the United States. Naturally, the free Chinese living in Taiwan are asking why the Canadian government has adopted this attitude. They pointed out that the United States has a large embassy in Taipei and a liaison office in Peking, and the United States is trading with both countries. Since Canada has an embassy in Peking, they ask why Canada has not put a liaison office to facilitate trade in Taipei. This is a question which I believe deserves an answer from our Prime Minister.

The republic of China became one of the world's top trading nations in the past 12 years. In 1962, their foreign trade totalled only $523 million U.S. Last year, it hit an all time high of $8.2 billion, the top trading nation of the developing countries. We sold the Bonaventure to the Republic of China, to be broken up in Kaohsiung, the shipbreaking capital of the world. But I point out to you, that there are other trading opportunities open for Canada in this area if we wish to capitalize on them. They bought $2.3 billion worth of industrial raw materials last year from other countries and more than $600 million worth of electric machinery for electrifying their railway system. In view of our foreign policy, we never even had an opportunity to quote on the needs of these people. We were told by their economic adviser, Mr. Y S Sun that they are interested in buying unlimited quantities of sulphur and potash in order to upgrade their agricultural economy. We have mountains of sulphur available in this country and not too long ago we turned off the production of potash, the reason given was that we were unable to sell it. I believe we should re-examine our foreign policy as it relates to Taiwan. At the present time, an easement of trade restrictions and an exchange of cultural activities are perhaps the best vehicles for improving the situation.

I note, according to an item of expenditure under foreign affairs that the government plans to spend $4 million opening up new missions in Korea, Barbados, Morocco and other countries. Since the free Chinese support a democratic form of government I hope that some thought will be given by this government to opening a trade mission in Taipei.

Having visited India, I was made aware of the fact that, while the energy crisis poses a serious problem for developed countries, for underdeveloped countries such as India, which must import large quantities of oil, it poses the threat of disaster. This is one of the few developing countries which has maintained a democratic parliamentary government over several years and, at the same time, has developed a balanced economy in which both the private and the public sectors have a role to play. With the increase in prices for oil, India's oil bill will be more than double all the foreign aid she receives, and this situation is bound to generate an economic disorder of very serious proportions in that part of the world. That country needs our help and our expertise in the fishing industry to assist it in capitalizing on the immense fishing resources in the Indian Ocean. I hope this suggestion will be given consideration by our Department of External Affairs.

Finally, I also visited Iran, a country which is desirous of expanding its relations with Canada. The leaders of Iran see in Canada with its skills, its level of development and middle power stature, a valuable friend and an unlikely enemy. For our part, Iran should be of growing interest as a market for Canadian goods and services and as a source of oil. As a result of discussions held with Prime Minister Hoveyda, I believe he would welcome an official invitation to visit Canada and I believe that such a visit would be mutually beneficial to both countries. At present we have a huge trade imbalance with Iran, purchasing approximately twice as much from that country as it purchases from us.

I was pleased to note that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) recently visited Iran, and I would suggest also that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) consider a trade mission to Iran in order to capitalize on the trading opportunities with Iran's 32 million people. Last year that country ranked fourth among the world's oil producers and is also interested in our fishing expertise. In order to capitalize on the immense shrimp resources in the Persian Gulf, resources which their Prime Minister told me were more valuable than the oil resources, Iran is desirous of using Canadian expertise and equipment, including ships, to develop our type of civilian coastguard as opposed to the military type used by the United States. I was informed that the value of such an arrangement could be worth more than $1 billion to Canada over the next seven years. I hope our officials in the Trade Department will get on with the job. This could be another way to ease unemployment in Canada. It is another suggestion from the Conservative party. It is another way to curb our present inflationary spiral.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Peace, Mr. Speaker. Once again I am happy to be here representing the people of the Northwest Territories and to be making a few remarks in the Throne Speech debate. We, the people in the Northwest Territories, have a strong belief in democracy. In October, 1972, a large number of the people of the Northwest Territories decided they should send a representative to Ottawa who truly represented the north, because in the Northwest Territories two-thirds of the population consists of native people, and one-third non-native. As a result, they decided to send a representative down here who was two-thirds native and one-third white man.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Firth: I am very proud indeed to be representing the people of the Northwest Territories. I am very happy to be a member of the New Democratic Party of Canada, the socialist party of Canada. I was happy to be brought up as a socialist. Many hon. members of the House must know that this was the true Indian and Eskimo way of life in the past, and still is today in many villages and reserves across the country. There, people live and practice this way of life and, as I say, I am very happy to be part of it. Indeed I was fortunate to be brought up in that system.

I will be brief, Mr. Speaker. I should like to mention some very important matters of concern to my constituents, the people of the Northwest Territories, a hardy group of individuals who, under very difficult conditions, in one of the harshest climates in the world, are working hard to develop the north, to make a good life for themselves and their children. Some 35,000 to 40,000 people, as I have mentioned, mostly Indian, Eskimo and Métis, live in a part of this country where we have the highest cost of living, where we have a cold climate, a drastic housing shortage, very poor health facilities, and an extremely high cost of communications and transportation.

The average cost of communication by phone, if you should have phone service, is at least $1 a minute. To charter a small aircraft costs in the neighbourhood of one dollar a mile. In many cases we have a complete lack of such services on a regular basis. And to top all this off in this day and age, in 1974, in Canada, we do not have a real democratic government. This is a most deplorable situation. Certainly, we have an administration in the Northwest Territories which is costing $150 million—at least that is the budget for this year. But a very important question is this: are we, the people of the Northwest Territories, willing and able to accept more governmental responsibility? I suggest that the answer is yes.

Another important question is: can we pay our way? I believe we can. In the Northwest Territories today we have two producing gold mines in the Yellowknife area and you, Mr. Speaker, know the price of gold today. We have a silver mine bringing out almost pure silver at Echo Bay Lake, and a lead and zinc mine at Pine Point. We have gas and oil production facilities at Norman Wells which have been operating for the last 30 years. Now, we have natural gas being produced at Pointed Mountain in the Northwest Territories, and a large tungsten mine at Tungsten. There is a large fur trade industry, commercial fishing, and deposits of other minerals. Our potential is many times what we are producing at present. Just to mention fresh water alone, we have 50 per cent of all the fresh water available in Canada, and up there in the Northwest Territories we keep it pure, clear and cold.

I do not suggest that the north should have to buy or pay for democracy. I do not suggest that we in the Northwest Territories are ready for full provincial status. But what I do say is that I believe we are ready to have, and we would like to have, a lot more say about our destiny, about the way in which the north should be developed, and even about whether the north should be developed. That, in itself, is an interesting question. The present situation with a partly elected and partly appointed council which can be over-ruled by an appointed civil servant, is no longer tolerable. I would suggest it is indeed a dangerous situation.

In January of this year, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) spoke at Yellowknife and we were led to believe that some great announcement would be made in the Speech from the Throne. He said something to the effect that in a few months there would be amendments introduced to the Yukon Act and to the Northwest Territories Act, and that the powers of the council would be debated. Mr. Speaker, in the Throne Speech there was no mention of the north or of the native peoples of Canada. This saddens me; it saddens me a great deal.

I should like to give an example of some of the things that can happen when you have a situation which might be called a sort of dictatorship within a democracy. Believe it or not we have here in Ottawa something like an embassy for the Northwest Territories. It was set up here in Ottawa almost a year ago—11 months ago to be exact. It is known as the liaison office, or something like that, for the Northwest Territories. It has been in existence for the last 11 months, but in all that time there has been no liaison between it and the only federal member representing that part of Canada, representing one-third of Canada.

That was the situation until about February 28 when at last there was some contact. I, personally, went over to see this office, and for the information of hon. members I will supply them with its phone number and address. The phone number is 992-7289, and it is located at Room 328 in the Centennial Towers on Laurier Avenue West. I went over there and spoke to the director general in charge of this office. He did not seem to be doing very much directing, or liaison work, or anything. I told him that I usually receive a large number of visitors to my office, people seeking information about the Northwest Territories. I asked him if I should not refer some of these visitors to his office to receive such information. He said he really did not encourage that sort of thing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Firth: What kind of liaison is that? Anyway, hon. members now have his phone number and address, and I hope they will take advantage of that information.

I was saddened to note that there was no mention in the Speech from the Throne about possible legislation regarding the native population of Canada, and in particular regarding the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I have some figures here which hon. members might be interested in, and that I think are important to mention. In the period from 1963 to 1974, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development spent something like $1,813,898,000, on the approximately 250,000 treaty Indians and Eskimo people in Canada. Mr. Speaker, this is approximately $7,252 for each man, woman and child for whom the department is responsible. I think that is a very important point and hon. members should think about it.

But what has been the result of spending this approximately $1,800,000,000? We have some highly paid staff in the department, but for the Indian and Eskimo people in the land there is still extreme poverty. The first citizens of our land are still living in poverty; there is a very high dropout rate in high school; very few people reach university and there is a terrible housing situation in the country, especially in the north. Not long ago I was talking to some people who live under such conditions. Three families live in one two-bedroom house and they have to eat and sleep in shifts. There is no running water or such facilities. The money has not provided a meaningful program to help the native population break out of the poverty cycle and that is something which hon. members should think about very seriously.

I should like to mention something about the Indian Brotherhood in the Northwest Territories. After a meeting between the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the president of the Indian Brotherhood in Yellowknife on January 18, there were some news reports to the effect that the Indian Brotherhood and the government of Canada were now ready, willing and able to sit down and negotiate the land claims of the treaty Indians of the Northwest Territories. These reports were not exactly true. The fact is that for some time the Northwest Territories Indian Brotherhood has been trying to prepare for such negotiations. However, the Brotherhood does not have the resources to do so. The government has publicly announced support for such meetings to take place, but I say the government has not made sufficient funds available to the Brotherhood to enable them to prepare to negotiate their claims. At the present rate of progress of the negotiations between the Indian Brotherhood and the government of Canada, I would guess that the native people of the Northwest Territories will not be ready to sit down at the negotiating table for another three to five years.

As an example of some of the problems that the Indian Brotherhood runs into, the Wrigley people, a small group on the Mackenzie River, asked the minister for some funds to set up meetings between the out villages along the route of the proposed pipeline or railway or highway or whatever, to discuss the project. They were turned down. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is negotiation and it will not work.

There is another matter of very great importance to the Northwest Territories—that colonial part of Canada, that underdeveloped part of Canada, that part of Canada which is most important, I think, in terms of natural resources. Because the fact many people are talking about pipelines, railways and whatever, in the field of development, and because there may be a substantial increase in population in the area, serious consideration should be given to more federal representation from the north in this House. There is, indeed, a great need now for more federal representation, but once again there has been no mention of any changes in this throne speech. I believe that the people of the north deserve and have a right to more federal representation. They should have a fair say in what is happening or may happen in the north in the next little while.

Let us just take a few minutes to think about one aspect of the present system of a single member representing the Northwest Territories. Not too long ago this House decided that members may have a constituency office. In a constituency of 1,350,000 square miles with 75 or 80 communities, where would you put that office? This is just one example of the difficulties faced by the people of the north.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have very much more to say. At this time I should like to ask for a ruling from the Chair. There are a few minutes left of the time allotted to me. I do not know exactly what the rules are regarding this, but I should like to ask that, during the remaining time allotted to me, hon. members of this House be allowed to sit and think about some of the points I have made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I suppose the Chair should recognize another hon. member. I recognize the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia).

Mr. Broadbent: There is a Liberal getting up. He refuses to think.

[Translation]

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my remarks, I would like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier).

Recently, in the House, the member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) spoke about the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement. He had great criticism for the Canadian government position.

Well, I must now use the other official language to be more precise.

[English]

Contrary to the allegation made by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek), Canada has stuck to its agreement. This fact was recognized in a radio interview some weeks ago with an elected representative of the state of New York who acknowledged that Canada had lived up to its commitments. In more than one way he apologized for the slow and hesitant support that was coming from the American federal government to meet its commitment in the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement. Having listened to the kind of charge made by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley, I feel that if his facts on COJO and ABC are as correct as they were on the question of the Great Lakes, then the people of High Park have a problem on their hands.

We all know that avidity for power plays some strange tricks on people and the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) who spoke on the same day, was no exception. The hon. member for Don Valley is a great proponent of an incomes policy. He was outraged because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) suggested that an incomes policy would hurt low income groups. The hon. member for Don Valley disagrees with that statement. Unfortunately, the hon. member for Don Valley does not tell us what kind of incomes policy he has in mind. It involves the question of job security, and similar questions. Despite the political partisan considerations which might be involved in any discussion of this topic, I think he should throw some light on this somewhat difficult question and tell us what he means.

It is well known, outside academic circles at least, that it is relatively easy to control wages and salaries but not so easy to control professional and business incomes. By suggesting his incomes policy, does the hon. member for Don Valley mean that he would intend to ask those earning higher incomes to stop their demands voluntarily or even reduce their incomes, in order to provide an example of restraint? In our society, some earn $4,000 a year, and others earn $80,000. For example, hospital workers are at one end of the scale, and architects are at the other. Does the hon. member for Don Valley, who I am sorry not to see here today, intend to reduce the gap between high and low income groups? If so, perhaps he should tell us how we are to do it, instead of allowing a synthetic rage to get the better of him, as happened on Friday.

In another part of his speech the hon. member for Don Valley said that his imagination boggled at the increase in government expenditure. In February, 1973, as recorded in Hansard, page 1559, the hon. member for Don Valley said this about the deficit then being incurred:

> ... is the deficit large enough to really move this country ahead, to produce the sort of employment that Canadians have every reason to expect and to hope for within the economy. I would argue, that it is not.

The hon. member then went on to talk about the Conservative bag of tricks, namely, removal of certain sales taxes and the program to help small businessmen. He went on to say, as recorded at page 1560 of Hansard for February 22, 1973:

> If we had done these things, the deficit we would be running on a national accounts basis would be somewhat over two and one half as much as the deficit which the Minister of Finance suggested. I say to the members of this House that this country at long last needs this sort of stimulation to move ahead in an effective and improved fashion.

Well, with advice of that kind on economic matters, who needs enemies! We learned, the day after the hon. member made that speech, that the real increase in the gross national product for 1973 had run at 7.1 per cent. Does the hon. member for Don Valley mean to suggest that if we had followed policies of the Conservative Party that percentage would have been even higher? I do not know.

Last Thursday the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) solemnly declared in this House that the Conservative Party has not only proposed measures to combat inflation, but has the will to carry them out. The measures suggested were removal of all types of sales taxes. The people of Canada were not told where government expenditures are to be cut in order to offset the loss in revenue. I suppose it is fairly easy to propose the removal of sales taxes but not so easy to say what is going to happen to government revenues. Perhaps the Conservative Party has certain reduced services in mind. If so, it should tell us which kinds of services are to be reduced or removed. On the other hand, if it intends to maintain the same level of expenditures, we should know where the needed revenue is to come from.

The Leader of the Opposition talked of indexing Canada Savings Bonds and of temporary controls, to be followed by some kind of miraculous agreement to be arrived at in this country. In this regard one of our national newspapers carried an editorial last Saturday with the headline, "Expert testimony". According to the editorial, the President of the United States said that,

> "The answer to higher prices is not simply controls—controls have been tried and controls have been found wanting.
> The answer to higher prices is to get up the supplies. That will bring the price down.

We do not dispute the will of the opposition. Yet not even its best friends can claim that its will is matched by consistency and competence. In times of inflation, the argument for moderation and the slowing down of expectations should be directed at those who command higher incomes in society, not at those at the bottom of the income ladder. It is easy to preach the gospel according to St. Gillies, the gospel of no growth, when your tummy is full and your income high. If those who are successful, who command better incomes, are willing to accept lower fees, lower rents, lower returns and lower profits, then and only then can the dialogue be started towards lower expectations on the basis of solid and tangible results.

In the meantime the government of Canada will need to come to grips with excess profits, difficult to define, I agree, and to tax windfall and excess profits in order to assure the Canadian public that there is justice in our tax system. In 1973 banks and a number of corporations piled up incredibly high profits. The Canadian public considers these profit levels simply intolerable. Something must be done about them.

While prices are increasing, the consumer, in a rather complex market, needs continuous advice and help, both in the form announced in the last session by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) and in the form of community level and neighbourhood help. This sort of help must be made available, particularly in the larger urban centres of Canada. The help centres ought to be staffed by persons who are deeply committed to the public and to the protection of the consumer.

If I may move to another subject, the vast majority of Canadians supported the measures which the government and this Parliament took in controlling foreign takeovers. The recent announcement by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) about the Canadian football league has strengthened that approach. With that in mind, it is disturbing to learn what has been happening, for instance, in connection with M.L.W. Worthington Company of Montreal. That company was stopped by the Worthington Company of New Jersey from exporting locomotives to Cuba. I am inclined to think that the majority of Canadians would like to urge the government to stop the dependence of foreign controlled companies located in Canada on the laws of the country of the foreign corporation. We seem to be making some progress on this question because of the position developed in Argentina by some of the companies that are of a multinational character and which are engaged in a trade negotiation in Cuba as well.

I do not think we should be pressing this measure just because it has been possible for another country to achieve it. We should be pressing it on its own merits, on the question that a multinational corporation operating in Canada operates under the laws of Canada and not under the laws of another country. In the same category of disturbing events which belongs to years past, I would put the special treatment of Time magazine and Readers' Digest, a treatment that is presently accorded under the Income Tax Act. I urge the government to remove this treatment at the time of our next budget.

In the Speech from the Throne, mention is made of the Unemployment Insurance Act and possible amendments. I would like to dwell on this subject for a few moments. The concept of unemployment insurance served a good purpose in its time. It is a concept that is borrowed from the private sector, namely of insuring income in time of need by means of contributions which working Canadians make in the form of premiums while they are employed. It seems, however, that in the seventies this concept is becoming rapidly outdated.

In the seventies we not only have automation of the so-called post-industrial society, but we have people with better education, something we have stressed as being desirable. We have an increasing number of people who are seeking meaningful jobs in society. They simply reject the idea of working for a large corporation by doing something monotonous and of little significance to their own personality. A symptom of this is the high percentage of absenteeism found in the large automotive plants of this country. Despite the wages that are commanded, the rate of absenteeism is very high.

Other factors are changing in this decade. We have, as a result of experiments through LIP and OFY, discovered a large range of jobs that are non-profit in nature, beneficial to the community and considered to be desirable. For this reason, the time has come to turn the unemployment insurance concept into a positive institution, not one that picks up the fallout of the private sector when it cannot produce new jobs or maintain the existing level of jobs, but one that is of a job creating nature. I will try to outline this idea as quickly as I can.

Under a positive system of employment insurance, if I may call it that, the premiums paid by employed Canadians would go to the creation of jobs for those who are unemployed. We have a better educated labour force. There is an increasing need for services not provided by the private sector, services for senior citizens, retarded children, migrants and immigrants in the large cities as well as the performance of certain works in maritime Canada in the environment and in the forests, in the improvement or redressing of the environment damaged by man.

In the present unemployment insurance fund, there is sufficient wealth to ensure employment instead of simply insuring unemployment as we have been doing up until now. If we were to have an employment creating commission, a person who becomes unemployed would have a few options. As at present, he would be interviewed to see whether he qualifies for Manpower training. If so, he would take the Manpower training route. Another option would be leaving the labour force for a period of time and requesting a payment of benefits. If over the years a person had accumulated the necessary credits, that would be a prior condition, he could just leave the labour force for a certain period of time. The credits for the unemployed person would be in direct proportion to the number of years the person worked in the labour force. The longer one worked, the greater the credit, and that would govern the length of time the person could withdraw from the labour force and be paid by the fund. This could be in the form of a period of time during which a person could better his education, see the world, repair his house or engage in any other kind of activity he had in mind.

The third option open to a person who becomes unemployed, cannot find a job in the private sector, does not qualify for Manpower training and does not have sufficient credits to leave the Labour force for a period of time, would be an offer by the employment commission of a job in the public sector which would be subsidized as the result of the creation of this fund. The fund, by the way, now exists, only for a different purpose. Canadians who are employed would pay premiums to provide jobs for those who are unemployed, do not qualify for Manpower training or do not have the necessary credits to leave the labour force. The jobs created in this way would not be determined by a distant group of officials in the capital, but by a community board, people in the community, who would determine the priorities, needs and, therefore, the jobs that would have to be created as a substantial component of this national scheme.

The salaries to be paid under this approach would be arrived at in consultation with the people whose premiums paid for the creation of the jobs, namely working Canadians. There is nothing wrong with consulting Canadians on this matter. Actually, it would be highly desirable. It would indicate the degree of support for this approach. The government would learn the value Canadians put on those who were willing to take on jobs in the public sector and perform something meaningful to society, not something motivated by profit.

Designing this system would bring us closer to the concept of full employment. Employment in the profit sector, when added to those employed in the public sector embraces the largest percentage of people who are working today. This combination of the two would come pretty close to the ideal that is described in reports of the Economic Council of Canada. A system of this kind would provide opportunity for two groups of people—those who prefer meaningful work and less pay, and those who find themselves temporarily dislocated as a result of fluctuations in the private sector and are willing to accept community or environment-oriented jobs that are offered by the local commissions that would come into existence.

I appreciate the reluctance of anybody to consider new schemes and approaches that are different from ones that have been tested so far. However, it seems to me that it would be a pity if we were to embark on a series of measures to patch up and perhaps make tighter an existing system, one that has proven its service but which is rapidly becoming outdated, rather than look at alternative approaches—there may be others more desirable and valuable than the one I have endeavoured to outline this afternoon—that need these new values that are strongly developing in Canadian society. These approaches would also make profitable use of the experience we have accumulated over the years as well as the very positive and constructive experience that has been made available throughout the country through the concept of LIP.

There are other aspects in which the people of my riding are interested. As you know, Mr. Speaker, Davenport is a downtown riding of an urban nature and is fairly representative of many other ridings in urban Canada today. Very often in public discussions the question of pensions has come up, particularly the Canada Pension Plan. Meetings that have taken place between the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and his provincial colleagues have been very closely followed. At public meetings people have expressed their very keen interest in seeing changes made to the Canada Pension Plan to permit people who are not employed to contribute the full amount of the premium that is presently paid by employer and employee. These people include those who are at home and others who are not in the labour force. This means that women in particular would eventually be able to look forward to some kind of retirement pension when the time comes. This is not a novel proposal; it has been accepted in other countries of the world as part of their social security systems.

Another possible amendment to the Canada Pension Plan which has been put forward in very strong terms is that people who, for some reason or other, have suffered a serious injury but have not reached the required five-year period for contributions, should qualify for a disability pension. This would include people who suffer from progressive diseases, people who have sustained a serious car accident, and others who are handicapped. The proposal is that this five-year contribution requirement be replaced by something that is more flexible. For example, such persons could receive a pension that is in proportion to their number of years of contribution, rather than continuing the present situation where they do not qualify for a pension even if they have contributed for four years and 11 months. I appreciate the difficulties faced by the minister in implementing this approach, but nevertheless it is an argument that makes sense and which, sooner or later, deserves the attention of the minister. It is at times sad to listen to pathetic people who find themselves cut off from even a very modest disability pension simply because they have not contributed for the magic period of five years.

In the area in which I live another very important issue is developing that may have national proportions, at least in industrial centres. I refer to lead pollution. It seems that no one really knows when lead pollution reaches the danger level to health. It seems to me that there is real scope here for the federal government to come to the aid of the provincial governments and municipalities by determining what limit should be placed on lead pollution before it becomes a danger to health. There was a very interesting program on the CBC recently which brought this whole question to the surface. All hon. members are probably aware of the legal consequences; it is a matter that is very serious and I welcome this opportunity of bringing it to the attention of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret that the time of the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, like those throughout the rest of Canada, the people who live in my constituency of Leeds wonder why the government has so completely failed to deal with the problem of inflation. Undoubtedly, the galloping cost of living is by far the greatest single problem facing this country today. But the government has literally ignored the situation for months and for years in the apparent hope that it will simply go away.

Any belated death bed repentances that the government dangles under our noses now can scarcely be taken very seriously. We have heard all about magic contingency plans in the past. The Houdinis opposite have often talked about these forthcoming productions to solve our problems, but they have either turned out to be mirages or else they were nothing more than a few temporary pay-offs to the New Democratic Party in the greatest public political prostitution performance in the history of Canada.

In a recent television interview the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made it clear that he expects living costs to continue the same sharp rise this year as last year. Furthermore, both he and his government have clearly demonstrated how little they are prepared or how little they are able to do anything about the whole situation. Apparently, Mr. Speaker, this country has a Prime Minister who prefers to gaze with no concern at the Canadian scene through the windows of his $76,000 Cadillac, rather than take some action that would help the disastrous economic shape of Canada. Apparently it is more interesting for him to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars in taxpayers' money on his office or on 24 Sussex Drive than it is to worry about the elderly of this country who are being forced to exist on grossly inadequate pensions and who, in thousands of cases, have not even got a decent place to live. While the people of Canada see their tax dollars filling Sussex Drive with such things as Hepplewhite consoles, stereo equipment, fancy crystal and even Persian carpets, not one thing has been done by this government to halt or slow down the cost of living that gallops constantly upward, creating an almost impossible situation for those on low and on fixed incomes.

It would be bad enough if we had a government that had tried to deal with the cost of living and had just not succeeded, but we have something far, far worse than that. We have a government that has not even remotely tried to stop this country from moving down the road to economic disaster. Nothing could express the situation more clearly than the lead editorial in the Toronto Star of February 19, 1974. This editorial bore the most appropriate heading "Our Helpless Prime Minister", and it concluded with these words:

> But above all what is needed is a government that can be seen to have the determination and courage to try to act against inflation, the central problem of our time. Trudeau's supine indifference is simply an invitation to all Canadians to accept the inevitability of inflation and do what they can, individually and often against each other, to save themselves as best they can—the road to chaos.
> It also invites the conclusion that if Trudeau won't try, then it's time to get somebody in that office who will.

It is not really an exaggeration at all to say that, not only is this government lacking in courage and in policies to meet our country's problems, but also that it is floundering from day to day in the grips of an obsession, the obsession of staying in power by any means whatsoever. Power for the sake of power has become the guiding principle since October 1972 on the part of an administration dominated by an emperor complex rather than dedicated to the principles of Liberalism which it has in reality totally abandoned.

In this House we have witnessed the sad performance of those who apparently are prepared to say almost anything, agree with almost anything and promise almost anything, in the hope that such action will enable them to cling to office. How tragically easy it seems for those on the front benches opposite to sacrifice any beliefs, to change any policies and to espouse any programs, in desperate attempts to cling to their portfolios.

Surely, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), at least now and then, I would hope, must feel twinges of conscience that tell him it would be more admirable for him to speak out firmly and strongly in the interests of the Canadian people rather than lurking coyly in the wings, willing to swallow almost anything in the interests of being first in line when the emperor vacates the throne. Surely, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) must at least now and then secretly wish that he could be more than a puppet and pursue a real foreign policy for Canada rather than merely following the somewhat muddled and often unfathomable views conveyed to him from the palace on Sussex Drive. Surely there must be moments when the present Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) asks himself what kind of a department he inherited from his predecessor, and surely on occasion he must be tempted to risk the wrath of the east block by striking a blow on behalf of true Liberalism, which he supposedly represents in this House, by abolishing that totalitarian superpolice group perhaps better known as "Goyer's gumshoes".

A few months ago a respected member of the press gallery—if my memory is correct it was Anthony Westell—compared those on the front benches opposite in one of his articles to a group of extinct volcanoes. With all respect to this writer, it seems to me that such a comparison is not entirely appropriate. To say that those who occupy the seats of power opposite resemble extinct volcanoes is to imply that at least at one time this government amounted to something, no matter how extinct it obviously is today. Without a doubt, Mr. Speaker, the performance of this government since 1968 has clearly shown that it has never been composed of volcanoes, extinct or otherwise. A better description would be mountains of confusion never capable of eruption.

Surely, there must be times when some of those opposite, if not on the front benches at least among the backbenchers, must think seriously and regretfully about a great example of integrity they might well have followed. They once had in their midst on that side of the House a man who cared for the welfare of his country and its people above all else; a man who would never yield to political expedience for personal gain; a man who was Deputy Prime Minister but who, unlike the Minister of Finance, cared more about the problems of the nation than he did about inheriting a crown. How disconcerting it must be to those opposite that this man today still sits in this House with his integrity intact and his principles unsoiled. I refer, of course, to the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer).

I have found many persons in my constituency who seriously question the peculiar foreign policy of this country. What is the reason, they often ask, that this government seems to have turned its back on former friends such as Great Britain or those who live in the countries of western Europe? Why, they often ask, is our Prime Minister prepared to travel to Moscow and to Peking but apparently not interested in visiting Brussels, or Paris or Armsterdam?

No one can justifiably object for a moment to the diplomatic recognition of communist China. It would be unreal to pretend that it does not exist. But should we be so obsessed with the east, so orientally oriented, that we turn our backs on our diplomatic friends of longstanding in the west? Specifically, what can be said of the government's relationship with England? The words that best describe the situation are "shoddy" and "shameful". This trend began shortly after this government took office in 1968 with that great contribution by the Prime Minister when he travelled all the way to London to accomplish the daring feat of sliding down a bannister.

Then came that blue day in October, 1972, which so terrified the Prime Minister that he grabbed the nearest Union Jack and rushed off to London again. In a show of hypocrisy unequalled in the history of Canada he became overnight a confirmed and ardent monarchist. We have watched an unparalleled display of political expediency since then, as he has slyly displayed himself at every opportunity with outward expressions of loyalty and devotion to the royal family. Such rapid adjustments to fit any situation are hardly surprising to those who have examined the situation in any depth.

It is a very clear fact that we have a government that long ago threw out the window what few principles it had left in favour of doing anything to retain power. That is basically why so many of us left the Liberal party, and that is also why so many who still remain in the Liberal party, despite what they may say or may have to say in public, do not rest easy in their minds. Why should those on the other side of this House rest easy? After all, was it not their present leader who wrote these very words about them in April, 1963: "What idiots they all are". Can they rest easy when they remember that their present leader once referred to them as "the spineless Liberal herd", that he once wrote that the Liberal Party "has never been anything more than a syndicate of the private interests" and that he called the late Prime Minister Pearson such things as "Pope Pearson", "The unfrocked priest of peace"? Can they rest easy when they recall that their present leader urged Canadians to vote NDP while shortly thereafter he was engaged in a manoeuvre that took over the Liberal Party and placed him on Sussex Drive?

And above all, can Canadians as a whole rest easy with a government that can suddenly change its direction as quickly as a chameleon changes colour, a government headed by a Prime Minister who has made very clear that he seeks to master the art of jumping on a horse and rushing off in absolutely every direction at the same time if such will help him stay in office. But despite the government's many window dressing twists and turns since that near disaster of October 1972, it has really not succeeded in hiding its underlying motivation. Despite the fact that the government dressed itself in sackcloth and ashes and the Prime Minister has played his Uriah Heap repentance act to the full, nevertheless the spots of the leopard have in no way really changed.

This is a government impatient with the democratic process, a government with little respect for Parliament. It is an autocratic government so influenced by the technocrats and the eggheads both in it and around it in key positions that it is totally incapable of caring for the problems of individual Canadians. Lost in the heartless mentality of the computer, it does not worry very much about the man who is unemployed. It is not very deeply concerned about inadequate pensions being received by the elderly. It shows no feeling for those on low incomes who can scarcely carry on in the face of the staggering rises in the cost of living. And if ever there was a single incident that clearly showed me how little this government really cares about individual people, it was the case of Ronald Patrick Lippert, a Canadian who was allowed to stay forgotten in a Cuban jail for ten years and to whom the Prime Minister consistently refused to give assistance despite hundreds of requests from all parts of Canada, in particular requests from Mr. Lippert's 80-year old mother who was not well and who longed for a chance to see her son once again. In all the time that I was connected with the Lippert case, I could never understand the incredible and incomprehensible callousness displayed by the government, and particularly by the Prime Minister, toward this man. Persons with any sense of humanity could never have behaved as those in the government did, who were associated with the Lippert case.

The impatience of this government with the democratic process has been amply demonstrated by its attitude toward opposition questions, especially questions placed on the order paper of the House of Commons. In the last few months there has been an obvious effort on the part of the government to discourage such questions. Apparently any questioning is a part of the democratic process that this government wishes did not exist. We have all seen the reaction that occurs when an opposition member draws attention to questions unanswered for a long period of time. We are immediately greeted with loud boasts from the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Reid) about the fantastic percentage of the total questions that have been answered by the government. These boasts, however, have recently been followed by the sinister suggestion that answering opposition questions is too costly with the very obvious threat that those of us placing questions on the order paper had better watch out or we would be branded as squandering the taxpayers money.

I realize this particular government is composed of experts on the subject of squandering taxpayer's money but it has now become quite clear that it has developed into an expert on something else as well, namely the latest methods of stifling legitimate democratic opposition. A few weeks ago the Canadian Press news service carried a report attributed in part to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) stating that the average cost of answering an order paper question is $3,000 to $5,000. The report then went on to say that one question even cost $75,000 to answer, an obvious attempt by this government to smear by innuendo all members of the opposition who ask questions. This is probably the most questionable government Canada has ever had, so no wonder it tries to stop any penetrating examination by members of the opposition. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the cost figures put out by the government through the lips of the member for Kenora-Rainy River, alias "Dr. No", are nothing more than absolute hogwash. The $9 million total cost figure for the last session is the best baloney sliced in this country in a long time.

Sometime ago I placed questions on the order paper requesting details about those big, fat political pork barrel expenditures of public funds in the form of government advertising contracts, millions and millions of dollars being shamefully shovelled out by this government to its friends in the advertising agency business without the calling of public tenders or the obtaining of competitive presentations. Each minister simply dispenses with a free hand this insidious government largesse to those the Liberal Party wishes to reward for previous services rendered or for future favours anticipated. Recently there have been press comments on this subject by such notables as Senator Davey, the author of such questionable political gems in the past as the infamous "truth squad" and the man who the Prime Minister has now brought back from Limbo to see if there is anything left in his little bag of tricks that will keep a sinking ship afloat. The senator and his associates have described some details of the eight-man committee that will handle Liberal Party advertising in the next election campaign. Supposedly by sheer coincidence it happens to be composed of top officials from four advertising agencies which, in turn again by sheer coincidence of course, just happen to be agencies that have somehow received fat government contracts. This is nothing more than scandalous and degrading use of government advertising contracts as a political pay-off to those who will attempt to keep the government in power, presumably with some anticipation of their firms receiving another ride on the gravy train.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is not only a deplorable situation but also could be construed as an attempt to get around the limitation on expenses imposed by the new Election Expenses Act. In other words, these eight men, described by the former executive assistant to the Minister of Finance in a rare moment of political candor as "our type of people", will presumably come to the aid of the Liberal Party more or less free of charge and any subsequent fat advertising contracts that might be awarded to their firms by a Liberal government would be absolutely coincidental. Without a doubt, Mr. Speaker, the present system of awarding government advertising contract on the basis of ministerial prerogative is about the worst example that exists of a government doling out political party patronage from public funds. It is essential that steps be taken to remove millions of dollars of government advertising contracts from their present status of nothing more than political slush funds.

I would like to say a few words about the government's sacred cow, namely its methods of instituting bilingualism—and I refer particularly to the methods of institution—in the public service which it has sought to wrap in an aura of untouchableness. It has attempted to create an atmosphere in which it is immediately considered sacrilege for anyone to offer legitimate, justifiable or constructive criticism on the subject. In reality, the bilingual program and the methods of implementing it should be fully and most carefully scrutinized, in the same manner as any other government action. This sacred cow should no longer be viewed through rose-coloured glasses but instead should be completely examined in every detail for the purpose of eliminating its nonsensical aspects and at the same time assuring fair treatment to all person employed in the public service. As a start, I would suggest that Canadians are entitled to a much better performance than they have been getting on this subject from both the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) and the gadfly flitting around of official languages commissioner Keith Spicer of Westmount Rhodesian fame.

It seems to me also that we could do without cocktail circuit bilingualism, as evidenced by the spending of some thousands of dollars to give language lessons to wives of senior public servants in an unwarranted abuse of public funds. Why should the taxpayers pay for language lessons taken by the wife of the governor of the Bank of Canada who makes $75,000 a year, and why should the taxpayers of Canada be paying for language lessons taken by the wife of the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation who has been quoted in the press as saying she took language lessons so that she could get along better in French at cocktail parties? Already $85,000 are reported to have been spent on this particular nonsensical aspect of the implementation of bilingualism, and I suggest it should be stopped forthwith. I believe that the implementation of bilingualism in this country, the methods being used by this government, has become a mismanaged monstrosity manipulated for political purposes and that a thorough examination is certainly warranted.

In conclusion, and with regret, I must say that I have found in my constituency, and places elsewhere as well, disillusionment with Canada as it is today. There is a feeling, which I believe is justified, that this country is drifting in a sea of economic and social confusion because there is not a firm hand at the rudder prepared to deal with our problems. Surely, it is time that the interests and problems of Canada and its people were attended to. Surely, it is time for an end to government by emperor complex, for an end to government that classifies democratic opposition as nothing more than nobodies. Indeed, it is time for an end to a government that wants to hold office, not for the prime purpose of doing good things for ordinary people but for the sake of clutching power in the palm of its hand. Canada needs a government that is prepared to come to grips with our social and economic problems. Canadians deserve a government that will fight the cost of living with something more than the inaction and the empty words of recent years.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like, first, to extend my congratulations to our new Governor General and wish him the very best in this most arduous post. I should also like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Speech from the Throne. Their efforts reflect the great contribution that has been made in this House by the younger, newly elected members, and also the growing concern of the whole House about the poverty which exists in Canada and throughout the world.

In reflecting, after one year in the House, the thing that stands out in my mind is the essential fragility of Canada as a country. We see the great problems with the two languages and the multicultural problems. We see problems in the poor and welfare areas of the country. We see problems between the developed and the undeveloped areas, and we see problems between the provinces and the federal government which result in clashes between them.

Mr. Neil: And nothing is being done about it.

Mr. McRae: A lot is being done about it and I will come to that in a moment. I see Canada as an essential core with an outer area, and with clashes between the centre and the outer area. This is another of those stresses which we see.

I should like to deal for a few minutes with two or three major problems facing this country to illustrate its fragile nature and to stress what I think is needed, namely, a much stronger federal initiative. We must listen to the provinces, but then we must make our stand.

I should like to deal briefly with the whole matter of our energy policy as it has been laid down and as it is developing. Sometimes when we deal with a topic as large as this it is well perhaps to dig ditches and build bridges. In other words, I would like to stop at a certain point and deal intensively with one matter, then go over other parts rather quickly.

There are three basic elements to our energy policy. The first one is an adequate and secure supply for all of Canada. I think that we must deal with an adequate supply both in the long and in the short run. In the short run, we were very concerned in the latter part of the last session and in this session with the possibility of an emergency this winter. For many reasons this emergency has not occurred, and I hope it will not occur. Of course, the energy allocation bill was the result of that concern. However, I should like to spend a good deal more time on the long-run aspects of our energy policy, because I think the situation is much more grave in the long run. I believe, too, there has been far too little concern about this aspect.

First, I will talk about oil. Early in 1972, the Canadian geological survey indicated that Canada had 135 billion barrels of ultimately recoverable reserves of conventional crude oil. A year later, early in 1973, this figure was reduced to 99 billion barrels, but not because we had used anything like that quantity in that period. In fact, we had used less than a billion barrels, but the figure was reduced because the information that the government had was changed. The information was changed, I think, because the department itself was a little more careful about checking its sources and was doing more work in arriving at these figures.

A year has passed since these figures were published. It is my estimate that the figure now is closer to between 60 and 70 billion barrels. In other words, our estimate of reserves ultimately recoverable of conventional crude oil has gone from about 135 billion to about 60 to 70 billion, or about half of what it was two years ago. Also, I think it is very significant that there have been no significant finds of conventional crude oil in the offshore areas or in the north since this 135 billion barrels figure was posed. So, we are still speculating so far as this is concerned.

Now, we do have a very large source of oil which we know exists. Perhaps the exact quantity is not available, but it is certainly very significant. I refer to the tar sands in Alberta and Saskatchewan. We do not have to spend time to explore or find these tar sands. We know where they are. For instance, we know that perhaps 50 billion to 60 billion barrels could be obtained through strip mining, but there would be great problems associated with it.

We are told that by 1985 Canada will require approximately 2 billion barrels of crude oil per year, and that our conventional western reserves will be used up by that time. At present, we have about 10 to 12 years of ultimately recoverable conventional western crude in our reserves, and I repeat that by 1985 these reserves will be just about depleted. As a result, we will be dependent on the conventional crude we find in the interval, and on the tar sands. I think it behooves us to realize that the tar sands are the significant area upon which we must concentrate. The problems involved in getting 2 billion barrels per year out of the tar sands will be tremendous. I am told that Canada will require something like 17 extraction plants using a strip mining process which would entail an investment of something like $30 billion.

Even if that amount of money were available, there would still be a problem in bringing the plants into production at a rate much faster than one every year and a half, or one every two years. As a matter of fact, an Alberta government interdepartmental study of the tar sands suggested that four years might be the minimum period for bringing each plant into production. I am told the industry suggests it could be done once every two years or once every year and a half. Obviously, this means that we could not get 17 plants into operation by 1985. As a matter of fact, the small Syncrude plant now in operation will not be on full schedule until 1978. In addition to the job of getting the plants on stream in time there is a significant environmental problem in that the process requires a great deal of water. Water has to be converted into steam, and the steam is then used to extract the oil and gas from the sands.

Considering these factors, it seems to me that the very large body of oil, possibly 200 billion or 300 billion barrels, that is in situ below the area that can be strip mined, is the one that can be of most benefit to us in the long run if we can develop the right extraction processes, particularly in terms of the environmental considerations. But at this particular point in time, no really worthwhile research has been done on how that significant body of oil could be recovered and put on stream.

So far as natural gas is concerned, we can assume that we have about 20 to 25 years supply in normal positions, that is, in areas from which it can be delivered fairly simply, with fair quantities of gas in other areas where its extraction will require tremendous investment. Here I mention the north in particular.

We also have massive reserves of coal. But there are problems attendant on the use of coal in large quantities, environmental problems, sulphur problems, dust problems. As an example, for the community of Thunder Bay, Ontario Hydro is now proposing to erect a thermal plant which would use lignite shipped in from the west. The Thunder Bay residents have expressed strong opposition to this proposal, opposition which I support, because this means that a significant amount of dust will be spread through the atmosphere wherever the coal is landed. Environmental problems will arise also from burning the coal, and these, too, will affect the community.

We are coming to the end of the road in generating electricity from water power. Now we have embarked on projects such as James Bay and South Indian Lake. One possibility which disturbs me very much is that rumours are afloat that work might be undertaken in the future on the Albany River. When such diversions occur, we do irreparable damage to the environment of the areas affected. Up to this point I have been dealing mainly with the supply side, and the brightest spot on that side is the nuclear possiblities. The CANDU reactor project has been a most successful one, successful beyond the dreams of the engineers who set it up. I do not think anyone expected the kind of load efficiency attained, which has been something like 95 per cent.

I think a serious look should be taken at the success of the CANDU plant at Pickering to see if it would not be possible to phase out some of the more difficult, more dangerous, and more environmentally expensive parts of the James Bay project in favour of using another CANDU nuclear plant. This is something that should be examined before the James Bay project proceeds much further.

But there is a serious problem associated with the CANDU plant also, particularly if we were to build 200 or 300 of them, and that figure is quite possible when one looks at the demand curves. With such a number we would have problems with heat, with nuclear waste, and with producing heavy water, although lately we have had more success in the latter area.

There are other ways in which energy supply can be increased, but all of them present serious problems. For instance, the gasification of coal is looked upon as something that can be done fairly easily. However, we must remember that this requires huge amounts of water. If the Americans intend to gasify a large quantity of coal—and it is said that they have enough coal to last them for 200 to 300 years—they will require huge amounts of water. Once again we would be placed under a strain. Where would they get the water they require? Approximately 2½ tons of water are needed for each ton of coal in order to produce gas. Of course that water would have to come from somewhere, and the Americans would naturally look to Canada for this water.

The requisite technology is nowhere in place for the development or the recovery of solar energy. Other suggestions such as biomass, and so on, have been put forward, but such developments are a long way off. The technology is not available. But even if by some magic sleight of hand we could develop all the energy we require, I think we would only be compounding our problems. I say this because if we were to increase our supply of energy, then we would use up other resources more quickly and eventually would run out of those. For instance, our supply of zinc would not last long if we decided that all cars should be electric. We would not have enough zinc under the earth to supply batteries for those cars. There are some very great dangers inherent in increasing energy supply at the rate we consider necessary.

Let us look at the demand side. We have looked at the supply side and it is grim. If we continue at a 5 per cent growth rate to the turn of the century—that is 27 years—we would have a factor of four: we would be producing four times the goods and services we are producing now. By 2028 we would be producing 16 times the goods and services we are producing now and would need 16 times the energy if the growth rate were 5 per cent. By 2056 we would need 64 times the amount of energy we are using today. That is what we call the demand side.

If you take the supply curves and the demand curves and plot them, as has been done by the Energy Board and other groups such as Gulf Oil, you see supply curves that rise fairly gently. In other words, we are only going to increase the energy supply slowly. But you see demand curves that go up almost perpendicular, and by 1978 or 1980 these curves cross. Beyond that point, the demand is ridiculous. I feel that we must take a real good look at the demand side and ask how we can reduce the demand for energy and the demand for natural resources. This is the important issue of the seventies, and if we do not solve it we are not going to make it into the eighties.

I have suggested that if we continue looking at these questions in terms of supply only all other things are going to run out. We have the supply question getting us into messes like the James Bay project, South Indian Lake, the South Albany River, the Mackenzie Valley oil and gas and these kinds of things. We have to find the massive investments required even for the gentle supply curves—$75 billion to $100 billion—in the next ten years and face the distortion that this will create in the economy.

My community is very involved in and dependent upon the pulp and paper industry. If there is an investment of $75 billion to $100 billion in energy alone, then a lot of it is going to come from the United States and other parts of the world. How are these countries that have to spend so much to get their energy, going to buy our pulp and paper? The Canadian dollar has gone up to $1.03 and $1.04 already, so what will be the distortion if we have such massive energy investments?

Inflation is a problem which the opposition has been talking about a great deal lately. One of the reasons for it is that we have a very heated economy with a 7 per cent growth rate. I was talking about 5 per cent when I said that by 2056 we would need 64 times the energy that is used now. In the last year we have been running at a 7 per cent growth rate and this has had a tremendous effect upon inflation. I think we really have to look at the cost of the demand side of our energy pattern.

I was very pleased to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) speak about the demand side in a statement made on New Year's Day, and I should like to quote from it. He said:

> All of the resources we now take from the earth come at an enormous price. This price is in effect a distress signal, a warning that thoughtless exploitation can in the end lead only to tragedy. To continue our present rate of consumption would be to deplete in short order the heritage of countless centuries, to squander mankind's only legacy on this small and finite planet.
> What we face now is not deprivation, but the challenge of sharing. We need not do without, but we must be good stewards of what we have. To ensure nature's continued bounty, we are not asked to suffer, but we are asked to be reasonable. We are asked to adjust our demands to nature's limitations, to realize that unrestrained consumption by individuals and economic sweepstakes among nations are not acceptable ideals.

I think this is one of the most important statements that have been made in the last two or three years, and there are certain things that flow from it. One is the setting up of a conservation office. I do not think that many of us are aware of this office but it is an important step and every support should be given to it to do the job that is required. Here are some suggestions on what it could do.

An important area in which the consumption of energy could be considerably reduced is interurban transport. As an example, in terms of gross tonnage rail transportation achieves 550 ton miles per gallon as opposed to highway transportation which gives only 38 ton miles per gallon, so there is a tremendous energy saving in using rail transportation. In net tonnage, rail would give 200 ton miles per gallon and movement by truck would give 50 ton miles per gallon, so the implications for piggybacking in this industry are enormous. Building a railway would only take from one-third to one-sixteenth of the energy used to build a highway, and about one-quarter of the space. A railway would use only about one-sixth of the fuel per passenger mile that would be used for air transportation. This has serious implications in terms of Pickering airport. Do we need it in light of the supply of energy and the demand for energy today? Should we not ask if it is a feasible proposition? Is rapid ground transportation not a much more sensible solution to the problem, considering the energy situation? Rapid ground transportation would only use about one-sixth of the energy necessary to move passengers by air. A great deal of consideration should be given to this question.

We should also look at better forms of urban transportation in an effort to keep cars out of our cities. Again, great savings in energy could be achieved by different kinds of housing construction, improved insulation and so on. There might be changes in our life style because we have to restrict our consumption of energy; indeed, such changes are being anticipated.

When we talk about this whole matter of demand, we are talking about a growth rate that is today 5 per cent, 6 per cent or 7 per cent. But that growth rate perhaps should go back to one per cent or 2 per cent if we are to rationalize the demand and supply sides of this problem. Slowing growth involves many difficulties. We must examine the psychology of growth. We know what happens in a bureaucracy. A bureaucrat sees his power, position and income increase in proportion to the number of people working under him. That situation is common to all bureaucracies and is one of the reasons underlying growth. Growth has been the big bogey, so to speak. We have said that it is needed for the creation of new jobs. That being so, we must look at other ways to create jobs, if necessary without growth. Perhaps job sharing and income diversification programs could be considered. Certainly, lowering the rate of growth would have a strong anti-inflationary effect.

When I speak of lowering the growth rate in Canada, I do not mean that there should be no growth, or that we should not redistribute growth. Certain areas, such as the Golden Horseshoe area, where growth is creating all kinds of problems, should be free from growth for some time at least. The mayor of Toronto has been loud in complaining about the growth of the city. He suggests that growth should be diverted to other parts of the country.

An hon. Member: Send him to Cornwall.

Mr. McRae: If I may move on, I suggest that our energy policy must involve adequate and secure supplies, and a delivery system capable of delivering those supplies. Those of us who come from northern Ontario, in particular, were happy to hear the government announce that an all-Canadian pipeline will be built by the end of the decade which incidentally would serve northern Ontario.

Our energy policy must also recognize that there are serious problems connected with Canadian ownership and control of our energy industry, particularly in the field of petroleum. We need more control over the industry. By setting up the national petroleum corporation, we shall be able to exercise greater control. Personally, I am in favour of purchasing one of the larger national companies. Certainly, we want to control the industry. In particular, we must gain control of the tar sands, which is where the development will take place in the next 20, 30, 40 or 50 years. It is also important for the national petroleum corporation to involve itself in supporting Canadian independents in exploration and also the Independents involved in the distribution of energy products such as gasoline.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member, to remind him that his time has expired. He can continue if he has the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, I will wrap up my remarks quickly. I suggest that a single, fair price across the country is also an important consideration. I could speak for another 40 minutes on this topic, and for that reason I will leave it. Nevertheless, the need is there.

May I also touch on transportation. The west faces transportation problems. As we get most of our petroleum and other forms of energy from the western provinces, and I am thinking especially of Alberta, we must make sure there is a quid pro quo, that is a better transportation policy for the west. I suggest that the National Transportation Act ought to be revised completely. We should revise the structure of freight rates. Unless the Act is revised, we will restrict growth to the centre core and keep it from spreading to those other parts of the country where growth is necessary. By using our transport system, we can diversify our manufacturing processes and the location of secondary industry across this country. That, I think, is extremely important.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, although I would love to spend more time on transportation and on agriculture, I suggest as strongly as I can that there is a vital need for a strong federal presence in this country. The federal government must consult with the provinces, but in the long run the federal government must take a strong stand on behalf of all Canadians.

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the throne speech has been described as a typical, vague document containing goodies appealing to all regions of Canada and all Canadian citizens. When one reviews the track record of the government in the last session of parliament, that approach is understandable. But, sir, I must emphasize that the Speech from the Throne avoids dealing with the issue most important to each and every Canadian, his health.

The government's disregard of major health problems, national in scope, will result in needless tragedies in the homes of thousands of Canadian families. During the last session of Parliament numerous proposals were introduced by members of my party, and by other hon. members of this House, which would have contributed effectively, in a positive way, to the health of Canadians; but no action was taken.

During the last session, I clearly enunciated an action oriented program to deal with the major problems of alcohol and drug abuse, and again no action was taken. Only today, during the question period, I raised a very special issue concerning the Medical Research Council, the importance of that particular organization and its interrelationship with health care in Canada. Again, the answer did not suggest that there would be action. I respectfully suggest that if the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), who is not present, spent less time kicking around political footballs and spent more time devoting his energy to the health of Canadian citizens, perhaps the comments which I am about to make would be redundant and programs dealing with health problems would have been included in the throne speech.

May I remind this House, and in particular the government, that with the passage of the Department of National Health and Welfare Act in 1944, establishing the Department of National Health and Welfare, it was clearly defined that the department was charged with the duties, powers and functions extending to and including all matters—I repeat, all matters—relating to the preservation of the health, social security and social welfare of the people of Canada over which the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction. I cannot emphasize too strongly that this government has not discharged its responsibilities in carrying out these duties, unfortunately to the detriment of countless thousands of Canadians.

Governments must work continually to fulfil their responsibilities of public trust and confidence, but it is also true that individuals must assume personal responsibility for the promotion and maintenance of their own good health. Future federal government health policy must reflect this dualistic approach. More emphasis must be given to disease prevention and to the development of educational programs designed to influence our health habits. We need a change from the present belief that good health and good medicine are synonymous. There is a need for the re-thinking of our manpower and institutional requirements. Our preoccupation to date has been with the health care organization and management which uses approximately 95 per cent of the health dollar. It is clear that the answer to many of the problems in the area of health care management depend upon appropriate federal-provincial consultation and co-operation.

I believe that the financial impasse facing the provinces can be resolved and, in accomplishing this goal, energies can be more effectively directed to health problems. There should be immediate negotiations with the provinces to effect a transfer of tax point payments to provincial jurisdictions. Surely, the provinces facing the ultimate responsibility of controlling costs should have the growth in tax revenue as a strong base upon which to launch extensive health program reorganization and further development in critical areas of need.

This implies, of course, that the entire management and administration of the health care organizational aspect of health should be transferred to provincial control. In order to do so, it would be necessary for the provinces to accept national uniform standards and guidelines designed to promote a comprehensive, universally accessible, portable system between all provincial jurisdictions, and recognize that the federal government has an important leadership role as well as the responsibility to develop programs designed to attack problems national in scope. In conjunction with the foregoing proposals, the federal government should guarantee that no future forced cost-shared health programs would be introduced without the agreement of the provinces.

A problem of major concern is that related to physician manpower requirements. Inequities have developed in the distribution of physicians throughout Canada. There is a necessity for immediate high level federal-provincial negotiations to achieve the following objectives. We need to define the total health manpower needs. We need to establish specialist requirements in all areas of post-graduate study. We need to determine an appropriate number of specific specialists per unit of population. There is an absolute need to encourage physicians to practice in rural and northern areas by devising methods of incentives. We must, of course, re-evaluate our medical school production capability. One is constantly concerned with the large number of excellent applicants, young people in Canada, who have the ability to become excellent physicians, but are unable to carry on their studies because of the lack of facilities. We must devise methods of encouraging greater entry by students into family medicine.

An area of growing importance is the use of computer technology. There is a need, in concert with the provinces, to update and modernize existent computer technology in Canada. Moreover, the federal government in cooperation with the provinces should undertake the responsibility of developing an ongoing annual health status survey of Canadians. While the privacy of each Canadian would be preserved, the survey would uncover new problems accurately and early. In addition, the survey would allow evaluation and analysis of the impact of various federal and provincial programs.

The possible benefits from regionalization of health care has been enunciated by this party in the past, and will contribute substantially to the rationalization of our present health system. While the ultimate responsibility for implementation remains within the jurisdiction of the provinces, it is the responsibility of the federal government to assist in the establishment of national norms and standards. To accomplish this goal, the federal government should extend the mandate of the community health directorate of the Department of Health and Welfare to assist such areas as the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and individuals such as Indians and Eskimos.

Environmental health problems are of particular interest and concern. It is important to recognize such problems may have an adverse affect on the individuals health and yet that individual is powerless to correct or eradicate the problem. It is clear in such situations government must intervene to protect the health of the individual. To achieve the necessary coordination in attaining many diverse ends in the matter of environmental health, the federal government should immediately create a federal interdepartmental committee, chaired by the Department of the Environment, with representatives from other effected departments to coordinate all aspects of proposed action on environmental problems including identification of these areas, full assessment of proposed action, establishment of priorities, setting of objectives, development of standards, support of necessary research, and proposed legislative action.

Emerging as the number one problem affecting the health of Canadians is that of lifestyle. Lifestyle health refers to those aspects of health over which individuals exert decision-making and control. Sadly, it has been the neglected area in our disease-oriented, physician-centred health care system.

In the past, little effort has been advanced by governments and little interest expressed by individuals for change. In part, this lack of personal responsibility has been due to lack of desire and, in particular, lack of knowledge on the part of Canadians to give up immediate pleasure for long-term health benefits. However, it is evident that value-systems of Canadians are undergoing change as demonstrated by a resurging interest in physical fitness, and the federal government should give every possible encouragment to this trend.

The responsibility for co-ordinating and providing leadership in prevention policies in this field should be part of the new duties of the federal department of health. May I again re-emphasize the pre-eminent responsibility of each province in the provision of actual treatment and rehabilitative facilities.

I want to turn to some of the specific problem areas in which there is no evidence of federal leadership and in which it is required. To do that, I will refer to some statistics. Although they are boring, I think they will at least establish the priorities. I wish to refer to the year 1971 for potential years of life lost. That is very simply calculated by taking the age of 70 as the average lifespan. For example, if someone should pass away at age 40, we would calculate there were 30 years of potential life lost.

In 1971, the potential years of life lost were 1,317,651. Of 124,795 deaths, many were preventable. Let me list some of the figures. Heading the list is motor vehicle accidents with 212,925 potential years lost. As the result of ischemic health disease, 193,380 years of life were lost. Other accidents accounted for 178,792 years of life lost. Respiratory diseases and lung cancer were fourth on the list. Fifth on the list was suicide followed by cancer of the breast, uterus and ovaries, strokes, cardio-vascular accidents, gastro-intestinal cancer, leukemia and cirrhosis. I am sure these figures indicate where the priorities lie and the need for leadership in these areas is obvious.

I wish to deal with the first group, cardio-vascular disease. At the present time there is no program, national in scope, to deal with this most devastating problem. If we are concerned about the health of Canadians, I believe that a major assault must be launched in Canada by the federal government to influence the incidence of cardio-vascular disease and the resulting morbid end results of this disease process. The program should at first be preventive in nature by influencing the decisions of individuals to discontinue lifestyle patterns which contribute to the course of cardio-vascular disease.

A national policy is required urgently to promote lifestyle changes in the dietary habits of Canadians. Targets must be established to control obesity as well as levels of consumed saturated fats. These educational programs must be directed not only to the public but as well to all interested professions.

Aggressive programs designed to decrease patterns of cigarette smoking are urgently required. Further, the tobacco industry should be obliged to decrease the levels of nicotine and tars in an effort to reduce the health hazards of smoking.

Lifestyle practices of sedentary living with lack of physical fitness must be overcome. We should extend present federal programs in this area to reach, in particular, men between the ages of 40 and 70.

Immediate negotiations should begin between the federal government and the food processing industry to set standards for the processing of "lean prepackaged meats"; to establish greater use of vegetable fats; to alter the level of saturated fats in some dairy products. Likewise, standards are required for the level of saturated fats in baked goods, and finally, guidelines need to be established for total fat content in all packaged food.

I now wish to turn to another area in which there is no federal leadership or involvement. I refer to cancer and lung disease. There can be little doubt that cigarette smoking patterns play a major role in lung cancer statistics, and not only in statistics relating to lung cancer but statistics relating to chronic bronchitis, emphysema and athsma. Since tobacco is a highly addictive drug, withdrawal is difficult to achieve. Research must be urgently mobilized not only to discover pharmacological substitutes to assist in withdrawal, but also to uncover and demonstrate viable program techniques to assist each individual in organized community programs of withdrawal. Research must be stepped up in the search for low carcinogenic tobacco strains through the collaborative efforts of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Medical research in the whole area of cancer must be stepped up. The Medical Research Council must be supported with additional funds in this particular endeavour. Of course, delays in transmitting research results to the clinical level must be overcome. In addition to this, public programs advising Canadians of the cancer danger signals must be stepped up.

Let me turn next to the problem of motor vehicle accidents. As I indicated earlier, the potential years of life lost is tops on the list. In 1969, three million hospital days attributable to all accidents were recorded. It is time we looked for driver responsibility in terms of traffic fatalities and accidents.

There are a number of considerations which must be undertaken when working with driver lifestyle factors in automobile accidents. Provincial jurisdictions must reconsider relicensing examinations and education to supplement present driver education programs. Reckless, inconsiderate and fast driving must be stopped through these educational programs. Mental health programs will help cut down on the incidence of suicide in terms of motor vehicle fatalities. Since 50 per cent of traffic fatalities involve use of alcohol, we should seriously consider introducing compulsory breathalyser examinations in all serious accidents and provide stiffer penalties for drunken driving.

In addition, Canadians must be educated as to the effects of legitimate drug use on driving skills, particularly when these drugs are mixed with even small amounts of alcohol. We must also seriously consider making seat belt use mandatory, a matter mentioned recently in the press. The capabilities of the federal departments of health and transport, along with official agencies in this field, should be mobilized to define a strategic set of objectives and priorities.

The next area I want to talk about, in which there is minimal federal involvement and no leadership, is the area of alcohol and drug abuse. There is no other area of health of more concern to our citizens, and in particular to parents, than that of alcohol and drug abuse within our society. I spoke at length in the last session about the necessity for an action oriented program, so I have no intention of reviewing in detail that particular area. May I remind hon. members of the House that the LeDain commission has confirmed the seriousness of the problem and has made many positive recommendations which this government has ignored.

In this area of health, all provinces are at work in the implementation of treatment programs and the development of educational preventive programs. Unfortunately, much of this work is duplicative, fragmented and uncoordinated. Federal leadership is required desperately to assist the provinces and the many voluntary agencies.

Once again I call on the government for the formation of a national institute for drug and alcohol dependencies to serve as the vehicle for the implementation of such a program. Such an institute would provide a framework for federal-provincial co-operation of an unprecedented order. It would be charged with the development of working relationships with all treatment, rehabilitation and prevention agencies.

I want to make a few comments, if I may, about mental health. In no other area of health are the direct and indirect financial costs greater, the tragedies in families more profound, and the personal distress to the patient more agonizing, than in the area of mental health. In no other area is the lack of federal participation in the sharing of costs, and the lack of federal leadership in developing programs, greater than in the area of mental health. I have stated earlier the need for a new cost-sharing formula that is based on the tax point transfer mechanism. This consideration, of course, must include more reasonable participation by the federal government for provincial responsibilities for mental health.

[Mr. Holmes.]

It is also necessary to establish immediately a high priority task force of professionals to identify not only the specific audiences that would benefit from educational approaches, but also the teachers, community and professional personnel who would carry the burden of guidance or counselling. In addition, this task force would identify the research priorities in the whole area.

Canada should and must have a national mental health act. This legislation would promote research into the cause and treatment of mental illness; establish manpower training requirements; set out educational programs for community workers, including teachers, the clergy and interested and concerned parents; and provide for special demonstration projects designed to improve programs of prevention, diagnosis, treatment and rehabilitation.

Finally, after appropriate consultation with the provinces, serious consideration should be given to the formation of a national institute for mental health. The federal and provincial governments, professional agencies, and the universities, as well as consumers, would participate in effectively integrating and co-ordinating all important mental health activities.

Again the federal government has ignored another extremely important area, the special problems of the aged. Older age groups are increasingly subjected to debilitating diseases which require prolonged hospitalization. Once again I think it is very clear where our priorities are in terms of research, prevention, treatment and rehabilitation. While we recognize the importance of a young, energetic work force, it is essential that senior citizens continue to be productive to society and to themselves. There is no doubt that the mental health of our senior citizens can be enhanced through continuing productive participation. Indeed, our senior citizens want to be recognized; they want to be part of our society. Besides, many sectors of our every day economy continue to require part time assistance, consultation and advice from these expert senior age groups.

The aging process is also related to many single discomforts of life that can often be resolved with prompt intervention. For example, nutritional disorders can be linked to buying power or can be linked to the lack of proper fitting dentures. The lack of glasses and hearing aids are major problems. I believe that these problems can be resolved easily through co-ordinated action by the provincial and federal governments, and discussions should be held immediately with the provinces to accomplish this end.

Throughout my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I have been asking for a concerned, compassionate government to assume their responsibilities in attacking major health problems, and I have asked the individual Canadian to join the team to improve the health of all Canadians. To achieve this goal and to enhance the motivational process of all Canadians, I would strongly urge the creation of a national health advisory council. In addition to representation from professional groups, researchers, university administrators and the Department of National Health and Welfare, I propose that membership also include health care consumers with appropriate regional, ethnic and social class representation, as well as specific consumer health interest groups. Recommendations from the multitude of government agencies, professional groups, official or voluntary agencies which pertain to major policy decisions to be considered by the government of Canada should be reviewed and assessed by this council with the capacity of making appropriate recommendations to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde).

I should now like to say a word or two, if I may, about health research in Canada. The ultimate goal of all health research is to improve the health of each Canadian. Research is linked intimately to the training of professional manpower and a high quality health care system which is further dependent upon viable research. This government has failed to recognize the fundamental truth that medical and health education, medical and health research, as well as the health care systems are linked inseparably to research and health research problems.

To resolve the numerous research problems, I would urge a bold new approach to total health research in the form of an all-encompassing national health research institute. This institute would represent a partnership between the federal government, universities and individual researchers in all fields of endeavour. The board would consist of representatives from universities, administrators and researchers from government and from consumers of health services. This board would report directly to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and hence to the Cabinet. I can visualize three major components of such an institute: The bio-medical area which is presently under the direction and supervision of the Medical Research Council, and its terms of reference should be expanded; a health care organization to continue the present efforts of the national health grants program, which should be enlarged; and the third area, that of prevention, to include coordination of lifestyle and environmental research components of health.

It is clear that in removing some areas of jurisdiction from government we have effectively asked that universities and the public share the responsibilities for guiding our research destiny. The first task for this new agency would be to establish a national research policy all-encompassing in scope. This body would identify those specific needs and priorities requiring urgent attention, and institute appropriate research programs. Such a body would report to the minister on human and financial resource requirements. Such an agency must promote a higher and more effective dialogue between governments, universities and the public, and there must be periodic evaluation, assessment and recommendations for improvement of the health care system. This agency should link itself in a workable manner with those activities I suggested in respect of a national institute for drug and alcohol dependency. This agency should ensure the academic freedom and present high level of excellence of our researchers, and guarantee stability for those researchers in the health field.

In conclusion, it is the individual Canadian who must capture our concern. When responsive and responsible governments address themselves to health problems and join with an interested and concerned public, as I believe is possible then I have no doubt we can improve the health status of all Canadians.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. member for Saint-Michel (Miss Bégin) may I advise the House that pursuant to Standing Order 40 the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales)—Industry, Radio Engineering Products Company Limited—inquiry as to sale and recovery of indebtedness to Crown; and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Veterans Affairs—Recipients of war veterans' allowances, old age security and guaranteed income supplement—Provision of cost of living increases.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of th motion of Mr. Stollery for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stanfield (p.31).

[Translation]

Miss Monique Bégin (Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, before extending the usual wishes, may I convey to the House the pleasure and pride of my fellow citizens of Saint-Michel who have discovered, as it were, our Governor General His Excellency Jules Léger through his interviews on television and have immediately felt drawn to him. As for Mrs. Léger, my colleagues all noted last week that we were so much at ease in the elegant residence of Rideau Hall that I wonder if she did not find it trying when we lingered there.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to convey once again to you and your assistants for that second session of the 29th Parliament, my best wishes in carrying out your very heavy responsibilities.

Before dealing with the main issue, that is the Speech from the Throne, I would like to say a few words on the profession of member of Parliament. On behalf of my colleagues I would like to thank the Speaker and President of the House of Commons of Canada for this co-operation in drafting regulations relating to hon. members' offices within federal constituencies.

The government caucus had laid upon me the responsibility for getting hon. members' opinions on this question and piloting that long awaited project. For the next few minutes I would like to talk a little about hon. member's task at a time when our role is getting greatly discredited, when the importance of the politician in the economic, social and cultural life is more important and real, when there is worry and when it is essential to have a fair representation of the people, so that this job may be really open to men and women who are willing and able to serve their fellow citizens and their country, even if they are not rich and are unable to face very high election costs and so that they may not only enter politics but do their job in a serious and sincere way.

It is a common saying in the general public that the member of parliament is some kind of person of standing who is entitled to mysterious privileges, in short, a person of standing who does not work very much and has an easy life. This I say without any resentment, but I think it is important to say here, sixteen months after my election, that this idyllic description has nothing to do with reality, at least for the great number of members I got to know and who have become colleagues and friends of mine.

In our Parliament, a session now lasts 10 or 11 months of the year, five days a week and three entire evenings, besides the tiring hours of work in committees of the House, including hearings held across the country. Added to that the usual work of a member of Parliament on behalf of his constituents and of those who request his help. Such work is a daily task which knows no rest during weekends. I am not mentioning here the caucus meetings, the representation duties, etc.

Last year, at this time, I was directly in charge of the interests of about 150,000 citizens. In one year, this number has been increased by 25,000. Did anyone ever ask what were the working tools of the federal member of Parliament in order to serve his constituents? After a month in office, I was astounded at the telephone bill that was awaiting me! And yet, all these long distance calls were about my work as a newly elected member of Parliament, due to problems brought to my attention by my constituents. A few months earlier, I was one of the 400,000 public servants, a specialist "at the service of the people". Today, I am on the other side of the fence, if I may say so, one of the 264 "general practitioners at the service of the same people". Before, I had at my disposal all the basic tools required. Long distance business calls anywhere in Canada or outside the country were paid of course by the government; any document could be duplicated in record time; travelling expenses and allowances in this country or sometimes even outside the country raised no problem. Green boards, charts, newspaper or magazine subscriptions; telegrams, books, briefcases, overtime staff, translations, were of course available as required. I did not have to pay for my French-English dictionaries, nor for any office equipment—Of course, we had air conditioning; anyway, we were on leave in summertime—

It is certainly not fashionable to try and foster pity for the M.P.'s. However I would like to correct the descriptions of the mass media on this question erroneous as they were, but not malicious I hope. On top of a fixed annual salary and an annual allowance for extra personal expenses caused by a second home and its attendant expenses, allowance which must also cover other expenses of all sorts, the federal M.P. does not receive any other allowance. It should be mentioned that his official mail, as that of all Canadians writing him, is postage free.

Last June, he found himself allowed, for the first time, to use a telephone credit card inside his constituency, and this applies only to the 156 non-urban constituencies in Canada, and between his constituency and government offices in Ottawa. All other long-distance calls require by our trade are charged to us. And since Christmas this year, thanks to the good offices to the Speaker who, as of January 15, 1974, promulgated standing orders to this effect, each of the 264 federal M.P.'s can open an office to serve his constituents: lease, furniture, maintenance, telephone, taxes, etc., are payed directly to the suppliers by the House of Commons up to a total of $200 a month. The required secretary or secretaries are hired by the House of Commons of Canada at a salary or salaries not exceeding $6,000 per constituency.

The amount of work required from a federal M.P. in his electoral riding is great, considering the increasing complexity of the government apparatus, the different jurisdictions and the constantly increasing number of programs directly aimed at the population.

● (1710)

We are often contacted not only for information—a service which should be normally provided by Information Canada—but also for assistance in drafting community projects, not to mention the great many individual applications for assistance of various types. Actually we are eager to maintain a regular liaison with various groups. I should like to mention that since it takes three elected members to the provincial legislature to carry out similar duties in my own riding, my burden must be three times as heavy as theirs.

It is therefore inacceptable to hear on a CBC news broadcast the following statement:

> Mr. Drudy earmarked a reserve of $924,000 . . .

—as though in the age of Louis XIV—

> . . . to help elected members maintain an office in their respective ridings, amount which equally shared among the 264 members, would provide every one of them with an additional income of $700 a month, tax-free, of course.

An editorial such as the one published in the November 12, 1973 issue of the Globe and Mail is equally inacceptable. The only purpose is merely to provide each hon. member with a small measure of the resources he needs to serve his constituents.

Before going on to something else, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank you for having considered recommending that at the opening of the first session of a new parliament, the government refer the regulations concerning these constituency offices to the House Committee on Procedure and Organization for study and recommendations.

This four-party committee, open to the public, will have an opportunity to study the various methods that the members from all parts of the country have tried in order to serve their constituents as well as possible. They will then truly answer for them to Parliament, as they have already answered for them to the public.

I have taken nearly half of the time allotted to me on this single question, Mr. Speaker, because I believe in my duties as member of Parliament and I am well aware that the Canadian people would like to believe more in those who represent them. They want representatives who can do their work with all the ability and means required to understand, for instance, the complexities of the accounting of multinational companies, windfall profits, spiralling food costs, etc. They want representatives who can protect their rights as human beings, consumers and Canadians; representatives who will truly contribute to the drafting and development of the pieces of legislation and administrative measures listed in the speech from the throne for our second session of Parliament.

[English]

As I now talk of the thrust of the Speech from the Throne, I ask myself what kind of Canada Canadians want in 1974; what kind of society do we want for our children; how will we achieve this; how will that vertical mosaic stretching from Cape Spear to Mount Elias, a distance of about 3,200 miles, ever help the west and the east re-unite? If this Speech from the Throne seems so important to me it is because of its concerns and effort in offering numerous concrete ways to achieve Canadian unity and reciprocal understanding between all parts of the country. It does so mainly through two approaches. The first is through erasing as much as possible inequalities, such as regional disparities, unequal distribution of natural and financial resources, discrimination based on sex as well as those injustices based on other prejudices. The second is through inviting all Canadians to participate in common enterprises in the making of our country, and in a Canadian identity, such as the development of a national petroleum company, an optimum over-all land use, and the exploitation of the living resources of our fresh waters and seas. In so doing, this government is showing its continuous understanding of what Canadians want. For, Mr. Speaker, Canadian unity cannot be achieved without Canadian identity, and economic growth will not mean a thing to us if it is achieved outside of a frame of social justice.

[Translation]

We have heard all kinds of remarks to the effect that this Liberal government has changed direction. Some people have written that we have gone back to an old-fashioned form of confederalism, others that we have set great principles aside to deal with trifles. It is obviously fashionable to say that the New Democrats are governing this country and not us. To say the truth, and with no ill-feelings towards that party, I would be at a loss to define what is a New Democrat. I think that in Mackenzie King's times, the only known definition was simply to consider them, and I quote, as "Liberals in a hurry".

In fact, seldom has a government been so realistic while following such an absolutely consistent policy, despite the sudden burst of a national crisis: domestic inflationary trends brought about by international uncontrollable situations, and, during 16 months, a genuine minority government.

This government has first dealt in the past decade, with the most critical problem that was bearing heavily on the social conscience of Canadians and I refer to the situation opposing the two founding groups of this country, and concerning their respective rights and status, and their equality of opportunities in taking part in the decision-making process of the whole of our Canadian society.

There was, therefore, need to draft and pass without delay the Official Languages Act of 1969. This legislative tool was the most essential basis for any further social measures. Sixteen million English-speaking and six million French-speaking people. Each and every Canadian, especially those who did not know the other official language, had to be guaranteed their rights to their own language.

It was not easy! One need only have witnessed the insults, the exchanges loaded with emotional overtones in the House of Commons during our recent debates reaffirming our policy, in May and June last, and even this afternoon, never to forget them. It was not easy and we still have a long way to go.

No legislation will ever do away with prejudiced attitudes or mentalities. Time only and daily efforts—personal and collective—will enable us in the next few decades to evaluate the progress made and the soundness of that historic initiative. To that initiative, we have added another: the policy of "multiculturalism in a bilingual structure", which was promulgated two and one half years ago.

I was struck, when I had the honour and the responsibility of spending three months with the UN as the Canadian delegate, by the erroneous picture one generally has of our country. I often had to explain that my country was made up of "three thirds": the French, the English, and those who from Germany, Italy, Ukraine, Holland, Poland, Greece, China, Portugal, Scandinavia and elsewhere came to settle in our land, and whose value we appreciate as much as they appreciate what they found in Canada.

The first budget assigned specifically to multiculturalism amounted to $10 million, in additon to the $2 million allotted in January 1972, provided for the distribution of subsidies, about 600 of them, totalling $2.5 million. After a careful study of the description of the recipient projects, it seems clear to me that we are still in the preliminary stages in the formulation of the principles which should guide the application of that program, the nature of which could either sow division, or encourage mutual understanding and tolerance. In that case as well, there was a risk, while specialists are confirming that a world movement towards a strong "linguistic nationalism" and a multiplying of languages in use is being observed, which leads isolated groups to retire even more within themselves.

The last Speech from the Throne of January 4, 1973 complied with its commitments despite the suggestions of the previous speaker, the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes). Anyone who reads it carefully and compares every item of it with today's reality can but be struck by the numerous and good measures that were taken subsequently. However, I would dare to suggest that in two areas, the legislation that was passed by this House appeared too weak although successful to me—that is, first of all, the balanced maintenance at a high level of incomes, production and employment, and next, the over-all initiatives and measures designed to meet the Canadians' wish to control and protect their economy and their resources through direct participation—have become the very basis of the measures put forward in the present Speech from the Throne.

The inflationary crisis was not as serious, making all due allowance, in Canada as in other developed countries although it involved a heavier burden for certain Canadians than for others. As a matter of fact, three of these groups that are often forgotten by people who live in the cities will be affected by the measures concerning farmers, fishermen and seasonal workers engaged in these sectors of our economy. Do they really have the choice to leave their area for something else? Do they wish to do so? And what would we do without them, as they are the source of food production on which we are entirely dependent and on which—I am referring to huge western grain farms—the balance of payments of Canada and its capacity in international trade operations may depend?

There are about 300,000 farmers, 200,000 farm workers (including the farmers' wives) and 100,000 fishermen in this country. If we take into account all those who depend on them, we get almost 2.5 million people. There is no doubt that they have been, since the war, the poor relatives of an agricultural economy that became an industrial and urban economy.

They in turn will therefore benefit, through imaginative but simple measures, from the assistance already introduced last summer under various forms for the benefit of Canadians who fall within the categories most vulnerable to cost of living increases, that is the unemployed, the pensioners, families living on low or fixed incomes, with children under 18.

Much remains to be done, however, given the appropriate measures since, in spite of increases of 5 per cent in the employment rate and 7 per cent in the national growth rate, the rate of unemployment, although low, nonetheless reached 6 per cent according to Statistics Canada figures.

Still from the point of view of progressive elimination of disparities, I welcome those parts of the Speech from the Throne which deal with the priority status promised to consumers so that they may enjoy reasonable prices, particularly for food.

[English]

Regarding regional disparities, all that the federal government can do to improve railway passenger services in urban areas, suburban rapid transit, and to serve the more isolated Canadian communities will be welcomed by Canadians. We hope, also, that fairer proposals concerning rates for the transportation of goods, which was discussed at the western economic opportunities conference, will be forthcoming. In the same vein, small businessmen follow with great hope the setting up of the new federal business development bank and are anxious to see it in full operation as soon as possible.

In conclusion, I say quite bluntly on the question of erasing inequalities that it is about time our country established a federal human rights commission, after at least six years of argument among departments as to who is the most discriminated against, Indians, workers, women or the ethnic minorities, and through which department the commission would report. It is important that such a commission should have jurisdiction in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and should be directly responsible to parliament and to the territorial councils. Strong powers of investigation and of prosecution, in addition to the usual powers of such commissions, are essential to give it real value.

• (1730)

As recommended in the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada—I think it is recommendation No. 165—I strongly share the opinion that past experiences give all indications that for a limited period of time, say seven to ten years, a distinct division dealing specifically with protection of women's rights is needed. For those hon. colleagues who do not understand what is sous-entendu here, we can have a special multiparty caucus. Unfortunately, the recent report of progress in 1973 on the status of women, published by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), is completely silent on this very important point. As to the statement that Crown corporations will have to undertake positive action to encourage the assignment and advancement of women, there is no need to stress that the CBC will become for women the very symbol of this effort at simple justice, which should also affect many women employees of the CN and of Air Canada, to single out only the biggest and maybe the most traditional of these public employers.

[Translation]

My time is nearly up, Mr. Speaker, and I have spoken on the first part only of the Speech from the Throne—the phasing out of disparities in this country. There will be other occasions to discuss modern national achievements which meet the aspirations of Canadians and of which the Canadian oil industry is the symbol, as was so well pointed out by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae).

Finally, we no longer have to feel guilty about being "a natural resources country". However, the fact is that we are a modern, industrialized country and yet underdeveloped, in the hands of international cartels that are now discreetly being called "multinationals". It is suggested that there would be only 15 governments in the world—Canada not included—whose budget would be as big as the budget of those cartels. We started at different paces, depending on the areas of this country, to realize that massive and non-diversified foreign investment not regulated by a "code of ethics" is nearly the opposite of foreign aid.

Still, I would not want to conclude, Mr. Speaker, without endorsing the concern of Canadians for less developped or poorer countries, as suggested by the mover and the recorder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, my colleagues for Spadina and Sherbrooke (Messrs. Stollery and Pelletier).

I think Canadians want "national" achievements but they are also conscious of others and, above all, they want to contribute with them to the development of that "new economic order" wished for in Washington by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp).

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciated the speech of our able and charming colleague from Saint-Michel (Miss Bégin) and I would like to have the time to follow through with the arguments and ideas so clearly expressed in her speech. Unfortunately, time is of the essence and I know that she will realize the need for me to make my own speech, but I want to tell her right now how much I appreciated her remarks when she spoke of the will to build a country more united and aware of the requirements of ethnic, female or other minorities in our country, Canada.

[English]

Canadians in all walks of life have long been quick to struggle for their interests as producers. As individuals and organized bodies we have fought to get what we consider our share of the country's increasing wealth. This continuing competitive struggle is one of the most time-consuming activities of our lives, and one of the most divisive so far as people are concerned. Only now are we discovering the importance attached to the fact that we are also consumers—not some of us, but all. The Stevens price spreads inquiry was probably our first parliamentary recognition of this discovery. Then, more than 30 years later, we had the 1967 inquiry into prices, mainly prices of food, as a result of which the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was established.

We have a number of House of Commons standing committees to handle the special needs of various sectors of our economy, many of them being directly concerned with production. But it is interesting to note that up to this point all our efforts to get a consumer affairs committee have failed, in spite of the fact that all of the opposition parties and all the members of the food prices committee, even those on the government side of the House, strongly favour such a committee. I trust that we shall not go too far into this session of parliament before we get it.

The rising tide of indignation and despair from the consuming public regarding the spiralling cost of living is at last convincing the government that it is time to talk about the cost of living in the Speech from the Throne. In fact, the government has admitted by this throne speech that the issues of oil and food are the two most crucial ones so far as the consumer is concerned. I am not going to talk about the cost of oil or about the supply of oil; a number of my colleagues will be doing that. I am going to concentrate on the need for action with respect to the supply of food and the price of food. I want to say right now that no amount of talk in the throne speech will convince the consumers that they are going to be looked after unless the government very shortly introduces measures to do so.

In the Speech from the Throne we have this kind of talk:

> The producer must be ensured a fair income for his work . . .
> The consumer must be ensured a fair value from his dollar.

Those are fine words. In his speech on the address in reply, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did a lot of tough talking. He said:

> We will not allow corporate profiteers and gougers to pile up unearned windfall profits at the expense of the people of Canada.

I suggest that no amount of tough talk is going to exorcise the demon of rising food prices in this country. We must have tougher measures than we have had to date to deal with food prices. Just this afternoon my colleague from Toronto-Lakeshore pointed out that the government, having had a look at the Food Prices Review Board's report which found that the Bakery Council's projected increase for bread prices was unjustified and recommended that it be kept down to between one and two cents a loaf, is still unwilling to act and to do anything about it. The government is still going to stall by having more evidence brought before the Food Prices Review Board.

● (1740)

In view of the fact that the Food Prices Review Board has made its final report and the evidence is now in, it seems to me that this government has to explain to the people why the Prime Minister comes out with such tough talk about not allowing corporate profiteers and gougers to pile up unearned windfall profits at the expense of the people of Canada. Why does he talk like that if he is afraid to keep the price of a loaf of bread down by 2 cents?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the consumer is not stupid. He or she may be a little slow to catch on, but they are learning fast and will be quick to notice the discrepancy. They will demand that the Prime Minister do more than talk a tough fight. It is time to fight where it is needed.

We in this party are glad to see that the government dealt with food in the Speech from the Throne. We are even more glad of all the measures this government has detailed to help the farmer increase the supply of food for this country and at the same time to gain a fair income for himself and his family. We are glad of those measures. Let nobody say that any of us is out to see that the consumer is allowed to profit at the expense of the farmer. But I speak as a consumer. Farmers and their families are also consumers of many things besides tractors, tractor fuel and farm supplies. They have to eat, just as city folk do. What is the use of the government just going far enough to protect the supply of food, to ensure a good supply of food and farm income, if it does not carry out the other part of what it says in the Speech from the Throne: the consumer must be assured of fair value for his dollar.

I have gone over the Speech from the Throne a number of times with a fine-tooth comb and can find nothing that will protect the consumer from being gouged and exploited along the links of the food chain which stand between the farm gate and the consumer. I find nothing whatsoever to protect the consumer in this regard. I do not think the consumer should be led astray on this point.

What is the point of ensuring that we get a continuously larger supply of food in this country, if at the same time the government is doing nothing to stop prices rising? The Prime Minister himself has indicated that prices are going to rise. The head of the Grocery Products Manufacturing Association says that prices will rise by 10 per cent in the coming year; the packagers are saying the same kind of thing, and so are the processors. What is the sense of taking measures to produce more food on the farm if nothing is done to protect the consumer from being gouged all the way from the farm gate to the table? What is the sense of taking measures to produce more food if nothing is being done to prevent that food being shipped to other countries in any amount simply because those who control it—I do not mean the primary producers—can get a higher price abroad than at home? I have the evidence from my own province to prove that.

In British Columbia, where canned and fresh salmon have been a primary source of protein, last year the two companies which dominate and control 85 per cent to 90 per cent of all west coast fishing shipped vast quantities of salmon mostly to Britain and Japan because they could get a higher price there. They created a shortage here and raised the price to the Canadian consumer. The price went up and up, and it recently went up again. Before anybody tells me that the companies had to do that, let me tell them that over a 39-week period ending June 17, B.C. Packers had a 25 per cent increase in sales and an increase in profits of 124 per cent. That is gouging at its best.

Mr. Cullen: What was the return on investment?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): The government is doing nothing about that, and there was no forecast in the Speech from the Throne. I know the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board would have liked to see stronger measures in there and is wishing that he had them, but there is nothing there. There is nothing in the throne speech that deals with this sort of thing.

Mr. Cullen: Please make it the committee, not the board.

An hon. Member: He has not been elevated yet.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Letters are now coming in, and I have been shown about two dozen from one of the smaller Ontario cities where there is a good, steady payroll. They say things like this:

> Isn't there anything you can do to stop the increases in all prices? All companies and stores seem to have great profits when they give out their figures. The feeds are going up for animals, fertilizers also. This means the farmer can't afford to keep a farm, and with many of them going out of business we in a few years will have a lot less food. We have potatoes in the Valley and other areas, and when they go into our stores they charge the same that they charge for P.E.I. or N.B. potatoes. How can the prices be the same? I've spoken to some farmers and they say they don't get the difference, so where does it go? Milk went up from 22 cents a can to 26 cents. Sugar has gone up from $1.59 to $2.69 for ten pounds. These are just a few, and it's getting worse all the time.

Here is another letter from the same place:

> Sugar has gone up terribly, white beans, spaghetti and eggs. Good heavens, I am sure all these don't depend on anchovies off the Peruvian coast.

I am sure, too, and I think it is high time we did something about this. The Prime Minister can talk tough, but I would mention again the particular situation where after careful investigation the Food Prices Review Board said that bakeries in Canada are not justified in wanting to raise the price of a loaf of bread to three cents or four cents and that their direct cost increases are, instead, in the neighbourhood of one cent to 1¾ cents per 24-ounce loaf. How about getting in there, Mr. Prime Minister, if you want to stop the gougers and corporate profiteers from piling up unearned windfall profits?

Turning to the matter of subsidies, I find that we will be paying about $129.5 million in subsidies for manufactured milk products this year. In spite of that, we are now told that the price of cheese will rise by ten cents per pound. Who is getting the difference between what the producer of milk is paid and what the consumer is charged? Unfortunately, the Kraft corporation does not publish profit figures. That fact is something at which the Prime Minister could shoot. I think the profit figures of Kraft would be tremendously interesting to a lot of consumers across the country.

Then what about salmon? Is the government considering export controls or a two-price system for salmon? I know that in spite of the profits the companies have made, the fishermen this year are going to get about 52 cents per pound for their catch. This has been the situation while the consumer has had to pay $2.49 a pound for whole salmon in the stores. I wish the Prime Minister were here so that he could hear more about the complaints of consumers.

Let us consider sugar. As my leader said the other day, the three sugar companies making up the sugar cartel, which were tried and fined in the courts ten years ago, are now being tried again under the Combines Investigation Act. How about imposing fines suitable for criminals, or how about jail terms as a means of bringing home to some of these criminals what they are doing to the people of the country when they raise prices? Such action, I think, would be excellent. These companies have taken $125 million from the pockets of consumers in the last decade. If you took that much in a robbery or hold-up, you would probably go to jail for 100 years and everyone would hope that you would live that long and serve the sentence. Something must be done.

Mr. Peters: What is more, the money would probably have to be returned.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): As my colleague says, the money would probably have to be returned. In the face of this, it is no good saying that a crop failure in Patagonia, Timbuktu or Outer Mongolia caused the shortage. We, in this country, produce some of all the products necessary for a good, balanced, nutritious diet. Agnes Higgins of the Montreal diet dispensary says that if we were willing to spend $100 on good pre-natal nutrition for pregnant women, we might later save the community $200,000 in the cost of caring for those who are being damaged now because of bad pre-natal diet.

Why does the government not go after that program instead of giving us fine sounding speeches from the throne, and Mrs. Plumptre as the head of a Food Prices Review Board without teeth or the power to act? Do not forget who voted against the idea of a selective Food Prices Review Board. Do not forget that the Conservatives opposed the idea. They made it impossible for us to get a selective Food Prices Review Board, something which the consumer must have. It is clear that consumers have rejected their stand, just as it is clear that people in Britain rejected the Tory government, there very largely because the cost of living had gone so high.

We reject the stupid idea, put forward by the opposition, of sitting down for 90 days to contemplate our navels, and then, hopefully coming up with the answers to the problems of inflation. We have the food in this country. We reject the system proposed by the official opposition, which boils down to restraint for the poor and opportunity for the affluent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member for Saint-Michel (Miss Bégin) is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member allow me to put a question?

[English]

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Perhaps the hon. member can ask her question at the end of my speech, because I do not have very much time.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I merely want to know where we grow sugar and how much we grow in Canada.

Mr. Peters: We grow quite a bit.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Please do not hold me up. That brings me to something I forgot to mention in connection with sugar. I think this government should take the initiative in renewing the international sugar agreement which lapsed in 1971. We need international planning in the field of sugar so that the consumers of this country will be protected.

Mr. Prud'homme: Has the hon. member forgotten anything else?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Please do not remind me of anything else; I do not have very much time. First, we need a Food Prices Review Board with power to act and power to apply selective controls on the basis of nutritional need. That means a subsidy where necessary and justified. I am thinking of bread and milk. If such a policy is to be adopted, it means there would need to be a two-price system for certain commodities, such as there is in the case of wheat. There would need to be export controls for other things, such as have been imposed with regard to oil. Do not say this cannot be done. It has been done. It will mean rollbacks in price. The price of bread should be rolled back without further fuss, in view of what the minister and the Food Prices Review Board have found.

Second, the government ought to pass legislation giving the Food Prices Review Board power to compel the books of the big food chains and other parts of the food distribution system to be opened. The board should have power to lay bare the industrial and financial connections of the food chains. Do not tell me we will not find anything, when George Weston profits in 1973, over 1972, were up 86 per cent, when the profits of Canada Packers in a 39-week period were up 36 per cent, and when the profits of B.C. Packers for a 24-week period last year were up by 124 per cent. We will find something, without any doubt.

Third, we need court action where indicated. I am glad that at the request of the federal government the Alberta Supreme Court has prevented Canada Safeway Limited, which is completely under American ownership and control, from acquiring many more stores in Calgary in the next few years. The court has limited very rigorously the number of stores that chain will be able to build and the restrictions it can impose on competitors. I am glad this has been done. We need more initiatives like that.

Fourth, the government should consider imposing an excess profits tax on any sector of the food industry where it is found, after investigation, that such a tax is warranted. Fifth, as I have mentioned before, the government should take the initiative in bringing about international agreements. I am thinking not only of sugar. We need an international grains agreement again so that the consumer as well as the farmer can benefit.

Sixth, we need to consider alternative approaches to merchandising. We need to encourage the formation of co-operatives as one means of standing up to the big giants and other merchandisers. We need to do a lot of these things, Mr. Speaker. Mistakes, no doubt big ones, will be made if we go along this way. But we need to do something along these lines. We can make only one unforgivable mistake, the mistake of not trying.

These problems will not go away. Consumers cannot be fobbed off with talk. I wish the government would realize that consumers know the Food Prices Review Board as presently constituted is as a weak reed in a violent storm. That is all it is. They also know that the Food Prices Review Board is a toothless wonder and that it is not effective in the field of the cost of living. My remarks are directed primarily to the subject of food prices because high food prices are the biggest single problem facing Canadian consumers at this time. Why do I mention food? You must begin somewhere, and all of us must eat in order to survive. That is why I have begun by dealing with food.

In conclusion, let me say that although the Prime Minister in the Speech from the Throne outlined all sorts of beautiful things and talked in a tough voice about protecting the consumer, my party is going to have its work cut out this session to make the Prime Minister and the government come through with regard to the programs I have outlined, just as we had our work cut out in the previous session to make them come through with pensions and other things which the people of this country needed. We are going to do it. The matter of food prices is an unfinished piece of business so far as I am concerned, and I warn the government that we are going to do our utmost to make them come through and fulfil their promises to protect both the producer and the consumer in the field of food.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will see the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) when the House resumes at eight o'clock. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure this evening to enter into the debate on the Speech from the Throne, especially being the first of the official opposition from the great western province of British Columbia to do so.

The constituency of Okanagan Boundary in beautiful British Columbia is so named because it takes in a large part of the sunny Okanagan Valley and extends some 150 miles along the American border, hence the name Boundary. The sunny Okanagan Valley and, indeed, most of the area in the riding, is semi-desert with a limited rainfall per year. Because we enjoy the best climate in Canada, it has over the years been discovered by many Canadians as a wonderful place to live. We have many retired people, people who have pioneered this great country of ours. Living in our valley, these people have come from all parts of Canada; especially from the three prairie provinces.

The very lifeblood of this area is, of course, water. The valley floors are studded with lakes and flowing rivers. Okanagan Lake, 80 miles long and some two miles wide, is the main one, but there are others, all of which are fed from the snowfall and the rains of the surrounding mountains. Most lakes in the mountains are dammed and used for irrigation; they also abound with fish. Some 50 good fishing lakes within 25 miles of the valley floor can also be found in the area.

Inflation hits the retired people very hard. They see the value of their dollar going down and they are on fixed income without any, or very little chance of insulating themselves against this. These people who have worked hard to build Canada, and in many cases pioneered Canada, are quick to see through the indifferent attitude of this federal government. They get very little break from income tax which they feel is being used to some extent to create a society of non-workers, something they were not able to enjoy when they were younger. They are concerned that Canada should not be allowed to deteriorate into a country of only hewers of wood and drawers of water.

The most noticeable thing about the Speech from the Throne is not what is in it, but its deficiencies. There is no provision for an immediate anti-inflationary program. There is no mention of curtailment of government spending, no mention of reduction in personal income tax, no mention of reduction or elimination of federal sales tax on all clothing and building supplies, no mention or provision for a full public inquiry into the Unemployment Insurance Commission and its distribution of unemployment benefits.

In the Speech from the Throne we do not see anything about a new industrial strategy for Canada. There is nothing in it about a resource policy, and even less about solving the most important problem we have in Canada today. As the member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) so ably pointed out when he referred to inflation, this is a major issue, as well as the increased cost of living. There is no way we can solve any of our other problems until we get inflation under control. I do not think we can do anything about the housing problem in Canada until we have dealt with inflation. I also do not believe we can solve the problem of regional disparities of income until inflation is lowered. Does anyone really believe we can solve the problem of redistribution of wealth before the problem of inflation is solved or before the aspect of poverty level is alleviated?

The critical thing is to come to grips with the problem of Canada's inflation now. I am afraid if we do not do so, and it keeps on at the rate of 10 per cent, our society and economic system will not survive. Imagine what is happening to the life savings of people who are faced with the erosion of the dollar at 10 per cent per year.

[Mr. Whittaker.]

What are the people of Canada to think of a government that says inflation cannot be contained, that does not provide measures which appear to be useful in the short term and only proposes ad hoc or band-aid measures which are a piecemeal approach? What are the people of Canada to think of a government that is not prepared to deal appropriately with all these problems?

A great many people in my riding believe that much of the inflation is caused by government spending. It is ironic that the government of the day, after the Speech from the Throne, should bring in the estimates for next year's government expenditures which are up a whopping 20 per cent over the past year. To increase government spending that much in an inflationary period makes no sense at all. We have had in this country during the past few years a fantastic expansionary domestic monetary policy. The increase we have had in the money supply guarantees that we are going to have increased inflation. As long as the government can, and does, print money and continues to spend in such an extravagant manner, we are bound to have inflation. Wasteful spending in government must be eliminated in order to deal effectively with the chaotic situation facing us today.

Many of us have been asking why we are trading for trade's sake. Is this really what we should be doing in this changing world? The government says it will try to solve the inflation problem in Canada over the long run by some type of supply policies. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is really concerned with supply problems, why does he not do something about our supply problems now? Why does he not slow down the export of some of our raw materials, or have them processed in our own country? Why do we not have a supply policy right now?

Of great concern to the people in my riding is the question of the environment. We have in the valley floors a series of lakes and rivers which are of good quality now but which must be protected for future generations to enjoy as we have in the past. I am disappointed that the government is not taking more notice of and becoming more involved in the preservation of our delicate environment. There was very little mention of this in the Speech from the Throne. It is vital to revise the sewage assistance program to give assistance to the upgrading of existing sewage plants and, even beyond this, to give every assistance to help remove sewage outfall from our lakes and rivers. Programs such as these are, in my opinion, much better than giveaway programs that help teach people how not to work and which remove any incentive to work.

There are many other proposals in the Speech from the Throne that people in my riding have been concerned about. Many are unhappy with the performance of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and additional ad hoc and band-aid measures will not satisfy them. The majority of people who pay into UIC and never intend to collect from it, those people who hear stories and rumours, also see what they believe to be abuses going on and they will not be satisfied with anything less than a full investigation into UIC and manpower.

It was encouraging to see so much of the Speech from the Throne devoted to agriculture. This has not happened in the past even though the leaders in the fruit and vegetable industry have over the years been predicting trouble. The former cheap food policy of the Liberal government, which relied on cheap food from other parts of the world, was headed for disaster. The prediction made at the time, that the beef growers would eventually be in trouble, even came true. Look at the situation they are in today. We have heard many of these proposals for agriculture before; let us hope something will be done, and done soon, and that at best these proposals will be long-term. Production cannot be increased in many agricultural fields overnight; it takes time.

The most significant part for the producer is for him to be provided with a return adequate to encourage production and to restore his confidence in long-term market opportunities. These proposals will have to be incorporated into legislation, otherwise farmers will completely lose faith. For instance, even though this government talks about helping farmers to increase supply, last year when I made a plea for assistance to help the cattle ranchers in my riding buy feed to tide them over the winter because of the drastic loss of feed due to an unprecedented drought, all that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) did was pay half of the support given by the provincial government, a mere $15 per ton. Instead of putting up only $7.50. a ton, he should have matched their offer or made it $30 per ton. I am sure it would have helped the ranchers keep their basic herd intact, and this would have ensured an immediate upkeep of supply to be extended in future years.

The proposals in the Speech from the Throne with regard to transportation were particularly weak in light of what we in the opposition have been telling the government over the past year about the shortage of railway cars for many products in Canada. Producers of apples in the Okanagan Valley have lost a considerable number of sales of their product because of shortage of cars. Grain producers who have found themselves in similar circumstances are fortunate not to have lost their market or sales, although this is no excuse for keeping ships waiting in harbour to be loaded. This does not happen in the fruit industry. Producers from other areas, namely Washington state, can get cars to fill the vacuum. Thus we find an abundance of United States apples in eastern Canada while the B.C. producers have to divert good products to processors for less money. What a way to run a country!

It is well known that lumber mills have been continually plagued with car shortages to ship their products. The government must take a firm stand with the railways. This kind of performance cannot be tolerated if we are to continue to build Canada and retain a low unemployment rate.

No mention was made of legislation to ensure that veterans with overseas service will not be discriminated against when applying for their old age pension, as the minister promised. Because of this I have submitted a private member's bill which I hope this House will pass very quickly. It has been brought to my attention, and I believe rightly so, that retired armed service personnel were discriminated against when pensions were raised last year. I speak for those who have not reached the magical formula of 85, even though many of these people were forced to retire. Measures should certainly be taken to rectify this discrimination.

It is heartening to hear that the government intends to do something about equal rights for women. I firmly believe they should have the same rights as men. They should not have to form organizations to fight for those rights; their legitimate requests should have been granted. Here again, I am sure these women's organizations will not give up until they have obtained the status of equality which they seek. It is too bad they have had to go through the frustrating work and the efforts they have made in order to obtain these rights.

I would be remiss if I did not bring to this House the feeling of many of my constituents regarding the lack of CBC outlets and adequate television coverage. Dealing first with television, unfortunately many areas in my constituency have at best borderline television. Although we live on or very close to the United States border, we just cannot get good Canadian television coverage. We are among the 5 per cent class who in Canada have poor or no reception, and although the minister responsible for the CBC keeps saying that money is to be spent to give us good television service, very little is done in my riding in this regard. These complaints are justified, and I hope we can get some action soon, rather than just promises.

Although there are three excellent private radio stations in the Okanagan Valley, we have been asking for years for a CBC outlet because we feel we should not be denied a public outlet when almost all of the rest of Canada has one. After all, we are helping to pay for CBC. Here again, although there has been much talk, correspondence and many petitions, we are only told to be patient and we will get extended coverage in time. This has been the case to the point that it is becoming increasingly frustrating. Many people who have moved to my riding to retire have been used to listening to CBC. We have a large population that wants such an outlet, and their request should not be denied.

One of the complaints I receive most frequently in my riding has to do with mail delivery service. I have been told by businessmen, and they have submitted proof, that since the assured mail program has come into existence the time it takes to receive a letter from Vancouver in the Okanagan has perhaps doubled. Every time I go on the open line program, and almost every day when I open my mail, I receive complaints about our postal services. I believe these complaints are justified; there appears in many instances to be an almost chaotic situation. I urge the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) to do whatever he can to solve this problem. There is no competition in respect of mail services, and the people are very aware of the situation; they know the service is operated by the federal government and is subsidized, and they therefore feel they should be able to obtain the services they deserve.

In conclusion, I urge this Liberal government to take immediate action to control the problems of inflation facing this country. I hope it will introduce shortly some concrete and positive measures in this regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the second session of the 29th Parliament I wish to congratulate His Excellency the Governor General and Mrs. Léger on their appointment. On behalf of my Laval electors, I offer them my best wishes.

The government could not have found a better counsellor than His Excellency to assume the heavy responsibility of Governor General, which shows a desire to keep on working for the Canadian people even after having served during three decades in official duties outside as well as inside this country.

I also wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier). Those two members have broadened the scope of debates by reminding us of the principles of the Liberal philosophy, by making us aware of human problems at the world level, by appealing to the sound reasoning of privileged people who benefited from the industrial progress through the political structure within which every citizen was able to develop himself in the social as well as the economical field.

We cannot remain indifferent to the cries for help of the underprivileged, unfortunate or oppressed people or of children disabled in their body or mind. On behalf of all the Canadian people, the government has played a part during the last twenty years in the case of those victims of an unjust fate by steadily increasing credits to third-world countries through CIDA whose budget was raised by 15 per cent this year and which now stands at $565 million.

It is not the responsibility of the Canadian Parliament to provide everyone of us with means of subsistence, however it must give all of us an opportunity for self-fulfilment if we are willing to contribute to our economic development. Ideally one should not care about what he can get from his country, but rather what he can do for it. If we consider the excellent record of the Liberal government during the first session, we realize that 50 bills were passed, all aimed at improving the quality of life of the Canadian people, while ensuring them a better future. When considering that 1973 record of achievements with regard to welfare, housing and farming, consumers and business people, we can see that the economic growth of Canada since 1968 has greatly increased, considering that the gross national product has gone up by 49 per cent during the past five years from $71,388,000 to $118,678,000 and that it has increased by 10 per cent in 1973. This is what we have achieved together and we have every right to be proud citizens of a young and vast country most richly endowed with natural resources.

I was reading recently the editorial in the January 27 issue of the weekly magazine Express. The editor, Mrs. Françoise Giroud, started her editorial as follows:

[Mr. Whittaker.]

Power in France is breaking up. In the United States, it is disintegrating. In Germany, it is weakening. In Great Britain, it is giving out.

and tonight we heard that the Conservative Party had handed its resignation to the Queen. It is obvious that this party has also failed.

For various reasons, but reasons which unfortunately coïncide in time, the leaders of the western, industrialized, or developed world, or whatever you want to call it, the leaders of the world to which we belong, seem to have exhausted their resources.

These are comments that help us to better appreciate our situation and want to proclaim throughout the world our pride as Canadians and congratulate the right hon. prime minister (Mr. Trudeau), who is in charge of our country and has not exhausted his resources. When we hear some of the speeches made by members of the official opposition, we may well wonder if we are sitting in the same House and if we belong to the same country.

Evidence of pride which can be heard throughout the country, in the United States and even in the European Economic Community countries are the same. Everybody looks toward Canada. The only group which disagrees and which acts as a scaremonger, is the one that takes a gloomy view of things, like the frog at the bottom of the well. Because it sees a cloud through the well aperture, it thinks that the whole sky is cloudy and that a storm is coming up. Its expectations are storms and bad situations. This prejudicial attitude on the part of some hon. members opposite do not reflect the objectivity that any right-minded politician willing to work for the good of the country should have.

Last Saturday, Mr. Speaker, during the program "Les affaires de l'État", I was listening to the hon. member for St-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) who spoke about social justice. He said that the Speech from the Throne did not mention at all this social justice. He stated that we completely ignored regional disparities. Well, I would suggest to the hon. member for St-Hyacinthe that he should first have the courage to read the Speech from the Throne and second the earnestness to explain it as it should be.

We can hear many compliments on the part of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. I still remember when he was a judge. I wonder what kind of social justice we would have when one considers his performance, in Quebec city, when he bought, during a historical event in Quebec, an "armoured" truck, at a cost at that time, I think, of about $48,000, and which was sold later at an auction sale for $2,000, with about 200 miles on the speedometer! I do not think that this is the kind of social justice that the Canadian people want to see in this country. Still concerning the performance of the Liberal government in the field of job creating, we have once again set a record compared to other industrial countries. Since 1968, as many as 1,222,000 new jobs have been created. Again this year, the contents of the Speech from the Throne shows to what extent the government wants to tackle economic problems. We see the government laying down a strategy designed to tackle not only the effects of inflation, including the rise of food prices, but also the causes of inflation through some vigorous measures in the field of agriculture and also through a national energy policy.

The world-wide scarcity of food and the oil crisis are the main causes of inflation, and we are aware of it. It is difficult for us to contain inflation due to external factors, but we will make every effort to alleviate its effects through measures likely to control that inflationary spiral.

To approach the problem in a simplistic way, as suggested by the opposition, would fail, judging by the results achieved in other countries. We saw what has just happened in England because of the measures advocated by the Conservative party. We saw the results of such a policy. As the hon. member for Bonaventures-Îles de la Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) pointed out, the same situation prevails in the United States.

We already know the results of those formulas advocated by Progressive Conservatives with respect to price controls.

The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) keeps on playing the same record across the country, that consumer prices must be frozen for 90 days, but without telling us for that matter what will happen on the 91st day.

It is also easy to say that farm production must be increased. Farm production is increased, and everything is fine. Food prices will come down significantly. That is another simplistic solution advocated by men who think that as in other industries, in the field of agriculture one can turn on the valve and shut it off when one feels like it. Agriculture is not an industry like the shoe industry. There are production and follow cycles. The hon. member who spoke before me, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) mentioned earlier that with beef production there is a cycle of at least three and a half years.

So one cannot put foward simplistic solutions like turning on the valve and shutting it off as needed. We should rather ask ourselves why farm producers neglected their production. Our governments forgot at times that the improved standard of living brought about by technological development was not shared by our farmers to the same extent as in other areas of industry. Farming must be given all the consideration it deserves and farmers must receive a fair retribution for their work. To that end, aggressive measures for the marketing of farm products are needed. We realize today that the agrifood industry is an important area of the Canadian economy.

I congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) on the agricultural impact in the speech from the throne. A food policy designed to increase the production of food products could make a fine headline in any daily paper. But if we go over all the agricultural measures the House will be asked to consider concerning grains and farm credit, guaranteed loans designed to update farm equipment, with regard to the transportation and marketing of farm products, the construction of cold storage facilities and concerning amendments to the legislation on the import and export of farm products, we realize the importance of that situation.

Our agricultural program is very clear in the speech from the throne, and I quote:

It is clear that this country's production must be increased. The Government is developing a policy on food based on the following objectives:

—an adequate and dependable supply of quality food for a growing population in Canada enjoying a rising standard of living;

—reasonable food prices:

—for the consumer, in not requiring an undue proportion of income for Canadians to secure a sufficient and balanced diet;

That is the objective of the Agricultural Products Marketing Act. The duty of the National Farm Products Marketing Council is to try to ensure farm producers a reasonable income to keep the investments in their industry and to avoid those sharp changes in price which the consumers are facing today.

Mr. Speaker, 18 months have gone by before the passing of that legislation because the Progressive Conservative party was then filibustering.

In the Speech from the Throne, we can read and I quote:

—for the producer, in providing a return adequate to encourage production of food items which can be economically and efficiently produced in Canada;

—a continuing supply and—

There is the importance that was given to the agricultural situation and when we listen to the speeches of hon. members opposite we see that they have not even had either the courage or the decency to be objective concerning the farming industry.

Agriculture is engaged in an accelerated modernization process and it has reached a stage where old prejudices are out of place as well as the indifference or the ignorance of city dwellers who sometimes worry about the appropriations granted to the department of Agriculture.

But because farmers were not making any profits on their investments in this field, they abandoned the farm. Quebec statistics prove it since in the last four years, 10,000 producers a year quit farming because they could no longer live off the farm.

Therefore, the advent of industrial farming, characterized by large size farms and the integration of a real farm production plant constitutes an inheritance that the new generation of farmers will accept with all the more enthusiasm that it will feel better understood by the other classes of society.

It must never be forgotten that agriculture is an important area of social and economic life; it is a dynamic factor which contributes to development and provides resources for it is at the same time producer and consumer.

In the area of urban affairs, as a representative of a riding in the second largest city in Quebec, I would not forgive myself for not speaking of the part of the Speech from the Throne dealing with urban policy and I quote:

... the Government is playing a vital role to achieve a more balanced pattern of urban growth and to increase the quality of life in our cities in co-operation with the provinces and municipalities. Improved means of public transportation are indispensable to the achievement of these urban goals ...

Public transportation is a financial burden for all municipalities which cannot balance their budget, and I refer here to the Ottawa-Hull Regional Commission, the Laval Transportation Commission, and the Montreal Interurban Commission. Deficits pile up annually under the public transportation item, because transportation costs are not covered by the user.

The Speech from the Throne proposes measures and I quote:

> ... to establish a National Urban Transportation Development Corporation to coordinate and market the development of required new technology in this field.

This consideration of public transportation is a policy which should please all the municipalities in the throes of this problem.

I wish to congratulate the architect of the Speech from the Throne, the right hon. prime minister (Mr. Trudeau), all the members of the Cabinet and more specifically the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). I am proud to be a member of the liberal caucus which will have the responsibility of explaining the content of the Speech from the Throne to the people and of participating, in the various committees, in giving body through legislation to the basic principles set down for the coming session.

● (2050)

In closing, may I add that the statesman works for future generations but the politician, thirsting for power, works solely for the time at hand, applying band-aid solutions and short term solutions, aiming at a short-term objective, that of winning elections.

We are here, in this august chamber, to develop the human potential of all Canadians, to discover and exploit all the possibilities of our natural resources in the field of energy, mines and agriculture. It is in that perspective, Mr. Speaker, that I shall continue to work with my colleagues of the liberal caucus, in this House, in the various committees, and thus serve, and if need be, fight for the interests of my country.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate our new Governor General and Mrs. Léger on their appointment.

A few months ago, Mr. Speaker, as I was driving around in my car, someone over the radio was inviting the general public to telephone the station to give their opinion and make suggestions on a replacement of the Governor General of Canada. A number of persons having made some excellent suggestions, I realized that there were in Canada—and especially in French Canada, for it was the turn of a French Canadian to be appointed—that there were in French Canada quite a large number of prominent people worthy of an appointment to this position. He who had to make the choice which has now been made public and consider several highly competent people, appointed a man who, for the next five years, will carry out these difficult and very important duties for our country.

I should also like to congratulate the hon. members for Spadina and Sherbrooke (Messrs. Stollery and Pelletier), the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne who carried out their assignments with much diplomacy. This does not mean, Mr. Speaker, that everything they said must be accepted, but because they carried out their assignments well, I feel they deserve congratulations.

[Mr. Roy (Laval).]

Over the past few days, we have heard various comments on the achievements of this government, especially on the first year of its new administration. As usual, the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne has caused much interest in every quarters. Some, as were expected, stated that they were quite satisfied with the gist of the Speech from the Throne, while others would have preferred the problems they, as elected representatives of the people, have to face to be considered from a different point of view.

Just a few moments ago, I was listening to the previous speaker, the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy), who has spoken highly of the content of the Speech from the Throne. At a certain point, he dealt with the increase of the gross national product. In my opinion, the hon. member for Laval has forgotten to tell us about some things; it might be an unintentional omission, but I think this should be rectified.

He said that the gross national product, if I recall the exact figures he quoted, has increased from $71 billion in 1968 to $118 billion in 1973. Those figures are certainly right and it is not on that I do not agree with him. But the hon. member for Laval has failed to mention that this increase took place at the market's price level.

This does not mean that there has been a real increase in the gross national product. I have here the commercial newsletter published annually by the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, in which a distinction is made between the GNP in current dollars and the GNP in constant dollars of 1961. And there is quite a difference.

The table I have covers the period from 1963 to 1972. In 1963, the current dollar GNP was $45,978 million against $103,407 million in 1972. But it is quite different if we use the constant dollars of 1961. In 1963, the constant dollar GNP was $44,531 million instead of $45,978 million. In 1972, it reached $71,722 million in constant dollars instead of $103,407 million in current dollars. There is quit a difference—$31,685 million.

The present inflation taken into account, of course, the gross national product is rising at a fairly rapid rate, but if we consider the real gross national product, in terms of tangible or consumer goods, things are quite different.

The same distinction could be made regarding, for example, the gross national product per capita. Once again, we obtain the same difference in dollars; at 1963 market prices, that is $2,429 per capita, but in 1961 constant dollars, the figure is $2,352 per capita. The 1972 GNP at market prices was $4,737 per capita, while in 1961 constant dollars, it was $3,285 per capita or $1,452 less.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to establish this difference and see what is the real growth of the GNP in terms of tangible goods available to the Canadian people. But because prices have been rising year after year, inflation is somehow gypping individuals out of part of their revenue, in reducing their purchasing power and denying them retribution for their labour.

Mr. Speaker, I thought it necessary to clarify this point to make this distinction clear to all those who are listening to me and those who will read the debate concerning the Address on reply to the Speech from the Throne.

We have heard several proposals which have been honestly suggested to deal with the problems which worry Canadians. They get impatient and ask for increasingly faster action to improve the unfortunate situation which they are now facing.

The population is worried about the hesitation and false steps of the government. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is going to succeed in standardizing unsatisfaction throughout Canada. Since last fall we witnessed the biggest fraud of modern times as far as our energy supplies are concerned, particularly in the oil area. Like other governments depending on oil trusts, the Canadian government tried to create a climate of panic in order to get higher oil product prices readily accepted. He know perfectly well that these increases in oil prices would considerably add to the price rise of all consumer goods but he knew too that all increases in consumer product costs and salaries also boost government revenues through higher indirect income and sales taxes. We just have to study the revenues of the three government levels to see that in the last ten years, their revenues have almost trebled. As a matter of fact, their total revenues jumped from $12,491,000 in 1962 to $39,179,000 in 1972. The rise in the price index is not due only to industry or trade, but to a large extent to the craving of governments for money and the consumers are certainly the losers.

It is normal for any citizen to seek to increase his income and thus improve his standard of living but inflation erodes his purchasing power and quite often the individual becomes frustrated, loses all initiative or becomes impressed by the violence of his environment and loses all confidence in the capitalist system. For example, we have only to look at the figures still provided in this commercial letter I mentioned a while ago to realize that if we take the 1961 dollar as a basis, this dollar was worth only 97.1 cents in 1963 and only 68.2 cents in 1973. That is to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian manual labourer, the small storekeeper, the small businessman, as well as the individual stuck with a fixed income as are our pensioners, for example, those who have retired or who must live on public welfare are penalized by this shrinking purchasing power. Even if they are occasionally granted an increase in salary or in pension, their lower purchasing power does away with what they hoped would improve their situation.

The same thing goes, Mr. Speaker, for the individual who has the opportunity or the advantage of saving money. Because of this increase in prices, and this reduction in the purchasing power, the receipt on whatever savings may have been accumulated are cancelled and it becomes futile to think of saving money for the days when such savings may be necessary.

Mr. Speaker, when we examine the pattern of our administrative system in the last decade, we soon realize that the capitalist system is sick and seriously so. In the belief that the capitalist system is superior to communism or any form of socialism, Social Crediters persist in offering economic and social measures to remedy the weaknesses of the system because weaknesses there are. The government has long since given up before the increasingly powerful monopolies which have too often dictated laws which gives it even more power and ascendancy over the life of the citizens of our country. The government is not the people's servant any more, it is now at the service of the mighty and does not conceal it. Can the capitalist system ensure a sufficient production and distribution of consumer goods to guarantee all Canadians a standard of living high enough to provide for themselves and their families the goods which are necessary to meet their needs and live properly? The elements of an acceptable standard of living are essentially the following: a daily nutrition which is sufficient to replace the energy spent to live and to work, enough clothes to enable body cleanliness and to protect the individual against bad weather, a house which gives a healty and hygienic shelter, sanitary facilities and medical care protecting the individual against illness and its consequences.

Two others can be added to these vital needs: protection against theft or violence, against the loss of the possibility to work, against poverty coming from illness or old age and the means enabling each man, woman or child to develop his or her talents and skills to the maximum.

These are, Mr. Speaker, the main elements necessary in order to ensure Canadians a decent standard of living. I know of the immense natural resources we have in Canada, and I also know of the will and the abilities of Canadians to work and to produce goods and services in sufficient quantities to ensure everyone a decent standard of living. We do not understand why so many families and people face financial difficulties because the cost of living exceeds all expectations.

In order to calm the anger of some categories of people who felt deprived of their incomes or their assets, because of the lower purchasing power, the government agreed to raise old age pensions and family allowances. Up to now, however, they forgot to take action with the provinces in order to improve the condition of disabled and blind people we find in all our communities and who also, and maybe more than anybody else, suffer from the impact of inflation. This is why the government, together with the provinces, should have as a priority to establish a sufficiently high level of assistance to allow these persons, who are underprivileged, to enjoy an acceptable way of living.

Unfortunately, we see that for each increase in salary or welfare assistance, inflation carries away the hopes we had for a better standard of living for ourselves and our families. The wife receives more family allowances, but the husband has to pay more income taxes. There has also been an increase in family allowances for those on welfare, but their welfare cheque has been reduced accordingly by the province of Quebec, my province. The same has happened to the elderly who are living in senior citizens homes. One is proud to give something with the right hand, but takes it back with the left one. The left hand knows what the right hand has given, and takes back what has been given.

Mr. Speaker, as soon as possible during this session, the government should take the necessary steps to lower the age of entitlement to old age security pension. As a result of the various transfers brought about by technology in the field of employment, the individual who loses his job at a certain age finds it hard to find another one before reaching retirement age which is now set at 65. Sixty years of age should be recognized as the age of entitlement to old age security pension and in all fairness, we should also consider paying that pension to the spouse as soon as either one reaches retirement age. I have already raised the question in this House. A motion to that effect standing in my name has appeared on the Order Paper and I expect to have the chance of dealing with it more fully during this session and make my point.

I would like to draw your attention to another matter. The problem of family housing should be solved immediately. We note that there is a decreasing number of available housing units and increasing the number of housing starts is considered but it is to be expected in the first instance that the builder will find it hard to obtain within a reasonable delay some of the construction materials and deliver his units without undue delay; otherwise he may have to bear heavier financing costs. The future home owners on the other hand will be faced with higher prices when buying their houses as well as ever increasing interest rates. A great number of Canadians and their families will find it impossible to buy houses and will have to go on living in premises belonging to other people.

The sales tax on all building materials shouldd be removed immediately in order to lower the price of materials, and the government should set up a special fund designed to lend money to all buyers of single family units at very low interest rates, and grant mortgage interest deductions for income tax purposes and municipal and school tax exemptions to all owners of single family dwellings.

Some of my colleagues have already, and others will be doing so later, dealt with issues which the Social Credit Party of Canada would like to see discussed and with legislative action, that they wish to see adopted and we shall do everything in our power to move the government and the population toward a more realistic policy which would be better suited to the needs of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss if I did not at the outset comment briefly on the moving and the seconding of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne which took place earlier in this debate by two of the newer government members of the House. One thing that struck me about their remarks was the degree with which they approached problems that we face in Canada on the basis of their relationship to the worldwide perspective. I think an interesting facet of the evolution of the parliamentary process in this country over the past 20 or 30 years is the increasing preoccupation of all members, past and present, with events that take place outside our borders.

I believe an appraisal was made not many years ago which showed that there were more questions asked about activities outside Canada than those within our borders. I do not know whether this reflects some kind of unnatural preoccupation with foreign affairs or just a frank realization that our country does not exist by itself, does not exist even within its totality, within its North American framework, but is very much a part of the whole international community. In saying that, I am not about to launch into some well known thoughts on foreign affairs as I have had the opportunity to do in the past.

I will focus my attention this evening on something that has from our beginning as a nation been a domestic preoccupation. It is interesting to note that I am making my comments following the introduction of the new national television program, first aired last night, "The National Dream", which is a re-creation of two books by Pierre Berton, "The National Dream" and "The Last Spike". These books chronicle the linking-up of Canada, particularly the area west of Ontario, by the railway and show how the railway made Canada one nation. It is ironic to think that when the railway was being built and when the vision of this country was turned westward, things were happening to this country in its eastern parts which were diminishing in importance and effectiveness the economic and social fabric of this newly constituted country.

For the past 100 years a succession of members of parliament and governments federal and provincial have wrestled with economic and social disparities within Canada. I want to bring the attention of members back to this problem this evening, first because it is still a major issue with which we must wrestle and, second, because I am disappointed with the Speech from the Throne. On this issue the government apparently has taken a "stand pat" approach.

The government says majestically, in the first paragraph of the Speech from the Throne, that it attaches great importance to regional development. Then it goes on to say that many of the measures to be introduced during the session were discussed at the western economic opportunities conference and will be of benefit to all areas of Canada. Then the speech refers briefly to transportation, mentioning it briefly as a key factor in regional development, and it talks about the necessity for developing a comprehensive port structure for Canada. Speaking as a member who represents a part of the country which has wrestled with the discrimination involved in our national transportation policy, I do not for one moment want to play down the importance of the transportation issue as an element in regional development policy.

One cannot be heartened by either the commitment or concern of the government in this regard, because as late as in today's question period, if my memory serves me correctly, a member asked when we are to get from the railroads accurate figures or accurate appraisals regarding freight rates to western Canada. That information was earnestly requested by the four western premiers recently and has not been made available, as I understand it, by the railways either to the Canadian Transport Commission or to the four western governments. If such action is any measure of responsibility with regard to the fundamental question of transportation, no amount of shuffling of amendments or high-flown talk in Speeches from the Throne will make much impact on the difficult issues to do with national transportation.

So far as port development is concerned, if we could hear the premier of Nova Scotia or the premier of New Brunswick speaking, they would tell us about the recurring difficulties they have experienced in coming to Ottawa and asking for deep-water ports. Development both in Nova Scotia and in New Brunswick has been given little impetus on that particular front.

What then, is the government saying about regional development? Some of the things the minister has been saying—I am sorry he is not here this evening to hear my speech, but I am sure he and his officials will read it—are very good. There have been occasions when all members of the House, I think, would like to rise in collective applause because the minister has accurately gauged a number of difficulties which have existed over the last 4½ dozen years with regard to the administration of regional development policies.

What is disturbing is not the minister's rhetoric but the limited response of the department and the conflicting signals which increasingly have come out of the department. For more than a year we have heard that one of the vital steps to be taken in implementing new regional development policies involves the decentralization of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The concept of decentralization is close to the heart of most of the provinces of this country, certainly those at our country's extremities. It was announced with great fanfare that decentralization would take place, that instead of 70 per cent of the federal department being in Ottawa and 30 per cent being in the field, the ratios would be reversed and 30 per cent of the work force of the department would remain in Ottawa while 70 per cent would be dispersed across Canada.

However, we have heard disquieting stories month after month to the effect that senior, key officials are unwilling to leave Ottawa for a variety of reasons. I do not want to focus attention on any individual. The general impression that has been left is that the department is not strongly committed to the idea that this would be a tremendous departure and an important new step in the implementation of new development policies. Also, there were far too many stories to be discounted totally as rumours, to the effect that morale within the department had sagged to an alarming degree. We are hearing far too many reports saying that creative input within the department is either being frozen out or stifled.

Without taking issue with any of the personalities involved, I suggest that the fact that the most important man in the department next to the minister, the deputy minister, is described as the acting deputy minister, is revealing. There are always good reasons for employing people in a temporary capacity. A department might go through a transition period lasting a few weeks or even a few months. But one does not permanently describe a man filling a permanent position as "acting". Neither the government nor the department have indicated why this should be so. So, Mr. Speaker, the government, by saying in the Speech from the Throne that it attaches great importance to regional development, is apparently ready to accept its commitment. On the other hand it is, on other fronts, sending out conflicting and disturbing signals.

I am grateful for the opportunity to speak on the matter of regional development as a composite part of the government's responsibility. That is also a responsibility of all members of this House. It is particularly timely that I should raise this topic because earlier today, in preparation for the national meeting of our party which will take place later this month, there was released a background paper on regional development. It represents the thoughts of some members of this House as well as the thoughts of those who work with the party in attempting to formulate party policy positions on a number of fronts. I shall refer to this report in a few moments because I think it outlines some of those things which we feel are crucial to the development of an effective policy and program of regional development.

I think it is beyond question that Canada in its very essence is a vast, beautiful and, as we have learned again, resource-filled country. By an accident of birth, however, great numbers of people live in areas or regions of Canada which share only marginally in the social and economic development of this country. Attempts to reduce interregional economic disparities and to equalize economic opportunities facing Canadians have been carried on with increasing concern during the past few decades. Indeed, attempts in this connection date back to the very beginnings of this century when Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as prime minister, in 1906 called a resource conference. It was actually a conference sponsored by the Canadian Forestry Association which led to the formation in 1910 of a commission of conservation. Many years later—far too many, I would think—a second resource conference was held in Canada. That was in 1954. It was sponsored by the Canadian Institute of Forestry, the Agricultural Institute of Canada, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Engineering Institute of Canada.

The focusing of regional development as a basic responsibility of the federal government in this country began dramatically in the sixties with the holding of the resources for tomorrow conference in 1961 under the leadership of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). That conference was geared specifically to the study of the integrated, multiple use of renewable resources. It was jointly sponsored by the federal and provincial governments. Surely in the course of the past 13 years we should have learned that if we are going to wrestle satisfactorily with regional development, it can only be done as we recognize the important input of other levels of government, as well as the private sector. Far too often, short-sighted and limited attempts in regional development activity have been put forth which did not take into account the important co-operation of and relationship to other effective inputs in the economic and social sectors.

It is interesting to note that at the 1961 resources for tomorrow conference, 18 papers were presented on all aspects of regional development. From that period through to the late sixties there were a number of programs which flowed out of the kind of momentum which developed from that national conference. It was like alphabet soup: we had AIDA, ADB, FRED and ARDA. In 1969, in a mandate which it said was vital, the present government set up the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I think that move was basically in the right direction, attempting to integrate and pull together a variety of programs that were spread across a whole group of departments. Some programs were actually working against each other. One of the rather saddening facts is even with pulling these together, we still see a major amount of economic and social activity engaged in by the government in other departments. This works in opposition to and undermines the important work being attempted by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

When we consider the present activities of the department and its move toward decentralization, we are faced with some difficult questions. Some of these questions have already been publicized by some of the smaller and poorer provinces. They are, in effect, asking what decentralization is going to mean. Is it going to mean another level of administration and bureaucracy which a provincial government will have to deal with before eventually coming to terms with the decision-makers in Ottawa? The minister and some of his officials have assured us that this is not to be the case. However, the process of decentralization is taking a much longer time to be implemented than originally forecast, and it is still difficult to predict.

The kind of complexities that will exist with regard to both regional and provincial offices have not yet been fully clarified. In spite of the fact we were told last year that general development agreements would be signed by all provinces with the exception of Prince Edward Island before the end of the year, to my knowledge only three have been signed to this point in time.

What, then, are we to expect from this process of decentralization? Is there going to be an equivalent decentralization of policy decision-making? Is there going to be an effective integration of this decision-making with provincial or regional groups? How is the policy with regard to the various grant or development programs to be developed in this regard? Surprisingly for such a major departure, we have been told publicly very little about that is to be involved and how it is to work in actual practice.

One of the more disquieting aspects is that one wonders how effective it can be in terms of co-ordination of provincial DREE activity with certain key agencies that do not exist on a decentralized basis except for some aspects of administration. Whether you are considering Public Works, CMHC, National Defence, Supply and Services or a host or others, no clear picture has yet developed as to how there is to be any effective relationship.

We know that this year the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will administer over $500 million. In addition, we know that $20 billion, 40 times that amount, will be administered on a general basis by the government of Canada. It is one thing to spend so many millions of dollars for specific developmental projects within a province or region; it is quite another to forecast the expenditure of hundreds of millions, or billions of dollars which may be totally unrelated to the specific functions taking place under regional development policies.

Unless some clear picture is given by the minister as to how this decentralized department will relate to all other departments of the federal government, let alone the provincial agencies, we may enter into an even more chaotic and, I shudder to suggest it, even more demoralizing period with regard to federal department regional development activity. However, my main concern this evening is not with regard to what is currently taking place in terms of decentralization; I am much more anxious to discuss the approach of regional development within the national concept of how we are developing Canada as a whole.

As any good businessman, or indeed anyone who sets out to do a job, will tell you, before one begins any task three things must be nailed down. First, a goal has to be attempted. The second is the framework or guidelines within which the goal will be accomplished. Third is the strategy, or the steps to accomplish the goal. Here I come to what continues to be my fundamental criticism of the government's present involvement and commitment to regional development activity.

The major weakness of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion as established by this government is that it has not asked itself or the Canadian people, putting it in a way in which the provinces and the various people can respond: where do we want to go; how do we want to get there; what will be the framework for this operation? I am reminded of the old song to the effect that if you don't know where you are going, you are generally bound to end up somewhere else.

I suggest, therefore, that in formulating policies which will respond actively and creatively to regional disparities, the following must be kept in mind. We must start out, in my estimation, with the elaboration of a goal that is generally accepted. One of the proposals that has been placed in the public domain today by our party is the suggestion that there be, in the first instance, national consultation on economic and social priorities.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is possible to establish any kind of short-term or long-term goals in regional economic development unless we are able, in the first instance, to relate these to the national goal. I think one of the reasons that the government has actively lowered its profile in regional development is the resistance that was beginning to develop or, if you like to use a stronger word, the resentment that has occurred in the high-growth areas over what it was costing to implement regional development policies.

It seems to me that if we are to move beyond our present situation, if we are to make the necessary decisions which will, in effect, close the income gap, the unemployment gap, or any kind of descriptive term you wish to use to describe the have-not or altogether too economically and socially depressed areas, then we must have some kind of national consensus. I think far too often programs have been put on the table on a kind of "take it or leave it" basis to the provinces, suggesting that if they are not prepared to respond in some fashion or other to what has been placed before them, then the provinces can go and peddle their papers elsewhere.

I believe that if we are to have an effective policy of regional development in this country, there has to be some national consensus as to what our short-term and long-term goals are. I do not think this can be achieved unless there is some kind of public consultation. I am not thinking here of some kind of one-shot affair where the provinces and the federal government sit down for a couple of days at the national conference centre under the glare of television lights and in full public view to confront each other on some of the well known slogans and shibboleths that have been fired back and forth over the ages. What I am suggesting is a thoroughgoing process that would involve all levels of government—and in that I include major municipalities—as well as substantial input from the private sector.

From time to time reference has been made by a variety of governments to the participation of the people. Far too often this has been more a kind of rhetorical slogan than an actualization. I believe we will not lose substantially to alter the present regions, whether they be groups of provinces, as is the case in eastern Canada, or parts of Canada, as is the case in western and central Canada, unless there can be a public commitment to both the kind of process and the cost of the process necessary to close the gaps that exist in this country.

I could quote again this evening, Mr. Speaker—I will not because I do not have the time—the considerable social difficulties that exist among people living in the four eastern provinces. We face the fact that, regardless of the hundreds of millions of dollars that have been spent in the last ten years to correct the situation, the standard of living in the maritimes has been adjusted only marginally in relationship to that of the nation generally. I could also indicate that the unemployment figure for the Atlantic provinces has consistently over the last 20 years been double that of the province of Ontario, and sometimes almost double that of the whole country. But these are statistics that are well known and perhaps do not represent the realities of hardship and loss of opportunity and potential that confront the hundreds of thousands of people who make up this country.

What we need, therefore, is a kind of national awareness, followed by a national commitment, followed by a national strategy. But having said that, we must envisage a way in which this can be carried out. Whe have had, in the person both of the previous minister of regional economic expansion and the present minister, men of powerful persuasion. But their persuasion seems to have been, quite frankly, limited.

In the early period there was great talk about how this department was going to co-ordinate the impact of the activities of other departments with respect to regional economic development. But we know that in general this has not been the case. We know that interdepartmental committees or interdepartmental activity, where it has been established, has basically not functioned effectively. Therefore, any concept of carrying out an effective regional development policy will have to include the new concept of ministry, the concept of support, and one that has been put on the table for consideration today, the concept of a supervising ministry. By that I mean a ministry which, very frankly, would be supervisory in relation to the general activities of the federal government in a variety of economic fields. It would also provide a level of involvement—co-ordination, if you like—not only of other federal departments but other levels of government that often make basic decisions within their own province or region.

Without an effective vehicle for co-ordination we will simply repeat the numerous errors that have become altogether too obvious over the past few years, where a grant or a program is established to promote development while at the same time a major decision is taken by another federal department which totally undercuts the effectiveness that it is hoped to achieve.

Further to that, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we have to deal in specific terms with a number of the opportunities that lie before us. One of the tragedies for those who live in regions that are regarded as slow-growth or underdeveloped is that many, if not most, of these regions, objectively speaking, should be not at the bottom but at the top of the list. The Atlantic provinces, parts of western Canada and the north have tremendous potential.

We consider transportation in the Atlantic provinces to be a problem. Yet in fact we are sitting on the doorstep of two of the greatest markets in the world, that of Europe and the eastern seaboard of the United States. Why have we not exploited in our national policies, both regarding transportation as well as marketing, the opportunity that this proximity offers? Deep-water port development and improved highway and rail transit would be an obvious avenue here. But without the commitment of the department that is specifically involved, no amount of grants, no amount of shoring-up inefficient industries will achieve this kind of effectiveness.

We must develop, as well, the entrepreneurial skills existing in our region. But again we have had a kind of passive approach to the fact that in many cases there is need to develop institutions that will give us these skills.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. Does he have unanimous consent to conclude his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I shall not intrude too long upon the time of the House; I know it has been customary in this debate to maintain the 30-minute time limit. There were a number of other items that I would have liked to discuss with respect both to long-range planning and the integration of industry, but these are matters that I am sure I will be able to return to at another time.

May I say in conclusion that I hope the government will realize that there is no necessity to freeze, on a continuing basis, the kind of pattern of disparity that is all too well known in this country. We have the potential, we have the resources, and I believe we have the opportunity. All we really need is both the will and the commitment.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to address this House and bring into the open the concerns of the voters of St. Boniface constituency.

May I add that the member for St. Boniface, no matter who he is, is always interested in all of Western Canada. It is a well known fact that, generally, it is believed that the most representative elements of Canadian reality are found in the province of Manitoba, and more specifically in the riding of St. Boniface.

The Address—Mr. J. P. Guay

Mr. Speaker, before addressing myself to the Speech from the Throne, I should like first of all to congratulate those who spoke before me. I enjoyed the speeches delivered by the mover (Mr. Stollery) and the seconder (Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke)). Needless to say, I also appreciated the comments of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and I listened carefully to the remarks made by the other leaders.

Having spent some time in my constituency, I am coming back to the House convinced that the Canadian people expect us to keep on discharging our duty, to pass measures to their benefit.

There surely exists a credibility crisis that we must solve through debates and serious work. As for me, Mr. Speaker, I am determined to work steadily so that we may make good headway.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, my I begin by addressing myself to the problems and aspirations of western Canadians. Never before has so much been written and said about the west. At last eastern Canadians, so-called, are beginning to realize that there exists in the prairie provinces and on the west coast a large body of Canadians who share a different perspective of Canada if only because theirs is a young region, one with a great deal of potential. But it is precisely this potential that concerns western Canadians, because they are concerned about the uses that will be made of their human and natural resources.

Let me say here, Mr. Speaker—and I wish to speak very clearly—that there is no cause for separatism in the west. I for one do not like talk about western separatism. Let me say bluntly that the term does not apply to us. Western Canadians are Canadians first. They want to be Canadians first. Indeed, it is foolish to say even that western Canadians are alienated from the rest of Canada. I believe, instead, that the rest of Canada is alienated from western Canada. Let me go further and say that I believe certain parts of Canada are alienated from the rest of the country. It is true that we who are from western Canada feel that what is commonly referred to as central or eastern Canada is alienated from the rest of Canada.

You know as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, that beliefs are realities and that if, indeed, western Canadians feel the Montreal-Ottawa-Toronto axis is the one which has discriminated against western Canada and, indeed, against the maritimes and our far north, there must be some truth to it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): There must be some foundation for that belief, but I do not believe the fault lies with us. The fault clearly lies with those who have persisted in the belief that all good in Canada comes from the great centres of population. The fault lies with those who cannot, and will not, see beyond the boundaries of their own world. The fault lies with those who are not prepared to move forward, seeking out new paths and new objectives for Canada.

Let me assure the House that western Canadians want their fellow countrymen to realize that their region holds great potential for development. Now is the time for us to tell young Canadians that they should go west. Now is the time for us to provide the opportunity for young Canadians who want to participate in the expansion and growth of western Canada. Yes, there have been significant developments in the last five years. This government has taken significant steps to increase federal decentralization in favour of western Canada. I welcome decentralization policies as they apply to regional economic expansion and similar programs, but that is only a beginning. Do not believe for one minute that western Canadians can be appeased or that they will be satisfied with a few handouts. That is not our objective. Nor, may I add, are we merely interested in obtaining some grants and favourable programs to fatten ourselves and to line our pockets. Those who would say that do not understand the profound feelings that exist in western Canada.

An hon. Member: That's not what your government says.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You are one of those individuals. It is very obvious that even after the years of experience acquired by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), he does not understand western Canadians; that is indicated by what he just said a few minutes ago.

An hon. Member: How about mushrooms?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I will talk to you in a moment if you keep on interrupting. Western Canadians want all other Canadians to understand that Canada's future must lie outside the concentration of wealth, resources and population centres which have until now preoccupied us. We want Canadians to strike out into new avenues, to open up new centres, to expand and benefit from the tremendous wealth of other regions.

An hon. Member: Tell that to your Prime Minister.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): We want Canadians to accept the principle that the expansion of Canada into new ventures must not proceed on the basis of per capita grants or subsidies. What we want is a new departure, a new national policy which will go beyond immediate cost-benefit principles. If our predecessors had limited themselves to expenditures based on narrow bookkeeping principles, there would not have been significant development of the far-flung regions of Canada.

What we must do is open up our potential by striking out boldly. For example, it is time we proceeded with vigor in the construction of a second trans-Canada highway right across our north. This is especially crucial to us in western Canada. It would lead to important investments in the northern area of Canada and create jobs for our young people, helping them by giving them the opportunity to live in the far north and to enjoy that part of our country.

● (2150)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, one of the major frustrations existing in Western Canada is to realize the opportunities that we are offered and especially to know that we do not have the means to achieve them. I already stressed in this House our lack of influence and certain evil consequences that would be brought about in Western Canada by a loss of representation to Parliament.

What we fear above all, Mr. Speaker, is that people not knowing well Western Canada would make decisions closely affecting us. We are afraid that members representing other areas throughout Canada be the ones to actually pass measures that would not always be for the good of Canada as a whole but too often for the good of their constituency or their area only.

I can understand the immediate problems that exist in their case but I entreat them today, Mr. Speaker, to look towards the future. I add that those who would fear too great an influence from Western Canada have nothing to be afraid of in that regard.

We are not opposed to representation by population, but we believe that it is time to recognize that they are other criteria. We must not leave to a large number of members who do not represent a region, too much influence on the natural resources of another region.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, find unacceptable I that we from Southern Canada, should decide upon the future of the North-West Territories while too many of us know very little about that region. That is how colonialism takes place. That is what turns one region against another. Mr. Speaker, I hope that we will have the opportunity during this session deal with this important problem.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I should like to continue to outline the problems of western Canada. The Speech from the Throne is very positive in respect of our concerns. There are proposals in it to take advantage of the potential of western Canada in the area of food production. I welcome proposals to increase the supply of food. I welcome proposals to encourage young farmers to become established and to avoid placing them in a debtor situation. If we are to encourage these young people, we must give them an opportunity to live without having to repay large capital loans which carry high interest charges. I hope to say more about this matter during the current session.

There are other positive proposals in this throne speech which apply to western Canada. But let me give you a warning, Mr. Speaker: let me tell you that we must not adopt these measures as a means of holding western Canada in a dependent situation. Let us not simply favour food production in the interest of Canadian consumers. In my view, we must complement this positive policy by ensuring that increased food production on the prairies leads to the establishment of secondary industries to process the crops grown in western Canada.

Here we have the nub of the question. This is what I am talking about when I say that we must expand the economic base of western Canada. If western Canadians knew they were not simply to grow food for the benefit of consumers, but also for the benefit of their young people who would like to remain on the prairies, which they know best, that would go a long way toward making western Canadians feel that others are concerned about them. Let me add that not enough Canadians understand this desire. Not enough Canadians, especially the policy-makers and those in a position to do something about it, are prepared to reverse the population drain from the prairies by creating secondary industries in western Canada. This is one area in which the natural advantages of the prairies must be seen and acted upon.

Mr. Speaker, let me address myself to other matters of concern to western Canada. May I begin by congratulating the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for calling the first western economic opportunities conference which was held in Calgary last July.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schumacher: What has happened to it?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): If it were worth while to give an answer to the hon. member, I would do so; but I do not consider it worth while. I say the "first" conference because I hope there will be other such conferences. A number of meetings of this kind will be required to ensure that this government and the prairie governments understand each other clearly. But this first conference demonstrated to the citizens of western Canada that this government—and I am not speaking here necessarily in partisan terms—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): —is sensitive to the concerns of western Canadians. This initiative must continue and must be followed up. I am surprised that the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher), a western Canadian, would make the comments he has been making while I speak about the benefit to western Canadians. I am surprised that a man coming from Alberta, even though a Conservative, would choose to interfere when another member is placing before the House the case for western Canadians. It is known that he has sung the same swan-song as his leader. They use double-talk. They do things in an attempt to trip somebody else, but they are not sincere in respect of the people whom they represent. I am surprised, Mr. Speaker; I felt the hon. member would be sincere in representing his people, because there are no Liberal members from Alberta. I thought we could depend on him to represent the people, but I am afraid he is not doing so. When he makes the type of comments he has been making, he does not help anybody in western Canada.

May I repeat that I congratulate the Prime Minister and the government for calling this first western economic opportunities conference which has been of benefit to western Canada. I repeat that it must be followed by other such conferences.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it is ten o'clock.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I just want to make clear that I am calling it ten o'clock. I have not completed my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The Chair noted that the hon. member has the floor, and he will still have the floor tomorrow.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INDUSTRY—RADIO ENGINEERING PRODUCTS COMPANY LIMITED—INQUIRY AS TO SALE AND RECOVERY OF INDEBTEDNESS TO CROWN

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, in this first adjournment proceeding in the new session it is an honour to be the first member to participate. I do so to seek further answers and more detailed information on a question I asked of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) dealing with Radio Engineering Products Company Limited.

The main thrust of my intervention at this time is to find out why the Department of Supply and Services, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of National Revenue through sloppy administration allowed their departments to go into debt to the amount of $4.5 million, a sum of money owed to the Crown by Radio Engineering Products Limited. In order to redeem themselves and in the hope of retrieving this money, they found it necessary to buy out this company. The last financial statement of the company showed they had lost $5.4 million in 1972, and it had to have injected into its cash flow in 1973 another $975,000. This is the position in which the Crown finds itself today.

This company manufactures communications equipment in Campbellton, New Brunswick, and has an office in Montreal. In 1965, the Fisher brothers who held the controlling stock of this public company entered into an agreement with the government to share equally the cost of developing communications equipment. This was arranged by the Department of Supply and Services and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and a loan of $522,000 was made to the company. Several irregularities occurred along the way. First, in 1968, when the debt of $522,000 became due to the Crown, with the approval of Treasury Board the agreement was amended and the loan forgiven provided the company would put the money into further development. This was later revoked and the $522,000 remained a debt to the Crown.

Then the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce erred twice in the life of the contract with regard to the sharing ratio. The same department failed to issue reports to the interdepartmental committee between April, 1967, and April, 1969. For two years no reports were made to the committee. Also, the department issued a cheque on the very last day on which they were allowed to issue cheques in the governmental year, that is, April 30, 1968, but it was not released until July and the department charged it to the year in which the cheque was issued, not the year in which the work was done. This strictly contravened the Financial Administration Act. Added to all these irregularities by the government, the major shareholders, Fisher brothers, sold their 70 per cent controlling interest to a U.S. corporation. In April, 1970, when the department put the heat on to collect the $522,000, they were told that the company could not pay because all their cash resources of $3.6 million had been lent to the parent U.S. company.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

While all this was going on in 1968 and 1969 the company had two exceedingly good years. They made tremendous profits and they owed income tax to the tune of $4 million. As we operate on a self-assessment policy for paying income tax, I would like to know why the Fisher brothers did not declare their tax. I would also like to know why the Department of National Revenue did not collect the income tax. We know that any member of this House, or any Canadian who owes income tax, has to pay it and pay it smartly, but here we have a company that owed $4 million and was not made to pay it. Now we find ourselves with a company that has few assets, that is not making any profit, and the only hope of collecting this money would be if the Crown sold the company which it itself had to buy.

I would like to know why the Fisher brothers were not made to pay this income tax. I would like to know why they were kept on staff and paid a good salary, plus 12½ per cent each of the aggregate net profits before taxes. It turned out that this was a pretty poor decision because recently the contract for their services was terminated. I would like to know from the department whether this company has been sold. If it has not been sold, what steps is the department taking to sell it so that we, the Canadian taxpayers, can have this debt paid to the Crown? Why was the income tax not collected? I suppose it is not being collected now because the federal government owns the company; but why was it not collected before the change of ownership?

I would like to know why the 1973 financial statement, which was due in July, has not been tabled to date, seven months later? This is a very unusual piece of business between the Crown and a public company. It raises a lot of questions to be answered and I hope the department will come forth with answers to some of my questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, when the government decided to take over Radio Engineering Products Company Limited in July, 1972, this company and its subsidiary in the United States were facing serious financial problems.

When he announced this take over, on July 14, 1972, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) stated among other things, and I quote:

> This take over will enable this company, which is advanced in its field, to carry on its operations, and it will enable the maintenance of about 1,502 jobs.
> The company will continue to develop and manufacture specialized multiplex equipment for the international market.
> The take over of the company by the government is a short-range measure and we expect that shares will be sold back when the company is in a more stable financial situation.

While the company was government property, very serious efforts have been made and the company's business as well as the level of employment did improve. The company that had specialized almost exclusively in the field of defence equipment is getting its first commercial contracts which should help ensure greater stability. It employs about 200 people in Montreal and Campbellton, New Brunswick, and this is beyond expectations. As the situation continues to improve, it will become more and more interesting for potential buyers to take over the company. If and when it is sold, the government intends to use the proceeds from the sale to write-off the debt balance to the Crown.

Because of the limited liquid assets of the company, it has not been deemed advisable to recover the indebtedness until the present time.

When the company was government controlled, the department kept in close touch with the New Brunswick provincial authorities of concerning the future of the company which is an important factor in the industrial structure of the Northern part of this province. Provincial authorities continue to support the Federal government action in this matter and take part in the financial effort required for the smooth running of this firm.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—RECIPIENTS OF WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES, OLD AGE SECURITY AND GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT—PROVISION OF COST OF LIVING INCREASES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if we must get down to one last minister of the present government, I am happy to settle for the one who is here tonight, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). As the minister will recall, I put to him on Monday, December 10, 1973, as recorded in Hansard for that date at page 8562, this question:

> As there are to be increases in January in old age security and the guaranteed income supplement on the one hand and in the war veterans allowance on the other, are the necessary steps being taken so that veterans who are on both will receive both and not have one set off against the other?

The next entry in Hansard is as follows:

> HON. DANIEL J. MACDONALD (MINISTER OF VETERANS AFFAIRS): Mr. Speaker, those necessary steps are being taken.

A few weeks later, in fact on Thursday, January 3, 1974, as recorded in Hansard for that date at page 9010, I put this question to the minister:

> Can the minister say whether the necessary steps have now been taken so that veterans who are receiving both old age security and the guaranteed income supplement on the one hand, and war veterans allowance on the other, will receive the cost of living increases that take place in both those payments this month?

The Hansard entry again is as follows:

> HON. DANIEL J. MACDONALD (MINISTER OF VETERANS AFFAIRS): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that my questions on those two days were the ultimate in clarity. So were the minister's answers. I asked very clearly about the two separate cost of living increases that were to take place in January, one on old age security and the guaranteed income supplement, the other on the war veterans allowance. I asked the minister on both occasions if veterans receiving both of those benefits would get both increases, and on both occasions the minister's answer was yes.

In the meantime, on December 18, 1973, two orders in council were passed. They are companion pieces, one having to do with the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, the other having to do with the War Veterans Allowance Act. I won't take the time, in fact there is not time, to give all the details of the order in council with respect to the War Veterans Allowance Act, but the effect of it was to raise the permissible income of a war veterans allowance recipient, who is 65 years of age or over, by a certain amount. The amount by which that ceiling was raised for war veterans allowance recipients, 65 years of age or over, was $4.83 single, $9.22 married. Those are the precise amounts by which old age security and the guaranteed income supplement were escalated in January, $4.83 single, $9.22 married.

The result of the order in council to which I referred is that veterans 65 or over who are on the war veterans allowance got a total increase in January of only $4.83 if they were single, and of only $9.22 if they were married. In these cases we are assuming that the wife is over 65 years of age as well.

But, Mr. Speaker, in January there was also an increase, due to the cost of living, in the war veterans allowance of $10.13 single, and $17.23 married. Veterans under 65 who are on the war veterans allowance got these increases. There is no question about it. The whole point of my remarks on December 10 and January 13 was this: I wanted to make a plea that I thought would be given a favourable response. I thought, this time, that veterans on the war veterans allowance and on the Old Age Security and guaranteed income supplement would get both. Somewhere in the cabinet, and I see the minister is the only one here to answer for the whole cabinet, is someone who frustrated the clear statement of the minister.

There is no doubt in my mind where the Minister of Veterans Affairs stands on this matter. I think he confirmed that when I asked him this morning if this matter is being reviewed. He said that it is, and I hope that even by now that review has got somewhere.

When you escalate, because of the rise in the cost of living, a person's income, you do not really do it if you escalate only part of that income. If the cost of living has gone up by 4 per cent or 5 per cent, and you escalate part of the income by 4 per cent or 5 per cent but do not escalate the other part, you have nullified the whole idea of escalating one's income according to the rise in the cost of living. If there is one group of citizens to which this ought not to be done, it is the veterans. I think the minister agrees with me. In particular, this ought not to be done to veterans who are on the war veterans allowance, or the burnt out pension.

I make a plea to the minister, Mr. Speaker. It is more than a plea; it is an offer of support. I think he needs support in that cabinet. His statement to me was as clear as could be, and yet the order in council does not back it. Advertisements that have appeard in veterans' publications make it clear that he has not been supported. I will be through after one more sentence, Mr. Speaker. I wish to assure the Minister of Veterans Affairs that in his continued review of this matter with his colleagues he has the support of all parties of this House for what he promised on December 10 and January 3; he said that those veterans who are over 65 are entitled to and should get both of these cost of living adjustments, and this is what all of us support.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this matter. Eligibility to receive war veterans allowance depends, among other things, upon the income of the applicant or recipient. The amount of allowance awarded in any allowance year, when combined with the recipient's total assessable income from other sources, may not exceed the relevant annual income ceiling as specified in the schedule to the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Section 19.1 of the War Veterans Allowance Act provides that the allowance rates shall be adjusted annually in accordance with the increase in the consumer price index. Hence, as of January 1, 1974, war veterans allowance rates were increased by 6.7 per cent. I appreciate that old age security pension and guaranteed income supplement benefits were also increased on that same date. However, in no case will a war veterans allowance recipient, also receiving old age security and guaranteed income supplement benefits, have his war veterans allowance reduced. In all cases a recipient's total income from all sources will be increased.

With respect to recipients of disability pension under the terms of the Pension Act also in receipt of war veterans allowance benefits, they in all cases received an increase of at least $10.13 single and $17.23 married, from all sources. Where the increase in pension was less than $10.13 or $17.23, as the case may be, the difference was made up in war veterans allowance dollars.

In cases where the escalation under the terms of the Pension Act was more than the war veterans allowance escalation, the recipient benefited up to the level of the war veterans allowance ceiling. Where the pension escalation raised the assessable income higher than the new war veterans allowance ceiling, the recipient's war veterans allowance was cancelled. Nonetheless, I should like to underline the fact that in every case a war veterans allowance recipient benefited by no less than $10.13 or $17.23, from all sources.

The steps which have been taken to ensure continued improvement in the allowances paid to war veterans allowance and civilian war allowance recipients is further indication of this government's concern for the well-being of our veterans and their dependants. As indicated in the annex to the Speech from the Throne, there will be further amendments brought to the War Veterans Allowance Act which will further enhance benefits to veterans.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:23 p.m.

GEORGE DERBY HOSPITAL LANDS, BURNABY—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House a petition pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 67, which in brief prays that approximately 170 acres situated in the municipality of Burnaby be returned to that municipality from the federal government for the original purchase price. I might say that a petition similar in form has been signed by some 9,000 residents of that municipality. If the petition is found to be in order, Mr. Speaker, I hope it will be referred to an appropriate committee of the House for action.

PROPOSED SALE OF LOCOMOTIVES TO CUBA—APPLICATION OF CANADIAN RATHER THAN U.S. LAW—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity dealing with the extraterritorial constraints which are holding up the sale of some $25 million worth of locomotives to Cuba. Inasmuch as some $50 million in Canadian public financing has been assigned to the benefit of the Canadian subsidiary involved through the Export Development Corporation, this subservience to foreign laws is intolerable. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell):

That the government be instructed by the House to immediately ensure that any company receiving assistance of public funds conduct its operations in Canada solely by rule of Canadian law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This motion, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SHORTAGE OF RAILWAY CARS FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA LUMBER—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity which is not plagiarized from anybody but relates to the continuing refusal on the part of Canadian National Railways to treat fairly northern British Columbians engaged in the lumber industry. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to conduct an immediate inquiry into the reasons for there being a continuing shortage of railway cars for lumber products and the reasons why the Canadian Railways in particular seem to be placing lumber producers in north central British Columbia at a disadvantage by not supplying sufficient railway cars, and that the said committee be further authorized to examine the need for the appointment of a railway car co-ordinator to ensure that railways in Canada serve the interests of Canadians on a priority basis.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), of urgent and pressing necessity and of major concern to all cattle producers, namely in view of the unsettling and detrimental effect on cattle producers and the operators of feedlots caused by the tremendous importation of cattle from the United States into Canada recently, as indicated by the fact that in a most recent week 60 per cent of the kill on the Toronto market were cattle imports, that the government should impose an import duty on cattle imported from the United States of one and one-half cents per pound on the first 12,000 head, two and one-half cents per pound on imports from 12,000 to 18,000 head, and on imports over 18,000 head, of five cents per pound.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a question of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the planned four cent increase in the price of a loaf of bread announced yesterday by certain bakeries, especially in light of the statement made in the House by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) and the recommendation of the Food Prices Review Board that only a two cent increase can be justified at this time, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

WORK UNFINISHED LAST SESSION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Donald W. None of these studies or reports is yet completed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would invite the hon. member to indicate as soon as possible what his motion is. I am sorry if I interrupted the hon. member at the moment when he was about to put his motion, but he will understand that in taking this opportunity I am not directly reflecting on his own motion but on all motions proposed under Standing Order 43. They should be put as quickly as possible and contain the essential motion rather than an explanatory introduction. I apologize to the hon. member if I interrupted him too quickly.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I therefore request unanimous consent of the House to the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASES IN PRICE OF BREAD—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs arising out of his statement yesterday about the message from the Bakery Council of Canada indicating that general restraint would be exercised for the month of March. In view of the opposition of the Food Prices Review Board that an increase in the price of bread of more than two or three cents would be excessive, and the reports that some bakeries at least have put their prices up by four cents, would the minister tell the House what action, if any, he proposes to take?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that most, if not all, of the bakeries, with one possible exception, which are the subject of these press reports are not members of the Bakery Council. I am taking steps to contact them today, and I hope to have further information to report to the House tomorrow.

Mr. Stanfield: I think the minister conceded with respect to the position of those outside the council or association that there was at least one bakery to his knowledge that had gone above the two or three cent level indicated as the maximum appropriate. What action, if any, does the minister intend to take with respect to any such bakery?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, first we want to contact this bakery directly and find out exactly what it is doing so that we will have exact knowledge rather than relying on press reports. In addition, as I said yesterday, my request to the members of the Bakery Council through the council itself was for voluntary action, and as soon as we get an assessment of how this restraint is operating, which we want on an urgent basis, we will have to consider what further action would be appropriate.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister what action he really proposes to take to confront the problem of the increase in the price of bread in view of the impression he has been giving in recent days that he is simply using evasive tactics to permit delays on his part?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the action I have been taking is within the framework of the statement made by the Prime Minister last August, which involves a three-stage process. First of all, where unwarranted price increases are identified it is expected that they will be made public by the Food Prices Review Board and given widespread publicity; second, the principals of the enterprise involved can expect to be called before that board and, third, in the event that the board reports significant instances of profiteering, in cases where the parties concerned are not willing to correct this voluntarily then, as the Prime Minister stated, the government would be prepared to seek parliamentary authority to undertake corrective action.

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO CONTROL PRICE OF BREAD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact certain bakeries have already announced that they will proceed with a four cent increase, thereby ignoring the recommendation of the Food Prices Review Board, and the statement by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in the House yesterday, and in view of the undertaking given by the Prime Minister of September 4 last year that the government would take action in a legislative way if the industry did not comply voluntarily, is the government now prepared, in light of the recommendation of the Food Prices Review Board, to proceed with legislation to halt this unwarranted increase in the price of bread?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my answer has already been given in that regard.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I ask—

Mr Speaker: Order, please. I will return to the hon. member in a moment. I have already recognized the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore who has a supplementary. We will be continuing with this subject. The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore.

INCREASES IN PRICE OF BREAD—REPRESENTATIONS AGAINST SUCH ACTION TO BAKERS NOT MEMBERS OF COUNCIL

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. If important bakeries in this country are not members of the Bakery Council, I should like to ask why the minister attempted to solve the problem of rising bread prices by working through the Bakery Council?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that this is argument. The hon. member may wish to ask the question in a different way; if not, I will recognize the hon. member for St. John's East who also has a supplementary.

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, I shall try to approach the question in a manner that will be in order. In view of the fact that a number of the bakers who are responsible for the price increases are not members of the Bakery Council, what steps did the minister take to contact those bakers in pursuit of some assurance that they would not take this action?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I am not mistaken, it was the announcement of the Bakery Council on February 15 on behalf of its members that they were planning to make increases in their prices of three to four cents, with a minimum of four cents in Quebec, that led the Food Prices Review Board to intensify its studies of this matter and issue the two reports of which we are aware. The reports were in response, as I understand it, to the announcement of the Bakery Council. I thought that the most urgent thing to do was to be in touch with the Bakery Council with respect to the intention of its members, and now that we have additional information I am proceeding actively to deal with this other aspect of the situation as well.

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, the minister could have anticipated the problem he has described. In view of the fact that Weston Bakeries announced yesterday it was increasing its price by four cents and it is a member of the Bakery Council and is taking this action in defiance of the council, the Food Prices Review Board, the government and the Canadian consumer, what steps is the government taking to empower itself to enforce a roll-back of that specific price increase which has been announced and confirmed by that bakery?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the approach outlined by the Prime Minister on behalf of the government contemplates decisions on action after there have been hearings by the board on its report and observation of whether there is voluntary action once these hearings have taken place. In the meantime I propose to contact Weston's directly to see exactly what they are doing and what they plan to do.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SALARY INCREASE FOR RURAL MAIL CARRIERS

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Has the hon. member for Portneuf a supplementary question?

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Portneuf, and we then return to supplementary questions on this matter.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General.

[Mr. Speaker.]

As the minister announced to us last December that the department was preparing an analysis of the contracts of rural mail carriers in order to adjust further the salaries of these workers to the cost of living, could we know how far this analysis has gone and what increase percentage can be expected by this category of postal workers?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, after many requests from members on this side of the House and some from the other side, we have reviewed all contracts for rural mail distribution to adjust them in accordance with the rise in the cost of living registered during the last few years, in brief, to make them more equitable.

We have also announced that, due to the price increase of a gallon of gas, an increase will be granted to all rural mail carriers.

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO CONTROL PRICE OF BREAD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact the Food Prices Review Board reported on February 18 that an increase of more than two cents on a 24 ounce loaf of bread could not be justified, and in view of the Prime Minister's statement to the country last September that he would take action if the bakeries failed to respond in a voluntary way and proceeded with any unwarranted increase, does the Prime Minister now propose to accept this challenge thrown to him by the bakeries and bring in legislation? Otherwise his statement is empty rhetoric and the Food Prices Review Board is a farce.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSITION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING FOUR CENT INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary on the bread situation. In view of the fact there has been an announcement of a four cent increase in the price of bread, and in view of the fact the Food Prices Review Board has said it is unjustified, the minister has said it is unjustified and the Prime Minister has said it is unjustified, I put this question to the minister. Is he going to back down as he has in the past on this matter or does he still feel—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that such questions are not questions; they are debate. Would the hon. member resume his seat. He will be given an opportunity to rephrase his question if he wants to. After that we will go to the next question and I will recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Lawrence: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think we are entitled to ask the minister—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, we are entitled to ask the minister if it is still the government's view, as enunciated by him, that a four cent increase in the price of bread is unjustified today?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, all I said previously about the matter was that the government would view any increase in the price of bread in a most serious manner if it came about through increases in costs which were not justified. This is why I contacted the members of the Bakery Council through their association, to ask them not to make any increase beyond that considered acceptable by the Food Prices Review Board until they had a chance to meet with the board. Second, there was not only a report on February 15 saying that a two cent increase would be justified; there was another report just on February 28 saying that further studies indicated that a further one cent increase might be justified or would be justified under certain circumstances. Finally, I should like to say that we should note the interesting conversion, equal in importance to that of Saul on the road to Damascus, when it comes to the Food Prices Review Board on the part of the Conservative Party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

TRADE

REQUEST THAT DIRECTIVE BE ISSUED UNDER CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION ACT TO ENSURE SALE OF LOCOMOTIVES TO CUBA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that section 4 of the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act gives the minister or the cabinet specific authority to issue a "special direction" to ensure that the trade objectives of the government are carried out through the Canadian Commercial Corporation, will the minister assure the House that he or some other minister or the cabinet will issue such a directive to ensure that the discussed sale of locomotives to be produced in Montreal to the government of Cuba will be proceeded with?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, a very few minutes ago I was talking to the president of the Canadian company with respect to this transaction. I asked him what the status of the application for waiver was. He told me it had not yet been acted upon. I expressed the view to him that if the problem, essentially a United States problem involving United States law and United States citizens—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: Just a moment—could be resolved by the resignation of those directors, I would expect that resignation to take place forthwith.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the more specific aspect of the member's question, he has raised the possibility of the Canadian Commercial Corporation being used. I am not the minister responsible for the Canadian Commercial Corporation and I suggest that he direct his question to that minister.

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING OPERATIONS OF SUBSIDIARIES OF FOREIGN CORPORATIONS IN CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the answer just given to the House by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and its implications, I would ask the Prime Minister to make clear to the House what I understood to be the force of the answer. Is it now government policy that if any American or other foreign subsidiary located in Canada does not conduct trading policies that are in accord with the general wishes of the government, the government expects the directors, in this relevant case the American directors, of such corporations to resign?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has indicated one course, resignation. We hope to obtain the same results by option, by a series of approaches to this matter. It may not be by resignation. It may be by moral suasion; it may be by talking to the American government. The important thing for the House and the Canadian public to know is that the Canadian government has means to make sure that this kind of deal which is to the profit of Canadian companies does go through. We have the means to do it and we will exercise those means.

PROPOSED SALE OF LOCOMOTIVES TO CUBA—REPRESENTATIONS BY EXTERNAL AFFAIRS MINISTER TO UNITED STATES TO SECURE REMOVAL OF RESTRICTIONS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister been in touch with the Secretary of State of the United States in the past day or so to ensure the removal of any restrictions imposed by the United States government on the sale to Cuba of locomotives to be built in Canada by the MLW-Worthington Company, a subsidiary of a United States parent company, which has received $50 million in export development loans from the Canadian government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the Prime Minister said, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has a number of options. The most desirable one would be to get a waiver of this particular rule applied to MLW-Worthington. Representations along these lines have been made. As the hon. member knows, Dr. Kissinger has been out of the country, but the matter is now in his hands.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Does the government—

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat. I will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby will also be recognized for a supplementary. At the same time, I would remind hon. members we are only on the second or third subject. We are not making very much progress with all these supplementaries. As I said, the hon. member will be recognized, along with the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, following which I will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO ENSURE THAT SUBSIDIARIES OF FOREIGN COMPANIES OPERATING IN CANADA NOT RESTRICTED

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): My supplementary is for the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government in the very near future to introduce legislation to ensure that subsidiaries of foreign companies operating in Canada cannot be denied the right to trade with countries with which this country has good trading relations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in stage one of the competition policy this is indeed the spelled-out policy of the government. I hope it has the support of the Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: It certainly does because that was our policy—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: We had the guts to carry out trade of this kind.

Mr. Trudeau: I hope you will support it this time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REQUEST FOR DECLARATION THAT SUBSIDIARIES OF FOREIGN COMPANIES OPERATING IN CANADA EXPECTED TO GIVE PRIORITY TO CANADIAN INTERESTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Considering the importance of avoiding specific confrontation on a number of items that are being negotiated for sale between Canada and Cuba by other companies and the desirability of avoiding the kind of ad hoc crisis we now have on a specific sale, will the Prime Minister follow the example of the president of Argentina and make a forthright, firm, non-inflammatory statement that henceforth all companies located in Canada will be expected to trade in terms of Canadian priorities?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the hon. member urges me to make a non-inflammatory statement and talks about a crisis. There is no crisis. There is a difficulty and it is being solved by the government. I indicated to the House that we will make sure it is solved in the interests of the Canadian people.

POSITION OF DEPARTMENT ON MEDICAL ASSOCIATION SUBMISSION RESPECTING ADMISSION OF FOREIGN MEDICAL GRADUATES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question in connection with foreign doctors emigrating to Canada. Can the minister inform the House whether the Department of Manpower and Immigration has taken any action on the brief presented by the Canadian Medical Association on foreign medical graduates coming to Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McKenzie: Will the minister check to see whether the Department of Immigration is now properly advising potential physician immigrants of Canadian licensing and employment regulations?

Mr. Lalonde: I will refer the matter to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McKenzie: Is the minister considering asking the College of Physicians and Surgeons to change their ruling on foreign doctors having to write the education council for foreign medical graduates examination so as to allow foreign graduates to practice in remote areas of Canada where they are badly needed?

REQUEST THAT BARNARD LAND, VICTORIA, BE RETURNED TO CITY AT PRICE PAID BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On December 8 last the Prime Minister officially turned over the Jericho lands, 37 acres in Vancouver, at cost price to the city of Vancouver.

The city of Victoria has a similar situation with the Barnard estate. Can the Prime Minister give any assurance that Victoria will receive the same treatment accorded Vancouver and thus reinforce his statement of December 8 that such transfers will remind people that the government at Ottawa is their government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government cannot take a general stand on all questions. It has to look at each particular request on its merits. The hon. member knows that the federal government owns vast quantities of land across the country. I think it owns about one-third of Quebec city. We would not in advance want to give any blanket undertaking that anybody who asks can have such land back as a favour. We hope the federal presence can be recognized through federal ownership of these lands and that they do not necessarily have to be transferred to the province or municipality.

PRICE OF HOME HEATING OIL IN OTTAWA AREA

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that about one-half of the heating oil used in the Ottawa area is western oil transported by the Toronto-Ottawa pipeline and that the major oil companies are charging eastern offshore prices for that oil, would the minister tell the House what he intends to do about this discriminatory pricing policy?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I asked previously that this be investigated by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and I have been discussing the matter with them. I think the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has a report to give the House at this time.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): We have been in discussion with particular refiners in light of what are anticipated to be lower costs for this home heating oil. Those discussions are continuing. There is some conflict as to the actual cost involved both in refurbishing the pipeline and of the product itself.

Mr. Baker: Are similar discussions being carried on in other areas of Ontario? Are similar assessments being conducted in other parts of Canada and, if so, where?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think there is a unique situation here in view of the re-establishment of the pipeline link. There has been a far-reaching discussion with the industry concerning the impact on their over-all cost position of the ability to move western Canadian oil into the eastern market and the costs involved in this movement whether by pipeline or by ship.

OIL—METHOD AND CRITERIA TO BE USED IN ESTABLISHING ONE-PRICE SYSTEM FOR CANADIAN CRUDE

Mr. Eldon M. Is it to be set by the cabinet or is it to be set by the board? What criteria will be used in setting the price of Canadian crude in the future?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): This is one of the questions which is presently under discussion with certain of the interested provinces. It will be a matter with which parliament will be asked to deal later this month. At the moment it is a matter for discussion.

INCREASES IN PRICE OF BREAD—ACTIVITIES OF FLOUR MILLING COMPANIES AS FACTOR

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the question I should like to direct is intended for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The other day I asked him about the relationship between the flour milling companies and their subsidiary companies which are engaged in the baking industry. I asked him whether or not those flour milling companies, because they control wholly-owned bakeries, are padding the price and thus inflating the cost of the end product, namely, bread. Can the minister tell us what he has discovered about this situation?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): When this question was asked the other day I said my authority in this area derived from the Combines Investigation Act and that I would be pleased to have the director look into any evidence which might indicate breaches of the act in this domain. As far as other forms of inquiry are concerned, I have not yet had an opportunity to carry them out, but I am prepared to see what further information can be obtained.

Mr. Howard: Rather than ask a supplementary question, I shall raise a question of privilege. While I shall not level the accusation directly now, the answer the minister just gave leads me to believe that he is either knowingly misleading the House or is misleading it out of ignorance. He has twice—both today and the other day—said he would refer this subject matter to the Director of Research and Investigation of the Combines Investigation Branch. I submit this is an attempt to mislead the House and the country into thinking that he and his department are going to do something—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that is hardly a question of privilege. It is debate. He does not agree with the statement made by the minister. It is a long established rule of the House that a dispute as to facts cannot form the basis of a question of privilege. The hon. member is debating an issue. The question period is so short that I would hope hon. members would not use it for alleged questions of privilege.

Mr. Howard: On the question of privilege, if Your Honour will permit me to speak to the point for just a moment, as I said, one could very easily level the accusation that the minister is deliberately misleading the House. If I do that, that is a question of privilege. Twice, now, the minister has told us he has referred this matter to the director of the combines investigation branch though, in fact, there is no director and there has been no director for over a year. That office is vacant.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member uses a strange argument. He says, "If I made the charge, that would be a question of privilege, but I am not making the charge and therefore I have a question of privilege." This is an argument between himself and the minister, and I would hope we could continue with the next question.

Mr. Howard: Let me say, then, that the minister has deliberately misled the House in giving those answers to those particular questions.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows as well as I do that he cannot charge another member, whether he be a minister or not, with deliberately or wilfully misleading the House. That is entirely unparliamentary. The hon. member cannot make such a statement. I will hear the minister first because he has been impugned by the accusation or charge now being made by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to lower myself to the hon. member's level—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: —but I do wish to put on the record that the position of director of the combines branch is being filled very capably on an acting basis by Mr. J. J. Quinlan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Skeena cannot flout the rules. He has the same responsibility as all other members to respect the rules. I think the hon. member owes it to the Chair to co-operate. The rules are difficult enough to administer and interpret without the position of the Chair being made more difficult, if not impossible. I call upon the hon. member to qualify the statement he has made.

Mr. Howard: Now that the minister has admitted that there is no director—and there has been no director for the past year; that office has been left vacant—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Howard: True, there are two acting directors but that does not give the minister licence to say there is a director.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: On a question of privilege, there are not two acting directors. The position is not vacant. It is being occupied by Mr. J. J. Quinlan and I feel the hon. member should not, either wittingly or unwittingly, attempt to mislead the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister is not helping the Chair. There are just a few minutes left before the end of the question period and I would not like them to be used in a battle over what the hon. member has said or not said. As I heard him, he made a comment which I gather from his introduction he is about ready to qualify.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I am one who is coming quickly to the conclusion that the minister cannot deliberately do anything, so I withdraw the word "deliberately". But he sure did it out of ignorance.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that the hon. member has settled the situation completely. My understanding is that he has withdrawn the charge, the very serious charge, that another member has deliberately misled the House. I would hope hon. members could debate in this chamber without using language which is clearly unparliamentary and which they know, from their experience, to be unparliamentary. As a very humble member, I certainly cannot see what is achieved by using expressions of this kind and unparliamentary words.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRANSPORT

LOSS OF SHIPMENT OF NICKELS BEING MOVED BY RAIL TO WINNIPEG

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a question for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker, and I express the hope that he is feeling better. Has the minister any information for the House concerning a lost nickel shipment on its way by rail to Winnipeg, possibly in Longlac area?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I am not aware of this. I will inquire and report to the hon. member.

COST OF BALER TWINE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. The minister in his remarks yesterday indicated that certain agricultural costs had increased by some 300 to 400 per cent, and since baler twine is one of the items affected I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he has taken any action in an effort to contain its price and, if so, what results he has achieved?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): As I am sure the hon. member knows, this is an imported product. Most of the people who produced baler twine have gone out of business for the same reason that some farmers have gone out of business, because they could not make a buck. There is a real world shortage of supply and everybody is bidding for it. Perhaps the hon. member has a suggestion as to what more we can do. We have asked people to produce a synthetic type of baler twine made out of plastic. I believe some of this will be on the market. But I am sure there will still be a terrific problem just the same as there is a sugar problem which is a world problem.

AGRICULTURAL INPUT COSTS AS PART OF CONSUMER COSTS

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, since the answer to my question is no, I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether agricultural costs are considered as part of consumer costs, and has he been able to obtain any satisfactory answers whatsoever in his office as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that they are considered as inputs into consumer costs.

LABOUR RELATIONS

POSSIBILITY OF RAIL SERVICE DISRUPTION BECAUSE OF PROPOSED RUNTHROUGH OF CNR TRAINS INVOLVING NAKINA, ONT.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, I have a very urgent question for the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Nielsen: Phone him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Penner: In view of the proposed runthrough of CNR trains through the home terminal of Nakina, Ontario, a proposal that has been agreed upon by the company and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, despite strong local protest and resistance in Nakina and Hornepayne, I should like to know whether the Minister of Labour will agree to intervene directly in order to prevent the possibility of a very serious national disruption of our rail services?

Hon. John C. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the hon. member that the director of mediation and conciliation for the Department of Labour is meeting with the chairman of the engineers' union this morning in an endeavour to resolve this matter.

ENERGY

CONCERN OF FARMERS OF SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO ABOUT ROUTE OF PROPOSED OIL PIPELINE EXTENSION

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the widespread concern among agricultural people in the southwestern Ontario region that an additional pipeline going through that area from Sarnia will cause havoc to a great deal of prime farmland, has he looked into every possible avenue for this pipeline and is it possible that some alternate route would serve the purpose?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the question of route was very extensively examined before the final decision was taken to put it in effect along the existing Trans-Canada right of way through that area.

INCREASE IN RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES ON STEEL SHIPPED TO WESTERN CANADA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact the government wants a subsidy on oil so we will have one price across the country, can the minister advise whether the government is taking any action to rescind the one-third in freight rates on steel going to western Canada?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have sent a wire to the presidents of both railway companies, Mr. Sinclair and Mr. MacMillan, protesting against this increase. I was informed unofficially that the increase is to be phased in, but I am still opposed to it and I hope they are going to roll it back.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to note that the minister does not agree with the increase, but I should like to ask whether the government will immediately introduce legislation to make sure there are no increases on freight rates to western Canada?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, knowing the powers we have, I hope I will have the support of the House if ever we want to use them in the form of a legislative instrument.

[Mr. Penner.]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ACQUISITION OF MACDONALD TOBACCO COMPANY BY R. J. REYNOLDS COMPANY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Before the recess the minister indicated he was having discussions with the R. J. Reynolds people and the Macdonald Tobacco Company concerning a takeover which seemed to be occurring during the interim period between the passage of the Foreign Investment Review Act and its promulgation. Would he advise the House what success he has had preventing the industry from being dominated by a United States corporation?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think I have indicated on a number of occasions that I very much regret the decision of those who sold control of this firm to the United States, it having taken place before the law could be promulgated. This particular transaction went through before we had an opportunity to screen it. As to the question of significant benefit to Canada, we have had and are still having useful discussions with both companies. They have I think, expressed a genuine interest in trying to meet the test of significant benefit to Canada but in my opinion they have not yet done so. We will be having further discussions on that point.

POSSIBILITY OF TARIFFS AND QUOTAS ON BEEF IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES TO ASSIST CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the very serious problems that plague the livestock industry, are he and his cabinet colleagues giving serious consideration to the institution of a system of reciprocal tariffs and proportionate quotas as proposed by the Canadian Cattlemen's Association in respect of the movement of beef between the United States and Canada, or is any consideration being given to the implementation of upper limits on beef imports into Canada from the United States in order that we may save the beef industry in this country?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can say that all the suggestions made by the Cattlemen's Association and by other associations, including the beef improvement association, the stock growers and the feedlot operators, as to what should be done are all being considered. We are meeting with the Canadian Cattlemen's Association later this afternoon.

I should like to correct one thing that was stated earlier in the proceedings today to the effect that 60 per cent of the cattle coming into the Toronto market were coming from the United States. Last week the figure was 45 per cent, which is still very bad as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Can we expect a statement tomorrow?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vegreville on a supplementary question, to be followed by the hon. member for New Westminster on a further supplementary, and then perhaps one or two last questions.

Mr. Mazankowski: Can the Minister of Agriculture indicate to the House when he will be making an announcement to the House and the country regarding the measures the government will undertake to bring about some order, stability and confidence in the beef industry in Canada?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think that the old answer will suit—soon.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ACQUISITION OF MACDONALD TOBACCO COMPANY BY R. J. REYNOLDS COMPANY—POSSIBILITY OF RETROACTIVE LEGISLATION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, again my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and is supplementary to the one I asked previously. In view of the fact the government was successful in respect of the Home Oil and Denison Mines transactions but has not been successful in respect of the takeover of this very important Canadian industry, will he now advise the House whether he has indicated to the R. J. Reynolds people that the government will introduce retroactive legislation to cover this takeover?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in the two cases the hon. member mentioned, Denison Mines and Home Oil, neither transaction had been completed. As to the question of retroactivity, the government does not intend to introduce retroactive legislation.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ADVERTISEMENTS FOR SALE OF HOUSES IN TORONTO AREA—CONTRACTS WHEREBY BUILDER CAN CHANGE PRICE AND MORTGAGE TERMS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is he aware that advertisements in newspapers in respect of the sale of new homes in Toronto indicate a fixed price for these homes, but when buyers go to purchase the homes they are told they cannot in fact buy the homes and that all they can buy is a reservation on a home under a contract which says that the sale price—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member resume his seat. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member for Mississauga, but I would request him to ask his question as we are running short of time. The hon. member knows he cannot read a contract but should ask his question directly.

Mr. Blenkarn: I apologize to you, Sir, but I had almost finished what I had to say. Let me go back so I can put the information to the minister in order to find out whether he is aware of this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should try to ask his question without conveying information. I am sure the hon. member can ask his question so that we can get on with the question period.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, is the minister aware that reservations are now being given to purchasers instead of clean, outright sales and that these reservations allow the builder or developer to change the price, mortgage terms and everything else unilaterally?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet seen these advertisements, and I thank my hon. friend for bringing this to my attention. I will see that they are looked into under the provisions of the misleading advertising section of the Combines Investigation Act.

GRAIN

REQUEST BY WHEAT BOARD THAT ADDITIONAL RAILWAY CARS BE PURCHASED FOR MOVEMENT OF PRODUCT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Mention was made in the throne speech of the importance of Canadian grain rail transportation capabilities. I should like to ask in this regard whether the government is now prepared to look at and deal with the request from the Canadian Wheat Board that additional hopper cars or rolling stock for grain movement be purchased?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we are looking at this specific request along with many other measures to bring the transportation system forward to the point that we can assure the delivery of the grain which can be produced in the prairie region.

● (1200)

Mr. Murta: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may ask a supplementary, after which we will proceed with the business for today.

Mr. Murta: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for permitting me to ask one short supplementary. Since the minister and his officials have been looking at these proposals for some time now, can he give any indication when there will be any positive word, one way or the other, on the purchase of additional rolling stock for grain transportation?

Mr. Lang: We have been dealing more urgently with the immediate situation. The purchase of additional hopper cars would not accommodate or improve that situation. The fact is that the car order process is very fully booked for quite a period forward, so some decision in the near future is adequate. We will be making that decision before very long.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Monday, March 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stollery for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stanfield (p. 31).

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, at ten o'clock last night I was in the midst of congratulating the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on having called the first Western Economic Opportunities Conference which was held at Calgary. I was also saying that many more such conferences will be needed. However, this first conference demonstrated to the citizens of western Canada that this government—I am not speaking, as I said, necessarily in partisan terms—is sensitive to the concerns of western Canadians. This initiative must continue. It must be followed by others. As a result of the conference a number of proposals were put forward. These will go a long way toward rectifying some of the problems faced by western Canadians. I refer particularly to transportation policies. Once these proposals are implemented they will be of benefit to consumers, businesses and farmers in western Canada.

We must help those in the grain business, those in the lumber trade and those in the fruit industry. While it is true that farmers in western Canada now receive the highest prices for their production, this does not necessarily mean that they are receiving the highest return on their production because they are now paying the highest prices ever for farm machinery, labour, maintenance, fertilizers and even twine and the like. Then there is the additional burden of having to finance these purchases.

There is also a curious factor involved which I must bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker. Farmers living in western Canada close to the oil industry are paying the fantastic increases in the prices of oil and gas. They are paying the same percentage increase that is paid by Canadians living elsewhere. Many people believe that western Canadians somehow are ripping off Canadians in other areas, but that is not true. There are western Canadians who feel they should pay less for gas and oil products because they are close to the source. They feel this way because for a long time they have had to pay more than Canadians elsewhere for manufactured products such as automobiles, television sets and the like.

It has been suggested that western Canadians wish to blackmail the rest of Canada by charging more to others for their oil and gas. If this is the case it must be because they in turn have been exploited by others for too long in other areas. I do not believe it is blackmail. I believe western Canadians are trying to point out that they will agree to sell their natural resources at the same price to all Canadians only when the rest of Canada return the favour. That is not exploitation. When the people of the west are treated equally in regard to consumer products with Canadians living in eastern Canada, then they will reciprocate.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne referred to additional measures in favour of women. I am very glad about this initiative and I hope that there will be many more women in this House in the future. I am happy to see also that we shall be doing something to abolish certain practices which are contrary to the aspirations of half of our population.

I must admit that I may be a little old to speak about these issues, but I am aware of the deep changes which are occurring in our constantly developing society.

I think that it may be up to the next generation to understand the effects and objectives of this movement, but I am optimistic about the future. This is quite a challenge for those who will replace us. The recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada must continue to be studied seriously.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize one point, that is that we shall have to operate without party considerations once more in western Canada. As for me, I am ready to work in co-operation with all hon. members to implement the initiatives mentioned in this Speech from the Throne.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the Member of Parliament for St. Boniface wishes to assure all members that his position in favour of western Canada and his desire to promote western Canada are not intended to weaken Canada or to seek special advantages or privileges for this vast region of our country. Let me as a westerner by birth say sincerely that I have always been excited by the potential of western Canada. The people of the prairies and those from the Pacific coast want other Canadians to share in the great future of the west and the far west. We are not separatists; we are not un-Canadian; we are not blackmailers. We are concerned Canadians who have been forced to speak a little louder sometimes because others have not listened to us. My plea to all in this House is that they listen to the west. To listen is to learn. To learn is to understand, and to understand is to be prepared to act.

I believe I have said enough, Mr. Speaker. I hope we will receive the co-operation of the loyal opposition in implementing the policies in the throne speech.

● (1210)

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for recognizing me and allowing me to take part in this most significant debate. Before I continue may I extend my sincerest congratulations to the new Governor General and Her Excellency as they embark on fulfilling this very important and significant post in Canada.

I should also like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. members for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier). It was readily seen that a lot of work went into their deliberations and I should like to commend them for their ideas and the sincerity with which they presented them.

The Speech from the Throne may be impressive on paper in terms of dealing with inflation, setting up a national petroleum corporation, bringing about reasonable prices for farm and agricultural products, giving aid to small business, regional development and equality for women, the last I think of extreme importance. I have said on many occasions that within that particular group there is a skill bank from which there have not been sufficient withdrawals owing to discrimination and the lack of appreciation of what women can do, not primarily because they are women but because they have special skills and talents from which we can acquire a great deal. Perhaps in this area we as men have been lacking.

I point out that the Speech from the Throne is couched in generalities. It is calculated to impress the electorate but is meaningless until the fine print is disclosed. By this, I mean the legislation to follow the letter of intent, if I may put it in that way, which is the Speech from the Throne.

The legislation that is proposed may or may not be brought in. Even if it is brought in, it may then be allowed to die on the order paper. If my memory serves me well, last session the government introduced Bill C-125 which, for a number of reasons, was not allowed to be proceeded with. In this regard we lost what I believe was a very significant opportunity to delve into the Unemployment Insurance Act as well as to see to it that the people of Canada would be saved $100 million.

A significant part of the speech is directed to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Let me quote this extract:

> Amendments will be introduced to the Unemployment Insurance Act as a part of a comprehensive review of the plan undertaken in the light of the experience of the last few years.

As a result of the experience of the last few years my leader, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), has called unequivocally for an independent inquiry into the workings of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. You will readily see why, Mr. Speaker, after I have reviewed some of the history that followed the introduction of the Unemployment Insurance Act in 1961.

I bring to the attention of hon. members the pamphlet that was distributed by the then minister of labour responsible for the birth of the UIC. In that pamphlet is this paragraph:

> We feel strongly that for our society today the proposed plan is a good one. This scheme, like all social programs, will have a certain life span.
> It has been a well planned and scrutinized creation in a series of social development programs. It will allow all Canadians to experience the growing opportunities and rewards of our advancing society.

May I direct my colleagues to two portions of that quotation which are significant, namely, that "It has been a well planned and scrutinized creation", and "the proposed plan is a good one". Let me underline once again that in its present form this plan is not only one of the most expensive plans in the world but it is readily seen to have been neither well planned nor scrutinized. Two years of history have placed on record the prognostications and errors regarding the cost of the plan and the rate of unemployment. The 1971 revisions to Canada's unemployment insurance program were intended to alleviate some of the suffering brought about by high levels of unemployment. The Trudeau government's policies of economic slowdown were responsible for the drastic rise in unemployment which began in 1970 and has proceeded ever since. The former minister of labour is the latest Liberal cabinet minister to admit this.

Since taking these deliberate actions which resulted in high unemployment, the government has been consistently wrong in its forecasting both in regard to the level of unemployment in the country and the cost of paying unemployment insurance benefits. The unemployment insurance scheme as originally proposed by the then minister was to be a self-financing insurance scheme funded by employer and employee contributions when unemployment was below 4 per cent; above the 4 per cent level the government agreed to put up public money on the assumption that it is the government's fiscal and monetary policy that creates the level of unemployment in this country. I remind the House that the former minister of labour said when the bill introducing the scheme was first debated that this was the basis upon which the federal government would then supply the additional moneys, because he felt that unemployment was the creation of the government.

My party argued at that time that although we were in favour in principle of such a scheme—meaning a revamped unemployment insurance plan—it could turn all too easily into welfare that removed from Canadians the incentive to work. Of course, the Trudeau government argued that the 4 per cent level meant that the government had a vested interest in getting the unemployment figures down, a stance not borne out by the economic policies of the government, policies that have kept unemployment, seasonally adjusted, near or above 6 per cent for two years.

My main concern in this whole issue is twofold: first, the incredible cost of the system—$2 billion for benefits plus administrative costs amounting to $145 million; second, the much needed reduction in unemployment in Canada. It is for this reason that my party has proposed a two-edged policy to get Canada's economy moving again and to get Canadians back to work. This proposal would, among other things, eliminate the sales tax on all clothing, not just children's clothing, and eliminate the sales tax on building materials.

In addition, much of our party's policy has been directed to what we call the incentive society. All of our economic thrust has been to get Canada back to work, to increase productivity, and to increase substantially investment capital for small business through an incentive scheme. By working unemployment down to something like 4 per cent and then seeing if it can be lowered from there, tremendous amounts of government money now expended on unemployment insurance benefits could be freed for other social uses such as lowering the age for the old age pension. In addition, the billion dollar drag on Canada's economy, a drag caused by the Trudeau government's policies going back as far as 1969 and 1970, would be substantially reduced as unemployment dropped.

The other proposal to be brought into effect at the same time would freeze all incomes and prices, except the price of food at the farm gate, for 90 days. During this freeze period consultations with labour, business, consumer groups, farmers and the provinces would be conducted, with a view to establishing a longer term—say 18 months to two years—economic stabilization program that would restore order to our economy.

Inflation continues to accelerate, Mr. Speaker. It is at a stage where it feeds upon itself through an induced inflationary psychosis, and it will continue to accelerate unless the government takes some action and gives some leadership to suppress current expectations. The government can do this in only two ways, The first is by using fiscal and monetary policies alone and putting many thousands out of work; the second is by using fiscal and monetary policies and an incomes policy. There is no other choice, for the economy will not long survive constantly accelerating price increases.

I do not have to repeat the serious handicaps which those on fixed income and those in the middle income groups face in terms of shelter, food and clothing. The guy in the middle seems to be squeezed, and the government just says that because it believes inflation is induced by offshore factors it can do nothing about it. As my leader has often said, and as we continue to say, Mr. Speaker, we do not accept that. Thus, my party's position on unemployment insurance must be seen in the total perspective of our economic package proposals to cut unemployment and combat inflation.

Certainly cheaters of the Unemployment Insurance Fund must go. Canadians should not be allowed to collect benefits if they are not actually seeking work, and those who voluntarily quit work for no justifiable reason, or refuse work for which they are qualified, or work which is reasonable, should not receive unemployment insurance benefits.

Although the unemployment insurance plan has been in operation for only two years many problems have arisen in connection with it. Three of the most significant are as follows: (1) the need to increase premiums dramatically, something which we experienced just in the past couple of months; (2) administration of the fund in terms of high benefit costs and, (3), the minister's credibility. I want to touch on all three of these matters.

As I have noted, one significant problem has been the need to increase premiums rather dramatically. I would like to put on the record the experience of the fund in the years 1972 and 1973.

In 1972 employer-employee contributions totalled about $691 million. In 1973 we understand that they were approximately $1,269 million. In 1972 there was a deficit of approximately $174 million, whereas in 1973 there was a deficit of about $509 million.

What is even more astounding, keeping in mind what was told us in debate on the initial stages of the bill setting up the fund, is what has happened to the premiums. I would like to put these figures on the record for the years 1972, 1973 and 1974.

The basic rate in 1972 for the employee was $0.90, and for the employer $1.26. In 1973 the employee rate was $1 and the employer rate $1.40. We understand that as of January 1, 1974, the premium rate for the employee is $1.40 and $1.96 for the employer. In other words, what we are talking about is a 40 per cent increase in the premium rate in order to sustain the unemployment insurance fund. You can understand my apprehension about this whole matter since we were told that premiums would be nowhere near the level that the minister has just authorized.

What about the administrative costs for which the employee and the employer are responsible? Let us look at the costs projected in the white paper and at the actual costs. The projected administrative costs for 1972 were $71 million, but the actual administrative costs in that year were in the neighbourhood of $120 million. The white paper projected costs for 1973 were $73 million and the actual costs for that year were $145 million. This actual cost of $145 million represents an increase over the estimated cost in the white paper of $72 million.

An hon. Member: It is double.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, it is double, and then you wonder why we in this party call for an independent inquiry.

The problem in the administration is the high benefit cost. Let me tell you what happened in 1972. I will not go back farther because in 1971, as already stated, we had the introduction of the new plan in conjunction with the older plan. In 1972 benefits cost $1.873 billion, and there were additional administrative costs of about $122 million, the latter having to be looked after by the employer and employee. In 1973 benefit costs hit $2.03 billion, plus $145 million for administrative costs, despite the fact that in 1973 unemployment generally was lower than in 1972 and notwithstanding the fact that 250,000 claimants were disqualified or disentitled.

By contrast, benefits in 1971 cost $892 million and in 1970 $694 million. What a contrast! What a history! Surely it is time to reassess the act seriously as to its intent, purpose and direction. Most certainly, Canadians are entitled to know the truth. We must determine the relationship between the high job vacancy rate, high benefits and high unemployment.

As the Hamilton Spectator put it in its issue of January 9, 1974:

> To tax the productive to subsidize a growing number of non-productive cannot help but lead to ultimate disaster. No nation can long survive if it does not respect the dignity of labour.

As I have often said, Mr. Speaker, this country was built on the work ethic, is still being built on the work ethic, and will continue to be built on the work ethic. But now we have disincentives to work. I have seen them introduced as a result of the new thinking brought in by the government, and I say we are in trouble unless there is a reversal of this thinking. Most Canadians are raising a hue and cry because they dislike what is occurring with respect to the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

A sampling of the nation's press underlines the suspicion raised as a result of misuse and abuse of UIC funds. It was called a "mess" by the Winnipeg Free Press on November 21 last. That paper had this to say:

Originally planned as an insurance program, it has long lost any semblance to this. It is a social welfare program, pure and simple, paid for in large part by thousands of Canadians who can never hope to benefit from it.

When the Minister of Manpower spoke on or about November 6 last year, the Vancouver Sun said he was whitewashing the UIC. It stated:

He made a great point of saying that about 250,000 persons will have been disqualified for benefits or thrown off the insurance rolls this year as a result of diligent investigation. Such statistics, however, merely prove the massive extent of attempted or semi-successful fraud perpetrated against the fund, without any indication about how many are getting away with it. The number who weren't caught must have been astronomical. This is implicit in Mr. Andras' statement that the investigating staff that totalled 147 a year ago now stands at 369 and 55 more will be added by the end of this year. This simply means that the number of watchdogs was insufficient a year ago and it still is.

That was the Vancouver Sun summation. "Unemployment income tax," reports the Vancouver Province of November 10, and "Rip-off continues," comments the Toronto Sun of November 15.

● (1230)

The third and most important problem is the credibility of the minister responsible. On May 22, 1973, when he was speaking to his estimates before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, he said:

But without indulging in superlatives I feel I can say honestly that this is a good and decent program and that, although as I have mentioned we still have problems to solve, our reorganization will move it a long way toward more efficiency, sensitivity and humanity.

When introducing notice of the increased premiums on November 7, 1973, the minister made a statement on motions. I should like to quote from page 11 of that statement where he said:

The important review of social security in Canada, now going on under the leadership of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, also makes this the wrong time for a legislative change in a social program as significant as the unemployment insurance program.

How inconsistent can that minister be, Mr. Speaker? This is what I am talking about in terms of a credibility gap. We see now that he is bringing in legislation in order to amend the act. I wonder whether the social security review has now been completed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). I would respectfully suggest that it has not. I would respectfully suggest that he is bringing in legislation now because he realizes that the act in its present form is unacceptable to Canadians and that they expect action.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: In terms of action we await the legislation that the minister promised by his letter of intent and the Speech from the Throne, and we say that we will not accept any cosmetic features in a bill, nor do we expect him to bring in any ad hoc measures in order temporarily to appease the opposition and not so much us but the people of Canada.

Again, on the question of the minister's credibility I should like to quote from the same speech at page 13 where he said:

I am determined that the unemployed who are genuinely doing their best to get work will receive their rightful benefits, and our fullest assistance in their efforts to find new jobs. But I am equally determined that those who are not entitled will not receive benefits. And I am confident that we now have the administrative system and competence to make this determination stick.

That is what the minister said on November 7, Mr. Speaker. I will repeat that:

And I am confident that we now have the administrative system and competence to make this determination stick.

During this time when the minister was procrastinating and flipflopping and taking shortcuts through facts, we in the opposition, particularly through the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis), had charged in no uncertain terms that he was wrong about the act. The hon. member raised charges related to mismanagement, financial waste, computer chaos, all within the past two years, but the minister and his officials dismissed those charges. His officials called them distorted, misleading and outdated.

To show how quickly the minister realized he was wrong when he was being pressed, in the first week of February, 1974, when attending a meeting of the Canadian Construction Association he admitted that most of the criticism levelled a year ago or even six months ago was valid. Then he went on to disclose a massive salvage plan. I should like to list some of the plans which the minister wanted to bring in: a closer system of checks for eligibility for unemployment insurance; increased emphasis on manpower training for employees; insistence on an active job search by insurance applicants; expansion of the Unemployment Insurance Commission benefit control staff; new controls on hiring through union halls; incentives to improve the mobility of the work force, particularly in construction.

These were his proposals even though in November he indicated that he had the "administrative system and competence". I hope that these matters to which I have just referred as being matters of salvage will be brought within the ambit of the Unemployment Insurance Act, as well as other matters.

We have long said that we are not happy with and we have never accepted a qualifying period of eight weeks; we have indicated that it should be at least sixteen weeks. We have also indicated that Manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission should be merged.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: It seems to me that the minister has been less than honest with the Canadian people in this regard. We must have the truth. Canadians not only are entitled to it but are demanding it. This is why we have continually called for a full-scale, independent inquiry into unemployment insurance. Surely the ever-widening credibility gap and the inconsistency of the minister make such an inquiry mandatory. My party will continue to press for a major independent public inquiry into the unemployment insurance program to clear the air of suspicion and to assess what the program should be accomplishing in the context of over-all Canadian policy.

We believe that an inquiry is more than justified. The unemployment insurance account is now running a deficit of about $509 million compared with 1972 when the unemployment insurance deficit was $174 million. Unemployment insurance benefits last year increased by $16 million over 1972 despite—and I repeat—despite lower unemployment rates and an Unemployment Insurance Commission benefit control program that disqualified an estimated 250,000 people.

The so-called comprehensive review to which the throne speech refers is, in our opinion, not comprehensive enough. First of all, Mr. Speaker, it was not independent and we believe that any review must be independent and not conducted by those at whom the finger of criticism has been pointed. Next, we believe that it should be an inquiry rather than a comprehensive review. The inquiry we are calling for and would like to see would get to the roots of the program and would provide concrete solutions to a number of basic questions. For example, are the fears about abuses and misuse justified? Further, we must resolve the question of whether disincentives to work are built into the unemployment insurance program and, if so, try to determine what those disincentives are and what can be done about them.

We must decide whether the unemployment insurance program is an insurance plan in reality or a welfare plan in which the contributions are simply a new kind of tax. Only a full and open inquiry into the program will provide these answers. Canadians are demanding them, Canadians are entitled to them, and I stand here on behalf of Canadians pleading with the government to give us the opportunity to get to the truth of the matter.

I should like to close by repeating and emphasizing some words of wisdom of my leader. He said:

> Canadians want to see some sense of order, of value and fairness returned to economic and social policy of this country. Those who are seeking work but can't find opportunity for jobs and careers want a government that places high priority on providing such opportunities. Those who are not working because they find it is not worth their while to work deserve a government that will build incentives into an overhauled welfare system.

We await the legislation. But let me say it had better not be a cosmetic effort, it had better not be an ad hoc approach to a very serious problem. If so, I am sure we will just have to look into this matter at more length and more thoroughly than we have in the past. At this time we do not intend to be bamboozled; we want the facts and we want the truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with other hon. members of the House in congratulating the Governor General and his Lady and to welcome their unique human qualities to Rideau Hall on behalf of all Canadians. I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier), the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Both made eloquent speeches of committed men.

The House will recall that my budget of February last year had two major objectives. The first was to promote further healthy growth of the economy through the injection of continued strong expansionary stimulus. The second was to do everything reasonably possible to contain the impact of worldwide inflationary forces on Canada that had already reached what I described as "epidemic proportions". Specifically, I forecast that real national output in 1973 would increase by around seven per cent, given fair crops, labour peace and international stability, and that employment would increase by at least 300,000.

Hon. members will also recall that the reaction of the Official Opposition to the budget was one of ridicule and derision, their typical knee-jerk reaction. The Conservative leader described it as a "national sick joke", as a piece of "fiction". He told the House on February 23, as recorded on page 1598 of Hansard, that he could not emphasize too strongly that the budget "falls far short of the nation's need for a new era of expansion of productivity". Those who supported it then would have to explain tomorrow why unemployment was still "a lingering curse".

The Conservative's chief economic spokesman, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), said the budget provided far too little expansion—I use his words, as recorded on page 1559 of Hansard of February 22, 1973—"to really move this country ahead, to produce the sort of employment that Canadians have every right to expect and to hope for." As recently as December 10, 1973, as recorded on page 8588 of Hansard, he was still bemoaning Canada's "basically poor economic performance" and the lack of growth since the first quarter.

Let me quickly outline the real state of our economy in 1973 so that the House will have an opportunity to compare the facts against Conservative fantasy.

[Translation]

The main fact is that the real national product increased by 7.1 per cent last year, despite major labour conflicts during the third quarter and international instability. This figure, matching perfectly the predictions of my budget speech, represented the greatest national product increase since 1956, the most substantial growth in Canada in 17 years—in this regard Statistics Canada was mistaken for it is really 17 years and not 7 years—and perhaps one of the most considerable noted in all industrialized countries. Let us compare that with the dark predictions of low economic growth made by the Progressive Conservatives!

The second noteworthy fact is that this unusual development has helped create 430,000 new jobs in Canada in 1973, 130,000 or 43 per cent more than the minimum growth I had predicted. This figure represents a record increase of 5.2 per cent in employment, which is close to 25 per cent greater than the previous peak, 4.2 per cent, reached in 1966. The average unemployment rate shrank from 6.3 per cent in 1972 to 5.6 per cent in 1973, which is the lowest level recorded since 1969.

[English]

Employment in manufacturing during 1973 increased by 111,000 according to estimates in the Labour Force Survey, a rise of 6 per cent. This was the largest increase in manufacturing employment relatively and absolutely since 1966, when the number of new jobs rose by 122,000 or 7.5 per cent.

Growth of manufacturing employment during 1973 exceeded the total for the whole of the previous six years by 8,000. It represented 26 per cent of the total increase in employment in 1973 of 430,000 or 5.2 per cent.

I am still troubled by the number of Canadians without jobs and I always will be so long as there are Canadians able and willing to work who cannot find employment. But I think I may fairly ask the House to contrast the unsurpassed record of employment growth last year with the grim forebodings and incantations muttered in darkness and in gloom by the Troika, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), the hon. member for Don Valley and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), which all last year came to resemble nothing so much as Macbeth's three witches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is wonderful writing, John.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The Conservative leader has treked back and forth across the country trying to create the impression that the standard of living of Canadians is being sharply undermined by inflation.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): And is it not being undermined?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is quite true that during 1973, for the first time in many years, the increase in average earnings of individual workers has only just about kept pace with the increase in the cost of living. But it is also true that the real standard of living of the great majority of Canadians has further substantially improved, based on the more comprehensive measure available to us of Canadian prosperity.

Over the course of last year the real, personal disposable income of Canadians per man, woman and child in this country, that is to say, the income available after taxes, after discounting the erosion of inflation and adding back transfer payments such as pensions and family allowances and after taking into account the reduction in personal income taxes equivalent to between 12 and 13 per cent as provided in the last budget, rose, in 1973 over 1972, by 6.8 per cent. That is the size of the average, real increase in disposable incomes of Canadians. This follows already exceptional increases of 5.9 per cent in 1971 and 6.7 per cent in 1972.

This increase in real, personal disposable income per capita last year in Canada of 6.8 per cent was half again as much as that in the United States. Since 1970, the average, real disposable income of Canadians has risen by 21 per cent, which is nearly twice the increase in the United States.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives in February, 1973, were totally wrong in their conclusions about where the economy stood and they remained totally wrong throughout the year about where it was going. But, as I will indicate to the House later, that error of judgment was probably the very least of their follies.

[Translation]

I said at the beginning of my remarks that one of the main objectives of the estimates was to do anything reasonably possible to limit the spread of world inflation. Canada did not escape—it could not at any rate in view of the important position it holds in world trade—the effects of this international evil which has taken over the past 12 months such proportions that even the most pessimistic observers had not envisaged them. In spite of our vulnerability to these world inflationary pressures, our price structure has reacted rather better than that of most other countries. Compared with the same period in 1972, our consumer price index showed in December 1973 a rise of 9.1 per cent compared with an average increase of 10.3 per cent for most OECD countries and 9.5 per cent for members of the European Economic Community.

As Minister of Finance, nothing bothers me quite so much as the negative effects of inflation on the budgets and savings of Canadians. This affects all Canadians. Inflation is the No. 1 economic problem of this country, a problem which has been and continues to be a matter of great and serious concern to this government. The leader of the Progressive Conservative Party and his colleagues have tried to convince the Canadian public that our only policy has been one of passive complacency. The truth is something quite different: Canada has taken more concerted and vigorous steps than any other country to limit the effects of inflation, try and protect the real purchasing power of the people who are the least in a position to protect themselves against the cost of living increases, and do whatever is in our power here in Canada to strike at the root of the evil with legislative measures likely to increase the amount of goods available to satisfy the needs of an expanding economy.

[English]

Before the outbreak of this energy crisis we expected that expansion of the Canadian economy in 1974 would again exceed long-term growth potential and would be at the upper limits set by available manpower and industrial resources. We expected that there would be some easing of worldwide inflationary pressures as a result of some increase in output of goods in short supply and significant moderation in the growth of a number of industrial nations.

Canada stands to be less affected by problems stemming from potential petroleum shortages and astronomical oil price increases than virtually any other industrial nation. Growth of national production in Canada may fall somewhat short of our earlier expectations, but it could very well match or exceed that of any other industrial nation, not excepting that modern industrial miracle, Japan. Certainly we moved into 1974 with substantial momentum following the substantial real growth in GNP during last year's fourth quarter at an annual rate of 11.5 per cent, matching the upsurge in the same period in 1972 and the first quarter of 1973.

Rapidly expanding capital investment, spurred by the tax measures to assist manufacturers and processors and reinforced by accelerated outlays on new energy resources, will provide a strong boost to the economy. As the recent OECD survey of Canada pointed out, measures already in force to increase social security benefits to Canadians will help to sustain personal income and consumer expenditures. Because petroleum exports exceed petroleum imports, we should escape from any adverse impact on our balance of payments because of higher oil prices.

But we still face a number of uncertainties. The effect of sharply higher oil prices on global inflationary pressures remains to be seen. Expansion of Canadian exports may be moderated by the effects of the energy crisis in retarding growth of our major trading partners, but by how much it is difficult to determine at this stage. Decisions still remain to be made regarding future oil prices in Canada which bear directly on the level of consumer income and consumer spending and about the division of oil revenues between governments and companies.

[Translation]

I proved well enough a while ago that the Progressive Conservative opposition erred completely in its assessment of the state of our economy last year. Small wonder then that it should have been led into compounding the error by advocating economic measures that were absolutely inappropriate and could have had disastrous effects on production.

They themselves recognized it to some extent later on through the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) who, for a while last fall, did a complete turnabout on financial, monetary and exchange matters, as compared with his previous stands. More recently, he started to change direction almost daily, like a weathervane, by proposing opposite economic measures.

A year ago February, as I pointed out previously, the Conservative financial Troika contended the fiscal stimulus proposed in the budget fell substantially short of that required to stimulate strong economic growth. The member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) called for a budget deficit on a national accounts basis of more than two and a half times that I projected, or more than $2½ billion. He maintained that Canadian growth would be retarded because of the appreciation of the Canadian dollar to around parity with the U.S. dollar. On February 22, 1973, as recorded on page 1559 of Hansard, he said:

We know that in Canada we have never had really high levels of prosperity since the dollar floated up in value.

In a press release issued on behalf of his party on March 21, 1973, the member for Don Valley suggested that monetary policy, in addition to fiscal policy, was also too restrictive. "There is growing evidence," he claimed, "that the Finance Department and the Bank of Canada are not seriously committed to creating full employment and are going to shift both fiscal and monetary policy to fight inflation by constraining demand and stalling maximum job-creation."

It was in a speech to the Empire Club of Toronto on October 25, 1973, that the member made complete and astonishing about-turn. He listed three major causes of inflation in Canada: excessively expansive fiscal policy, when he had been calling for more expansion; excessively expansive monetary policy, when he had been arguing for more expansion; and depreciation of the Canadian dollar along with U.S. currency in relation to the currencies of other industrial nations. He deplored the fact that, in his words, "we continue to follow an expansionary fiscal policy long after it was clear that it was having a strong inflationary force in the economy without doing much about unemployment." I cannot help but wonder, Mr. Speaker, when that became clear to the hon. member.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): He deplored what he alleged to be the "easy money policy" being pursued by the government and the Bank of Canada, contending that an increase in credit beyond the real growth rate of the economy was a major contributor to inflation. It was only a few weeks before in the House of Commons, on September 10, 1973, that in the course of pursuing the same theme the member at the same time accused the government of following a "tight money policy" and an "expensive money policy."

Finally, the member expressed grave misgivings about the fact that the Canadian dollar had depreciated along with the U.S. in relation to other currencies, the clear implication being that Canada would have been better off if the Canadian dollar had also appreciated in relation to the currency of our most important trading partner. What then, Mr. Speaker, are we to make of his earlier claim that Canada had never really been prosperous since the Canadian dollar rose to parity with the U.S. dollar?

The Conservative leader has spoken frequently about the fundamental need to pursue "judicious fiscal and monetary policies." Having said in October that our fiscal and monetary policies should be far more restrictive, the member for Don Valley in the House on November 29, page 8257 of Hansard, questioned when I was going to bring in "new monetary and fiscal policies so the economy will not slide into a serious recession." At the time I presumed he was now advocating adoption of more expansionary policies. But on December 11 and again on December 13, pages 8615 and 8699 of Hansard, he asked whether I believed nothing could be done through fiscal, monetary and exchange policy to moderate inflation. Obviously he was advocating that fiscal and monetary policy should be more restrictive and the exchange rate somehow pressed upward.

I can only conclude, Mr. Speaker, that in the mind of the Conservative party a judicious monetary and fiscal policy is expansionary on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays and restrictive on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Hopefully, on the seventh day they will rest and try to reconcile what they did the rest of the week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Because they totally failed to appreciate the nature of the global inflationary problem confronting us, the Conservatives also advocated the adoption of specific policies to deal with it that also amounted to sheer folly. Having concluded that inflation in Canada was caused primarily by domestic cost-push forces, the member for Don Valley last February, as found on page 1561 of Hansard for February 22, urged the adoption of wage and price controls. He contended this would bring the inflation rate down to 3 per cent, solving the inflation problem in the way that it was allegedly already solved in the United States. That is what he indicated in his speech. We asked for the Conservative studies on inflationary forces based on cost-push rather than demand-pull. I asked for them through my department. I have not yet received those studies. I wonder how they would contribute to the intellectual economic climate of the country. Where are the studies? If there are studies, why have they never been produced?

Let us have a hard look at the facts. What is the major source of inflation? The recent OECD survey of Canada concluded that it "can mainly be attributed to the price boom on international markets."

As every member is well aware, the prices of agricultural commodities, raw materials and petroleum have increased over the past several months at a rate never before experienced in our peacetime history. Consider a few products traded internationally which we ourselves do not produce in Canada. Over the past year, the price of tin has gone up by 83 per cent, cocoa by more than 90 per cent, coffee by 40 per cent, sugar by 57 per cent, rubber by 85 per cent and rice by 206 per cent. What would the Conservative party do about controlling sharply increased prices for these and many other goods which we import from abroad?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Are controls effective in containing inflation and promoting healthy economic growth in the circumstances confronting us today of worldwide inflationary pressures—and let me stress that important qualification? It may come as some surprise to Conservatives, but the answer must be a resounding no. In January the year-over-year increase in the U.S. Consumer price index was 9.4 per cent, compared with an increase of 9.1 per cent in Canada. I am not proud of those figures. I just put them on the record. In Britain the cost of living in January was up by 12 per cent over a year ago.

I know the hon. member for Don Valley does not like us to compare the American situation, although he did that last year when it apparently was running favourably for him. His colleague, the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard), on "The Nation's Business" or some other program last weekend, cited the American figures to the best of his ability, the only problem being he did not have the up to date ones.

Not only have controls in those countries failed to have any significant effect in checking inflation, but they have also impeded economic growth. The British economy and British society are perched on the edge of disaster because of labour's militant opposition to controls. The United States is moving rapidly to dismantle what controls still remain in force because they proved only to increase inflationary pressures by creating artificial shortages and to retard economic expansion. Herbert Stein, Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, told a joint economic committee of Congress recently that the United States had tried the wage-price control "medicine" and found that it gave "temporary relief only, followed by many headaches." Furthermore, he said:

> We know that controls won't stop the inflation; they only offer us more and more shortages and inefficiencies.

The Leader of the Opposition tells us that controls are necessary to dampen down inflationary psychology. Where in the world have they been effective in doing that to the slightest degree? He says they are necessary to overcome growing bitterness caused by inflation. I might observe that if his long round of speeches advocating controls provide no solution to inflation, they certainly contribute to the problem by inciting bitterness and inflationary psychology.

In the United States, Treasury Secretary George Schultz has told a congressional committee—the Senate banking subcommittee—that controls, initially so warmly welcomed, have lost public support. Certainly, controls have served only to create bitterness in Britain. This should come as no surprise to the Conservative leader, who warned us several years ago in a speech at the Agudath, Israel's Mens' Club on January 31, 1971, that controls would cause "untold resentment among groups and individuals who felt unfairly done by, and would result in a climate of constant confrontation." One year after the Conservatives first proposed the adoption of a wage-price control program following a 90-day freeze, we are still waiting to learn just what kind of a program they have in mind, what limit they propose to impose on wage and price increases, and why they consider such a program would be any more effective here than programs carried out in the United States, Britain and other countries in reducing inflation without retarding economic growth. Surely the idea of establishing across the board controls covering virtually all wages and prices in the circumstances confronting us today of strong worldwide inflationary pressure has by now been totally discredited on every count.

I shall conclude in a few moments. Let me underline one simple but important fact. Because they do not bear the responsibility of office, opposition parties are not obliged to accept the consequences of the follies they often urge us to commit. Particularly in the case of the Conservative party, these nostrums and panaceas change from day to day depending on what it calculates might catch the public fancy at the moment. One day they demand we adopt more expansionary economic policies and the next day they tell us our existing policy is far too expansionary. One day they condemn us for even contemplating the adoption of price and income controls and the next they condemn us for not having done so. They continue to try to foist controls on the country long after their ineffectiveness in existing world circumstances has been demonstrated in one nation after another. As Minister of Finance, I do not intend to be pushed into gambling recklessly and irresponsibly with the future of the Canadian economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The plain fact is that there are no simple or easy solutions to the inflationary problems confronting us. As I said before, probably no other country has taken such broad and concerted action to deal with this situation as we in Canada have already taken by broadening the scope of supply and protecting those who are least able to protect themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I shall not spend any time now in reciting the further important measures we propose to take, measures which are outlined in the Speech from the Throne. Despite all the problems that face us—and we do face problems—despite the erosion caused by inflation—and it hurts—when we look around the world we have reason to consider that we are a fairly fortunate people, and we intend in this government to do everything we possibly can to keep it that way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West will be recognized at two o'clock.

It being five minutes past one o'clock, the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my sentiments to those expressed by other members during this debate to the member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) who, as young members—I say young in the sense of experience in the House—proposed and supported the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I know that this is a very difficult task. They are often not used to the atmosphere of the House at the beginning of a new session. Thus, the Throne Speech was read in the morning and the speeches in reply the same afternoon. I do not think that this would be the best atmosphere. It seems to me that it would be better to proceed the same day only with the reading of the Throne Speech. Then we could study it. This would be more realistic. We know very well that young members having read the speech in the morning are not ready at 2 o'clock in the afternoon to make serious comments in reply to this speech.

This means that these things were "cooked in advance" and, in this sense, it is unreal.

[English]

I should like also to join with others in extending my sincere congratulations to His Excellency on his appointment to office, and to wish him and Madame Léger a very interesting and successful term, and I do not suggest five years as that does not now seem to be the rule. I am sure they will bring their own charm and distinction to the discharge of the functions of that office. I may say that Canada has been more than singularly blessed by the quality of our vice-regal representatives since I came here in 1957, as a matter of fact, after the rule was adopted of having a Canadian act as the Governor General. We know each of those who have occupied that office, and the more recent ones are fresher in our memories. Let me say without disrespect to your predecessor, Mr. Speaker, and mine, who occupied that distinguished position since 1967 when he took over under rather pressing circumstances on the eve of Expo '67, he left his own very indelible impression on the office of Governor General of Canada. We wish both Mrs. Michener and Roly, to some of us, now that he is no longer in office, a very pleasant life in retirement, although I see it is not exactly to be idle.

It was quite an experience to sit here before the luncheon recess and listen to our good friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) literally whip himself into a frenzy of political fury. He had to whip himself to deliver a speech in which I recognized a number of sentiments and arguments that have been put forward by a number of apologists for the Department of Finance from time to time. In the writing of this speech one can see some fine as well as some rather blunt hands. There was as well some political digging, which is a lot of fun. I am sure he was doing his best to get back one dig for every 10 he gets from this side.

Having looked at the speech as a whole, I note a welcome departure from the high-flying but clearly empty phrases of last year. We now find a compendium of proposals or promises delivered with one eye on the political horizon. Perhaps I should not say "one eye", I should say that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet prepared this throne speech staring bug-eyed at the political horizon. They have come up with the simple phrase "Ask and you shall receive", because this is the basis on which they are giving handouts here and handouts there. We must remember, however, that there is a good deal of distance between promising and delivering.

It is clear from the speech of the Minister of Finance that if he had not spent so much time trying to get in political licks he might have given the country what is required of the Minister of Finance at this time. He indicated he would be making a report on the situation regarding the International Monetary Fund, the Canadian dollar and the value of gold. These are the things on which the Minister of Finance should be reporting. Instead of that, he presented some cheap arguments about certain statements researchers dug up out of context from speeches and questions by my colleague the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies).

The key to this throne speech will not be, as suggested by the Prime Minister, the docile servility of this House in accepting and passing government proposals, not at all. We will look for what is contained in the budget, the proposals the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) will make in order to raise the money to pay for all the promises contained in the Speech from the Throne because we have seen that the government is distributing largesse on the basis of "ask and you will receive". This involves a great deal of money.

Although I cannot do so this afternoon in the time allotted to me, I could take up twice the amount of time allotted on subjects which I think should be discussed, such as inflation, regional development and unemployment. I would have liked to have gone into the subject raised by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) concerning Canada's relations with Taiwan and some of the things we were able to see during the recess. I would have liked to have gone into the relationship between the government and Canadian participation in the deliberations of the Council of Europe, which I heartily support because this gives members of parliament an opportunity to speak to their opposites in the parliaments of Europe. This is the only place where there could be a dialogue between members of this parliament and members of the Assembly of the Council of Europe which in its membership as observers goes much beyond the United States, which has had observer status there for a long time. We are invited to assume that position of observer. The hand of invitation is out. I think it is up to Canada to respond affirmatively. There is no question that Canadian contacts around the world on a ministerial or government basis are far too narrow. I think a greater role can be played by members of parliament from all parties. This is the kind of forum if you like, the kind of arena, in which members of parliament from this House and senators from the other place could exchange views without being tied by government positions. This is terribly important.

I could talk about industrial strategy and about national unity. At the moment there is a great deal of malaise in the national body. Many people say it is a sense of regional alienation, but it is only because they have become aware of an already existing inequality. The favourite whipping dog in this field of alienation over the past decade was the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

In the province of Quebec, it was a cultural, a linguistic situation, but never an economic issue. There was never any argument on this point. Moreover, the claims of Quebec barely touched the economic situation.

Mr. Bell: That is true.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Now, we get to western Canada. There, the sense of injustice and alienation is purely economic. I suppose some of it may be a little geographical, but primarily it is economic. But that has been a grievance for a long time. As a young man I was aware of many of the arguments which basically exist today although in more modern dress, such as freight rates, the cost of manufactured goods from central Canada and so on. Now, there is the fact that there is a price freeze—yes, a price freeze—on an essential commodity, 85 per cent of which is produced in the province of Alberta. This has been imposed without consultation by central Canada on the basis apparently that there should not be windfall profits to those who are exploiting the resources. I intend to ask the Minister of Finance why he and his administration do not move in on the gold mines of Ontario and Quebec which have the major monopoly on the production of gold in this country. At today's prices if there aren't windfall profits in gold then the whole situation is crazy. There are no windfall profits with regard to oil.

In this situation, oil was seized upon as a convenient whipping boy, and there must be a great deal of careful negotiation. There is no way that, shall we say, the benefits of a below-world price on this commodity in Canada is to be loaded on the backs of Canadians who happen to live in Alberta. If that were done, then I think the people of western Canada could say, do it with regard to lumber because those people pay world prices for lumber, or do it with regard to nickel because they must pay the world price for nickel. Also could we not do it for steel, because they pay the world competitive price for steel. The arguments used by the government in this connection are as empty as a hollow egg shell.

I suggest that in order to justify just what shall be a Canadian position, a negotiated Canadian position, there are other arguments which must be used. I will admit that in many areas there has been a sense of isolation and injustice, but this has existed for a long time. It is the oldest cliché in Canada to say Canada is a hard country to govern. Let us get on with it and try to change the pattern. I think we require a national mobilization of effort to master inflation at the present time. To counter inflation we get bandaids and blow-out patches applied from time to time by the government of Canada whether or not they suit the purpose of any provincial government. Whether or not it suits the purposes of such governments in any region of Canada, the government of Canada moves in without consultation and unilaterally takes those steps it has decided upon.

Although the impact of any policy may not be too bad in, say, Ontario, it could be disastrous in the Atlantic provinces. It may not affect Alberta very much and yet the neighbour in Saskatchewan may be hard hit. That is not the way to proceed. In this whole area of combatting inflation an industrial strategy must be developed. The situation today is an indication of the bankrupt performance by the government of Canada and the provinces. I will not entirely absolve the provinces because there is a bankruptcy of leadership in this country with regard to industrial strategy as a whole. It is a dog-eat-dog operation. The leader of the dogs is the program on regional and economic expansion. Action is taken without consideration of the aspirations of the provinces. It is usually done with an eye to the political climate and the political return. We know it is on the basis of beggar thy neighbour in many instances. A plant is established in one province so that one of a similar nature may be closed in an adjoining province. It is strictly on that basis. However, I shall have more to say about this on a later occasion. We receive complaints from the provinces that it is either economic clout that is used to back up the government's action or just plain bullying, such as the attempts at bullying we have had in respect of the marketing of oil.

During the last month we have seen that "brain trust" in the cabinet, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) come out with a program that was filched directly from the Hudson Institute—the statistics were quoted directly from the compilations of that organization—for the development of the tar sands. The government of Canada would borrow capital from various countries and the tar sands would be developed on a crash basis over the next ten years. Thousands of Korean labourers would be imported.

Yet the minister is speaking on behalf of a ministry which has absolutely no jurisdiction over the tar sands or over the development of them. Only the government of the province of Alberta or its appropriate agency, the energy conservation board, has any say about whether a shovel will be put into the ground. There is no doubt that the federal government can tax the product in the end, but as for the development and the marketing of any oil produced it cannot say one thing about one barrel or drop marketed within the province of Alberta.

If anybody should think that the federal government is able to move unilaterally into the development, or participate in the development, of those tar sands within the confines of the province of Alberta without the consent and co-operation of that province, then there is absolutely something wrong with their thinking. The federal government could no more do this than they could say they were going to develop a gold mine in the province of Quebec without the consent and co-operation of that province. The permits would have to be issued by the appropriate government, which would be the government of the province of Quebec in that case. Yet we seem to be assuming that this kind of development will be done unilaterally.

I wanted to talk about inflation, Mr. Speaker. This morning the minister seemed to say that he had pulled out all the stops and touched all the bases of sympathy regarding the effects of inflation. But the net result has been that the government has not done a thing effectively to counter inflation.

Let me just take a look at the situation. In 1968, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his then administration took office, the consumer price index for all items stood at 120.1. In October of 1972, when this particular administration took over again, the consumer price index stood at 142.0. By January of this year it had risen to 157.6. When the minister became Minister of Finance in January of 1972 it stood at 136.7.

I can go down through various items, such as food and shelter. Food stood at 122.0 in 1968, in 1972, October, it had risen to 145.3, and in January of 1974 it was 174.0. Shelter in 1968 stood at 124.6, increased to 160.5 in October 1972 and in January of 1974 stood at 173.8. We have seen increases each year.

Let us look at the performance of the minister, and particularly at this self-congratulatory budget of which he spoke. He must have sprained his shoulder patting himself so hard on the back for his predictions and for the measures taken by the government in 1973.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That budget speaks for itself.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it certainly does.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Look at the results.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Let us look at the increase in the price index. In the first quarter of 1973 the increase was 5.9 per cent over the preceding quarter. In the second quarter it was 7.3 per cent; in the third quarter 8.2 per cent, and in the fourth quarter 9 per cent. So, it speaks for itself. The rate of increase has been not quite double.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): What about the increase in jobs?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am glad the minister reminded me of that.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): And growth.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Jobs are the most artificial statistic you could possibly have. Because there is no indication how long a job lasts. An individual can come on a job that lasts two weeks, stand down, and then a new person is hired in the same job. Statistically that is classified as a new employment.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Oh, come on.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister shakes his head but he knows that is true. There is no true measure of jobs other than by putting some measure on the length of a job before it can be considered a new job; for example, that an employment shall last for three months or six months. I defy the minister to say that that is the criterion at the present time, because I know it is not. As a matter of fact, these job starts can be as artificial as a rolling engagement of one week—a start and a stop, a start and a stop. These are all classified as new jobs.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is not the way it works, Marcel.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It certainly does.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There have been almost half a million new jobs.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister says half a million. With our mobility of labour today, with stops and starts, summer jobs, and so forth and so on, these are all part and parcel. You would never see, Mr. Speaker, such a collection of garbage can items as you see in this particular statistic relating to new jobs.

Mr. Baker: Just like the budget speech.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister spent a great deal of time deriding the Conservative position on an incomes policy, saying it does not work here and does not work there. On the other hand, he cited with great self-satisfaction, and out of context, the last report of the OECD. I had the privilege of participating in the debate in Strasbourg with Mr. Van Lennep of OECD on this self-same report, and I invite the minister to read the whole of Mr. Van Lennep's commentaries about Canada and the dangerous situation prevailing here.

The minister spent a lot of time this morning saying it was too bad that people do lose their life savings, pension and insurance plans and all that when we have inflation at a rate of 9 per cent to 10 per cent this year. The decks were awash with the minister's tears. He referred to the inflation rate in England, their value added tax and so forth. I was in England this year and I know what the situation is. I was on the continent as well and they do have inflation.

But what comfort is it, Mr. Speaker, for a man to tell his neighbour: "You have a telephone pole in your eye, but never mind the fence post in mine, we are both blind"? That is the type of consolation the Minister of Finance is offering the people of Canada.

I invite the minister to express some real concern for the backbone of the taxpaying public of this country, those people who have insurance plans. After all, Canada prides itself on the amount of savings that go into insurance schemes. But today it is worthless to go into that. It is even worthless to put money into the minister's own savings plan, the Canada savings bonds. Last year the investor lost over 2 per cent by investing in a Canada savings bond. Is that any encouragement for savings? Insurance programs loom very largely here in Canada, to provide security for individuals and families, and to provide investment funds for Canadian industry. But inflation at a rate of almost 9 per cent and 10 per cent hurts insurance.

I have spoken on inflation since 1968. I remember the crisis of February, 1968. It was a crisis of inflation. The government had to take certain actions, and people beat their breasts, protesting that there would not be any increase in government expenditures. We all remember those days. But what have we seen since? The other day the minister's colleague said there was an increase of only 11 per cent in the estimates he tabled.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You wanted to double them last year, Marcel.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I will tell the minister what he conveniently forgets. He conveniently forgets what I said at that time—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I don't. I remember.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): —that to deal with unemployment at that time we required a massive program of government development, with satisfactory controls. The minister forgets that point.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You underestimated the economy last year.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Underestimated the economy?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You certainly did.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the minister gave his figures. They were not in constant dollars. They were in current dollars, with 10 per cent inflation in them.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There was real growth.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Real growth!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Seven per cent.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Not 10 per cent, seven per cent is the predicted growth.

I will hold the minister accountable to me for not speaking about the International Monetary Fund. What has happened to the efforts to reform international monetary relations? What about the meeting in Rome? Why has the government changed policy since February, and relaxed its efforts to maintain parity with the U.S. dollar? That has to be a change of policy. I am not criticizing it, but where is the explanation? What was the degree of intervention by the Bank of Canada in the international monetary field during the past year in order to maintain parity? Did we have a clean float, or was it tattle-tale grey, or almost miners' black?

I know that I have almost exhausted my time, Mr. Speaker, and there are still many things I wished to mention. But will the minister please shortly make a statement on what is being done with regard to the review of the Bank Act? The Bank Act has to come up for renewal in 1976.

An hon. Member: 1977.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A lot of hard work has to be done. I want to ask the minister to tell us about the silly proposal included in the Speech from the Throne, which is an off-the-cuff offer from the Prime Minister to let someone, primarily Premier Barrett, get his itchy fingers on the Bank of British Columbia. There are some doubtful statistics. As a matter of fact, no one has demonstrated the thesis on which these so-called provincial banks should exist. In any event, provincial government ownership of banks should come only with a total review of our banking system.

There may be a case for it in some places where we know there are institutions that act much like banks—for instance, the Alberta Treasury Branches.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Exactly.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But when the government had the opportunity under the deposit insurance legislation to make those people come in, it went on craven knees to the provinces and asked them, "Please, please come into this program." The totality of our banking system and of credit institutions has to be reviewed. To add this complication at this point is ill timed. To bring it in at this time is just for the birds, but again geared with an eye to political support.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Oh, don't say that.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is just on the basis of obtaining partisan support from the NDP. I simply say that it is a very poor way to run the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in the speech which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made in this debate last Thursday he likened the NDP members to seagulls who, because they are squeaking and making a lot of noise, act as though they were running the ship. I think the Prime Minister should be aware of the fact that the message which the seagulls are trying to convey to him can be summed up in the words of the English poet, Alfred Noyes, "Captain, art thou sleeping there below?"

I was interested to listen to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) reciting with some pride a catalogue of steps which the government has taken during the past 12 months to protect Canadian consumers during the oil crisis. However, they neglected to state that every one of those proposals was put forward by the members of the NDP—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Oh, come on.

Mr. Douglas: And they also neglected to state that all of those proposals were at first rejected by the government, and belatedly accepted and implemented by the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) shakes his head—and I can hear it from here—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas: —I would just like to remind him that it was the members of this party who, in January of last year, advocated putting domestic controls on the export of oil. The government said there was no need to do that, and then imposed them on March 1.

It was the members of this party who advocated export controls on gasoline in April. And the government finally implemented them later in June. It was the members of this party who, in May, advocated a price freeze on domestically produced oil, a two-price system, and an export tax to pick up the windfall profits. And the government put those into effect on September 6. It was this party which first proposed, and for years had been proposing a pipeline to Montreal, which the government's energy report tabled in this House last June rejected, but which the government accepted and the Prime Minister announced on September 6. It was this party first put forward the proposal for a one-price system across the country, which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said was completely impractical, and which the government has now adopted.

I think that when the people of Canada review the steps that have been taken with respect to the oil crisis during the past 12 months they will be inclined to say, "Thank God for the seagulls."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: There are three major oil policy decisions which must be made during this session of parliament. Our failure to face up to them will wreak havoc in our economy, and create untold hardships for the people of Canada. The first of these policy decisions has to do with fixing the price of crude oil in Canada. The present voluntary price freeze will end on March 31 and has to be replaced by a new pricing policy which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) described on March 1, at page 83 of Hansard for that date as follows:

● (1440)

> . . . a proposal for a one-price oil system in Canada which, from the first of April this year, will keep Canadian prices at less than international prices but which will provide the revenues necessary to first find and develop new resources and to offset the higher costs of oil imported into eastern Canada.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. Speaker, I draw attention to the words "revenues necessary to first find and develop new resources" of oil. The question that this parliament will have to settle is, who is going to get the revenue from this proposed price increase to find and develop new resources of oil? Is it to be the oil companies? I point out that the oil companies do not need more money. Before the price freeze went into effect they had secured an approximately $1 per barrel increase which brought them revenue of something in the nature of $700 million annually.

I note that the President of Gulf Oil says that the government of Canada will have to pay them some $400 million just for the months of February and March. It is interesting that the Minister of Industry, Mines and Resources admitted in a speech last Friday that it would probably be in the neighbourhood of $300 million, or perhaps more. What is the justification for that? Has any analysis been made of what they are paying for this oil and what the markup is on this imported oil?

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that oil profits are a national scandal at a time when this country faces an energy crisis. Look at the figures: Imperial Oil's profit up 45 per cent, Shell up 43 per cent, Gulf Oil up 58 per cent. Mr. Jerry McAffie said very proudly that these were the highest profits that Gulf Oil had enjoyed in all its history. For the fourth quarter of 1973, the profits of oil companies increased by 46½ per cent. All this profiteering at a time when we are in a national crisis, Mr. Speaker, when Canadians are being asked to tighten their belts and when the workers of this country found in 1973 that their share of the gross national product actually declined while corporation profits as a share of the gross national product increased.

In his speech last Thursday the Prime Minister made a statement that I hope will be engraved in stone as it ought to be. At page 33 of Hansard for that date he said:

> We will not allow corporate profiteers and gougers to pile up windfall profits at the expense of the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I like the words: I am waiting to hear the melody. I say to the Prime Minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the profiteers and gougers are profiteering and gouging right now. What does your government intend to do about it? If one could judge by the statement of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, they not only do not intend to do anything about it, they are going to enable the profiteering and gouging to go on at an accelerated rate under the guise of encouraging oil development and exploration. The government should institute a full scale public investigation of oil profits before they agree to any increase in the price which is to be paid to the oil companies. Even in the United States the Senate has had an investigation into oil profits and that revealed a situation in companies like Exxon which borders on economic piracy.

As a matter of fact higher prices to the oil companies is no guarantee of increased exploration and development. They have made good profits and yet drilling has decreased in western Canada during the past three years. It is estimated that $1 billion per year of profits from western oil has gone elsewhere for exploration. These companies get depreciation allowances, depletion allowances and reports show that they pay less than 6 per cent tax on their book profits.

We in this party contend that the only justification for higher oil prices is to secure revenue to develop oil resources for Canada under Canadian ownership and control. Any increase in the price of oil should go to the treasuries of the oil producing provinces and to the federal government to be used to develop the oil sands and the frontier oil under public ownership and within the control of the Canadian people.

That brings me to the second policy decision which the government will have to make in this session and that is one regarding a national petroleum company. The New Democratic Party were the first to advocate the establishment of a national petroleum company which would have three main functions: First, to be the sole purchaser and seller of all oil products consumed in Canada; second, to purchase one or more of the major oil companies to provide competition in the oil industry; and third, to participate in the development of the oil sands and frontier areas alone or in conjunction with the provincial governments concerned.

The Prime Minister announced that the government was accepting the concept of a national petroleum corporation on September 6, last. We were skeptical of the government's intentions then and we are more skeptical now when we examine the statements of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Let me point out first of all that according to the minister's statements, the national petroleum company will not—and I emphasize "not"—take over a major oil company engaged in refining and marketing but only in exploration and development. He made a statement to a Liberal constituency meeting of York-Scarborough held last Saturday night which, the Globe and Mail of March 4 has reported as follows:

> Asked about plans for a national petroleum corporation he assured questioners several times that there is no intention to get involved in an integrated oil marketing operation. "He said if the corporation buys an existing company it will be one engaged in exploration and development of oil-bearing land, not one that refines and markets petroleum products".

Mr. Speaker, I want to ask, where is this exploration and development going to take place? The millions of acres that are likely to be oil-bearing or gas-producing are already hypothecated to the multinational companies through permits and leases. If all the national petroleum company is going to be is another small company drilling for oil on Baffin Island, I say to the minister—forget it! This is a time for a frontal attack on the oil and gas cartels that have ravaged our resources and exploited our people. There is no time for the government to get into the oil business by the back door. We must start by taking over the largest of the companies, Imperial Oil, which would give a national petroleum corporation access to the oil fields, refineries and control of the interprovincial pipeline.

I should also like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that this national petroleum corporation as outlined vaguely by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will not—and again I emphasize "not"—participate in the development of the oil sands nor prevent those resources from falling under the control of United States oil companies that already control 91 per cent of our production and 99 per cent of our oil refining. In his statement to the House last Friday the minister said, as recorded at page 86 of Hansard:

> While the major thrust of this corporation will be in the form of exploration in the frontier areas, we are of the view that it should also contribute to the development of the large petroleum resource existing in the Athabasca oil sands both through mining techniques and through in situ extraction methods.

I draw the attention of the House to the words, "both through mining techniques and through in situ extraction methods." Apparently the minister has no thought of the National Petroleum Corporation going into the production of oil in the Athabasca tar sands. This is the usual Liberal technique. The public company will spend public funds for the engineering and research and then turn their findings over to the oil industry, who will then gouge the Canadian people for the privilege of using their own oil. So far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to accept a national petroleum corporation which is merely a bird dog for the major multinational oil companies. I have no intention of becoming a partner in perpetrating a cruel hoax and transparent fraud on the Canadian people.

That brings me to the third policy decision which will have to be made by this Parliament during this session. We must determine who, and under what circumstances, is going to develop the Athabasca oil sands and heavy oil deposits. I cannot believe that the government does not know how serious the oil situation is in this country. When I recall how they were misled, and in turn misled the country, about gas reserves in 1970, as revealed by the former Liberal cabinet minister Eric Kierans, it is quite possible that the government is being deceived again.

Recent studies which will be published shortly show that conventional oil reserves in this country could be exhausted in less than ten years. They also show that by 1980 Canada could have a deficit of one million barrels per day between supply and demand, if the present rate of Canadian consumption continues and if we continue to export Canadian oil at the same rate as we are exporting it at present. There is no possibility that sufficient oil will be on stream from the oil sands or the frontier areas to meet a deficit of those proportions. This country is in a race against time. We are racing to see whether we can develop new sources of oil before our present conventional sources are completely exhausted. The real energy crisis—at present we are suffering from a crisis of delivery—is going to hit this country in five or six years.

What steps should we take to meet this threatened crisis? I suggest we should do three things. First, we should begin now conserving oil and gas consumption. Many electrical generating plants could be switched to coal or other fuel for generating electrical power. Second, we should begin phasing out our exports of oil and gas. It is only fair to tell the American people what lies ahead. We should phase out our exports in such a way as to give them adequate time to secure other sources of supply. Third, we should begin immediately negotiations with the provinces, to start development of the oil sands, with a very substantial component of public ownership. The federal government can offer inducements to the provincial governments to participate in joint ventures with it and the oil companies, if those companies are kept in a minority equity position, in developing this vast reservoir of oil which can be the salvation of Canada.

We, in this country, sold our birthright with regard to the production of conventional oil and conventional gas. Our predecessors might have pleaded ignorance; we cannot. In view of our experience of how the world oil cartel has exploited both producing and consuming countries alike, posterity will never forgive us if we allow the Athabasca tar sands to fall under foreign control.

It will be argued that the development of these sands will take large amounts of capital. I say, Mr. Speaker, that if capital is a problem, then we should postpone any consideration for constructing the Mackenzie pipeline. With proper conservation, we will not need gas from the Mackenzie Delta for another ten years or more. The Prime Minister's commitment to go ahead with the Mackenzie pipeline, made on September 6, was purely an attempt to conciliate the United States. Remember, 82 per cent of the drilling in the Arctic produces American gas, only 18 per cent produces Canadian gas. The only purpose for spending $5 billion building that pipeline is for supplying natural gas to the United States. Canada probably has between 23 and 25 years of gas reserves. If we needed to look into the Mackenzie pipeline proposal for gas to meet Canadian needs, we could begin those studies about ten years from now.

I suggest that the $5 billion which we would be called upon to spend on the Mackenzie Valley pipeline would be better spent in developing the Athabasca oil sands. By building one plant every 18 months with an average capacity of 125,000 barrels per day it is just possible that we could have sufficient oil on stream, if we conserve our consumption and our exports, to meet our own requirements in 1980. I say that anything less than the development of the Athabasca oil sands and heavy oil deposits in Saskatchewan under Canadian ownership and control will be a betrayal of Canada and an insult to posterity.

Certain proposals have been made by Mr. Herman Khan of the Hudson Institute and his think tank. Since we do not have to take advice from Mr. Kahn, nobody worries much about it. But I am alarmed to note that his proposal was picked up by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer). The minister has been going around this country saying that it is going to take $20 billion to build ten plants in the Athabasca oil sands; that we should do that by borrowing the money in the United States, Japan, Germany and wherever we can get it; that we should bring in Korean labour or labour from wherever you can get it so long as it is cheap; and that we should pay these countries back, says the Minister of Supply and Services, in oil.

What does this mean, Mr. Speaker? It means that the Minister of Supply and Services is advocating the alienation and the hypothecation to other countries of oil from the oil sands of Alberta. Those oil sands contain reserves larger than the oil reserves of the Middle East. He would hypothecate that oil to foreign corporations. It means, secondly, that $20 billion of that oil will be hypothecated to other countries and not to the Canadian people, to whom the oil belongs.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Surely this is a preposterous proposal. But the government says, "Ah, the Minister of Supply and Services is speaking on his own, as a private individual." Mr. Speaker, since when do cabinet ministers, members of the Privy Council, speak on their own? A minister cannot separate himself and say that he speaks as a private individual and not as a minister of the Crown when he discusses public questions. The Prime Minister has a responsibility to this country either to tell the people of Canada that the policies being enunciated by the Minister of Supply and Services are the government's policies or to tell the minister to shut up. It is just possible, however, that the minister is not speaking out of turn. It is possible the minister is flying a kite for the government. It is possible the government has in mind one of the grand sell-outs which have characterized the Liberal party down through the decades.

● (1500)

I say the Prime Minister has a responsibility before many days have passed in this House to tell the people of this country who is going to develop the Athabasca oil sands and under what conditions. What steps does the government intend to take to ensure there will be a public component in the development of those oil sands? What steps does the government intend to take to make sure that the control of this last great reservoir of oil will not fall into foreign hands as have both energy resources and other nonrenewable resources?

I want to say in closing that the New Democratic Party will oppose with all the power at its command any step to turn over this remaining oil and gas potential to foreign monopolies. A recent Gallup poll showed that an overwhelming majority of the Canadian people want Canadian ownership and public ownership of our oil industry. If the government fails to take steps along this line, I say that they will lose and deserve to lose, the confidence of the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleagues, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and other members in congratulating Their Excellencies, Mr. and Mrs. Jules Léger, on the assumption of their very high function. I also join previous speakers in complimenting the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) who seconded a motion to move the address and, of course, the original mover, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), who gave such an eloquent address.

My reason for speaking during this debate is to make reference to the government's program relative to the promotion of equality of opportunity for women generally in our Canadian society and to enlarge upon references made in that connection in the Speech from the Throne. In particular, I want to concentrate on the government's program to improve the status of women.

We regard it as a challenge to the government and to society as a whole, to work toward an evolution of roles to enable both males and females to play fully their part in the family and in society according to their individual choice. Each individual should be encouraged to discover and fulfill his or her own unique potential and identity without the constraint of society's presumptions. Women must not be treated as members of a group on the basis of some assumed average characteristic if they are to be allowed to realize their own potential. More than a token gesture, more than just what is required by law, a whole change in attitude is needed if the barriers preventing them from participating and contributing to all aspects of human activity are to be removed.

The government has in recent years strived to create public awareness of the problems facing women today, has continuously advocated equal opportunity for women in all fields of life and has worked toward the elimination of discrimination as a prerequisite for the improvement of the status of women. Our efforts are beginning to bear fruit. During the past year increasing attention has been given to this question by the public.

Throughout this period I have had the privilege of being assigned the responsibility for co-ordinating government activity on the status of women. I have taken every opportunity offered me to bring the concerns of women to the attention of my colleagues and to interpret women's needs to them, and I have received their constructive co-operation in my task. One step forward of which I am justly proud is the establishment of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. This council has, in its first year, made many valuable recommendations to the government and has become a focal point for the aspirations of women everywhere in Canada.

Despite our achievements to this point, however, we recognize that much more has to be done in the field of legislation as well as changing attitudes. Two recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada have made this abundantly clear. I refer of course to the Murdoch case and to the Lavell case.

In the former, the Murdoch case, a woman who had worked with her husband building up a substantial farming property from nothing was denied any interest in that property when she separated from him. All that she was able to obtain was maintenance payments of $200 a month. The decision brought home to all of us the vulnerable position of women who spend all their lives doing what is expected of them as wives, tending to their husbands and children and maintaining their homes while their husbands produce an income. In the case of farm wives such as Mrs. Murdoch, the injustice of the situation is particularly apparent, since they usually contribute directly to the development of the farm.

In other cases, such as wives of wage-earners or businessmen, the wife's role may be less direct. But surely, however a couple has decided to divide the various duties and responsibilities of living between them, the time has come to recognize that both partners contribute in one way or another to the acquisition of their assets and, therefore, both should have an interest in those assets. While jurisdiction with respect to matrimonial property is, I think, largely with the provinces, we in the federal government are concerned and a study of this matter, particularly as it applies to distribution of assets following divorce, has been undertaken by the Law Reform Commission.

The other Supreme Court decision, the Lavell case, has pointed out the limitations of the Canadian Bill of Rights in protecting women against discrimination. The government is determined to act to provide new protection. First, as mentioned in the throne speech, the legislation to be introduced creating a Federal Commission on Human Rights and Interest will include provisions to protect women from discriminatory practices. This will incorporate the prohibition of discrimination on the basis of age, sex and marital status in the field of employment, which I originally announced would be added to the Labour Code. Our purpose in putting the employment provisions in the human rights legislation is to avoid the duplication and confusion which would result if the various fields in which discrimination might exist—employment, services, and so on—were covered by different pieces of legislation administered by different bodies.

Our second attack on discrimination will be through the amendment of existing legislation to provide equal treatment for men and women. The Speech from the Throne referred to the Canada and Quebec pension plans and the agreement reached with provincial governments to amend the legislation in this respect. Presently, as hon. members know, these pension plans require everyone to contribute on the same basis but contain differing provisions with respect to benefits payable to the survivors of male and female contributors.

Another act which has received a great deal of attention is the Canadian Citizenship Act. My colleague the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) will be introducing legislation to amend this act so that among other things men and women will be given equal status.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): In addition, an omnibus bill on the status of women will be placed before the House with the object of removing from a number of other acts provisions which are presently discriminatory, or otherwise prejudicial to women. Examples of these acts include the Canada Elections Act, its provisions with respect to the listing of electors; the Immigration Act, particularly its reference to "head of family" and the acts relating to pensions and allowances for veterans. Changes will be proposed in these and other measures.

I turn now to the position of women who are public employees. The President of Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) will be proposing amendment to the Public Service Superannuation Act and related acts to provide for equal treatment of men and women in pension plans.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The Treasury Board already has a program under which to review all regulations, directives and other regulatory measures with a view to removing inequities in them based on sex.

Mr. Stanfield: What about rug ranking?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Hopefully these provisions will end that very unfortunate situation which occurs all too often. A new relocation directive and a revised foreign service directive have already been issued and amendments have been made to such regulations as those covering conditions and terms of employment in the public service and payments to estates.

The government's endeavours to ensure equal opportunity to its women employees have been outlined on a number of occasions. One of the important elements of the program was the cabinet directive addressed to deputy heads of departments in April, 1972 directing them to undertake steps to encourage the assignment and advancement of more women into middle and upper echelon positions. We shall now be directing a request along those lines to Crown corporations.

All these activities are designed to meet the objective set out in the Speech from the Throne, that of creating a society free from discrimination. However, as I indicated early in my statement, more than government legislation is required. The recognition of society in general of women's changing status is a pre-requisite of true equality. It is with this in mind that the government is developing its program to celebrate Women's Year in 1975. That year has been designated by the United Nations as one in which efforts will be made to promote equality of women in all aspects of society. We in Canada have decided to take advantage of the United Nations proclamation in order to give special emphasis to the changing attitudes of women, and changing attitudes about women. Preliminary planning has begun. An inter-departmental committee has been meeting for some time and a special secretariat to implement the program is being established. Consultation will be undertaken in the near future with provincial governments as well as non-government organizations. A major part of our program will be designed to reach those in the community who have not yet been involved, both those whose lives are being affected by the changes and those who are in a position to effect those changes. The main element will be a series of regional and national conferences as well as an informational and education campaign involving the public media.

Knowing how important is the role of non-government organizations, especially of the many women's organization's which have been fighting for changes over the years, we shall also be making available to these groups increased financial assistance for the development of special projects for International Women's Year. Within the federal government, each department and agency will be undertaking special programs and realigning priorities in 1975 to promote equal opportunity for women both in their programs as they affect the public and for their women employees.

On the international level, the role of the Canadian government in improving the status of women has received particular recognition. Canada has been asked by the United Nations to host an international seminar during the summer of 1974. The experts will concentrate on elaborating a model of permanent machinery at the national level for improving the status of women and promoting equality of the sexes at all levels of society. This seminar will form part of the United Nations advisory services program in the field of human rights. In addition, every attempt will be made to increase the number of women representing Canada at international conferences of all kinds.

It is hoped the activities foreseen for International Women's Year will heighten the awareness of the people of Canada of the new role of women and indicate the government's support of it.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): May I first of all join with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) and others who have spoken in this debate in extending congratulations to Their Excellencies on taking up their new responsibilities and also to the mover (Mr. Stollery) and seconder (Mr. Pelletier) of the address.

I believe that over the years the significance of this debate has been somewhat eroded, partly due to the changes in the rules which now oblige members of parliament to inject into this discussion matters which were formerly taken care of in the committee of supply. I believe this debate should be one in which members of parliament, whether in the treasury benches or elsewhere, should take an over-view of the situation. They should concern themselves as to where we are going as a nation and, whether or not we feel this or any other government has the will or capability to lead this nation, whether our goals are leading us to the point we hope to reach. This debate should give an opportunity for us to look at the whole forest. Because of the operation of the rules in the last number of years, I feel we are usually looking at the trees, and there is no opportunity to take an over-view of the whole situation.

If we do not do that we find the government staggering from one crisis to another with ad hoc solutions and policies of putting salve on the blisters to ease the pains and ills of our society rather than being able to take the time to diagnose the cause of those ills and pains. As a result there is a tendency for people to take a rather jaundiced view of parliament, and perhaps they have lost confidence not only in this government, which I think is justified, but in this parliament, which is less justified, and perhaps in our whole system, which is completely unjustified. This situation arises partly because of the circumstances in which we find ourselves. I would be so bold as to suggest that the sacred cow, the media, is not entirely without some responsibility in this field.

I know that the press gallery is composed chiefly of men who are well enough educated and hard working, but it would seem that on many occasions the important things which are going to be vital to this nation in the future, and the proper presentation of them, are not the things that sell newspapers. I am told that the people who report the happenings of parliament do a good job in that they discriminate as to what is important, pick those things out and give them proper prominence in contrast to some things that are just spectacular or sensational. One cynic has said that the trouble is that the people they work for spend all their time separating the wheat from the chaff and then print the chaff. I am not sure about that and therefore will not have anything further to say in that regard as I do not consider myself qualified to do so, but there is a responsibility, if this system is going to function the way it is intended, for everyone concerned to take an intelligent and, hopefully, objective view of this country both in respect of its opportunities and its problems.

Even those people who take a jaundiced view of this institution and its works are not always without redemption. I was interested to read the other day the writings of perhaps one of the most critical and cynical commentators on this institution over the years when he made a confession in the foreward to one of his books, "Home Country" by Peter Newman. He says:

> To my surprise, I now harbour a suspicion of the automatically assumed beneficence of change. I have come to believe in the value of tradition, especially as it allows us to preserve the relatively gentle society which still exists on this side of the 49th parallel.

He goes on to say:

> Perhaps my real ideological swing has been away from a blind acceptance of the small "L" liberalism of the fifties to a strongly felt nationalism.

Later he says:

> It is far too much to claim for "Home Country" that it's the chronicle of a time, but it is the chronicle of a political education, my own.

It is refreshing to come across the writings of someone who is candid enough to say there is something we can all learn.

We have good men in public life at all levels, and perhaps more people have devoted more of their lives to making municipal, provincial and federal affairs operate to the best of their abilities than can be said of almost any other professional calling. This country has men both inside and outside parliament of great leadership, many of whom are in our legislatures and municipal councils, and often they are not given the credit tnat is due. We no doubt have many potentially exceptional leaders in other fields as well. Sometimes one gets the feeling that it is perhaps a little too bad that so many of them have been employed by newspapers to write editorials and comments on the news, particularly those who have such a great potential for solving our national problems.

Let me take a few minutes to try to put into perspective and on the record some of the apprehensions which concern the people I represent and the people I meet every day. The first and greatest concern or apprehension is inflation, the ever-rising cost of living and the fact that purchasing power lags behind the increase in the cost of living with the rapid debasement of the value of monetary savings of all kinds with a resulting discouragement to thrift, making it an almost impossible task for people to provide for their old age when their savings are depreciated so much in the interval.

Perhaps the worst feature of inflation is the diverting of investment from the production of plenty to the speculation in ownership of things it is supposed are in short supply and, therefore, will command a high price in the future, in an attempt, which is a natural one on the part of individuals and business, to find something that will neutralize the depreciation in the value of money.

There are two types of inflation. There is the general type that is inevitable because as population grows and our needs grow beyond or even greater than population it becomes obvious that material wealth will be harder to obtain. For example, it is more difficult and no doubt more expensive, no matter how great our science and technology may be, to extract oil from the Athabasca tar sands than it is to remove it from the ground in easily accessible areas.

It is inevitable that the price of food will have to go up as we have to move from the richest agricultural lands to marginal lands in order to produce food. There are many examples of this sort of thing which I could cite such as in respect of lumber, building materials, metals or any other extracted material. Naturally the cream was taken off first. Then as time goes by and demand increases it is necessary to exploit less rich supplies of these natural resources which are available to us. It is true that science and technology can do much to improve the efficiency of our production, but we should not expect science and technology to be able to accomplish the impossible because the resources are finite and only so much can be achieved.

The most serious type of inflation of course, and the type this government should contain and has the responsibility to contain, is what I might call induced inflation stemming from the government's failure to practice what it preaches. It tells the working man he should not expect his take-home pay to increase faster than his productivity, that people should live within their means and that they should constrain expenditures of certain types. However, the government does not pay any attention to any of these principles. In my judgment we have had rapid over-expenditure on the part of the government.

We have seen the mis-employment of human resources and the unemployment of human resources. If we are to obtain the greatest benefit from our natural and human resources they must be used as efficiently and as fully as possible. Not only this government but governments at other levels—although I believe this government has the blackest record—have acted as if these immutable laws do not apply to them. I submit they do. In this connection I should like to quote briefly from an article in the Board of Trade Journal by Mr. R. L. Smith, president of the Board of Trade of metro Toronto. He makes five points but shall quote only three. He states:

> Government spending is taking too much of our gross national product. As a nation we have to live within our means.
> The country does not need all the government restraints and controls that are being placed on business today.
>
> The realization of social and political objectives are dependent upon the achievement of economic goals.

He goes on to say:

> Perhaps too few of us know that total government spending in Canada is approaching 40 per cent of our gross national product. In 1952, the figure was 26 per cent; in 1962, 31 per cent. Compared to other countries in 1972, government spending in the U.S. was 32 per cent of the GNP; Britain, 36 per cent; France, 37 per cent; Germany, 37 per cent; Japan, 17 per cent.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) in speaking today in this debate referred in some way to the almost miraculous economic development of Japan or something to that effect. I should like to point out to him that in Japan only 17 per cent of the gross national product is spent by governments. Only ten years ago the federal and provincial revenue totalled about $13 billion. Today the total is about $39 billion. That is a three-fold increase in that short period of time. We have set in play many programs which by themselves inevitably will expand in cost at a perhaps uncontrollable rate. The Economic Council of Canada, for instance, said this year that the expenditures of all governments on health and education would, at their present rate of increase and at the present level of taxation, account for all available government funds—that is, take up the whole budget—within little more than a decade, leaving nothing over for many other services government is expected to provide.

I want to make perfectly clear that I do not condemn education or government expenditures on welfare and public health. We must realize, however, that our resources have some limit and that therefore we must use our resources in the best possible way and that we must have priorities. These priorities should be based on the value received for the expenditures made. Mention was made in the quotation to which I referred of government restraints on business, especially the statement made by the President of the Metro Toronto Board of Trade. When one conjures up government restraints on huge corporations the average man in the street will say, what is the matter with that. That is not my concern. I think large corporations are in a position to deal with these restraints in a fairly efficient manner. My concern is the effect that all these government demands and restraints has on small businesses. They make it almost impossible for the person who is self-employed and who wishes to contribute to the production of the country as a whole to do so in an efficient manner.

I have visited little operations in my constituency in Prince Edward Island. These are operations which manufacture some item or other such as perhaps some phase of the lumber business. It might be a little operation involving a man, his wife and perhaps two other employed persons. At the end of every month they have to send in forms and statements to eight departments of government, including federal and provincial. For them this is a chore and a hindrance. It causes them to wonder whether the whole thing is worthwhile and whether perhaps they might be better off if they were in the position of employees. It seems to me that in the last number of years governments have become so preoccupied with reallocating our wealth that they have ignored its production and the best climate in which the production of wealth and the good life might be possible.

It is said that humans differ from animals because of the fact that humans have the capacity to anticipate the future and have a concept of time and therefore are able to adapt to and cope with the future. As I look at this government day after day, on the basis of that harsh definition it would seem to me it hardly qualifies. It barely qualifies because there is a horrible lack of appreciation of the trends that have been set in motion in this country in the last few years, trends of geometric progressions which if they doubled every 50 years, let alone every ten years, would mean that some day we would reach the point where something has to go bust.

To illustrate what I am saying I might be forgiven if I once again refer to the fable of the stupid stable boy who was sent with a horse to be shod. The fable is in pounds and pence, but in order to simplify it I will put it in dollars and cents. The blacksmith said: "The charge is $5, but if you prefer I will give you a special deal. I will let you pay just one penny for the first of the 32 nails in the set of horseshoes, and you can pay for it now. Next week you can pay for the second nail, which will be two cents. The third week you can pay for the third nail, four cents". The stupid stableboy thought he was on to a great deal so he took it on. He went back to the man he was working for and told him what a great deal he had had from the blacksmith.

His boss was, of course, able to point out to him: "Yes, you are all right for this week and next week, and after six weeks you will pay 32 cents for the sixth nail. Then it starts to get tough. At the end of 16 weeks you will pay for the sixteenth nail $327.68; for the 24th nail you will pay $83,886.08; and by the time you get to the last nail in the set, the thirty-second nail, you will pay $21,474,836.48".

This is the kind of course on which the government has embarked. It is acting like a stupid stableboy. Every year it embarks on some expenditure, some course of action, that has built into it an exponential curve that will create terrible difficulties for the government in its present life span—which will be short—and certainly for the Canadian people in the days ahead, unless action is taken well in advance. This is why I say that foresight in government policy is absolutely necessary.

If corrective action is taken early, it need only be a slight correction which will not disturb the economy or disrupt life at all. But if allowed to go on, as the case with the oil crisis in the United States, and we double our consumption of oil year after year until demand rapidly outruns any hope of supply, then we will be in for real trouble.

The population explosion is, of course, an example of the exponential curve to which I have referred. It took all history, and pre-history too, to produce a world population of one billion by 1840. It took less than a century to add the second billion and a mere 35 years to add the third. By the end of the twentieth century the world will have doubled its present population, bringing the number to more than seven billion. This is the kind of problem we will be faced with.

I think it is vitally important for us as a nation to recognize how our policies are going to affect the rest of the world, and how the rest of the world is going to affect us by their policies. We cannot operate in a vacuum. We cannot operate as a federal parliament by ignoring the effects our policies will have on provincial policies and on the policies of other levels of government.

We, of course, have gaily encouraged the population explosion, and I see nothing wrong with this. We have coped pretty well as a civilization with one of the four horsemen of the Apocalypse, the rider of the black horse, famine and pestilence. We have even delayed the rider of the pale horse, death, to the point where we now have a much longer life expectancy, which is a beneficial thing. But one of the side effects is that we have more and more people in our population who are non-productive. In other words, the productive years of an average individual relative to his entire life span are becoming shorter and shorter, which puts great weight on his responsibility during his productive years.

I think government expenditures have been allowed to increase at an unjustifiable rate. For every man, woman and child in this country this federal expenditure is now at a rate of $1,000. The government says that this is partly due to statutory items over which it has no control. Who, may I ask, introduced the statutes, Mr. Speaker? The government is saying, in effect, either that it did not care, or it could not see the effect of the legislation it forced down the throat of parliament, in some cases, and passed last year.

Mr. Hales: They were like that stable boy.

Mr. MacLean: I also think the growth of the civil service is completely out of reality. I believe, of course, in an efficient civil service. I am not saying there should be no growth but that I think the rate of growth should be controlled so we do not continue to be the one country in the western world with the highest percentage of GNP going to government expenditure. If that is our goal, to be the most expensively governed country in the western world, then we have achieved it. But I doubt very much that one of Canada's real national goals, so far as the average person is concerned, is to have the biggest, most expensive and most grandiose government in the world.

The effects of this run away rate of acceleration in government expenditure cannot help but bring with it inflation. Indeed, it is one of the chief causes, if not the chief cause, of this induced inflation about which I have been talking. What effect does this have on the average citizen? For example, the expenditures of this government have doubled in the last eight years. If they double every eight years over the next 48 years, then the annual budget will be $1,408 billion.

What effect will this have on the young person now entering the work force and contributing relatively good dollars to the Canada Pension Plan? At the age of 66 he is supposed to get the benefit of 48 years' work. Presumably if this trend is allowed to continue, the annual budget is going to be, as I say, $1,408 billion, which will mean that the Canadian dollar at that time, compared with today's dollar, will be worth about three cents.

So is it fair to expect people to save good money now, even through a very meritorious scheme, which will be almost worthless when the money is repaid? The same argument applies to all kinds of savings. I think sooner or later—and sooner rather than later—the government is going to realize that it will not be able to borrow money from the general public, because people will not lend money to a government only to have the money repaid years later in dollars that have become almost worthless in the meantime. So we are not very far from the time when, in order to get anyone to buy government bonds, the government will have to guarantee an escalation in the face value of the bond so that it will be redeemed at the same purchasing power the investment had when the bond was first purchased.

What does that do? If that trend continues you have an explosive acceleration in the cost of carrying the national debt. That is happening now due to the increase in the interest rates. It does not take much of a mathematician to realize that it costs three times as much to carry the national debt at 9 per cent as it did at 3 per cent. This adds to the deficits, subtracts from the amount of money that is available to a government for constructive use, and cheats the person who lent his money to the government to save for his old age, because he gets paid back in dollars of deflated value. It has always been so, and the government should realize that it cannot make this country prosperous, that it cannot bring about a satisfactory economic situation by debauching our economic system and debasing our currency.

I believe my time is almost up, Mr. Speaker, and so I will try to conclude. There are other trends that are equally deplorable. One is the unnecessary and accelerated urban growth, and the depopulation of rural Canada. I would like to talk about that for a long time, but I will not on this occasion. Then, there is the worship of growth. I think that an economy which does not operate satisfactorily unless it is being artificially stimulated is sick. An economy that is sound should be able to do what it is supposed to do in a state of equilibrium.

I said that I may sound like a prophet of doom, Mr. Speaker. I am not; I am an optimist. I believe this is a country with a great future. However, I believe that there are certain dangers that we must foresee and avoid. If we do then there is a great future for this country, but in some cases time is running out.

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand-Falls-White Bay-Labrador): On rising to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, first may I add my congratulations to those of the hon. members who preceded me, offered to the Governor General and Madame Léger on their appointment. I wish them success and happiness, and I hope to welcome them to the province of Newfoundland whenever they can find time to visit there. I understand they will be visiting with us to take part in our celebrations at the end of this month and the beginning of April. I can assure them that they will be most welcome indeed.

May I say also how glad I was to see a keynote in the speeches that were made, moving and seconding the Address in Reply, one which I hope will be followed in this debate and throughout the continuation of this parliament, namely, that in Canada we cannot be isolationist or parochial, that we must learn more about other countries if we are to solve the problems that beset us today because certainly the majority of our problems are international in origin and scope. It is only by learning more about each other, and working more closely together, that we will be able to solve them.

It is indeed a pleasure and honour for me, Mr. Speaker, to speak in this throne speech debate on behalf of the people of Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. This is a large, far-flung riding, one of the largest in Canada. It stretches over about 130,000 square miles from the inland paper town of Grand Falls, and the nearby town of Windsor, built around the great Price Paper Mill. This is a bustling, burgeoning area of Newfoundland, an area of rapid growth, including the fine towns of beautiful Green Bay, the fishing communities along the shores of White Bay, north to the town of St. Anthony, historic for its associations with Sir Wilfred Grenfell and that great medical mission of his. Along the coasts of Labrador we have Indian and Eskimo people in addition to the settlers. It encompasses Goose Bay airport, which boasts the longest runways in Canada east of Montreal, Churchill Falls and the massive hydroelectric project there, and the iron ore mining towns of Labrador City and Wabush along the Quebec border. This is a very diverse area, containing many different kinds of people, not only from Newfoundland but from many parts of the world.

Much of the area contains the potential for great prosperity, but it is also a region with many problems. Mr. Speaker, much has happened since I rose to speak in a similar debate a year ago. It has been a year of crises, of great challenges, and yet a year of great strides forward. The government, in a minority situation, has met these crises and challenges with courage and vision. Things are not what we would like them to be, far from it, but they are immeasurably better than they would have been had it not been for the policies of this Liberal government.

It is important to realize, not for the purpose of excuses but for the purpose of clarity and perspective, that the problems we have faced have been worldwide. For example, escalation of the price of oil in foreign countries caused an increase in the price of petroleum products in eastern Canada. The government will ensure that in future there will be one price for oil in all of Canada, and that the country will be self-sufficient in oil.

While the news of a subsidy for petroleum products and of the extension of the pipeline is welcome in Newfoundland, I should like to point out that in my riding we have our own source of clean and everlasting power in the Churchill River. The proposed development at Gull Island rapids will produce 1,700 megawatts of electricity, and at Muskrat Falls another 600 to 800 megawatts. Further, there is the possibility of power potential from the Eagle River. Altogether in that area we have the prospect of producing 10,000 megawatts of electricity for use in Canada. Little of that will be needed in the province of Newfoundland, but Newfoundland would like enough of it to meet its own needs in the foreseeable future, including any required for new industry that may be attracted to the province as the result of readily available power supply. As I say, there would still be a great deal available for use in other parts of the country.

It is important for the economic development of my riding, for the province of Newfoundland, and I believe for Canada, that the power development on the Lower Churchill River go ahead immediately, and that the power be brought across Labrador to the island of Newfoundland. I would hope the government would be as magnanimous in its assistance for this project as it was in regard to Manitoba and the Nelson River power development project. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, hydro power is clean and everlasting, and free from economic fluctuation in foreign countries. The development of this power potential is important for Newfoundland and for Canada, and I urge the government to give all possible assistance to my province in connection with it.

The problem that is heaviest on the minds and pockets of all Canadians is that of inflation and rising prices. Again, Mr. Speaker, it is small comfort, but nevertheless important to note that the problem of inflation is not confined to Canada but is in fact worldwide. Therefore, it cannot be solved in Canada alone, but only by Canada acting in co-operation with other countries. Nevertheless we in Canada must take action, and we have done so.

Our approach has not been to curtail wages and prices. We have seen this tried in other countries with disastrous effects, and we do not want to repeat the mistakes of other countries. Our approach is to try to increase the consumer spending power of Canadians. Our approach has been to attempt to put more money into people's pockets, particularly the pockets of those on low or fixed incomes who are hardest hit. We have done this by raising and indexing pensions and family allowances, by greater tax concessions, by changes to the Canada Pension Plan, and by selective subsidies on certain food items and on petroleum products. This has helped tremendously; things are still not good but they are immeasurably better than they would have been. This is what we did in the past and this is what we will continue to do in the future to help the Canadian consumer meet rising costs.

The great thing about this throne speech is that it attacks the cause of rising prices and not only the effect. The fact is that to bring food prices down you must bring up food supply. In a very positive way this speech suggests a policy that would help our food producers, particularly the farmers and the fishermen and this is of the most importance to me. While we are making progress in farming in Newfoundland, the mainstay of our economy has been and will be the fishery. With a market that is constantly demanding more fish, this government, realizing the importance of increasing our catch to meet increasing demand, has responded positively and emphatically by giving fisheries a prominent place in the throne speech and listing policies designed to increase production in both the inshore and offshore fishery. I am pleased and proud of the importance that this government has obviously attached to the fisheries, Mr. Speaker.

In summing up those sections of the speech dealing with fisheries, I should like to quote from an editorial in the St. John's Evening Telegram of March 2, 1974. In the past the Telegram has been very critical of our fisheries' policy, as a journal should be, but it is prepared to give credit where credit is due. To be quite fair, the editorial does urge the creation of a department of fisheries. But it also says that the fishery has been fully recognized in the Speech from the Throne and a great deal of emphasis has been placed on it. It says: "Be thankful things are suddenly going your way". That word "suddenly" is worth dwelling on, Mr. Speaker.

Suddenly, in October 1972, we had more Liberals from Atlantic Canada in the House of Commons. Suddenly, as a consequence, there was more talk of fisheries in caucus. Suddenly, there were resolutions on fisheries before the national convention. If fisheries has been emphasized in the throne speech it is for a number of reasons. It is because those Liberals from Atlantic Canada have been working long and hard threshing out a fisheries policy, discussing, persuading, convincing. It is because we have a Minister of Environment and Fisheries who is extremely competent, able and far sighted. It is because the Liberal parties in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, have ensured that fisheries get a prominent place in national policy. And it is because we have a responsible and responsive government which realizes the value of the fishery to this country, particularly at this time when there is a food supply problem. These policies are Liberal policies, Mr. Speaker, and it is a Liberal government that has recognized the importance of the fishery not only to Atlantic Canada but to the whole country.

The editorial sums up those statements of policy in the Throne Speech which apply to the fishery:

> The improvements are aimed at the modernization of the inshore and offshore and the provision of ice boats and gear to make them multipurpose and the provision of ice-making plants to assist in improving the quality of the catch. Harbour facilities will be improved and updated and incentives will be provided to encourage the fishing effort in the direction of species and areas which are underexploited.
> There will, of course, be immediate short term effects which will assist the fishermen to bring their boats up to the new standards and to help them meet the new quality controls which are in the offing but the real objective appears to be the development of the total fishing effort to take advantage of any concession which might come from the Law of the Sea Conference.
> Environment Minister Jack Davis is quite convinced Canada will get management control of the continental shelf and the government must be accepting his optimism to give so much attention to the fishery in the Throne Speech.

There was a time when people said that this is Jack Davis's policy—this is a time when Jack Davis is speaking for himself. I think it is quite clear that this is no longer true. The policy we have and are enunciating at the Law of the Sea Conference, a policy which will give Canada control of her continental shelf to a minimum of 200 and possibly a maximum of 400 miles, is Liberal policy accepted by Liberals across Canada and espoused and defended by this government.

But the most eloquent symbol, Mr. Speaker, is the dollar sign. Money talks and the language in so far as spending on the fisheries is concerned, is impressive. Environment will be spending almost $6 million in Newfoundland on environment and fisheries in the coming year. I am pleased but I am not satisfied. It is not enough, particularly for the small craft harbour program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rompkey: This is a program for which those of us from Atlantic Canada fought very hard, and I think with a great deal of success.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rompkey: Wharves, breakwaters and harbour improvements are an urgent necessity for inshore fishermen and there just is not enough money to do what needs to be done. We have doubled the budget for small craft harbours over the past year. We are spending more than we have for some time. Commendable as this is, it is still not enough.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that fisheries were given prominence in the Throne Speech and that measures are to be introduced to help fishermen improve their facilities and increase their catch. But let me deal with some of the problems that remain with the fishery, particularly in Newfoundland.

The catches of inshore fishermen in Newfoundland are continuously declining. Generally, the landed value is rising because of better prices. But, particularly in vulnerable places like the northeast coast of Newfoundland and the Labrador coast, where the season is necessarily short and the effect of offshore fishing particularly damaging, fishermen are becoming very discouraged by catch failure. Moreover, those who have invested in longliners are faced with debts that they cannot foresee paying, unless the pattern of fishing changes. The policy of improving assistance to fishermen so that they may provide themselves with better equipped and more flexible boats is extremely important. Many of our inshore fishermen will want to go where the fish are, and there must be ways and means of helping them to do so.

Another means of protecting the catch of inshore fishermen on the coast is to place a moratorium on fishing by the offshore fishing vessels, particularly on the spawning ground for groundfish on the northeast coast of Newfoundland, to the coast of Labrador. A restriction on fishing these grounds for a period by the larger vessels would increase the catch of inshore fishermen. These are the people who are the most vulnerable; these are the people we have to think about most. The merchants and firms who operate the offshore fishery have been getting help from the government, but to a certain degree they are able to look after themselves. It is the little man in the small boat about whom we must be concerned, and to him we must address our policies.

But the inadequacy of their particular unemployment insurance plan is the reason many inshore fishermen are quitting and finding jobs elsewhere. The fact is that all other workers are much better protected against unemployment than the fishermen, so fishermen are opting for other jobs, both temporary and permanent, where they get a steady income and a better deal if they lose their job.

What fishermen want is to be equal, to get benefits equivalent to those of other workers from the unemployment insurance plan. Fishermen want to be equal to other workers in terms of unemployment insurance benefits and they deserve to be. They are our primary producers, providing us with much needed food. They work hard, very hard, and they deserve help and protection for themselves and their families during the offseason. I was pleased to note, Mr. Speaker, that changes will be made in the Unemployment Insurance Act in this session. We are now busy drafting the necessary modifications to give fishermen equality with other workers in unemployment insurance benefits. We in the Liberal party are aware of the problem. It is a complex problem but we are working hard to come up with a solution.

The department will be making proposals to Manpower on behalf of fishermen. The thrust of these proposals will be to make fishermen equivalent, to give them an equal deal with other workers in so far as unemployment insurance is concerned. This must be, Mr. Speaker; because the Law of the Sea, the limit on fishing, the subsidies to boats to improve boats and gear, and all the other measures that we had designed on behalf of the fishermen will be to no avail if, through something like an inadequate unemployment insurance plan, most of them tie up their boats and go to work at other jobs.

This leads us, Mr. Speaker, to the whole question of the development of rural Canada and northern Canada. We have all been aware for some time now, of increasing urbanization. More and more Canadians are coming to live in cities. They are moving from rural areas, from farms, fishing villages, small communities all over Canada. This has done two things. It has made it necessary to cope with increasingly complex problems in our cities in such matters, for example, as transportation and housing. But this emigration, particularly from Atlantic Canada, has caused what has been called "the brain drain" or what might be described as the erosion of rural Canada. True, some young people who are disenchanted and dissatisfied with the cities and with "the system" are returning to the country or to wilderness areas. But there seems to be little encouragement for many young people to remain in rural communities and little incentive for young people to go to rural communities.

First of all, the cost of living in most cases is much higher, particularly where residents cannot supplement their income by harvesting the resources of the land or the sea. The cause of this to a great degree is high freight rates. People who live at a great distance from manufacturing and supply centers find it doubly difficult to pay for necessary consumer products because of excessively high freight rates. For this reason, I was pleased to see in the Speech from the Throne the promises that steps will be taken to end discrimination in freight rates. This problem, Mr. Speaker, does not exist only in the west. There is discrimination in freight rates in parts of Atlantic Canada as well, indeed even within sections of a province.

Many people in rural and northern Newfoundland and in the Labrador area have, up to now, found it difficult if not impossible to obtain adequate housing. While we have had programs to assit native people, our housing assistance to non-native people has been less than adequate. This is particularly discouraging in burgeoning areas where jobs are available but where jobs go begging because prospective takers cannot obtain or erect adequate accommodation for themselves and their families. However, I notice that the throne speech indicates that measures will be brought forward to provide substantial assistance for rural housing. This is an absolute necessity, Mr. Speaker. Otherwise we will add to the depopulation of rural Canada. But, what is even worse, we will never be able to attract new people to rural and developing areas. This government has always believed in the vision of the new Canada of the north, and there are indications in this speech that that belief is more firmly held than ever.

Transportation is another serious problem, Mr. Speaker, certainly in Newfoundland and particularly in my own riding. We need more and better roads. We need improved air services. We need improved transportation by sea.

[Mr. Rompkey.]

There are still too many parts of rural and northern Canada which are not linked to the rest of the country by road. I could mention those in my own riding, some of which have been completed under DREE. Others, I hope, will be completed in the near future. We must continue our attempt to knit the various parts of this vast country together. The current CBC TV series, "The National Dream", brings home to us once more the need for vision and imagination in the area of transport. Development follows improved transportation. If the people at the extremities of this country, and indeed within provinces, are to feel that they are fellow citizens, they must somehow have better access to one another. We have made great progress in this regard through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion but we still have a long way to go. The department has been a godsend to Newfoundland. It has worked wonders and will continue to do so. Recently a $5 billion plan was signed with th province of Newfoundland, which is an indication of the support the government of Canada is supplying with regard to the budget of the province. As I say, much more remains to be done.

We need to improve air services. There are communities in rural and northern Canada which will not be connected by road in the foreseeable future. We must ensure that they have access to their fellow Canadians. A great deal of emphasis needs to be put on STOL aircraft in our rural areas. Better aircraft and improved landing facilities are needed to bring goods and services to people in rural areas and to bring them closer to each other. This government has made a tremendous improvement in communication in rural and northern Canada. Still, there is much to be done.

Since the introduction of the satellite, many parts of northern and rural Canada are now connected to television and telephone service. Yet, in a day when we can talk to men on the moon, I still have great difficulty in reaching and talking to people in many parts of my riding by telephone. Actually, some people in my riding do not have any telephone. You communicate with them by means of a high frequency radio set. If you are lucky enough to get them in the first place, the chances are that your conversation will be cut off in the middle. Television in some areas is still non-existent or of an inferior quality. I was pleased to hear the announcement recently that $80 million is to be spent on the CBC's accelerated coverage plan to bring TV to remote areas. We must provide this kind of communication link to all our people if they are to feel part of the country.

The speech also mentioned measures to be taken to provide workers with improved access to available jobs. The decentralization of government services is essential. The Department of Manpower has already taken steps to set up a more decentralized system of combined Manpower and UIC offices by establishing smaller offices to serve local areas. This is highly desirable and the policy should be continued. Too many still find it is easier to find jobs for themselves than to seek them through Canada Manpower. I believe this decentralization of administration will help to correct that.

Hand in hand with this trend goes the community employment policy in a social security context for those Canadians who have particular and continuing difficulty in getting and keeping employment. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has already said that it is his intention to emphasize jobs rather than social assistance. He will be working with Manpower and the job-creating branches of other departments in a positive approach to finding productive and useful work for our unemployed. In the past programs such as LIP and OFY, while they have been admirable in philosophy and generally in application, nevertheless have not fully met the need. A more comprehensive program is necessary. We must also bear in mind once again the need for decentralization of administration. Programs to create employment should be fully integrated in a total plan for community development.

In Newfoundland, as possibly elsewhere in Canada, we have been creating employment through large scale projects to develop our natural resources. I am thinking of power projects, of mining ventures, of large scale lumbering and fishing operations. While these are necessary and desirable, we should at the same time realize that small scale commercial enterprises in rural areas can supply the economic needs of the local population. At the same time, these justify the provision of infrastructure, but allow the residents to retain a great deal of their original life style. I am thinking of small fish plants, saw mills and small agricultural operations. I am thinking of communities with populations of from 500 to 5,000, which could be provided with adequate housing, schools, water and sewer systems and up-to-date communications, cultural and recreational facilities. I am thinking of communities where residents would have the necessary cash income, but where they could do other things to supplement this cash income, depending on the life style they wish to pursue.

So, I support the principle of developing a community employment policy, but only if the application of it in a particular community is designed and executed not only by the federal and provincial governments but by the people of that community as well. At the same time as we are developing our community employment policy, we should be developing our policies designed to help people participate in the decision-making process. We, as a federal government, should be very heavily involved in adult education in the broadest sense. Too many of our people are still unaware of what choices are open to them and what programs are available to them. Too many still find it difficult to plug into the decision-making process which is becoming more and more complex. It is their community and their life, and it should be our job to help them to design and build the kind of community they want and the kind of life they want. Programs of this nature are most effective if at the same time we invest heavily in educational programs designed to help communities decide for themselves how their environment should be modified or how they should adapt to it.

There were other parts of this throne speech that will be of interest to my constituency, Mr. Speaker. The town of Windsor in central Newfoundland, for example, will be pleased to know that measures will be introduced to assist provinces and cities in the relocation of railway lines and terminals and in the redevelopment of these areas. The whole of the central Newfoundland area is growing and progressing rapidly but will need help from various federal departments if it is to keep its public services in line with its rapid growth.

This is a bold and robust speech, Mr. Speaker, and these are bold and robust policies, Liberal policies backed up by Liberal spending. Certainly, we have experienced crises; but crises often call not for caution but for imagination and foresight. This government has recognized the fundamental changes taking place in the world, as it at the same time becomes smaller and yet more complex. Change, in all aspects of our society, is becoming increasingly more rapid, as society becomes more complex. It is to the great credit of this government that it has governed and governed well in these circumstances while in a minority situation. A great deal of impressive legislation was passed during the last session, Mr. Speaker, and I believe the list will be even more impressive this session. It has been a source of pride for me to be associated with this government and with this caucus. I have found that members of parliament can be heard and can change things, not as fast as we would like and not as many things as we would like, but the changes come with a little help from your friends.

The policies this government has put forward bear the mark of this caucus and this party. They are policies that were forged in hot debate. They are all the more enduring because of that. I believe they will carry us through this turbulent time. I believe also that when the time comes, the people of Canada will give credit where credit is due.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I was rather perplexed by some of the comments of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey). He spent the first part of his speech trying to be a Liberal and the second part trying to be honest. He wound up by again being a Liberal. He spent a good deal of time extolling the great policies of the Liberal government. It almost made me feel as though I should move to Newfoundland immediately because things are so great there.

For some strange reason, the hon. member forgot to mention the unemployment rate and the rate of inflation in the past year. After stating how great Liberal policies were, he proceeded to give all the reasons people are leaving Newfoundland. He referred to high freight rates, inadequate housing, inadequate transportation by land, sea and air, inadequate development, inadequate television and inadequate telephone service. All of these factors I see as a reason why this government should be thrown out completely and replaced by a Progressive Conservative government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: I read with great interest some of the comments made a few days ago by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). I hoped he would explain what policies he and the government are proposing in order to expedite development of the tar sands which happen to be located in the middle of my constituency. For that reason I hope I will be forgiven if I talk for a few minutes about the tar sands. I was hoping the minister would give some indication of what the policies will be in order to ensure that the tar sands are developed at a rate sufficient to meet Canada's needs on an interim and long term basis.

We have been hearing and reading much in the last few months about an energy crisis in the world. I think it is fair to say that insofar as the world is concerned this is not a myth, although insofar as Canada itself is concerned, from the short term point of view, there probably is not a crisis in terms of availability of energy but rather a crisis in terms of transport of it from producing areas to consumer areas. This is simply the result of government neglect over the past 10 years.

Because of the unique position that Canada occupies in that the tar sands are located in this country, the solution to foreseeable energy problems faced by North America will in large part involve major activities on the part of Canadians. The estimate of reserves of conventional oil in North America insofar as present liquid hydrocarbon reserves are concerned is that they are equivalent to approximately 10 to 12 years' supply.

As production capabilities from these sources decline, new sources must be developed at a rate which meets both the increasing consumption and the declining capacity of conventional reserves. While the minister, in his comments, touched briefly on his intentions as they may relate to the tar sands, he by no means indicated any kind of a long-term plan, or indeed any specific short-term or interim plan for federal government assistance or participation in the development. He stated that the government proposes to spend $40 million on oil sands research technology and that this will permit full and rapid development of that resource. He also stated that a national petroleum company will be established which will, among other things, involve itself in the tar sands.

As far as I am concerned, both of these suggestions could be considered at best a feeble, airy-fairy effort to meet a problem which could be severe and acute in a fairly short period of time. I have no objection to a national petroleum company in principle in that it will fulfill a certain need which exists in this country, but I certainly cannot see it as the solution to our petroleum requirements for the future. Much more important to consider if we are serious about long-term planning is the encouragement of private enterprise as well. We know that without encouragement of private enterprise which is already in the business, serious shortages could develop rather quickly, since it could well be a decade or more before a national petroleum company could get its production on stream.

The world energy crisis has placed a strain on many countries but it has also had its beneficial effects, namely, the new price structures which have been forced by international and economic pressures. These price structures have had the effect of making it possible to undertake with greater vigor the development of some of the more difficult sources of petroleum, such as the tar sands in our country, because these developments are now economically feasible and economically attractive in the long term. With the old price structure, there was some question as to whether the tar sands development was economically viable. With today's price structure on the international scene, there is certainly no question about viability, although with the price structure within our own country still held at $4 a barrel, economic viability is questionable unless the prices are allowed to rise at least 5 per cent per year for the next 25 years or so. With that kind of Price increase, there would presumably be sufficient return on the investment to make investment in the tar sands as attractive as in a number of other types of private enterprises.

While the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said in the recent past that he would allow the price of crude to rise sufficiently to make tar sands development a more attractive area for private investment, we have yet had no clarification from the Prime Minister or the minister as to what the government envisages this level to be. A positive statement from the government at this time in this area would be useful in terms of removing some of the doubts that now exist as to the real economic prospects for interested developers.

While there are other potential sources of liquid hydrocarbons, such as the vast coal reserves, the oil shales in Colorado, Arctic oil and offshore sources, the most obvious known potential source for which the technology now exists is the Athabasca tar sands. This source consists of some 700 billion barrels of oil, of which 60 billion barrels are obtainable by surface mining and another 90 billion by presently known in situ techniques.

To encourage further research and development, the very progressive Progressive Conservative government of Alberta has announced a $100 million fund for mining and other research to develop more effective techniques to increase the percentage of recovery of oil from the tar sands. With this research, if it bears fruit, it is expected that an additional 150 billion barrels could be removed, adding up to a total of 300 to 350 billion barrels removable out of the total deposit of 700 billion barrels.

As I mentioned before, the United States has a projected reserve supply of somewhere in the area of 10 to 12 years, while Canada has a prospect of 15 to 17 years supply. It is, therefore, rather urgent that our alternate sources be developed not only for fuel but because these hydrocarbons are also sources of raw material for the petrochemical industries, synthetic rubber, plastics of many kinds and organic chemicals which generally require vast amounts of hydrocarbons for which there is no substitute raw material. At the same time, we should be taking appropriate steps to ensure that producing provinces cease to be exporters of the raw materials only. We should ensure that more and more of the exports from the producing provinces are in the form of fully manufactured products. Since there is no substitute raw material available to these petrochemical industries we must use our depleting reserves prudently and ensure that, while development takes place, some thought is given to the needs of future generations. So, while the short-term need requires maximum achievable output, long term need dictates development in keeping with principles of conservation.

The appropriate level of development, to judge from the rate at which tar sands development has been going on so far, is not likely to be reached in less than 15 or 20 years from now. The plant which is already in production began research on the tar sands in the 1950's, applied for a permit to build an extraction plant in 1962, received it in 1964 for a capacity of 45,000 barrels a day and was permitted to increase production to 65,000 barrels a day in 1973. The first oil was produced in 1967 but full output was not achieved until 1973. In this case, approximately one decade elapsed between the time the application was made and the date on which full production was achieved. The experience of the existing plant shows that three years were required for construction. Organization in terms of ordering materials, locating skilled staff, and so on actually began a couple of years prior to construction. We are faced with a similar situation as far as progress toward construction of a second plant is concerned.

Construction of a second plant is about to begin. The capacity envisaged is 125,000 barrels a day and the plant is expected to go on stream by 1978, four or five years from now at best, but it might be as late as 1980 before the full rate of production is achieved. Difficulties are also being faced by this company in terms of locating a sufficiently large pool of skilled labour, including engineers, to enable the project to proceed. I am told there are presently some 500 vacancies in Alberta for engineers. A number of large projects are under way not only in Alberta but in North America generally, and these are absorbing all the available trained labour. These shortages are a source of potential delay and indicate a certain lack of foresight on the part of the federal government inasmuch as it failed to take the appropriate steps to prepare a labour pool for this project as well as for future plants as they get under way.

I did not hear the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources make any mention of his department's plans to overcome this serious problem. I should like to suggest the immediate initiation of a massive manpower training program designed and carried out in conjunction with industry and the province. Such a training program makes all the more sense when one considers the high unemployment rate existing in our country today. In its absence, skilled labour will have to be brought in from other countries, leaving unemployed Canadians to continue to enjoy the fruits of our massive and costly unemployment insurance program.

Another serious problem arises from the shortage of manufactured equipment largely stemming from difficulty in obtaining steel, and here again no comments have been forthcoming from the minister. I am told a search is being carried out all over the world to find an industry capable of manufacturing the appropriate equipment and that the company has been unable to obtain the commitments it requires in the equipment field in order to carry on in accordance with its projected schedule. The steel shortage is a cause for major concern and it could seriously delay development of the tar sands. I want to know what the government is going to do in terms of assuring a supply of steel.

There is another area in which the government has been somewhat negligent. I refer to the immediate needs of people at the site of development and in particular to the need for assistance in the provision of adequate housing for employees and potential employees of tar sands developers. Presently, Fort McMurray is classified by CMHC as a one-industry or one-company town. Under such a classification, severe mortgage restrictions are imposed; requiring a company to guarantee all housing loans. This, of course, becomes a serious obstacle in the way of individuals obtaining housing, particularly if they are not directly linked with the company involved in the extraction project.

Predictions are that upon the completion of the second plant the population of Fort McMurray will rise to somewhere in the vicinity of 25,000. It is projected that 1,000 new housing units will be required for the next four or five years until the plant is on stream. So far, however, there has been no evidence at all that the present rate of housing development can adequately meet the rapidly growing demand. In view of the fact that the potential for development is unquestionable, Fort McMurray should certainly be considered to be a stable community and made subject to ordinary CMHC rules. And since there is already a severe housing shortage, I believe it is reasonable to expect the minister responsible for CMHC to seriously consider removing the present restriction in order that mortgages to individuals could be more readily provided. This is another immediate and pressing aspect, and it is one to which neither the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) nor the responsible minister have made even a passing reference.

A third developer has filed an application with respect to a plant to produce 100,000 barrels a day. It is conceivable that this plant will not be in production until the early 1980's, depending on several of the factors to which I have referred. On the basis of these three examples, it is obvious that although huge deposits exist in the tar sands it will be some years before production is anywhere near the level required to assure self-sufficiency in Canada and security of supply. A host of other companies are stepping up their activities and interest in the area. They may be planning extraction plants and in due course it will be necessary for them to go ahead so as to assure security of supply. Before this can happen, the government must seriously consider providing assistance in the areas I have discussed; it must give some indication of a stable, long-term program in terms of providing an assurance to these companies that they can expect a reasonable return on their investment over the years. Such an assurance will encourage them to move ahead as quickly as is required.

While I appreciate that the minister is looking at the creation of a national petroleum corporation, I remind hon. members that he himself has stated it might be many years before such a corporation does, in fact, have a plant on stream in the tar sands region. Until this is the case, the government must take steps to encourage those who are already in the business and who are in a position to proceed immediately.

Mr. Speaker, I know there are many in this country who feel that most of the development of Canadian resources from now on should be carried out by Canadian enterprise and in large part owned by Canadians. I happen to agree with this proposition and what I have said does not conflict with it, providing the government takes steps to ensure that Canadian interests are protected. The fact that the companies which hold leases on the tar sands, and are in process of development, are in large part foreign-owned should not be a reason for failing to proceed with development. All that is necessary is that legislation be passed requiring these companies to allow adequate Canadian participation in ownership and administration.

As to the debate over whether development should be carried out by private enterprise or public enterprise, I personally do not think it makes much difference. If a publicly-owned company such as the proposed national petroleum corporation can go into the extraction business in the tar sands and can produce oil on a competitive basis, proving itself to be more efficient than private enterprise, then by all means it should be encouraged. What I should not like to see is a publicly-owned corporation going into the business as a lame duck industry requiring continuing injections of capital from the public treasury. I do not think that is what Canadians are looking for. Basically the aim must be that the factor of competition be allowed to play its role fully in order that Canadians get the best value for their money. If a public company can really provide that kind of competition, then so much the better for Canadians. If it cannot compete and becomes a drain on the treasury, then Canadians will be the losers.

● (1640)

With regard to the amount of profit that is taken out of these developments, again I do not believe it matters whether the ownership is private or public in so far as returns to the public treasury are concerned, since governments have the authority to legislate any royalty or tax structure they deem to be in the best interests of Canadians. In the case of a privately owned company, it does not need more than a reasonable return to be encouraged to stay in business.

Another important factor we must keep in mind is that we must not hang our hopes only on the tar sands as being the only remaining potential source of hydrocarbons. I think adequate steps must be taken to encourage the continuation of exploration for conventional oil supplies, and while my friends to the left—

An hon. Member: To the far left.

Mr. Yewchuk: —to the far left have indicated they believe there are basically no conventional oil supplies left worth looking for, that kind of negative attitude should not be encouraged. Exploration must be continued simulataneously with progressive development of the tar sands.

I want to spend a few minutes on another subject which concerns us all as well, and that is the subject of inflation, particularly as it affects the ordinary working man. On February 27, Statistics Canada said the country's economy showed its greatest gains in seven years in 1973. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has been repeating that everywhere on frequent occasions. The rise was something like 7.1 per cent in terms of real growth after deduction for the steepest inflation in 22 years.

At the same time, the latest figures released by Statistics Canada indicate a progressively deteriorating situation for the Canadian worker. Average weekly earnings for the month of December actually decreased approximately $5 from the month before, and were only 5.9 per cent higher than those of a year before. When we compare that with the cost of living increase over the same period of 9.1 per cent, it is indeed obvious that whatever salary increases the working man has managed have more than been eroded by inflation.

However, what is even more disturbing than the actual figures for December is the trend revealed by these same indicators as reviewed over several months. Last June the cost of living rose more than the average weekly earnings, and since that time the gap between the two has been dramatically widening. Clearly then, any rhetoric on the part of the present government as to the increase in the earning power of Canadians is totally without meaning in the face of this uncontrolled inflation.

The finance minister on many occasions has claimed that in spite of inflation, and in part through his income tax measures, what he calls "real disposable income" has risen by 6 per cent. It is unclear, however, where or how this figure could be obtained. Discounting the effect of tax measures, current income would have to have risen 15 per cent over the past year to compensate for the 9 per cent inflation and to provide a real income increase of 6 per cent. The national accounts show a third-quarter to third-quarter increase in over-all disposable income of 17.29 per cent, but these are aggregate figures, not per capita average figures. Their increase represents for the most part an expansion of the labour force. Therefore, such a statement by the minister is less than honest if it is these figures on which he bases his statement.

Average weekly earnings, which do not take into account either inflation or effective tax rates, from the third quarter of 1972 to the third-quarter of 1973 rose by only 6.8 per cent; inflation over this same period was 8.2 per cent, thus showing a net loss in real income of 1.4 per cent over the year rather than an increase of 6 per cent which the minister has claimed. Because of this loss, I think we can look forward in the next year to widespread labour unrest as the working man tries to boost his sagging wage enough to catch up to the runaway inflation.

For sometime now the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his finance minister have maintained that inflation in Canada is due to international factors and that there is little the Canadian government can do. In fact, the Prime Minister said on December 30, 1973:

> If a government can't cope with self-induced inflation, it deserves to be thrown out.

That is a reference to inflation which comes from factors within Canada. We are getting pretty tired of Liberals saying that nothing can be done about inflation because it is caused by international factors. With that Liberal attitude nothing will be done as long as they are in power.

What then are the real facts? According to expert opinion, 60 per cent of our current inflation of 9.0 per cent is self-induced; it comes from factors within our own country. It should, therefore, be within the competence of our own government to do something about at least that 60 per cent. If that were done it would bring down inflation to within range of the acceptable limit defined by the Economic Council of Canada. International inflation only accounts for a little more than one-third of our total inflation. Furthermore, the domestic or self-induced component of inflation has been escalating continuously since the last quarter of 1970 when the Prime Minister said: "Inflation is licked".

It is obvious that because the government has not been able to hold the line on domestic causes of inflation it is now trying to cover up its own incompetence. At the same time, the Prime Minister said recently in a radio interview that over the next 12 months he cannot see a lowering of the cost of living, which suggests that he and the government are openly admitting that they cannot cope with our inflation problem. In view of these facts the only recourse Canadians have is to follow the advice of the Prime Minister given on December 30, 1973 when he said: "If a government can't cope with self-induced inflation, it deserves to be thrown out".

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Yewchuk: I would be very happy to do so.

Mr. McRae: In view of the fact that an interdepartmental committee of the government of the province of Alberta on the Athabasca tar sands suggested that a plant should not be brought on-stream more rapidly than once every four years, is the hon. member not concerned that the more rapid development of the tar sands he suggests will create serious environmental and social dislocation in the community he represents?

Mr. Yewchuk: I am sorry I did not hear the question. I wonder if the hon. member would mind repeating it.

Mr. McRae: In view of the report of the Alberta government interdepartmental committee on the tar sands which suggested that plants should not be brought on-stream more than once every four years, is the hon. member not concerned that the more rapid development which he seems to suggest as desirable would create environmental and social dislocation in his constituency?

Mr. Yewchuk: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am concerned.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, like those who preceded me in the throne speech debate, I want to congratulate the Governor General and Madame Léger on their assumption of their important roles. I was very impressed with his remarks during the ceremony when he was sworn in, as I thought they were very timely and very profound. He covered many of the basic questions with which we as Canadians must cope. I am confident he will perform his functions as Governor General, with the aid of Madame Léger, in a superb manner, and will represent Her Majesty here in Canada in a way that will be a real credit to all Canadians.

Second, I should like to congratulate the mover and seconder, the hon. members for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) on their very excellent speeches in moving and seconding the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. In addition I should like to congratulate the new Chief Justice of Canada on his appointment. I take particular pleasure in this because of the number of communications I have received from constituents of mine who were deeply impressed with the government's action in appointing this man as the Chief Justice of Canada in view of the great reputation he enjoys as a person concerned about civil rights and other matters of importance to all Canadians.

I was very pleased to be present in this House when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke on leader's day in this debate. Personally, I thought it was one of the finest speeches I ever heard delivered in this House of Commons since I was elected in 1968. I do not say that simply because he is the Prime Minister. I have had the opportunity to say that on numerous occasions before in similar debates but have not chosen to do so. I was deeply impressed with what he said, and particularly the philosophical base he provided for his statement at that particular time.

Before proceeding to make specific remarks in this throne speech debate, I should like to make some comment on what was said by one of the earlier speakers, the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean), whom I hold in great esteem and consider a personal friend. While I was in the House he spent some time talking about the high cost of government expenditures. I have heard a great deal about that from all sides of the House, but I was disappointed that he did not choose to tell us in what areas he would like to see a reduction in expenditures. It is very easy to say that expenditures are too high. Anyone can say that. However, I think it takes some real study to calculate where the reduction should be. Should we be reducing the old age security benefits, the guaranteed income supplement and so on which have an enormous impact on the federal budget? Should we be knocking out the New Horizons Program and the community employment program, and should we not have the escalation provision in our social security programs? I believe that all these things are socially desirable.

Mr. Yewchuk: Start with Information Canada.

Mr. Cafik: I might mention Information Canada, but is that really so significant an expenditure? It amounts to $10 million when we are looking at billions of dollars in respect of social security programs in the last year. I do not think one should attempt to pick out items on which many members might find agreement. We should look at the really substantive issues in respect of which the government is spending large amounts of money.

In order to give an example of the kind of attitude exhibited by some members, perhaps for political purposes, I might refer to the meetings of the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs during the first session of the twenty-ninth Parliament when I was representing my minister, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, as a witness. There was a good deal of discussion concerning whether the adoption of the escalation clause in respect of old age security, family allowances and so on, was in fact fanning the fires of inflation. We discussed this at some considerable length. As I recall it, this subject was brought up by three members of the Conservative Party at one particular meeting. I wanted to know whether, in fact, they were suggesting that these particular social programs should not be subject to escalation. No one wanted to say that. They wanted us to bear the brunt of the criticism by suggesting that the provision for escalation would fan the fires of inflation. I wanted to know whether, in fact, they were willing to put their money where their mouth was and vote against the escalation provision in these social measures, but no one was willing to do so. However, they did try to make the charge that the government was fanning the fire of inflation when in fact they were voting for the very things they were trying to say were so bad.

One other point I should like to make is that the previous speaker, the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), was talking about the rate of inflation, real income and so on. I would be quite happy to speak to him privately later because clearly there seems to be some confusion concerning the real facts. I have no vested interest, political or otherwise, in trying to portray the facts in any particular way other than the way I believe them to be on the basis of the information I receive from Statistics Canada.

On January 11, I embarked on a small research project in respect of this question. I based the figures resulting from my calculations on facts and figures presented by Statistics Canada. They differ from those presented by the hon. member for Athabasca. I am not saying the hon. member is wrong, but clearly either he is wrong or I am wrong in respect of the statistics I shall mention. It would be very interesting, and I believe valuable, to find out which figures are correct. The information I obtained at that time indicated that in 1973 the percentage increase in personal income was 13.8 per cent and that the consumer price index increase was 9.1 per cent, which included all items. As a matter of fact if one were to extract the food items, one would find the increase would be more than 13.8 per cent for 1973. However, in respect of the real personal disposable income per person to which the hon. member referred as being 6 per cent, my investigation indicates that in 1973 there was a growth in personal disposable income of 5.1 per cent. These are Statistics Canada figures. That, of course, is small consolation to those who do not find themselves in that statistical group. We must be careful because clearly a statistician is a person who can make figures lie.

Obviously that statistic is of no consolation to some simply because it happens to be based on the broad average and would not be true in each individual case. There are many groups of which members of parliament would be one, who have had their incomes eroded through a loss of purchasing power. There are others who suffer more seriously and they are very much the concern of all of us. I think the fact is that it is not sufficient to simply say the government has not solved the inflation problem. That could be said about any government in the world. If one looks at the international rates of inflation in 1973, one will find that our rate of 9.1 per cent compares with the rate in Japan of 11.8 per cent, the rate for Australia of 10.5 per cent, the rate for Italy of 11.6 per cent and the United States with a lower figure of 6.2 per cent in 1973. The figure for France is 5.7 per cent. For Germany, it is 7.1 per cent. One hardly need say anything about the United Kingdom in view of all the controversies that have existed in that country within the last few weeks and the severe inflation problems it has had. This does not mean that we cannot do anything about it. However, let us look at what we have done about it.

An hon. Member: Nothing.

[Mr. Cafik.]

Mr. Cafik: If the hon. member thinks that the reduction in the price of bread is nothing, all I can say to him is that he does not know what fighting inflation is all about. If the hon. member for Athabasca says that escalating the old age security pension, the guaranteed income supplement, the family allowances, the veterans allowances and the public service pensions is not an attempt to fight inflation, all I can say to him is that this is the kind of nothing we are very proud of.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question. If the government has done so much to reduce inflation, can he explain why it went up from 5.1 per cent a year ago to 9.1 per cent.

● (1700)

Mr. Cafik: I am sorry; I did not have my earpiece on.

Mr. Yewchuk: I will repeat my question. If the government has done so much to lower the rate of inflation, can the hon. member explain why it has risen from 5.1 per cent a year ago to 9.1 per cent today?

Mr. Cafik: I am talking about steps the government has taken in specific areas to keep down the cost of living. There is no question about this in terms of bread prices; neither is there any doubt about it in terms of milk prices. So far as oil prices are concerned, if the Conservatives had been in power and had allowed the kind of rip-off we have seen by the private sector to increase the price of oil to Canadians, we would be looking at a price which was not too far from 75 cents to $1 a gallon right across Canada.

Mr. Baker: We are being ripped off in oil by your government as well as in everything else.

Mr. Cafik: If hon. members would like to ask questions, I would be prepared to entertain them at the conclusion of my remarks. I am not trying to be partisan; I am simply trying to give hon. members the facts as they really are. It is quite fair for any member to say that the government has not done enough. It is quite fair and reasonable for someone to ask why we didn't do this or didn't do that. But to say that this government has done nothing to offset the effects of inflation is just unadulterated political nonsense. To say we have not done anything to hold down prices in certain specific areas in this country, whereas the fact is that we have taken action to hold down prices, is equally unadulterated political rubbish.

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, aside from the anti-inflation steps I have already indicated, we have adopted a proposal which I think even hon. members opposite would believe to be significant. We have indexed tax exemptions for children, etc., to meet the rise in the cost of living. Since that step has been taken, some 175,000 people have been removed from the tax rolls and the amount of tax paid has been reduced by 6.6 per cent. Certainly that action has done something to offset the consequences of inflation.

The government has also taken steps in a number of other areas which I think are equally well known and to which I alluded earlier. First of all, we have almost tripled family allowances. I think it was high time this was done and it was a step in the right social direction. Certainly it has placed income in the hands of those who are raising children, and this increase in income has more than offset the amount of inflation we experienced during the past year, since the figure now averages $20 per month per child across Canada.

As far as old age security and the guaranteed income supplement are concerned, last year single pensioners had their pensions raised to $183.99 a month. Married couples received, with the guaranteed income supplement, $351.02. Both payments are escalated on a quarterly basis to accommodate the increase in the cost of living. To say that these are not steps in the right direction is to say nothing at all.

I have heard many people talk of the problems confronting those on fixed incomes. We all know these problems exist, but in a very real way now, the number of those on fixed incomes, compared with one year ago, has dropped. By escalating the OAS and GIS payments in line with the cost of living increase, these incomes are no longer fixed but are escalated in line with the real cost of living. That fact ought to be taken into account by anyone who looks at the situation in an objective way.

The throne speech also makes many references to oil policy, agricultural policy, transportation, urban affairs, and so on, and I should like to address myself briefly to a number of these items. First of all, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced the government's oil policy in this House last December 6, if I remember correctly. I strongly applaud the steps that were taken at that time—indeed, the steps taken even prior to that time—so as to make sure that increases in the international price of oil would not accrue to the major oil companies but would in fact be preserved for Canadians. This was done through the action of the federal government in co-operation with the provinces. That was an important step; it made sure these windfall profits generated by the increased demand for oil in the world and by the war in the Middle East were not inherited by the oil companies. I am sure all Canadians would basically agree with that.

I also applaud the decision at that time to build an oil pipeline from the west to the east. At this stage of the game this means from Ontario to Quebec. I, along with many others, advocated the need for an all-Canadian pipeline and I am delighted that the government has announced construction of an interim pipeline along a southern route, with construction of an all-Canadian line over the long term. This is particularly important because I, as a Canadian, am not very comfortable when I realize that an energy-carrying line form the west to the east can have the valve closed, at least theoretically, by Washington. If we are to be independent in name as well as in fact, I think we must make sure we have total security of supply within this country; and I think the decision the government made at that time is consistent with this over-all view regarding the preservation of a Canadian national identity and sovereignty.

I feel very strongly that Canada cannot survive as a nation unless we have what I feel is a very basic requirement in this country, a common market. A common market means that the resources of all the provinces are essentially to be used for the benefit of all Canadians from coast to coast. Thus, I applaud the action the government has taken in the face of enormous criticism from many quarters, particularly on the opposite side of the House, to stand firm for what is Canadian as opposed to what is provincial or local. I think we must stand firm with a national policy to ensure that the resources of this country are used for the benefit of all Canadians.

I also applaud the establishment of a Canadian petroleum corporation. I hope its initial purpose, that of pursuing research and development of the Athabasca tar sands and that sort of thing, will be extended to give us a far greater degree of control over our national resources so that we as Canadians can reap the benefit rather than the multinational oil corporations and private individuals. I think that all Canadians understand that although oil prices need not increase in Canada on the basis of cost increases at the wellhead, in the long run the price of petroleum products in Canada will increase since new technology has to be developed to extract oil from the tar sands.

Many would argue that this means the price of oil in Canada today ought to be increased so as to provide funds for this kind of research. I would not object to that, provided the increase was reasonable and staged and the increased revenue was in fact used toward achieving that goal. However, I object very strongly to this argument being used as an excuse to provide higher incomes to the multinational oil corporations for the production of oil already discovered in this country and which does not cost them one nickel more to produce. I would like Canadians to have an absolutely iron-clad guarantee that the extra benefits oil companies receive are used for the development of new resources in the interests of Canadians, and not in the interests of the multinational oil companies and their investors.

I think the same principle ought to apply, with very strong safeguards, in respect of the tremendous advantages the oil companies and other resource development companies have enjoyed through tax incentives. These special tax privileges must be used to undertake research and development. That would be fair. But if these companies are really using the money that accrues from increased prices and tax incentives for the purposes of development, why cannot we do it through a national corporation? If they do not enjoy a rip-off through this kind of incentive, then they should be as happy as we parliamentarians to see that that money controlled by the government is earmarked, in co-operation with them, for specific purposes rather than going into their treasuries.

I also wish to speak briefly about the emphasis on agriculture which was contained in the Speech from the Throne. Agriculture is essential to our economy. There is not much doubt that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has done a superb job in representing the interests of the farmers. In this area, the matters mentioned in the Speech from the Throne are very important. It says we must provide an adequate supply of food in our own country at reasonable prices both for the consumer and for the producer. Obviously, this is not an easy equation to work out, but in terms of principle it is highly desirable. A large number of steps are outlined to achieve this objective. I want to bring just two or three of them to the attention of the House because I think they are of particular significance.

First, we must improve the availability of manpower for the food production sector of our economy. Anyone representing even a modest agricultural riding knows the great problems being experienced by farmers in securing adequate manpower. It is also important that we provide assistance and financial incentives to young people to enable them to become established in farming. This is a matter of great concern, bearing in mind the average age of our farmers. If this is not done, then severe problems lie ahead not only for Canadians in the long haul but for the world in general. As an agricultural nation we have a tremendous responsibility not only to our own people, to our farmers and consumers, but to consumers throughout the world. Any human being worthy of the name must have deep concern when he sees so many people throughout the world going short of food when we have the capability to provide much of it for them.

I have consistently advocated increased availability of reasonably priced feed grains. The price of feed grains has increased because of international shortages and a number of other factors. This in itself is an enormous item which is reflected in the increased cost of food. I advocate subsidies on feed grains to a significant degree, not only in the interests of consumers but of farmers.

I am also quite pleased that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce was alluded to so prominently in the Speech from the Throne which spoke about aid to small businessmen. These persons are certainly in need of considerable aid. We have many programs now to assist industry in Canada. We are familiar with IADA, PAIT, PEP and others. A number of them provide forgivable loans and other free money for various purposes that are deemed to be in the national interest. I applaud some of those programs. However, the area on which we must concentrate is that of providing capital to business people who need it, at reasonable interest rates without any forgivable feature. Many small business people suffer badly because they cannot get adequate financing. I praise the government for its initiative in talking about a federal development bank. I certainly hope this will provide funds to businessmen at better interest rates than were available through the IDB which it is to replace. This is one of the most fundamental problems in our country today and it must be dealt with quickly.

When speaking about small businessmen, I also wish to mention problems that surround the DREE program. Mr. Speaker, I am not being critical of that program because we all realize the importance of correcting regional disparities; however, it has some offsetting disadvantages in other areas. My riding is situated on the outskirts of Toronto and contains a number of manufacturers who need funds for expansion of their businesses. It would not be in the public interest for them to be squeezed out of business, or to think they are being squeezed out of business, by the application of DREE grants and other incentives to other parts of the country. This creates an enormous dilemma for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) and for parliament, and we must look at it. One way to correct it would be the establishment of a new kind of industrial development bank which would provide loan capital at reasonable interest rates to people outside designated DREE areas who badly need capital.

Now I wish to deal briefly with transportation. There has been a lot of talk about the difficulties between the western provinces and the federal government regarding the oil crisis and how the tax money will be divided. Frankly, I believe a large part of that problem would disappear if, as suggested in the throne speech, we were to introduce realistic freight rates that would end the discrimination which now exists. As a member for an Ontario riding, I have no great reason to say that; but, Mr. Speaker, I have had the good fortune to travel across this country of ours and I have a great deal of concern for the maritimes and for the west. I realize this is a problem for all Canadians and not just for Canadians in the west or in the east.

In what I call the golden horseshoe around the Toronto area there are many people, if not the majority, who feel that we have expanded too fast and too much and that it would be a good thing to decentralize some manufacturing industries to other parts of the country which need them. I subscribe to that view.

● (1720)

I am hopeful, too, that we will take steps toward improving commuter transportation as well as look at the freight rate situation, and will put more emphasis on rail passenger traffic in this country. We need a system which is more efficient, consumes less energy and is more desirable than many other forms of transit that we have at the present time. Rail is part of the answer. I must say, in a negative way, that I have been a little disturbed over the years by people who say that the CPR and the CNR are really outside our control. In my view, parliament controls the regulations and the acts under which these bodies, operate, and if we are not willing to take the kind of steps that need to be taken in the field of transportation, then it is high time something was done about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue, however, if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues. I notice that one of them on the opposite side has his fingers up indicating "two". I do not know whether that is some sort of comment about my speech, or whether he thinks I should have only two minutes. I remember once before giving unanimous consent and finding out that there was no limitation once it had been given. I am not trying to scare hon. members, and I shall try to keep my remarks to a minimum, but I have a few more points to make. As I say, I appreciate the indulgence of the House.

An hon. Member: You are getting better all the time.

Mr. Cafik: Thank you. I thought I would save those negative comments until I needed consent, so that I would get it. I should like to pursue the question of a transportation policy for a moment. I think all hon. members probably realize that I inherited the proposed airport at Pickering which has caused me considerable grief. I recommended, of course, an independent inquiry, which is now sitting on that question. I certainly hope that the inquiry and the Department of Transport bear in mind questions such as the short fuel supply, and so on, and the fact that these are non-renewable resources. I hope they consider the steps we need to take in terms of a future transportation policy in regard to commuter transit over short distances, say within 50 miles of major cities.

I am not saying that such a system would automatically rule out a second airport for Toronto, but it would have a tendency to go in that direction. I am not an expert on whether airports are needed or not, but I think the department and the independent inquiry should bear in mind any new steps taken by the government of Canada toward a transportation policy which might affect the decision which was originally taken and sustained. The independent inquiry would be well advised to take into consideration all the relevant factors on the whole question of transportation which have come to light within the last six or eight months.

There has been some mention of housing and I have a question in respect of that problem. Much to my surprise, there appears to be a rather broad base of agreement on such questions as land banking and providing federal and provincial funds therefor. That seems to be the conventional wisdom today. But I have grave reservations about land banking and the development of "instant" cities. It seems to me that proper development in this country ought to occur around existing communities and should not create instantaneous communities such as the type suggested east of Toronto. An example is the Cedarwood development, which is nothing before it starts and when it is over it will not be very much. In terms of being a social unit it will not provide for the real needs of human beings who want to live close together.

If we are making the mistake of going heavily into land banking, it seems to me we are encouraging the development of large banks of land around the large cities. The cities will take advantage of this, not the smaller communities; therefore we will be providing an incentive to make our large urban areas even larger. That scares me a great deal, Mr. Speaker. I think cities such as Toronto are big enough now. We need expansion around the smaller communities. I think such expansion would solve not only the housing crisis but would have a beneficial effect on the price of land. There should not be large-scale developments concentrated in one area, if this was avoided a much more meaningful kind of human environment would be provided wherein people could live and raise their children. This is basically going into the past, but in the past small communities have provided a great deal. We should be very careful before we destroy that kind of thing for new and novel schemes which may temporarily appeal to many people. We may find that we have made a serious social mistake.

Mr. Baker: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I realize that we gave unanimous consent to the hon. member to continue, and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) did put up his hand with two fingers outstretched. I also realize that there is no limitation once consent is given. But I wonder, through you, sir, if I could ask my hon. friend to terminate his remarks, interesting as they are. There are other hon. members who wish to speak. I wonder if I could ask Your Honour's indulgence.

Mr. Speaker: I tend to disagree with the hon. member's interpretation of the rule; I think there is the right to withdraw consent. I do not believe the fact that the House gave the hon. member consent to continue gives him leave to continue indefinitely. I do not think the hon. member proposes to do that, but if hon. members at this time wish to withdraw their unanimous consent, he would have to yield the floor.

An hon. Member: He is going to say, "In conclusion".

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the indulgence of the House. I thought, from all the smiles on the other side, that hon. members were very much in agreement and wanted me to continue. In conclusion, I very much favour the establishment of a human rights and interests commission as suggested in the Speech from the Throne. I say, too, that I believe if we all work together as parliamentarians rather than as members of a particular party, this second session of the twenty-ninth parliament will be as productive as the last session and of great benefit to all Canadians.

Mr. Alexander: It is up to you.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin, as so many others have, by associating myself with the tributes which have been paid to His Excellency the Governor General, to his lady and also to the newly appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. Also, I should like to pay tribute to Your Honour. It is good to see you back again presiding over this new session with your usual calmness and impartiality. I enjoyed the address just concluded by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik). It was reasonably nonpartisan though it contained a lot of self-applause in its early stages. We agree with much of what the hon. member said, and it is good to see he is changing his views.

On the basis of past experience, I think this Speech from the Throne can be fairly stated not to be a particularly credible document. It reads well, and if we could be certain that what is set out in the document would truly be implemented, we could talk about it in a much more meaningful way. It is interesting to note some of the remarks which are conspicuous in the speech both by their presence and by their absence.

There is no reference, even in an oblique way, to the famous just society which has been so prominently talked about in some past speeches made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I was so interested in the origin of the phrase "the just society" that I thought I would see where it came from. For the record, and if I am wrong I will stand corrected, I believe that those who are interested will find the origin of the phrase in the issue of the New York Times of Thursday, May 4, 1968. The phrase "the just society" should really be attributed to the great Czech patriot, Alexander Dubcek. He is reported to have said in an article by David Binder which was special to the New York Times, datelined Prague, "We are aiming for a truly just society." For the record, that great patriot should be given his due for coining that phrase. In passing, it is fair to say that he faced many more obstacles in establishing the "just society" than did our Prime Minister.

This afternoon the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) said it is unfortunate that a member of parliament, in the few minutes in which he speaks in a throne speech debate, has to cover so many subjects. As he said, our rules make this necessary. May I begin by talking of the energy situation in Canada and particularly about the energy crisis affecting eastern Canada. We in eastern Canada feel let down. Not only is the security of our source of supply of petroleum tenuous, according to reported statements by people in a position to know, but our once prosperous and important coal mining industry has been allowed to deteriorate to the point where it hardly exists.

Since there have been so many references to pipelines, and since so many have been speaking as to who thought of the pipeline and who suggested it, I think it should be pointed out for the sake of the record that paragraph 2 of part VII of the policy document considered at the priorities for Canada conference called by the Conservative Party at Niagara Falls from October 9 to 13, 1969, reads:

> Strengthen the national oil policy by including a pipeline to Montreal to serve a minimum of one-quarter of Quebec needs as a security protection against the interruption of oil supplies from politically unstable areas.

Again, by way of background, let me mention some questions and answers which were raised in this House on May 29, 1970. On that day the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) asked the then minister of energy, mines and resources, Hon. J. J. Greene, the following question as recorded at page 7481 of Hansard for that day:

> Mr. Speaker, would the minister advise the House whether any contingency planning has been carried out to date with respect to eastern Canada's position vis-à-vis our traditional sources of crude oil? Could he also indicate whether the low level of prices we pay for oil in eastern Canada is to be preserved under any planning that has been done?

The minister answered as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, there are no plans at present to change the national oil policy which connotes that oil for the eastern market will be offshore oil. If there is any plan to change the national oil policy from its present course, then of course that would be announced in the House in the normal manner.

Other members asked questions, including the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). One NDP member wondered, in so many words, whether Venezuela was a secure source of supply and whether any change in our oil policy was being considered. The minister said that in view of the very good potential of large quantities of economically priced oil being made available to eastern markets from offshore, consideration was not being given to any change in our national oil policy.

We in eastern Canada feel badly about the government's position and lack of policy. It is in order now for me to request the government earnestly to atone for its singular lack of foresight, and it should press ahead with construction of the pipeline. That construction should be given greater priority than now appears to be the case. Despite the urgency of the problem, I do not see evidence of any truly national commitment for building this pipeline on an emergency or crash basis. I say that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) should accelerate this program and do something meaningful at once, instead of making vague statements as to which route would be more preferable, and for what reason.

Speaking of coal, the government recently indicated that it is interested in allocating funds to Cape Breton Development Corporation to pursue more active research and development in order that we can better utilize the coal in eastern Canada. Our coal should be used for domestic heating and for cooking purposes as well after suitable treatment to remove sulphur. Recently, the Cape Breton Development Corporation displayed a remarkable lack of foresight. Being apparently unable to fill an order, it had to buy a large amount of coal, at great expense, in the United States for coking purposes; then, lo and behold, through inexcusable lack of foresight, large quantities of this coal were found to be unacceptable for the purpose intended.

This type of thing characterizes the poor administration of Devco operations. There has been poor administration and poor maintenance regarding the mines; also poor safety precautions, examples of which have previously been brought to the attention of the House. I will not elaborate on it at this time; will merely say that an uninspired record is shown in research and development, and I am glad to see more money allotted in the estimates for this purpose.

With regard to the environment, there is no commitment in the Speech from the Throne to do anything very meaningful to control conditions in parts of the country where environmental controls are necessary. Not too long ago there was a federal department known as the department of forestry. It has been completely absorbed by the Department of the Environment. Although there may be problems connected with provincial jurisdiction, surely the government knows how desirable it is to encourage provinces to use funds, perhaps made available through ARDA, for more active programs of reforestation. The denuding of forest lands in eastern Canada is causing difficulties with flood control and is bringing about other undesirable side effects. It is time the government seriously encouraged action in respect to reforestation, in conjunction with the provinces.

I always hesitate to mention unemployment insurance since so much has been said about it. Recently I wrote another letter to the minister on this topic. It seems that quite a number of people for one reason or another have been getting more benefits than those to which they were entitled and they are asked to repay the excess, and in some cases all of their benefits. When a person receives unemployment benefits to which he is not entitled, it means that an administrative mistake has been made. When a person in poor circumstances receives a considerable sum of money and then is forced to repay it even if his circumstances have not changed, the result is sad.

However, as in so many other areas, this government does not want to take responsibility for mistakes. I contend—and I say this through you, Mr. Speaker, to the minister—that when through an administrative mistake a person has received a considerable sum of money to which he is not entitled, some penalty should be imposed in order to discourage officials from making that type of mistake again. Nobody in this House suggests that anyone should get something for nothing. Nevertheless, if a person gets money to which he is not entitled, and gets it through no fault of his own, some lesser amount should perhaps be paid back and the difference should be made up in some cases by those who were responsible for the mistake. At one time this sort of thing was done in some financial institutions, and it may still be done. The trouble is that officials do not want to take responsibility under government programs, and the unwilling victim of this situation is often the person who is not responsible for the mistake in the slightest degree.

As far as regional development is concerned, having read the current Speech from the Throne I see no great cause for rejoicing. Lip service is paid to regional development; and that is about all. At one time there was a great priority on this concept proclaimed by the government, on the basis that there was nothing more important to Canadian unity than regional development to relieve disparities in our country. I was particularly interested in listening to the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) speak this afternoon. He made it sound as though everything is ideal in his part of the country, although later in his speech he denied that. I was reminded of what a great Newfoundlander and great Canadian, Joseph R. Smallwood, said in his book "I Chose Canada" on the topic of regional disparity.

I think it is fair to say that not many provincial premiers fought harder for the alleviation of regional disparity than Mr. Smallwood. I think it would be interesting and for the edification of hon. members who have not had time to read Mr. Smallwood's book if I quoted briefly what he said about regional disparity, for this is a very serious matter for Canada, particularly the eastern part of our nation. At page 482, Mr. Smallwood wrote:

> There isn't the slightest doubt that Canada's four Atlantic provinces are still miles and years behind the rest of Canada. These four provinces have made real progress in the last quarter of a century; but the gap today is wider and deeper between them and the rest of Canada than it was before. The Atlantic provinces are farther behind or below the Canadian average than they were 25 years ago. At a federal-provincial conference in Ottawa, I once quoted Abraham Lincoln's dictum that "this nation cannot endure half free and half slave" and said that Canada could not be the great, harmonious, and happy nation we wanted it to be while nearly half the provinces were lagging badly behind the others, and the discrepancy was becoming more acute all the time.

I will not quote from this excerpt at great length. Mr. Smallwood went on to say:

> Mention the idea of the underdeveloped provinces being permitted easier credit in times of tight money, and a look of distaste comes over Ottawa's face. Mention the idea of tax-free bonds for the underdeveloped provinces, and Ottawa's only answer is a palpable inaccuracy—namely, that in the United States, where that financial device is so widely used, it is going out of fashion. Let an underdeveloped province make use of the Crown corporation technique to get development, and all hell breaks loose. The policy of reducing so-called regional disparity boils down, in the end, to a half-hearted willingness to dole out money for road paving, water and sewer systems, schools, and hospitals.

He continues:

> —with the exception of a few brave souls, nobody in Ottawa has the slightest belief in the likelihood, or even the possibility, of the four Atlantic provinces ever being much more than mere markets or colonies for the rest of Canada. They won't admit this; they'll deny it with vehemence, sarcasm, wit, indignation, and in a variety of other ways, for of course they can't possibly admit it—except in action.

He concludes this particular chapter by saying:

> Some day there may come to Canada a government that will brush aside all weasel thoughts of the Atlantic provinces as Canada's poorhouse; one that will attack the problem with nerve, employing for an experimental period of ten or twenty years the devices that have been condemned in the past, and others that it will think up, to get these four provinces 30 or 40 years ahead in the space of a decade or two.

Based on the performance of this government, we can be sure of one thing: it certainly will not be the one to take those steps. I commend those words of the former premier of Newfoundland to the present minister of regional development.

There is some mention about fishing in the Speech from the Throne with which we are dealing today. I note with interest that it states the government will wish to consult with provincial governments, consumer groups and producers. Once again I ask members to forgive me if I appear a bit skeptical as to the government's intentions, because at a political meeting in Nova Scotia last night the minister of fisheries for the province of Nova Scotia admitted that many regulations had been made regarding the fishing industry and "imposed without fishermen having an opportunity to express their feelings."

We have seen many examples of lack of co-operation between federal and provincial governments insofar as fishing is concerned. Although some members opposite may not believe this to be true unless they have had the experience, I can assure them that as far as Nova Scotia is concerned, there was a great deal of backing, filling and attempting to evade responsibility before the fishermen in Atlantic Canada whose industry had been grievously damaged last June got any payment at all for their losses. The minister first said he was consulting with his provincial colleague. i was then told it was in the hands of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). When members from all sides of the House pressed the fishermen's claim, it was still many months before any payment was made.

It is high time there was a little co-operation between the federal and provincial departments of fisheries. When you look at the past history, it is easy to see why even new members like myself are disillusioned with the credibility of a document such as this, after having read some of its predecessors and experienced some of the practical effects of what was not done to implement speeches from the throne in recent years.

As the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) knows has said so well, there is certainly a great need for assistance in the fishing industry of this country. The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador asserted that the present policy of extending the limits of Canada as far as jurisdiction over fisheries is concerned is a Liberal policy. It is obvious to those who have gone into the past history that that statement is as palpably inaccurate, as this government now trying to take credit for the idea of putting the oil pipeline through to Montreal. The record should be put straight on this particular point as well.

As far as finance is concerned, there are many more learned members than I who have given discourses on the subject. I do not intend to repeat what they have said better than I could. However, one thing that is indicative of the government's lack of commitment to do anything tangible in the field of finance on the domestic scene is the continuing neglect of the Minister of Finance of what should be a routine housekeeping measure, setting a very bad precedent—to rest. We in this country have a bond issue of some $50 million that was issued in 1936. It is known colloquially as the perpetuals. These are Canada Savings Bonds that were bought by Canadians in good faith many years ago. Today they are selling at ridiculously low prices because the sky-rocketing interest rate, on present-day Canada Savings Bonds has made their return so negligible that nobody wants them. These bonds are selling on the open market for about $35 or $40. The Minister of Finance has been approached by many members, including myself, and requested to do something about this situation,

I think it is disgusting for bonds of a nation like Canada to be kicking around the financial markets of this country like orphans, selling for less than half their face value. Many members have approached the minister about this matter and I know he has given it some thought. He said the government is a little puzzled about what it should do. It does not want to see windfall profits made: it does not want to do anything unfair. Well, Mr. Speaker, windfall profits are made and money is lost on the market every day. Any government so insensitive toward bringing in a selective capital gains tax to protect people from being hurt by it, which tax was never really designed to apply to them, should not worry too much about a little windfall gain for some people who bought their country's savings bonds years ago in good faith. Perhaps the minister should raise the interest rate on the bonds current rates and raise the rate of return.

I am sure the serial numbers of these bonds are on record. Perhaps the minister could say that if anyone held these bonds and could prove ownership for five or ten years, they could be redeemed at face value. This would be an equitable solution for some. After all, this is no more than is possible with respect to the current bond issue regarding redemption, I find it almost ludicrous that the Minister of Finance, who is responsible for a highly complex portfolio and who is no doubt a very capable minister—I am not denigrating or denying his capability—cannot find a way to redeem these bonds. After all, he is a spokesman for Canada at complex negotiations such as those conducted under the International Monetary Fund, and I think this is as good a time as any to put this request forward on behalf of many Canadians who are being hurt by the government's lack of action.

Perhaps I might take a minute in which to urge the Minister of Finance to do something else, too. I think it is time he considered varying the present unimaginative capital gains tax. Other nations which impose such a tax and have done so for some years have found it possible to make interesting variations designed to take the sting out of the tax in cases where it was not really meant to apply. I fail to see why a man who has systematically purchased securities over the years, for example to provide for his retirement or for the education of his children, or a man who has bought securities through a payroll deduction plan and has retained them for years, should be taxed when he sells them on the same basis as one who habitually deals in the stock market.

[Mr. MacKay.]

I fail to see why the minister, if he sincerely wishes to give ordinary Canadians a break, especially when they are trying to provide for worthwhile projects in their future, cannot put together a workable scheme to vary capital gains on sales of securities and make the tax more flexible. Perhaps he could say that up to a certain sum, maybe $20,000, a Canadian who purchased securities in Canadian companies and retained them for five years, or ten years, would not be subject to the same type of capital gains tax when he sold them as, say, a financier who on the basis of his intuition or some inside information bought a thousand shares of Cominco or Imperial Oil and made a few thousand dollars in two or three weeks.

As the hon. member for Ontario has said, there is much to be done in the field of transportation. I would say to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) that it is time the government addressed itself seriously to some of these long-standing problems. It is not that the problems are not known. They are. Indeed, the solutions are known in many cases. It is just that the government has been too timid or too preoccupied or too lazy to act. For example, two years ago the then minister of transport said he was going to make sweeping legislative changes. He did nothing. What would be wrong about severing the association of Air Canada with the Canadian National Railways' system? Ministers have themselves agreed that this is a good idea in principle, but nothing has been done about it.

What would be wrong about reconsidering part III of the National Transportation Act and setting up a system designed to cope with the requirements of motor carriers across the nation, perhaps an interprovincial trucking board? What would be wrong about establishing a separate Crown corporation to handle ferry services to our island provinces? What would be wrong about considering the staggering of labour contracts affecting our major transportation systems so that all the contracts would not expire at the same time, paralysing the nation and effectively destroying the normal collective bargaining process? There are all sorts of innovative and common sense things which could be done to improve our transportation system. We could improve passenger facilities, for example, or get on with a program of electrification of the CNR and improve the roadbeds. As I say, there are many things which could be done, but they can only be achieved if the government is sincere in wanting to see them accomplished.

I return now to the theme with which I began. How can we in the opposition really take the Speech from the Throne seriously? We have heard of the little boy who cried "wolf" too often. The government and its supporters are apparently sincere. They say they have a constructive program, and they ask for our co-operation. They may be sincere, but on the basis of past experience we can hardly be blamed for being skeptical. There is no doubt the government is worried about inflation, and well it might be because inflation is the number one topic which disturbs Canadians today. It is robbing us all. I find it very strange, when I look back over the statements the Prime Minister has made—I sometimes try to ascribe some credibility to him and to his government and see statements such as appeared in the Ottawa Journal on December 24, 1971, as reported by the Canadian Press: "Prime Minister Trudeau said flatly Wednesday that inflation no longer exists in Canada." That has to be one of the great statements of all time. That was about the same time he told us there had been a fantastic breakthrough with President Nixon. Needless to say, neither of these particular predictions came true, and now in fact we hear reports that the United States congress is considering strong retaliatory measures of the type taken against Michelin Tire of Nova Scotia, against Canada and other nations which give too great a measure of assistance to certain of their exporting industries. Some breakthrough!

If inflation were an abstract, philosophical topic or a metaphysical phenomenon, the country could afford a comment of this type from the Prime Minister. We could debate it philosophically and marvel at the logic, convoluted or otherwise, that it reflected. But, instead, it is a very vital issue, one which hurts us all, and until the government does something meaningful about it we can only remain skeptical. The hon. member for Ontario said, in effect, "What's $10 million." Information Canada costs $10 million. That is picayune. What about the $600 million the government has spent in the last fiscal year on consultants? That, I suggest, is hardly picayune. That might be a good place at which to start reducing some of the waste in government.

I see it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I conclude my remarks by simply saying that if people could be sure the government really meant to do something about the ills which trouble the country, if they could be sure it would be forthcoming with quick, constructive decisions, they would certainly give the current Speech from the Throne the support which perhaps it should receive on the face of it. We in the opposition shall watch very carefully in the weeks ahead to see whether, just for once, the government is sincere. If it is, it will certainly receive constructive co-operation from this side of the House.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, we are now beginning the second session of the twenty-ninth parliament. Everything here interests me enormously. This new task and the active involvement in the satisfaction of my fellow citizens in this highest of Canadian institutions, the federal Parliament, hold great interest for me.

I shared with my constituents from Rimouski a deep feeling of pride when I heard the Speech from the Throne on March 6, given by the Governor General Mr. Jules Léger in the presence of Mrs. Léger, the honourable senators, the ministers, the members of Parliament and their wives, as well as many Canadians from all parts of the country. This ceremony was also carried on the French and English television networks.

I would like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne (MM. Stollery and Pelletier) who acquitted themselves admirably of their difficult task by defending the position of the present government as well as the situation of the people who still live without the advantages to which they are entitled in Canada in 1974, while those among their fellow citizens who are more fortunate, benefit fully from the natural, cultural and spiritual resources provided bountifully by the Providence and made available, through the talent and work of the adult population of Canada, to all Canadian consumers.

However, I should like to point out that they have only begun their work in this field and that it is up to us, as members of this House, to continue and complete the task of distributing more equitably our unlimited resources among all our full-fledged citizens without exception, by introducing timely legislation during this session. I would like this session to be consumer instead of producer oriented as was the case in previous sessions.

There are no poor here, only Canadians deprived of their natural and providential rights, of their individual and universal rights, officially recognized in the International Declaration of Rights signed by the United Nations on December 10, 1948, three years after the Second World War armistice, as well as in the Canadian Bill of Rights voted unanimously by the Parliament of Canada and signed on August 10, 1960.

Why then must we keep on talking of inflation, unemployment, poverty in a country as rich and fertile as Canada, when in 1973 our gross production totalled $114 billion, which means $5,000 per capita and readily proves that the national production is not lacking; but the hitch is in the distribution of goods and services among all consuming citizens, whether producers or dependents.

In trying to clarify some points, Mr. Speaker, after attending a complete session of this Parliament and as one of the new members relected on October 30, 1972, sitting among members reelected once or more, I cannot but thank all members and ministers for their benevolent attitude towards myself and for the attention that I have been favoured with.

For these reasons, I do not wish to offend anyone without reason, feeling the obligation, under the circumstances, of making a detailed report of my observations over the past 15 months, particularly concerning the financial system in Canada, the monetary system, the administrative system, we could say that the whole capitalist system but chiefly the monetary system; I have been elected under the label of the Social Credit Party of Canada and I am proud of that perfectly conscious and grateful.

● (2010)

As I said and I want to emphasize it again, what I learned when I met with teachers and proponents of Social Credit helped me—understand the values and—methods of the capitalist system, the socialist system and even the communist sytem. Of all those systems, I prefer the capitalist system even with its defects and shortcomings. I am convinced that it is the best to satisfy people who insist on the quality of life, the respect for other people, the scale of values, and the value of a human being.

If I could sum up in a word my true position here after one session in Parliament, I would say that I am today a capitalist Social Crediter. We must realize that those two words are not inconsistent but they are complementary. One can be a Social Crediter and remain capitalist, or capitalist and remain a Social Crediter.

Mr. Speaker, if I have astonished or surprised many members here, particularly members from older parties, I must give them some satisfying explanations, and I have a magnificent opportunity to do so by using reports published in the Canada Gazette on December 8, 1973, on the great results obtained by ten Canadian banks which are the core of the whole economic life in Canada in its financial relations with all countries in the world.

We are tied to all the other nations of the world not only by oil but also and more so by money. Oil and money could bring disagreements between peoples but also they are the cause of relations between citizens and peoples.

If the Progressive conservatives want to defeat this government on the oil issue, I would like to support and maintain the government on the question of money, finance, capitalism, simply asking that this government take immediate action to remove from the capitalistic system, from the banking and financial system, the deficiencies and the shortcomings which still prevent them it from having the whole people take part in the production they can provide us with.

And it is here, Mr. Speaker, that our knowledge of the Social Credit can be useful to the reformation and the improvement of the social capital because, on the whole, credit is only an extension of capital. When there is enough capital, there is no need for credit. If social capital completely suited everyone, we would not need the Social Credit because all citizens would have social capital in proportion to their needs, desires and ability to enjoy it.

Does not social capital itself depend from social work? Are we not all made to live in society? In social life, work and capital are necessary. We must thus all be capitalists, in fact or in wish. Everybody wants to be a capitalist, that is to say to possess something, to have a lot, a house, a business, furniture, a car, instruction, a good character, friends, a family etc. But it is all this that makes one a capitalist, to have the freedom to choose between the things which we fell necessary, useful or pleasant in life. But we need money today to buy these things. We need money even to buy oil. What is true of the difficulties between countries is also true of the difficulties between the citizens of each country.

Oil and money are necessary everywhere. Thus, I want this government to solve the problem of oil. I also want them to solve the problem of money. If the Progressive Conservatives want to defeat this government because of the oil problem, I want to keep it in office because of money problems. And money problems can be solved here in the Parliament of Canada immediately among ourselves according to our legislative powers. Our oil problems depend for a large part on foreign countries. So if we want to solve anything it is becoming pressing to solve first things which depend on us, which are within our immediate power—the money problems. If there is an oil shortage there is plenty of money. There is usually never any shortage of money but even if there is one somewhere it is because there is overabundance elsewhere in this country. There is generally plenty of money, so let the Progressive Conservatives instead of trying to defeat the government on an oil issue, keep it on the issue of the abundance of money and its better distribution among all Canadians who are full-fledged citizens who must have guaranteed personal incomes either through their work, their capital or their personal vital rights. That is the first requirement of any democratic capitalist system which takes the people into account in its monetary, economic and political administration. That is the essence of our requirements, Mr. Speaker.

A good capitalist system includes not only big banks, companies, or national or multinational corporations. A good capitalist system needs all consumers, all workers, all capitalists, all university graduates wherever they may exercise their talent, their science and their competence.

So our capitalist system must be brought up-to-date in view of the benefits it can produce as illustrated in the last reports on the ten chartered banks as of October 21 last and published in the Canada Gazette on December 8, 1973. I am not making up those figures. I am not trying to mislead or lure anyone. I take those figures in reports most trusted by this government.

So, on October 31, 1973, our ten banks increased their assets by $14.4 billion, to the terrific sum of $75 billion, and they started with a sum of $60.6 billion on October 31, 1972. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, there is a spectacular increase of $14.4 billion over 12 months for ten Canadian banks. To put this phenomenal increase in the right perspective, in a year when all Canadians suffered from inflation, unemployment and poverty, when our governments repeatedly have to borrow and incur deficits in their administration, it is important to note that these increases were only $6 billion since the introduction of the 1967 Bank Act. But in 1973, there is an increase of $14.4 billion, that is to say 228 per cent more than last year. To better evaluate the impact of this important factor on Canadian finance, it is essential to know that in 1967, the banks' assets amounted to $30 billion in round figures, that is after 100 years, and 33 years after the creation of the Bank of Canada. But in six years, these assets have gone up from $30 to $60 billion, an increase of two and a half times.

I hope I have been well understood. I hope I shall not have to make that point again when I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) whether if he has found a magic wand or an alchemic formula to balance his budget, that of other families in the Rimouski constituency and throughout Canada, when I ask him to provide a guaranteed personal income to all dependents, unemployed and penniless, on the basis of their vital right.

I also hope that I will not have to bring up again the ticklish issue of the tremendous power of banks and multinational corporations, when I ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) to equalize incomes, expenditures, taxes and reserves among consumers, producers and corporations, when I also ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) to treat ordinary people as fairly as professionals, unions and corporations, to do justice to labour as well as to management and to better balance their incomes.

In short, Mr. Speaker, let us not forget that if there is a shortage of oil somewhere, there is a great supply of money which is not properly distributed among all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne deals so much with inflation, unemployment and poverty in Canada in 1973 and 1974, let us not forget that all those symptoms reveal the national economic imbalance between magnificent production, defective consumption and extravagant capitalization, since in 1973, out of a $114 billion production, only $66 billion are earmarked for consumption, $48 billion for capitalization for the years to come, including $8 billion to be capitalized by individuals and $40 billion by private and public corporations.

Let us not forget that such an awkward distribution of a magnificent national production is the result of a legislation imposed by the only government in Canada, for it is the only government having the power to regulate trade and commerce, any mode or system of taxation, currency and coinage, bank laws and the issue of paper money as well as the interest on money, according to section 91 of the British North American Act, according to our present constitution.

Let us face up to things without trying to blame the past or criticize anybody. Let everyone assume his own responsabilities without forgetting especially the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), the most scholarly of us all, the most able to know the importance of the altogether simple and universal management method, according to which income includes expenses and profits; a method as necessary to the smallest consumer as to the Royal Bank of Canada whose current assets of $18.366 billion increased by $3.6 billion in a single taxation year, namely 1972-73.

I also wish that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), who distributes family allowance cheques for the smallest children in Canada and the biggest cheque of the Prime Minister, would realize that there is no lack of money in this country when it comes to guaranteeing every dependent his minimum living wage, his individual guaranteed income, in direct relation with the national production of the current year, that will be over $5,000 per capita in 1974, or an average of $28,000 for a family of five.

I also wish, Mr. Speaker, that each member would think over the words that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said on July 1, 1973, Confederation Day, where he stated proudly and I quote:

> The best part of our constitution stems perhaps from our set of values which puts in the first place the quality of life and gives such importance to the individual, where everyone can develop while respecting the characteristics of other people.

To conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I shall summarize them as briefly as possible and insist with the Prime Minister on our set of values, respect for other people and the value of human dignity, as we keep on supporting our banks and corporations which can certainly produce and capitalize as they have demonstratd this year in an extraordinary way.

In view of the oil shortage, we are all convinced that we have money in quantities in all its forms and that money shortage is only artificial, temporary and casual, and that we are in a position to solve the problem immediately through the passage of legislation, as soon as we are ready to open our eyes on the real values of our Canadian democratic capitalistic system, by correcting immediately its defects and filling its gaps that threaten in the long run to make it lose its natural beauty. Therefore, we must simply proceed to a better distribution of what we are producing between all of us.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I speak of the respect we owe one another, in this House. Far too often, unhappily, we, in the Social Credit party, are ignored in our claims and are laughed at because of widespread prejudice. I would like you to know that all the Social Credit knowledge only helps us to better understand capitalism without recommending its destruction, on the contrary. As far as I am concerned, when I rise in this House, let us all be assured that I place myself in the atmosphere of the capitalist system in which we are living, working and paying taxes, while we see large banks and companies being granted substantial privileges, through our legislation, which even causes inflation, unemployment and poverty that we would be able to control as soon as we decide to do so, since our government have favoured or tolerated poverty, unemployment and inflation through technical measures. This Government will re-establish the national economic balance between individuals, families and companies through contrary technical measures and not thanks to an election or a threat of election.

If we are the higher institution in Canada, we must assume all our responsibilities and prove as a good administration in the balance and harmony of all the components of Canada.

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks, I wish to congratulate my two colleagues, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier), the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. They dealt with very important matters on various levels.

Mr. Speaker, the criticism made following the reading of the Speech from the Throne was the same as always, too many generalities, too many omissions, etc.

The Speech from the Throne is a document that stresses the points on which the government intends to legislate during the present session, but some events like the energy crisis during the last session may require bringing other pieces of legislation before Parliament.

But usually, as the session goes on, the legislative program set forth in the Speech from the Throne is brought before Parliament, amended in certain cases and finally passed. The speech read by the Governor General on February 27 deals with several economic, social and scientific matters, such as the energy crisis, inflation, means designed to offset its consequences and ensure supplies to consumers at reasonable prices in the near and distant future.

So it is proposed to help small and medium-sized businesses, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Canada Pension Plan. First, I would like to deal with inflation which has spared no country in 1973. Several factors have caused the increase in prices, like bad crops, the growth of world population and, in many parts of the world, the shortage of food, changes in eating habits, the strong economic growth in several industrial countries like Canada, which actual growth rate was the highest in the last 17 years, have experienced in 1973 which has brought about a shortage of basic materials and food, the decrease of oil exports by some producing countries and price increases.

All these cases I just outlined have bad effects on food prices, materials and products involved in industrial processing and the building trade. In order to alleviate these effects, the federal government chose selective measures and continues to do so. Inflation strikes everybody, but particularly large families, people on average or fixed income as well as a large number of retired persons.

That is why we have seen the federal government pay subsidies to limit price increases of various items, such as bread, milk, heating oil, gasoline and other oil products, amend tariffs to allow greater imports of fruits and vegetables, increase old age pensions and the guaranted income supplement, increase family allowances gearing them to the cost of living. The sales tax on children's clothing has been removed and the personal income tax geared to the cost of living.

In the Speech from the Throne, the government announces its intention of taking steps to increase food production; I hope it will do the same with regard to industrial products and thus reduce the pressure on prices.

The official opposition prefers an overall price and salary freeze for a period of 90 days. It is not very clear about what steps would follow. Recently, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) suggested, also to counter inflation, doing away with the sales tax on building materials and clothing.

With regard to the tax on building materials, he did not specify what measures would make up the reduction in income that would amount to about $500 million. Some may say that government expenditures will be cut down; Mr. Speaker, that reminds me of the experience with the conservative government: from May 1957 to 1963 they made the same promise. What was the result? An annual increase in expenditures.

The progressive conservative party might perhaps want to increase personal income taxes to make up the shortage. Who knows?

Mr. Speaker, we are aware of the experience of the United States and the United Kingdon in the area of price and wage controls which, following completion of Phase IV of the program, resulted in an exhaustion of supply sources and the spiralling of prices in the United States.

Here is what the policy of the Progressive Conservative Party was on inflation, as reported in the March 1, 1974 issue of the Montreal Gazette by Mr. John Meyer, the former financial critic with this newspaper, and I quote:

[Mr. Clermont.]

[English]

The Conservatives, predictably, have persisted in their argument for controls—surely an anomolous position for the party bearing the name it does to be in. They have been making that argument for so long, and with such indifference to the experience of other countries where controls have been used, that it has begun to threaten their credibility as an alternative to both the Liberals and the New Democrats.

Their persistence is curious in view of the number of senior members of the party with business and financial backgrounds, both practical and academic. There was, and still may be although with clearly reduced force, an argument for controls on strictly political grounds. Controls would be evidence of a government's determination to explore every means of containing inflation and some stability in prices might even be achieved over the short run.

But as the definition and scope of inflation has become clearer, and its source largely found to lie in the inability of production to keep abreast of demand, controls can now be seen more likely to prolong and intensify inflation than to contain it. That is what is happening in the U.S. where continuing shortages of both basic commodities and finished products are directly attributable to the inability of producers to adequately cover their costs.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the labour and industrial sectors will not generally support a global policy of price controls, no matter their duration. Some quarters consider that the present state of inflation is attributable to the growth of spending by the various levels of government, and of the money supply. Under these circumstances, in view of the problems resulting from the energy crisis, I feel it would be a gross lack of responsibility to minimize them, since it may happen that because of the increase in the price of oil, which tripled within the past six months, some of our trading partners may face serious problems as far as their balance of payments is concerned. This could result in a very considerable decrease in their economic growth, and we are aware of the impact of our exports on our economy.

The results of a recent survey indicated that the biggest problem for many Canadians is that of energy. It will be recalled that in June 1973, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources published a paper on energy in Canada. Among other things, the study analyzed energy supply and demand in Canada and many measures that could be implemented. It was then proven that they were most timely, following what happened in the fall of 1973 when some producing countries cut back their crude oil exports and greatly increased prices. At that time, two major problems came up, that of supply and that of prices which Canadian consumers would have to pay.

As far as supplies are concerned, we know that Canada was divided in two ever since 1961 by a line known as the Ottawa Valley or Borden Line. West of this line, oil was mainly shipped from western Canada by pipeline. Consumers east of the line were supplied mainly by cheaper oil imported from a number of producing countries in the middle East and Venezuela. In this case, means of transportation had to be provided without delay in order to ensure a constant flow of oil in this part of the country.

On September 4 and December 6, 1973, the Prime Minister of Canada advised the House of the action the government would take to deal with this difficult situation. On September 4, 1973, he announced the following steps:

1. The oil industry will be asked to refrain from making further price increases affecting Canadian consumers before January 30, 1974. This price restraint would apply except where, to the satisfaction of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), the increase in the cost of imported crude oil warrants a Canadian price increase.

2. The government intends to seek a control mechanism whereby higher prices in the U.S. market would not automatically increase prices at home in Canada.

3. The government will also hold early consultations with provinces and industry on the extension of pipeline facilities so as to enable Canadian oil to be shipped into Montreal. At a time of rapidly escalating international prices, this would put Canadian oil into competition with international oil and would give additional security against international disruption of supply.

In the meantime, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, with the co-operation of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), was setting up additional means of transportation to provide adequate supplies to the residents of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, either through the re-opening of the pipeline between Toronto and Ottawa which had been closed in 1962 or through the St. Lawrence Seaway from Sarnia to Montreal, until the closing of the latter, or by rail, truck or tanker from Vancouver to Montreal, the latter going through the Panama Canal. In December 1973, the Prime Minister announced further measures such as:

1. The creation of a unique national market, the effect of which will be to abolish the "Borden Line" or "the Ottawa Valley Line".

2. A pricing mechanism to provide sufficient incentives for the development of oil resources.

3. Measures to ensure that any escalation in returns and revenues as a result of any higher prices will be used in a manner conducive to security and self-sufficiency.

4. The early completion of a pipeline of adequate capacity to serve Montreal and, as required, more eastern points.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government recently announced the extension of the pipeline between Sarnia and Montreal, the construction of a second pipeline on Canadian soil, namely between Winnipeg and Montreal.

In January 1974, Parliament passed the emergency legislation on energy supplies.

As far as prices are concerned, consumers east of the Ottawa Valley Line have to pay a little more for their oil products. But following the Energy Conference held in Ottawa on January 22nd and 23rd at which the Federal government and the provinces agreed to hold a voluntary temporary price freeze on oil coming from Saskatchewan and Alberta, assurances were secured that the Federal government would protect the five Eastern provinces which have to rely on off-shore oil against the substantial increases they would have to face after February 1st, 1974.

The Federal government then agreed to maintain the price differential and assured Eastern residents that their prices would not increase on February 1st and that at the end of the voluntary freeze period in two months time prices would be even across the country, with allowances for freight costs. Then the Federal government will make substantial grants available to Eastern provinces so that costly off-shore oil will fall back to the same price as cheaper Western oil. The Federal government has resumed its talks with the oil producing provinces with a view to reaching by March 31, 1974 a consensus that will benefit all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, on August 3, 1973, the Federal government announced a new feed grains policy to be implemented in two stages. The first would be a concrete program for 1973-74 dealing with price parity between Eastern and Western Canada, and adequate supplies during the winter months. With respect to supplies, due to various circumstances, feed stocks in the province of Quebec in this period are far from being adequate, and I seriously wonder if groups and organizations would not be interested in seeing that program fail. We know that when that program was announced there were rather violent reactions to such a project. I urge the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) as well as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to make sure of that.

In another sector of agriculture, the Canadian Federation of milk producers has submitted to the federal government a series of requests to ensure these producers the incomes required to supply Canadian consumers with the dairy products they need, and a fair return for their work, their investments and their management skills. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the cabinet will seriously consider these requests and that the Minister of Agriculture, when he announces the government dairy policy for 1974-75, will also announce a substantial increase for industrial milk producers.

In going through the main estimates for the fiscal year ending on March 31, 1975, I note, in the estimates of the National Capital Commission, that an amount of $8 million will be spent on phase 2 of the highway network development in the national capital area north of the Ottawa river, that a further amount of $3,500,000 will be spent on sewers and $500,000 on public transportation.

The first two amounts are part of the comprehensive plan that the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada and the Minister of Transport had announced in 1969 and which will be carried out across the Ottawa river in the next 25 years.

As you remember, a general agreement on the improvement of the highway network on the Quebec side of the national capital area was reached on January 7, 1972, between the province of Quebec and the federal government, listing several projects to be carried out over a few years, such as the building of a bridge over the Gatineau river, the widening of Gréber Blvd. from Maloney Blvd. in Gatineau to Archambault Blvd. in Gatineau Point, and the development of a limited access expressway from highway 8 in a south-west direction to the Gatineau river, as well as expressway A50 from Aylmer to Masson.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the parties who are negotiating the construction of this highway between the bridge on the Gatineau River, presently known as the "Pont des Draveurs", and Highway A5, to get this project under way soon so that the people living east of Pointe-Gatineau who have to go to Hull and Ottawa can use it and relieve the traffic on Gréber Boulevard at peak hours.

Regarding the $500,000 contribution for public transport, it is to be linked with the agreement reached last fall between different government levels and agencies to eliminate the traditional double fare applicable between Ottawa and Hull.

For many years now, the members of Parliament representing the Quebec part of the Ottawa region have asked for this measure, which has now taken the form of a $500,000 contribution from the National Capital Commission, made in the name of the federal government. The fact that there is now a transport commission on both sides of the Ottawa River probably helped to reach such an agreement.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the throne speech which we are now debating is conspicuous more for what it does not say than for what it does. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has described it as a matter of fact document. This is synonymous with saying that it is prosaic, ponderous, pretentious; in fact, dull. It lacks imagination, compassion, identifiable objectives. It is, however, a true reflection of the government which presented it—stolid, complacent, self-satisfied, even sanctimonious; much like the Pharisee who looked at others in their misery and thanked God that he was not as they. That attitude on the part of the Liberals opposite, Mr. Speaker, is the cause of much of the malaise in this country today.

We are saddled with a government that lacks daring, innovation, imagination; a government that lags along day after day in the same old rut, lacking the will to fight the problems that beset millions of Canadians, afraid to depart from the well-worn practices of a bygone era and come up with some contemporary policies; a government that was old the day it was born.

It makes parliament watchers wonder whatever happened to such spirited individuals as Walter Gordon, Judy LaMarsh and Joe Greene with their free-wheeling ideas—individuals whom the Liberal Party used to encourage. One is left with the distinct impression that cabinet solidarity today means thinking alike, acting alike, doing nothing to upset the uniformity and sameness which characterizes this government.

Mr. Sharp: You are much too optimistic.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the government lacks leadership which is responsive and sensitive to the needs of the country, and that lack is sadly reflected in the Speech from the Throne.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Canadians today are beset by fears of inflation and the spiralling cost of living. For thousands upon thousands on fixed incomes, their weekly shopping is an agony to be endured as the purchasing power of their dollar goes steadily downward. There is no relief in sight, certainly not in this throne speech, for the escalating costs of bread, milk, sugar, meat—the staples; no relief in sight for the thousands of would-be home owners for whom the cost of purchasing a house is prohibitive. Nothing in this speech indicates that the government is concerned with preventive health plans. Instead, the government adds to the worries of millions of Canadians by reducing the rate of funding available to the Medical Research Council from a 5.4 per cent annual increase to 2.5 per cent for 1974-75.

Under Liberal management, the prolonged scientific and medical struggle to combat cancer, heart disease, multiple sclerosis, genetic defects—all diseases—is downgraded. Senior medical researchers are being denied the funding they so grievously require. Some of our most talented scientists will be forced to leave Canada to continue their research in countries whose governments place a much higher premium on health protection. It is a sad commentary on the Liberal government that it sees fit to spend $100 per capita on unemployment insurance, but a mere $2 per capita on medical research. It is ludicrous to think that this government can spend $2 billion annually for unemployment insurance and only $40 million next year for medical research. Surely Canadians have a right and a duty to demand that government priorities and spending are brought into line with reality.

Mr. Speaker, reference to Canada's native peoples is almost non-existent in this throne speech. This cannot be attributed merely to the oversight of one minister but, rather, to the collective decision of an entire cabinet. Brief reference is made to rural and native housing programs. We shall have to await legislation for details, but I trust these programs will apply to native housing both on and off the reserves. Over 80 per cent of current native housing is substandard, and the rate of housing starts for native people has been running at half the rate of that for other Canadians. I trust the new legislation is designed to eliminate both these inequities and to eliminate the hardships in settlements such as Fort Rae, where 1,000 natives live in small wooden homes at temperatures sometimes of 60 degrees to 70 degrees below zero, homes heated primarily by wood stoves, homes without running water and indoor facilities. And there are many native communities such as Fort Rae across Canada.

There is nothing in the throne speech to indicate that the government is prepared to recognize and accept the principle of aboriginal rights; nothing to show that a native communications policy which will provide for continuing dialogue in their own languages is in the offing; nothing to indicate that the government is willing to meet its commitment to provide funding to Indian organizations so that the Indian Act can be revised by and for Indians, both male and female. I trust the minister will be making positive statements in all these areas in the near future.

The throne speech does make specific mention of guaranteed loans and other forms of assistance to both farmers and fishermen to assist them in purchasing or modernizing their equipment; incentives to increase Canada's catch of unexploited stocks of fish; and assistance to young farmers to provide sufficient financial incentives for them to establish themselves in farming. We will insist that these programs will apply, without question, to native people both on and off reserves and that the government will not try to fob-off requests from Indian bands for assistance under these new proposals by referring them to the ill-conceived, poorly administered, highly restrictive economic development loan fund which they now have to cope with.

The native people, Mr. Speaker, get very short shrift in the throne speech. But that is becoming more and more a characteristic of this Liberal government. A senior civil servant, Walter Rudnicki, attempts to consult with the native council over housing policy and is summarily dismissed—not given the opportunity for discussion or even resignation, which we were told the other day is the "Liberal way", but cavalierly thrown out on his ear without notice. Why? Because of consulting with native people. That is short shrift indeed.

A few weeks ago the native people of the James Bay area were given very short shrift when the minister threatened to cut off legal aid in their battle to halt the massive James Bay project until their aboriginal claims are settled. Legal aid will be cut off, the minister says, if the Indians are "unreasonable". What does he mean by "unreasonable"? Surely, throughout this long-protracted struggle it is the minister himself who merits the description "unreasonable". He and his government have consistently refused to assume their constitutional and moral responsibility with regard to the James Bay native people. Rather, they have maintained a narrow, legalistic, rigid approach, lacking compassion, sensitivity and understanding.

During the recess the minister found it convenient to throw around terms like "unreasonable", while at the same time lavishing praise on the Bourassa government's handling of the situation. I hope that now these aberrations are past, he will assume the responsibility he has hitherto ignored and lend his full support and the weight of the federal government to backing the position of the native people of James Bay.

As I have said, the native people received only minimal reference in the throne speech, but that vast area north of the sixtieth parallel, two-fifths of Canada, fared even worse. It did not merit a single word. I realize the government has signified its intent to introduce a bill to amend the Yukon Act and the Northwest Territories Act. This will, I trust, mean significant amendments, not just a political restructuring to allow for a fully elected council, an executive committee, the addition or more councillors or the separation of the role of Speaker and Commissioner, important as these are, but significant amendment which will indicate this government is finally prepared to do something to remove the stigma of colonialism which permeates the north; that it will untie the apron strings from Ottawa; that it will hand over to the territorial councils fiscal responsibility for those areas already administered by the territorial civil service—education, housing and local government.

Unless that step is taken, unless the federal government is prepared to concede some of its fiscal authority, all other proposals are merely a charade, a farce perpetrated against 60,000 northerners who deserve something better. As legislators we, any one of us, would be appalled to participate in a legislative process of dealing with appropriations where we had the right to ask questions but were denied the right to propose changes, additions or deletions.

At the recent Northwest Territories Council sessions in Yellowknife, some of which I attended, the elected councillor from the eastern Arctic pointed out that there were some 200 children of school age in his area with severe hearing defects, but that no programs or special facilities were provided for them in the education estimates. Neither, I might add, is there anything done for them by the federal Department of Health and Welfare. Imagine the frustration of this councillor who could indeed raise what one cannot help but recognize as a serious health and educational problem, but who had no power to suggest that expenditures be reallocated to allow for special training of these handicapped children.

It is this kind of responsibility, Mr. Speaker, which northerners should be allowed to exercise. They are close to the problems; they can recommend legitimate action and they should be accorded the fiscal power to enforce it. In the true interest of northerners, and in a real effort to eradicate the last vestiges of colonialism in Canada, I hope the minister is seriously considering incorporating such legislation in the amendments he will be proposing to the territories' acts.

Health care of native people, particularly those living in isolated areas, is woefully inadequate. Study after study points up the fact that native people are not provided with a treatment and public health program comparable to that enjoyed by residents elsewhere in Canada. We had a sad illustration of that just recently with the death of a two-month old Indian child in Alberta. Nowhere is this inadequate treatment more apparent than in the isolated communities north of the sixtieth parallel. Doctors are few, and dentists almost non-existent. There are only seven dentists employed by the Department of National Health and Welfare, and a few in private practice, to serve a population of 60,000 scattered across 1.5 million square miles.

An official of the Department of National Health and Welfare used these words to describe dental health among native northerners: "The conditions of teeth among the people of the north can best be described as 'oral sewers', and this stands in strong contrast to the universally healthy state of teeth that was seen before the native people were introduced to the white man's diet." The Nutrition Canada national survey report released last November contained a number of references to nutritional problems among Canada's native people. It spoke of vitamin C deficiency, vitamin A deficiency and other dietary related illnesses; but it went on to say that the data collected for the Indians and Inuit have not yet been fully analysed and a special report on these groups would not be available until at least six months after the initial report and recommendations of last fall had been released. Is it any wonder that our native people are made to feel as second-class citizens when they are continually relegated to the tag end position, to the status of an appendix on governmental reports?

A recent report on mental helath in northern communities observes that, first of all, it is apparent that a number of myths entertained by both northerners and uninitiated southerners alike must be laid aside if we are to seriously grapple with the many problems confronting our northern citizens. One of these myths is that people indigenous to the north are a simple, contented lot, accustomed to the rigors of the Arctic environment and satisfied as long as white intruders leave them and their ecology alone. At one time this may have been true. Today it is definitely false. This is not to say that the Indian and Eskimo peoples do not love "the land", nor that they are helpless and despairing in contending with the elements. Quite the contrary.

The report goes on to say that it would be absurd not to recognize the cultural disintegration and change in lifestyle amongst the indigenous population which is a direct result of the inroads made by the white man's culture. Both native culture and natural ecology have been disrupted and traditional hunting economics, whether inland or coastal, would no longer seem to be viable. Virtually no Arctic community can now be considered self-sustaining.

One serious consequence of cultural erosion has been a loss of traditional control by the community over the behaviour of its members. This disruption and the dominating influence of southern educational systems and technology in northern settlements has irrevocably altered northern society. Therefore, the report states, while this is not a comparative study in the strict sense, it seems safe to say that the people of the north, whether white, Indian, Métis or Eskimo, want and need the same kind and quality of facilities and services available to southern Canadians. One might go so far as to state that because of the severity of the climate, the relative isolation and the long, dark winters, the need for a full range of high quality services and public amenities is much more acute in the north. Unfortunately, such services are not available and this lack is felt by all northern residents. For the aged and economically depressed, the problems of northern living are further compounded. This study was funded by a grant from the Department of Manpower and Immigration. It sets forward the facts in a very straightforward manner.

I mention these health reports which are particularly directed to problems in the north—hearing defects, lack of dental facilities, nutritional deficiences, mental health hazards—to show that they exist and that concerned Canadians are aware they exist. But if the throne speech is a true reflection of the Liberal government's thinking—and I have no reason to doubt it—then I can only assume that the cabinet is not particularly concerned with these problems.

The throne speech makes special reference to transportation as a key factor in regional development. It goes on to say that steps will be taken to ensure that Canada's transportation capability supports the government's national goals and is safe and efficent. Those two words "sufficient" and "efficient" interest me. At the present time the government is engaged in building a multimillion dollar highway along the Mackenzie corridor, a highway that was begun as a political come-on without the benefit of adequate, or even any social and evironmental impact studies. Is that highway safe from environmental damage? Is it efficient? Well, compared with what? The costs of the highway have escalated wildly since it was announced in April of 1972. The environmental and social hazards are rapidly becoming apparent even without the studies having been done; and the highway, it appears, has few ardent advocates except for a cabinet clique.

[Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands).]

The Canadian gas Arctic consortium have publicly stated a highway is not necessary to their developmental plans, if and when a pipeline is built. The native communities have voiced their opposition on a number of occasions. They regard the Mackenzie River itself as their traditional highway. Residents of far northern communities such as Inuvik see no advantage to driving at least 1,000 miles to Yellowknife so that they can board a plane to fly to other centres farther south. They would go by air in the first place: the people in the north "think air."

If the government is serious in developing a transportation policy that is safe and efficient and which will contribute to regional development throughout the north, why does it not admit that a better alternative might be to use the $300 million to $400 million which has been estimated as the cost of the Mackenzie Highway, to hard-surface and enlarge existing airstrips, build new ones in those communities which are still isolated and, most important, subsidize air travel and air transport throughout the north? Such a plan would benefit northerners from Frobisher Bay to Old Crow.

The $300 million which is being spent on the highway would subsidize air transport for years to come and would eliminate intolerable inequities in the present travel costs, inequities which set the rate structure at $110 for an air ticket from Edmonton to Toronto, an air distance of 1,700 miles, but which demands a payment of $150 from Edmonton to Inuvik, an air distance of 500 miles less, or 1,200 miles. Travel costs in southern Canada are 6 cents per mile; in northern Canada 12 cents per mile—double the rate This is just another example of discrimination against northern Canadians. This injustice could be eliminated by equalizing transportation costs in the north of Canada as well as elsewhere in the country.

If this country is to achieve its full potential, equal consideration must be given to all Canadians and to all regions. The native people and the northern territories deserve the recognition this throne speech has denied them.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, as has occurred several times before, I would most sincerely like to compliment the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I would also like to compliment my leader on what I feel was an effective and worth while amendment to the motion proposed by the hon. members on the government side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: In my view, the time has come for this House to face some harsh realities. When I listened to the Speech from the Throne I was disturbed to hear the net content that was being suggested by the government with regard to any plans they might have for the curtailing or control of inflation in this country. I was more disturbed than ever when I listened to the rambling, disjointed speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he entered this debate. One conference which he made I would again like to quote for the record:

I draw a similar parallel to allude to the goings-on in the New Democratic Party. It has to do with an ocean liner but the parallel is a bit different. It has to do with seagulls. Because they were squawking and making a lot of noise, they thought they were actually running the ship.

Like many other members of the House, I laughed when the Prime Minister made that comment. If he chose to compare the NDP with the scavenger bird, the seagull, and suggest that somehow they were catching refuse from a ship, that comparison presumably was his right to make. However, it suddenly dawned on me, if the NDP are only the seagulls following the ship, who in fact is running the ship? Up to this point I had assumed the NDP were running the ship, the government of this country. We now have the admission that while we do have a majority government with two caucuses, neither caucus is completely sure of which is actually running the ship.

Having listened to the current Speech from the Throne and the speech of the Prime Minister, I thought it would be interesting to see what was said in previous throne speeches and by this Prime Minister since he took office in April, 1968, concerning inflation. The reason I say that is you will recall, Mr. Speaker, having received in this House estimates for the fiscal year 1974-75 that are truly startling. It has already been pointed out that these estimates contemplate an expenditure of 20 per cent more than was spent in the previous year, based on the original estimates. Perhaps it puts the magnitude of the government's spending spree into perspective when we realize that by the end of 1975 the government will have spent, at the federal level, $120 billion. Give them one more year and they will have spent, since they took office in 1968, more than has been spent by federal governments in Canada in the previous 100 years.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Stevens: These are the hard facts. Yet this is a government which when it took power in 1968 had the audacity to say it would control government expenditures.

Mr. Benjamin: What would you cut?

Mr. Baker: We'll start with you.

Mr. Stevens: It is not only the growth of government spending which is startling; it is the growth in the monetary supply of the nation. In the past three years, for example, the money supply in Canada has increased by 53 per cent, an increase of 17 per cent per year on average. Government expenditure in the last six years has gone up faster than 20 per cent a year. Can anyone sensibly say that a government which induces such increases in our money supply and in federal spending is not an inflationary government?

Having mentioned this, I should like to refer to certain statements made in previous speeches from the throne. For example, on September 16, 1968, the speech said:

> Parliament will be asked during the present session to consider proposals for a systematic and continuous review of prices and costs in our economy. Just as incomes cannot increase faster than productivity if price increases are to be restrained so government spending by all levels of government cannot increase faster than productivity if we wish to restrain the increase in levels of taxation. These two realities are among the most important that Canadians and their leaders much bear in mind during the months and years ahead.

The speech went on to say that the government would be conscious of the limitations it must place on its expenditures. This is 1968, and bear in mind that inflation in that period was approximately one-third of the current inflation in this country. Speaking in the debate on the Speech from the Throne of that year, the Prime Minister said there must be "a freeze on civil service growth". He stated:

> We have issued explicit guidelines to be used in the preparation of the estimates of 1969-70 and we shall not hesitate to take whatever other actions may be necessary to restrain the growth in our expenditures.

That was in September, 1968. I would draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that in the fiscal year ending March, 1968, total expenditures by the government of that time amounted to $9.9 billion. Today we are faced with an expenditure somewhat in excess of $23 billion, by the same government. Perhaps I might turn now to October 23, 1969, the date of the next Speech from the Throne. There it is stated:

> In recent months the government has urged both the public and the private sectors to adopt special measures to combat the dangers of inflation. These measures, which the government has itself adopted, must be applied by all if further restraints are to avoided.

Again, speaking in the debate on that Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister noted that the opposition parties had had much to say about the government's alleged failure to act in controlling spending. Mr. Speaker, there can be little doubt that history has shown the opposition parties were quite correct in their allegation.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): What about last year—wanting to double the estimates from your side?

Mr. Stevens: I turn, now, to Hansard of October 8, 1970, where we find the following statement contained in the Speech from the Throne:

> We are not yet free of inflationary pressure but there has been real progress and price increases have abated to the extent that the Canadian record in the battle against inflation is superior to that so far attained in any other western country. In the result it has been possible for the past several months to moderate certain monetary and fiscal restraints.

I would draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the government then took credit for a better record than that of any other western industrialized nation. Yet today we are repeatedly told by the same government that there is little we can do about inflation in Canada, that we are caught up in the worldwide inflationary experience. I suggest the government is not being candid with the Canadian people. They know that inflation can be contained. They know what measures can be taken. But they hesitate, through lack of leadership, to take those measures.

Mr. Speaker, in the debate on the Speech from the Throne to which I have just referred, the Prime Minister made a startling comment. He said:

> May I repeat at this point that the first step which was proposed to us was the fight against an inflation which had become a threat to the whole economy. Courage was needed to take that step.

Here we have a Prime Minister who said he felt he must take action against inflation, a threat to the whole economy. Yet the inflation to which he referred amounted, in fact, to one-third of the inflation we are presently experiencing. Is it unfair to assume that if there was a threat to the economy in 1970 or earlier, there is a triple threat today with inflation running at more than 9 per cent per annum?

Last session, Statistics Canada produced some very relevant figures which show how inflationary the present government has been in its first five years of office and in its latest year. Let me point out that during the St. Laurent government's five years in office ending January, 1958, inflation in this country amounted to 6.7 per cent. For five years of the Diefenbaker government ending in January, 1963, inflation was 7 per cent; in other words, 1.4 per cent on an annual basis. In the first five years of the Pearson government ending in January, 1968, inflation rose to 15.6 per cent. And in the first five years of the Trudeau government it went to 22.3 per cent. That was the most sensational five-year period of inflation Canada has had, barring wartime. In the past year, January, 1973, to January, 1974, inflation has increased another 9.1 per cent.

Is there no relationship between the government's spending as I have outlined it and the government's policy of printing money? Certainly the financial leaders of this country are becoming alarmed. For example, the largest life insurance company in Canada, Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, through its president, Mr. Thomas Galt, stated at the annual meeting held on February 12 of this year:

> It cannot be denied that the rapid growth in government expenditures and in the money supply in recent years have been major causes of the inflation we are having in Canada. Inflation must be combated—soon and effectively—or the damage to our economies, if not to our entire social order, will be irreparable.

That is what was said by the president of Sun Life, and I note that his words are very similar to the words of the Prime Minister in 1970 when he felt he had a better case to present than he has today. Mr. Earle McLaughlin, chairman and president of the Royal Bank of Canada, spoke to his shareholders on January 10 of this year and said:

> I hope that the various governments would exercise restraint on the expenditure side, as a means to dampen inflation.

That was before the government tabled its $23 billion estimates for the current fiscal year. Surely there can be no suggestion that this is restraint. It is becoming customary for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), and I am pleased to see that he is with us tonight—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I never miss anything you say, and I never learn anything either.

An hon. Member: That's because you're a slow learner.

Mr. Stevens: It is often said by the Minister of Finance and by his leaders, both on the New Democratic side and on the Liberal side, that somehow our inflationary record has been better than the inflationary record of the United States. In this respect, the Bank of Canada review of February, 1974, referring to the OECD report, puts the record straight, and I think it is time this government put the record straight concerning this comparison between the United States and Canada. In spite of virtually no inflationary pressure of the nature the United States has had to live with, our record has been worse than the United States record in the past two years.

Let me quote from table 1 on page 6 of that Bank of Canada review. In 1972, United States inflation was 3.3 per cent, while ours was 4.8 per cent. In 1973, U.S. inflation—I emphasize that this is from a lower base—was 8.8 per cent, compared with our 9.1 per cent. Is it honest for the government to represent that somehow we have a better record than the United States? I suggest that such a statement is not correct. Not only has this government placed severe hardships on many people as a result of its inflationary handling of our economy; it has made millionaires of some individuals and corporations in this country.

I have already referred to the growth in our money system. You will recall that it is proposed in the throne speech that there be an amendment to the Bank Act. I will be very interested to see what the Liberal government intends to do in 1974 with respect to the banks, compared with what it did for the banks in 1967, the year of the great sell-out to the Canadian banks. I make reference to the fact that in that year banking legislation in this country was liberalized to such an extent that between 1967 and 1973 the banks were able to increase their earnings from $116 million to $321 million; that is the amount available for payment to their shareholders or for dividends. There are certainly some individuals and corporations who have truly prospered under the Trudeau government's rule, but I can assure you that it is not the poor man to whom the Prime Minister referred in his speech in this debate.

When explaining the government's record to Canadians, I believe it should be pointed out that when this government took power in April, 1968, Canadians paid $5.2 billion in income tax and in 1974 they will be required to pay twice that amount. This is before one even considers contributions to the unemployment insurance account which will add approximately another $1 billion to their tax load. It took 100 years from confederation to 1967 before the federal government's personal income tax levy reached $5.2 billion. Under the Trudeau government it took only six years to double that figure. That is the true impact of this high spending, high flying government which has the nerve to say that this House should continue to have confidence in it. It is time the people of Canada were asked who should run Canada.

An hon. Member: David Lewis.

Mr. Stevens: Based on the estimates that have been tabled, after allowing for indexing—an idea that this government accepted from this party, and thank goodness—and after allowing for inflation, personal income taxes are likely to increase by more than 25 per cent as a result of this government's spending spree. If this forecast is borne out by the facts, this will mean that the increase in federal income taxes paid by Canadians will be $2.5 billion, or $200 million more than the entire tax paid by all Canadian citizens in 1963, the last year of the Diefenbaker government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being 9.30 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put all questions necessary to dispose of the amendment now before the House.

The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment? All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed to the amendment will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Stanfield) which was negatived on the following division:

IMMIGRATION

ARREST OF OFFICER OF DEPARTMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, that the credibility of the Department of Immigration is seriously undermined by the arrest of an officer of the department charged with issuing false and forged work permits to unqualified and illegal immigrants, and that other arrests may be pending. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That this House immediately call for an independent inquiry to clarify this serious situation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES TO COPE WITH INFLATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity as it concerns the steady increase in the cost of living provoked by excessive interest rates. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That the House consider immediately urging the Minister of Finance to use his powers in his capacity, as well as the Bank of Canada, in order to lower the interest rates, which are one of the major causes of inflation.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

AGRICULTURE

ACTION TO ASSIST CATTLEMEN IN LIGHT OF EFFECT OF IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES ON MARKET

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the extremely crucial fat cattle market situation all across Canada that has been triggered by a fourteenfold increase in live cattle imports from the United States since January of this year over last year, and in view of the very reasonable and workable proposals presented to the minister last evening by the cattlemen, will he now indicate what action he is prepared to take to meet this critical cattle market situation?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has stated, I and some of my officials consulted with the Canadian Cattlemen's Association late yesterday afternoon. I think the record has been pretty good that we have paid close attention in the past to what this organization has suggested and their suggestions are being seriously considered again today. I hope we will be able to make a decision shortly.

Mr. Hargrave: In view of the serious market drop of some 10 cents a pound over the last two weeks and 15 cents a pound over the last three weeks resulting in increased losses per head in excess of $150, is the minister now prepared to make an immediate recommendation to cabinet or a statement on motions this week on this situation?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I have already made a submission to my colleagues in the cabinet.

IMPORTATION OF UNITED STATES CATTLE GIVEN DES—STEPS TO PROTECT CANADIAN PRODUCERS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that Canadian beef producers are not allowed to use the food supplement DES while United States producers are permitted to use this food additive and ship such beef and cattle into Canada, what steps does the minister propose to take to effect a fair arrangement for Canadian cattle producers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think I should clarify one thing. It is the male species of the animal to which you feed DES, not the female, and the banning of meat coming into Canada from the United States in cases where the cattle supposedly have been fed DES would not necessarily mean a total ban on the importation of meat. There are many things that have to be considered. We recognize that it is illegal to feed it to cattle and then to sell that meat in Canada. But we do not believe that any cattle that are being fed DES in the United States at the present time will be coming into Canada for several weeks because, as I said previously, no one is going to implant DES, or add it to the feed, and get any results from it until several weeks have passed. We are watching the situation closely. We are in consultation with my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare. We are in contact with people in the United States Department of Agriculture. I can say that a decision will be made concerning this matter before any of the animals being fed DES at the present time come to market in Canada.

SUGGESTED DEFICIENCY PAYMENT TO CATTLE PRODUCERS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact many farmers with cattle and those operating feedlots face severe losses and that this is an emergency situation, would the government consider making a deficiency payment to those farmers and feeders who have cattle in feedlots over, let us say, the next month or six weeks so that they will not suffer a real disaster and be forced out of business?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the submissions that have already been made.

Mr. Gleave: Can the minister assure the House that within the next few days he will make a statement on motions clarifying this whole matter in order to relieve the uncertainty that now exists in that part of the farming industry?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I announced yesterday that we would be making a decision soon, and I hope very soon.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PRICE OF BEEF TO CONSUMERS IN LIGHT OF CATTLE RAISERS' COST OF PRODUCTION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose my supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that beef producers in Canada are now producing beef at far below the cost of production and at the same time the price at the retail level has failed to follow this lowering of prices, especially in the last four or five weeks, can the minister indicate if he is taking any action in this regard?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are looking into this as part of our over-all review of the situation, and we are working closely with the Minister of Agriculture and other ministers on this important matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be recognized for a supplementary. The Chair will then recognize the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, after which I will return to the hon. member for Calgary Centre and others who have further supplementaries.

Mr. Danforth: Is the minister himself undertaking or has he directed that a specific study be made with regard to this very serious problem, or is he leaving it to the general action of the Food Prices Review Board? Is he taking any action other than what he indicated in his previous statement?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the Food Prices Review Board was given vast powers under the Inquiries Act to look into this kind of matter in great depth, but I am certainly prepared to look into it further myself.

PRICE OF BEEF—CONSULTATION BY MINISTER WITH FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs if he has had any recent contact with the Food Prices Review Board with regard to the matter of the consumer price for beef?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Not on that matter, Mr. Speaker. I was in touch with them to ascertain when they would be having meetings on the matter of the bread increase.

While I am on my feet, perhaps I might give the information that I promised to give the House in answer to questions posed yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: I would like to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister will be recognized in due course for that purpose.

Mr. Bell: Plant a question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In order to proceed in an orderly way, I believe we should allow the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore first to ask his supplementary question, and then we will try to complete the first round of questioning.

BREAD PRICES—RESULTS OF REPRESENTATIONS BY MINISTER TO BAKERIES

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, in view of the anxiety of the minister to tell us something about the price of bread, may I run the risk of setting him up by asking this question: In view of the fact that today Weston Bakeries announced that they were going to withhold for the time being the full price increases they have in mind, will the minister tell the house the results of any contacts he has had with other bakeries and what assurance he can give the House in respect of their price plans?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity to add further information to the information I have previously given. As a result of my contacts with the bakery industry for the purpose of having them restrain increases in the price of bread, at least until after further meetings with the Food Prices Review Board, as the hon. member has suggested I have been informed that Weston Bakeries are rolling back tomorrow their planned four cent per loaf increase in Quebec to three cents.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: In the province of Ontario I am informed they will be increasing their price on Monday, March 11, by no more than two cents. With respect to the Steinberg chain, I am informed that they have not increased prices on their private label house brands yet. They plan to increase the price of their private label breads by no more than two cents. With respect to A & P, they will be increasing their price on private label white bread by no more than two cents in places other than Quebec and in Quebec they plan to raise their price but only by three cents. With respect to Corporate Foods, the increase in Ontario—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Gray: If I may complete my remarks, I am simply doing what I said to the House yesterday I would do.

An hon. Member: On motions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might try to give the information as briefly as possible. As the hon. minister will realize, if he gives a lengthy reply which is really in the form of a statement he should expect statements to be made in reply by the opposition parties. I would hope that the information he is giving to the House at this time would be given briefly.

Mr. Gray: I will heed your admonition, Mr. Speaker. Corporate Food Bakeries inform me that in Ontario they are increasing their standard 24-ounce white loaf by two cents on Monday, March 11. The Safeway chain has advised that they will not be increasing the price of their private brand white bread for an indefinite period, at least until the end of March.

Mr. Baker: They are not going to wrap it.

Mr. Grier: For what period of time have these commitments on prices by these bakeries been undertaken?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that this is certainly until after the meetings with the Food Prices Review Board and likely until the end of the month of March.

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO ENSURE NO FURTHER INCREASES IN PRICE OF BREAD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. In view of the fact that all of the relevant confidential bookkeeping data of the bakeries has already been given to the Food Prices Review Board and the board has made a recommendation based on that data, may I ask the minister if the government is now prepared to take immediate steps to ensure that there will be no further increases in the price of bread?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have already informed the House that the steps indicated in the Prime Minister's statement of last fall were that the government would be prepared to consider further action after the parties mentioned in a Food Prices Review Board report had appeared before the board for discussions. This meeting is to take place on March 20, as the House knows, and we will be prepared to take appropriate action in light of the results of that meeting.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED ELIMINATION OF ARTIFICIAL RESTRICTIONS ON AVAILABILITY OF CREDIT

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that the last five years U.S. banks and finance companies have tripled business in Canada, the total figure going from $961 million to more than $2.7 billions, which shows that because of the artificial credit restrictions by the Bank of Canada Canadians must seek in the United States the funds required for their economic activities, can the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House what measures he will take to abolish artificial restrictions on access to credit for Canadians in their own country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are many approaches to this question. I cannot cover them all briefly. But the hon. member will surely remember that the Minister of Finance has encouraged provinces in particular not to borrow from foreign sources during these years precisely to prevent an increase in American credit in the United States.

The provinces have followed partly these recommendations, but I do not believe that the hon. member would ask the government to prevent provinces or even corporations from borrowing on the world markets.

Mr. Matte: I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the right hon. Prime Minister tell us if he believes that what is physically possible in Canada can be financially realizable in our country?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

PRICE OF HEATING OIL PURCHASED BY GOVERNMENT—RESULT OF TRANSACTION

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Several months ago the minister was asked what price the Canadian Commercial Corporation had paid for the 40 million gallons of distilled oil it had purchased and the minister replied that competitive circumstances made it undesirable to release the figure. In view of the fact that these competitive circumstances no longer prevail, would the minister now tell the House what price the corporation paid for this heating oil?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say that the hon. member gives the wrong impression when he says that the Canadian Commercial Corporation bought the oil. In fact, the department itself did so.

[Mr. Gray.]

Second, I am not now in a position to reveal what price was paid because incidental expenses still have to be taken into account. As soon as these have been figured out, the government should then be able to announce the exact cost of that purchase.

[English]

Mr. Andre: In view of the minister's answer, could he indicate to the House the total amount of oil that was purchased, whether the oil has now been sold and whether there was a net loss or some money made in the course of this transaction?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will understand that because of the very mild winter we have had, the oil has not yet been used. I am not now in a position to say exactly how many barrels were purchased but I shall be pleased to advise the hon. member of it tomorrow.

AGRICULTURE

IMPORTS OF UNITED STATES CATTLE—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE ACTION TO ASSIST CANADIAN CATTLEMEN

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Medicine Hat and is directed to the Prime Minister. When the price of beef reached its peak last August the government moved very quickly to control prices. Would the Prime Minister now undertake to have the government move as quickly to stop the abnormal influx of American cattle which is disrupting the market and bankrupting the industry?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will consider the government's program as announced in the Speech from the Throne with regard to agriculture he will see that it consists essentially of a series of measures aimed at increasing supply in Canada and therefore benefiting the consumer, while at the same time ensuring various forms of income guarantee to agricultural producers. These measures will be brought in during the course of the session and I hope that they will be explained to and understood by the Canadian public. In the meantime one cannot help remarking that yesterday the Tories were complaining that the price of bread was too high and today they are complaining that the price of meat is too low. We would like to know where they stand.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is totally wrong.

Mr. Towers: In view of the serious situation of the industry and as cattlemen cannot wait for delayed decisions on the part of the government, will the Prime Minister not now commit the government to making an immediate decision and have the Minister of Agriculture announce it prior to his leaving the House next Monday?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the order in which matters will take place in this session will be discussed in the usual manner by the government House leader and the other House leaders. We would be glad, for instance, if the opposition wants to give up some of its opposition days before the end of the month, to replace them with good government legislation.

Mr. Bell: But you have not got anything ready.

ARTS AND SCIENCES

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF GRANT COUNCILS FOR SOCIAL AND NATURAL SCIENCES AND HUMANITIES—POSITION OF NATIONAL RESEARCH AND CANADA COUNCILS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. May I ask whether the announcement in the Speech from the Throne of the establishment of granting councils, one for social sciences, one for the humanities and another for natural sciences, means that the National Research Council and the Canada Council will be phased out of operation?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of State for Science and Technology): No, Mr. Speaker, it does not mean that they will be phased out of operation. The National Research Council will continue with its laboratory functions and the Canada Council will continue to promote the arts.

CONSIDERATION GIVEN BY CABINET TO ADVICE OF MINISTRY OF STATE FOR SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. The throne speech suggests and a subsequent statement released by the minister says that the advice of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology will increasingly be taken into account by the cabinet. What new mechanisms does she foresee to ensure that this will happen, or is this simply a promise from the Prime Minister that from now on the cabinet will listen to the minister's ideas?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of State for Science and Technology): No, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow the hon. minister to reply to the question. I was going to take issue with the form of the question but perhaps it might be easier to allow the minister to reply.

Mrs. Sauvé: No, Mr. Speaker. A mechanism has been worked out between my ministry and the Treasury Board. If the hon. member would refer to the speech I made last Friday in the House, he would realize that apart from that mechanism I will be in a position to publish science expenditures before the fact, that is, before they are approved by parliament, so they can be available for public discussion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROPOSED GRANT COUNCILS—METHOD OF OPERATION—OPPORTUNITY FOR INTERESTED GROUPS TO COMMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a further question for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. Will the minister provide an ample opportunity to learned societies, cultural groups and other interested people before definite decisions are taken as to the precise role and method of operation for any new granting council operating alongside the Canada Council and the National Research Council to make comments upon the minister's proposals?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of State for Science and Technology): I am always happy to consider the comments of the learned societies.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST BY BRITISH COLUMBIA MINISTER FOR DELEGATION OF JURISDICTION TO PROVINCE IN FISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour of which I gave him notice yesterday. Has the minister received a request from the Minister of Labour of the province of British Columbia for delegation by the federal government to the province of labour jurisdiction in the British Columbia fishing industry? If so, what action has he taken on this request?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received such a telegram. We are in the process of advising the minister that the matter is actually before the courts because there has been an application for certification before the Canada Labour Relations Board that raises the jurisdictional question. So it will be resolved from a judicial point of view. In the meantime, our position is that we have jurisdiction and will proceed.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I think I am free to ask this question despite the minister's reference to some subject matter before the courts. My supplementary arises from the minister's statement about the jurisdiction which he says the federal government has under existing law. I am sure the minister is aware of the confusion about jurisdiction. Is the minister prepared in this session to introduce further legislation amending the Canada Labour Relations Act which will in fact make clear what the federal jurisdiction is with regard to most of the fishermen who are not now covered by any labour law legislation?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to give that some consideration. I should have added in my previous answer that there is some legal question whether in fact we could delegate authority, even if we were asked to do so, without a special act of parliament. Be that as it may, and further to the particular question the hon. member has asked, I would advise the hon. member that when we made the most recent amendments to the Canada Labour Code we were the first as a federal government to make amendments that would provide bargaining rights to fishermen. We acknowledged the fact that they are entitled to them. We recognize that in the code. If further amendments are required to protect them in their negotiations with employers, we will be prepared to consider them.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO EXPEDITE PROCESSING OF APPLICATIONS FOR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the honourable and gallant Minister of Veterans Affairs. Veterans are being advised that because of the very large increase in the number of applications for pensions and allowances they may well have to wait for 18 months before a decision is made in their respective cases. Would the minister endeavour to dispose of the backlog of cases by adding ad hoc additional members to pension boards and the like in order that veterans will not be obliged to wait as long as is at present anticipated?

● (1430)

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): We have been making considerable progress with pension applications. I might refer to December, 1972. We had 719 submissions and 103 favourable decisions at that time. In December, 1973, we had 813 submissions and 308 favourable decisions. In other words, favourable decisions in that particular month had increased by a couple of hundred. I also want to inform the right hon. member that the Pension Commission is working very hard indeed and they are really keyed up. I spent about three hours there one day last week with the people who are working there. We have a back-up staff of doctors and so on. I was very fortunate last month to be able to obtain the services of an additional doctor. We have to have a certain type of group to go and meet veterans out in the country. For instance, we have these appeal boards. We would like very much to have a doctor who has considerable experience—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the minister for his voluble attempt at an answer, but I ask him whether or nor it is a fact that veterans—they cannot be answered by statistics—are today being advised that they may expect to have to wait 18 months because of the backlog?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to contradict that. I would not want that to go round the country at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): It is far from being true. As hon. members know, assessment of pension rights involves considerable detail and fact-finding. But cases which are of a specific nature, for example, a case affecting a veteran's widow or a man who is not able to look after himself and needs additional care, can be brought forward. Not very many, we anticipate, will have to wait 18 months.

Some hon. Members: How many?

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are so advised!

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Does the minister appreciate that the difficulty with details he mentioned arises because the records go back so far and that by changing the benefit of the doubt clause many of the applications which constitute the backlog could be cleared up? Would the minister look at that clause very carefully and try to relieve the situation so that applications can be cleared up quickly?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I will give that matter consideration.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED ASSOCIATION OF CANADA AND TURKS AND CAICOS ISLANDS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Is he aware of the fact that the State Council of the Turks and Caicos Islands of the West Indies has prepared a petition requesting from Great Britain the authorization to negotiate an association with Canada? If so, is the Canadian government favourable to such an association?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am aware of the fact that the council has prepared a petition to the British government. A copy of this petition has come to us. Of course, it has not been transmitted officially by the British government as it would have to be if there was to be a request to us. If I might express my view as Secretary of State for External Affairs, it does seem to me to be very undesirable to raise the expectations of the people of those islands that they will join Canada when this question has not been settled by this government or in this House.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

POSITION OF FORMER EMPLOYEE OF DOSCO PRERETIRED BY DEVCO

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I might say by way of preface that we often hear the term "Philadelphia lawyers". A case of this kind would occupy all the lawyers in Philadelphia. Failing their services, I would depend on the minister who is working toward the fulfilment of legislation passed by the House in 1967. I would ask him about the case of Mr. Campbell, a long-time employee of Dosco who, preretired by Devco, found himself on the preretirement leave of absence plan of another company, one for which he had never worked a day in his life. I ask the minister how such an arrangement could come about?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I would say to the hon. member that since both of us are residents of the Atlantic provinces, perhaps in addition to those Philadelphia lawyers we ought to put in a couple of sea lawyers like himself and myself to try to work it out. I am grateful to the hon. member for having brought this case to my attention. As he is aware, I have made inquiries with regard to this case and if I receive information which I have not already given him I shall be glad to make it available and discuss it with him.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I wonder whether the minister will treat this matter with the sense of urgency it deserves and provide an answer, say as of yesterday or no later than tomorrow, and inform the House why a man can be placed on the preretirement plan of a company for which he has never worked and why some kind of financial arrangement, a very strange one, can be made whereby Devco pays his preretirement for the other company?

Mr. Jamieson: I obviously cannot get an answer for yesterday, although I did give the hon. member one answer which obviously did not satisfy him. I will communicate again with the parties concerned and endeavour to get him an answer, if not tomorrow, then as soon as possible.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Get on the hot line to Tom Kent's office.

ENERGY

CONCERN OF FARMERS OF SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO ABOUT ROUTE OF PROPOSED OIL PIPELINE EXTENSION

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the concern recently expressed by farmers that the proposed route for extension of the oil pipeline will result in the rape of prime agricultural land in southwestern Ontario, and in view of the answer given my colleague from Huron yesterday, can the minister tell the House whether he has received direct representations from these farmers or by farm organizations on their behalf in recent weeks?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): If by direct representations the hon. member means representations to me, the answer is no.

Mr. Frank: Then I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. In light of the reply given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to my first question, can the Minister of Agriculture tell the House why he has not made serious representations to his colleague following the many representations to him both by letter and personally by the farmers affected and by their organizations in connection with the proposed pipeline?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The representations made to me have been passed on to the departments concerned, including the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. We have had correspondence about it between ourselves.

Mr. Frank: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a question of privilege. I hope it will be brief because we are running short of time.

Mr. Frank: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In his answer to me the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said he had not received representations. I said "directly or indirectly", by farmers or otherwise. The Minister of Agriculture now tells us he has made representations. Who are the farmers to believe?

Mr. Speaker: That is hardly a question of privilege. Perhaps the hon. member would like to ask a supplementary question to try to solve the difficulty, after which I shall recognize the hon. member for Brant.

● (1440)

Mr. Frank: My supplementary question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact these farmers, whether rightly or wrongly, are looking at the installation of this proposed pipeline and the replacement of earth involved in a three-foot pit with some seriousness, does the minister consider the policies expounded by some assistants in the energy department as fact and, if they are fact, what is the point of having these future hearings?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, may I just remind the hon. gentleman that he asked me whether there were direct representations made. I repeated his question, and there were none. I hope he will not try to confuse the issue in this regard. My understanding is that his party and his leader were in favour of putting additional oil supplies into Montreal from Canadian sources at an early date. This remains the policy of the government and I hope we will continue to have their support.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. May I ask the Prime Minister whether he has considered giving Mrs. Hartling, head of the national anti-poverty organization, the same salary, program funding and personnel as the government has so generously given Mrs. Plumptre and her staff, which will amount to approximately $1.9 million in 1974?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure that question can be placed on the order paper or considered at the time of adjournment in case of urgency.

Oral Questions

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REASON THAT CERTAIN EMPLOYEES OF DEPARTMENT OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS NOT PROSECUTED FOR THEFT

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General in his capacity as spokesman for the RCMP. In view of the fact the people of Canada have been informed that certain civil servants within the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have not been prosecuted for theft because they claimed that they had only borrowed certain goods from that department, and in view of the fact that section 283 of the Criminal Code defines theft in words that cover borrowing or taking permanently by using the words "to deprive, temporarily or absolutely", would the Solicitor General, either today or in a statement tomorrow on motions, inform the House and the Canadian people of the true reason why prosecutions did not take place?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will look into this, but I should point out that enforcement of the Criminal Code in Ontario comes within the jurisdiction of the Attorney General for Ontario and the Ontario Provincial Police.

Mr. Dick: I appreciate the answer of the Solicitor General, but since the RCMP investigated this matter as it fell within federal jurisdiction—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Dick: —I request the Solicitor General to give us the reason why the RCMP did not lay charges.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as I said in my first answer, I will look into this matter and give a report to the House as soon as possible.

AGRICULTURE

BEEF—NECESSITY OF ACTION TO ASSIST CATTLE PRODUCERS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it relates to beef prices which were discussed earlier today. I might say that I express surprise at the Prime Minister's answer as it is evident that he did not know that, in spite of the crisis, the price to the consumer has not gone down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member to invite him and other hon. members to ask their questions as directly as possible without preambles and little statements. We would save time if we proceeded in a more orderly fashion.

Mr. Jarvis: In light of the fact that the Speech from the Throne contained some very welcome suggestions to the effect that the government intends to give "incentives to increase the production of livestock necessary to provide for Canadian and export markets", and in view of the current beef crisis, is the Prime Minister aware that unless immediate steps are taken to mitigate that crisis there will be no beef industry to give any incentive to because all the producers will be bankrupt?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the prediction of the hon. member is not one with which I agree. The position of the government is that supplies can and will increase. As to the stability of returns, the hon. member will recall that his own party rejected the proposition made by this government some years ago that marketing boards could be extended to cattle if the cattlemen so wanted. This is one tool they have not chosen to use, I believe in accord with the Tory party.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. In light of his rejection of the proposals of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association at the meeting yesterday, would the minister indicate what counter-proposals, if any, he made to the association yesterday?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. gentleman gets his information, but I can honestly say that I rejected nothing that the Canadian cattlemen presented to us yesterday. I said that their proposals would be considered, and they will be considered.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT TO INCREASE SUBSIDY IN ORDER TO ENCOURAGE DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he is giving consideration to amending the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to bring into line the subsidy guarantee in order to encourage development of the gold mining industry in northern Ontario?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will recall that the period of time for EGMA was extended, but given the current commercial price of gold it seems unlikely that that kind of floor will be needed to encourage anyone to get into the gold mining industry.

Mr. Peters: I am pleased to hear that the minister understands the problem. I now ask him to overcome that problem. Will he raise the floor to a level that will ensure long-range investment by the industry in the production of gold, taking into account the anticipated price of $200 an ounce?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think I would have to say that the commercial market has done far more than I could ever do in this regard.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE MEDICAL RESEARCH FUNDS WILL NOT BE REDUCED

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the widespread fears and anxieties being caused by the cutback in medical research funds due to inflation, can the minister assure the people, many of whom have lost relatives or friends with incurable diseases, that there will be no cutback in research funds or any loss of teachers or professors in those fields?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to state that there has not been and there will not be a cutback in funds allocated to medical research. I believe these funds will represent an additional $2 million for the Medical Research Council. Second, the council decides on the allocation as between the various fields of research; this is a matter to be decided by the council. As for the total funds allocated, I would like to stress that since 1963 the funds allocated to the council have increased eightfold, from $5 million to just over $40 million.

Mr. Rynard: May I tell the minister that this is the lowest increase given by the second highest inflationary government in history. How could there be an increase?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PRESENCE OF DES IN UNITED STATES CATTLE IMPORTED INTO CANADA

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On February 28 I asked the Minister of Agriculture a question with respect to United States cattle reaching the Canadian market having been fed on the food supplement DES. At that time the minister stated that he would have a conference with the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister had that conference with the Minister of Agriculture regarding United States cattle that have been given this cancer promoting additive to feed, or whatever you want to call it, and what steps is the minister taking now to protect the health of Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Agriculture stated a while ago, we have had many discussions on the matter and we will probably have others. As to the step mentioned by the hon. member, I would like to point out, like the Minister of Agriculture, that several weeks will elapse before the arrival on the Canadian market of any American product treated with DES. I would also like to point out that the government has contacted American authorities and that we will take the necessary steps so that no meat treated with DES will be imported from the United States. We will then consider the application of a certification system guaranteed by the American government and we will also carry proper tests.

● (1450)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period. Perhaps the Chair might be allowed to recognize the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster before calling orders of the day.

TRANSPORT

LOSS OF SHIPMENT OF NICKELS BEING MOVED BY RAIL TO WINNIPEG

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport if he now has information on the case of the missing coins which took place in the dark of night on a train on the way to Winnipeg?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, immediately after the question was asked yesterday I put the question to Canadian National Railways and asked for an answer right away, but I have not received the answer.

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning the comment made by the Minister of Agriculture in respect of the use of DES. I am sure the minister realizes it is common knowledge that the DES implant or growth stimulant is used quite frequently in feeding heifers in feedlots and also that DES is readily available in the United States and is indeed being used right now in the United States. It seems to me—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. He has made his point. Now that he has made his statement I do not really think it is a point of order. If the hon. member feels that the information he has obtained today is not exact he might pursue the matter during the question period tomorrow.

Mr. Frank: Mr. Speaker, in view of the misinterpretation of my earlier question I should like to pursue this very important matter at ten o'clock.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Tuesday, March 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stollery for an address to His Excellency the Governor general in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe there was some difficulty at the time of adjournment yesterday concerning the order of speakers. I think there might be agreement that the Chair recognize the Minister responsible for Urban Affairs followed by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave).

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when I rose I was not aware that there had been some difficulty at the conclusion of yesterday's debate. If the fact I have been recognized has caused the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar any difficulty or inconvenience I apologize to him.

In entering the debate at this time I wish to join all of our colleagues who have extended their congratulations to His Excellency the Governor General and to his lady upon their appointment. As a couple they follow in the footsteps of many distinguished predecessors, and members of the House of Commons who know Their Excellencies know they have the qualities to carry out the job with dignity, warmth and very great charm. I also join with members of this House in extending congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) for their fine contribution to this debate.

I welcome the opportunity to enter the debate because it allows me to review, for the benefit of hon. members and for the benefit of the people of Canada, the progress that has been made in the solution of urban problems, especially the progress toward our goal as a government as well as a nation of making available good housing at reasonable cost to all Canadians wherever they live. Before beginning my remarks on housing and urban affairs more generally, I should like to devote if I may a few moments to matters that affect me as a minister from British Columbia which were mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. One of the highest priorities of people in British Columbia is the opening up of the northern part of the province and the development of their northern resources and northern industrial capability. The major port and railway program agreement made between British Columbia and the federal government announced the day before the Western Economic Opportunities Conference, will make those aspirations a reality. That agreement, coupled with a major further agreement to be signed between British Columbia and the government of Canada by my colleague and seatmate, the minister responsible for regional economic expansion, will, as I say, allow those aspirations of British Columbians to become a reality.

A key transportation component announced at the Western Economic Opportunities Conference is the construction of the Clinton-Ashcroft link between the CNR and the British Columbia Railway. Although this construction is taking place in British Columbia, all western provinces will benefit from it. Those in this House who ask daily questions about the movement of wheat will realize that when bad weather closes the rail lines through the Fraser Canyon, the one outlet to the Port of Vancouver, as it has done on several occasions, the building of the Clinton-Ashcroft passage will enable us to keep the grain shipments and other freight moving between the prairies and the port of Vancouver to the markets of the world. Tnat, of course, must be proceeded with, as was outlined in that agreement, with haste.

I should like to dwell for a moment on recent federal contributions to western port development. Last year the federal government spent almost one half the total National Harbours Board budget in British Columbia.

[Mr. Speaker.]

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Basford: I am delighted to hear my colleague from the Progressive Conservative Party across the way say "shame" to that. That is usually the way they regard British Columbia problems.

Specific projects now under development include the $30 million Vanterm Container Facility and the $20 million Lynnterm Deep Sea Terminal. This kind of capital expenditure will be continuing for some years. Outside the Vancouver port area a feasibility study is presently being conducted into the next phase of the Roberts Bank port development. For Prince Rupert, the federal government, apart entirely from the railway expansion program, has already announced a $17 million program for port expansion. These are exciting and bold developments which will ensure a strong base from which to compete for world trade. Many of the complaints about our present system of administering ports cannot be measured in terms of personnel and money. The government and my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), the responsible minister, recognized this in the Speech from the Throne by calling for the development of a new ports policy aimed at establishing a high degree of local involvement.

● (1500)

I believe there is a pressing need, and I speak as a member from British Columbia, for an independent regional port authority for western Canada. For far too long we have tried unsuccessfully to evolve a single national ports policy for all of Canada. To continue to view all Canadian port facilities as a monolithic entity in the hope of finding a comprehensive ports policy is to miss entirely the crux of the complaints from the various regional ports, particularly those located in the west.

Vancouver and Prince Rupert are national ports, national in every sense of the word, but they are also western ports serving the four western provinces particularly, and the need for a national ports policy must therefore be reconciled with the essential requirement for greater regional involvement in their operation, their management and their planning. It is with that recognition that the statement in the Speech from the Throne appears in respect of the evolution of a new ports policy.

Mr. Alexander: Let's get down to the $75,000 homes in Toronto.

Mr. Basford: The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) suggests that we get down to housing, that is what I want to do.

Urban matters and housing are among the main priorities of the government. This is adequately demonstrated by the attention devoted to urban matters and to housing in the Speech from the Throne, from which I quote as follows:

> In the domain of social policy the government is playing a vital role to achieve a more balanced pattern of urban growth and to increase the quality of life in our cities in co-operation with the provinces and municipalities. Improved means of public transportation are indispensable to the achievement of these urban goals. Measures will be introduced to establish a National Urban Transportation Development Corporation to co-ordinate and market the development of required new technology in this field. You will be asked to consider measures to assist provinces and cities in the relocation of railway lines and terminals and in the redevelopment of these areas for purposes that will enhance the environment of many of our cities and towns.

And further:

Provision of adequate shelter at reasonable prices in a satisfactory neighbourhood environment has been a continuing concern of the Government, and levels of funding to meet this objective are being reviewed. Substantial assistance to rural and native housing programs will also be proposed.

I notice an hon. member from Newfoundland desires to say something and I draw that particular reference to his attention. To continue with the statement:

The sewage assistance program will be revised to make it more effective as a means to increase the supply of serviced land. The Government will introduce measures to increase the protection available to consumers in the housing market.

Mr. Alexander: You are going to have a busy session.

Mr. Basford: Our first objective is to manage urban growth before it manages us. I come from Vancouver and I am anxious that Vancouver and our other major cities in this country such as Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg, Halifax and others—

Mr. Alexander: And Hamilton.

Mr. Basford: The whole Hamilton-Toronto axis, yes. I am anxious that they should flourish in the future as they have in the past. But too rapid growth in those urban centres causes numerous problems, which we are experiencing now, for those large cities; numerous problems in housing, land costs, long distances to be travelled between home and work, pollution and the lack of amenities, and we now see this phenomenon within the country. To concentrate growth in a few large cities will leave much of rural Canada in the prairie provinces, Quebec, Ontario and in some of the Atlantic provinces, as well as many small towns and cities, in a desperate position with no growth, or even losing growth.

These are national problems and the federal government has already taken a strong lead in things that should be solved on a national basis by co-operation at the federal, provincial and municipal levels of government. As the throne speech has indicated, the federal government intends to do much more in this regard during the forthcoming session in terms of developing in a co-operative way within this country good techniques of managing urban growth.

Our second main objective relates to the quality of life in the cities we have today, especially the quality of life in the central cores of our largest cities. All of us in this House who represent city ridings can think of neighbourhoods in those cities as well as small communities and small towns which are threatened by social as well as physical decay.

Two federal programs that this parliament enacted which are designed to meet these needs were introduced and passed last session through amendments to the National Housing Act. I refer to the neighbourhood improvement program and to the residential rehabilitation program in particular, both of which programs I am now happy to report, some months after passage of the legislation, have been well received by provincial and municipal governments.

In recent months I have visited all of the provinces and raised these matters with their responsible ministers. We now have neighbourhood improvement agreements to provide for the selection of neighbourhoods within these provinces and for the rejuvenation of these neighbourhoods. We now have agreements with six provinces and I am confident that we will soon have agreements with all of them.

To the extent that we are able to go back into our older neighbourhoods and communities and rehabilitate them and the housing in them we are improving the life in our cities but, more importantly in today's context, we can through this technique provide a large stock of more moderately priced housing and relieve some of the pressures we now see for new land, new subdivisions, new housing and new servicing.

In today's society we talk about the need to recycle many things, including bottles and tin cans. we talk about all the environmental factors and the need to recycle these things. These two new programs are designed to recycle housing in neighbourhoods, and they are essential. I would hope all hon. members in this House will work with me toward assuring that the provinces name the particular neighbourhoods to which these programs should apply as quickly as possible so the programs can begin doing what they are designed to do.

Hon. members and all Canadians have their own ideas, of course, about urban needs, ideal cities, the need for good housing at reasonable cost, clean air, convenient transportation, attractive surroundings, security, excitement and so on.

An hon. Member: Oh boy!

Mr. Basford: There is less agreement on how we should solve the problems of transforming our towns and cities to meet these views. Having regard to the contents of the Speech from the Throne, I wanted to discuss a number of topics, but I should like to concentrate particularly on urban transportation and housing. Let me begin with urban transportation.

There can surely be little disagreement that, in our larger cities at any rate, there is a need for a shift away from the automobile toward public transit systems, especially given today's land and energy situation. For this reason, the throne speech announced our intention as a government to create a national urban transportation development corporation. We have been having discussions with the provinces, and these will be intensified with interested provinces to seek their participation in the establishment of this corporation.

Scarcely a week goes by without the appearance of some new or improved scheme for improving public transit, but in some cases we do not need to wait, and we should not get carried away waiting for some new exotic system to be developed. For example, in terms of public transit, one of the more immediate needs in many of our cities is a good dial-a-bus system. Some of our cities are indeed experimenting in this regard. In many of our cities there are railway tracks and other facilities that could be adapted to meet both light and heavy urban transit needs. I forsee the national urban transportation development corporation being able, once established, to supply these equipment needs to municipal and provincial systems in the best, fastest, and cheapest way.

● (1510)

We will be providing, in the railway relocation bill that my colleague, the Minister of transport and I will be introducing, that existing rail lines, rights of way, and other facilities can be recycled as part of an urban transportation plan for use for urban and interurban services.

Mr. Alexander: It's about time. You have been studying it for three years.

Mr. Basford: I am delighted to note, from comments from Conservatives and members of the NDP, that this measure will have their immediate and overwhelming support. I hope that, therefore, it will have easy and quick passage through the House.

Mr. Alexander: Let us see the fine print.

Mr. Basford: In other cases, however, our towns and cities have networks of rail tracks and yards that, because of changes in transportation methods, are now under-utilized to meet current needs, and do not in any sense need to occupy the large tracts of urban land that they presently occupy. The railway relocation legislation will provide a vital means by which the quality of life in many Canadian cities, large and small, can be significantly improved, and under which huge tracts of downtown land can be made available for residential and commercial use.

I draw attention to studies that have been conducted in many cities, and in particular the city of Winnipeg, where the matter is a controversial one. In that city there are at least three different proposals for railway relocation and, without indicating a preference for either of them, if the bulk of the railway tracks could be removed from the Arlington yards this would free 600 acres of downtown land for housing and commercial use thereby, as is the case with the neighbourhood improvement program and the repair and rehabilitation program, taking some of the pressure off the need for new land, new services and new communities. Before outlining the housing measures, legislative and otherwise, which we are preparing for the year ahead, I should like a moment to review the progress which we have achieved toward meeting our goal, under the National Housing Act, of creating good housing at an affordable cost for all Canadians, and to put these activities into some kind of perspective.

However, this kind of comparison is not a source of self-satisfaction to the government. We will not be satisfied as long as there are families who lack the kind of home that contributes to their fullest possible well being. So, Mr. Speaker, I think that hon. members on all sides of the House will readily concede that in terms of getting houses built we are doing a good job.

Some 268,000 new housing units were started during 1973, more than in any other year in Canadian history.

Mr. Gillies: How many single family houses?

[Mr. Basford.]

Mr. Basford: The hon. member asks how many single family houses. We had a record number of single family housing formations during the same period.

Mr. Gillies: That is just nonsense.

Mr. Basford: I am amused at the static I hear coming from Conservative members from Ontario. They are criticizing me for policies that have generated 268,000 housing units in one year, but only yesterday their provincial colleagues were taking credit for creating just 100,000 housing units.

Mr. Alexander: Don't let us get you confused.

Mr. Basford: Before the end of the month of March somewhere in Canada workmen will begin laying the foundation for the one millionth housing unit to be constructed in Canada since 1970,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: —exceeding the forecast needs quoted by the Economic Council of Canada. If I had time I could quote speech after speech from hon. members opposite saying that we must meet the target set by the Economic Council of Canada. For their benefit, I simply want to record the fact that we are exceeding that target. If hon. members opposite want to draw a comparison with the United States, I would point out that housing starts in Canada increased by 8 per cent last year, while they declined by 14 per cent in the United States. That is a startling comparison that underlines the success of Canadian policy.

Looking forward to 1974, and taking into account the impact of our new social housing programs which will create more low and medium priced housing than has ever been built in the past, I believe that we have a very good chance of matching if not exceeding the 1973 record. As hon. members know very well—

Mr. Gillies: What is a medium priced house?

Mr. Basford: Again, I am getting some static from hon. members opposite. All hon. members know very well, it is one thing to build housing, and it is another thing to see that housing is fairly distributed to people who need it, senior citizens, and low and moderate income Canadians. That distribution is the major problem at which housing policy is aimed. My colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), in his extremely able address yesterday dealt with the general question of inflation and rising costs.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): He did not.

Mr. Basford: He dealt with it very ably, if I may say so, and rather than dealing with the matters with which he dealt yesterday I will deal with the distribution of housing, and with why we are pushing all of our new housing programs which offer practical and immediate help to people who need it most.

An important element in housing costs is the cost of serviced urban land. The objective of the land assembly program is to overcome this phenomenon by providing serviced land where and when it is needed. Hon. members will recall that more than a year ago we undertook to provide at least $100 million per year for five years for public land assembly schemes. Incidentally this was twice the amount recommended by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) at that time.

The response of other governments was initially slow, but I am happy to report to the House at this point that as a result of my travels and meetings with provincial governments, and as a result of the efforts of federal officials and provincial governments, we exceeded our target in 1973, so by the end of that year we were able to commit $150 million for land assembly. There are prospects for the coming year of very substantial commitments for land assembly. It has our complete support as a government.

As a result of the changes that I announced at the trilevel conference on urban affairs in Edmonton in October, the bulk of federal land assembly funds are being provided to those provinces and municipalities and to those projects which promise a quick start and quick development of lots. We undoubtedly need five to ten and twenty year land banks in this country, but immediately we need public land assemblies that provide lots as soon as possible. I am delighted that using our federal resources either by way of loans or partnership, governments like Ontario, British Columbia and Manitoba are following our lead for "quick start" land assemblies rather than long term land banking.

Hon. members will be gratified to learn that the amendments to the National Housing Act, which they enacted into law last June, have been enthusiastically received by all who share in their implementation and benefits. If 1973 was the year of major amendments to the National Housing Act, I trust 1974 will be seen as the year of complete implementation and utilization of these amendments. If that occurs, if provinces, municipalities, non-profit groups and others who can benefit under the act, fully implement and utilize those amendments, I know that these provisions will make a major contribution to solving our current housing problems.

I have already mentioned the Neighbourhood Improvement Program and the Repairs and Rehabilitation Programs. The Assisted Home Ownership Program has already assisted more than 8,000 low and moderate income families to buy their own homes. And by the end of the year, the benefits of this program will assist as many as 18,000 families to become home owners. We hear a lot about subsidized interest and home purchase plans, and that is exactly what this program is about, reducing to those on low and moderate incomes effective interest rates to 6 per cent. I would hope that hon. members would give that program their complete support and see that people in the income categories provided get the benefit.

An hon. Member: Where do you buy those?

Mr. Basford: I am also determined that the so-called "third force" in housing flourish to the maximum extent possible, that the co-operatives, charitable and the non-profit groups and other organizations build or acquire low and moderate price housing. During 1973, we committed $104 million in preferred rate loans. In addition, $313,000 in grants was paid to these organizations to help them to do research, build their own organizations and plan housing projects.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I have to interrupt the hon. minister but his time has expired. He can continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I should like to give my consent—I do not know whether this is a condition—if he would answer one question at the end of his speech. I would appreciate that and I certainly want to hear him out.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to do so. I am sorry to go over my time and I did not intend to do so. I thank hon. members for their courtesy in allowing me to go on and I shall conclude quickly.

With regard to the non-profit and co-operative housing groups, in my view they have a piece of legislation that they can take full advantage of, and in that they have my full support and complete encouragement.

I would also like to say something about the work we are doing with the native people, particularly the Métis or non-status Indians. We are maintaining a close relationship with native peoples' housing organizations. This relationship is founded on the principle that native people must be involved in the designing and construction of their own projects.

This consultation accounts for the remarkable achievements of such native housing organizations as KINEW in Winnipeg, CANATIVE in Edmonton and the Saskatchewan and British Columbia Métis housing associations. I have the views of the Métis associations and their national council. I have recently discussed these matters with the more involved provinces and I will be meeting with the Métis and non-status spokesmen tomorrow to further develop programs sensitive to their needs. And while I intend to give priority to this special need, I also intend to outline a national rural housing program to meet the general needs of people outside of our major urban centres.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: Our housing programs have been criticized as being oriented to the big cities and towns. We have a rural housing program for the country and we are developing policies to meet that. Mr. Speaker, I want by reference a few cities to show, by example, how we intend to act and how our housing policy can take effect.

In Ottawa, there are 400 acres in Nepean Township in federal hands. We want to put these lands to use as a housing project which will demonstrate new ways of building residential communities. We will explore new forms of housing which make the most economical use of land while providing all of the amenities that families require. Particularly important now, it could demonstrate ways in which new technology may be used to conserve energy and materials. We are creating a development arm within CMHC to carry out the plan. I have met with the reeve and hope we can lay concrete proposals before him very soon. I hope construction can begin in 1975.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, hon. members are familiar with our efforts outside Ottawa in what is called the southeast city and the federal and provincial governments' acquisition of some 5,200 acres upon which to develop a wholly new community. I believe that project can demonstrate the usefulness of new communities in the management of urban growth which is essential, and as a means of reducing land costs. This plan presents a practical solution to the long term growth problems of this region. Let me say—in case there is any doubt about it—that it is urgent and critical that it proceed as quickly as good planning and full consultation with all governments will allow. We are ready to do so and CMHC and the NCC have been instructed by me to attach the highest possible priority to these developments and to co-operate fully with Ontario and the regional municipality.

Outside the capital region, the Metro Toronto-Hamilton axis area must obviously be a high priority area. In the last couple of months we have committed some $90 million to $100 million so that land can be brought quickly onto the market. I trust that the announcements made in the Ontario throne speech yesterday reflect this use of federal programs for that purpose. Apart from public land assemblies, private developers can surely be persuaded to put land on the market more quickly, aimed at lower income groups in exchange for speedier developmental approval. I hope that governments will follow that course. I have long urged and pointed out that the National Housing Act supports municipalities engaged in land assembly and I am delighted that Toronto, for one is engaging in public land assembly with our support. The mayor and council have a housing report before them on which I must congratulate them, and a housing program involving the full use of the National Housing Act program including the co-op section, the municipal land assemblies, the non-profit and the rehabilitation grants. In this, the city of Toronto has my complete support and co-operation.

In Vancouver, neither the city nor the province can complain of lack of support from Ottawa for housing programs. Major projects in Burnaby and Vancouver, including False Creek, have been approved with a minimum of red tape in a matter of weeks. Loans involving millions of dollars have been approved literally in a few weeks. In these developments the full range of housing initiatives, which include direct lending land assembly, assisted home ownership and so on under our program will be used. Vancouver and other places have very low vacancy rates. For the coming year, they will be given priority in the allocation of capital funds aimed at increasing these vacancy rates.

I could repeat examples of this in other cities and towns of Canada. My point is that, apart from changes to be made this session, I hope members will do all they can to assure that the housing programs are used in their provinces and municipalities. They are generally well funded. The level of funding is currently being reviewed and the programs can, if used, make a major contribution to solving housing problems. The housing act can respond, and it is responding to the solution of real housing needs in cases where provinces and municipalities are using it.

In addition to these measures and our thrust towards quickstart land assembly, we have been discussing with the provinces changes in the sewage treatment program which, among other things, would provide assistance for trunk sewers for storm water where they are used to create new developments aimed at bringing more serviced lots onto the market.

Another measure I plan to propose will give additional assistance to small towns and places where the per capita cost of sewage works puts an inordinate burden on the taxpayer. This is aimed, again, at bringing more serviced lots onto the market at a faster rate. This legislation is being drafted and will be introduced soon. Many provinces and municipalities have taken full advantage of the sewage treatment loan program. The province of Quebec has not taken much advantage of this program; recently, however, the government of the province announced a major thrust in this area. I have already indicated my agreement for allocating $80 million of federal funding to the province of Quebec, for the 1974 program entered into for this purpose.

There are other aspects of the federal government's urban affairs activities and housing programs which I should like to discuss, but I am already trespassing on the time of the House. Undoubtedly, the forthcoming budget debate, the rest of this debate and consideration of estimates in committee will afford opportunities for going into these things. I had wanted, in my speech, to deal with other matters, but there will be other occasions when these can be discussed. In the time available to me today I thought hon. members would be encouraged to hear a brief report on the enthusiastic response to our new housing programs, our urban transportation plans and the very substantial progress which these programs have made and can make towards the goal of providing all Canadians with sound, safe and satisfying accommodation in a pleasant and protective neighbourhood environment.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, will the minister permit a question? I appreciate the indulgence of the House in permitting me to ask it. The minister talked about serviced lots and stressed the effects of the land banking program, on which $100 million a year is to be spent. May I ask how much out of that $100 million has been granted this past year. I understand that only $9 million has gone to Toronto which, considering the extraordinarily high price of lots in Toronto, is not very much. How much of that $100 million has been allocated to our major cities?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I do not have the breakdown city by city on my desk. As indicated in my speech we had indicated last year that we would commit at least $100 million for land assembly. I indicated in my speech that, by the end of 1973, we had already committed $150 million for land assembly. I pointed out that, in addition, we must consider the cost of servicing the land assembled. That cost is included in the sewer loan support program and amounted to some $250 million. The $9 million was a direct loan to the city of Toronto only. Loans for all Ontario, many of which were made with regard to land around the Toronto and Hamilton area, amounted to about $73 million.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I want to talk about the apparent direction of the government's agricultural policy as seen by ordinary farmers and make some references to the Speech from the Throne. It is couched in generalities, which is why, I suppose, most members in their speeches have not referred to it directly.

In the last several years the members of this House have seen some swings in agricultural policy. I listened to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) speaking the other day, to try to learn if there was to be any clearcut policy or direction with regard to farm policy for Canada.

In the last few years we have seen several farm oriented programs, such as LIFT, under which farmers were asked not to grow too much wheat. The government said to them, "Do not grow so much barley; lay off rapeseed; actually, if you take one year's holiday and get lost we will all be better off." Fortunately, the farmers did not take the government too seriously, but we are still recovering from the effects of such programs.

It is fair to say that the farm programs the present administration has offered to this country have been lacking in consistency. I will only mention one or two of them. The proposal for stabilizing farm incomes which surfaced in the previous session is again evident in the Speech from the Throne. If the idea of stabilization means anything, I suggest it means that the income of farmers will be stablized, at a profitable level, that the performance of agriculture will be satisfactory, and that there will be a consistent pattern in the field of agriculture, and farm income. At the same time, however, we must bear in mind proposals such as those made by the minister for the Canadian Wheat Board, under which he would remove jurisdiction with regard to the sale of barley and oats from the Canadian Wheat Board as of Aug. 1, 1974 and allow these commodities to be traded on the open market, on the commodities exchange.

Mr. Benjamin: Over our dead bodies.

Mr. Gleave: I can think of few ways which are more effective in bringing about swings and variations in price than trading commodities on the open market through a commodities exchange, as is done in Winnipeg, Chicago, London, Paris and elsewhere. Nobody claims, I think, that such a scheme would contribute to stable commodity prices. Whatever claims are made for commodity exchanges, stability is not one of them. So I must say, on this one score alone, that I remain to be convinced about the consistency of the government's policies.

● (1540)

One may go on from there to take a look at the manner in which beef has been marketed in the past several months. In the last day or so, some of those representing the beef industry had discussions with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) with regard to the circumstances in which the beef feeders, those who make a living from feeding or fattening beef, find themselves. This particular commodity has all the advantages available to it of a futures market or cash auction market.

At one point during the past few months, the government placed an embargo on Canadian fat cattle moving to the United States. Nothing could have been more calculated to throw the market into confusion. It threw the beef price structure and marketing in western Canada, Ontario and eastern Canada into confusion. An embargo was slapped on over the weekend, leaving the farmers to find out how, where and at what price they could market their beef. I do not know if a more disastrous thing could have happened to the beef market.

After the farmers recovered somewhat from that, a surcharge was put on U.S. beef coming into the Canadian market. That lasted for a while. I am sure the minister and the government received a great number of complaints. They realized it was not a good idea and decided to phase it out somewhere around February 15. That is fine, but it does not contribute to stability.

What is going to happen at this time, we do not know. We will have to wait and see. For the sake of the industry, I hope the minister will announce the government's beef production policy within the next day or two so that these men who are raising beef, feeding them at great expense and running cow-calf operations may know what to expect. Let's have some stable policy.

When the Minister of Agriculture was in Swift Current, Saskatchewan on February 18, he addressed the chamber of commerce. That is a good place to talk to people in the livestock business. I noticed he went out of his way to say the Saskatchewan government had imposed a marketing board for pork, even though producers said they did not want it. If the federal government is in favour of a stable marketing policy, why does the Minister of Agriculture object to a hog marketing board operating in the province of Saskatchewan? Why does the minister object to the manner in which it was established? The government of Saskatchewan did not break its own laws.

I happen to know something about the marketing board act. I am damn sure the minister does, too. The province of Saskatchewan was altogether within its rights. Saskatchewan is the only place in Canada where the farmers are guaranteed 57 cents a pound or $57 a hundred for their hogs. One would have expected the minister to say he fully supported the action of that province in stabilizing an important part of the livestock industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: The minister said he is a strong supporter of marketing boards. He means, provided they do not operate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: The other great conciliator on the government side is the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. His contribution to stabilization is removing feed grains from the operations of the wheat board and putting them on the open market. That minister will go down in history as one of the greatest non-conciliators to hit the grain industry of Saskatchewan for a long, long time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: Because everyone did not agree with him, the minister accused the Saskatchewan representatives of walking out of the meeting. In a press release he said they can walk out and stay out; he will talk directly to the farmers and their organizations. Well, any federal minister who does not know that the minister of agriculture in Saskatchewan represents the farmers in Saskatchewan has something to learn. One need only look at the support his party received in the last election. If you do not believe that, listen to the farmers who are raising hogs in Saskatchewan.

The minister said the meeting was called to fully inform provincial agricultural officials about the details of the feed grains marketing plan for 1973-74 and to seek their co-operation in making it work. He then said they walked out of the meeting in a huff. The minister then referred to Manitoba. He said that he was saddened by the performance of Mr. Uskiw, the minister of agriculture for Manitoba. Everybody is out of step but Aunt Nellie's Joe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: The minister said on one hand he was saddened by Mr. Uskiw's performance, but on the other hand he was more determined than ever. He said he was saddened because the kind of political nonsense displayed by Mr. Uskiw and Mr. McArthur can only hurt the cause of prairie farmers. I say most sincerely to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board that is not the most effective way to gain the confidence of the people in western Canada.

A review of freight rates was asked for at the Western Economic Conference. I do not suppose much has yet been done. Our transportation system is a real disaster when it comes to moving grain. I forecast that because of our transportation system, we will not have the ability to move all the grain for export this year that we could have marketed. The Western Producer reports that a string of 25 carloads of grain which had been sitting at Perdue since January 7 was finally picked up only a few days ago. The President of the National Farmers Union said the CPR cleared the Rosetown-Biggar line of cars on January 7, then abandoned it to the wind and snow, thus leaving it plugged and stranding any grain in elevators on the line. That is typical.

● (1550)

If I had time I could give instances of similar neglect throughout western Canada. Perhaps things are better in Eastern Canada. All this will cost us a great deal in terms of income, and I see no sign that conditions will improve. The minister has told us that more hopper cars will be provided. But the cars we already have are sitting empty. The railroads have simply failed to supply sufficient motive power. The minister responsible for the Wheat Board says he has met with representatives of the railroads and that they would not give him a commitment. Mr. Speaker, we own one of these railroads; the other is privately owned. Is the government so weak, so incompetent that it cannot extract a commitment as to what will be done?

An hon. Member: The Tories own the CPR and they wont sell it.

[Mr. Gleave.]

Mr. Gleave: I cannot see why we should buy it. It was given to the company in the first place and it has done nothing ever since except milk the public for everything it can get.

I turn, now, to another subject. To whose advantage will it be when the government finally gets feed grain on the open market? One of the sad things about this policy is that nobody will benefit except the traders in Winnipeg. The farmers in Quebec will find themselves at the mercy of the grain traders, at the mercy of the scalpers, with nobody standing in between. I have nothing but derision for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board and for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), if it comes, to that, when they say the Wheat Board will be charged with responsibility for seeing that the grain is in position after the commodity market is in charge of the buying and selling. Those two marketing arrangements are like fire and water; they just don't mix. How can there be a futures market which permits any corporation to purchase any amount of grain it wishes, and which is available for future trading, while at the same time it is someone else's responsible to deliver the grain which has been bought? The consequences of this policy will be an uneven flow of grain, whereas formerly there was even controlled flow. The Wheat Board cannot be made responsible for the delivery of grain which someone else owns.

One of the most rewarding discussions I heard last session took place in the Standing Committee on Agriculture. Mr. Gibbings was appearing before the committee. One of the members from the maritimes said New Brunswick farmers were running short of feed grain. He asked the Wheat Board representative where the grain was, and was told it was in Thunder Bay. "Could I buy it?" the hon. member from the maritimes asked. The representative of the Wheat Board answered: "That depends upon who owns it". Of course, it does. That is the sort of situation we shall face after August 1.

I wish to say something, now, about the dairy industry. I wonder whether in the not-too-distant future the minister will be able to announce a policy enabling us to produce all the butter and the cheese we need. I notice a recent statement from Manitoba to the effect that the province is no longer able to produce all the butter it needs. I suspect the position is not much different in Saskatchewan. What incentives will be offered to encourage people to produce the butterfat and the butter we need, as well as all the other dairy products the nation requires. In at least one province powdered milk is being reconstituted so as to meet the demand for fluid milk. It is all very well for the minister to say that milking cows is a 365 days-a-year job. it is all very well for him to say we are now entering an era in which it is more difficult to keep people in the dairy industry. But it was the policies and actions of the Canadian Dairy Commission which forced or persuaded many small farmers to get out of the dairy business. They did get out, and the minister knows it will not be easy to bring them back. He says, and I use his words, that we shall have to re-arrange the dairy industry. Why did he not tell us what he or the government propose to do by way of re-arranging the dairy industry?

One of the most interesting meetings I attended during the last election took place in a little town in my constituency. I happened to drive into the town at a time when a meeting of those interested in the dairy industry was being held. The town used to be a dairy production centre of some consequence. The meeting was attended by agricultural representatives as well as by officials from the senior levels of government. A discussion took place about the best way of persuading farmers to get back into the business of producing manufacturing milk, setting up tanks, transportation and so on. I listened to the discussion and listening, too, at the back of the hall, were women and men who had been milking cows only a few years earlier until they lost their quotas and their right to a subsidy was removed. I heard someone interject that this is not the case. But I read the letters and I listened to their complaints when all this took place. It will obviously be difficult, now, to get these people to go back. I say to the minister he had better take a hard look at the operations of some of the big monopolies and combines which are now engaged in this industry. In my opinion they are carrying too much clout and swinging too big a club, along with some monopolies in other lines of business as well.

● (1600)

The minister mentioned sugar in his speech and the fact that we have not done too well in supporting the sugar industry in underdeveloped countries, as was mentioned by the mover of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. He is right. We have not done very well in supporting the underdeveloped countries; indeed, we have done very badly. We should be supporting a sugar agreement and giving some support to countries in the Caribbean which need it, which have needed it in the past and will need it again. By doing this, we would also benefit our own consumers.

Mr. Whelan: You remind me of Morty Shulman who said that if you want to buy sugar you should buy it cheap from the Caribbean. That is his attitude—don't pay any attention to slave labour. That remark is right in Ontario Hansard.

Mr. Gleave: I do not know what Morty Shulman said, but I do know what I am saying. What I am saying is that we ought to be party to an international commodity agreement to buy and sell sugar, but we are not. The reason we are not is that it does not suit the big sugar combines in Canada, the three big companies which dominate the sugar industry in this country.

Mr. Whelan: There is no international sugar agreement now between any countries.

Mr. Gleave: Are we, as a nation, a signatory or an observer?

Mr. Whelan: We sit in on the negotiations.

Mr. Gleave: We sit in and we might as well sit out for all the good it is doing.

Mr. Whelan: There is no agreement at the present time.

Mr. Gleave: We are helping neither the disadvantaged people in the world nor the Canadian consumer. We can buy sugar in Regina cheaper from a company in Denver, Colorado than we can buy sugar from an Alberta company, and I can quote the figures if the minister wishes. This is the kind of food system we have in this country. It is about time we had a policy that benefitted both the consumer and the producer, and this is possible of achievement. But it is not possible through the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. It is not possible through the sugar combines that exist in Canada and which are presently under investigation. It is not possible with a 20 per cent increase in the cost of production faced by farmers in one year. Both fertilizers and machinery have risen in price.

Dealers in farm machinery in my constituency tell me that they cannot get an adequate supply of machines to run farms, and farming is a mechanized industry today. Neither can farmers in my constituency get a firm price for fertilizer at this point in time. I wrote the minister on February 11 asking him specifically what assurances he had been able to get from the fertilizer companies as to price and as to supply, and I have not yet had a reply.

I do not know whether the minister does not know the facts, or whether the facts are so horrible that he does not want to put them down on paper and admit to them. An hon. member to my right yesterday, I think it was, asked some questions about baling twine and did not receive a very good answer from the minister, who said we were short of sisal. We manufacture twine in this country out of material other than sisal. We also manufacture synthetic twine.

In this regard a pattern seems to be establishing itself. Things we need become in short supply; there does not seem to be any around. The next thing we know, the price moves up substantially. This pattern is becoming so commonplace that we really come to expect it. In the United States, the heads of the big oil companies were called before the responsible Congressional committee and charged with following the practice of creating a scarcity, then jacking up prices.

We would feel a lot better if we had some assurance from the minister that something really effective was being done to keep prices down. We have had no such assurance in regard to farm machinery, farm machinery repairs, fertilizers, and many other commodities that have increased costs for farmers. Neither do we have the assurance from the bakeries that the price of bread is not going to increase. The government subsidizes wheat for domestic use and we as farmers subsidize it also, yet the bakeries jack up the price of the bread and walk off with the profit. What a charade! What a joke! This is Liberalism at its best.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret interrupting the hon. member but the time allotted to him by the Standing Orders has expired. He might, however, continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Gleave: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think I have made the most of the points that I wanted to make, but there is one further matter that I wanted to bring to the attention of the minister. I refer to the outbreak of brucellosis, which is a pretty serious matter. I thought the minister was most unfair when he was asked a question by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) about this outbreak in his area. As a matter of fact the minister replied: "You guys better quit talking about it or else it's going to affect our sales".

I am very much concerned if that is the attitude of the minister, because we face a very serious situation as a result of this contagious abortion in livestock, or brucellosis, as it is known. It is proving very expensive to farmers. I do not think you can pay sufficient compensation to a farmer who has a good dairy herd wiped out by brucellosis; you just could not put up enough money. The same is true of a good beef herd. I would have been happier if, in response to that question, the minister had said he was carefully examining the department's procedures with a view to finding the most effective method of eliminating this disease, or else that new procedures were already in place. In my own area the farmers are greatly concerned about this question.

One last matter before closing, Mr. Speaker. In the absence of the minister to whom the Wheat Board is responsible, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether the Wheat Board would some day tell the House what its policy is toward working out a new international wheat agreement. Has the Wheat Board any plans to work out a new commodity agreement, and can it get the co-operation of the European Common Market countries, or Australia, Argentina and the United States, the principal signatories of the last one? Are they actively exploring the possibility? At some time I should like them to tell us if they are exploring the possibility of an agreement on sugar and other international commodities.

● (1610)

If we are to hope for or expect a stable return to farmers, there are two or three major things which must be done, as the minister knows. We must seek international commodity agreements. That is one thing. The other is that we must seek and encourage machinery throughout this nation that will give us stable prices and stable bargaining power for the farmer. That is the second thing we must have if we are to achieve the objective which the government has set. Frankly, I say to the minister, so far as this party is concerned, we will be judging the legislation which comes in not only by what it provides but by what it leaves out. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that if there is stability of prices and income for the farmer as well as giving a fair break to the consumer, we will look at that.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, our tradition is such that in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, a member of Parliament is expected to pay tribute to His Excellency the Governor General, to the right hon. Prime Minister, to the Leader of the Official Opposition, to the Speaker of the House, to the mover and seconder of the Address in reply. Therefore, all these distinguished gentlemen may be assured of my most sincere regard, and I congratulate them for the work they have achieved in their respective function. I do not know any better way of giving them a proof of my solidarity than by anticipating their wishes and proceeding right now to the analysis of the outline of this government intentions that is called the Speech from the Throne.

[Mr. Gleave.]

I do not consider the official opposition's role as being the incense bearer of the government, praising it for its good deeds if any, sympathizing with its problems, excusing its weaknesses as if they were unavoidable. On the contrary, the opposition's role is to induce the government to do better when they only do well, and to condemn them when they do not properly fulfill the responsibilities that are bestowed upon them. Democracy is the better for it.

Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne leads us to ask ourselves questions, first on our real chances of success in the short and long term as regards the fight against inflation then on the suitability of the federal approach to urban problems, in the field of transportation or in other areas. In both cases, the very approach of the present Liberal government is controversial and debatable. Before explaining why and how, I would like to emphasize right away that the Speech from the Throne completely fails to mention the international policy of this government. Must we believe, Mr. Speaker, that rumours relating to the early resignation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), which have circulated for sometime, were or still are justified to the extent that he was unable to draft a few relevant sentences that could have given evidence of a new breath of the present government in foreign affairs? Who knows? It is strangely silent. One thing is sure, within roughly ten days at the most my party in keeping with the work it undertook to be better prepare to govern this country when the time comes will publish a work paper to make known to all both its orientation and its commitments with respect to foreign affairs. As many others that document will be submitted to our members for consideration and approval at our forthcoming national convention to be held in Ottawa on March 17, 18 and 19.

I further point out, Mr. Speaker, the remarkable discretion of the Speech from the Throne on the serious problem of regional disparity. I find but one sentence and even then a very short and most evasive sentence, and I quote:

● (1620)

The government attaches great importance to regional development.

And that is all. The need is barely felt to say that measures will be introduced to deal with transportation, freight rates and port facilities. Nothing is said about the need for an industrial strategy, an economic development strategy underlying the entire concept. Once again we have empty promises with respect to regional economic expansion.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) could speak at length on the expectations and disappointments of the people in his area and if necessary he could read to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) headlines on this subject published in La Tribune, a daily newspaper in the Quebec Eastern Townships.

Other areas in Quebec are growing impatient because this government is dragging its feet. The northwestern part represented by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) who, we are glad to see, is back among us today would even have more to say on this subject. Also in the same situation we find the Saguenay, Lake St. John and St. Muarice areas, where the working papers on regional development are more numerous than viable projects and where people are fed up with false hopes raised in the Kruger manner; the Laurentians, where Mirabel is being built in spite of delays, makeshifts, if not injustices, when one considers the fate of expropriated individuals on behalf of whom I am requesting once again the setting up of a parliamentary committee; the North Shore that refuses to be merely an economic appendage of the United States; the Lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspé Peninsula, where because of the failure in Cabano of a proposed community cardboard factory, the people are desperate and where the fishermen, according to the members for Matane and Gaspé (Messrs. De Bané and Cyr), are tired of being neglected; in the Bois-Franc area as elsewhere, bankruptcies have shown that the government economic growth policy is in no way based on a strategy of industrial and economic development; the Quebec area, where at times patronage and expedience have outweighed wisdom and long-term prospects and where, for example, Lauzon is still awaiting the government's decision about a merchant marine. This derides the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Comtois), but it does not amuse neither the people of Lauzon nor the unemployed workers; the greater Montreal area, where projects as tremendous as Mirabel or 1976 Olympics should not make us forget on the one hand the shocking and early disposition of farm lands in the area, and on the other, the pressing need, both for the people in greater Montreal and throughout Quebec, to see Montreal launched on a viable and sustained economic recovery likely to create permanent jobs; the Outaouais region nearby, which ought to be something more than merely across the river from Ottawa and which must not be taken away from Quebec heritage, culturally, socially and economically. Those Mr. Speaker, are the areas, where the citizens are living in the expectation of better days to come without uprooting themselves from their environment, days which would be planned right now in closer cooperation with the Quebec government.

In my own riding of Saint-Hyacinthe, several businessmen or contractors complain to me about the difficulties they meet with when trying to expand, to enlarge or improve their plant while some industries threaten to leave as did recently Crane Society Ltd., in Marieville. We are sick and tired of the same short sighted program, sick and tired of those piece meal loans without any planning. And failing recognition as a special area which I requested last year and for the reasons I gave at that time, Saint-Hyacinthe wants to know quickly and squarely what industries will the government encourage in the area. For instance we want to know when they will take concrete measures to establish an agricultural food industry in the riding of Saint-Hyacinthe. Those are the regions, the ridings in Quebec where the Liberals in the next election campaign will have to explain the silence of the Speech from the Throne concerning regional economic expansion.

In Quebec, we will force them to speak about regional economic expansion and unemployment because we have 250,000 unemployed in Quebec. Nearly 10 per cent of the labour force in Quebec is idle and the future is not very promising. We will force them also to talk in concrete and clear terms about the 9.3 per cent rise of the cost of living during the last 12 months. In the food sector alone, which is vital, there was a rise of 18.2 per cent during those last 12 months. Unfortunately, that is not the end of it.

Let the Liberals come to Saint-Hyacinthe to Brome-Missisquoi, to Joliette, whose distinguished representative has come back among us and who is certainly destined to assume great responsibilities in our team. Let them come to one of these constituencies or to any other.

An hon. Member: They already did.

Mr. Wagner: They came and we saw the result. Let them come to our constituencies during the next election campaign and apologize to the people for their inertia before inflation and let them say that the main reason for the problem is the international inflationary spiral.

[English]

There is quite a difference between a government's constitutional right to govern and its moral right to seek the confidence of the people. I doubt very much whether this government understands that difference or, even worse, cares about it. As long as the Liberal-NDP charade continues, as long as the pressures of big corporations and big unions frustrate both members of the coalition from acting on prices, wages and profits, this daily erosion of our system's credibility will be massive, and rightly so. No wonder people are losing faith. Gentlemen on the other side should not wonder why the young are cynical and the aged are bitter. We have no government.

Ministers are racing around the country eradicating what confidence might still remain out there. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is keeping a low profile for reasons that friends of the heir apparent know too well. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) leaves hints that he might like a switch of task, or something even more restful, and the consensus of Eglington, from what I gathered on my last visit there, is that he will soon have what his heart desires. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) snatches insincereties from the jaws of truth whenever he rises to answer a question. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) talks about football while inflation attacks the rights of Canadians to decent nutrition. The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) is out trying to sell what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) is trying to buy back. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) wants to investigate in private what is going awry very seriously in public, and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) says: Spend, spend, spend a little more. What is $3 billion and some, asks he. As the Minister of External Affairs would say, that is the Liberal way.

They remind me of a company on the verge of bankruptcy, unafraid to amass as many creditors as possible. It would be funny if it were not so sad. The creditors are the Canadian people. The government is piling up massive debt, debt that in terms of eroded confidence, mistrust, cynicism and despair may carry with it a rate of interest our nation is unable to pay. Politics, if they are to have any meaning today, must be synonymous with honesty, integrity, and responsive government. Members of the NDP used to care about this. Indeed, they used to be the purists about our system and its accountability. In all sincerity I ask my colleagues to the left: where is this purism now?

● (1630)

Mr. Alexander: And where are they?

Mr. Wagner: There isn't one member of the NDP in the House at this moment. The purism is gone, and the members are gone. They only reappear when they have to give a vote to save the government and keep the government in power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: Where is the decency and the implicit humanity of Mr. Tommy Douglas' new Jerusalem? What, if anything, I ask them, have you said you cannot suffer as social democrats from this government? I have to wonder. I have to wonder about the young people attached to all the political parties, in the schools, and across the young work force. What are they to learn from this parliament? What are they to learn from this government? So far, they have learned that no Conservative policy is too repugnant for the Liberals to steal, no socialist principle is too sacred to be sold, and no Liberal policy is so solid as to stand on its own merits.

As a famous Liberal was wont to end his speeches—I am sure hon. members across the aisle have often heard this—he would end by saying, "Gentlemen, these are our principles—and if you don't like them, we have others". I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if that is the type of game we want to play with social justice in Canada. I wonder if we have the right to play that game with our nation's fiscal and economic policies.

Beyond this chamber, beyond the pundits and the trained observers in the Press Gallery, there are 22 million Canadians who, for the most part, are partisans of no political party. They are partisans of this institution we call democracy. They are poll workers in their everyday jobs, if you like, for the concept which we call Canada. They believe that this concept means more than politics. They believe it means justice, equity, unity and direction, and when we play with this concept we are playing with the faith and trust of those who make this country live and grow and prosper.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: When we attack their faith, undermine their hope, limit their fair share, we are attacking this nation's future. I would think that no member of this House would want to be a party to that.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in addition to refusing to speak on many important issues, the present government, is at fault in its very orientation. While the government seems winded, without either imagination or daring on the international level, the same holds true on the domestic scene.

Inflation and the record of the relations between Ottawa and the provincial governments—particularly Quebec's—give ample proof of this fact. This country no longer needs intellectuals who are either bored or weakened by power, a power which they are gradually losing; this country needs qualified administrators who are capable of innovation.

[Mr. Wagner.]

Mr. Speaker, it is not true that we have to submit to the increasing inflation—any pressures and it is no longer true that the Quebecers' only real choice of a government is the Liberal party.

For instance, the cost of single-family dwellings built for the average wage earner went from $22,500 in October 1973 to $28,600 in February 1974. This happened at Laval, on the south shore of Montreal and elsewhere. It is not true that this is solely the result of international inflation.

When the owners or managers of well-known grocery stores have reached the point where, to operate according to the good old principle "the most for the least", they keep their employees regularly for two and one-half days every week, and week after week, only to mark up food stuff, it is not true that this is the result solely of the international inflation.

When some of those same merchants, these are facts, Mr. Speaker, and this happened in Montreal early this week, increase by one cent or more the price of some 400 different articles, it is not true that this is the result solely of the international inflation. When the large chain stores such as Loblaw's, Dominion Stores Ltd., Steinberg, Provigo, Becker Milk and Harvey's Food, as well as several others manage to increase their profits from 1971 to 1972 respectively by 43.2, 188.2, 58.2, 29.4, 63, 646.5 and 78.9 per cent, and when we know that those same stores and others made even higher profits in 1972 and 1973, it is not automatically true that this is simply the result of international inflation.

When businessmen, the "big shots" especially, build up stocks like never before, whether it consist of heating fuel or mostly food products, in such quantities that they have to rent additional storage space to better plan their spiralling profits, it is not true that the only influence is that of international inflationary pressures. The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) and many others should try to find a single unoccupied storeroom in good condition in Montreal at the present time!

Mr. Speaker, the cost of living, especially as concerns food products, is increasing at a scandalous rate.

The poorest among our fellow citizens, and even those whom we say belong to the middle class, all the wage earners who—and I was happy to hear the prime minister himself say it—are not responsible for the present increase in the cost of living, want us to control inflation.

In my constituency of Saint-Hyacinthe as elsewhere in Canada, the government is expected to take immediate, strict, firm and energetic action tackling at short term both with the present effects of inflation and its causes at least its Canadian causes.

The present inertia of this government which, in the short term at least, is forsaking the consumer threatened by inflation, is already appearing as the basic cause of its impending defeat and proves to be, which is more serious, an accomplice of the worst injustice.

This government has in fact surrendered to inflation. Public opinion exacerbated by the "big one" annihilating the "small one" should compel this government to resign and give way to a serious team ready to administer the country.

If the farm producer, his problems and his needs are finally better understood, so much the better, and with my constituents of Saint-Hyacinthe, I am the first to rejoice about it. But... beware, I want to enter the following caveat: If it is high time and commendable that politics serve the farmer a little better, let no one use the farmer to play politics, as has been the case far too long in Quebec politics.

Our farmers are also, and first of all, first class citizens and in this capacity also, they consume a great deal of products. On the farm itself, they know what their raw materials cost—always more. If they want more assistance, and rightly so, they do not want and do not accept, as several of them told me recently in my riding, to be used as short term "surety" by a government that has become helpless in the face of inflation.

On another level, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal government has got us used to a strategy of clashes that provincial governments, including the Quebec government, and Canadians as a whole cannot put up with any longer. Measures to initiate a food production or urban transportation policy must not once more bring about a deterioration of federal-provincial relations here, must not either be brought to a term without any previous serious consultation to such an extent as to create new crises that almost invariably the present central government uses in order to appropriate jurisdictions which are not devolved to it.

We can rightly fear the worst here, especially when one reads in the speech, and I quote:

The Government will wish to consult with provincial governments—

—How cynical! What a return to the former arrogance which has already been decried, judged and condemned in October 1972.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude my remarks, because I see that you are making signs to me and because I hear my friends opposite say that my time has elapsed. I know that they have had just enough of it and that their conscience is bothering them. Duly so, and they will have a hard time trying to explain to the Quebec people the failure of the government. I conclude, therefore, by saying that this government, lacking in leadership, increasingly less recognized and accepted as a true, reliable and honest interlocutor by a number of provincial governments, less and less accepted as a conciliatory agent by an increasing number of Canadians, should retire from the bargaining table and turn over the direction of this country to a Progressive Conservative team, ready to take over, as a responsible alternative, and to a leader whose patience, persistence, determination, will and competence are more and more appreciated by the Canadian public as a whole and especially—a very encouraging and revealing sign—by Quebecers themselves.

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments regarding some aspects of our economy which is of interest to me as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) and as a member for Lévis.

As hon. members know one of the main objectives of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is to ensure the adequate and constant development of production as well as of trade in Canadian goods and services by creating, for instance, a proper national and international setting, by encouraging production of new goods and services and the introduction of new production techniques conforming to the requirements of a developing market, by improving the use of resources and by seeking to increase the necessary outlets for our economy.

True to its objectives, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce was deeply involved in the creation by the government of the Industrial Development Bank and the Development Agency for Small Business of which the Industrial Development Bank is the spine and the heart. Through this organization, the government is more than ever in a position to encourage small business activity in Canada, which are so essential to our economy. It often is the most effective means of producing goods and services which can meet the specific needs of Canada and it has the flexibility to cope with the production and local distribution requirements of the various regions of this country.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) who has just concluded his speech, that these are positive measures taken by this government to help small and medium enterprises in the province as in all other provinces of our country.

An independent organization, the IBDA offers small and medium enterprises a highly diversified assistance, acts as local information centre for all government programs and services available to small enterprises, and it supplies the required information on the availability of private sources of financing, and even providing the financing in case of need. It assumes the practical responsibility for the advisory and administrative services to small business, including the CASE consulting program; the main responsibility for the development and management of the federal administration training programs for small businesses, keeps an up to date list of the various assistance programs offered by the government and the private sector; it cooperates closely with the federal and provincial departments and agencies as well as with the private institutions.

The wellbeing of our economy in the years ahead will depend on it. In brief, the IBDA plays an absolutely essential role with the small businesses on which it depends to a large extent.

● (1650)

As regards the textile industry, Mr. Speaker, small business—and I think this is closely related to the riding of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe which contains several textile firms—in its multiple aspects is of vital importance to this country.

Despite a manpower shortage and the problems it is facing today to get supplies of natural and synthetic fibers, the Canadian textile industry usually maintains its operations at the high level that was observed during 1973 when substantial increases in sales and profits were recorded.

Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce officials have done their best to help this industry get supplies of petrochemical products and it is expected that this spring the situation will improve a little in this area. The petrochemical product shortage is now felt on a worldwide basis, but I am pleased to see that Canadian producers enjoy a very favourable position as compared with most of their foreign competitors.

The Canadian capacity to produce synthetic fibres is now expanding, particularly in acrylics, nylon and polyesters. You know that Du Pont of Canada Limited announced that it plans to build a $40 million polyester plant in Coteau-du-Lac, in the province of Quebec, with production slated for 1976. Therefore, I think that the outlook for our textile industry is promising and I am pleased about it.

Mr. Speaker, our shipyards are an example of the prosperity of the Canadian industry, encouraged by government measures. Despite a shortage of steel and delays in the delivery of diesel engines, our shipyards are now operating at full capacity. Shipyards throughout Canada, and particularly in Lauzon, still benefit from STAP, the Shipbuilding Temporary Assistance Program of the Department of Industry, Trade, and Commerce which has been extended. This program implemented on November 27, 1970, provides grants to the builders of ships which will be registered in foreign countries. The maximum grant is 17 per cent of the certified cost of the ship, with restrictions relating to the Canadian content and the minimum size of ships. The extension of this program will make it possible to pay subsidies for ships completed before October 31, 1978 and ordered before March 31, 1975. This Canadian industry thus contributes to the overall prosperity of our country and is a good example of Canadian technology competing with that of big industrialized countries.

It is well known that this matter is of special interest to me, since there is a very important shipyard in my riding of Lévis. The level of employment in Quebec shipyards is relatively high at present and it seems this situation will last until 1976. We are very happy about it. This high level of employment is due to contracts secured thanks to STAP adopted by the Canadian government in 1971. However, we are concerned about what will happen to employment after 1976 and about the long term future of that industry because studies now being made in various quarters seem to be unanimous in their fear of an overcapacity to produce in the years prior to 1980. That is why we believe that foresight is necessary on the part of the government in this area and a long term policy must immediatly be set up.

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe is nodding his head and I am glad about it but I find it completely abnormal coming from that hon. member. Newspapermen in the press gallery might say that I am criticizing this government. No. On this side of the House we want to be positive, we want to build and the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe who just concluded his speech said nothing worthwhile, Mr. Speaker. All he was able to say was that there are unemployed workers in Lauzon. If anyone knows, I do, and I studied the causes of it. We looked at those causes, we made studies and we drew conclusions and that is why on this side of the House, even if I sit on the government side, I can speak in Ottawa and especially in the province of Quebec.

[Mr. Guay (Lévis).]

Steps must immediately be taken to allow the shipbuilding industry in Canada to take its place in the field of international competition so Canada will be recognized as a shipbuilding country. The international situation with respect to shipbuilding is now characterized by six major factors—production costs of Japanese shipbuilding yards; the threat of overproduction hanging over shipbuilding yards throughout the world; financial, administrative and technological changes taking place in European shipbuilding yards; the prospects of the freight market and maritime construction; flags of convenience and competition among different national flags and, finally, the U.S. maritime construction and navigation program.

It is here also that the merchant marine problem merges with the shipyard issue. As a matter of fact, the establishment of a merchant marine would contribute to stabilizing employment in the shipbuilding industry. Let Canada put an end to the agreements concerning the merchant marine which favour ships registered within the Commonwealth and allow them to operate in the Atlantic area. The Canadian government should also make sure that the Arctic waters are national waters that should come under the national coastal trade. The Canadian government should also provide for at least a 50 per cent Canadian content in our international maritime exchanges with the United States and the rest of the world.

Lastly, as I have often mentioned in this House, let the Canadian government limit registration of merchant ships flying the Canadian flag to those built in our national shipyards. We could also establish a shipbuilding research centre whose cost would be shared by concerns and various levels of government, and create an organization to provide communications and facilitate exchanges between governments, ship owners and shipyards.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to see that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe agrees with me. And I still find it strange that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe should have devoted 90 per cent of his remarks to repeat the contents of the speech and to conclude that it did not mean anything. But I say there is something in the Speech from the Throne. I fully endorse the entire Speech from the Throne, but I can be positive and make suggestions to the government. That is what I would have liked to hear from the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe but that is not what he said. Mr. Speaker, I have heard 22 speeches from Progressive Conservative members and I have not found anything positive in them. We are being told: Our problem is inflation. We know that the problem exists, but the opposition members do not seem to know how to solve it. I have here a newspaper article which says and I quote: "The government did nothing". The article appeared in Le Soleil. I shall talk about it later, if the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe has enough patience to let me finish. I shall come back to the article in about five minutes. Anyway, he can read my comments tomorrow.

Finally, I should like to deal very briefly with a matter which is very much with us: the oil situation. The energy crisis has certainly had important effects on the industrial sector. Its impact, present as well as future, has not been and will not be consistent however, because we must bear in mind the fact that some industries need much more energy than others. Among these, let us mention the pulp and paper industry, the petrochemical industry, metallurgy, the processing industry for some non-metallic minerals and the food processing industry, all of which are important in Quebec.

It is to be hoped that industries will not suffer too much from the shortage of oil in the next few months. I can assure you that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will keep a very close watch on the international situation and its impact on Canadian industry. Although supply does not seem to be too much of a problem at this time, the problem of prices is not an easy one to solve. Several companies have already made their difficulties known in that area and as stated in the agreement passed following the Federal-Provincial Energy Conference, a price freeze was decided with grants for the Eastern part of the country. The Federal government is now implementing that plan.

Members of the Opposition talk about the oil crisis. It was said on several occasions that there was an oil problem. Some say they want such and such a route for the pipeline, they want it from Sarnia, they want it through the North, they want this or that. It seems that members of the Opposition and especially Progressive Conservatives when they are from the province of Quebec, support a solution which would favor Quebec in the shortest delay with respect to supply but when they are in Northern Ontario, when they are in Toronto, they are in favour of another solution. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is playing politics with a problem as crucial as the one we are faced with. In spite of the short term squabbles, we must realize that we have, on a long term basis, a unique occasion to develop our industrial sectors involved in energy because few countries will be able to guarantee those industries a steady supply. Of course, if those resources are to attrack industry they must be available at competitive prices.

Mr. Speaker, in the last session I was pleased to see several pieces of legislation passed which dealt with subjects I had included in my speech on the budget on February 21, 1973. On other points, I see that substantial progress was made towards future legislation.

However, there are two suggestions which I then made and would like to discuss in the House in the near future. I draw them again to your attention. The first deals with housing. In my opinion, it would be advisable that the government considers granting an income tax deduction on the construction of family dwellings, in order to encourage Canadians to become home owners.

Since the owners of public and commercial buildings are allowed each year a certain depreciation on their properties, it would seem logical that the owners of family dwellings be entitled to the same privileges as well as an income tax deduction on maintenance costs and other expenditures incurred, such as interest on mortgages. They could also be claimed as a tax deduction. Such measures would stimulate the construction industry while attaining the aim of the government which is that a great number of families become owners of their home.

Another suggestion which I also made dealt with the CNR employees. They have indeed obtained a retroactive 2 per cent salary raise, but this is not their only demand. They wish to obtain pension fund parity with Air Canada employees and civil servants.

Presently, CN employees wonder why, being employees of a Crown Corporation, they do not get exactly the same treatment as other employees of corporations which fall under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

I know perfectly well that an hon. member on this side of the House is about to introduce a Bill on that matter and I wish to emphasize that I will be pleased to support it.

To conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few personal comments about the Local Initiative Program. I realize that in the Estimates for the fiscal year 1973-74, the LIP budget has been further reduced. This decision being unjustified, in my view, I wish to make two proposals to this House. Either we should completely abolish this program which in its present state causes but dissatisfactions and disappointments among the people, or we should discuss in committee a proper way of applying this program in a more efficient way.

I was pointing out a few things a moment ago, before the departure of the Hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. I do not know whether he is going to the province of Quebec while his leader is here but I know that whenever his leader, the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), is in Quebec, he in turn is here. Last Sunday, there was a benefit cocktail in Quebec City for Progressive Conservative partisans and this is related to my remarks, since it emphasizes first the absence of the Hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, and then that of the hon. member for Brôme-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey). In every speech, we have been told that the dear child of Joliette was back home. He was going along with the Leader at that time. Well, I want to ask the Leader if, in Quebec, at the present time, it is one thing to find the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. LaSalle), and another thing to loose the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe and the hon. member for Brôme-Missisquoi?

When the leader of the opposition was visiting his supporters—who, by the way, are not that many in Quebec—two thirds of his members in Ottawa were absent. Fortunately, the hon. member for Joliette has come back to the fold, because the whole caucus would have been absent.

I find it very amusing that this member should make his first official trip with his leader in Quebec when he himself, on every TV and radio network, following caucus meetings on topics of particular interest to Quebec, makes statements to the media repeating what Mr. Balcer once said in the House: There is no room for a Quebec French Canadian in the Progressive Conservative party.

How can he, this is the question the hon. member for St-Hyacinthe was asking a moment ago, explain in the ridings of Joliette or Saint-Hyacinthe the inaction of government? Personally, in Joliette, I would have simply asked the member for that riding to explain his change of heart. For that matter, he follows in the footsteps of his Quebec leader who has had many changes of heart.

I have here, an item that appeared in Monday's issue of the newspaper Le Soleil. The article was entitled as follows:

Robert Lorne Stanfield rewrites Quebec's history

The article reads as follows:

Saturday night, Robert Lorne Stanfield encouraged the Quebec conservatives to write a new chapter in the province's history, a chapter entitled: "The province reconquered".

Of all the Quebec members sitting in this House, none, I think, who is really aware of what happened in Quebec in the years 1760 during the conquest would have dared say that in Quebec. It is the Conservative leader who comes to conquer us again, under the "tory" banner, a party made up of Englishmen.

Don't take the Quebec people for fools. We were conquered once, more than 200 hundred years ago, and it still hurts. I shall not tolerate any attempt to reconquer us in 1974. Perhaps the leader of the official opposition meant his conquest of the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle). It could be that I say that anyone trying to reconquer the province of Quebec and banking on the hon. member for Joliette will have a lot of work to do. The way he keeps changing his mind, the hon. member could very well be in another political party at the time of the next election.

● (1710)

I note something else in that article on the great speech on the leader of the official opposition. I ask the members of the opposition to pay close attention to what I am about to quote: The Trudeau government "has done nothing" to check inflation, the Liberal government "has done nothing" to solve the oil crisis, the Liberal government "has done nothing, absolutely nothing". But, in the same speech, he contradicts himself, and I quote the words the leader of the official opposition spoke in Quebec:

Since January 4, 1973, we have seen the Liberal government adopt, one after the other, quite a few of our policies and ideas, which it had previously spurned, derided.

Does that mean that when the government accepts the positive suggestions of the opposition, when they are positive, when they can be passed by the House, it does "nothing"? Some inconsistency! I put the question to the leader of the official opposition.

Mr. Speaker, I say that this speech is a mass of inconsistencies. They say that we have "done nothing". And yet, we have done everything the Progressive Conservatives had recommended we should do. Which means that they did not recommend much and they did not do anything for Quebecers.

Mr. Speaker, I am almost through with my remarks. When they talk about "conquest" of when they say:

"La Belle Province should keep in mind that the Conservative Party was the only one to stand up for Quebec with respect to oil supplies and prices.

But I simply ask what steps they proposed as a solution to this problem, to "résoudre à l'avantage", as the leader of the opposition says when he comes to Quebec, what single measure, if any, have they proposed, except to say: The government is powerless, the government "has done nothing".

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I dare hope that before the end of the throne speech debate, at least one Conservative in the House will have a concrete proposal to make. If the Conservatives did not understand my French, I ask them to read it in French tomorrow in Hansard. I have made proposals to the government and I know it is willing to listen to us. But the opposition can only criticize, so they are beyond help—

An hon. Member: It will not be better tomorrow.

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Yes. Read my speech tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. O'Sullivan: It won't make any more sense tomorrow.

Mr. Guay (Lévis): You read it tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, people come to Quebec and say: "Let La Belle Province remember . . . " Quebec remembers one thing especially, and that is the Conservative members of Parliament. The same article refers also to the official language. What did the Progressive Conservatives and the Social Crediters do about this? They separated and said: We are still hesitant. Out west, the members of Parliament said: Understand that we have protected you. Then, in Quebec they said something else. A few Quebec members voted for the bill on official languages. As for the Social Crediters, what did they do? When the vote was taken on the official languages bill they abstained from voting. They said: "It is not enough!" When one says it is not enough, when one refuses to make the first move, how can one march in step. If nobody makes the first move, things come to a standstill. I blame them severely and the Quebec people will also blame them for taking this attitude.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard about a solution: The Leader of the Official Opposition goes around the country saying: Well, we will freeze prices for 90 days and after that, we will see, we will look into the matter, we will set up committees and then see how to deal later with the problem of inflation.

Mr. Speaker, everyone can see that these people are irresponsible, and I think the public, the Canadian people, cannot trust a party that has never proposed a policy which would benefit not only Westerners or Quebecers, but all Canadians.

The Liberal party, with our prime minister, was not afraid to go out West during the federal-provincial conference of western prime ministers to discuss problems and put forward solutions for the benefit of the western people. It was not afraid to come to Quebec to face problems, because only the Liberal party is and will remain the party of all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my comments on the Speech from the Throne, I should like to refer briefly to the words used by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. May I say that when I hear a speech like his I am extremely embarrassed. It hurts me to see a grown man representing a riding as large as his stand in this House and cry. All he says, in essence, is: Give us an indication of your policies. This is what we have heard over and over again. They want us to govern, but they want to be the government.

Like other members of parliament I had the privilege of listening to the speech from the Throne and hearing what was said by the mover and seconder of the Address, by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and by various cabinet ministers as well as by supporters of the government. I believe the people of Canada will be as disappointed as I am by the contents of the Speech from the Throne. We are living in troubled times here in Canada. We are in difficulty economically. We are not sure what the future will bring. The country is looking desperately for leadership. It has occurred to many, as it has occurred to me, that all we hear in the Speech from the Throne is, really, a rehashing of policies which have been in Liberal speeches from the throne for the last 15 years.

I should like to deal with some of the deficiencies in the Speech from the Throne, deficiencies which affect small businesses, defiencies which affect the labouring people of the nation, deficiencies which affect the housewife, the merchant, those who are trying desperately to get along on fixed incomes. However, I have been delegated to deal with the Speech from the Throne as it concerns agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, I have known the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) for a great many years, even before we both became members of this House. He is a man for whom I have a great deal of respect and affection. I have a great deal of affection for him as an individual. But I consider that his response, as minister, to the needs of the industry and of the nation, to be less than effective. He has travelled across the breadth of this nation making, perhaps, more speeches than any other Minister of Agriculture in our nation's history. He has assured the nation that the farmers of Canada are second to none in productivity. He is correct. He has assured the farmers that they are tops in efficiency. He is correct in that too. The Minister of Agriculture has told the farm community that they are second to none in the world. That, Mr. Speaker, is absolutely true, because if they had lacked those qualifications none of them could have survivied the last six years of Liberal administration as far as agriculture is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: Let us recall one of the speeches the minister made. It was at the Outloook Conference. This throws light on the manner in which he is carrying out his responsibilities. He said:

> We are watching energy supplies. We are watching fertilizer supplies. We are watching equipment supplies. We are watching steel production. We are watching agricultural chemicals. We are watching agriculture stocks and we are watching international markets.

Mr. Speaker, the minister and the other members of the present government are probably the greatest Canadian spectators of all time. But what the farmers want is not conversation or spectator entertainment; they want to know when the minister will get off his podium, sit at the drafting table and begin to introduce legislation so that some of his fantasies could become facts.

In his speech the other day—and I was amused by this—the minister said:

> I note that an hon. member suggests that this is a Conservative policy—

The reference was to the program for agriculture which the minister had just outlined and which had been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. He said:

> I note that an hon. member suggests that this is a Conservative policy. I note he has been reading some of my speeches and is adopting some of my ideas.

Mr. Knight: He was right. The minister stole them from us.

Mr. Danforth: We need only go back to the 1958 policies of the Conservative party. There one would find, almost verbatim, the proposed 1974 policy of the government, with one small exception, that is, the reference to payment for grain storage in eastern Canada. It is no wonder members of the Conservative party recognize these proposals. They, themselves, were the proponents and authors of that policy. Now, we see it incorporated in Liberal policy for 1974. Mr. Speaker, the policy was good in the 'sixties but surely it is not adequate for the 'seventies. We have entered a new era. There is a revolution in agriculture. There is a brand new ball game, and some new rules are required.

If agriculture is to make progress, a long-range policy is needed. The policies proposed must be credible. There must be confidence in the minister and in the government. But they have done everything possible to discredit the minister and discredit themselves. I should just like to give a few illustrations of what I mean. One of the greatest concerns of the primary producers of Canada today is the availability of fertilizer and its price. I should like to quote what the Minister of Agriculture said to the growers of this nation, as reported at page 1248 of Hansard for February 13, 1973:

● (1720)

> Having done some research and made telephone calls, I wish to report . . . that the price of fertilizer will not increase.

The price of fertilizer has almost doubled, Mr. Speaker. The minister also said that we must be thankful we have the farmers we have in Canada. After the crass Liberal policies we have had, we surely can be thankful that we have any farmers at all left in Canada.

The minister also said that we must be very cautious that we do not do something that would discourage them. I should like to deal with some of the actions this government has taken which are discouraging farmers, and I do not have to look very far. I should like to deal with the beef industry, the representatives of which are in Ottawa today. The price at which this industry is being asked to sell its products is less than cost of production. Beef producers in this country today are losing thousands and thousands of dollars. As a matter of fact, many of them have already gone bankrupt. Many more are contemplating bankruptcy, and havoc will be created so far as future production of beef is concerned unless the government does something to correct the situation, and does it now.

I should like to repeat what the minister said about this, not today but at a prior meeting with the cattle producers. He said:

> During my discussions with the cattlemen's associations and others I found them to be as happy a group of producers as I have found in any part of our nation.

How ironic it is that the producers who are his friends, and who are so happy, are the very ones who are going bankrupt at the present time as a result of the policies of this government. And the minister says that we must be very cautious that we do not do something that would discourage them! The minister scares me to death when he talks like this.

I want to deal with another commodity about which he has made a statement. The minister has said that more stability has been provided to the dairy industry than any other sector of the agriculture industry in Canada. I ask, what stability? We have the same dairy production in Canada today as we had 100 years ago. It cannot provide for the needs of the Canadian people today, when three or four years ago it was producing an abundance of butter and milk powder for export, with hundreds of thousands of pounds in storage. There were adequate supplies of cheese, butter and milk powder for all Canadian citizens at a reasonable price. Yet the government says it has provided stability. What has the government done in its search for stability? One thing it did was to establish quotas and to say that anyone under a certain quota—and the government set the minimum—would get no subsidy or support. What did this do, Mr. Speaker? It put every little milk and cream producer out of business.

Then, the government was not satisfied with that. It said that what it would do with the quotas was to fix it so that anyone who went over quota would be fined $1.25 per one hundred pounds of milk produced over quota. What has been the result of this? Dairy production in Canada has degenerated to such an extent that this year we are going to have to import 54 million pounds of butter to supply our own domestic needs. No wonder the minister says that we have to turn the dairy industry right around. I wonder what he means by that, because he has already turned it upside down. This is why we are so anxious about government policy and want to know what is going on.

We are also very concerned about the poultry industry. The minister has stated there must be more and more production to fight the increase in inflation. Yet this is the same government that slaughtered two million head of poultry in this country. We had too much poultry and now we are told we do not have enough. The government says we must put emphasis on the production of food and that we must have more food. The farmers must take acres out of fallow and provide more food for the nation and for export. And this is the very government that paid farmers not to grow wheat. The government now says they must grow wheat and it is doing everything it can to get them to grow wheat. This is the type of stability we have, Mr. Speaker, and it is why it is a mockery for the government to say that we have to be very cautious that we do not do something to discourage agriculture.

I should like to say a few words about sugar, something very dear to me. The government has said that we must have a sugar policy and do something about the price of sugar. The government and this Minister of Agriculture were the very ones who put the sugar beet growers in Ontario completely out of business. Now, the minister says we have to establish a sugar industry in southwestern Ontario, the very industry that it put out of business. The government stopped the subsidy of $700,000 to Ontario producers to produce sugar beets in an endeavour to save money. It then paid the same farmers $1.5 million to stay out of the sugar beet industry. Today, the minister says that we must establish a new industry, that it may cost $30 million to build a new plant. How has this government established any credibility? How can we believe the government is sincere when it tells us its programs are designed to help the farmers?

If anyone had any doubt about the sincerity of this government, let them read the Speech from the Throne. According to the Speech from the Throne, it is government policy to provide high quality food to Canadian consumers at lower prices. Then, the government turns round and says that we have to encourage the farmers of this nation to grow more food at a greater return to the farmers. Anyone who knows anything about business should know that you cannot have cheaper food and pay the farmers more. That is no policy at all. It is not possible, practical, feasible or credible. This is why the government is in trouble.

What has the government done to the beef producers of this country? First of all, it placed an embargo on beef shipments to the United States, our traditional market. Then, it lifted that embargo. Then, it took off the tariff protection we had against imports of U.S. beef flooding our market. Then that was not good enough; the government put it back on again and doubled the tariff. Then, it reduced the tariff gradually to its original floor. Now, when our industry is being crippled as never before, the government is considering what else it can do. When the government comes up with some plan I just do not know whether it will help or hinder. I shudder every time the Minister of Agriculture makes some proposal or puts forward some new policy. We are told not to interfere, to be very cautious about doing anything. Yet the government has changed its policy on beef alone six times in six months. How can agriculture thrive with a policy like that, Mr. Speaker?

We in the vegetable industry in Canada depend for the most part on tariff protection in order to survive. If there is one thing we must have in Canada today it is a guaranteed, stable production of fruits and vegetables. Who would ever believe that the housewives of this country would go to the grocery stores and find the shelves bare of fruits or vegetables either in the fresh, frozen or processed form; but that is what is happening. It is happening because this government kept tinkering with tariffs and reducing them so that many of our vital industries have gone out of business. In my area there used to be thousands of acres devoted to the production of early fruits and vegetables. However, these producers have found that under the reduced tariff protection offered by this government they could not continue in business.

What happened? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) in this House a few weeks ago, without consultation with any segment of the agricultural industry and perhaps not even with the Minister of Agriculture, eliminated the tariff on many fruits and vegetables coming into this country. Immediately there was chaos in the Canadian industry because this was done at a time when production was coming in. Many of our markets collapsed as a result of this action by the government. The actions of this government where the farmers and agriculture are concerned are those of an antiquated body which either does not understand at all the complex agricultural industry or does not give a damn about the farmers. It is one or the other. There is no other explanation for these policies that have been carried out.

I should like to speak of another problem in respect of agriculture. We must have some policy in this regard because we are in trouble. It deals with farm labour in southwestern Ontario in the harvest and planting seasons. There is difficulty obtaining labour. The government establishes minimum wages. We have tried to compete, but the result is that there are not sufficient people to do the work there. We have attempted in every way possible to encourage people to come from other parts of Canada and even offshore. What does the government do? It sends a group of people down to that area to inspect the working conditions of the labourers who go there. They find a single case of abuse in respect of housing, at least an alleged abuse. On the basis of that, the publicity goes out across this nation that the employers in that area abuse their privileges as employers and make the position of the employees almost untenable. There is reference to substandard wages paid by the growers in that area. The wages paid in that area are comparable to those paid by the automobile factories adjacent to them. If they were not, there would not be any labourers available.

The very objectives of this government, without investigation of the facts and without listening to the representations of the agricultural groups, have made it almost impossible for us to have enough labourers to take off our crops. Excursions were started into the area by this government. These excursions involved young people from all over the nation with a view to helping us with this problem. "Excursion" is the word for it because these young people came at government expense. They got off the buses, the planes, the taxis and the trains, looked around, said it was a good district, and then got back on the planes, trains and buses and said to the government "Thank you for the trip". There were some exceptions involving young people who worked for an hour or three hours in order to see what it was like, so that they could go back to school and write an essay about how they worked in the fields. Now, the government is talking about a pool of labour from which the employers can obtain labour to help them. This is not regular labour. They have to take their chance and they can do this provided there is adequate government inspection of the working premises in order to determine that conditions are acceptable, not to the workers, but to the government inspectors.

This is the reason the agricultural community lacks faith in this government. This is the reason the agricultural community lacks faith in the Minister of Agriculture. They like him as a person. I like him as a person, but unless he can produce some effective policies he will be completely discredited, not only across this nation and in this House but in his own riding. That would be unfortunate indeed, because I think without a doubt he is the only individual on that side of the House who knows anything at all about farming. Perhaps he is the only practising farmer on the government benches today. Perhaps that is the reason we are in trouble; I do not know. I had great hopes when he was appointed Minister of Agriculture. I am from a neighbouring riding of his and I had great hopes. I went to him and told him that I would do everything in my power to help him in his programs to help the farmers. However, it became evident that, although he had some ideas, he was unable to convince his colleagues. Had he had any influence over his colleague the Minister of Finance, perhaps we would not have had the reduction of the tariff on foodstuffs.

In the Speech from the Throne there is a suggestion that the government intends to do great things in respect of transportation. There is no mention of transportation as it relates to agriculture. When we talk about transportation in the House everyone in Canada thinks there will not be sufficient boxcars to move the grain to the coast. But that is only one part of the problem. The housewives of this country are becoming very concerned over the fact that there are not sufficient canned goods on the shelves when they go to the grocery stores. The shelves are becoming more and more bare. It is true that in some cases the fruits and vegetables are available in the warehouses of the companies which manufacture them, but there are absolutely no cars available to transport these goods to the retail stores. There are no boxcars. I spoke to the manager of a canning plant in southwestern Ontario who said that so far as he was concerned—and this is just one of many instances—they are 140 boxcars behind last year's minimum effort in respect of shipping goods. He said they are attempting by all possible ways to get the goods on the market. They are paying premium transportation rates for trucks and every sort of licensed vehicle they can obtain with the result that the consumer will have to pay more money for these goods. I do not want to hear the government blame producers for the high cost.

Much of the blame for the increased cost of food today can be laid at the doorstep of this government. Is it not ridiculous to think that we have a Minister of Agriculture going around this country saying that so far as the producers are concerned the price of food is still not high enough and that the farmers should have more for their produce, then have another minister saying they will do everything they can to drive down the prices of food. I am speaking of course of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray). That is in direct opposition to the Minister of Agriculture. Then, we have the third minister in this unholy triumvirate so far as agriculture is concerned, the Minister of Finance, who wants cheaper food not because of concern for the consumer but because of political expediency and the fantastic dream that the importation of cheap food will force down the cost of living.

This government's policy is not formulated for the farmers of this nation. I might use the old cliché that is so true in respect of agriculture. The government staggers from crisis to crisis. It has taken the Conservative policy of 1958, has constantly revamped and patched it and reproposed it to the present date. I am not surprised at hon. members over there asking us what we would do, because it is evident that in all departments they are bereft of ideas. I am as convinced as my colleagues that when the people are again asked to give a mandate they will vote for a party which is progressive, which shows some initiative and has some policies to solve crises. Over and over again I have sat in my seat listening to the members of the government condemn us for even proposing price, wage and income control, yet all they have to do is look at the results of their own monetary and fiscal policies to see that they have been an absolute disaster. They must devise other ways of tackling these problems. Perhaps we do not know all the answers but we are not wrong all the time.

This nation must have a policy that will lift us out of the doldrums in which we find ourselves today in order that we can again become a nation among nations. We have a golden opportunity to be a leader among nations, but we cannot hope to be under this present government's policies. This government says it cannot take action because our problems are worldwide. I suggest that under a progressive government we would once again become a leader instead of a follower.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me first add my congratulations to those of my colleagues who have already spoken in this debate to the mover (Mr. Stollery) and the seconder (Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke)) of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I wish every one of the constituents of the hon. members for Spadina and Sherbrooke could have been here to hear those speeches. Had that been possible, I am sure those hon. members would win their ridings in the next election by landslides. In any case, they certainly did justice to their cause and deserve to be proud, as we are proud of their outstanding contributions to this debate.

May I also extend my warm regards to His Excellency and Madame Léger, with the wish that their term in office provide them with much happiness and peace. I can see already that they will make a great contribution to Canada.

Having said that, may I also welcome all of you, my colleagues, back to my riding, as the parliament buildings are, of course, part of Ottawa Centre, the riding I have the honour to represent. This afternoon I have heard those opposite say they are having some difficulties dealing with government. May I also offer to those who live within my riding, as many here do, the services of my constituency office at 340 Elgin Street to help with any problems they may have.

An hon. Member: Give us a new member of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You would then be busy 24 hours a day.

Mr. Poulin: I am already busy 24 hours a day. Ottawa Centre is the heart of the national capital area, not only politically but culturally and socially as well. It is for this reason I have spoken on a number of occasions of my conviction that the National Gallery of Canada, presently in quarters that were never intended to be more than temporary, remain in its present general area. To be more specific, I should like to see the new National Gallery built on the land directly south of the National Arts Centre, and the land of Cartier Square, which is presently occupied by a temporary Department of National Defence building, become a parkland area for the citizens of the area known locally as Centretown as well as for the citizens of the nation who come here to visit.

Ottawa Centre, as the political heart of the nation's capital, also finds a majority of the 125,000 federal public servants in the national capital area working within it. Many of these people also live within the riding. Bilingualism in the public service is thus a matter of concern. However, I know that the vast majority of public servants accept and endorse, as do I, the policy of bilingualism as stated in the legislation passed by this House in June of last year. The concern which has been expressed in the past over the implementation of the Official Languages Act among public servants has decreased substantially in past months. A couple of weeks ago there was a new flutter of concern about bilingualism when it was reported that the number of positions to be classified bilingual would probably be greater than the original estimate, but surely this issue of numbers is not a real one to any reasonable minded Canadian.

Recently the Ottawa Journal hit the nail on the head. In its lead editorial on Wednesday, February 20, regarding bilingual positions under the heading "Its Need—Not Numbers" it stated:

> The purpose of designating bilingual positions is to give effect to the will of parliament, to assure the right of all Canadians to communicate with their federal government in the language of their choice, to ensure the right of public servants to work for the federal government in either official language.

Therefore, whether the number of bilingual public service positions is 25,000 or closer to 50,000 is not an issue.

In addition, as the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) has stated, the principal reason for not disclosing the total or an approximate number of bilingual positions stems from the firm commitment of this government to the staff associations that they would be consulted and fully advised before any official disclosure or determination was made.

Last year $2 million was applied toward the stimulation of bilingual education in the lower grade schools in this community. These federal funds were spread out among the four area school boards in the national capital area on the Ottawa side. May I say from personal experience that this has been of great benefit to all of the children who had the opportunity through this federal funding to learn a second official language. It should be continued and I would urge the government and the President of the Treasury Board to consider very seriously making the same amount of money, or more if necessary, available in order to encourage the learning of the official languages in our schools in the national area.

However, the official languages policy is only one area in which there is a two way relationship between the employer, the government, and the employee, the public servant. Salaries represent another such area, and here also the government must act as a responsible employer, and the public servant must act as a responsible employee. Salary increases must keep up with the increase in the cost of living, but at the same time they must be such as not to add to the inflationary pressures in this country.

Ottawa Centre, however, in many ways is not unique among urban ridings. This riding has many of the same social and economic problems that are present in numerous other urban ridings. However, in the case of Ottawa Centre, the federal government has special responsibilities as the federal government itself is a major landowner, tenant and employer. For this and many other apparent reasons I again urge the government, as it has been urged many times in past parliaments, to establish a joint parliamentary committee to study the present and future development of the national capital and the national capital area, a committee composed of members of this House and of the Senate, of members from all parts of Canada. It is my determined belief that not only are we blessed by Providence with the finest country in the word but also blessed with potentially having the finest national capital in the world as well.

● (1750)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Poulin: Take Lebreton flats for example. This is a choice area of land, formerly partly residential, on the shore of the Ottawa River just to the west of the parliament buildings. As a matter of fact this vacant area of land can be seen from the parliamentary restaurant. This land was acquired by the federal government in 1961, and has lain idle since that time. When the land was first acquired, the plan was to use it as the site for the new National Defence Headquarters. That plan did not materialize. In the mid-1960's much of the land was earmarked for arterial road construction. Fortunately, nothing came of that plan.

Again, I urge that work begin immediately on a concept plan for Lebreton Flats. It is my recommendation that this area be developed for housing so that the people of Canada will be able to use and enjoy this choice area of the national capital. Because of its proximity to downtown Ottawa this land is too valuable to lie idle. I envisage an integrated, forward-looking community for this area, a community of various types of housing to accommodate a cross-section of Canadian society, a community which has its educational and commercial requirements taken into consideration from the beginning, an area which would lend itself also to exemplary recreational facilities for Canadians of all ages and interests including, for example, much needed soccer fields for this sport which is rapidly becoming so popular. There have been encouraging signs in recent months for this type of proposal. I urge the National Capital Commission that, starting immediately, it report monthly progress on development of a concept plan for Lebreton flats along the lines that I have suggested.

To be taken into consideration when developing Lebreton flats should be the citizens in the area directly to the south, that is, Dalhousie Ward. The residents of Dalhousie Ward have published a study, done almost exclusively by the people of the area but financed by a $45,000 federal government grant from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The initiative of the residents of Dalhousie Ward, of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and of the minister responsible for it, all deserve a great deal of credit for this experiment in urban planning.

As the minister mentioned earlier in his remarks today, an agreement has been reached between the province and the federal government with respect to the neighbourhood improvement program and with respect to the residential improvement program. The plan, as I say, was developed by the residents of Dalhousie Ward. It is now being considered by the citizens of the ward. It will then go to the municipal officials, and I would only state to the people of that area, to the minister, to the municipal officials, and to the corporation that they will have my entire support in having that area designated in order that it qualify for the neighbourhood and residential improvement programs as enacted by recent legislation.

I now wish to turn to some national issues, Mr. Speaker, It was heartening to me, and to most Canadians, to see mention in the Speech from the Throne of such a wide range of measures to impede inflation, and especially inflation in the area of food prices. I note particularly the measures that will result in increasing the supply of food, for this is the only long-term solution to the complex problem of increasing food prices. Here I mention measures such as assistance to farmers to help them modernize their methods, assistance to young farmers to help them get established in agriculture, improvements to marketing systems, and the availability of manpower, especially during peak periods.

I note the twin commitments in the throne speech that on the one hand the producer must be assured a fair income for his work, and on the other hand that the consumer must be ensured a fair value for his dollar. I quote from the speech:

> He must be protected against disruptive increases in the price of essential food stuffs caused by international market demand. Guarantees against unduly low prices to producers must be coupled with guarantees against unduly high prices to consumers.

In the past several days we have heard that bread prices are likely to rise in the near future. However the fact remains that without Liberal government action last summer and fall, bread prices today would be 10 or 12 cents more per loaf than they are now.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is two minutes to six o'clock, and I wonder if at this time I could call it six o'clock as I am just about to go to another topic.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Does the House agree to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock pursuant to Standing Order 2(2).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES COMMISSION

FILLING OF VACANCIES IN MEMBERSHIP—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek consent of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43 in a case of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the continued inactivity on the part of the government, making ineffectual the administration of the Combines Investigation Branch in one way by keeping the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission without a chairman since May, 1970, and with only one member since the end of December last year. Therefore, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

This House instructs the government forthwith to make the necessary appointments to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission so that its membership will be at the full complement of three, pursuant to the Combines Investigation Act, and thus put the commission in a position to carry out its responsibilities on behalf of the consumers of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The hon. member's motion cannot be put.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B), 1973-74

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Supplementary Estimates (B) for the financial year ending March 31, 1974, was presented by Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies of Supplementary Estimates (B) for the financial year ending March 31, 1974.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the Supplementary Estimates (B), 1973-74, tabled this day, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Motion agreed to.

PENSIONS

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House to present a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 for the purpose of giving the House the chance to let the Minister of Labour know that we are waiting anxiously for him to implement his commitment to appoint a commissioner to go into the whole broad question of railway pensions. I hope, therefore, the House will agree to this motion so that the minister will have that approval. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard):

That this House requests the Minister of Labour to appoint forthwith a commissioner to inquire into all aspects of railway pensions, including a full inquiry into ways and means of improving substantially the pensions of Canadian railway employees already retired.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not, and therefore the motion cannot be put.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS PENSION PLAN—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the prejudicial manner in which CNR widows are treated with respect to their pensions, in view of the fact the CNR is a government-owned and operated railway, and in view of the statement by the Minister of Labour that discrimination will be eliminated from the Canada Pension Plan, the Immigration Act, the Canada Elections Act and those acts respecting veterans' pensions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave):

That this House instruct the government to bring in legislation which would correct the appalling discriminatory practices in the CNR pension plan.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

ENERGY

PROPORTION OF EXPORT TAX PAYABLE TO OIL PRODUCING PROVINCES—APPLICATION OF EQUALIZATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. What is the position of his government now with regard to the receipts of the oil producing provinces, the proportion of the export tax that may be paid to oil producing provinces? Is the position of the government today that this is subject to equalization, or not?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question is part of a whole series of questions that I am in the process of discussing with the premiers of the oil producing provinces and of the oil consuming provinces. We have a position on this point and I have put it to the premiers. I would hesitate to state it now because it is part of a package, I repeat, which we are negotiating with the provinces which have opposing interests. I would be reluctant, indeed, to have to indicate at this stage of the negotiations what the government's position is.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister and I am not really asking him for a legal opinion. In view of the position taken prior to the recess of the House that the share of the export tax received by the oil producing provinces was subject to equalization, and specific sums were actually mentioned as to what would have to be paid with respect to equalization for the months of September, October, November and December, and in view of the indication by the Minister of Finance since then that, technically speaking at least, a proportion of the export tax received by the oil producing provinces was not subject to equalization, I should like to ask the Prime Minister not what his package is—I am not inquiring about his package for discussion—but whether it is his position that his government is bound under the existing law to regard those moneys received by these oil producing provinces to date as subject to equalization?

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Leader of the Opposition is talking about the past, the opinion expressed by the Minister of Finance is one we stand by, that is, to the effect that these amounts are not subject to equalization.

Mr. Stanfield: If that is the present position of the government, that these payments are not subject to equalization, can the Prime Minister explain why the government told the House, when the export tax matter was before the House for legislative purposes prior to the recess, that these payments were subject to equalization?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, my recollection of what we told the House is that the receiving provinces under the equalization system had benefited largely in the past year, notably by the increases announced by the Minister of Finance last spring, and that the provinces therefore were in a better position with regard to equalization than they had been in previous years. It is true that I remember indicating that they probably would benefit from the increased returns to the oil producing provinces, and that still remains the case. Whether these increased returns would come from their share of the export tax or from general revenues is something which I think was left undetermined.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the Prime Minister examine Hansard of January 4, which clearly indicates that the share of the export tax received by the provinces would be subject to equalization and that this was one of the pleas of the Minister of Finance for adoption of the measure? Will he examine the record and at an early opportunity explain to the House why the government made this representation to the House at that time and why, since then, it has taken a different position?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will certainly look up the Hansard record and discuss the matter with the Minister of Finance.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASES IN STEEL PRICES—MONITORING BY DEPARTMENT—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs arising out of the announcement by Dofasco that the company is increasing the price of rolled steel by about 8 per cent, that increase following almost exactly the same increase by the other two big producers, Stelco and Algoma and following a number of other increases which have taken place in the last few months. As steel enters into the production of homes, cars and a host of other products that the Canadian people need and consume, may I ask the minister whether his department is monitoring these price increases and whether he will refer the apparent cartel arrangement among the large steel corporations of this country to the appropriate officers working under the unfair practices legislation for study and research?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to have this matter brought to the attention of the officers to whom the hon. member refers. He has raised a very important question and I will be pleased to provide further information when it is possible for me to do so.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question which was part of the question I have already put to the minister. Is the minister's department monitoring these steel price increases and has it had any conversations with the companies to ascertain whether these increases are at all justified in view of the very large profits recorded by all the companies I mentioned?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, my department has not had such conversations. With respect to monitoring, this matter is being followed by a number of government departments but has not been specifically followed by my own up to this point.

RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES COMMISSION

REASON FOR DELAY IN FILLING VACANCIES IN MEMBERSHIP—EFFECT ON WORK

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, arising out of the motion the hon. member for Skeena tried to move earlier. Would the minister explain to the House why the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission now consists of only one member when it is, by law, to have three members, and how the commission carries on its hearings with only one member? Has it in fact carried on any hearings within the last year?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the commission is carrying on its work of supervising certain investigatory activities of the combines branch as well as considering certain matters referred to it by the branch. It is the intention of the government to fill the remaining vacancies certainly before the stage one competition policy bill is decided by the House, at which time the commission will have additional very important duties to review certain trade practices.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I direct one last, brief question to the minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is the hon. member's fourth question. He will be recognized for a short supplementary, followed by the hon. member for Charlevoix.

Mr. Lewis: I think members of the House as well as the people of Canada would be interested in knowing why there has been such a long delay in appointing the chairman of the commission and why the other vacancy has been left so long?

● (1120)

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that there is a chairman, Mr. Couture. With respect to filling the other vacancies, it is the government's intention to fill them in light of the possible decisions of the House with regard to the stage one competition policy bill.

COMMUNICATIONS

STATE OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH QUEBEC ON CONTROL OF CABLEVISION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Communications.

In view of the new statements—and we discussed them a few days ago—made by his Quebec counterpart, Mr. L'Allier, can the minister tell us how far the negotiations have gone between Quebec and Ottawa about the control of cablevision?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the last developments are as follows: There were meetings between officials and we are waiting for the provinces to propose a convenient date for the second part of the federal-provincial conference started at the end of last November.

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Can the minister tell us if representations were directly made either by himself or by his officials about the fact that the province of Quebec is now claiming from cablevision operators the amount of approximately $800 for a supposed provincial permit?

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, we are trying to ascertain the facts in this field, after which we will be able to establish our policy. The facts are still little known.

NUMBER OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH RADIO STATIONS IN MONTREAL

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the Minister of Communications.

Does he intend taking specific action to improve the situation revealed by Mr. L'Allier as concerns the imbalance between the number of French radio and television stations and the percentage of francophones in Montreal, in view of the fact that there are ten English radio stations against only eight French stations, while the number of television stations is the same for both languages?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, this question does not come under the jurisdiction of the minister, as the hon. member is well aware, but under the authority of the CRTC, which has heard very recently the representations of three contractors for a third French television station in Montreal and which should announce its decision on this matter in a relatively short time. For the past two years at least, the CRTC has also been studying the general situation as concerns both the French and English radio stations in the Montreal area.

Oral Questions

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I should like to ask the Minister of Communications whether the proposals put by his Quebec counterpart in the brief submitted to the federal government are acceptable by the latter?

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): No, Mr. Speaker.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

PUBLIC SERVANTS AND ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTEES—RIGHT TO CONTINUE COURSE OF ACTION WHILE CASES UNDER ADJUDICATION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister pursuant to the statement made in the House by the right hon. member on December 18 in which he set out guidelines for public servants and order in council appointees. Can the Prime Minister say whether as a matter of policy public servants under investigation will be permitted to continue in that course of action which prompted the investigation in the first place while their cases are being adjudicated?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I missed part of the question because of noise and from that part I heard it appears to be purely theoretical. I am afraid I do not have an answer. If the hon. member will repeat the question, hopefully by being more specific as to cases, I will attempt to answer it.

ALLEGATION THAT CERTAIN CAPTAINS IN MARINE SERVICES BRANCH STILL CARRYING ON SAME ACTIVITY WHILE CASES UNDER ADJUDICATION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that four federal employees, captains in the Marine Services Branch of his department in the Toronto area, who have been the subject of an adjudication hearing pursuant to the type of situation about which I asked the Prime Minister, are apparently still carrying on the same type of activity that prompted the investigation in the first place and that no report has yet been released concerning the results of the adjudication? This involves a firm called Meridian Marine Limited and another called Mercator Marine Limited. Can the minister assure the House that he will check into the situation in due course and undertake that the matter will be looked after diligently?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I do not know how the hon. member can say they have continued this type of activity when it was decided that they should resign from the company many months ago—three of them. One kept on until he decided to resign. As the hon. member knows, this question is before an adjudicator, and I think the situation has been handled very properly by the department.

Mr. MacKay: For the minister's information, the company is still listed in the current directory in the Toronto area and the wife of one of the people involved is still doing business in the basement of a house owned by one of these captains—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Perhaps they have not printed a new directory.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR STATISTICS ON NUMBER OF RECIPIENTS CHEATING COMMISSION AND INFORMATION ARISING FROM COMPREHENSIVE REVIEW

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration; I am glad to see him back. I do not know where he was, but I suppose he was trying to determine how he should bring in the new amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. In a recent speech to the Canadian Construction Association the minister, while expressing alarm at the tendency of some people to cheat or rip off the Unemployment Insurance Commission, indicated he had no knowledge of how widespread such tendency was. In order that the Canadian people might be aware of the facts involved, would the minister be prepared to table any statistics he has available which were used as the basis of his speech so we can determine for ourselves the extent of his alarm?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): If the hon. member had referred to the full context of my speech he would have noted that I also expressed concern about the possibility of Canadians or others beating the tax system or the expense account system in submitting expense accounts to their employers. There is a whole range of these matters which I think should be of concern to all of us. As far as statistics are concerned, I think some have been used publicly and I shall be very glad to answer questions of that kind when my estimates are before the committee.

Mr. Alexander: Would the minister be prepared, when the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Commission Act are introduced, to place before the House the findings of the comprehensive review that was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne in order that we who are concerned about this matter may formulate an opinion as to the validity, form and effectiveness of the proposed amendments?

Mr. Andras: I think the Speech from the Throne made it clear that the proposed amendments will be part of an ongoing process in the course of a comprehensive review which, in my opinion at least, will necessarily take some time since it should be carried out very carefully and thoroughly. For this reason the findings in their totality will not be available at the point in time at which the hon. member suggests they should be placed before the House.

Mr. Alexander: Surely the minister must be aware of some findings upon which he has based the proposed amendments. My question is restricted to the amendments only. Surely the minister will allow us an opportunity to look at the statistics and findings with respect to the amendments only so that we may formulate an opinion as to the form and effectiveness of those amendments? Surely we are entitled to that.

Mr. Andras: I have no argument with the hon. member as to the wisdom of making the facts available to all hon. members and to the public. We intend to do that. We look forward to the opportunity to do that. The hon. member will be in a position to judge the amendments when they are presented to the House in the light of some of that information that we will be making available.

GRAIN

SHORTAGE OF RAILWAY CARS TO MOVE GRAIN—COMMITMENT BY RAILWAYS TO MEET TARGETS—ABILITY TO MEET EXPORT CONTRACTS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister who reports for the Canadian Wheat Board. It is based on the statement by the chairman of the Wheat Board that the grain transportation picture is in such bad shape due to failure to provide sufficient rolling stock to move grain that there is a real risk that our dependability as an exporter will be called into question. Has the minister received any commitments from the railroads that they will make up the 17,000 cars by which they are short of their target since the beginning of January?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): We have received no commitment as specific as that, but the railways certainly hope to achieve their targets as quickly as possible. They have been under severe disabilities because of the much greater amount of snow than usual in the prairie region this year, as well as cold weather. I know hon. members appreciate that it snows every year, but this year it has snowed three times as much as it snows on the average and this has made a difference. Perhaps hon. members might at least begin to appreciate the problem when they note that the CPR, for instance, at this point in time last year had ploughed a total of 1,500 miles of track while this year they have ploughed 19,600 miles of track—

● (1130)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lang: —a ratio of about 13 to one.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, the minister may be surprised that it snows in Saskatchewan, but it is a fairly common phenomenon. Since the minister a few days ago said, when he was asked whether he had had any commitments from the railroads, that he was not satisfied with the commitments he has had, would the minister give the House the firm assurance that the situation to which the Chief Commissioner of the Wheat Board refers, namely, that we are in danger of losing our reputation for dependability and as people who are able to deliver what we produce, will not in fact happen and that we will be able to deliver right up to our export targets?

Mr. Lang: Again, Mr. Speaker, we are taking every possible step to ensure that this will be the case. We have created an emergency grain transportation committee to consider additional steps that can be taken to move grain more rapidly. The figures that the railways set as targets depended on a certain amount of cars and motive power being available and assumed a certain turnaround of those cars. We think that, by using the cars more effectively in the way they are loaded and in the way the grain is placed, we may be able to get a quicker turnaround and thereby exceed the original commitments of the railways allowing them to catch up on the backlog that exists. That is our purpose and objective and, as usual, this government stands ready to take any step it can to make sure that these targets are met.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are four or five hon. members seeking to ask supplementaries on this subject and we might go on for a long time and I wonder whether that is what hon. members want. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege respecting the last statement of the Minister of Justice about the way the government intends to do things. I ask him this question once again. I have been pursuing the same matter for six years and I am asking for nothing that has not been approved by way of legislation. Would he take another look at section 18(a)(1) and (a)(2) of Bill C-135 and read the last sentence—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rose on an alleged question of privilege and referred to a statement made by the Minister of Justice in answer to another question. I very much doubt whether that is in order. Now that the hon. member has made his point, I would appeal to him to allow the Chair to return to the question period.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my point of privilege is based on the statement made by the Minister of Justice which is not factual. I again ask him to compare section 18 (a)(1), section 18(a)(2), section 28(1)(e), and the summary put before the government by the Cape Breton Development Corporation, the last sentence of the second paragraph, and compare that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

SHORTAGE OF RAILWAY CARS TO MOVE GRAIN—ACTION TO ACQUIRE MORE LOCOMOTIVES AND ROLLING STOCK

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport relating to the question asked earlier by my colleague from Saskatoon-Biggar. In view of the fact that both our national railroads, every year for the last number of years, have reported that their inability to meet grain movement is due to a shortage of locomotive power as well as a shortage of boxcars, would the minister tell the House what action he is taking to have both railroads place a higher priority on acquiring additional locomotive power, and would he give consideration to having the next CNR financing bill make provision for additional funds to enable the Canadian National Railways system to acquire locomotives and rolling stock to meet the transportation needs of the country?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am trying at this moment to exercise all the pressure I can on the railways in order to get rail cars and locomotives. I have been partly successful, though I do not receive the co-operation I should receive. I shall be speaking this afternoon on this question and perhaps the hon. member will be satisfied with my answer.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vegreville on a supplementary and the hon. member for Skeena on a supplementary and then we will go on to the next question.

SHORTAGE OF RAILWAY CARS TO MOVE GRAIN—ACTION TO ACHIEVE BETTER UTILIZATION OF EXISTING ROLLING STOCK

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. May I ask the minister whether he has looked into the very large number of boxcars that have been sitting idle on various sidings recently throughout western Canada, which results in very inefficient utilization of rolling stock, and what action has the minister or the government taken to provide for better utilization of the rolling stock the railways now have?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have naturally looked into this question, but this is a human operation and occasionally it does appear that something better could have been done to make more efficient use of cars. But the fact remains that, while hon. members may not see the consequences, when there is as much power being used to plough snow from the tracks as is being used this year compared with other years, this power is not available to collect cars, bring them to the main lines and assemble them into trains. This is the real problem, and lack of power has caused the problem. In addition, the high levels of snow have resulted in more than the usual amount of power being put out of action through snow getting into the motors; this has been a problem as well. I am not trying to defend the railways and I am not saying that they have operated in a perfect manner—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Skeena, following which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, that was a snow job if ever I heard one. May I direct a supplementary question relating to the shortage of railway cars to the Minister of Transport. Intrigued though we are by the minister's forthcoming declaration, inasmuch as this problem of national rail transportation has been with us for many months and the government has been unable to cope with it, would the minister seek out among his colleagues the prospect of establishing a national rail transportation system to cope with the situation that exists all across Canada, instead of trying this patchwork approach of pleading with bodies like the CNR and CPR to do something about it?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will surely fight for this purpose.

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION ON RAILWAY RELOCATION

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

GRAIN

SHORTAGE OF RAILWAY CARS TO MOVE GRAIN—REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF BOXCAR CONTROLLER TO DIRECT ASSIGNMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact the railway companies make far more profit from shipping products other than grain and therefore, regardless of snow, lack of power or other excuses, they invariably place grain shipments in a secondary position, will the minister, in order to assure that we can keep up our contracts properly, give consideration to bringing in legislation to provide for a boxcar controller having power to direct the railway companies to provide cars to areas of the economy requiring cars, with failure to do so subject to a heavy penalty? If you do not do that you will never get anything.

● (1140)

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I already have in my notes for a speech this afternoon reference to a concept along those lines in order to have some way of monitoring rail and hopper cars. I will be happy to discuss this concept further because I think we will have to do more and a better job in that field in the future.

FISHERIES

ALLEGED FISHING BY SHIPS OF SOVIET UNION ON HAMILTON BANKS DURING SPAWNING SEASON—DEGREE OF SURVEILLANCE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries having to do with marine resources. Bearing in mind that Hamilton Banks is the main spawning ground for the inshore fishery off the northeast coast of the eastern part of Canada and that the months of January, February and March make up the spawning season for this great marine resource, would the minister indicate whether it is a fact, or perhaps I should ask whether he can confirm, that there has been a substantial increase in fishing activity involving that marine resource, especially by the Soviet Union, during the present spawning season, and can he indicate whether his department has increased surveillance of this resource during this period?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that the department is devoting more resources to this matter, but I cannot confirm that the Soviet Union is increasing its fishing pressure in that area.

Mr. Lundrigan: It seems contradictory if there is more surveillance that the minister cannot confirm that there has been an increase in fishing activity. May I ask whether he has taken the position that all nations of the world, including Canada, should refrain from fishing the marine resources on Hamilton Banks during the spawning season as this happens to be the main resource body for the northeast coast fishery and, more importantly, has he communicated that kind of governmental policy decision to the various countries, including the Soviet Union?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, information on this subject is being collected and it will be supplied to other member countries at the next meeting of the International Commission of the North Atlantic Fisheries.

IMMIGRATION

ARREST OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICER—ALLEGED UNDERGROUND RING BASED IN MUNICH—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Recently an official of the Department of Immigration was arrested for forging immigration permits, and today it is reported from Newfoundland that immigration authorities there suspect an underground immigration ring based in Munich, Germany. Will the minister now order a public inquiry to clarify these serious charges?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in respect of the immigration officer who was charged with an offence, I think it is obvious that this resulted from certain allegations which caused the department to request the proper police authorities to investigate them. The matter is before the police authorities and will be before the courts, so it would be improper for me to make further comment. This is an indication, however, that where we do have evidence of wrongdoing we are prepared to act. With regard to the other matter the hon. member raised, at any given time there may be plans afoot in foreign countries to propose illegal immigration into Canada. Whenever this comes to our attention we do investigate and take the necessary action, but I do not think this calls for a full public inquiry.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Has the minister issued guidelines to his department that would tighten up immigration security and, if so, what is the general content of those guidelines? Has the minister undertaken specific measures to stop further issuance of false work permits to illegal and unqualified immigrants by officials of his department?

Mr. Andras: That is an ongoing process at all times.

SPORTS

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO PREVENT WORLD FOOTBALL LEAGUE ENTRY INTO CANADA

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. While supporting the attempt by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to protect the economic viability of the Canadian Football League and his fight against the proposed World Football League expansion into Canada, I should like to ask whether the government intends to introduce legislation at an early date to provide a legal basis rather than merely a persuasive one in respect of future attempts of this kind?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at this stage the decision has not been taken to use legislation, but I repeat that the minister's stand is one which the government supports and we will take whatever means are necessary.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, it may be difficult for the Prime Minister to answer my supplementary question, but it will get into Hansard and perhaps the Minister of National Health and Welfare can take it as notice. If legislation is anticipated I should like to ask whether the minister or the government contemplates an amendment to some existing act or a brand new bill to handle this particular situation in commercial sport?

THE MINISTRY

NATURE OF POSSIBLE CHANGES

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of hundreds of my constituents I should like to put a question through you to the right hon. Prime Minister. It involves his next cabinet shuffle. I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether he has consulted recently with members of the New Democratic Party, and will he be soon naming them to the federal cabinet?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that a question asked in those terms is in order. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that.

Mr. Grafftey: Let me reword my question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that during the last 16 months Canada has been governed by a majority Liberal-Socialist coalition government, is the Prime Minister soon going to name NDP members to the federal cabinet? I ask this question on behalf of many serious Canadians.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not plan a shuffle for the immediate future, but I would gladly entertain suggestions from the hon. member as to possible candidates for various posts in my cabinet. Perhaps there are even some good Liberals in his party who would support good federal legislation. He might want to include his own name in any shuffle that I would make.

FISHERIES

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF HADDOCK QUOTA TO PREVENT WASTE AND ENABLE FISHERMEN TO EARN LIVING

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct an urgent question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact Nova Scotia fishermen operating out of the port of Lockeport are presently throwing back into the sea anything in excess of 5,000 pounds of prime haddock per trip and are still being fined by the federal government for exceeding the haddock quota as set under ICNAF regulations, will the minister re-examine and amend his order in council of January 15, 1974, in the hope of preventing this excessive waste of high quality food and at the same time enable our fishermen to earn a living in the fishing industry?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, this is a difficult problem. Haddock have been badly overfished by foreign nations. We have an international agreement as to quotas and Canadians cannot take more than their quota if we are to live up to enforce quotas on other nations. We are concerned about this problem but we do not intend to revoke the order alluded to.

Mr. Crouse: In view of the plight presently faced by Canadian fishermen and their inability to go to sea and make a living, will the minister inform the House what these fishermen are to do with their haddock catch in order to avoid paying fines to the federal government when the incidental catch exceeds 5,000 pounds per trip?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, haddock have been badly overfished so Canadians, among others, must take other fish in order to earn an income. Over-all fishing income on the east coast is up a third from last year, so the hon. member is misinforming the House when—

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. Crouse: Would the minister please answer my question? Fishermen in Nova Scotia are urgently awaiting an answer right now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, but on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member wishes to rise on a question of privilege. I will recognize the hon. member in a moment, but I remind hon. members that we are now reaching the end of the question period and I would hope that we would try to have a few more questions before calling orders of the day.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, the fishermen in Nova Scotia at the present time are facing a very urgent problem. They are unable to go to sea and keep their catches within the quota set by the order in council passed by the government on January 15. Unfortunately the haddock cannot read even though they travel in schools, so the fishermen are catching in excess of the quota. If they dump them back into the sea, they are polluting the water under the Environment Act and if they dump them on the land they are polluting the air. I asked a simple question and I hope the minister will give me an answer. What are the fishermen to do with these extra fish?

● (1150)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has restated the question. He is not satisfied with the reply given by the minister. I respectfully suggest to the hon. member for South Shore and all hon. members that the device of a question of privilege cannot be used to restate a question a second time. If the minister wishes to reply to the restated question I have no objection.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

USE OF OUTSIDE CONSULTANTS—GOVERNMENT INTENTION RESPECTING ISSUANCE OF GUIDELINES TO CONTROL EXPENDITURE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. As the cost of outside consultants to the government is in excess of $750 million a year and has increased by more than $400 million during the last five years, is it the intention of the government to issue guidelines in the near future in an effort to control this excessive and very heavy expenditure paid for by the taxpayers of Canada?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we already have guidelines seeking to achieve just this. The guidelines in effect provide that outside advice should be sought in preference to constructing permanent staff to provide inside advice. I hope the hon. gentleman is not suggesting that the government should not seek advice but should proceed without it.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, would the minister not agree that with the number of new top level public servants this government has taken on in the past few years there should be enough people to give the government the type of advice it needs without these excessively high expenditures?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that is obviously argument. The hon. member for Trinity.

INDUSTRY

LAY-OFFS BY AUTOMOBILE COMPANIES—GOVERNMENT PLANS—POSSIBLE CONVERSION OF MORE CAPACITY TO SMALL CARS

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the substantial lay-offs in the auto industry, especially in the Windsor area, can the minister say whether the government has any plans to relieve the situation?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member mentioned, there is no question but that the automobile industry is in for a difficult year primarily because of the reduction in purchases and sales in the United States. I can say, however, that the Canadian operation is still optimistic. Indeed, sales of Canadian-made North American vehicles in Canada are up this year over last year.

Mr. Hellyer: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Has the department undertaken any studies to determine whether or not it would be advantageous to convert additional Canadian capacity to the manufacture of small cars and engines for small cars and, if so, have there been discussions with the industry in this regard?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations with the industry on a fairly continuous basis. Quite clearly, one of the advantages that Canadian auto production has today is that it is more heavily weighted toward small and middle-size vehicles than is the case in the United States.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister undertake to visit Washington within a few days in order to brief Senator Long and others concerning the facts of the auto pact so that congressmen and senators will not, on the basis of false information, exert undue influence on the U.S. auto industry that would be detrimental to Canadian interests?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, we will take whatever steps we can to ensure that the members of that committee understand Canada's position.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Although I did not hear the words because of the noise on the other side of the House, I am informed by my colleagues that the Minister of Fisheries when I put my question to him a moment ago, stated that I was misleading the House. If the minister said that I must ask for a retraction because the facts I stated are as they stand at the present time in Nova Scotia with relation to the regulations imposed upon Canadian fishermen by the Canadian government. I am not misleading the House and I therefore ask the minister to retract that allegation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows the rules very well. We have heard this hundreds of times over the years. The hon. member has heard it. We all know it is not unparliamentary to suggest that another member has made misrepresentations or has misled the House. What is unparliamentary and has been ruled on very often is to suggest that it was intentional, wilful—that kind of concept. When a minister or a member tells another member he has misled the House, I am sure there is no suggestion that the statement should be withdrawn. According to the rules, at that point it becomes a matter of debate between the two members concerning who is right and who is wrong. A matter of debate cannot be the basis for a question of privilege, as has been ruled quite often in the past.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Fisheries is a gentleman, I feel certain he will withdraw that allegation.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Is the hon. member for Skeena rising on a point of order?

Mr. Howard: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for Skeena. I believe the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate wishes to rise on a question of privilege and perhaps he should be given precedence. I will come to the hon. member for Skeena and all the other points of order in due course.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, first of all, every time I rise on a question of privilege involving anything to do with fisheries I know it lacks the sex appeal of matters like energy, boxcars and grain. Perhaps this is one of the reasons I am rising on a question of privilege. It must be obvious to Your Honour and all members of the House that there is something really rotten in Denmark when reasonable members—even if hon. members might point a finger at me as once in a while being unreasonable—have to stand in their places and almost abuse the rules of the House in order to elicit information and represent our people in the marine parts of this nation.

Approximately a year ago a number of members rose in the House and presented to Your Honour two points of view. One was in respect of the question period generally speaking, that is, the length of the question period. There were many representations made concerning amendments. The second was the responsibility we felt we had as members to ensure that the frontbench members of the government were answerable each day to legitimate questions asked by members of the House of Commons in view of the fact that this is the only procedure available to us in an attempt to hold the government responsible to the Canadian people.

Today we have had a representation by the hon. member for South Shore in respect of fisheries that was totally ignored. It received no response. Earlier today I made a representation to the minister concerning the Hamilton Banks. There is not a member of the House of Commons who knows about the Hamilton Banks. It is a billion dollar resource but it does not have sex appeal. The minister knows that today the Soviet Union is out there in abundance raping this resource.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a speech on fisheries. We will be engaged in the throne speech debate in a few moments and I would suggest that would be the time to make the kind of speech the hon. member is making now. I cannot for the life of me see how there is a question of privilege which should be ruled on by the Chair at this time.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, we do not have a throne speech every day and members do not have the right to participate every day, but we do have the right to raise questions. I raised the question whether the minister was aware of the fact that there was an increase in activity by the Soviet Union and he indicated he was not aware. I asked him whether there was any increase in the surveillance on Hamilton Banks and he indicated there was an increase. The information I have is there has been a decrease in surveillance in 1974 on the Hamilton Banks.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat. I respectfully suggest to the hon. member that he should give the Chair an opportunity to rule on the question of privilege. This is a basic to the debates of this House. The hon. member has a right to rise on a question of privilege, indicate what his point of privilege is, and give the Chair an opportunity to make a ruling, but not to go on at length into the substance of the matter which gives rise to the alleged question of privilege. I would urge the hon. member to let the matter rest. He has made a point which, to my way of thinking, relates more to debate than to privilege. I have taken note of this point, particularly with reference to the question period. Perhaps the hon. member would like to leave it at that and give the Chair an opportunity to reflect on the matter further.

● (1200)

Mr. Lundrigan: To summarize my remarks, Mr. Speaker, the point I was trying to make is that the question period we had today—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Lundrigan:—because of the time limit, because of the numerous rules we have to adhere to, and because of the types of responses we are getting from the government front benches, has been such a totally inflexible, totally rigid question period that members have had no chance to elicit the kind of responses for which they are looking. I think too much emphasis is placed on the rigidity of the rules rather than on the rights of the Canadian public.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think I should be required to make a ruling, but if I may make one brief comment it is that I certainly do not think, from my humble experience in the House, that the rules are rigidly enforced during the question period. As a matter of fact, I would think it is just the opposite case.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a question of privilege in a similar way, and I appreciate the difficulty Your Honour is in when dealing with matters of this nature. What the rules do provide is an opportunity, as was exhibited today on two occasions, for cabinet ministers if they so desire, without any opportunity for a countervailing or counterbalancing position to be put forward, to give false and misleading information to the House and to the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Howard: I specify two instances. They relate to the Minister of Corporate Affairs in responding to questions which were posed earlier. On one occasion he made reference to somebody called the chairman of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. That is an inaccurate statement. There is no chairman. There has been no chairman since May, 1970. For the minister to try to substitute the title "chairman" for somebody who is an acting chairman is false information given to this House and the country.

The second bit of false information he gave the House was that the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission is in a supervisory capacity with respect to the Combines Investigation Branch operating under the Combines Investigation Act. That is simply not true and is not an accurate statement.

Whether such information is given because of a lack of understanding of the situation, which I can fully appreciate with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, or whether it is given in an attempt to sort of fob off a serious question, somehow an opportunity should be provided to present a contrary opinion or position. But no such opportunity is provided under our rules no matter how generously they are enforced by Your Honour.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my point of order has been adequately covered by the questions of privilege and points of order raised previously, but it deals with the question period and the responsibility of the ministry, and only of the ministry, to answer questions.

If for some reason a minister finds himself doing government business outside Ottawa I have no objection to that, but it is the responsibility of the government to have an acting minister and to do away with the practice of having non-cabinet ministers, in other words, parliamentary secretaries, answer for the government. This is certainly not their responsibility and it is not covered in the rules. Further, I realize that when I put a question to any member of the cabinet he is not required to answer that question. But when he does answer he is expected to answer the question accurately and honourably, and that has not been the case.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, you recognized me before all these points of order were raised, and I wonder if I could still ask my question.

Mr. Speaker: That was a long time ago, and as the question period expired some 10 or 12 minutes ago I think we ought to go to orders of the day.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Wednesday, March 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stollery for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the adjournment yesterday I had made some remarks with respect to matters of a local nature that are of concern to the government and matters of concern to the government nationally. I would now like to comment briefly on some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), whose speech I listened to yesterday with great interest. He referred to a story during his speech. My recollection of that story is that it had its origin with an Irish Boston politician who said, "These are my principles and policies and if you don't like them—well, I have others."

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe entered the House with a reputation, unexcelled by any other member, for his commitment to law and order as a prosecutor, as a judge, and as a minister of justice for the province of Quebec. However, it was not long before he, like the Irish Boston politician, reverted to other policies and principles.

Both in the House and in committee he supported the 90-day notice provision inserted in the Protection of Privacy Act which provision, I fear, will greatly restrict the investigative powers of the police in their efforts to control criminal activity. In his speech the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe also made reference to what he termed "the Liberal-NDP charade." May I point out that the NDP support has been for good Liberal policies which have resulted in good laws for Canada—some 50 pieces of good legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Poulin: Of equal significance is the fact that when the Conservative opposition joined with the New Democratic party, for whatever reasons, the product of that union was the 90-day notice provision which in fact places a fire alarm bell in the offices of organized crime, warning them that law enforcement agencies are investigating their criminal activities. The result of that union produced an illegitimate section in what is otherwise a worth-while piece of legislation.

However, Mr. Speaker, I must agree with the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe when he says that politics, if they are to have any meaning today, must be synonymous with integrity, honesty and responsive government. The word "politics" has gained many unsavoury connotations in recent months. The events surrounding Watergate in the United States have had a deep effect on the faith of the American people in their government, on the integrity of politics, and on the credibility of politicians in general. These effects have spilled over into Canada.

We all have a responsibility to restore politics to its place as a respectable and respected profession in the eyes of the public. Politicians themselves must ensure that they are honest, not only in fact but in every facet of the appearance of their actions. The fact that the authority of the government is no longer automatically accepted, especially by younger people, is not in itself an unhealthy attitude if it results in people taking a more active interest in their government.

There is another area of concern to me on which the throne speech was silent. I had hoped that included in it would be an announcement of forthcoming changes in the Narcotic Control Act regarding commercial trafficking in heroin and other similar hard drugs. This is an area which is becoming more and more of a concern to Canadians. The illicit commercial trafficking in hard drugs is becoming more and more of a threat to the health and well-being of Canadians. This problem continues to grow and is one of the major social concerns facing our nation.

My research indicates that the domestic illicit heroin problem is the most serious of our multi-drug problems. The number of persons addicted to heroin in Canada has continued to increase. It is now estimated that there are between 16,000 and 19,000 persons using this drug in our country. If we go back in the chain of supply, inevitably we must find that those who are using heroin, and who are the unfortunate captives of this addictive habit, have been supplied with their drug, and in many cases induced to become users of it, by those whom I would term commercial traffickers in heroin.

For purposes only of my remarks at this time, Mr. Speaker, I would define a commercial trafficker in heroin as one who sells a quantity of heroin, for example, 250 grams, which is equal to eight ounces or half a pound and has a current street value of $100,000. Such traffickers are clearly and without doubt in this most reprehensible criminal activity for the sole motive of profit, greed and avarice. Such traffickers stand to double or triple their investment and we can easily see that the profits are indeed high. I believe that we must impose the most severe and stringent sanctions on such criminal activity so that those who seek to gain such high profits will, if convicted, be assured that the Canadian people, as represented by parliament, will also extract a high price by way of a minimum penalty of imprisonment without parole. I strongly recommend that, in order to deter this criminal activity and to protect society against this most reprehensible crime, the government should amend the Narcotic Control Act to provide a minimum term of imprisonment of seven years without parole for anyone convicted of trafficking in heroin or possession for the purpose of trafficking in the amount I have mentioned. It may be that parliament, upon examination of my proposal, would see fit to define a commercial trafficker as one who would traffic in, for example, two ounces of heroin which now has a current street value of $25,000. I point out, Mr. Speaker, that one ounce of heroin has a street value of $12,500 while the current value of one ounce of gold is $160.

On September 1, 1973, new drug measures went into effect in the state of New York, just 60 miles from our seat of parliament. There, for example, a person trafficking in one ounce or more of heroin is liable to be sentenced to a minimum term of imprisonment of 15 years, with a maximum of life. While a minimum term of imprisonment is repugnant to me generally, and there are very few such penalties remaining in our system of criminal justice, commercial trafficking in heroin is such a heinous crime that I feel it is the duty of parliament to take all the steps it can to deter commercial traffickers and thereby protect society. Those persons who would dare traffic could not do so while in prison.

Commercial trafficking in heroin might better be compared to those criminals responsible for the Lode airport massacre in Israel, the Munich massacre at the 1972 Olympic games or, indeed, if sabotage was involved, the tragic deaths of 344 people in the recent Paris air crash than to a single murder or multiple murder committed in the course of a robbery or a murder committed by an individual under any imaginable circumstances, for the trafficker in heroin leaves his many victims as unfortunate pitiful slaves to a habit that destroys them mentally, morally and physically.

I will quote now from a transcript of the evidence given at a trial by an eminent pharmacologist who holds a Ph.D. and many other high degrees. In addition, at the time of giving this evidence he had 12 years of practical experience in the drug field. His comments on the long-term and immediate effects on an individual of the use of heroin are as follows:

> So far as immediate effects in terms of depression of respiration, and depression of heart action; constriction of the pupil of the eye; depression of intestinal movement. Those effects are less apparent in some ways than the behavioural effects, which relate to a lassitude, a languor, almost a stupor; a feeling of well-being, a feeling of comfort and loss of anxiety. That pleasurable feeling is, in fact, one of the reasons that the heroin user returns to the use of the drug.
> In the long range, there are additional kinds of effects because heroin use is characterized by two phenomena; the development of tolerance and the development of dependence. The tolerance means that the user has to increase the dose to get the same kind of effect. So that an habitual heroin user will take many time the dose of heroin which would be toxic or perhaps fatal to someone who was not used to taking it. The dependence on the drug is of two kinds: one is a profound craving for the drug, a psychological dependence, which comes to the point of actually mastering the total lifestyle of the user, such that he lives for the drug-taking experience. His whole life experience revolves around the drug-taking and all that he does centres upon an attempt to make certain that he always has the drug in his presence or available to him for his use.
> There is, however, a physical dependence which develops for the drug as well. That we know because if you take heroin away from an addict, within a few hours' time he will begin to show the symptoms of withdrawal. In effect, his body cries out against the removal of it—the drug. The withdrawal symptoms include such things as an appearance, almost, of a heavy cold, with running eyes, running nose, the person aches all over; his joints ache, his belly aches; he has stomach cramps, intestinal cramps and sometimes he has unavoidable defecation; he feels absolutely miserable. This lasts for a couple of days in its most acute form. By seven or eight days it is nearly over with, but during that time he feels acutely uncomfortable. Most people who have been involved with heroin and when the drug is taken away, they all go through this withdrawal, but most of them, if left to their own devices, so profound is their psychological dependence on the drug that they will go back and seek the drug again. So the recidivist rate, the percentage of people who voluntarily go back to the use of heroin, when they have been taken off the drug is, even in the best of treatment institutions, 70 or 80 per cent.
> All in all the life expectancy of a heroin user is considerably less than that of normal people.

With respect to the usefulness of a heroin user to himself or to society and the possibility of his returning to a productive life in society, the following evidence was given by the same man:

> There is no doubt that the social productivity of heroin users is markedly decreased. Their total lifestyle revolves around the drug. When they are on the drug, they do not want to work; they have a lassitude and a languor about them, almost a stupor; they are not really interested in productive employment; they become a great strain on themselves and their family and society. The number who are able to break away from that is relatively small, even under the best treatment or circumstances most return voluntarily to that kind of a lifestyle.

I have here some interesting statistics involving heroin and its abuse in Canada. In 1969 there were a total of 310 convictions in Canada involving all offences with respect to heroin. In 1972 there were 923 convictions registered with respect to heroin offences in Canada. This is a most alarming comparison. Another most significant statistics with respect to heroin is that in the entire year of 1972 there were 52.94 kilograms—116.56 pounds—seized, whereas in the first nine months of 1973, that is, from January 1, 1973 to September 30, 1973, there were 63.72 kilograms—140.18 pounds. That is an increase of approximately 20 per cent in the first nine months of 1973 over the amount seized in the previous 12 months. Comparing the same period, the number of persons charged with trafficking in heroin in the entire year 1972 was 958, whereas in the first nine months of 1973 the total number of persons charged with trafficking in heroin was 645.

As I stated earlier, the number of people addicted to this drug has been estimated to be between 16,000 and 19,000. The number of convictions for offences involving heroin shows a tremendous increase between the years 1969—310—and the year 1972—923. The amount of this illicit substance seized, comparing 1972 and 1973, shows a remarkable increase and the number of individuals charged with trafficking has also been on the increase.

By virtue of the present penalty provision of the Narcotic Control Act a person convicted of trafficking in a narcotic, whether it be cannabis or heroin, is subject to the same penalty, that is, a maximum of life imprisonment. There is, however, no minimum penalty provided presently in the Narcotic Control Act, whether the offence be in relation to trafficking in cannabis or to trafficking in heroin. The minimum penalty in either case, for either substance, is a suspended sentence.

I have the greatest respect for the judges in our country who have in most instances been imposing severe sentences, justifiably so, in the case of those who are found guilty of trafficking in heroin. My recommendation for a minimum sentence of seven years for anyone trafficking commercially in heroin is designed not to take from the judge that discretion, although it would have the effect of doing so, but more to impress upon those who would dare to traffic in this substance the determination of this government and this Parliament to deal with them in the most severe manner in order to deter this trafficking and to protect society. I would also propose, if a person is convicted, for example, of trafficking in four ounces of heroin as I mentioned previously, that the judge, having regard to all the circumstances including the previous criminal record of the person convicted, if any, continue to have the discretion to sentence the person to life imprisonment. The greatest weapon we have to interrupt and suppress the illicit traffic in this most reprehensible drug is the diligence and honesty of domestic law enforcement, coupled with the most severe penalty for those who would trade in human life in this way for the sole motive of greed, profit and avarice.

A little more than a year ago, Mr. Speaker, we had a throne speech that marked the beginning of some 50 pieces of legislation. This is to be noted because all the pundits at that time were predicting that the government would last for only a matter of weeks, if not days. That session ended, having lasted 203 sitting days. Last week we had another throne speech. In the coming months we will be able to look back on this debate as the beginning of more progressive legislation as long as the majority of members continue to support good Liberal policies such as we have seen defined in the recent throne speech.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the remarks of the hon. member who just sat down because for the last two or three years I have been asking the government of Canada to appoint a royal commission to look into international crime, which includes to a large extent the importation into Canada of those dangerous drugs to which the hon. member referred. I hope that he will now become an ally. Up to now the government has paid little attention to a problem that is serious beyond words. At the same time, I want to say a word about the CBC commentator, Mrs. Trudel, who has dealt with this matter at length on her program. On one occasion last fall I heard her mention how widespread and open trafficking was in this immediate area. Apparently, as a consequence of what she said, the RCMP within the last two weeks picked up a large number of alleged wrongdoers.

At a time like this it is always difficult for one to find subjects on which to speak. The House is waiting for the final vote which will come at the end of this debate but which is of little consequence because, once the amendment of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition—not the official opposition but the opposition—has been turned down, we pass into an area of little or no interest.

I commend the government for its decision to endeavour to make Parliament more effective and representation more equal, for bringing about changes in redistribution so as to assure that large areas of our country with small populations will continue to enjoy a reasonable representation in the House of Commons. I brought this matter up originally, and all parts of the House responded with that degree of desirable co-operation which I have always found to be worthy of notice.

That brings me to this point, Mr. Speaker. Parliament, as operated today under the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), is not effective. It is a caricature of what it ought to be. The opposition should place before the people of Canada this fact: we will reform Parliament. We did that in 1956 and 1957. We brought about changes and the people of Canada understood what was happening, because before then the previous administration had been totally disregardful of any views expressed by members in other parts of the House.

Today two members, by way of privilege, raised the issue of questions asked in the House. I have been here for some time. You, Sir, are simply tied up by the rules, many of which were forced through under closure by the majority sitting opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: One dare not challenge anything ministers say when they give their truncated answers because, as several hon. members have mentioned, by doing so one would introduce controversial matters. How do you answer controversial matters which may have arisen in a minister's statement except by following up with a supplementary question which may be controversial? What I am leading to is this: There must be a reform of our rules which, today, have placed Parliament in the position of being an adjunct, a necessary adjunct.

As for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member noted in the House of Commons for his wisdom and warmhearted personality, I have noticed lately that even his warmhearted personality has shown some signs of flagging. He is not in the position of being able to move amendments any more. He cannot do it. He is the authority in the NDP on amendments and on Parliament, but he dare not do anything. Why? Because, if he moved an amendment with the accustomed wisdom that he used in the past, the government would be defeated. It is difficult to express how much Parliament has lost in consequence of the present situation.

Does this House, as presently constituted, discharge its responsibilities? Have we any examination today of expenditures? There is virtually no examination. The No. 1 responsibility of Parliament is to look after supply. What has happened? I knew, when I was Prime Minister that ministers would be concerned about the fact that certain programs would be brought up in the House. You will always have that concern on the part of ministers. Today, you cannot bring those matters up, no matter how wasteful the expenditure or how unjust and improper. There can be no vote in the House of Commons on such items. Two years ago we were placed in the position of having to vote expenditures of $19 billion between eight o'clock and one a.m. Those were fabulous expenditures. Do you mean to tell me that if we could deal with individual items the spendthrift proclivities of the Prime Minister would not receive attention?

● (1230)

If anybody wants any information on the subject of those expenditures, I will render the fullest answer. Not even King Farouk expended to the extent the Prime Minister is doing today on 24 Sussex Drive, his offices and his country place at Harrington Lake. Waste, waste, in the hundreds of thousands of dollars! What can you do? You complain, but nothing happens. Amazing waste! Amazing spendthrift expenditures are being made. They have been revealed by two hon. members, the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), but you might just as well spit at the moon to do anything effective regarding those expenditures. We have the highest taxation in Canada's history, the highest interest rates—

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The highest income.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and the highest cost of living. The government says: Look us over, we have something else to take the eyes of the people off these things. We have an oil crisis. What the Arab sheikhs did was a godsend to the Trudeau government.

Have hon. members noticed the attitude of the Prime Minister in the past few days? Everything indicates that he has an election in mind. What will it be on? Those awful pirates in Saskatchewan and Alberta. He is going to wrap himself in the garb of being the preserver of Canadian unity, something which has suffered more detrimental effects under him than under any other Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Taxation is going up. How many have complained about the fact that every employer and every employee in Canada are paying 40 per cent more in unemployment insurance premiums since January 1 this year? That was when the pockets really got picked in the tens of hundreds of millions. How many have spoken? Silence. Can you challenge it? Not as an individual item. I could go on setting out something of what is happening today.

The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) asked a question today. Some rather ridiculed it. I thought his first question was one that indicated he did not realize what was happening, but the second one was most effective and searching. The Prime Minister tried to brush aside a very, very unusual observation on the part of the hon. member.

The hon. member apparently found in his constituency that this wonderful alliance between the New Democratic Party and the government indicates what the NDP claims it is, the one that forces the government to act. They have become the paragons of political perfection. No matter what legislation the government brings in, who did it? "We did it", say the NDP with that becoming modesty that is being evidenced. Two minds but with a single thought! How do we survive together?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a member from Saskatchewan I want to pay tribute to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). He is not here, but I am sure this will be brought to his attention. I would like to have been at that meeting when the two philosophical and intellectual minds got together just after the election, the leader of the NDP and the Minister of Justice. Mind you, they did not discuss anything about unity. They did not discuss any relationship between them. Well, from now on the minister will be known as the cupid of political development, the first of a kind. He brought them together and it has been effective. However, and I am sorry to say this to the NDP, the Prime Minister has been disparaging of their contribution. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would be able to quote the Scripture—whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what is happening today because the Prime Minister is trying to get rid of the NDP.

Prime Ministers must have holidays. This Prime Minister has had more holidays than all Prime Ministers since 1867.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Shame!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I suggest that the hon. member look up the records. However, none has in fact been like the holiday like he had in Switzerland. I saw a picture of the Prime Minister. He was mounted on a bobsleigh built for one. It was the first time in a year and a half that he was by himself. He did not have to turn and say "David, which way do we go today?"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Bob, you have a long way to go.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member will be running the next election, if I know anything about it, as a "Liberalcrat" because he is a bit of a wit. I do not mind his interrupting from any seat because it is always very helpful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. Boniface is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the right hon. member that I paid him a compliment and nothing else. I said it would take a long time for the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) to come up to par with the right hon. member and I meant every word I said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, an observation like that indicates the biased nature of the hon. gentleman. I find the Leader of the Opposition deals at great length with inflation in his speeches. Apparently the hon. member has not read the words of the Prime Minister of Canada on December 23, 1970. I keep a record of all these gems. He had just returned from abroad. These were his words:

● (1240)

It is obvious from the statistics the fight against inflation has been won. The government's anti-inflation performance has been unequalled by any country in the western world.

According to the Canadian Press dispatch, he went on to say:

Now the government has to deal even more vigorously with the twin economic evil, unemployment . . . There is a delicate balance between unemployment and inflation and the government has to be careful not to set off another round of inflation.

An hon. Member: Great sense.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Last night he was in Toronto and he spoke there to an audience of those who could afford to pay $75 to attend.

Some hon. Members: A hundred dollars.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, I am always Conservative.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: He revealed a great deal last night. He said: We are going after this problem; inflation has to be met. There is a new thing going around I am told. They call it streaking. Last night the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) streaked. He appeared with all those garments of expectation, hope and political promise removed. All I have to say is that the Leader of the Opposition finally has a recruit in a government which up to the present has shown no sign whatever of doing anything effective to meet inflation.

What is one of the major reasons for inflation? It is overspending.

Some hon. Members: Right on!

Mr. Diefenbaker: There never were, in the history of Canada, three governments together which have spent so unwisely or so riotously as this government. Five years ago we had the third best inflation rate in the world. Today we are in sixteenth place. And why? Spending the people's money. Is there anyone opposite who will stand up and justify just one simple example? I could give yards of them, but one will suffice: the spending a year ago of $385,000 on flowers and plants for government offices and $105,000 to water and trim them. Is it any wonder the Prime Minister was chosen as flower boy of the year? I will not include you, Mr. Speaker, but every other person in the House I include. Have you visited the hallway in front of the Prime Minister's office?

An hon. Member: Beautiful!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Even the floor of the hallway is covered with that deep carpet. Between $60,000 and $80,000 was spent on trimmings in that place. And in Toronto last night he said the government was going to meet the problem of inflation. Mr. Speaker, there is waste on every hand. For three long years, every one of the ministers—and we are graced this afternoon by the presence of two of them in the House—

An hon. Member: Three.

Mr. Diefenbaker: One of them is the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) who has the largest portfolio of all and the happiest disposition, though he does not like some English people in Montreal. Then there is the Minister of State in charge of multiculturalism (Mr. Haidasz). He has been spending right and left. And after all the promises made to people of various racial origin, what are they going to get? They will receive one-seventeenth of the total amount spent on biculturalism.

The Prime Minister used to say nothing needed to be done, that everything was going along well. Last night, like King Canute, up to his ankles, he said: We are going to do something. He got down to business and we can look forward to legislation which certainly is not covered in the Speech from the Throne. Apparently, some of the Liberal members have whispered to him that the stand taken on inflation by the Leader of the Opposition is the right one and that action is necessary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister is touching all the bases. Three years ago he said it was the labouring people with their claims for high wages who were contributing so largely to inflation. But you can never follow the metamorphosis of the right hon. gentleman—yesterday, against the monarchy; today, for it. Ask what you would like to have, and it will be followed—figuratively speaking. But he has relieved labour of any responsibility. We farmers will come later on. Oh, here is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). I am glad he is with us because, if I have time, I want to deal with him. His demanding presence always deserves respect in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is what the Prime Minister said:

> It is important to commend those whose performance has been responsible and restrained.

The opposition was not included in that.

> It is therefore appropriate at this time to destroy the myth that the cost of labour has been a dominant factor contributing to the present inflationary round in Canada.

The Minister of Agriculture has not expressed a similar view, but this is the official view now. Having slapped labour in the face for four years, the Prime Minister has suddenly decided that the responsibility for inflation is not theirs. He went on to say that it was not true that the average working man has caused excessive upward pressure on prices.

One of these days I am going to make a speech about all the criticism that was heaped on my head at one time, because some of the members opposite seem to have forgotten that we were in office. They seem to have forgotten the fact that in the period to which I am referring we enjoyed the lowest rate of inflation of any country in the world. How was it done? Simply by having a vociferous minister like the Minister of Transport. If word came that there were to be increases which we believed to be unjustified, the heads of those corporations were contacted and asked whether it was true. We inquired why, and very often they said it was because of increased costs. You would be amazed, Mr. Speaker, how quickly these plutocrats said, "We have not decided on the matter yet", when it was pointed out that if they did, an examination would be made under the Combines Investigation Act and if the increases were not justified they would be prosecuted. Today there is open season on the manner in which the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) and the other ministers, including the Prime Minister, look after inflation. It goes up, up, up.

The day before yesterday they saw the light. They followed the course followed by certain of my ministers and got in touch with the bread people. Yesterday the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was able to say that there would not be an increase to the four cents. Westons agreed to this the day before yesterday. Then the minister came out with the No. 1 government policy of all and told Canadians that if they did not cut down, boycott them, ignore them. There is the government's policy.

Mention has been made of the actual rate of inflation. Mr. St. Laurent was not a spendthrift. He did not waste the people's money or live in glorified greatness. Under his government the rate of inflation was 2.04 per cent. Under the government of Mr. Pearson the rate was 3.26 per cent. He never indulged in self-glorification. He lived in the home I lived in when I was Prime Minister and was most economical in office. Under my administration the rate of inflation was 1.4 per cent.

What is the rate today, Mr. Speaker? The average of this government has been at least 6.7 per cent. The government has done nothing but spend, spend, waste and tax, and then they wonder why the people are asking what can be done to control inflation. Everyone rushes to spend their money as fast as they get it so it does not lose its value.

Going back to 1971, after the Prime Minister announced that we had inflation beaten the rate stood at 1.6 per cent and by the end of the year had risen to 5 per cent. By the end of 1972 it was up to 5.1 per cent, in 1973 up to 9.1 per cent, and the rate today is 9.1 per cent. When is the government going to decide that the people's money should not be wasted? That is the simple question. But the government will not answer it because everyone is engaged in spending and nobody cares. There is no control.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry I have to interrupt the right hon. gentleman, but I must remind him that his time under the rules has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will restrict my remarks to the next five minutes before adjournment.

What are the government's policies in the field of agriculture? Reporting for the Wheat Board, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) has said that all is well. The government brought in the LIFT program. When I returned from the Far East and the U.S.S.R. I said that the demand for wheat was going to be beyond anything we had had before. At that very time the government of Canada called on the western farmers to cut down production. I opposed the LIFT program in the light of events, and I am able to say now that by following the LIFT policy of the government of Canada the western farmer lost hundreds of millions of dollars.

Why cannot some action be taken with respect to boxcars? This morning I decided to turn to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), and I hope he does not turn away from what he said. We have been trying for months to get the Minister of Justice to bring in legislation to provide that these great railway companies shall not defy the people. Each area of the economy ought to receive its fair share. I suggested a controller with the power to direct that a fair share of available cars be given to grain movement. This is not the case today. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) pointed out that cars were piled up for weeks, unused. In explanation all we got was a snow job from the government. The minister says that when the snow goes, everything will be well. Why will this government not appoint a controller?

I am glad to see that at last the Liberal party has awakened to the need for an international food bank. They speak of it today as if it were a recent discovery, a product of the mind of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). I never charge him with coming to conclusions on anything and I know there is no basis for that.

I brought this question up in December, 1957, before the NATO conference in the city of Paris. All the leaders were there for the first and last time. Only two nations joined, Canada and Norway, no one else. Then, in September of 1960 before the United Nations I brought up the suggestion of a world food bank, but again there were difficulties. However, today other nations are beginning to learn, and Canada is beginning to learn.

I had hoped to deal with international affairs, Mr. Speaker, because, if ever there was a mess in Canada, the administration of international affairs today is in a class by itself. Finally, I ask when will the government give the western wheat farmer immediate interim payments to the end that he does not have to continue to pay interest at a rate of 9, 10 or 12 per cent?

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it would probably have been unforgivable, on the occasion of the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne and after one year at the head of the Department of Transport, if I had not found the time despite the circumstances to tell the House about the situation as concerns the Department of Transport and about the future as I see it.

[English]

I want this speech to be as non-political as possible. I do not know how successful I will be, but I will judge from your reaction. In any event, I tell you that is what I am going to try to do as I think this is a problem so important to the future of this country that we should, at least for a few hours, look into each other's eyes and say what we really think about this matter.

Before preparing my notes for this speech I looked through Hansard for the past 20 years in an attempt to find a comprehensive speech on transportation as a whole, not just on one aspect or a philosophy of the moment. Unfortunately, I did not find such a speech. I found speeches delivered by a number of persons which were good in respect of a particular purpose, but I did not find a speech which covered not only the problems of the moment but the problems to be encountered in the future.

The last great speeches on transportation were made back in 1967 when the National Transportation Act was adopted by the House. At that time we, as a government, laid down a number of principles in which we believed.

These principles were not really rejected by the opposition. Of course, there was opposition but not in respect of the main principles. We said at that time that transportation should work in the same way as other things in other sectors of the economy. We suggested that we should have competition between the railway companies as well as competition between the railways and the trucking industry and between the trucking industry and the shipping industry. We felt in that way we would be sure of getting the best deal possible in this field. I was here at that time and I do not remember hearing any indication of any reservation about this principle. I can tell you now in all honesty from my experience that this fundamental principle is wrong in Canada. It is not entirely wrong but is partially wrong, because if you look at the size of this country and the distribution of its population you will see that you cannot have a transportation network which is economic everywhere; you cannot have an economic system of transportation to service the north, for example, or to service those regions of the country where the population is very thin. You cannot have an economic system for regions which are remote from the centre.

● (1410)

Let us speak about the Maritimes, for instance. If we had laid down this principle at the same time or immediately after we had passed those laws which enable either the department or the CTC to subsidize a certain part of the country, not only the Maritimes but other regions would have suffered. That means that the fundamental principle can apply where there is competition in Canada at this moment, but it will not work in the many places in which there is no competition.

Mr. Stanfield: It was not true in 1967.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I agree with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). I believe we thought this experiment would bring results in all regions but this has not happened. I am sure the CNR does not have competition in certain regions. The same applies to the CPR. Sometimes they agree not to have any competition. The fundamental principle of this act has been distorted by the situation in Canada. This is the reason there are so many complaints. I shall not attempt to say to this House that everything that has been done since I have been in office has been perfect. I shall not attempt to prove that.

An hon. Member: We agree.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): You agree. I am glad to hear that you agree with something. Sometimes I am pushed around a little in the House by some tricky questions because in the transportation field there can be a lot of difficult situations. I believe I can say I have been lucky. In any event, I think it is correct to say that many good things have been accomplished during this past year and a half I have been in this ministry. I do not say this for myself but on behalf of all the public servants who work hard to solve certain problems, as they did in respect of the problem of the freight rates in the Maritimes. There was an increase from 30 per cent to 50 per cent in the subsidy on westbound traffic. They were successful in working out that formula. I believe everything is just about settled now and we will have an agreement on this question very soon.

So, that has been done and it is very important. That does not mean we have solved all the problems of the Maritimes, but it is something we can place on the right side or on the left side of the ledger. I am not an accountant, so I do not know which side is the good side.

An hon. Member: The right side.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Then, let us put it on the right side. We dealt with the famous Darling report. For years this problem was never solved, but now it has been solved. We have agreed on a formula which will provide that coastal shipping in Canada will be carried on only by Canadian ships and Canadian crews when they are available. So, if we add that to the restrictions we are placing on shipping in Arctic waters, this means that sooner or later we will have something that will look like a merchant marine in Canada. There are many other reasons to believe this is the direction toward which we are moving. This is something positive which is worthwhile mentioning.

We speak also a great deal today about the Western Economic Opportunities Conference and its effects on the western provinces. I have heard statements to the effect that nothing has happened since the meeting in Calgary six or seven months ago. Well, this is not true. I have met twice with the ministers of transport and I shall meet with them again in Vancouver sometime next week. All these ministers agree that if we are to change the pricing systems of the railways in respect of freight, this cannot be done overnight. A proposal was made by Manitoba and another was made by Alberta. We agreed to have a firm of specialists study these and make recommendations. We all agreed that this study could not be available before the month of May or June. The fact there has been no result yet is because we agreed that there should be this kind of consultation. Now, we hope to have some kind of an answer. We agreed on that.

We are agreeing now on the upgrading of the highways on the Prairies. We agreed to freeze all branch lines. This has been done. I hope we still have agreement with the province of British Columbia concerning the rail and port development in the north of the province. This involves an amount of $325 million for the development not only of the natural resources of the north but also the port of Prince Rupert. This is something which is there; no one can deny it. There is also the matter of the Clinton-Ashcroft bypass on which we have a clear agreement. Everyone agrees this is good.

A large amount of money is being spent in Calgary for the new airport. This is something new and it is on the right side of the ledger. We have a new international air policy for the international carriers, CP Air and Air Canada. This is new. It is not perfect. However, I know this has really helped both air lines. It will help not only in solving disputes between CP Air and Air Canada but also with the main problem of getting the largest share we can of the international market. This is what we have done. This is a fact. It is something positive. So, we have signed a bilateral air agreement with the United States. Some people may say it is rotten and they do not like it in respect of their areas, but others say it is good. I shall not discuss its merits, but I know it is the largest bilateral agreement ever signed in the world. This opens many markets. I believe in the long run after we open United States markets to Canadians we will win because it is a larger market and we have a good chance of having a better return. This is something else that should be placed on the right side of the ledger.

In the matter of airports, we thought we could build an airport at Pickering to service Toronto. I am not responsible for that, and if it is proven that it is useless to have an airport there then I am not going to insist on the expenditure of $400 million.

● (1420)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I know of many other places in Canada where we can spend that kind of money. However, there is an inquiry being conducted and I am not going to make any judgment here. I do not think that would be proper.

We have not been paralysed at Mirabel in Quebec, yet. Work is proceeding, and I think that in about a year's time Mirabel will be opened and it will be an excellent airport. we have spent a lot of money at Saint John, New Brunswick, and at Halifax in order to improve their airports. We have spent money to improve navigational aids for air and for inland and ocean water travel. All this can be put on the right side of the ledger. So if somebody writes, "You know, this department has done nothing and is doing nothing"—I do not know if you could call that person a journalist, but I do say that is the kind of dishonesty that should not exist.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): On the other hand, if you tell me we have not done everything we could have done, and even I will not admit it publicly, unfortunately you will be largely right in certain instances. Anyway, the burden of proof falls on you, not on me, in that field. There is just one thing I would like to get across to hon. members, if that is possible. I don't want to take up too much time with my remarks.

Mr. McCain: Take all the time you need.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I am just practising your language right now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): To be sure of not losing my mother tongue, I would try to explain a few things as briefly as possible in French. Are we really going to stay indefinitely in this closed circle, which is the essence of a circle, or are we going to broaden somewhat our transportation policy and see how we will serve the Canadian people in the future? That is the important thing. Then it is not simply... and by way of an answer I could very well say that we will try to build more railroad cars to carry lumber, coal, or western wheat. It can and will probably be done, but the transportation policy has not been basically changed.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was telling me this morning of the wheat problem in the west. He is right. Railway companies are indeed not interested in carrying wheat. It is not profitable; they have been shaken by the present situation and do not want to buy cars to carry wheat. Even is they were paid, I doubt that they would do it. So there is quite a problem. Government cannot discuss indefinitely. The external trade of the country greatly needs an effective transportation system, giving a fast and safe service, for Canada is an exporting country. Actually, the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific companies do not have available for Canadians more cars than they had last year.

[English]

About the same number of box cars are available this year as we had last year. This means that no provision was made for any growth in the economy. This is true. So, what do we do in this situation? Hon. members may say, "You are the minister; you do it." I have a few answers to that, Mr. Speaker. It is true that hon. members gave responsibilities to the minister, but they forgot to give any authority at all in many instances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I am just talking to the House. I told you I would not make a political speech. I am just trying to tell you the facts. Everything is done the same way. We have the CTC which has final authority over almost everything, except in a few cases where there is provision for an appeal to the minister.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that we decided to have two national carriers. You know in this country we like to have everything in duplicate—two languages, two great ethnic groups, two railways, two national flag air carriers. We like to have two of everything. We do not like to be alone.

Mr. Andre: Two parties in power?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, two parties in power—and two leaders of the Official Opposition!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, you can understand that in such a short time I will not have the opportunity to go over all the problems, but the problem of the freight cars is a real one. We were fortunate that we did buy a certain number of hopper cars last year. As a result the railways own a number of cars, and the Wheat Board owns a certain number of cars. I do not know if there is a possibility we may buy some more as a result of other governmental re-organization.

Then, there is the question of regional air carriers. Very often I hear hon. members make speeches on the philosophy that should govern our aviation policies. Air Canada is a national carrier. Then, we decided to have another one. But often hon. members will say, "That is fine, but what are you doing for my locality? It is more important." At present we have PWA, Quebecair, Nordair, Wardair, EPA in the west, and Transair. I apologize for mentioning Wardair because it is not a regional carrier.

When an airline is designated a regional carrier it often enters the charter business in order to maintain a satisfactory economic condition. Then, it will turn around and tell us, "We have to stay in the charter business to remain economic, and we will have to abandon some local or regional routes." What do we do in that situation? Are we to establish a third carrier system? That would be silly. The third carrier would also buy big jets in a few years, and in order to pay for them it would need routes that extended beyond the particular locality or region originally awarded to it. That might make sense, as a result of which at that stage we will have big regional carriers with big jets, a third system of carriers with big jets, and we will be on our way to creating a fourth system of carriers. This is precisely the policy that was followed in the United States, with the direct result that many companies went bankrupt.

We also have the problem of isolation in Canada. There are communities far away from the bulk of the population. They need a service, and in return we say, "If you can find an airline which is going to make money servicing your area, then all right we will build you an airport." That means we will have Canadians who will not be serviced and who will remain isolated from the rest of the country. You can say, well, this is public money and we should use public money in order that those people will feel they are Canadians, so we have to give them service.

● (1430)

Then, there are all the problems of urban transportation and these are very serious ones. I remember about six months ago when I flew to Paris the journey took five hours, 45 minutes but from Orly airport into Paris took one hour and 45 minutes.

An hon. Member: How many stops?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No stops—oh, a stop between Paris and Orly but not for the purpose you think.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): So, what do we do? We have now an agreement with Ontario and we are going to have this commuter train between Richmond Hill and Toronto. This is not a policy, it is, an ad hoc decision. We say, all right, we are going to do it because we have a problem, but can we restrict that to Toronto? What about Vancouver, Quebec, Montreal? Do we have a policy? I am working with my colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) on a policy—

Mr. Stanfield: There is your problem right there.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): You have problems with him? I do not. Mr. Speaker, I think I have taken enough time and I do not want to be unjust to the other members who wish to speak.

I do not blame anybody for our problems. I do not blame any former ministers of transport; they all tried to solve the problems as they saw them. Nobody foresaw the new technology; nobody foresaw that it would take an hour and a half or an hour to go from Dorval to Montreal; nobody foresaw the congestion in the airports, but these are the facts.

Some hon. Members: Why not?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): It is just a few years since a minister of transport could go to a place and say "We are going to build an airport here" and his announcement would be well received. Now stones are thrown at him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Here you have a poor French Canadian who has to go to Toronto to try to convince them that they should have an airport.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): But I do not want to talk about the past, Mr. Speaker. We do not have what we can call a real policy for the future. If I stay in this post I shall surely ask the authority of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the cabinet to try to elaborate this kind of policy so that we know where we are going.

This morning we were talking of snow in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Of course, this is not new; snow in Canada is a very old feature of our country. Maybe we will have to stockpile some rolling stock somewhere. Do we always have to establish a level of rolling stock, for example, exactly at the level of economic activity in Canada or should we be wiser and say that even if it costs money it is better to build more freight cars and have them in reserve? This would meet a situation such as the one we encountered this winter in which there was a shortage of rail cars for lumber, a shortage of cars for wheat, for fruits and almost everything, even for moving grain to the east. At the same time we had too many cars in the maritimes; some were waiting in Sydney to be crossed over to Newfoundland. I am not going to tell you that I am building rail cars in my yard, because I am not. I am sure of one thing, however; I do not think we can go very far in this country without a policy in that field which is much more far-reaching then the one we have followed nationally until now. Everybody tried to contribute suggestions because this is a problem which is vital to the country.

As minister, you will understand that I am responsible for the ministry of transport. I would like hon. members to visit the ministry so that they could find out exactly what it is. There are three large sections of this administrations—air, marine and surface. As well as that there are many Crown corporations such as the National Harbours Board, the seaway, four pilotage authorities, CNR, Air Canada, Northern Transportation and so on and so forth. None of these companies have the same type of relationship to the minister, so how can he handle them?

An hon. Member: Sell them.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Some corporations have to go directly to the minister as authorized by the law, while others do not. Everybody is working hard, but I think that if we want to progress in the field of transportation in the future we have to manage transportation in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That does not mean that we have to run each railway in Canada; that has nothing to do with it. That does not mean that we have to run each regional air carrier, but it means that we should have the power to define the national objectives; what the people are expecting; what kind of service we have to give them and where we have to give that service to meet those expectations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): This is a really fortunate country. We have everything in Canada. We have water, air, surface—we have ice, we have snow and we have distance—we have everything to have fun in transportation. Something we do not have is a real policy and I hope that sooner, rather than later, it will be possible to have such a policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) wishes to ask a question, but this can only be done if he has the consent of the House and the hon. minister as the time of the minister has expired. Does the House give consent to the hon. member to ask a question of the minister if the minister consents to answer?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the minister on an excellent speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: The minister mentioned air and rail transportation in his speech but neglected to say anything about motor transport. I want to ask whether he intends to look at part III of the Transportation Act in considering his policy and if he intends to make a statement on it soon?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I presume that the hon. gentleman knows that it has not been ratified by the provinces yet. I hope it will be soon so that we can have a national policy.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege to follow an orator of the stature of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand). At the risk of having hon. members thumping their desks again may I say, through you, that it was a fine speech and I enjoyed it. It is a tough act to follow.

It is with some regret that I enter this throne speech debate today, Mr. Speaker. On January 16, last year, very shortly after the opening of the first session of this parliament I spoke at some length about some very serious concerns with regard to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Those concerns are as great today, indeed, even greater, and I intend to dwell for a few moments solely on this very unhappy situation.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

Before I do, however, let me say that as I read over the comments I made at that time I recall congratulating you, Mr. Speaker, and the Deputy Speaker, on your elections to the onerous duties of your offices. After this past year I feel I am now in a position to pass judgment on the handling of these offices with at least some small experience. I can only say now that my remarks at that time were traditional and frankly not sufficiently commendatory. I am extremely impressed with the manner in which Your Honour handles the daily challenge of this House with firmness and yet complete grace, especially during times when members both new and old, myself included, must strain the patience of Your Honour to the breaking point. I thank you for the many courtesies afforded to me. These same comments, in a like degree, must also be accorded to the Deputy Speaker, who has brought to his position a calm patience which, I understand, was not his trademark prior to his election to this office. His grasp of the intricacies of the task has been exceptional.

I also want to say a word of appreciation to the two assistant acting speakers for their efficiency and fairness, as shown to me when I have risen to speak. If I may reflect for one further moment, you will recall that I spoke, as is customary, of the many great qualities of the riding of Hastings, which I am proud to represent. If there is a member in this House now who is not aware of the qualities of that riding or even of the excellent cheese which we produce, I will have erred grievously and I shall correct that error as soon as possible.

Now, let me speak of my major concern, that of the tragedy of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In reviewing my remarks of the year past I noted that I brought to Your Honour's attention, and to the attention of those in a position to make corrections, a number of details which I felt surely would have warranted a serious study. During the intervening space of over 13 months I have repeatedly brought to the attention of the minister, other members of the cabinet and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), both in this House and in statements outside the House, a need for a full-fledged inquiry, this being the only way that we can properly expect to achieve any semblance of order out of this very disordered piece of legislation.

I suppose it might give a minister of the Crown some small pleasure when he thwarts a member of the opposition in his attempt to achieve a specific correction in that minister's field; but when hundreds of thousands of Canadians do not receive proper treatment at the hands of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, when many Canadians, through no fault of their own, need assistance, and, what is even more important in my mind, when the many millions of Canadians who have to pay the exorbitant rates charged by the Unemployment Insurance Commission have little or no hope of collecting benefits and see no end to this most disgusting form of indirect taxation, then, when these many Canadians become as unhappy as I am, I think the minister may well have thwarted a section of the Canadian public, to his everlasting discomfort.

It is interesting to note that I started to demand an inquiry into this matter on January 16, 1973; and mine was a lone voice at that time. Since then, the Canadian Construction Association, the Retail Merchants Association of Canada, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Chamber of Commerce and many other associations representing Canadians from all walks of life, have joined in my request for such an inquiry. While I have had support from members of my party throughout all this, I am very pleased and proud that just recently the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) formally, on behalf of the party, issued a similar request to the minister for a full-fledged inquiry. As a matter of fact I had hoped, from the report of a press conference by the minister after a speech at the Canadian Construction Association in Quebec, that there would indeed be consideration of an inquiry. At that time I suggested publicly to the minister that he might well ask that some indication of this be included in the Speech from the Throne which we are discussing now. Unfortunately, the following day, in Cobalt, the minister denied ever making such a statement.

I know that the press have a tendency sometimes to shade or colour or slightly change what we, as practising politicians, from time to time say; but, Mr. Speaker, they do not make up such statements out of whole cloth. No, indeed! I suspect very strongly that in the presence of some of the heavyweights of the Canadian Construction Association the minister began to realize the enormity of the request and the need for such an inquiry all across Canada. Who got to the minister after that to have him reverse himself at a time and place when there would be no pressure I do not know. Suffice it to say I am deeply disappointed and curious as to what he is trying to hide.

Let me explore for a moment the need for an inquiry. In a document which I prepared some months ago and which is available to any who asks, I contended that almost $1 billion had been distributed throughout the Unemployment Insurance Commission to people who were not deserving of assistance. That, Mr. Speaker, is a particularly strong statement, one which I researched very, very thoroughly before making. While there have been, from time to time, scandals within governments at all levels in this country and in other countries, I doubt if there has ever been such a wastage of funds collected from taxpayers in modern times. Very briefly, so that there will be no question in anyone's mind, I ask people only to take the figures given by the minister as to the number of disqualifications made in the latter part of 1973. Assuming that the level of disqualifications would have been as great from the inception of the new legislation, and multiplying that by the average amount of a claim, you will come to a figure of well over $850 million. My contention that almost $1 billion has been improperly distributed is very easily substantiated.

In my opinion it does no good for the previous minister to say that this money was a new kind of social distribution of wealth, that it, in fact, actually helped the economy. If we are to have welfare programs, let's do them honestly; let's do them humanely; let's do them only where necessary, but let's not call them an Unemployment Insurance program. There were, and are, many other accusations in the document I referred to and I have added to the list since. It is interesting to have the minister, in his recent speech, admit that the charges which had been made, and I assume he refers to my charges, were accurate.

At one point in my discussion of these problems I pointed out that in my opinion the level of collections would be completely insufficient to balance the fund. Despite denials late last year, there was a major increase in premiums, ostensibly a 40 per cent increase but in actual fact an increase ranging as high as 98 per cent, to some Canadians. I suggest to the minister that the increases which he implemented, unless there are major changes in the legislation and unless some of the abuses are curtailed, will not come anywhere close to balancing the books this year, next year or in the years to come. Employers and employees alike have threatened they will not pay the increased premiums.

Let me just point this out as a means of comparison. The budget for administration for the Unemployment Insurance Commission, which supposedly only services approximately 6 per cent of the working population who are unemployed, cost taxpayers $145 million in 1973. By contrast, the administration of the Income Tax Division of the Department of National Revenue, which collects from every Canadian, employed, unemployed, or retired on a continuing basis every day of every week of every year, in 1973 cost taxpayers only $136 million. I am unaware of the relative efficiency of the Income Tax Division. Perhaps there is some fat there also; but, surely in a comparison of the two figures one can only shudder at the obvious inefficiency of the UIC.

Another salient comparison, particularly since the government blames its problems on outside influence, can be made if one looks at the unemployment situation in the United States. There, the level of unemployment is within one half per cent of ours, but wages run about 20 per cent higher. The unemployment insurance figures suffer terribly by comparison. The average Canadian recipient of UIC assistance received $2,328 last year, while the average U.S. recipient received $768. In the United States, the cost of unemployment insurance equalled 2 per cent of the budget. In Canada it was 10 per cent. Although Canada's population is only 10 per cent of the United States, the cost of the unemployment insurance in Canada is 50 per cent of the U.S.; our cost of $2.1 billion versus theirs of $4.1 billion. In 1970, our programs on a pro rated basis were about equal. How many more comparisons are needed to prompt an honest inquiry?

Let me for a minute make a few interesting points to those hon. members sitting on my far left; far left, supposedly, in more ways than one. The NDP supposedly is the party of the labour unions. The NDP admits, and yes, even brags that they were successful in keeping Bill C-125 from becoming legislation during the first session of this parliament. Not that perhaps Bill C-125 was a perfect answer by any manner or means. Indeed, in my opinion, it was similar to the ad hocery that has taken place, but let us consider the way the members of this party represent their unions. I suggest that the average union employee is ripped off by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, harder by far, in fact four times over, than any other average Canadian. Let me explain.

The union employee is the one who is the least likely to be laid off. He is the one who bargains in his contract, and rightly so, for security. It is the many thousands of unorganized workers in Canada who normally make up the larger share of those receiving unemployment insurance benefits. The union employee, if he has any program for providing him with assistance from his regular employer for any layoff, gets no help from the Unemployment Insurance Commission, or at least very little. Thus it is that the average union employee is less in need of this program than any other. However, it is the union employee who pays the largest share of the premiums. The average union employee who makes over $170 weekly, enough to put him in the category of paying the maximum premiums, is the type of employee whose rates were increased by 48.7 per cent in January of this year. It is this type of employee, if he happens to be in one of those areas which were added to the work force at the inception of this legislation, whose premiums were increased by 98 per cent. Therefore, the average union employee pays more in direct premiums.

In addition, the average union employee provides a great deal of the purchasing power in Canada. The employer, the manufacturer, the producer who is being charged 1.96 per cent of wages does not actually pay those amounts himself. Rather, he adds that amount directly to the cost of the goods and services he provides and, once again, it is the average union employee who picks up the tab by purchasing those goods and services. There is no way he can prevent this situation.

Finally, the fund is not, by the wildest stretch of the imagination, self-sustaining and a good deal of the money being disbursed comes from the general rate. It is the average union employee who, through direct income taxation, pays a major portion of the income taxes which go to make up those many billions of dollars that are being distributed through this fund. In my constituency, a number of union employees are very unhappy with the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Much has been made of the documents which I have in my possession. The most ludicrous outcome of this situation was the instigation of an investigation by the RCMP as to the source of those documents. I have far too much respect for the RCMP, probably one of the finest police forces in the whole world, to ever believe that they would have started such a ridiculous and asinine project of their own volition. No, they had to be directed to do so, and I suggest that direction had to come from the minister of the Crown responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission. If that minister was not responsible for instigating that investigation, then I suggest to him that he find out who was responsible.

It was obvious after my discussion with the officers involved that they had been badly misled because they fully anticipated that the documents I had in my possession would be marked "confidential". This of course, is not the case. I do not like the sensationalism caused by using documents in this nature. Had there been anything, in any minute way a threat to security, I swear I would not have used it.

There is, however, a document which I have not referred to yet and, before I go any further, let me state categorically it is not marked "confidential". To the best of my knowledge, it is the only remaining one of its kind since the chairman of the commission was very careful to have the remainder of them destroyed. It did not come to me from a civil servant working within or without the Unemployment Insurance Commission so there is no question of breach of oath. I have, however, carefully checked its authenticity and am thoroughly convinced of its validity.

I have now to turn my attention to the former minister responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), since I cannot by any stretch of the imagination centre my criticism of the formation of the legislation on the present minister. I am now in a position to state categorically that in February of 1970, months before the legislation came into effect, the knowledge was available that a mistake, a gross error, had been made in the calculations used to estimate the cost of the disability program that was to be implemented. This error, in the range of $200 million to $300 million was known. I ask if the hon. member for Verdun was aware that that error had been made, discovered and was not being corrected. Through the many months of interrogation and investigation before the standing committee, my colleagues who were in the House at that time constantly questioned the validity of these figures, since to many it was obvious there had to be an error.

There was an error and someone responsible knew there was an error. I ask the hon. member for Verdun, did he know that such an error was being perpetrated in the presentation of the statistics that were used in the preparation of this legislation? If he did know, then with a great deal of reluctance I state that he was dishonest in not bringing it to the attention of the committee. If he did not know of this error and since we have debated the matter publicly on many occasions—I admire the hon. member for Verdun personally and I would much prefer to think that he did not know—I suggest to him he has no recourse but to join with me in my request for an inquiry into this matter alone, if nothing else.

The approach of the present minister to my many allegations has been, unfortunately, typical. At one point when I questioned him with regard to the increase of computer facilities at the regional pay centre, in Belleville, he indicated that there were no enlargements planned. Those enlargements are in place and functioning at almost double the original capacity. On another occasion when questioned about the computers, the minister blamed staff. At that time I took very strong exception, and I continue to take strong exception to that approach. My investigation, and indeed the investigation undertaken by the Department of Supply and Services not that long ago in the province of Quebec, resulted in a clear indication that the average employee of the commission is, by and large, a hard-working civil servant. In the words of the department itself, had it not been for the dedication of these people, the commission could not have weathered the extremely difficult conditions during the early years of the legislation.

The approach has been to install new locks, to change the keys of the existing locks and in the case of the Belleville Regional Pay Centre, to put on a massive lock costing over $600 which prevents anyone on staff from entering the executive suite. The cost of the lock and the cost of installing the lock are outrageous. It is the typical approach of the minister and his department that they would take Gestapo-like methods in an effort to prevent the Canadian public knowing exactly what is going on in the Commission before they make even the feeblest attempt to correct this situation. Again I ask: What are they trying to hide?

● (1500)

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has conducted surveys. I have conducted surveys. Others have conducted surveys. They all underline the need for an inquiry. Virtually every newspaper, radio station and television network in the country has commented on such a need. The major associations which I mentioned earlier have demanded an inquiry. In the name of all that is reasonable, what does a Canadian have to do in order to bring about such an inquiry? The avoidance of an inquiry in order to maintain the ego of the few whose interests are perhaps best served by not digging into the matter thoroughly is a position which will not much longer be accepted by Canadians in any walk of life.

The Speech from the Throne spoke of a comprehensive review. That is just not satisfactory. It is not sufficient. It will not do. The Canadian public will not accept the whitewash job perpetrated upon them by the very people who were the cause of the problem in the first place. It may well afford some satisfaction to the minister to thwart me in my efforts but I suggest to him that should he continue to do so much longer, with the increasing pressure from Canadians in every province, he will do so at very considerable risk. And, I suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) there will be considerable risk to him, also.

Mr. Mackasey: Perhaps the hon. member would allow me to put a question to him. I respect his opinions and I intend to comment on them a little later. I wonder whether he would tell me the number of disqualifications he is using as a statistic in order to arrive at the figures he gave.

Mr. Ellis: I am using the minister's own reports. My recollection is that in the last half of 1973 it was close to a quarter of a million.

Mr. Mackasey: Disqualifications?

Mr. Ellis: Disqualifications.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this debate in order to say something about what I regard as being Canada's most pressing national problem to the extent that it affects the greatest number of people directly today. I refer to housing. I listened with a great deal of interest yesterday to the speech given by the Minister of State responsible for housing in the hope of hearing him announce new programs to deal with what might properly be described as a crisis situation in housing. What did I hear? I heard the hon. member from British Columbia speak for ten minutes on harbours, all of which were located, of course, in British Columbia. Then, he spoke for another ten minutes on railways. Again, all the railway development to which he referred happens to be in British Columbia.

Toward the end of his speech he deigned to spend a few minutes on the subject of housing. But nowhere was there any indication that the government intends, at least before the budget is introduced, to move in a serious way to deal with the housing situation. There is every indication that in this area of policy we are saddled with a do-nothing government, a government which, once the housing bill was passed last spring, decided, presumably, that enough had been accomplished.

Let me put forward my reasons for believing that such an attitude is palpably absurd. Indeed, it is more than absurd since it involves a serious question of social morality, and the government has "copped out" altogether on this issue. To put the subject into some kind of perspective, let me compare it with the so-called fuel crisis. What does it mean for Canadians? I do not wish to be misunderstood. In the long run we shall face a fuel crisis in Canada, especially in the years beyond 1980. We shall be confronted with serious shortages and plans must be made now to deal with them. But in the short run, which countries face an oil crisis? Western Europe does, and so does Japan, since the oil used there has to be imported. But a man in Tokyo or a woman reading the headlines of her newspaper in Brussels, could scarcely bring themselves to believe that Canada, a country self-sufficient in oil, was really facing a fuel crisis. In reality, the current "crisis" centres on the amount which one part of Canada will charge another part of Canada for its products. As to the effect of the present situation in terms of cash, a typical family will be paying $50 more for heating their home over the six months winter period. In the same six months, given the present rate of inflation in the housing industry, the price of the home itself will have increased by $4,000. When we make that kind of comparison, it is abundantly clear where the national political energy should be going at this time.

Let me give the House some further information as to what is happening in the housing field. In Ottawa, Toronto and Vancouver, prices have increased in the past year by some 25 per cent. In virtually all of urban Canada the picture is the same. For the first time in Canadian history a steadily-employed, moderate income family living in Canada cannot afford to buy a housing unit, whether a single family dwelling, a condominium, or other kind of accommodation. The reason for this is that governments at the federal level in the past, both Liberal and Conservative, have failed to recognize that housing is to be distinguished from other goods and services available in the commodity market. They have regarded housing as being basically like any other consumer item. They have refrained from interfering with the financial markets or with the acquisition of land because, in their view, a house is like a television set or an electric toothbrush or any other item of consumer use. Price, in their view, must correspond with market conditions.

Thus, the situation which exists today is a very bad one—and I say this with great deliberation—it will become worse in the next three or four years. The generation born in the late 'forties or early 'fifties is now coming into the housing market. A number of crises have already arisen in connection with that generation. First, there was the elementary school crisis; the number of places in elementary schools had to be expanded rapidly to meet the need. This was followed by the need for a similar dramatic expansion of places available in our high schools and, later, in our post-secondary institutions. These same people are now young parents with one or two children; they are out in the housing market in every city from St. John's to Vancouver.

I point out in passing that we are among the most highly urbanized people in the world with almost 85 per cent of our population in the cities—a higher proportion than in the United States. Moreover, the proportion in the age group normally buying houses, the proportion with young families, is the highest in the western industrialized world. This means that a housing crisis of significant proportions is upon us, and it will continue if we allow the normal market situation to continue unchanged. If we want to do that, it means that we have to abandon the typical approach to housing used by both the Liberal and Conservative parties in Canada. What have these parties done? In the past they have relied on profit incentives. In 1967 they combined together to lift the 6 per cent ceiling on bank mortgages.

In 1969 the Liberals and Tories voted in favour of lifting the 6½ per cent NHA ceiling on mortgages. In the same year, the former minister responsible for housing in a Liberal government, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) who now sits as a Conservative, recommended that we introduce a rollover period on mortgages of five years. The idea was justified politically at that time on the ground that when you take out a mortgage at one point, five years later the interest might come down and the mortgage payments are thus reduced. But what has happened, of course, has been that ever since this feature was introduced in 1969 mortgage rates have not gone down, but both Liberals and Tories were happy to accept the profit incentive idea.

Again, both these parties combined together three months ago in this House to vote for the mortgage mechanisms bill. In the immortal words of the minister responsible for housing, the purpose of this bill was to enhance the attractiveness of investments in mortgages. The cumulative effect of the reliance on the profit motive, clearly argued for by both Liberals and Conservatives, is that during the Trudeau years, when the four innovations I have just mentioned were introduced, average or low income housing disappeared from the housing market and high income houses appeared like they had never appeared before in this country. The profit margins of the financial institutions of Canada went almost out of sight and have been almost at the highest level in Canadian history. Mortgage rates now are around 10 per cent.

The average price of a house for sale in Toronto is $41,000. According to NHA regulations, you would require an income of $21,600 to purchase that home. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how many people in the city of Toronto earn $21,600? Maybe 5 per cent, 10 per cent at the most. The NHA authority, which was set up to enable the average person in Canada living in a city or urban area to finance the purchase of a home, is now assisting only the top 5 or 10 per cent of the income earners in our population.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

This same reliance upon and encouragement of profit incentives has led the banks to invest in mortgages like they have never invested before. I have already referred to the high profit levels of financial institutions. Bank profits in particular have risen 85 per cent during the past five years. These figures are significant and I wish the minister responsible for housing were in the chamber. We will see what is going to happen with his financial mechanisms legislation when it takes effect this year. Last year banks in Canada increased their mortgage investment by 67 per cent; in 1973 their investment was up 67 per cent over 1972. The reason for this is obvious: there is no better place in Canada to make a quick buck, a very substantial return, than to invest in mortgages, which is exactly what the banks are doing.

I could list the profits made by a number of major corporations involved in other aspects of house financing or land development, but I will mention only one, Cadillac Development Corporation. This is not a small concern but one with holdings in Ottawa, Toronto, Mississauga, Windsor, Hamilton, Hull and in the U.S.A. It is a Canadian multinational corporation. If we look at this corporation's profit picture for the nine months ending September 30, 1973 we find profits increased 57.1 per cent over the same period in 1972. Their profits from land and housing increased 214 per cent. This is the profit made by one of our larger development corporations, but is quite typical of Campeau and a dozen other development corporations I could mention. However, I will not bore the House with all the statistics.

Quite apart from the financing of houses, which has become crucial in terms of cost, the other important aspect of housing costs is land. Land costs during the last three years have gone up, on average in Canada, by 60 per cent. Last year the average increase in our largest cities was 20 per cent. I am not at all happy to say that I learned only yesterday that the city I represent, Oshawa, now has the dubious honour of having the highest lot costs in Canada. According to figures not yet released by Statistics Canada but which will be coming out soon, the cost of the average lot in the city of Oshawa is now $14,875. This is on an NHA financed housing project and is the highest average in Canada. The average cost of a housing lot across Canada that is not NHA financed is even higher than this scandalously distressing figure of $14,875. What has brought this about? Again we have left to free market forces the buying and selling of our land. With the increased numbers of persons entering the housing market at this time, what can one expect? One can expect a few people to make a lot of money if the market is left to operate on its own.

Many hon. members are aware that the Globe and Mail published an interesting investigative report last spring. It revealed that of all the land available and designated for housing development in metro Toronto, some 80 per cent was owned by five companies. These companies are now in the market for one reason and for one reason only—to make a speculative land profit. That is where the big gain is to be made in our major urban centres, and it is where they put their money.

Let me give an example of the wheeling and dealing of just one company, Consolidated Building Corporation of Toronto. In July of 1973 this fine, noble, altruistic corporation bought 18 acres of land and resold it 17 days later for a profit of $1.5 million. That is not bad for 17 days. This company is in the land development business and has extensive residential and commercial holdings in and around the city of Toronto. However, in 1973 they found that land speculation in itself, not simply land development, was a more attractive business than building homes. According to the president of the company, as quoted in the Globe and Mail, the company is a public company and in the business of making profit. He used that fact to justify the company's total concentration upon land speculation.

Mr. Brewin: Good capitalist theory.

Mr. Broadbent: Good capitalist theory, as my colleague says. The people who pay for this kind of theory are the countless thousands who want to buy a home in one of the cities of Canada at the present time.

What can be done to correct the situation, Mr. Speaker? Clearly we have to abandon once and for all the notion that market forces can be left to treat houses in the same way as they treat television sets and similar commodities, which is to let people pay what the market will bear. This kind of thinking must be abandoned. We have to regard housing as we regard the provision of schools and medicare: it belongs by right to all Canadians, not simply to those in fortunate circumstances. What is required to bring this about? It requires direct government involvement, just as did the building of schools for our children during the past century, and just as did the provision of medicare services during the past decade.

Let me suggest two specific courses of action. In order to deal with financing of housing we must say to the banks, the trust companies and the insurance companies that they hold savings of Canadians and can make legitimate profits on most of their investments, but in the area of housing they will have to put up mortgage money at an interest rate which will not produce a profit. We should say that very explicitly. We must say to the banks, by a change to the Bank Act here in the House of Commons, that they must put up mortgage money at 6 per cent, and we must change other financial legislation which applies to other financial insititutions to achieve a similar effect.

I suggest that we should make sure we have a vigorous department of housing rather than be satisfied with the current situation in which the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) makes fine, well-intended speeches but does nothing. We should have an active department of housing whose responsibility it would be to allocate that 6 per cent mortgage money to the moderate and low income group first, and then to the upper income group when the needs of the first groups were met. I suggest in all seriousness if this were started now we could provide mortgage money so that 90 per cent of the families in Canada could afford housing without a serious impact on their monthly budgets.

The second approach we must take has to do with the land matter. What can be done there? As the minister of state responsible for housing knows, in the 15 larger cities in Canada there are 50,000 acres of what is called quick-start land now available. This is land that can be used for housing almost immediately. If this government wanted to act in this regard, all it would have to do is buy the 50,000 acres to be used for housing units. This land could accommodate 250,000 units which would house almost one million people. That land should not be turned back to speculators, because if that happened we would find ourselves in exactly the same position five years hence when the land was sold at a fantastic capital gain.

The federal government should purchase the 50,000 acres of land and lease it under contract on bid to designers for housing units such as Habitat built for the 1967 exhibition. Entrepreneurs who were genuinely interested in providing such accommodation could be awarded contracts for the construction of 250,000 units to be leased. The units would be sold to the citizens but the ownership of the land would remain with the government. in this way we could cut the cost of the average unit from $10,000 to $20,000, as we would not be passing on the cost of the land to the purchaser. When an owner of one of these units decided to sell he would be required to sell the unit back to the housing authority. If he were allowed to sell it on the open market the price would be anywhere from $10,000 to $20,000 higher with a substantial capital gain. This should be discouraged, and this could be done by requiring that the unit be sold back to the housing authority. The owner would be allowed, in addition to what he paid originally, a certain amount related to the increase in the cost of living, plus an amount for any improvement such as a patio or some other substantial change to the unit. There would be no capital gain. In this way we could keep at least the cost of that housing within reasonable limits.

I might say in passing that there is one government in this country which has started to move in this direction, and I refer to the province of British Columbia. I found out recently when speaking in the city of Kamloops—I was not aware of this fact before going there—that the government of British Columbia had turned over 40 acres of prime downtown land in that city for housing on the condition that it be developed on a leaseback program of the kind I have outlined.

If we combined these two approaches, that is changing housing financing by making mortgage money available at 6 per cent, and developing an imaginative land bank system so the land would remain in public hands, we could provide housing for all those post World War II babies who are now adults with babies of their own seeking accommodation on the housing market. This could not be done overnight, but within two to four years this problem could be resolved. We should adopt these two principles; providing mortgage money according to the needs without worrying about making a buck, and providing land on the basis of need instead of for speculative gain. In this way we could remove, in the years ahead, a serious problem, at least for generations if not forever, and housing would fall in the category of being a social right, just as we now have medicare and education in that category, services that Canadians now rightly take for granted.

Mr. Oza Tétrault (Villeneuve): I am most delighted today, Mr. Speaker, to be able to express my views and those of my electors. The Speech from the Throne contains many words about social security. We do not seem to know too much about social security, but I think a responsible government in a free society would find it very easy to apply the principle that everything physically possible and desirable should be made financially possible.

This principle was applied during two world wars, the first from 1914 to 1918 and the second from 1939 to 1945. We never stopped the wars because we had no money, and I am sure that if a war broke out tomorrow we would be able to find all the money necessary to defend our country. However, once the war ended, I am sure the government would then again suggest that we tighten up our belts.

Both the Conservative and Liberal parties were elected with the financial help of large corporations. Once the old parties are elected they must first serve those who elected them, and this is detrimental to the labour force in Canada, or the little man.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, these were the words of James A. Garfield, a former President of the United States:

> He who can control the money supply of a country controls the trade and the industry of that country.

Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the brave member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). He certainly has very good ideas to help those having housing problems and what have you. He said that the banks were making very large profits, around 85 per cent in 1973. I will come back to this subject later, Mr. Speaker, and give some figures. This may be somewhat monotonous, but I would appreciate having them printed in Hansard to open the eyes of my knowledgeable colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, on February 24, 1974, during a CBC interview with Mr. André Payette, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was asked the following question, and I quote:

> Nevertheless there is in Canada at the present time one Canadian out of four whose annual income is lower than the threshold of poverty. While solving the problems of tomorrow, what is being done to settle our current problems?

Replying to that question, the Prime Minister admitted that there were too many poor people in Canada and I quote him:

> I have always stated, and it is the point of view of the Liberal party, that Canada is an extremely rich country; its natural and human resources make it one of the most fortunate countries in the world. So we do not suffer from a shortage of resources, but we do have a distribution problem.

Mr. Speaker, for more than 30 years in the House, the Social Crediters have been suggesting that our monetary system is deficient, that it must be changed, that action must be taken to improve the fate of the poor in Canada.

When the first citizen of the country admits that there are poor people in Canada in spite of our prosperity, Mr. Speaker, the Social Crediters are not surprised, because in such a system as ours leading us into debt, it is impossible to get out of the hole.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

• (1530)

Canada's public debt is continually increasing: 18 years ago it was $17,951,491,464 and in 1973 it was $51,717,700,000. Provinces and municipalities are also overburdened by debts and, Mr. Speaker, I know what I am talking about because for six years I was mayor of Val-d'Or and our greatest problem then was always the matter of finance.

At that time we were not wondering whether we had any equipment or men, but rather where to find money. Today, in 1974, the same problem is recurring. The more things change, the more they are the same.

Mr. Speaker, here are a few statistics concerning 1973: direct and indirect municipal debt: $8,421,273,000; yearly interest: $452,983,000. The provinces have a debt of $17,054,997,000; the interest they have to pay amounts to $566,185,000. Canada's national debt totals $51,717,700,000 on which we pay interest costs of $2,260,600,000 and this finally works out to $77,193,970,000 all told. Canadians must pay yearly interest costs of $3,170,771,000, which represents a grand total of $9 million a day in interest for the municipalities, the provinces and the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder where we are going with such high interest costs, which must be paid by every Canadian. If my memory serves me right, every Canadian must pay $110 a year toward the national, provincial and municipal debt.

Mr. Speaker, how many bridges, miles of road, hospitals, schools and public utilities are not provided for the population because of this? These $9 million a day add to the wealth of financiers while the taxpayers continue to wait for the public utilities to which they are entitled and for which they have paid through their taxes.

The governments that allowed the public debt to increase uncontrolled are responsible for the useless spending of $9 million a day, the cost for servicing the public debt alone. This money should be used to meet the needs of Canadians rather than to add to the wealth of financiers.

Mr. Speaker, in 1970-71, the Canadian government lent $65,900,000 to the province of Quebec. Similar loans were granted to the other provinces under the same conditions.

Over 20 years the province of Quebec will have to pay the capital and interest, an amount of $162,900,000, that is about three times the total amount of the loan.

Mr. Speaker, those are figures that will give Quebecers food for thought and I am surprised that here, in this House, every time I address my colleagues concerning the monetary system, they do not seem to be interested nor to understand.

An hon. Member: They do not understand.

Mr. Tétrault: I realize that.

Mr. Speaker, the Social Crediters have repeated and will keep repeating several times that we ought to grant interest-free loans to finance public developments.

The only way to end the catastrophic indebtedness of municipalities, provinces and the federal government is to finance public developments through interest-free loans.

Some will say that granting interest-free loans does not make sense. I believe everyone knows that at the time when the Quebec premier went to Europe to borrow funds to finance the James Bay development, a former minister of Mr. Lesage's cabinet, Mr. Gérin-Lajoie, was in India lending money, interest-free, for a period of 50 years plus ten years of grace. If there is logic in that, Mr. Speaker, I wonder what it is.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government can, even today, use the Bank of Canada to grant interest-free loans to the provinces. The Bank of Canada Act authorizes interest-free loans to the provincial or federal governments for a maximum period of six months.

Mr. Speaker, why not offer the same advantages in Canada as in foreign countries, and grant loans for periods of "sixty years" instead of "six months"?

The Social Credit Party of Canada advocates the use of the Bank of Canada to finance the public sector and put a stop to disastrous running into debt which threatens to lead our country, one of the world's richest in natural resources, to the brink of bankruptcy.

Mr. Speaker, the list of figures I will give might be monotonous, but I want them in Hansard to prove to the people what kind of administration we have.

● (1540)

17 DEFICIT BUDGETS—2 SURPLUS BUDGETS

TOTAL DEFICIT: $6,316 million or $300 per Canadian

Year		Amount
1955	deficit	151 million
1956	deficit	33 million
1957	surplus	257 million
1958	deficit	38 million
1959	deficit	609 million
1960	deficit	413 million
1961	deficit	340 million
1962	deficit	791 million
1963	deficit	692 million
1964	deficit	619 million
1965	deficit	38 million
1966	deficit	39 million
1967	deficit	422 million
1968	deficit	79 million
1969	deficit	566 million
1970	surplus	393 million
1971	deficit	370 million
1972	deficit	600 million
1973	deficit	450 million

Mr. Speaker, those figures are food for thought for the Canadian population.

Earlier, the tremendous profits the banks are making were mentioned and once again, even though a list of figures is monotonous to listen to, I want to quote them.

A deposit of $100 in a savings account of a chartered bank entitles the bank to loan $1,250 at an interest rate, in 1974, of 10 or 12.5 per cent. Here is an example, Mr. Speaker. A customer deposits $100, and I quote from a table:

		Bank Deposit As Legal Reserve:	Savings Balance:
1—Mr. A.	borrows $100.00 at 10% int.	$8.00	$92.00
2—Mr. B.	borrows $100.00 at 10% int.	$8.00	$84.00
3—Mr. C.	borrows $100.00 at 10% int.	$8.00	$76.00
4—Mr. D.	borrows $100.00 at 10% int.	$8.00	$68.00
5—Mr. E.	borrows $100.00 at 10% int.	$8.00	$60.00
6—Mr. F.	borrows $100.00 at 10% int.	$8.00	$52.00
7—Mr. G.	borrows $100.00 at 10% int.	$8.00	$44.00
8—Mr. H.	borrows $100.00 at 10% int.	$8.00	$36.00
9—Mr. I.	borrows $100.00 at 10% int.	$8.00	$28.00
10—Mr. J.	borrows $100.00 at 10% int.	$8.00	$20.00
11—Mr. K.	borrows $100.00 at 10% int.	$8.00	$12.00
12—Mr. L.	borrows $100.00 at 10% int.	$8.00	$ 4.00
13—Mr. M.	borrows $ 50.00 at 10% int.	$4.00	$ 0.00
		$1,250.00	$100.00

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the bank transformed $100 into $1,250, thereby creating a net profit of $125 at the end of the year on a $100 saving deposited in an account.

This is the way banks do business, Mr. Speaker, and it is unfortunate so few people are interested in the way we are being administered by them in Canada.

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic expansion): Mr. Speaker, there have been occasions in this House when I have taken advantage of the throne speech debate to be, what one on the other side of the chamber might term, hypercritical. But let me assure everyone that I have no intention of doing that today. Of course, there may be some regrets on that score. There are some important matters of government policy, and one or two other matters related to my own province, to which I should like to make reference, and I am delighted to see my colleague, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), in the House on this occasion.

First, I want to associate myself with hon. members who have already spoken in this debate and who offered their congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply. It was interesting and encouraging to note that both of those hon. members emphasized the plight of the less fortunate and deprived peoples of the world. While listening to them I was reminded of the old adage which says that if the problems of everyone in the world were put in one great heap and you could take back any person's problems you liked, chances are you would take back your own problems. Perhaps that is not entirely true in a world in which disparities are widening. However, it is true enough for us in Canada to recognize that, in relation to the other peoples of the world, those described by the mover (Mr. Stollery) and seconder (Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke)) in this debate, our condition is nevertheless one for which we should be extremely grateful. In fact, if we were to take that theory of putting all the problems together and apply that to countries, I suspect there is not a Canadian alive today who, seeing the problems of virtually every other country on the face of the earth and given the opportunity to trade Canada's problems for those of other countries, would not willingly take back our own. I think this is another reflection of how successful and fortunate we are.

We can say this without being smug or narrowly nationalistic, and also while being fully conscious that despite our good fortune, relatively speaking Canadians have severe difficulties of their own that continue to impede the basic objectives that I am sure all members of this House hold in common with the great majority of their constituents. One such goal that has been pursued by every Canadian government in history has been the reduction of regional disparities. There are probably more laws on the statute books, and more programs in both federal and provincial departments and agencies, relating to this subject in one way and another, than to any other. It could hardly be otherwise given the makeup of our country and the continuing necessity to combat a broad spectrum of natural forces in order to maintain and strengthen national unity and ensure for all Canadians a fair share of our national bounty.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to turn this into a philosophical discourse, but I hope that hon. members will permit me on this particular occasion to remind this House that in just over three weeks' time my native province, Newfoundland, will celebrate the completion of its first 25 years of confederation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Welcome!

Mr. Jamieson: Having been very deeply involved in a variety of ways in the events leading up to that historic joining of our two countries, this may be an appropriate time to tell this House what we as Newfoundlanders expected from the union and the extent to which our expectations have been realized. Of necessity, these are personal observations, but I believe they will reflect the views of a great many people of my province. Today, all but a handful of us are happy to be Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: That includes, I might add, those who favoured confederation and that substantial minority, including myself, who had doubts about the wisdom of union and who fought and voted against it. Incidentally, it says something about the rapidity with which time passes to observe, and hon. members may be interested in this particular statistic, that today, just 25 years after the event, no less than 60 per cent of our Newfoundland population has never known anything but Canadian citizenship. Put another way, only a rapidly shrinking 40 per cent of the people of our province can recall our days of independence. That is truly, I think, a really remarkable and, in some cases, frustrating reminder to us all of how fast time goes by.

It is satisfying and somewhat ironic that today I find myself a member of the government of Canada, a proud Canadian and even prouder member of this House of Commons and that I find myself the minister who has been given the primary responsibility for dealing with regional disparity, the problem which perhaps more than anything else, brought Newfoundland to accept union with Canada in 1949. The promise of that day was that our partnership offered us greater hope for the realization of our aspirations than if we remained outside the mainstream of Canadian life. Today, although much remains to be done, I say, without serious qualification and with a great deal of satisfaction as one who describes himself as a Canadian not by birth nor by conviction but by conversion, that confederation has been good, extremely good, for Newfoundland.

Of course, Newfoundland is not immune to the impact of the revolution of rising expectations. In material terms, however, the condition of the Newfoundland people today when compared to that of 25 years ago—and I am sure the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) would agree with me in this—is so vastly improved that had such gains been forecast even by the most enthusiastic confederate of the late forties, the unanimous judgment would have been that he was certifiably insane. The evidence of this progress is everywhere, but a single example will suffice. In the current year, 1974-75 the Department of Regional Economic Expansion alone, will spend, in Newfoundland, more than twice the total budget of the province in the first year of confederation. That gives you some idea of how dramatic has been the growth.

It is not difficult to see why the great majority of Newfoundlanders are avowed federalists; why we believe in a strong central government and that the whole is more important than its parts. This is not because Newfoundlanders wish to have their hands forever in the federal till. Being a proud and independent race, we long, indeed pray, for the day when ours will be a have, rather than a have-not province. That day, however, is not yet; and until it comes the commitment to our fair share, implicit in the terms of union, must be honoured. I am happy to say that this government recognizes and accepts that responsibility and I pledge it will continue to do so.

It is not an easy task. Economic and social progress are relative. Although we have shared in Canada's prosperity and its successes over the past quarter century, Newfoundland was so far behind, there was so much catching up to do that the problem of narrowing the gap, of coming closer to standards taken for granted in many of the more senior regions of Canada has been frequently frustrating and always difficult.

Of course, we are not alone in this dilemma. Regional disparities continue to plague many other areas also; areas that have belonged to the Canadian family for a much longer period than has Newfoundland. No one is more aware of this fact than I, especially because of my present responsibilities. I hope, within the time limitations of this debate, to give this House some of the strategies that I consider appropriate, at this point in time, for dealing with regional disparities. Before I do, however, I would like to make one further comment on the attitude of most Newfoundlanders toward confederation. I ask the indulgence of the House in this regard because I want to get it on the record.

I have said that our expectation is, and always has been, that we will be treated fairly. We can ask for no less for all other Canadians. This is true, whether we are speaking in economic or cultural terms. We were a distinct group, with our own traditions and heritage for more than 450 years before joining Canada. We are determined to retain that individuality and, in large part, I believe, we have been successful. I believe, therefore, that we as Newfoundlanders, can understand and support the special aspirations of other groups and provinces, such as Quebec, when they seek equality of opportunity and the preservation of their distinctive characteristics. In one way or another, each of us in Canada is part of a minority and this is good for Canada. But distinctiveness in matters that are important to us, is no barrier to a strong federalism. Indeed, it can strengthen Canada as a land in which each of us respects and supports the rights of the other.

I will turn now to some specifics with regard to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and some of the new approaches that we are adopting. The statement that economic disparities pose a threat to national unity has become a cliché; but it is true that eliminating these disparities is, as it always has been, one of our most difficult challenges. The approach this government has adopted is achieving results, some remarkably good. But, I am the first to admit that there is more that needs to be done. From time to time I have told various committees of the House of the general policy approach my department is adopting. If time permits, I will review these details later.

First, however, I believe members will be interested in proposed changes in the implementation of the Regional Development Incentives Act. This act, which became effective July 1, 1969, has been one of the instruments by which the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has sought to improve employment opportunities in slow-growth regions of Canada. Some of the records with regard to its achievements to date, its weaknesses and some of its failings, were published in the spring. Members have had ample opportunity to discuss them. I have welcomed suggestions from the various corners of this House as to how changes ought to be made and I believe that what I have to say will indicate that I have been receptive to a great many of those suggestions.

I turn, first of all, to the question of decentralized administration. Like all the other programs of my department, the incentives program will be administered out of ten provincial offices and four regional one rather than centrally, here in Ottawa, as has been the case heretofore. All projects will be evaluated in the provincial offices, with decisions on most smaller cases being made there. The delegation of authority will seek to maximize the responsibility of the provincial offices in the management of the program. The regional and headquarters offices will provide support in evaluating large cases or difficult ones when this task is beyond the resources of the provincial office to undertake. Most large cases, and those involving technical or complex considerations, will be referred to an advisory board on industrial incentives which will now be composed of federal officials from other departments as well as from DREE. I might say that, after reviewing this matter, it was not proposed to have representatives of the business community, however respectable, on the board which was evaluating incentive programs of this kind. This will now be done internally, with various inputs from the various departments to the government.

This decentralized form of administration will provide applicants with increased service, as they will be able to walk into provincial or regional departmental offices and discuss their applications with the incentive officers handling them. That, coupled with a more selective analytical approach aimed at reducing processing time, will provide applicants with decisions about their projects quicker than under existing arrangements. Again, this has been asked for widely, both in this House and outside.

The changes being introduced will call for the amount of the grant to be based on a standard formula according to the region and type of project. Here, again, I suggest there is a marked and distinct improvement over the old arrangement. In the Atlantic region, for instance, and this, I suggest, will be extremely important to the hon. members concerned, new facilities and expansions to produce new products will be eligible for assistance based on 25 per cent of the approved capital costs for buildings, machinery and equipment. This is something which I wish to bring to the attention of members, particularly those from the Atlantic provinces, because it involves a change in the method of payment for the number of jobs created.

Under the new scheme of things, we will provide 25 per cent with regard to fixed capital costs, plus 30 per cent of the average wages and salaries in the second and third years of operation. Up to now, the incentive per job has been based primarily on the number of jobs which have been created and has not had much connection with the pay rate for that particular job; so that theoretically at least, if the job paid $75 per week, the incentive was virtually the same as if it paid $150 per week. Under this new scheme we are taking a justified step to encourage enterprises in the Atlantic provinces in particular to pay decent levels of wages and we are saying, "The higher your wage bill is, the more return you will get in the form of incentive." We will do the same thing in other designated and special regions, and they will receive the same level of assistance except that, for obvious reasons, since wage rates tend to be higher outside the Atlantic provinces, the percentage of wages and salaries to be used in calculating the incentive will be 15 per cent rather than 30 per cent.

These new arrangements differ, as I said, from those under the old program, primarily in that there was no standard formula on which assistance was based. In a rather general way that assistance was based on a great many fuzzy criteria, if I may use that expression. Now, the applicant will have a much better awareness of the level and degree of assistance which he will be entitled to and, also, he will be able, in the great majority of cases, to get that assistance on a much more rapid and assured basis than has been the case up to now.

I should say a word about modernization and expansion with regard to producing more of the same product. In the case of a fish plant, say, which does not have the technique to create a new product line, the level of assistance will be at 20 per cent of the approved capital cost of plant and machinery, regardless of the designated region in which the facility will be located.

I wish to move on, because there is so much to say in such a short time. On the question of relocation—and this is bothering a number of people—it certainly was not our intention to move available jobs around the country. We have tightened up the regulations and we will demonstrate in precise language, when they are promulgated, that although our current regulations exclude an incentive in an instance where a project would simply transfer existing jobs from one location to another within a designated region, the regulation change applies this constraint to all of Canada and makes incentives contingent on any plants of the applicant or parent firms manufacturing similar products anywhere in Canada continuing to operate at the same level as at the time of the incentive application. This will be welcome news to many who feel that under some circumstances, perhaps, shifts were made within the Atlantic provinces or within designated areas in order to take advantage of the grant provisions.

I will turn now to minimum capital costs. We have had many representations to the effect that the floor or minimum which we were prepared to consider for incentives was too high. One of the major features of the revised program will be the introduction of incentives for smaller projects. In line with government policies I and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) have seen what we could do for small business. We have discovered that there have been many worthy projects put forward to the department under the old program that did not qualify because their capital costs were lower than those prescribed by the regulations. I think hon. members should note that the figure is $60,000 in the case of a new operation and $30,000 in the case of an expansion.

In the case of a new plant or an expansion into new product lines, which is virtually the same thing, these costs must normally total $60,000. We will be reducing that to $25,000. To make it more flexible still, in the case of that kind of new operation the costs involved may be either $25,000 or there may be the creation of five additional jobs. So, we will be able to work with the small businessman in the manufacturing and processing sector in particular, in order to try to encourage that type of enterprise. We will also reduce the figure to $25,000 for straight expansion of existing product lines. The reduction in that case, from $60,000 to $25,000, is not so great. We have simply brought both into line at $25,000, for obvious reasons.

I now turn to another interesting and useful change we will make in the regulations. Again, I hope this will demonstrate that I have been listening to what hon. members on the committee and in this House have been saying. We will bring in a new program providing for an incentive grant which is to be repayable under certain circumstances. This will overcome special problems encountered in several types of projects. One type involves projects which will be very profitable if the products are quickly accepted by the market. Where the government risk is considered worthwhile, an incentive may be provided with the condition that, if certain levels of profitability and other performance stipulations are met, the incentive will be paid back. This is an example of new flexibility. In looking at the profit position of a particular applicant, it might be very difficult to justify an outright non-repayable grant, even if it could be demonstrated that the project itself is worthwhile.

Even large and often profitable companies find themselves in cash flow difficulties, which may lead to the abandonment of a project or to delay in its implementation. This provision will enable us to say to a manufacturer or processor or company to which this will apply, "We will provide you with the incentive; but, if your profit projections turn out to be correct, then there appears to be a case for recovering these moneys at some point when you are on stream and your balance sheet shows that you no longer need this form of assistance. I hope we will be able to cope with certain other cases by using this technique.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Another type of project might not be able to attract sufficient financing at reasonable rates while, on the other hand, an outright grant might not be considered appropriate. In such an instance, a loan guarantee might be given if a suitable lender is available. However, where a lender is not available or the project might be lost because competitive funds are not available elsewhere, an incentive with specific provision for repayment might be a suitable instrument. Again, projects which might not have received an incentive can be assisted. I believe they can be assisted in a way which is consistent with our view that, while we wish very much to see industrial development take place in the slower growth parts of the country, we do not want, and I do not believe there is any necessity in some instances, to simply make public funds available as a gift. If the project is as good as the promoter says it is, surely the logic for some form of repayment, continued expansion or some other justification might deserve merit.

I want to touch on a few other modifications. We are going to change the qualification so that leased assets for incentives can be covered in certain cases. The forest industry, for example, often has a very large investment in terms of leased assets. Therefore, in order to accommodate the applicant, we will now embrace these, something we were not capable of doing before because they had to be fixed assets in the literal sense of the word. Something else we are going to do is adjust the list of eligible assets to include certain off-site assets employed exclusively for the operation. Here again I am thinking in some respects of the forest industry and some aspects of other types of manufacturing industry, for example transportation vehicles used between separate sections of the same facility. It seems to make eminently good sense to include these in the calculation of a grant.

There will be an addition of a few new activities to those already eligible for assistance. We discovered in some instances the definition of manufacturing and processing had to be broadened to some degree. I may say I am open to other suggestions beyond the examples I am giving today, but the type of thing is grinding, mixing and blending of fertilizer and feedstuffs, drying of hides, cleaning or drying of peat or Irish moss, certain transporting and merchandising activities and most types of concrete and asphalt mixing. These have now all been included in the program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: There will be an increase in allowances for cost over-runs for payment. Members have asked me on occasion what we are doing with regard to the possibility that, with today's circumstances, estimates might well get out of hand in some respects and a project, after it had been partially launched, might run into difficulty. At the present time we allow for a cost over-run of 15 per cent. It is now our intention to make that 25 per cent. This will take care of and answer that question that has been asked frequently about what we are doing with regard to compensating Atlantic provinces industry because of higher energy costs and things of that kind.

We are going to make changes in the provisions governing equity to provide greater flexibility in the time of payment of the equity participation. I believe this will be welcomed by certain applicants.

Another one members made representations on, and which I have come to believe is correct, has to do with the loan guarantee program and the magnitude of the loans and the minimums we will guarantee. This matter is of particular interest to tourist operators, for example. In this case, the loan program is available to certain new commercial undertakings and to new expanded and modernized manufacturing and processing facilities. In revising this, the guarantee fees will be lowered and the minimum capital costs required for a commercial facility to be eligible will be reduced sharply from $252,000 to $100,000. This will be very much of an improvement with regard to the number of people who can take advantage of the loan guarantee.

With regard to the payment procedures, we do not propose to make any change in the current requirements. That is, no monies are paid until I, the minister, am satisfied that the project is in commercial production, has been for a period of 30 days and the number of jobs are in place. In short, it will still be a question of proving that the project is operating before we pay them 80 per cent. The other 20 per cent, of course, is retained over a further period of time. I do not think there is any wisdom in making alterations to that.

In addition to the assistance which will be available under the revised incentives program in designated areas, that is those regions of the country which are marked as being eligible for RDIA, we have also taken into account the representations of members who have stated they cannot get incentives in their areas because they are not covered by the incentives program.

To date I have signed four general development agreements with the provinces, one with Newfoundland, one with Ontario, one with Alberta and one with Saskatchewan. I anticipate signing with Quebec probably next week, and with the other provinces before the end of the current month. Under these general development agreements, it will be possible for the federal and provincial governments to agree to support a major development opportunity in any area, whether it is in the designated section or not, provided the two governments are satisfied it will make a worthwhile contribution to the economic development and improvement to that area. I am sure the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) will welcome that particular piece of news.

I would like to say that I am very pleased with these changes in the incentives program. They have been worked out in consultation with the provinces, and will make that program a more effective instrument in our regional development efforts. The date on which they will be implemented will be announced as soon as final arrangements for the transition from the old program are completed. Hon. members will appreciate there is a problem of getting from one program into another. It should not be more than a few weeks. Of course, before it becomes official, it will have to be gazetted, but that is all that remains to be done.

As for the general policy changes, I am very happy that the new approach has been, and I do not need to qualify this, universally welcomed by the provinces. As hon. members know, I have been back and forth across the country and there has been legitimate and, I believe, mutually satisfactory consultation on a wide range of matters, not simply the incentives program with which I dealt in detail, but the whole question of how we will approach with each province what they see as their priorities in terms of reduction of regional disparities and the improvement of slow growth areas.

One of the important discoveries, perhaps that is not too broad a word, that has emerged from this or has certainly been reaffirmed by this exercise is that a blanket program which falls with equal weight in each area of the country is clearly not the most rational approach. Individual governments have individual priorities and see their province proceeding in a particular way. Therefore, on that ground alone there is the necessity for us to the best of our ability to accommodate what provincial governments legitimately set down as their goals and objectives.

The second point is in a country as vast as ours, the opportunities vary markedly as to their size, availability and type. I will give hon. members just a few quick examples.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the minister gives examples to hon. members, I must remind him and the House that the minister's time has expired unless he has the consent of the House to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Jamieson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful to the House. I will not give too many examples. I merely want to illustrate the kinds of things we are talking about. In Saskatchewan, several proposals for subsidiary agreements are already in the discussion stage, involving such areas as steel and metal-related industries and joint government action in the Qu'Appelle Basin to increase employment through the development of year-round recreation and tourist facilities. There will be others. In Ontario we did our first one in Cornwall, as you, Mr. Speaker, will know.

● (1620)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: In Alberta, one of the matters which I discussed at considerable length with the appropriate minister there is, for instance, combined effort on the up-grading of agricultural products, the value added to agricultural products. We want to assist in that. In Quebec, of course, there are industrial opportunities of a variety of kinds plus opportunities for the development of industrial parks and the various infrastructure supports which are necessary in order to induce industries to come to a particular region.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken altogether too much of the time of the House. I hope members will appreciate that this has been a very busy 12 months trying to put all these pieces into place. I hope they will realise that there has been no unnecessary delay but each one of these schemes has required individual discussions with individual provinces and with a great many governmental departments. However, we are off and running, and I look forward to a productive period ahead in carrying out the government's commitment to reduce regional disparities in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all, on behalf of my constituents in Medicine Hat, offer warm congratulations and best wishes to our newly-appointed Governor General, His Excellency Jules Léger, and to his most gracious wife, Madame Léger. I should like to assure Their Excellencies that a genuine western welcome, even a southern Alberta welcome, awaits them whenever they choose to visit Medicine Hat.

I should also like to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Stollery) and seconder (Mr. Pelletier) of the Address, with particular reference to the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) whose speech I enjoyed very much.

There are two subjects I wish to deal with this afternoon. The first is a very important local issue—indeed, in many respects it is truly a national issue. I refer to the closure, recently announced, of the defence research establishment at Suffield. Second, if time permits, I propose to make a review and assessment of the serious and immediate crisis confronting the Canadian cattle industry.

Mr. Speaker, Friday, February 22 was a bad date for the city of Medicine Hat. I am referring to the announcement by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) that the defence research establishment at Suffield would be phased out. On that date, too, the minister announced that a new defence research establishment would be established in the Winnipeg area, representing a capital expenditure item of $11.5 million and an annual maintenance cost of $6.5 million. In the government announcement it was stated that the new facility at Winnipeg would not mean any increase in the defence research budget since both funds and personnel would be transferred from other defence research establishments. With the greatest respect I suggest this new announcement means another $11.5 million of taxpayers' money, plus the operating costs, and is indeed a substantial increase in the government's budget. I think it is important hon. members realise that the facilities being replaced have a probable total capital value of some $40 million.

Let me briefly review the history and background of the Suffield research station, because I think it is important to do so. These facilities were created during the second world war as an army base. The station was formed through the acquisition of about 1,000 square miles of farm and ranch land along the west side of the South Saskatchewan River. The headquarters are located some 25 miles northwest of the city of Medicine Hat, just north of the village of Suffield. The Defence Research Board took over the base in 1946. Headquarter facilities occupy an area in excess of 120,000 square feet of building space presently in use. The central laboratory alone occupies approximately 64,000 square feet. The Suffield Research Library contains 20,000 volumes. Building construction since 1947 has cost about $12.6 million. Prior to 1947, both the Canadian and British armies were involved in the wartime operation of the station. At the present time the Suffield payroll amounts to $2.5 million a year, nearly all of which is spent in the communities of Medicine Hat and Redcliff. This generates a tremendous amount of activity, business, social and otherwise.

The scientific, technological and research involvements of Suffield are legendary in Canada. Indeed, they are continental in their scope. Universities which have been associated with Suffield include the University of Alberta, the University of Calgary, Queen's University, the University of Saskatchewan and the University of Victoria as well as the Technical Institutes of Northern and Southern Alberta in Edmonton and Calgary. Industry in Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom has also been involved in co-operative research because of the wide expertise available at this Suffield station. Computer facilities are available and have been used by agriculture departments.

One of the more spectacular and advertised activities at Suffield is the explosives testing program carried out by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, a program made possible by reason of the vast extent of the back-up area—1,000 square miles. Currently this area is being used for a United Kingdom army tank training program now in the third year of a ten-year contract. Some 184 families depend upon the research establishment for their livelihood. A good many of them have been there for more than 20 years. Many more Suffield residents are actively involved in the supply and service aspects connected with this institution.

In the period since the minister made his announcement not two weeks ago, I have received more letters, phone calls, telegrams and personal representations than I have received on any subject or issue since my election. They include representations from city council, the mayor's office at Medicine Hat, the Chamber of Commerce there, various unions on behalf of employees directly affected, and other organizations.

If, as the member of parliament for this area, I might summarize the views expressed in all these communications, I would do so along these lines. First, and foremost, this question was raised: if the research establishment in Canada needs to expand its northern operations and its activities in the field of search and rescue, as suggested in the announcement, if the government really believes in its policy of decentralization, particularly as it applies to the west, and if part of the Ottawa defence research establishment must be moved, again as indicated in the announcement, why should these activities not be added to those carried out in the existing excellent facilities at Suffield instead of building a new research establishment at Winnipeg for a further $11.5 million?

This afternoon in Suffield and Medicine Hat the minister's special assistant, Mr. Jim MacNicol, is hearing the views of all concerned about this decision to close down the research establishment at Suffield. In conversation with him before leaving for the west I asked him whether he was going to explain the government's decision. He quickly responded that he was making this special trip to listen to all who wished to meet with him, and I am sure that Mr. MacNicol will hear a very strong and united voice today asking that this Suffield decision be immediately reconsidered.

It seems to me that this decision is decentralization in reverse. By that, I mean it is moving from a 30,000 population city, Medicine Hat, to a 550,000 population city, Winnipeg, which actually is Canada's third largest city. This is reversing the east to west, and indeed the south to north, moves that most of us feel are so necessary to properly develop western Canada. Many of the letters I have received told me of serious personal involvements which will result, such as moving east when retirement plans have already been started in southeastern Alberta. The minister's reply to my question on February 28 suggested that I was aware that "the research establishment at Suffield has been phasing out for several years". Of course, I and the entire Medicine Hat community were totally unaware of this defence department of Defence Research Board decision until that day, February 22, which was less than two weeks ago. In retrospect, it probably would have been much better had we all been informed several years ago.

In summary, then, concerning this Suffield decision I most earnestly and seriously ask the Department of National Defence, and especially the minister of the department, to consider carefully the implications of this decision on the Medicine Hat-Redcliff community which I have the honour and privilege of representing. If improvements and additions are necessary in defence research establishments in Canada, why not at Suffield? I ask the minister seriously to consider this question.

I want to make a few comments about the cattle situation, but before doing so one of the letters I received on the Suffield issue suggested that perhaps I was more interested in cattle than in people. By coincidence, over the last two weeks I have also received almost as many communications on the fat cattle market crisis in which this industry is presently involved. These letters have come from a very wide cross-section in both western and eastern Canada. Because it is a national issue and because I have been spokesman for the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, I should like to comment on the current cattle situation.

For the second time within the last six months a fed cattle market crisis has occurred in Canada due primarily to the direct and indirect involvement of last year's freeze on beef prices in the United States. Live fat cattle prices in Canada have dropped eight to 10 cents a pound over the last three weeks, to a current level of about 42 cents in the west and around 44 cents in Ontario. Feedlot costs of gain in the west are 55 cents to 60 cents a pound, and probably a little lower in the east. Actual cash losses per head on most fat cattle sold over the last three months range from $100 to $150 per head. This is continuing and the situation is getting worse. In retrospect, the only way these losses could have been eliminated would have been to stay completely out of the cattle feeding side of our industry. Live fat cattle imports from the United States since January 1 have increased from 2,154 in 1973 to 29,114 in 1974, a 14-fold increase. There has also been a 50 per cent increase in the tonnage of offshore imports of carcass beef, exclusive of United States imports. This, of course, is the main reason for the dramatic drop in fat cattle prices today.

Our Canadian domestic marketing of fed cattle—by that, I mean grade A and grade B—are down 32,000 head, which is 10 per cent, for 1974 over the same period a year ago, that is, from January 1. However, we are not short of fat cattle in Canada. It is now apparent that there is a holdback from market of fat cattle both in western Canada and in Ontario. We should keep in mind that the largest calf crop in our history is about to be born both in Canada and in the United States.

Over the last three weeks between 7,000 and 8,000 fat cattle have been imported weekly, nearly all coming into Ontario. This is about two-thirds of eastern Canada's fed cattle weekly kill numbers. The week that is just ending tomorrow will likely see the largest number of imports for the year. A direct result of this is the extreme difficulty of getting bids on feedlot cattle, especially in western Canada. The packers are backing up because there is no outlet for their carcass beef in the east. Another result has been the extremely light deliveries in both east and west since practically no cattle are being offered. For example, today on the Toronto market there were only 600 cattle in total offered for sale.

On February 25, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association presented both a short-term and a longer-term recommendation to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie). The long-term approach has been suggested by long standing United States import quotas of 400,000 head per year, with appropriate quarterly quotas. In addition, the United States charges a 10 per cent ad valorem tariff on certain imported cuts of beef. Canada has no quotas on live cattle or dressed meat imports from any country. In addition, we have no equivalent to the United States ad valorem tariff.

The cattlemen have recommended that Canada should insist on a reciprocal, proportional quota system involving United States exports to Canada that would allow 40,000 head per year, or 12,000 per quarter. These figures are in the approximate ratio of the cattle populations of the two countries, which is ten to one. Because of the time lag to negotiate and to institute this quota provision, the cattlemen have also insisted on provision for a short-term, temporary tariff that would automatically increase with increased import levels. On Tuesday evening last, March 5, a seven-man delegation presented this proposal to our Minister of Agriculture in somewhat more detail than I have outlined here. After their presentation the delegation indicated considerable disappointment and frustration in that the minister did not seem to indicate any immediate and positive action.

I should like to say a word or two about this DES situation, since diethystilbestrol is again in the news. DES is now legal for use in cattle feeding in the United States. Implants of DES are presently available and in use in the United States. The feed additive form of DES will also be in use within 30 days when new supplies become available in that country. Canada's ban in respect of DES still stands and the Minister of Agriculture announced just a few weeks ago at the CFA convention in Saskatoon that it would not be lifted. Technically, I suggest that Canada has two alternatives: Either to re-licence the use of DES in Canada or institute a complete embargo on all imported fed cattle and beef from the United States. The cattlemen suggested that a monitoring or certification procedure on imports is not a practical method and would not be acceptable since it is literally impossible to tell whether an animal has been fed or treated with DES, and certification is begging the honesty of the industry in the United States.

By coincidence, the United States announced in a news report yesterday morning that their DES-free certification program was about to be launched. This announcement pointed up the fact that the United States is anxious to protect their very excellent export market for cattle in Canada, and also pointed up the fact that last year this market alone totalled some $141 million. I am entirely satisfied that the proposals of the cattlemen are both reasonable and workable and merit the full support of all hon. members in this House. Last fall during the first such crisis only the feedlot operators were hurt, while the cow-calf and grass yearling producers sold their cattle on very strong markets. Now, however, the entire industry is sharing the impact of the fat cattle market price, and this is why it is much more serious now than it was last fall.

If the feedlot industry in Canada is to survive, it must recognize that high feed grain prices will likely continue through the balance of this year and most of 1975. I suggest this is due to the world shortfall position on feed grains. The industry must also realize that there will be an unofficial fat cattle market ceiling established by consumer resistance at retail outlets. These two situations will dictate much lower prices for feedlot replacement cattle, perhaps as low as 40 cents a pound. We in Canada should not forget that we are a net importer of cattle and that almost all of our imports are fat cattle coming into Canada for slaughter. This has been the case for several years. Our imports come mainly from the United States, with lesser amounts, coming from Australia and New Zealand. The United States is also a net importer of beef and cattle, being probably the largest importer in the world.

The throne speech contained a very specific reference to our cattle industry and I should like to quote one sentence as follows:

> —incentives to increase the production of livestock necessary to provide for Canadian and export markets.

The present and future life of the Canadian cattle industry is now seriously in question. Cattlemen are not asking for subsidies or handouts, but only for a fair and equitable opportunity to compete with our United States neighbours in this same cattle industry. Our own Canadian industry is a $1.5 billion industry at farm gate values. That is how much it was worth last year and slightly less in preceding years. It is the largest agricultural commodity group in Canada today and it is worth saving. To save it we will require genuine understanding and some immediate action by government.

[Mr. Hargrave.]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to participate in the debate by referring to an entirely different subject, but the remarks of the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) this afternoon, and his attack on unemployment insurance, leave me very little choice but to answer some of his allegations. I do not intend to do so in a personal manner as I have never in the 12 or 13 years I have been in the House found it necessary to be abusive.

Before speaking about unemployment insurance, I want to follow tradition by paying tribute to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is significant that the mover, an hon. member from the greater Toronto area, reflected upon a comparison of affluence in Canada with the affluence of those countries vaguely referred to as being in the third world, whereas the seconder in a very deep and thoughtful speech reminded us of the poverty which still exists in Canada. Galbraith in "The Affluent Society" suggested that it is hardly beneficial today for politicians to ally themselves with those who are very poor, since in this industrial era, in north America particularly, the poor represent a very small minority, very inarticulate and very passive, and, quite frankly and bluntly, to be allied with them can quite often be a political detriment.

Poverty does remain in Canada. Those economists who think you can eliminate poverty by simply giving everybody a sum of money per week fail to understand the difference between being hungry and living in a poor environment. There are whole areas in Canada which, because of poverty, regional disparity, geographic location and the inability of having someone articulate on their behalf, find that they have substandard roads and substandard schools, because teachers do not want to move in and teach in these areas, as well as substandard medicine, because doctors do not want to go too far away from the centres of learning. So poverty has come to mean to too many Canadians more than just the absence of dollars and cents, but has become in reality the absence of opportunity. This parliament, including members on all sides, as I have no monopoly of concern for the poor, should remind itself periodically that there are still many thousands of Canadians whom one might consider to be in the poverty category rather than just hungry in the evening.

The hon. member for Hastings referred to a 1970 paper of which I should have been aware, having something to do with disability. I looked puzzled because disability has nothing to do with unemployment insurance but workmen's compensation. I can only presume he was talking about maternity and sickness benefits. I went back to my office and found about three and a half feet of paper on the subject, including the Mercer report and various discussion papers. The hon. member is welcome to go through them.

I know there were many estimates of what the cost would be of these particular sickness and maternity benefits. There have been papers prepared and sooner or later one will come out which might suit me or one might come out which would suit the hon. member, but very little will be proven. What has been proven is that previous to the Unemployment Insurance Act only 15 per cent of Canadian workers had any sickness benefits and only 3 per cent had maternity benefits—one of the prime recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. The hon. gentleman is entitled to his opinion. I think from my discussions with him that he is serious, so I respect him; but that does not necessarily mean he is right when he says that the trade unions are upset and are complaining about the practices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Let me say to him that next week when the Canadian Labour Congress appears before the cabinet we will learn whether they believe the commission is being operated properly, whether it is too lax, or whether it is operating too severely. This will be a very interesting meeting.

I do not usually quote economists because, as someone once said, the main purpose of the study of economics is to make certain that an economist does not fool you. There are, I suppose, as many economists as there are scientists, but unlike scientists they are the only people I know who can be well paid for anticipating something and then even more highly paid for explaining why their anticipation went wrong. Nevertheless, there are some good and valid economists. I think of the report put out by the C.D. Howe Research Institute which I believe is as independent an organization as one might find. I should like to quote one small section from a book put out by the institute written by Judith Maxwell and Carl E. Beigie:

> In an earlier section of this chapter, we concluded that Canada does not have the plant capacity to employ all the labour available for work, and we also concluded that unemployment will rise in 1974 because of slower economic growth. One further conclusion that seems obvious is that Canadians should not consider the unemployed to be welfare bums. If, in fact, the unemployed are expected to work, then Canada has failed them by not providing jobs. This means that the country owes them an adequate income either from unemployment insurance, manpower training allowances, or the welfare system.
> Many Canadians believe that programs making transfer payments to persons are already too expensive, and the Economic Council of Canada has urged the three levels of government to reduce the growth of these expenditures to an annual average of 11 per cent. While this is an admirable objective, it loses sight of three basic facts:
>
> The high unemployment of recent years places a greater burden on transfer programs, as explained above.
>
> The sophistication of modern medicine means that many ill, injured and aged people are kept alive when in other societies they would not survive. This means that the population of handicapped people is relatively larger here and, in addition, that Canada keeps them in greater comfort than do many other societies.
>
> Transfer payments must keep pace with inflation. To set a target of 11 per cent a year when prices are rising by 8 per cent means that the country has made a very small transfer of "real" income. Once the transfer payments system is perfect—which it is not—

There is a footnote referring to the Special Senate Committee report on Poverty in Canada.

> —the growth rate should be at the same pace as inflation. But the system needs dramatic improvement first.
>
> In summary, then, the main policy response to higher unemployment in 1974 should be to provide either incomes, training or jobs in community work for the people who are effectively locked out of the economic system.

Mr. Speaker, you either believe this or you do not.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Mackasey: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would permit me the luxury of half an hour without his usual intervention.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I just want to know the year of the article. I do not mean to detract from the minister's time.

Mr. Mackasey: It is 1974. I think it is ten days old as everybody should know who is interested in the subject. It has been in every daily newspaper, except perhaps the Hamilton Spectator in recent weeks. The term "welfare bums" is a despicable expression. That it should be used in connection with the people drawing unemployment insurance or even welfare is nothing of which any Canadian should be proud. According to a study of health and welfare, and the study by the C. D. Howe Institute, perhaps 14 or 15 people out of 100 on welfare could work if work were available. People who do not work because of the absence of day care centres and those who are chronically ill, mentally retarded and those who are third generation welfare recipients, or unfortunate alcoholics are not the type of people who work even in this time of affluence, and rather than call them welfare bums or resent the $1.40 or $1.90 or $2 a week that we contribute to UIC or welfare, we should thank God we are not part of the welfare trap ourselves.

It is ironic that the first voice that should be raised in respect of an inquiry into the Unemployment Insurance Commission should be from the construction industry. Anybody who knows anything about labour—and I know the hon. gentleman who speaks for manpower does—and anybody who knows about technological change in the Labour Code will know it has not cost this country one day of labour unrest but on the contrary has resulted in many settlements. Amongst the leaders against that particular legislation was none other than the construction industry. But, what industry depends more on federal handouts than the construction industry in general? Unemployment insurance is the greatest handout and subsidy to the employer in the construction industry of any industry in this country and I am sure they would be the first and the greatest opponent of the concept of merit training which would place the responsibility right on the employer in the construction industry to provide his workers with a guaranteed annual income or would at least cut down on the characteristic of the construction industry today which is if you lay the cornerstone at 1.30 you fire the workers at a quarter to two. The government will look after them through one of its programs.

A construction firm can go from 800 employees to a telephone answering service, a secretary and one architect while the boss suns himself in Miami as the federally sponsored project comes to an end. Perhaps the inquiry should not be into the Unemployment Insurance Commission but rather into the construction industry and the way in which these people manipulate funds from the government. They build at a time that suits them. They do not spread the work across the year and in this way avoid the responsibility for fringe benefits and for a guaranteed annual income or some legal obligation to their workers. The problem with unemployment insurance is that it is a complex piece of legislation and all members, including members opposite, I am sure realize and appreciate this.

In the act, I believe in sections 108, 109 and 110, there is reference to an advisory committee which has power to inquire. That committee did inquire in October 1973 into the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The final report of that advisory committee was placed on the table in October. It was a unanimous report. One of the signatories to that report was none other than the representative of the construction industry. I would welcome a public debate with Mr. Durocher any time he has time to spare from his lobbying from department to department to see what he can accomplish on behalf of the construction industry or what he can do to build up strength to reduce the federal sales tax on building materials.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), for whom I do not hide my affection and concern, perhaps because he is a fellow maritimer, has always shown concern for people, as well he should because in the years when he was premier of Nova Scotia the average unemployment rates in that province were 20 per cent, 21 per cent and 22 per cent, and these were acceptable and considered normal. But now he comes along and at a $100 a plate dinner the other night says we need an investigation of unemployment insurance, not to see if it is administered properly but to see if it contains disincentives to work.

I point out that this is an act which provides an average of $70 a week, or about $1.75 an hour. What are the disincentives in such an act into which the Leader of the Opposition demanded an inquiry when speaking before "poor" people who had to pay $100 a plate for their dinner? It was great stuff politically, but let him come down to the Verdun anti-poverty association and I will arrange a bean supper for him at 50 cents and he can ask those people what disincentive they find in unemployment insurance. They will tell him all they want is work, that that is all they are seeking.

To suggest that Canadians are lazier than Americans shows a distrust of Canadians, a distrust of workers. It is an insult to suggest that the average European, the average American or the average Canadian does not want a decent job, something that will challenge his initiative and be compatible with the level of education that we provide in this country. If we educate the children of the Atlantic provinces who previously may have been denied secondary education, or even high school education, for financial reasons and then call them lazy bums when they come out of high school and will not work in a tavern cleaning off the tables, we should remember that we ourselves would not do that.

But perhaps the policy of the Conservative Party is to go back to the days before we had unemployment insurance. I say read "The Lost Years," by Broadfoot, before advocating that. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I was out in that beautiful part of the country, Alberta, in Edmonton, and talked to some 700 people there. There were many who had lived nine years on welfare, others who saw their farms disappear in the dust bowl and others who simply packed up their belongings and abandoned their farms. Because they drew $14 a month welfare in those days they were not allowed a radio licence, a beer licence, and certainly not an automobile licence, in case some of that money may have been wasted on a glass of beer, in case they may have stayed at home listening to the radio, or in case they bought a gallon of gas to go for a ride on Sunday. I ask hon. members opposite, is that the type of Canada to which they wish to return? It is the type of Canada we will see if they continue this unalleviated harassment of unemployment insurance, particularly if they do not base their criticism on facts.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

I ask the opposition to remember that the press of this country has intelligence and that the press gallery in this chamber is not for sale to the opposition, to me or to anyone else. Rather, it is an extension of the House of Commons. Instead of feeding more and more on the question period, members of the press gallery are doing their homework; they are delving into the situation and finding the facts. For example, in Saturday's Montreal Star there was an article by James Stewart, who used to be in the press gallery 10 or 15 years ago and who spent a week or two studying unemployment insurance before writing about it. This is what he says about it:

> In the eyes of the Canadian Labour Congress and the Confederation of National Trade Unions, in fact the law is already proving too restrictive and punitive, offering few improvements over the old system for some workers, and leaving too much influence in the hands of employers.

It is too long an article for me to read it all, but perhaps I might read his conclusion first and return later to other sections of it.

> It looks more and more as though the bosses who scream loudest about the unemployment insurance scandal are part of the scandal themselves. They're simply lousy employers.
> Perhaps the inquiry people have been asking for should go beyond the ski bums and maternity claimants.
> It should look deeply into the big operators in the cheap labour market, the companies that lay-off at will, using UIC as a crutch to protect their profits, as a subsidy to reduce their obligations in sickness and maternity benefits, and as a scapegoat for their own shabby employment habits.

I take my hat off to Jim Stewart who had the courage to point out what too many of us here already know. Then he writes about the case of a woman as follows:

> A woman, growing older and a bit slow, was laid off from her office cleaning job. She got something like $35 a week in unemployment insurance benefits, but she was told she had to prove a daily active search for a job.
> She did this for a few weeks. Then she complained to her member of parliament that her diligent and vain search for work was costing her, in bus fares, $8 to $9 a week of her $35 benefit. Outraged, he told her to go home and relax, and if she had any trouble to call him.

I might say that it was a Conservative member of parliament who went to her rescue. Why couldn't she get another job, Mr. Speaker? She was 59 years old and she was no longer productive for the firm that won a federal office cleaning contract. She just could not wash enough floors between midnight and 8 a.m. to provide a proper income for that enlightened employer, so he finally dismissed her. She went on unemployment insurance. She complied with the regulations which say that you must be actively seeking work. This cost her $8 or $9 a week in taxi and bus fares and finally she complained, as she had every right to do, to her member of parliament.

One of the complaints we have heard from the hon. gentleman from Hastings is his inability to get information. He always asks, "What are we hiding?" Mr. Speaker, any information I get is public. There is the Auditor General's report of October 5, 1973, which can be obtained from the library by any member of parliament. Statistics Canada will give you the complete breakdown of disqualifications and disentitlements monthly if you ask for it. Then there is the annual report of the Unemployment Advisory Committee which was tabled on July 7, 1973. There is nothing that is hidden. What is really the problem is that too few people understand how the act works; too few people care; too few people have the courage to speak for the poor, because to speak for the poor in these reactionary times is a political liability, and there are too many people in this House of Commons who judge their success by their ability to get re-elected, and nothing else.

I have said many times, and I have written innumerable articles on this, that I will accept any amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act that will improve it. But I will not accept anything that will drive the poor people into the hands of unscrupulous employers, that will drive them into conditions that are deplorable and that are bypassed by inspectors who never get around to inspect such places, or that will drive them to accept work with employers who pay only the minimum wage or below the minimum wage. There are ample cases of this in the evidence already available.

Employees in this country have never been quite so well off. It was only a couple of years ago that we were crying about unemployment. Today we are bothered by too much affluence and labour-intensive industry cannot find people to work for $1.25 an hour in Prince Edward Island, $1.50 in New Brunswick and $2.25 in Toronto for the one simple reason that you cannot live in Toronto on $2.25 an hour.

Maybe I am wrong, Mr. Speaker, but we never hear very much when we ask the opposition: what would you do to improve the act? I come back to the same argument that I used a year ago. We can throw the fishermen off, if you like. By strict definition they are employed. If you want pure insurance of the private nature, I say throw the fishermen off who are employed, but I doubt if anybody on the other side of the House from the Atlantic provinces or from any province, if he has the slightest humanitarian instinct, will get up and make such a suggestion. You can throw out the woodworkers who work piece-work in the middle of the woods. They are self-employed. Why not make that suggestion if you want to save money?

What is the disincentive the Leader of the Opposition is talking about? What are the disincentives in a man receiving $107 a week unemployment insurance when he had to earn $170 or $180 a week, or more, in order to get that $107? What are the characteristics of the man in Canada who earns $180 a week? We have studied the facts and here they are: he has a mortgage, he has car payments, he has life insurance payments, he has a child in secondary school. If he is thrown out of work at age 48 for the first time in his life, he can postpone such expenses for about three months. Is he going to quit a job that pays $180 per week or more to draw unemployment insurance of $107 per week, and not sure if he can find work again? Where is the disincentive? There may be disincentives at the bottom end of the scale where some poor fellow is getting $2 an hour on the Gaspé peninsula and can now draw $1.33 and says to himself that for 67 cents an hour it doesn't pay to go back to work at what he was doing. Would you drop the $1.33 and put that person on welfare, or would you raise the minimum wage?

Have hon. members opposite stopped to figure out what the average benefit is based on? It is 66 ⅔ per cent of what the industrial income of this country is, subject to taxation. What were the old rates? They were 50 per cent, non-taxable, in 1968. When you calculate the rate of inflation between 1968 and 1974, you find that the man drawing $107 is earning less, in proportion to what he was getting when he worked, than the man who was getting $53 maximum, in proportion to what he was earning when he worked. Yet people use the phrase "generous unemployment insurance benefits". Sure we distributed $2 billion last year. Again, I have the tables but I do not intend to get into them. Most of that $2 billion went into the areas of the country which needed the money—the Atlantic provinces, northern Ontario, northern Saskatchewan, the province of Quebec and the Gaspé area, to be spent by the poor in the areas where it should be spent.

How many people know that you cannot draw benefits in Toronto under any conditions for more than 23 weeks if you have 19 or less weeks' work attachment, as opposed to 52 weeks before, because of the level of employment in that particular area? How many people know that the country is divided into 16 regions and in eight of them the limit that you can draw unemployment insurance is 23 weeks, and then you are thrown off if you happen to miss one of the blitzes for which we are very famous.

Mr. Speaker, when all parties put the act together, we were not unaware of abuses. In 1968 I ran a campaign, as minister responsible, against abuses that won first prize in Marketing Magazine. That was a big deal, I suppose. It was harsh enough for Dalton Camp, that small "l" liberal, to take me apart in his column. I thank him for that because I still have the column. It reminded me that in my zeal to be efficient in running the unemployment insurance program I was unintentionally abusing the act myself and throwing people off that act for the simple pleasure, I suppose, of running up statistics. That was in 1968.

When we drew up this act, some of the officials in charge of benefit control had been with UIC since 1942 when the act first came in. We plugged every possible loophole. When you talk about eight weeks' work attachment, do not compare it to 20 weeks; compare it to seasonal benefits. People who are familiar with unemployment insurance know what I am talking about. Under the old act, with no week's attachment between December and May you could draw unemployment insurance benefits and call them seasonal benefits. That has been eliminated. We lengthened the waiting period from one week to two weeks so that we could review more thoroughly the applicants to make certain they were qualified. That is paying off. If you look at the statistics, you will see that about three times as many people are disqualified for leaving jobs than in the old days. Because more are leaving, or because they are apprehending more with more efficient methods? It depends which way you want to look at it.

Mr. Yewchuk: You should get a new speech, Bryce.

Mr. Mackasey: Virtually every abuse under the old act has been plugged, and yet members keep coming back to the fact that it is abuse-riddled. Mr. Speaker, if people want to go from eight weeks to 12 weeks, go ahead. Maybe you save $50 million out of $2 billion. In Newfoundland, 13.9 per cent of all claims in 1972, and I can only talk about 1972 because those are the figures I am aware of, and I was there—I do not talk for 1973; 1972 is supposed to have been the year of poor administration, so if anything the figures are worse—came from people with 11 weeks work or less; 14 per cent for Prince Edward Island; 12 per cent for Nova Scotia; 13.8 per cent for New Brunswick; 10.6 per cent for Quebec, and all the other provinces considerably lower. If you want to go to 12 weeks, those are the people you will affect, the people who can least afford it—once again, people in areas of regional disparity. I just heard the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) speak about how we are going to eliminate regional disparities. In the meantime, why should we select these people—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member as his time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, we would agree that the hon. member continue so long as he brings his remarks to a close in reasonable time.

Mr. Mackasey: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members. I can understand people believing that the plan is abused, and I select no one opposite as a redneck or a reactionary. There are reactionaries in every party, but what comes out of a party is a consensus. The people who went on unemployment insurance in 1972 with eight weeks work represented 2.5 of all claims in Canada. That is what all the excitement is about—2.5 per cent, 11 weeks or less, 35,000 people. There were 1,800,000 who drew unemployment insurance benefits at one time or another in 1972, and 35,189 had 11 or less weeks of work. Incidentally, they stay on benefits for a shorter period of time than the person with 20 or more weeks. They simply want a chance; they want a job. They are marginal workers who come out of school with substandard education and want nothing more than to work. They work as long as there is a job available for them, provided the money is sufficient to live on. That is the plain fact of life.

The person in Toronto who complains about his inability to obtain workers is usually an employer who wants it both ways—to be in the centre of the most prosperous city in the country, to have minimal transportation problems, because chances are he has no railway costs, and at the same time he wants the same type of labour at the same wages as if he were located thousands of miles from Toronto. He has all kinds of spokesmen in the House of Commons, but not too many people stand up for the poor because it is not politically advantageous.

Let me give one example out of many. I will not refer to those referred to in the Montreal Star since I do not know where those examples came from or how valid they are. I remember that in October, just prior to the election, the Financial Times carried great headlines stating that a lumber company had laid off 187 workers, and eight weeks later when they recalled the workers, none showed up. According to the article, the workers were on unemployment insurance. The company could have kept the workers for those eight weeks if it had realized that they would be needed for the production of lumber eventually. But when the company wanted its 187 workers back, they were not available.

One of the directors of the company, a learned senator, came to me—after all the publicity was over, of course—and we discussed the problems. I got him to give me the social insurance numbers of the 187 workers involved so that we could run them through the computer and find out who they were and if they were still on the unemployment insurance list. It turned out that 14 of the 187 were drawing unemployment insurance. The other 173 were working for competitors of the company which had originally hired them, or for companies in other industries. When confronted with these facts, the senator said he was sorry. There was no retraction in the newspaper, however.

Being short of workers, the company went to Manpower and Manpower officials went to the camp to find out what was the trouble. Well, there was not much trouble. You could earn $300 a week in lumber camps, according to Bob Neilsen of the Toronto Star. Your only problem was that the camp in question was 92 miles from the nearest town and how you got there was your own business. When you got there, you slept with 16 other people. If your chain-saw broke in the middle of winter, you repaired it outside. Oh, yes, you could make $300 a week if you were in the right strawberry patch; that is, if the lumber was of sufficient diameter. There was no guaranteed weekly wage, let alone monthly wage, since you were on piece-work, and somtimes you could not work when it snowed or rained. And this company complained because it could not get workers. I am not talking about a company in eastern Europe; I am talking about one in Canada.

In contrast, there are companies in British Columbia and in Ontario which build decent accommodations for their workers, which permit wives and children to come with the worker, which guarantee a weekly wage and provide transportation. There is a waiting list of people who want to work for these companies for the kind of wages they pay. Let those employers who are complaining about unemployment insurance and welfare programs as being for the benefit of lazy Canadians look in the mirror and see their own faults. They are prepared to overlook their own faults very conveniently and to condemn those who speak on behalf of people who normally have nobody to speak on their behalf.

Mr. Speaker: I see that the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) has risen to ask a question. I would remind the House that the time of the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) has expired and unanimous consent is required if he is to answer the hon. member's question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I always appreciate hearing the former minister speak on this important subject. I should like to ask the minister how he would handle the case which I am about to raise, and what changes he would make to the act to meet this kind of situation. I am speaking of a man who is offered a job paying $3.23 per hour, and after working only one day he discovers that by working he will be only $7 better off than if he stayed on $100 a week unemployment insurance. How would the former minister propose to get a man like that back to work?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, if he is getting $100 a week in unemployment insurance, he was earning $150 a week and not slightly over $3 per hour. If he was earning $150 a week before collecting insurance, he should normally be able to return to a job paying $150.

Mr. Hales: But what if he cannot?

Mr. Mackasey: After one month on unemployment insurance, under the formula of the commission benefits drop from $150 to $140. After 60 more days, if he is irresponsible or too restrictive in his demands, he can be disentitled.

May I ask the indulgence of the House and speak for two more minutes so that I can rectify something which I believe the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) said. The hon. member suggested, I think, that 250,000 Canadians had been disqualified. I do not want that inaccuracy to be left in Hansard. I suggest the minister may have said that 250,000 people were disqualified or disentitled. There is a big difference, Mr. Speaker. You can be disentitled for as little as 25 minutes and then be reinstated. You could be disentitled for a variety of reasons. As I said, you can be disentitled for as little as 25 minutes.

Our system allows us to pour out millions of statistics. If you want figures showing, say, one million disentitlements by June of any year, you will not have any problem getting them. An officer may say to you that in the circumstances you are disentitled, that you are no longer eligible, and so on. In the meantime, your circumstances may change and in half an hour you could be reinstated. Nevertheless, you are a statistic; you are shown as having been disentitled. That is why I am suspicious of statistics.

The only statistic I believe in is this: in December, 1973, 6 per cent of the people paying unemployment insurance were drawing benefits; in 1972, 7.4 were drawing benefits; and in 1970, 10.6 of the so-called lazy bums of the Canadian work force were drawing benefits. Since we have gone from 10 per cent to 6 per cent, I suggest that some of our economists themselves should be on the unemployment insurance rolls.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I will say from the outset that it is with pleasure that I stand quite officially on one side of this House that I have known quite well. First of all, Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier), not so much to congratulate them for the contents of the Speech from the Throne but for the courage or the guts they had to support such a speech which I feel contains the very same wishes or good intentions we know or I heard for the last six years.

I would like to deal immediately and quickly with the last few years that led to this Speech from the Throne. I was during three years one of those who showed tolerance and patience for the measures introduced by this government. On many of them I was very generous I think in supporting this government on several occasions, believing as thousands of Canadians that satisfactory results could take place. We realized in the last six years that the "just society" which was the goal that we no longer hear about now is far from being achieved and I think that thousands of Canadians admit that the results are pitiful.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not because this government did not make an effort. I think it did. It is not because it refused to introduce changes because it did bring in certain changes and proposals. However, we ended up with an inflation that is no less serious than before, an unemployment rate that is both steady and unacceptable, and the increase in the cost of living. We know how housewives are concerned, and rightly so. We also have the so-called oil crisis which made us go through difficult days.

When one assesses the last six years, in spite once again of the proposals that were made it is difficult, and it was difficult for me, to continue to support a government which does nothing to meet our aspirations and the results of which are totally unsatisfactory to the majority of Canadians. Of course, I tried during three years on behalf of my constituents to do the best possible job. For that matter, having worked as well as I could for the past six years and realizing that the government has chosen to disregard a number of suggestions —the government is not the only one making them—I have felt necessary, because I was not listened to attentively, to reconsider my position with a team acting as a unit and to give Canadians the opportunity not necessarily to destitute the party in power, but to put an administration a lot more efficient and productive in its place. Indeed, hon. members opposite will refuse to believe that there could be on this side hon. members as competent as they are. I think, in the light of our accomplishments since the 1972 elections, that there are many Progressive Conservative members who could come up with initiatives comparable to those put forward over the past six years. For that reason then I thought it fair to answer the call of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in order to represent the province of Quebec within this party as this is necessary and pressing because even if 50 per cent of the government members are from Quebec, we can see that the province is poorly represented on some occasions and even not represented at all on some others. I could enumerate all the pieces of legislation about oil that we have discussed here. During two months, while the official opposition was fighting a serious battle about the importance of a single price, we have not heard, except on rare occasions, members from Quebec answer the accusations of the opposition leader which were perfectly justified when he said that Quebecers were betraying their own province on the energy matter. And we know it very well.

Furthermore, this government is going to create soon a national energy corporation and we don't know what will be the powers of that corporation and I am aware that Quebecers are very anxious to know if the government is not securing powers in the hydro-electric energy field. We do know that Quebecers are now worried about this matter. But Quebecers in power are not speaking about it and do not want to say anything on the subject and we are waiting for the opportunity to take required position on this matter. I should like—

An hon. Member: You don't know what is happening.

Mr. La Salle: Yes I know it very well. Yesterday, a question was raised about my return within the Progressive Conservative party. The hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) was asking if I would still be a member of this party at the next elections. I should like to tell him, Mr. Speaker, that I had the guts to make some decisions and take some positions. I think I had to do it. I had to consider the work made in the last 15 months by the opposition and I have understood that it reflected perfectly well the worries of Canadians.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in his speech that the Leader of the Official Opposition was repeating the same complaints. I think that he omitted to say that the complaints of the opposition leader are also those of most Canadians on major problems. But in the Speech from the Throne, the government was careful not to specify. We ask once again for a vote of confidence from the Canadian population, without wanting to assess the miserable results of which we are all aware. And these are precisely the points that the opposition leader mentioned in his arguments and those that concern most Canadians. The members on the other side are well aware of this. Therefore, I should like to tell the hon. member for Lévis that if there is any worry about whether or not the Progressive Conservative Party can win part of Quebec, the members opposite can rest easy because the Progressive Conservative Party will get a sufficient number of candidates elected to represent fairly and equitably the province of Quebec. Everything is fine! Our objective is not to elect 56 members, of which 50 rarely open their mouth. Our objective is to obtain the election of about ten good members who can do what they are supposed to do in this House and represent the aspirations of Quebec, just like we recognize that the first duty of Albertans and Manitobans is to tell of the aspirations of people in their province.

It is said that we need a strong government. I was listening to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) who spoke of decentralizing his department. Mr. Speaker, these are things I like to hear: decentralization of powers, respect for provinces and provincial jurisdictions. No one can accuse the opposition leader of not having this respect. The same thing could not be said about the present leader of the government however. My Quebec colleagues know it very well. Because opposition members are talking about inflation, unemployment, the high cost of living and the oil crisis, they are being laughed at. There will be an attempt, of course, and it has been mentionned, to create a national energy corporation whose powers are not very well known yet. If this proposal is not first discussed with the provinces, it may raise great problems.

Federalism may hope to survive only to the extent that the provinces will be happy to stay within Confederation. And the government's attitude, this centralizing attitude cannot last whether Quebec or any other province is involved. I am happy to have found out recently that Quebec was not the only province that has problems when it comes to the respect that each province is expecting from the federal government. Therefore it is false to say that a strong federal government is needed. But if we so work as to respect provincial jurisdictions and make provinces sufficiently happy within Confederation, it is possible to talk of a viable federalism.

Of course the national energy Corporation as envisaged by the government was born from sheer necessity since it meets a suggestion made by the New Democratic Party. There is no doubt about it.

But instead of being tempted to nationalize, why does the government not introduce encouraging measures for the Canadian investor so that the people will consider investing in Canadian companies? Tax incentives could be given too.

These would be measures which would enable Canadians to save and invest in Canadian industries and which would also enable our firms and Canadians to gain control over our industry as a whole, perhaps not fully but at least to a much greater extent than we do now. It is a matter of regaining our economy and rather than attempting to nationalize this or that it would be very important and much more beneficial to let Canada really in the hands of Canadians, to introduce encouraging measures and advantages for Canadians who invest in our industry. This could indeed prevent us from having to advocate the establishment of a national energy corporation.

I would like to say that in these last six years I spent in Parliament, I have always endeavoured to meet the aspirations of my province. Once again, it is the duty of all hon. members to meet, as much as possible, the needs of their provinces.

I blame members from Quebec for having been too silent on several problems and I am particularly shocked to notice that today still the Quebec Minister of Communications must wage a pitched battle against his Ottawa counterpart (Mr. Pelletier).

With a Quebec representation of 50 per cent or more within the government, the Quebec people expect practical and positive results. When there are problems between Ottawa and Quebec, we always find out, to our disappointment, that it is our Quebec ministers who ridicule the Quebec government. Even recently we saw how long it took the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to understand the Quebec position on family allowances. Have any changes been made to the Constitution since the present government came to power? No, Mr. Speaker, we are no further ahead. I say these things because I choose to repeat them at every possible opportunity.

I want to prove to the Quebecers that a Liberal government will not necessarily favour them or improve anything. When one studies the major problems, one realizes again that the government has a long way to go before finding all the solutions. Of course, I will be asked this question. As a matter of fact it has already been put to me, as well as to others: Does the Progressive Conservative party have solutions to all current problems?

Mr. Speaker, I could not give any guarantee that my party has all the solutions, but we know for a fact, and the people of Canada know it very well, that the present government does not have them.

Therefore, is it possible to do any worse? I do not think so. The integrity and the honesty demonstrated by the leader of the opposition will be ample evidence to Canadians that it is possible to have a government that could do much better. We are not asking too much of Canadians when we are asking them to give another political party the chance of finding solutions since this government did not come up with them.

Mr. Speaker, to substantiate my statements about the Quebec representation in Parliament not being sufficient or adequate, earlier I mentioned the constitutional problems and the too few or inexistent improvements. I would also like to bring to the attention of the House the glaring injustice being committed against expropriated people in Sainte-Scholastique.

Obviously my colleagues on the other side do not want to hear about it, but we know very well that just yesterday there was a meeting of 2,000 persons who feel, justifiably so, that they have been discriminated against. When one considers the differences of $200 to $2,000 an acre in the evaluations paid at Pickering, I believe that no member from Quebec, who has a little guts, cannot but be revolted.

It can be said that there are such and such reasons, but there is nevertheless the fact that the government had to go back to Sainte-Scholastique and try to patch things up, with no success. We realize that the minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) is not responsible for the evaluations made. On the other hand, the Minister of Transport has the responsibility of condemning the basically wrong evaluations, but nothing has been done as yet. It seems that this flagrant injustice of the expropriated people of Sainte-Scholastique will be tolerated.

Therefore, I ask the members from Quebec to stand up so that the wrongs made by the evaluators be corrected. I do not accuse hon. members of committing this mistake. What is unfair is to keep quiet as you have been doing for a long time on this matter.

Mr. Speaker, I would like as well to emphasize how important it is for my region not to be able to get a grant for a designated area, which my region was until June of last year. I would like of course to ask something to the minister in view of his earlier statements. It seems necessary of bring a few changes in the assessment of possible grants to be paid to certain industries or regions. These changes are already applied in a few provinces. After waiting for six months, I am justified to insist that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion answer my riding as well as many others. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) rightly referred to it yesterday. He must answer the province of Quebec so that a new agreement be reached as soon as possible. The file has been submitted long ago so I do not know why the government has not answered yet, has not signed this agreement, but I hope that it will be signed as soon as possible because I think that my constituents, like all the people from Quebec who have been deprived of this agreement, are entltled like those of any other region of Canada to be able to get a grant which is necessary, and in my region it is imperative that we benefit—

Mr. Trudel: You have a glib tongue!

Mr. La Salle: —while the hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa (Mr. Trudel) is asking me a few questions, I ask him to invite his Liberal government of the province of Quebec to be understanding and above all I ask him to see that this agreement is signed for the benefit of Quebecers. This is another delay and another injustice on the part of a government composed of 50 per cent of Quebec members, and which brags about dutifully serving the province of Quebec.

Mr. Béchard: You are talking through your hat.

Mr. Wagner: That doesn't mean anything, 50!

Mr. La Salle: I know it doesn't mean anything.

Mr. Trudel: Fifty is 25 times 2.

Mr. La Salle: I would also like to ask important supplementary credits to the minister responsible for amateur sports in order to answer a need or a motivation of the youth for physical conditioning which interests people of all ages. Thanks to the forthcoming Olympic Games in 1976, they have received supplementary credits. That is not enough, Mr. Speaker. If it is necessary to have good physical conditioning, I think the time has come to transfer to another department than the Department of National Health and Social Welfare the agency responsible for amateur sports, which are completely sunk in the estimates of that department. I would suggest the establishment of a department in charge of amateur sports, physical conditioning, sports and leisure in Canada. In my opinion, if an in-depth study were made in this regard, one would realize that it is urgent to grant sufficient credits to give all young people an equal opportunity to enjoy a better physical training program than the one now existing.

● (1750)

Mr. Speaker, I would like particularly to point out to the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) certain parishes of my constituency which have made suggestions because they urgently need more functional post offices. The city of Joliette as well as the municipalities of Saint-Jacques, Saint-Thomas and l'Épiphanie have made instances in my constituency and I must on their behalf draw the attention of the Postmaster General so that they may obtain adequate services.

Mr. Speaker, in the Speech from the Throne, reference has been made to the improvement of the social climate, but nothing has been said of the possibility of granting the old age security pension at 60 years of age. In my opinion, several of my colleagues would be as a rule in favour of such a measure. It would perhaps only be necessary to introduce legislation for a 5-year period—whether it is voluntary at first, it does not matter—recognizing the provision of an old age security pension at 60. The reduction on the labour market of the number of 60-year-olds would then create more vacant jobs for our young people who are unemployed.

Mr. Béchard: You are complaining because we are spending too much—

Mr. La Salle: Surely the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine knows that such legislation could be helpful to him. There is no problem.

In my opinion, the cost of such legislation could be estimated and since we could provide work for the unemployed we could determine the saving realized by giving holidays to those who deserve them and work to those who are at an age to work. If we want to improve the social climate, the passage of such an emergency measure should be seriously considered. I will continue to believe that such legislation could solve the serious unemployment problem which we are now experiencing.

Before ending my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about farming since it is a most important factor in my riding. I realize also that agriculture is not in top shape throughout Canada and several members have said so.

When we see that in 1973 Canada has imported 50 million pounds of butter, I think we are right in being concerned.

A decrease of 8 per cent in dairy production was recorded in Canada last year, which has meant importing butter and at the present rate, unless the government takes drastic steps, we expect the import of 100 million pounds of butter next year.

The Canadian Federation of Milk Producers has submitted a brief asking for an increase of $2 per 100 pounds of milk. Again the government will probably hesitate to meet these requirements since it has no policy governing production costs. We realize that production cost have soared and I have here a brief submitted recently by the APU and the Canadian Federation of Milk Producers which shows that the cost of milk production has increased to $10 per hundred pounds, while these same producers are receiving only $7 per hundred pounds. They are therefore asking for a $2 increase in the hope that production costs could stabilize again in 1974 and finally they are anticipating some profits. I think that the Canadian Federation of Milk Producers is perfectly right in asking for such an increase and we wonder to what extent the government will comply quickly with these representations. I am talking about stabilization. We will never be able to ensure stabilization without providing short term grants if we really want to save farmers.

More dairy farms will go out of business next spring. Although some people maintain that this has to do with the age of the milk producers, it is not true, Mr. Speaker. The first reason is that the dairy producer does not make enough money to keep a long-term operation. Milk producers, with an average age of 40, are not ready to get their old age security pension. On the contrary, they are good at figures and they are not going to give up their dairy business because they do not make any profit.

I think the government should give special consideration to this problem and bring forward positive measures to deal with it, while ensuring that the consumer will not be saddled with all those responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, I would have much more to say, but my time is up, and I want to say again that I will do my utmost to bring up those questions regularly in the House in order to meet the wishes and settle the problems of most Canadian citizens. I will fight with all my might a government that has failed to include in the Speech from the Throne positive measures to improve the lot of the people, a government that even dares to ask for a confidence vote from the people.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time we tried a new administration that has been preparing itself very well in the last few years.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, since it is nearly six o'clock and I would not like to be cut short at six o'clock, may I—

Mr. Wagner: You can always start now.

Mr. Béchard: May I call it six o'clock, with the consent of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Since it is about six o'clock, I leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I recognize the hon. member for Îles de la Madeleine (Mr. Béchard).

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to your attention that the name of my riding is Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine.

Mr. Speaker, as did those who spoke before me I want to extend my respectful compliments and congratulations to His Excellency Governor General Jules Léger and his lady, and wish them years of happiness and joy in their mandate. The years of experience acquired by Mr. Léger in his many functions both in Canada and abroad where he carried out his responsibilities with competence, tact and dignity prepared him very will for the high office recently entrusted to him.

One cannot omit to point out the quality of the most eloquent speeches delivered by the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier). Their words actually moved the Liberal fibers of any Liberal worthy of that name. This refreshing bath, Mr. Speaker, even moved the fibers—formally Liberal fibers—of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner). This refreshing bath in which our distinguished colleagues immersed us can only be enlivening for one who, politically committed during all his life, stood up with vigour and no less pride for the great principles of liberalism.

With respect to those principles, it is no coincidence to find in the Speech from the Throne so kindly delivered by His Excellency the great Liberal philosophy passed on to us by Laurier, King, St. Laurent, Pearson and so admirably and efficiently continued and adapted to the needs and evolution of our modern society by that man whom history will undoubtedly indentify as the greatest Prime Minister Canada ever had, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). No, Mr. Speaker, it is not a coincidence. The very essence of liberalism we all are imbued with has always governed the action of all Liberal governments, and of this one in particular. One only has to review all the acts adopted by successive Liberal administrations, especially those passed under the administration of our two last leaders to realize how much the Liberal party has always been concerned with the well-being of the individual in every class of society.

● (2010)

It has now become a cliché, Mr. Speaker, to identify the Liberal party with social reform in Canada.

Legislative measures aimed at giving the individual, the citizens, more security, more importance, more freedom, in the true sense of the word, and more dignity, more than any government had ever dared, especially Progressive Conservative governments—

Mr. Grafftey: More unemployment, more inflation!

Mr. Béchard: Let us talk about unemployment. I shall come back to that later.

Those measures were passed by Liberal administrations, and particularly by the government of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). They covered every field and the list is too long and the time at my disposal too short to name them all, but after such achievements, and I can mention a few that were unthinkable, as I said, a decade ago, the opposition and particularly its leader (Mr. Stanfield), its deputy leader for Quebec the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), who is here tonight, and only two nights ago, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), dare accuse the Liberal party and the right hon. Prime Minister of lacking imagination and determination. These false healers of all ills—I should rather say these false controllers, as they are fond of controls—in the one important field of social security which is designed to relieve the distress and the problems of older people, of the underprivileged, those false controllers or false healers of all ills, have only succeeded, Mr. Speaker, since Confederation, since 1867, to give to our older people the small amount of $16 on a total now reaching $188 a month. It takes plenty of nerve to dare speak about a lack of imagination and determination.

This is the record of the previous government of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) and now of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe: $16 in a lifetime, since Confederation. Those who are so concerned with welfare, are complaining today about inflation.

Mr. Trudel: The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe is blushing!

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, am I ever sorry for the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle). He became suddenly mute until this afternoon but he is riding again the horse he had so wisely and rightly discarded in 1971, after swearing publicly on television and radio and before a committee of the House never to ride it again because of the shabby position taken by the Progressive Conservatives on the Official Languages Act. He had done the same thing during the debate on the 1976 Olympic Games.

Mr. Speaker, I am also sorry—

Mr. Grafftey: Be serious, this is petty politics!

Mr. Béchard: What is it? You could not possibly have listened to your colleagues' speech, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe and the hon. member for Joliette.

How I sympathize also, Mr. Speaker, with the so-called Quebec lieutenant of the Progressive Conservative party, my colleague for Saint-Hyacinthe—

An hon. Member: Not Marcel Masse!

Mr. Béchard: —because since he has been sitting on the Progressive Conservative side, we can readily appreciate the delicate position in which he finds himself. Sometimes we can see he is on the verge of shouting: What in heavens' name am I doing here?

Mr. Speaker, the "reconquest" about which the national leader of the Progressive Conservatives spoke so highly on the occasion of a fund raising cocktail at the Quebec City Château Frontenac where, by inadvertance or by pure coincidence, the only two elected PC members in Quebec were conspicuous by their absence, this new conquest, Mr. Speaker, is not for tomorrow. The absence of these members was well caricatured in Le Soleil of March 5, 1974. The Leader of the Official Opposition is shown climbing the Cap Diamant on his way to the Plains of Abraham, followed by someone who is deemed to be a leader and the new PC member, to speak in the language of the inhabitants who are there in a ship on the St. Lawrence. The leader is supposed to be the province of Quebec lieutenant. The caption says: "Eh you, there, if we have any trouble we will go and fetch you." So the "reconquest", as I said, is not going to take place tomorrow.

I was referring a moment ago to the social dedication which the Liberal party has always indulged in. However, Mr. Speaker, in our party as in all other parties which are concerned mainly with the individual's well-being and betterment and not only to the well-being of those who are better off and those who were able to contribute more generously to electoral funds and therefore ensure more security, we did get from time to time people whose views were a little too conservative, who were attracted by the Liberal party or willing to join it for the determined purpose of slowing down the Liberal political action which they considered as being too avant-garde.

This was a real misfortune and disaster for our country and the Canadian society which could have benefited earlier, and in a more equitable way, from changes that were made necessary by the unavoidably changing world and that the Liberal party has always advocated.

In our so-called democratic western societies, too often in the past have we toadied to high finance. In doing so, we consciously or unconsciously deprived citizens of a standard of living to which they were entitled as human beings. Unfortunately we realized too late that we could not neglect workmen, farmers, fishermen, older citizens, the poor, the sick, children, women and underprivileged people of our society as management or the state saw fit.

The Liberal party, however, prompted by the very concept of its existence, raalized quicker than any other political party in Canada that our system was bad and that government responsibilities should be redirected toward individual well-being and respect for the human being. Consequently a wide range of social security measures and progressive legislation specifically aimed at individual security were passed in this country.

I am far from suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that everything is perfect in the best of worlds and that the Canadian citizen has no more problems. I am not afraid however, to assert that liberal policies, and the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) agrees with me that—

Mr. Wagner: Oh, no!

Mr. Béchard: —generally speaking, the Liberal policies developed when he had been a Liberal for several years reduced the involuntary injustice of former governments and that the Canadian citizen now lives more comfortably with less tension and more freedom. There will probably be some people in this House and elsewhere who will say after my next comments that I despise or ignore private enterprise.

● (2020)

On the contrary, I salute all the Canadians from coast to coast who have accomplished and are still accomplishing great things to develop the various industries that have contributed to building our country by providing the Canadian population with its daily bread while developing our natural resources and that have placed Canada in the enviable position it now enjoys.

What I cannot accept, however, Mr. Speaker, is the scandalous sweating of the worker who is the main contributor to the development of this country and who provides the necessary profits for his employer so that the industry may continue to give work to Canadians and progress in order to continue developing our resources for the good of all Canadians.

[Mr. Béchard.]

Mr. Speaker, no intelligent Canadian citizen can pretend, at least I hope not, that an industry, a business or a company does not have the right to make profits.

Such an attitude would be bordering on insanity. However I cannot honestly believe that these same industrial and commercial firms are eager to make excessive profits at the expense of Canadian consumers.

Such excessive attitude—it has long been and still is recognized—is conducive to a situation like the one which prevails now in all countries of the world, including Canada. Our industrialists and businessmen have come to realize this, as evidenced by the improvements they have made to their respective business and the lot of their employees.

All countries of the world are faced with inflation, a problem which occurs at various stages in their development, a disease the root of which is not always found in their own country but elsewhere in the world. The escalation of prices is particularly acute in the area of food products, an area which hurts each and every Canadian.

Because Canada must rely enormously on trade with the outside world to sell its products and acquire the goods which it does not produce at all or in large enough quantities, it is not immune to the fluctuating whims of international prices.

Mr. Speaker, this morning the former leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) spent half an hour blaming the government for its spending. The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) brought up the same question recently when the main estimates were tabled.

The former prime minister said that the rate of inflation was 1.9 per cent under his administration. But, Mr. Speaker, he should be the last person to remind the Canadian people and Parliament of his administration from 1958 to 1963.

The member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) referred to unemployment. At a time when the labour force was much smaller, the number of jobless almost reached one million in 1963, when we returned to power. Throughout Canada, restrictions were announced on radio and on television rather than in Parliament, after the 1962 election. That is respect for Parliament! The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) referred to regional development this afternoon and yesterday. The Conservative party allowed winter works in order to cut branches along the roads. That is the meaning of regional development for the Conservative party.

[English]

Mr. McKinley: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if there was unemployment in Canada in those years, it was brought about by the Liberal administration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member knows that this is not a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, it is easy to say that when one was not in the House and was not even thinking of going into politics in that riding.

The inflation rate was 1.9, but apart from unemployment, there was nothing, no industrial development, austerity was everywhere. Austerity and restrictions were announced on television, mind you, if you remember, just after the 1962 election.

Mr. Speaker, while this government has been making every effort during the past years to fight this plague, the energy crisis arose last fall, and one must realistically admit that it had something to do with the actual rise in the cost of living.

● (2030)

Considering such difficult times, one can now say, although the problem is not yet entirely solved, that Canada showed maturity. The position it took to protect our energy resources as well as the consumer against an unacceptable increase in the price of a product so vital to our economy, was the best one.

Thanks to those measures, Canadians were able to keep warm this winter even if it cost them a little more. We were privileged, Mr. Speaker, to have as leaders of the country men as determined and energetic as the right hon. Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). We owe to this team to have avoided what could have been disastrous for the Canadian people, as in so many countries, and for the Canadian economy in general. The new energy policy announced in December by the right hon. Prime Minister, and all the effective steps taken by the government will guarantee Canada, from coast to coast, sufficient oil supplies at one price only, in view of the huge oil potential of our country. In addition, that policy was not designed to take away anything from those areas of the country richest in oil; on the contrary, it will guarantee them tremendous developments even while they share their natural resources with their fellow citizens who are less fortunate in that specific field. Canada has developed and has become what it is today, Mr. Speaker, through the co-operation of all its provinces, an element that is essential to our unity, and I would even add, our survival as a respected nation. If Canada wants to continue to grow and ensure future generations a decent standard of living, that co-operation and sharing must be maintained and grow stronger. Our country, in the field of oil potential alone, can not only be self-sufficient but even surpass in importance the countries of the Middle East whose reserves are far more limited than our own, and achieve a standing that will be respected throughout the world.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I should like to echo the remarks of the Minister of Supplies and Services (Mr. Goyer) on the project he conceived to ensure our country that success in the future through the maximum development of the Athabasca tar sands. Our country has the opportunity of making giant strides in that field and, in so doing, of ensuring its security and independence in the case of an energy crisis in the future, not to mention the tremendous contribution it would make to our economy. The outlay will be fantastic; I will be told, and our economy cannot afford such an expenditure. The minister has explained the funding of this project and I will not take the time to repeat it at this time. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, it will not be an expenditure, but rather an investment which is bound to make Canada grow to such an extent as to put to shame those who dismissed our country as "a few acres of snow". I commend the minister and I hope that his initiative will meet with general approval for it is not one that can be brushed aside with a sweep of the hand.

Previous speakers have mentioned the measures adopted by the government to offset the ill effects from inflation, so I will not repeat them. Besides, the time allotted to me is running short. I will bring up the subject again on another occasion.

Before concluding my remarks with considerations peculiar to my riding and area, I would like to greet with satisfaction the measures announced in the Speech from the Throne to improve the lot of Canadian farmers and fishermen so that they may be able to increase productivity and the quality of their products and pave the way for younger people anxious to go into farming if we want to ensure a sufficient quantity of food to the people and, if need be, facilitate the export of our surplus at better prices.

For several years a serious problem has been facing farmers and agricultural producers of eastern Canada and Quebec especially, that is supplying feed grains in sufficient quantity and at a price comparable to that of western producers. No resentment has ever been shown by eastern farmers regarding what their fellow citizens of the west could benefit from. Never. However they did want to get the required feed grains and meals at a price enabling them to compete on the market. Steps have been taken to solve that serious problem, but these have been far from satisfactory. We must at any cost, and that is pressing, find quickly a solution.

To fishermen the Gaspé Peninsula and the Magdalen Islands in particular, where fishing is of great importance in the economy, it is urgent that harbour facilities brought up in the Canada-Quebec agreement be set up and this without delay. In this connection, I am pleased to see in the House tonight that the Minister of the Environment is listening to me.

While in my constituency the main harbours have already been built or are under construction and while for the Millerand harbour over $1 million is provided in the estimates for 1974-75, I cannot remain indifferent, Mr. Speaker, to the problems raised by lack of sufficient funds for the fishing centres of Grande-Rivière and Les Méchins for instance. I want, in full support for my Gaspé and Matane colleagues (Messrs. Cyr and De Bané), as well as for the fishermen of that region, to urge the Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries as well as the government to provide additional supplies to these fishing centres. The agreement for the Lower St. Lawrence area, the Gaspé Peninsula and the Magdalen Islands will expire in 1976.

We must not forget the coastal fishermen because they cannot all seek shelter in those harbours and they earn most of their living through fishing, especially in the Bonaventure constituency. They are greatly to be pitied since centralization has monopolized these last years the department's total budget. Some may say that I am doting, Mr. Speaker. For some, perhaps. But if nobody pays attention to me, I certainly intend to keep on doting and to persist in the same vein until some action is taken to comply with my legitimate requests.

The now famous seal hunt, that most compassionate and soft-hearted people, more soft-hearted as to the disappearance of those small animals than as to that of human beings, for instance, an unborn child, succeeded in having prohibited almost gradually, that seal hunt Mr. Speaker should be restored.

I do not deny the fact that the species should be protected and that some control would be necessary. The conscientious fisherman, the fisherman from the islands, who devotes himself to seal hunting, is aware of that problem and also aware of the need for controls, but that source of income for our fishermen should be preserved at all costs at such a difficult time of the year. If need be, seal hunting should be developed so as to be more beneficial for the islands' residents through the establishment of a plant or by encouraging the establishment of a seal skin processing plant in the islands.

Apart form providing a substantial income for the fishermen, seal hunting contributes to the preservation of our fish reserves, since an incalculable amount of fish are eaten up by those seals. Officers from the Department of the Environment should never forget that important factor of decrease in the fish species which are the fishermen's main source of income.

Therefore, I wish to associate myself fully with the conclusions of a group of fishermen from the islands who met recently in La Vernière to discuss that important subject which was dealt with in a CBC broadcast this week.

I would have many other specific subjects to deal with in the interest of my constituency, Mr. Speaker, but I will have to do so some other day for lack of time.

The Speech from the Throne gives us plenty of work to do. This legislative program aimed at improving the lot of the Canadian people will hopefully commend itself to all hon. members, including those for Saint-Hyacinthe and Joliette (Messrs. Wagner and La Salle) who, to the best of their knowledge and belief, will want to pass it quickly, I am sure, in the best interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Béchard: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, could the hon. member tell the House whether he endorses the recent statements made by the hon. member for Matane (M. De Bané) and the hon. member Gaspé (Mr. Cyr) to the effect that the fishermen in the Gaspé peninsula are mistreated by the present government?

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, firstly the hon. members for Matane and Gaspé did not say such things but they pointed out that the loans granted to the Gaspé peninsula according to the agreement ending in 1976, were not sufficient for the building of all centralized fishing harbours to be finished in time. I do not hesitate—for I just mentioned it in my speech—to say it is not sufficient and that we will demand more. But the Progressive Conservative party suggests that we spend too much money. The hon. member for Joliette wanted in one hand the old age security pension be given today to all persons of 60 and on the other hand, we are blamed for spending too much.

[English]

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by adding my voice to the tributes which have been paid to His Excellency the Governor General. I am certain that all Canadians join in wishing him every success and fulfillment during his tenure.

I think this was an interesting day of debate on the Speech from the Throne. I listened to the previous speaker with a certain amount of amazement. The basic principle behind his speech seems to be that flattery will get you anywhere. He would like to move a couple of seats to the right, I expect. Trying to compare the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the disadvantage of Sir Wilfrid Laurier is gilding the lily somewhat.

I enjoyed the speech of the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle). He appears to be the happiest man in the House these days. He has joined a winner. He knows where he is, and he will be here long after some of the flowers opposite have wilted. I listened to the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) trying to rationalize and defend the Unemployment Insurance Act. I suggest to him that he should get a little support from his ex-cabinet colleagues if he feels like coming here and being punished frequently by the party which turfed him out of cabinet, I suggest it indicates a streak of masochism. However, that is his problem and not ours.

I was much impressed today with the very eloquent address of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand). I wish I could speak as well in my first language as he does in his second. I would not agree, however, with the content of his speech. It would seem to indicate that his department is out of control. He appears to think it is an unmanageable department. I suggest that is too facile an excuse. No department is unmanageable; what it needs is a good manager.

The debate on the Speech from the Throne is different from most other debates undertaken by the members of this House in that it offers an opportunity to reflect upon the general direction of governance in Canada. Rather than discussing the minutia or motives in a specific piece of legislation, we can reflect on matters and trends which are of general concern to the country and to its future.

As the member from Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) noted when examining the economic aspects of the debate, "the question of whether or not one is prepared to support the Speech from the Throne really depends upon whether or not one can decide from what is said that this government has the vision and imagination to solve the economic problems that are facing Canada . . . " This is indeed our function in this debate, to consider the past achievements and failings of the Liberal-NPD coalition and then to study carefully the merits of the government's plans, extracting what policy there is from the rhetoric.

In addition, and probably of greater importance, we must consider the aspirations and anxieties of the Canadian people. We must consider the future and the problems it will bring in the widest terms, in economics, ecology, sociology, demography, politics; indeed, every facet of man's social existence must be considered. For, Mr. Speaker, it is incumbent upon the members of this House to provide Canadians with the leadership they need for the coming decade and it is this debate which gives us the greatest opportunity to consider this, the task at the core of democratic rule.

How, then, are we to judge the fitness of this government to lead the country? It seems to me that we must do these things: first, we must examine the aspirations of the citizens of Canada and the problems which will face the country, considering especially the record of the government in understanding these hopes; second, we must examine the government's suggestions as given in the Speech from the Throne and evaluate them in terms of their ability to satisfy the nation's needs; third, we must judge the record of this government in terms of its ability to implement that which it has promised.

All three of these are necessary, and while the need for the first two steps in unquestioned, the third is just as vital. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) put it last session, "the question of trust and confidence is part and parcel of the question of credibility." All too frequently policies have been evaluated in an abstract political vacuum; too frequently we forget that it is a specific political party which has to translate broad objectives into specific legislation and which must supervise the executive implementation of that legislation. We must judge the government party, or should I say parties, in terms of its ability to do this.

Of this triad of necessary conditions for good government, empathy with the people, programs and ability to translate programs into well functioning government outputs, I should like to begin by considering briefly the last condition by examining the success the government had during the previous session of parliament in realizing the objectives which it set itself in that Speech from the Throne. In examining that document in light of the last 14 months of government action or, perhaps more properly, government inaction, we see that the editorial comment, "there is less to it than meets the eye," was indeed correct. Of the plethora of commitments undertaken then, some have been fulfilled; however, the resulting legislation has tended to lack any consistency or unity of design.

This is possibly best exemplified in economic affairs where the Liberal-NDP union has created as its illegitimate offspring an incoherent mass of band-aid bills, each doing something to alleviate the hardship of those caught up in the government's economic mismanagement yet none of them offering any consistent or broad attack on the causes of the country's economic ills. The laudable pledge in the throne speech that the government will "contain inflation" and "attain reasonable price stability," after inflation of 9.1 per cent in the last year sounds now like the bitterest irony.

Fourteen months ago the government had proud words on social security. There were as bases for action the "five principles which, taken together, comprise a statement of the government's commitment in respect of social security." What has been the reality of the legislation on social security? Nothing except incremental adjustments which have barely kept pace with soaring prices. Like the creature in "Through the Looking Glass" who said, "It takes all the running you can do to keep in the same place," I only wish that the Liberal-NDP coalition would not continue to ascribe such grand munificence to their enlightened social philosophy but would, instead, give the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) his due. It has been his mismanagement of the economy which has created the absolutely compelling need for increases to prevent those such as old age pensioners falling further behind in their race with the ravages of inflation. Is this the "compassionate and equitable guaranteed annual income" which the aged and disabled were promised 14 months ago?

As a light and humorous footnote, were it not so callous toward those caught on fixed incomes, we may listen to the blustering of the NDP. That marvelous group manages simultaneously to take credit for the raise in old age pensions and avoids responsibility for the niggardliness of the amount. Being able to ascribe all that is good in an action to oneself, and all that is bad to another, is an exalted exercise in either egotism or double-think.

It was a peculiar spectacle to watch the Prime Minister and the member for York South (Mr. Lewis) arguing last Thursday as to who could take credit for last session's band-aid legislation. Neither of them wished to take any responsibility for bringing the country to an economic condition where such band-aid legislation is necessary. Their differences, I suppose, come down to "Who runs Canada?" If the member for York South can dictate terms for his support, then he can equally be blamed for not insisting on sound economic policies. If the Prime Minister is correct and the NDP are merely seagulls following his ship, then he alone should assume responsibility for the inflationary mess we are in. These two party leaders squabbling over credit for the goodies, whilst blaming others for everything else, does little to enhance the image of parliament. It is a sorry sight. To attempt to take credit for high incomes, and blame others for high costs, is simply dishonest.

While not agreeing with Prime Minister Harold Wilson—and let me now congratulate him on his victory and wish him well in his extremely difficult task ahead—I admired his honesty and courage when he stated, "One man's pay raise is another man's cost rise." We could do with more of that kind of candour in this House. I am not saying that wage raises are the only factor; profits, world conditions and, not least, government extravagance all contribute to high prices.

In the 1973 Speech from the Throne the government also spoke at length on the subject of housing. Whether the legislation which resulted will have a significant effect or whether, as with pensions, it only represents running to remain in the same place we cannot yet tell. What is apparent is that the legislation did not tackle the root causes of high housing costs, costs which preclude far too many Canadians from becoming home owners. Will the government's meagre palliatives do anything about the phenomenal price of urban land, the greatly increased price of building materials or, above all, the usurious mortgage rates? No, not until a coherent, inclusive program is enacted, for these problems are the result of economic and demographic problems which need to be dealt with directly.

Let us reflect briefly on the interrelation between inflation and the high cost of housing. If there is an inflation rate of, let us say, 8 per cent, will mortgage rates fall below 8 per cent? Never, for only a fool would loan money at a rate that would ensure his losing real purchasing power from that investment. What happens to the price of land? Unfortunately, it becomes more expensive when more of it is bought for speculation. During times of inflation it becomes a good investment for it is a classical hedge against inflation. This sets off a vicious circle, vicious, that is, for the hapless, prospective home owner as increased demand forces up prices, making land a better investment against inflation and thus causing greater demand, higher prices, and so on and on.

To be far, I must admit that the Liberals did not pledge themselves to a fight against these basic problems in housing, and in this they have lived up to their word for they have certainly not tackled these basic problems.

Let us now turn to the government's latest Speech from the Throne to see what promise it holds and to search for any new commitment to a more thoroughgoing and coherent approach to legislation. The first thing that strikes me is that the government has finally seemed to realize that inflation is a problem of very serious proportions. That is well and good; but what form does that recognition take? It is, unfortunately, in the form of an extended mea non culpa. One wishes that half the energy which the cabinet puts into finding excuses were directed to finding solutions. Here the government has seen fit to blame the sinister forces of international economic problems for Canada's inflationary ills.

Is there any mention of the vast increase in the money supply? Is there any mention of lack of a government supply policy? Is there any mention of the effect of an increase in government expenditure of 19.6 per cent? Is there any mention of the inflation psychology fostered by statements like those in the throne speech, that inflation is a matter largely external to Canada and, therefore, beyond the control of the government? The answer to all these questions is no. Instead, we hear only the repeated incantation: international forces, international forces. This excuse, presages, unfortunately, the absence of any effective government legislation to deal with inflation. If the experience of the last throne speech is to be believed, for the good of the country let us hope that the government will instead do something effective and that the Minister of Finance will study carefully the speech which the hon. member for Don Valley made to the House last Friday.

On the lighter side, the address also contains a number of sections which seem to be on the same order as being for goodness, motherhood and apple pie. I am sure that all members of the House are for "the producer must be ensured a fair income for his work", of "the consumer must be ensured a fair value from his dollar," or my favourite, "research to make it possible to increase production, improve quality and lower costs". Babbitt is not dead while the writer of that cliché lives. There seems to be a strong emphasis on things being reasonable or fair, but virtually nowhere are we told what this is to mean in terms of objectives or policies.

[Mr. McKinnon.]

In reading the rest of the Speech from the Throne I am struck by the lack of any systematic view of what needs doing. There is a series of disjointed proposals. Each is of varying merit, although most are in some measure useful. However, they do not cohere. One cannot adduce from them any consistent approach or comprehension of the aspirations of the people of Canada. This is, I suppose, what above all else discourages me about the present Liberal government. It lacks direction. It lacks vision. In worshipping the exercise of power for its own sake, the government has not only lost touch with the people's hopes but also has reached a point where it even fails to comprehend the essential problems facing Canada.

I have been here now a relatively short time, 14 months, but sufficient time to form opinions about the ministers of the Crown. The ministers occupying the treasury benches seem unable to respond to or produce a call for action. Look at that front row. We see the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) who acted as a second to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) in his famous fight to keep tankers out of the Strait of Juan de Fuca. As the Leader of the Opposition said, "If that was a fight, we should get our money back." All pretence at even a token fight stopped, of course, when the Prime Minister declared that the tankers must go through.

Looking along the front bench further, we see the Minister of Transport who provided the layman's view about freight rates at the Calgary conference. At that conference there were only two people around the table who did not know anything about freight rates. Unfortunately, one was the Prime Minister and the other the Minister of Transport. This was embarrassing even to opposition MPs who were in attendance.

It has not gone unnoticed in British Columbia that the Prime Minister announced that the west was now to be officially considered as alienated and that steps would have to be taken to bring the western provinces back as the Liberals had done with Quebec. That message must have lost something in the translation, because the Minister of Transport almost immediately dictated that the airport in Victoria would become bilingual. Such ham-handed misinterpretations of the Official Languages Act makes it extremely difficult for the moderates in our country to prevail. I am only being half-facetious when I say the last person insisting on being spoken to in French at Victoria airport was reported to be Keith Spicer, and that was months ago. I do not wish to pursue that matter further, as in the present context almost any mention of bilingualism tends to exacerbate the problem. Perhaps I could close this subject by quoting Solzhenitsyn who said, "Intolerance is the mark of an inadequate education." There are, unfortunately, too many intolerant people on both sides of this question.

A little further along we find the hon. and affable President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) and House leader for the coalition, although the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) may be entitled to some of his extra allowance for the position. In his position as House leader he has taken a leading part in the negotiations concerning redistribution. Another title might be, "How to set democracy back ten years." In this cause he produced "Redistribution, 1974 approaches and perspectives." Other than the misleading tables attached to his production, I object most strenuously to his peculiarly selective quotations from Laurier, Borden and St. Laurent which give the totally erroneous impression that these statesmen were not strong supporters of representation by population. This is a time for Oscars and Grammy awards, and to the government House leader I bestow the George Orwell award for creative history for the year.

I listened to and read about the speech which the Prime Minister made in Toronto last night. His speech this year in the debate on the Speech from the Throne was much better than that of last year. However, I resent his using the House of Commons for a trial run of the speech he was to make at a fund raising dinner in Toronto later. He told the same jokes there as he did here. He addressed a well fed and well heeled group of the Liberal establishment whose loudest applause was reserved for his assurance that the status quo would remain. Small wonder they applauded. They are not only able to protect themselves from inflation but, indeed, to profit from it.

Looking further down the front bench, we see the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This minister is the one who professed total lack of knowledge of any diplomatic freeze between the United States and Canada, although it was being discussed publicly in the United States. In point of fact, the state department of the mightiest nation on earth refused for two or three months to accept any Canadian diplomat above the Canadian desk level, yet our Secretary of State for External Affairs knew nothing about it.

A little further down the treasury bench we come upon the charming and hon. Minister of Finance. I wish to pay him a compliment. He is a true House of Commons man. I enjoy his speeches, but that does not mean I agree with him. He produced a budget on February 19, 1973, over a year ago. His most famous statement was, I suppose, when he declared the following on that occasion:

> This budget is aimed at reducing inflationary pressures in Canada and at offsetting the effects of past inflation . . . It is equally essential to reduce the squeeze of rising prices on family budgets and the erosion of the hard earned savings of Canadians.

That budget promptly generated the most disastrous erosion of savings and the highest inflation rate in modern times. I also wish to comment on something the Minister of Finance says frequently. He discusses the people he has dropped from the tax rolls. However, this goes back to the days of Mr. Benson who, on presenting a budget on June 18, 1971, said:

> Mr. Speaker, as a result of all the changes in taxation of personal income that I am describing tonight, 1,000,000 taxpayers who would otherwise pay taxes next year will be removed from the tax rolls.

● (2100)

The present Minister of Finance reiterated this on February 19, 1973, when he said:

> Tax reform introduced some 18 months ago removed from the tax rolls a million Canadians.

Continuing, he announced that one of the main points of the 1973 tax legislation was that three-quarter of a million people were dropped from the tax rolls. This means that wandering around the country out of a taxable population of a little more than seven million, there are 1,750,000 Canadians who have been removed from the tax rolls. And I have never met one of them. I don't know where they are. I wander the streets and I don't go around deliberately in the areas where everybody pays taxes, but in the poorer sections of my constituency I have never run into anybody who has said, "Thank God for Mr. Benson and for the present Minister of Finance. I have been removed from the tax rolls."

I thought this sounded kind of funny, so I had the tax returns looked up and my sources produced the basic statistics, the reports of 1971, 1972 and 1973 which show that in the year 1971, when Mr. Benson made his famous million cut, there were 7,363,963 taxpayers. In 1972, a year later, when the million should have presumably been taken off the tax rolls, there were in fact more than 7,600,000 taxpayers. This is like the flim-flam trick that goes on in the midway—the three-card trick where sometimes you see them and sometimes you don't.

The fact is that in 1973 there were still more people paying tax than there were in 1971. This is a cheap political trick. I would have come close to being unparliamentary by saying the minister was deliberately deceiving the House, except I did not think for a moment that anyone was being deceived. I did not think anyone would believe him, it was so patently dishonest. I was surprised to read a newsletter from the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) who quoted the figure of 750,-000 being dropped from the tax rolls. He took credit for it at that time. So apparently the minister did deceive at least one member of the House. These people have not been cut from the tax rolls. They have done a little paper jiggery-pokery and probably claim that if nobody had had a pay raise during the year, about a million would have been removed. But everybody's pay went up, and they were not removed. I wish they would quit trying to deceive the country in this way.

However, the minister usually pays close attention to both the Leader of the Opposition and to the honorable member for Don Valley, and though he is a slow learner he has no scruples about cribbing, so we look forward to an improvement, hopefully, in his next budget.

Moving back toward the centre, we locate the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). It is he who suggested a 3 per cent raise in pay for civil servants at or near the bottom of the civil service pay scale. He never seems, to me, to have the image of a cabinet minister. To me he works and acts more like a business comptroller who has been probably lent to the cabinet by some friendly corporation to keep control of their more woolly-headed socialist members.

There are too many members of the cabinet deserving of condemnation for me to deal with them all at this time, but I should not let the second row pass unmentioned since there we find such ministers as the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) who appears to be trying to wind down his department. Perhaps he wishes to be the final minister of veterans affairs. Then there is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) who, when the price of bread went up, suggested that people quit eating bread. There is an historical precedent for this. When Marie Antoinette heard that the people were rioting for bread, she said, "Let them eat cake." I am surprised the Minister of Consumer Affairs did not think of this.

An hon. Member: The Prime Minister had another alternative.

Mr. McKinnon: Yes, he had another alternative suggesting a different kind of confection. We work our way along to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) who has clearly ordered, now, that if war breaks out he should be awakened, even if is before 8 a.m. We work our way along to the end of the second row, past several ministers who belong mainly to the low profile, "keep out of trouble school," and we end up with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). This minister said in his maiden speech that he hoped to become a House of Commons man. His abrasive answers, or non-answers, to questions have done little to establish any such claim. It is hardly fitting or proper for a minister to tell questioners that they should read his press releases or his speeches and not to expect to get an answer in the Commons. After all, this is where we are entitled to ask questions and get answers.

In his department, incidentally, there has been tremendous growth in expenditures. They have risen to $6,854 million. I notice that the Grit member for Ottawa-Centre (Mr. Poulin) has stressed the growing danger of the drug heroin. But, like most back benchers in the Liberal Party, apparently he has little influence with the government because despite the enormous increase in the department's expenditures, the funds available for the fight against the non-medical use of drugs have been reduced. This leaves considerable doubt in my mind as to the correctness of the priorities of the minister of health.

I apologize to those ministers I have missed. It is not that they are unworthy of condemnation, but there is such a dreadful sameness about their gaffes and their maladministration that one wearies. I would not want you to think, Mr. Speaker, that they are not well-meaning people. They are. They are doing their best, and it is regrettable and most unfortunate for the country that their best should be so mediocre.

As I talk to my constituents, I am worried also at the degree of their alienation from our central government. To people in British Columbia, the federal government is a long way away. To them it is not only far removed but unfeeling. Inflation, high prices, shortages, rising federal taxes and budgets are things which are apparently beyond influence, matters controlled by a government of strangers whose actions are no more responsive to the importunities of the man in the street in Victoria than is the weather.

I find myself having to counter the argument that the federal government is irrelevant, though it is a sorry and lame reply to have to say that it must be important since it costs every man, woman and child in Canada $1,000 a year; that it must be important because it is the main cause of inflation and resultant insecurity for all. But the things that are visible and relevant to the citizens are their streets, sewers, highways and schools. All these things involve provincial or municipal government. I believe we must try to bring our central government closer to the people.

[Mr. McKinnon.]

The Speech from the Throne is almost irrelevant even as far as members of this House are concerned. How are we to involve the people if we cannot give them anything better than this poor excuse of a program for the session? Why not a Throne Speech some time which states precisely what the government intends to do about the main issues which concern Canada? One is tempted to attribute the government's timidity, when it comes to enacting more than remedial legislation, to lack of courage. But to quote Plato, "It is wisdom which makes courage, self-control and integrity possible, or, in a word, goodness". It is a disquieting thought, but perhaps it is wisdom that this government lacks. I fear it is so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I begin my participation in this debate by adding my congratulations to the mover and to the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. This is one occasion when people in the back rows get a chance to lead off. Maybe this should happen more often. I do not agree with much of what they said, but I congratulate them on the way they said it.

The Speech from the Throne lists a number of measures which the government says will be placed before the House. Many of them are measures which members of my party, as well as of other parties, have been advocating for a number of years. I, for one, along with many other members of the House, an anxious to see just what this legislation will be. We are anxious to find out whether they put their actions where their mouth is.

Before I deal with some of the items in the throne speech I want to add a few sentences of my own to the plea that was made by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on behalf of the senior citizens of Canada. I have yet to find a member of this House, of any party, who is opposed to the idea of reducing the pensionable age to 60, at least on a voluntary basis, so that a person who wants to leave the work force and retire at 60, or a person who has to leave owing to illness or for other reasons, can do so and be eligible for pension.

In addition to that, it seems to me we must now provide that the pension will go automatically to the spouse of a retiring senior citizen so that we put an end to the situation where thousands of couples in this country are living on one pension. When a man has reached 65 and is eligible for the old age pension, his spouse, if she is in her late fifties or early sixties and is not employed, should automatically become eligible for the pension.

Finally, while all of us welcome our accomplishment last session in getting the cost of living escalator clause built into the old age security pension, and we welcome the small increase—it was slightly larger than the Conservatives offered, but still small—to $100 a month, we must continue to take steps to increase the pension until it reaches the $200 a month level.

I compliment the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) on his speech this afternoon. He was much better able to keep his temper than I would have been; I would have used some of the words that he said he would not use. But I do want to ally myself with the words he used in regard to those who were trying honestly, legally and properly to draw unemployment insurance benefits. The problem here, Mr. Speaker, is not the myth of the ski bum or the loafer who is drawing unemployment insurance; the problem is that people who are entitled to draw unemployment insurance and should be drawing it are being disentitled by the thousand each week. This kind of witch-hunt being conducted by a frightened Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), in response to the rednecks and hardhats in his own caucus and in the caucus of the official opposition, is unfitting for a democratic government and democratic system.

Every member of this House has been swamped with phone calls and requests for help by people who have been disentitled to unemployment insurance benefits during the past year or more. I find, Mr. Speaker, that people are being disentitled because thay have been led into answering questions in a certain way during an interview and then conned into signing a statement in which they automatically incriminated themselves and caused their disentitlement to benefits.

I have no objection to a requirement that a person who draws benefits must be actively seeking employment. But I do object when overzealous officials of UIC go to the length of requiring a woman to refund $15 to the Unemployment Insurance Commission because she was honest enough to say there was one day when she was not available for work, and that was her wedding day. She did not get married until 6.30 in the evening, but UIC insisted that she send back $15 because she was unavailable for work that day. How cheap and "chintzy" can you get in a witch-hunt by a frightened Minister of Manpower and Immigration, some of his colleagues and members of the official opposition, to search out people who are allegedly drawing benefits to which they are not entitled?

This whole business about leading applicants to reply to questions and then to sign statements which under the regulations restrict them to a certain kind of job or amount of pay or location of work has been carried to an outrageous extreme, and I am glad the hon. member for Verdun made the speech he did today. I hope members of other parties will do likewise.

Items in the throne speech that we in the New Democratic Party are anxious to see legislated include, among others, the legislation that finally is going to set up a national petroleum corporation. May I say to my hon. friends opposite that we hope they mean business. This corporation must not be merely an agency whose efforts in research and planning, etc., are designed to do nothing more than aid and comfort the well-being of multinational oil corporations. This must be the beginning of a massive entry by the Canadian public, through public ownership, into research, exploration, production and distribution of oil and oil products. If the bill provides for anything less than that, I can assure hon. members on the government side they will have some problems.

The throne speech refers to an increased availability of feed grains. I am glad to see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) in the chamber. If the Minister of Agriculture and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board mean by "increased availability of feed grains" that more is available because the price on the open market and in the hands of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange is going to be cheaper, then I can assure both ministers that they, too, are going to have some problems. I hope that any measure brought forward to increase the availability of feed grains will provide that they are to be restored entirely to the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board and that this jurisdiction will apply from the Atlantic to the Pacific. If the measure does not mean that or something like that, again the Minister of Agriculture and his colleague from Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) are going to have problems.

The throne speech makes mention of "an agricultural stabilization plan to encourage rational production decisions", whatever that means. It also mentions "a prairie grain market insurance plan", whatever that means. I will say only this much about those two items. If one or both of them is designed to take the place of the misbegotten legislation that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board brought in in 1971, then it had better be much better than that legislation was.

I listened to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board on a farm broadcast a few days ago, Mr. Speaker, and you should have heard him. This is a man who could forget history, could rewrite history and could distort history that was only two years old. He made some remark about a few opposition members obstructing the legislation. Well, there were a few of us not only obstructing; we damned well stopped it going through because it was bad legislation. The minister conveniently forgets that the farm organizations were unanimous in their opposition to it, one of the few times when they have been unanimous about anything. He conveniently forgets the four reasons why we did all we could to prevent that bill from passing. If he forgets them again in this new legislation, then he and the Minister of Agriculture and other members on the government side are going to have some more problems.

The minister in charge of the Wheat Board can distort the record all he wishes, but that legislation was fought and prevented from passing because the government was attempting to repeal the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board has now succeeded in doing that via the back door, by making sure there was not enough grain in store in the terminals at the end of the crop year so that the federal government would not have to pay storage costs under that act.

The minister now complains, and pleads with the farmers to haul grain. If he had kept grain in storage at Thunder Bay and Vancouver to 80 per cent of capacity at the end of the crop year last fall, he would not have to cry now for farmers to haul grain. However, he was able to save the government some money in that it did not have to pay its proper share of the cost of storing grain. He wanted to phase out PFAA, which has been done, but at least we got better crop insurance out of it.

There are two items which had better find their way into any government legislation in the form of stabilization bills. That legislation must include provision for some kind of escalator feature in respect of the increase in cost of production based on net farm income rather than gross farm income. If this principle is not found in proposed government stabilization legislation, that legislation will be treated accordingly by the members of this party, members of farm organizations and others in this country.

A great deal has been said in the last few weeks in the press and in this House by spokesmen for farm organizations, spokesmen for the government as well as by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, in respect of the movement of grain. In this regard the minister, during the question period today and on other occasions, has blamed all the difficulties on the snow conditions. He will not admit it, but the Canadian railways were behind in grain movements before the first snowflake fell in Saskatchewan or anywhere else on the prairies last fall. They were behind then, and they are further behind now.

There is nothing new about this problem. It has occurred and recurred almost every year since the end of the second world war. Successive federal governments have refused to face up to the problem and deal with it in any effective way. We had a classic example forcefully brought to our attention last winter regarding this situation on the prairies, showing how incapable our railway transportation system is to meet the transportation needs of the country. They have never kept up with transportation requirements. To understand that this is the fact one need only look at the deteriorating condition of our railway tracks and consider the inadequate number of snowplows and locomotives to deal with snow conditions. Mile after mile of the lines of both railways in the three prairie provinces sat unused for six or seven weeks this past winter without a wheel being put to them.

To illustrate this point I would refer to what was said by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) yesterday. He said that 25 carloads of grain sat on one siding for almost 60 days. On a little siding in my own constituency, Adams, there were seven empty cars put in on January 29. Four of those cars were loaded on January 30 and three more were loaded on February 11. All seven cars are still sitting there. Four more cars were loaded yesterday by the elevator agent. He could not finish loading all the cars because the track was blocked with snow. I suggest there are thousands of carloads of grain on the tracks at various points which have been sitting there for weeks because the railways are incapable of moving them. Thousands of cars have been waiting to be loaded but the agents could not load them because they could not be spotted.

Both railway companies have decreased their maintenance-of-way forces, with the result that back tracks and switches have remained unshovelled and uncleaned for weeks on end. Snow fences are not only unrepaired; some have been taken down and never replaced. The CPR complained about having 19,000 miles of snow to plow in the prairie region this year as compared with only 1,000 last year. I would ask where their snow fences are and what has happened to their maintenance of way crews. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) complains that the railways thumb their noses at him and will not honour his requests. If the Minister of Transport has not learned by now that he must make the companies do these things, I suggest we need a new Minister of Transport.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

Another item which is in the throne speech concerns steps to be taken to end any discrimination in freight rates. We must see that suggestion implemented. I never thought I would live to see the day when discrimination in freight rates came to an end, but it is in the throne speech and we are now waiting to get the legislation. We are anxious to see it, because we want to know what the Liberals mean by "any discrimination in freight rates". That statement which appears in the throne speech is pretty all-inclusive. If the government is really going to act on this, it will be a great day for western Canada and I am sure this will be of help to the people in the Atlantic provinces, in northern Ontario and in eastern Quebec. When that is done, it will be a magnificent day. I think I can even stomach the Liberals a few weeks longer just to see that legislation.

An hon. Member: But how much longer?

Mr. Benjamin: Let me mention one or two other freight rate items in order to be helpful to the Minister of Agriculture. He might want to use my suggestions when he is finalizing the drafting of legislation, or to strengthen his proposals to the cabinet in order to make sure the legislation does in fact do away with discrimination in freight rates. It now costs 19 cents a hundredweight to ship live cattle from Edmonton to Vancouver. If you butcher the cattle in Edmonton and ship it to Vancouver as dressed beef, it costs $1.39 a hundredweight. It costs $2.90 a hundredweight to ship livestock from Prince Albert to Toronto; but if you butcher the cattle in Prince Albert and ship it as dressed beef to Toronto, it costs $3.40. What is even worse, the cheapest way of sending a carload of steel from Hamilton to Calgary is to ship it from Hamilton to Vancouver and then back to Calgary. The rate from Hamilton to Vancouver is $1.85 a hundred pounds, but from Hamilton to Calgary the rate is $2.65 a hundred pounds; yet Calgary is 700 miles closer to Hamilton than is Vancouver. If the Liberal government's legislation cures these problems it will be a great day for people in many parts of Canada.

I should now like to turn to another matter having to do with freight rates. The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board reopened this matter when he said in a speech he made in Winnipeg last August that possibly it is time to review and adjust the Crowsnest pass rate agreement. Whenever anyone makes that suggestion, whether it is the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt or an official of the CNR or the CPR, it only means one thing: the only way they will review and adjust the Crowsnest pass rates is upward. We have heard similar statements by the Alberta livestock association and the Palliser wheat growers. That would be selling out the grain growers of western Canada if we adjust the Crowsnest pass rates. The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and officials of the railway companies have said a good deal about the low Crowsnest pass rates, but none of these people has mentioned what the CPR received as part of the deal when the agreement was made.

Let me tell you a little bit about what the CPR received. They received $11,000 per mile, for a total of $3,630,000, to construct the rail line from Lethbridge, Alberta, to Nelson, British Columbia, through the Crowsnest pass and the Kettle valley. That represented about 35 per cent of the cost. That is a real example of free enterprise getting welfare. That makes the people on unemployment insurance look like amateurs. The CPR also received nearly four million acres of land in 1897 when the Crowsnest pass legislation was passed in this House, including the mineral rights. They received six square miles of proven coal land from the province of British Columbia. The coal was there. Several tens of thousands of tons were being taken out of that area in 1897. In addition to that, they obtained a little deal to buy 33 miles of rail line, including mineral rights, some small smelters and mines in Trail and the surrounding area. Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company was established as a result of the Crowsnest pass agreement. In the last 60 years they have benefited to the order of some $300 million as part of the deal.

If the Canadian Pacific Railway is in fact losing money hauling grain—which I do not believe—as part of the deal, then it has been more than compensated through the profits from mineral operations and a host of other enterprises, as a direct result of what the people of Canada did in 1897. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will relate this to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. He would have a better chance having the Ten Commandments amended than changing the Crowsnest pass agreement unless and until any increase in the Crowsnest pass rates is included in an income stabilization plan. We will have to have the income stabilization plan first and then maybe we will talk about the Crowsnest pass rates.

Certainly if the Crowsnest pass agreement is to be done away with, we will take the right-of-way, the buildings, the rails, the mines, the smelters, the profits and give them back to the people of Canada. If the deal is to be cancelled, we will cancel the whole deal. If they want to back out of an agreement which they signed which says "in perpetuity"—which is a long time—and they want to back out of the freight rates part, they can do so but they will lose all the rest of it. I think the government of Canada could have a nice time with the hundreds of millions of dollars from the mines and smelters of that area, which could be used for the benefit of the people of Canada and to provide old age pensions at age 60 from the profits.

I should like to say a little more about rail transportation, particularly as it applies to the Canadian Pacific Railway. What this company received as a result of the Crowsnest pass agreement has more than compensated it for the grain rates. In fact, the Crowsnest pass agreement provided for a rate reduction in respect of a host of other products from eastern Canada. I have yet to find out how that disappeared from the agreement, because those rates have been raised many times. That is a small matter compared to what happened in 1881. As we know, Canadian Pacific Railway received 25 million "suitable acres of land". I shall come back to that in a moment. It also received $25 million in cash. We thought that was the end of it.

One might read the legislation and the agreement of 1881 which appears in chapter I of the Statutes of Canada, an act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. There one will find that the CPR received many more things. They received 213 miles of railway that had already been constructed by the government of Canada between Selkirk and Emerson. The agreement also called for the government of Canada to construct and turn over to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the lines required from Fort William to Selkirk and from Kamloops to Port Moody. There was not much left for the CPR to build. It received 25 million acres, including mineral rights, and $25 million in cash and some more. In the legislation it also received from the government and the people of Canada duty free entry for all the material required for the construction of that railway—the rails, the telegraphic equipment and everything else. Then they received massive exemptions in respect of property and land taxes. The legislation reads:

> The Canadian Pacific Railway, and all stations and station grounds, workshops, buildings, yards and other property, rolling stock and appurtenances required and used for the construction and working thereof, and the capital stock of the company, shall be forever free from taxation by the Dominion, or by any province hereafter to be established, or by any municipal corporation therein; and the lands of the company, in the Northwest Territories, until they are either sold or occupied, shall also be free from such taxation for 20 years after the grant thereof from the Crown.

I read some of the debates of the House of Commons for that day. I find that one, the Hon. Edward Blake, had something to say. By the way, it turned out that the Conservatives offered so much and lost, and the Liberals came in and offered more for the Crowsnest pass agreement. The Conservatives offered $6,000 per mile, and the Liberals offered $11,000 per mile. In 1880 in the House of Commons, the Hon. Edward Blake had this to say about what the government of Canada was doing for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company:

> The great mass of railways in this country have been constructed out of resources mostly provided by private individuals. Considerable sums have, from time to time, been given by way of aid or subsidy by the government towards the construction of some lines, but the main portion of the capital of these railway companies is private capital.

He went on to say:

> —but the same considerations are not at all applicable to a case in which you say to some individuals: Gentlemen, we will give you as much and half as much again as is necessary to build this railway, and we will let you own it afterwards. It is not the work of private capital at all. These men will, for a little while, until they make some land sales, invest four or five millions which will be recouped to them within a very brief space of time, and then they will have this enterprise without having sunk a dollar of their own money in it, and will have millions of acres besides.

Mr. Speaker, that is some of the background and history of the Canadian Pacific.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to join with other hon. members in congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I think they both did a remarkable job and deserve great credit. I also wish to associate myself with the tributes paid to His Excellency the Governor General and Madame Leger. I wish them both a most happy and successfull mandate at Government House.

Ever since I have been in this House, Mr. Speaker, it has always been a pleasure for me to observe the dignity and the diplomacy with which you have carried out your very difficult duties. I am certainly happy that hon. members saw fit to re-elect you, and also the Deputy Speaker to preside over this new session. I offer you both my best wishes.

● (2140)

In my maiden speech in this House last year I said I was very honoured that the people of Cardigan elected me as their representative in Ottawa. It is now over a year since they gave me that privilege, and I must say that I find it more and more challenging and interesting to work on behalf of the people of Cardigan as time goes by. They have continued to show their complete support for whatever I have endeavoured to do for them. I think I can say in all fairness that they appreciate what has been done for them during the past 16 months. Needless to say, I look forward to many more months and years of working on behalf of those who elected me.

As hon. members know, last year marked the one hundredth anniversary of Prince Edward Island's entry into confederation. Although the seeds of confederation were planted in Charlottetown in 1864 and the dream became a reality in 1867, reluctant islanders waited another five years before finally joining confederation in 1873. Of course, we were extremely proud and happy to celebrate all three of those centennials with equal vigour and enthusiasm. In 1973, Canadians from all over the country joined islanders in celebrating their anniversary. The former Governor General and Mrs. Michener officially opened the celebrations on January 1, 1973. From then on it was a year of festivities and of various events to commemorate the historic occasion. We were particularly honoured that Her Majesty the Queen and Prince Philip could join with us in celebrating the centennial. This was certainly one of the highlights of an exciting year. For me the occasion was all the more memorable because Her Majesty spent a considerable amount of time in my riding of Cardigan.

We were also privileged to have the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the federal cabinet pay a visit to the island and hold a cabinet meeting in the historic Confederation Chamber at Province House. This was the first time the federal cabinet had met in Charlottetown since confederation. Needless to say, I was particularly proud to take part in that historic event. I wish to take advantage of this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to express, on behalf of all islanders, our most sincere thanks to all hon. members, and indeed to all Canadians who came to the island and joined with us in celebrating our memorable anniversary. I am sure that the hospitality and the friendliness with which you were greeted will prompt you to come again as often as possible.

Hon. members will recall that a comprehensive development plan for the island was signed in March, 1969. I will not go into the details of the plan as I am sure hon. members are familiar with it. However, I would like to point out that since the implementation of the plan, the number of people leaving the island has declined substantially to the point where we now have a real population growth on the island. This means that a whole new generation of young people can find interesting and challenging opportunities on the island instead of having to move to other parts of Canada or to the United States.

I should also point out that the numerous DREE projects which have been, and continue to be, approved for the island are of tremendous help to our economic development. I think the decentralization program that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) is now carrying on for his department will make it still more effective.

Another point that I should like to mention about development is that although we are looking forward to a fairer degree of economic development which would continue to offer our younger generation better opportunities for work, at the same time we are also looking at the quality of development that we want for our island. I do not think we are prepared to have development simply for the sake of development. We are also extremely concerned with the over-all environment of the island. We are becoming more and more aware of the fact that our geographical location puts us in a rather privileged position today. We realize that people from big cities envy us, and we would certainly want to try to avoid some of the mistakes they have made and perhaps belatedly regret. In other words, we are looking for a certain quality of development which will help us enjoy a reasonable standard of living but at the same time will help us keep and develop those environmental qualities which we still have and which have become so precious today.

In the agricultural sector, some of the programs related to the development plan helped island farmers enjoy a particularly good year in 1973. I am pleased to note that the Speech from the Throne speaks of a number of measures which will continue to help the farmer produce in greater quantity and quality so that we can achieve stabilization of food prices. In that respect I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has demonstrated great leadership and is moving in the right direction.

Island fishermen have also shared in this prosperity with good catches and increased earnings. The fishermen were extremely pleased with the compensation program for replacement of the gear they lost during a particularly severe storm. Some $617,000 was received by 845 fishermen on the island in compensation for their heavy losses. This was approximately two-thirds of the total losses, and the provincial government reimbursed the fishermen for the remainder.

Another very important fisheries development in P.E.I. is the small harbours development program. Results of the 1973-74 supplementary program can already be seen, and $335,000 was allocated to upgrade facilities at many of the island's small craft harbours. I am pleased to see that the Speech from the Throne refers to further "improvements in harbour facilities for fishing fleets." I think the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé) have shown great understanding of the fishermen's needs in this regard.

Even before confederation transportation was a major problem in Prince Edward Island. One of the terms of confederation was that there would be a continuous link with the mainland. Because of this promise the federal government remains continually abreast of the problem of transportation. At the present time, two ice-breaker ferries travel between Borden and Cape Tormentine, New Brunswick, in the winter, with four additional car ferries in the summer. This provides a superior year-round freight and passenger service between Wood Islands and Caribou, Nova Scotia. Planning is under way for more secure facilities at Wood Islands for the convenience of the travelling public, as well as improved berthing facilities. This construction should be completed by 1976. I am encouraged by the co-operative attitude of the Ministry of Transport in helping to alleviate transportation difficulties for islanders, and by the willingness to arrive at and ensure economic transportation access to markets in central and western Canada for island producers.

Turning to my Department of Veterans Affairs, I think I can say that we have had a most successful year from many points of view. The legislation enacted for Canada's veterans during the previous session of this parliament was far reaching and of vital importance. It incorporated some basic philosophies and principles which were proposed many years ago. It opened new doors for both veterans and their dependants to enjoy a richer and more secure way of life.

As hon. members are aware, there are three acts which govern the compensation paid to veterans and their dependants. These are the Pension Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act, and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. Last March, Bill C-148 was passed. It amended the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act so that they assumed a completely new profile. In effect, this bill changed the qualification requirements for allowances from a means-tested program to a limited income-tested program. This was done by removing the 'imitations covering personal property. In the same bill, the rates and ceilings were adjusted upwards, which resulted in a 25 per cent increase for the single recipient and a 28 per cent increase for the married recipient. Of course, these amounts continue to increase each year as a result of previous legislation which provided for automatic annual increases based on the consumer price index.

● (2150)

In his remarks a few days ago, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raised a question about the War Veterans Allowance Act, and particularly the fact that some veterans would be discriminated against. I simply wish to say to my hon. friend that every veteran in this country has received, and will continue to receive everything that is due him. Furthermore, I hope to be in a position very shortly to introduce legislation that will further amend the War Veterans Allowance Act so that benefits to veterans will be further enhanced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Next week?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Last June, the Pension Act was amended by the passage of Bill C-202. Under the Pension Act, pensions are awarded, as a matter of right, for death and disability related to military service in wartime. The bill provided an immediate increase of 24 per cent in the basic rate but, more importantly, it tied the rate to the average salary of a composite group of employees in the public service. Now, for the first time, the disability pension rate has achieved parity with the current cost of living standard. This was probably one of the most significant single advances in the history of Canadian veterans' legislation in more than 50 years and I think the veterans' organizations of this country deserve great credit for the very important ocntribution they made in the preparation of this legislation.

Another aspect of the whole pension system to veterans that I should mention very briefly is the question of backlog. As hon. members know, the legislation passed by this House in 1971 opened the door to a deluge of pension applications from veterans. This situation has created a considerable backlog with which the commission has been struggling ever since. I am happy to report that since last year that backlog has been considerably reduced. Whereas a year ago it was over 9,000 applications, it is now down to 7,300. What is more significant and encouraging is the fact that the monthly output of decisions has almost doubled since last year. I think the Canadian Pension Commission, together with the pension review board and the bureau of pensions advocates deserve great credit for this increased efficiency. I am sure this trend will continue and that in the not too distant future we will have eliminated that backlog.

On the subject of veterans' hospitals, Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention that the government's policy of transferring hospitals to the jurisdiction of provinces is progressing quite well.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Says who?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I say that. Three hospitals have already been transferred and negotiations are well under way for the transfer of a few more. I have no time to argue; the clock is moving too fast, Mr. Speaker. Although some people would like to see the veterans' hospitals remain as they are now, we certainly feel that it is in the best interest of veterans to proceed with these transfers. Otherwise, we run the risk of having to operate geriatric institutions within a short number of years and this is certainly not in the best interest of our veterans' population, not to mention the fact that it is becoming increasingly difficult, if not impossible, to find well qualified professionals to look after our veterans.

The year 1974 will mark two important events for the veterans of this country. As hon. members know, this coming June will be the thirtieth anniversary of the landing of the allied troops in northern France, which resulted in the liberation of Europe and the end of the second world war within one year. The government will certainly take a very active part in those celebrations, and I will be making an announcement very shortly concerning the participation of Canada in those ceremonies.

This year will also mark the twenty-fifth biennial national convention of the Royal Canadian Legion. This very important gathering will take place in St. John's, Newfoundland, during the first week of June. I do not think I need repeat here the important contributions made by the Royal Canadian Legion on behalf of all those who served their country in wartime.

Mr. Speaker, the Veterans Land Act has been a most successful post-war rehabilitation program and for that reason alone it is not surprising that representations have been made by members and by veterans organizations to extend the March 31, 1974, deadline for veterans to submit loan applications for the purchase of properties. In addition, some of the representations made have requested the reopening of the October 31, 1968, deadline for interested veterans to obtain a VLA certificate of qualification, that the loan ceiling for smallholding settlement purposes be increased and that the minimum acreage requirements be eliminated to enable veterans to purchase city-sized lots in urban areas. Notwithstanding the many occasions on which I have already done so, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is fundamental in the consideration of these requests to review the intent and purpose of the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): You do not have much time.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): The Lord being good, I will make it. First and foremost, it was one of three alternative rehabilitation—

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): There is no question about the Lord being good. He is good. The Lord willing is the question.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): —programs enacted to assist veterans on their return to civilian life following wartime active service. Its purpose was to provide a measure of financial assistance to those veterans interested in settling on the land as full or part-time farmers, or in association with their occupation as commercial fishermen. For those veterans not interested in or who did not consider it practical to settle under the terms of the act, alternative benefits in the form of educational assistance or re-establishment credits were available.

I think it must be emphasized that the Veterans Land Act was a post-war rehabilitation measure and that almost 30 years have elapsed since the end of World War II, and 20 years in the case of the Korean conflict. I suggest it is difficult, within the normal sense of the words "rehabilitation in civilian life", to contend successfully that after these periods of time the words have any meaningful application. This is borne out by many of the individual letters I have received. Time and again reference is made to the fact that the veteran intends to retire in one, two, five or ten years' time and he would like to use the loan provisions of the act to acquire a retirement home. I am certain this was never contemplated when the legislation was enacted, nor when parliament gave unanimous consent in 1965 to the establishment of deadlines for phasing out VLA lending operations in a reasonable and orderly manner.

I stated earlier that, as the name implies, the Veterans Land Act was oriented toward agriculture to assist veterans interested in land utilization to acquire farmland for operation on a full or part-time farming basis. There is no question that the vast majority of the 130,000 veterans settled under those provisions of the act did utilize their properties for agricultural purposes, with the main body of those established as full-time farmers continuing to do so. This, however, is neither the purpose nor the inclication today of veterans and others who want the act extended. Mr. Speaker, the desire today for an extension of VLA lending operations coupled with an increase in the smallholding loan ceiling and elimination of the minimum acreage requirement is to provide assistance on favourable financial terms for the purchase of homes, including even condominium units, in urban areas.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What is wrong with that?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Similar representations have been made throughout the 30 years that the Veterans Land Act has been in operation. On all occasions, and notwithstanding modifications made from time to time in the minimum size regulations, successive governments have recognized and adhered to the basic concept and purpose of the act. I strongly suggest that to do otherwise now would be grossly unfair to the many thousands of veterans who were not interested in, or found it impractical to live on a half-acre of land or more and made alternative, less favourable financial arrangements for the purchase of urban properties.

● (2200)

In the same connection, Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind hon. members that on the recommendation of the Royal Canadian Legion part II of the Veterans Land Act was brought into being as far back as 1954 to provide assistance to those veterans interested in building their own homes on city-sized lots with National Housing Act mortgage financing. More than 4,500 veterans have used the provisions of part II in the 20 years they have been available.

It is acknowledged, of course, that the provision of suitable living accommodation necessarily has been an integral factor in the establishment of veterans under the Veterans-Land Act. Since the inception of operations, over 40,000 new homes have been constructed. This accomplishment has not, however, altered the fundamental purpose and orientation of the legislation, nor has it converted the program into a straight housing measure serving to duplicate or conflict with the provisions of the National Housing Act.

I remarked earlier that the Veterans Land Act was one of three alternative rehabilitation schemes. The university training program was concluded in the mid-fifties. The re-establishment credit benefits provided under the War Service Grants Act terminated October 31, 1968, which was also the final date for veterans interested in the possibility of settling under the Veterans Land Act to obtain a certificate of qualification. The periods in which these alternative benefits were available were considered to be adequate and appropriate, and it seems evident that the same opinion was held concerning the Veterans Land Act when in 1965 parliament gave unanimous approval to establishing March 31, 1974, as the final date for qualified veterans to submit loan applications for the purchase of properties.

Almost nine years have elapsed since that deadline was established. The terminal date has been well publicized. I am of the opinion, therefore, that veterans sincerely interested in obtaining VLA benefits for the purposes contemplated by the act have had ample time in which to do so. Virtually every veteran who obtained a VLA certificate of qualification by the deadline of October 31, 1968, had already utilized the benefits alternative to those of the Veterans Land Act. In the circumstances, adherence to the lending deadline specified in the act will not represent a denial of benefits to any veteran.

On January 11 last, as reported at page 9281 of Hansard, I stated that if I had sufficient information to make me think the deadline date should be changed I would so recommend to the government. I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I have carefully considered all relevant representations and data, including that determined by the Royal Canadian Legion in the survey it conducted last December. I am unable to conclude that such a recommendation would be warranted or appropriate.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: It being after ten o'clock, this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At 10.05 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSING

PROGRAM FOR RURAL AND NATIVE HOUSING—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short report to the House on some meetings I had yesterday, together with officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, with representatives of provincial Métis and non-status Indian organizations and the Native Council of Canada.

During the course of those meetings I outlined to them the elements of a federal rural and native people's housing policy. I am happy to report that these plans were very well received. I should like to inform the House about these consultations and the important new policy initiatives which we are proposing to meet the housing needs of people in the rural areas of Canada.

Before I go further, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I had instructed that copies of this statement be distributed in the usual way to members opposite. I understand there has been some complication and members obviously have not received copies of the statement, for which I apologize. If they will look at my behaviour in this regard in the past they will remember that I have assiduously tried to observe that courtesy.

Mr. Stanfield: It must be the Post Office.

Mr. Basford: While there are still some aspects of implementation and administration to be discussed, the native people's organizations have indicated to me in a general way that they welcome the initiatives we are taking. We emphasize, however, Mr. Speaker, that this policy and its programs will serve all people in isolated and rural Canada according to need or according to income and without regard to race or ancestry. Hon. members will recognize, however, that such a policy could not be successful if it did not also meet the particular needs of native people who, in many areas, require new housing on a priority basis.

The goal of this policy will be to build or acquire up to 50,000 housing units for rural and native families in the next five years.

We will invite the provinces, and I have consulted with them, to participate in achieving this goal through a federal-provincial partnership arrangement under section 40 of the National Housing Act which provides for sharing of capital costs, 75 per cent by the federal government and 25 per cent by the province. By this technique we can provide housing in rural and isolated areas for purchase at monthly payments directly related to income which, in many cases, is extremely low or non-existent.

With provincial concurrence, we will also extend the benefits of the new residential rehabilitation assistance program to rural settlements, in cases where people's needs can best be met by permanently improving the dwellings they already occupy.

In addition, the federal emergency repair program which began three years ago will, as requested, be continued for a few more years for those native families living in substandard dwellings until new units are available.

CMHC will give special assistance to rural people to ensure that they are able to make the greatest possible use of the whole range of NHA programs, including assisted home ownership, non-profit and co-operative housing.

Special standards of residential construction will be developed to accommodate the special needs of rural and native communities.

Wherever possible, we will see that housing projects provide not only shelter but opportunities for employment of local people, job training and local economic development. All federal programs which can have an effect on the health, welfare and social and economic well-being of the people concerned will be integrated with the housing activity. This will involve such federal departments as Manpower and Immigration, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, National Health and Welfare, Regional Economic Expansion, Finance and Secretary of State. To this end an interdepartmental and intergovernmental committee will be formed in each province in Canada.

● (1110)

A key factor in the success of the program will be the direct involvement of the people themselves in the planning, implementation and administration of the programs. Native people's organizations in particular have been very successful in recent years in developing self-help projects and we will continue to provide financial support for these organizations and for any others who are willing and able to take this kind of initiative. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, as requested, will take immediate steps to recruit and train people at corporation offices and to set up other short-term training programs to increase the skill and knowledge of those involved in native housing organizations and housing programs, in order that they can take full advantage of the legislation and the budget. In addition to strengthening the head office staff which deals with native housing matters, the Corporation will second staff to provincial native organizations where their skills may be required.

As I have already indicated to the House, Mr. Speaker, assistance in training and development, like all other aspects of the policy, is equally available to all rural people.

Hon. members will recognize that the rural and native people's housing policy, in several of its aspects, provides an opportunity for provincial government participation. I had already, before Christmas, consulted with my provincial counterparts and formally advised the provincial ministers yesterday of this fact, and I will be arranging to meet with them in the next few weeks to enlist their formal co-operation. Following these consultations, I will be meeting again with the native people's organizations and I am confident that, for the 1974 construction season, we will be well launched on an aggressive campaign of native and rural housing programs.

I am happy to report these details to the House. By any standard, Mr. Speaker, we are one of the best housed peoples in the world. We are also a rich, successful society. But in that society, in the rural and isolated areas, we have some of the worst housing of any people in the world, much of it inhabited by people of native origin. These proposals which the government has made to the native organizations will, in my view, promote a major replacing of that housing. It will require an immense amount of work by those of us in the federal and provincial governments and in the native organizations themselves, but I hope all three groups are ready to begin to implement these proposals immediately.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my first words, of course, will be to congratulate the minister and hope that the program will be as successful as he suggested it will be. I did not really expect him to make this statement today. I read about the program in the newspaper last evening but received a copy of the statement just now. That may have been due to accident or some other reason.

Without having read the statement, I think I can comment because I know something about the native people of Canada, those who live on reservations and those who do not. I noticed one omission in the statement. Nothing was said about the native peoples living in the two northern territories of Canada.

In the statement the minister dealt at some length with federal and provincial arrangements for co-operation in housing. When we deal with housing for the native peoples of Canada who live either on reserves or off, we must consider the conditions under which they live. Anyone who has visited native people living on reservations will be aware of these conditions. I have personal knowledge of the conditions under which they live in western Canada because I had the honour for a number of years to represent the people of the former constituency of Bow River prior to redistribution.

In that constituency are two reservations, the Blackfoot Reservation and the Morley Reservation. I also know something about the people in the area where the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) lives, having practised law there for some time. I am aware of the conditions under which native people live in northern Saskatchewan. I say, and I think all hon. members will agree with me, that the conditions under which native people have been forced to live, either by the Indian Act or by governments in the past, stand as a monument to our inhumanity, of our inhuman attitude toward these people.

On many occasions we have read in the newspapers about the poor housing to which these people have been subjected over the years. They are forced to burn energy other than natural gas or oil. Many times there have been fires and families have been destroyed along with their houses. These people have been forced to live under such conditions for a number of years. Therefore I wish the minister success in this program.

The minister talked about 50,000 houses. If there could be a crash program and these 50,000 houses could be built immediately, it would certainly relieve much of the present suffering and inhumanity.

I hope the minister will also take a hard look at another fact that is all too often forgotten. Schools and hospitals have been closed on reservations and the children are forced to go to school elsewhere. These people should be able to enjoy a high standard of hospitalization within their own region.

It was my fortune this morning to meet with a group of native people in connection with their oil rights on certain Indian reservations, particularly with regard to the surtax being creamed off in the sale of Canadian crude petroleum. These people were promised certain things by their treaties. They should be entitled to share in that tax so that their living standards can be upgraded not only with regard to housing but other basic needs such as food for their families. One need only visit those families and see the manner in which they live to realize they are badly in need of assistance.

I again wish the minister every success in this program. I hope it is a crash program and that it will get off the ground and not just be a matter of words.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the other day I read in the newspaper that Mr. Lawrence Gladu had been appointed to the Native Housing Committee of Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation by Mr. Teron. I am pleased to see that some attempt is finally being made to involve native people formally in the activities of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Mr. Gladu, along with others, will be a great asset with regard to native housing needs.

The statement made by the minister today is long overdue. It would have had much more impact three, four or five years ago. It would have been much more valuable at that time. Nevertheless, it is welcome. I am sure the native people will feel that some recognition is finally being given to the deplorable conditions under which they have had to live for many years.

When the forces of society can be organized and developed and the wealth of society used to assist those who are disadvantaged, it is a credit to the political system of this nation and, indeed, to society itself. There should not be any question about our endorsement of that philosophy.

We regret that we did not get a copy of the statement until the minister was delivering it in the House. If we had had an opportunity to look at it earlier, my colleague, the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth), would have replied because he has been concerned about this subject matter long before becoming a member of the House. He is concerned, and I am sure others are about the lack of any reference in the minister's statement to involvement of people in both the Yukon and the Northwest Territories in participation in this program. The minister talks about a 75-25 per cent division of capital costs between the federal government and the provinces, but nowhere does he make reference to what is to be done about the territories. I hope this was an oversight on his part, that in the rush to put things on paper it just slipped his mind, that it is not really a slip in policy but that there will be some involvement of a comparable nature respecting native people in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon who far too often are left out of consideration in matters dealt with by this government.

The native people generally have been at the bottom of the economic level for as long as we can remember. They have been the single most disadvantaged group in Canada in educational opportunities, in social development, in rapport with the rest of society, in the degree of recognition extended to them by parliament and the legislatures. While this program is welcome, it is just a slight step in the direction of society paying attention to the single most disadvantaged group we have had in this country over the years and still have.

There are two groups of native people in terms of legal definition, which is unfortunate. First, there are those who are registered as members of a band and classified as such, registered Indians and, second those who fall in the general classification of being Metis or as not having Indian status. In the statement, or that part I have been able to read since it reached us, the minister talks of native people who do not live on reserves. I think this is a sad situation that should not be perpetuated. We should not think in terms of a division between people, of reserve housing and housing which is not on reserves; we should think in a total sense about this matter.

The minister talks in terms of rural areas and I am sure neither the minister nor the native people would want to see a situation where once again native people are singled out as a particular group entitled to a particular quality and type of housing in rural areas where non-native people encounter the same difficulties in respect of sewage facilities, septic tank facilities, water facilities, electrical energy facilities and all those other things. The program should not be promoted as an idea that would be divisive within a community but, rather, all-encompassing.

There were a couple of other failings in the minister's statement which need to be looked at. I refer to interest rates and land assembly costs, the cost of land and the cost of money. These are the two greatest factors in the escalating cost of housing in this nation. If this housing program is going to proceed as envisaged by the minister, and if it turns out later that the people who rent these homes or seek to buy them find that their economic position in life is insufficient for them to be able to pay the interest rates or the land costs, then a few years from now they will be in no better relative position than they are now. Unless the problems of interest rates and land costs are tackled, things may come to an end sadder than anticipated by the minister in his glowing statement. Apart from that, this is a welcome move and, I hope, just a commencement.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I heard with pleasure the statement of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) this morning because I represent, in fact, an area or a constituency which includes the two areas mentioned in his statement, Indian reserves and rural regions.

The questions which come to my mind and which will have to be brought to the attention of the minister for explanations are, undoubtedly, the provisions concerning loans with regard to the cost of these buildings. I have had the chance to visit personally the reserves in question where homes already supplied with the help of the government were in some way adequate for the needs of the moment. But the same help for Canadians in rural areas is far from satisfactory. I sincerely hope that this new policy will properly allow underprivileged residents of rural areas to gain justice in the field of housing.

On the other hand, the minister stated that special standards for home construction will be formulated. I sincerely hope that the minister will properly revise the standards that were used by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation these last few years, especially in the Quebec region. According to the standards of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, buildings were found with two inches of ice in wardrobes. Therefore, it is nearly time that these standards be better formulated and especially that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation inspectors do some positive work.

I hope that the minister will revise not only his policy but also the standards and their enforcement by his department to give justice to the whole population and, especially, as intended in this motion, for people in rural areas.

COMBINES

IMMEDIATE APPOINTMENT OF DIRECTOR OF INVESTIGATION AND RESEARCH—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 to seek the consent of the House to move a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity. The Combines Investigation Act was designed to protect consumers against the voracious appetite of corporations for profits and to deal with such matters as price fixing, predatory pricing and the like. The urgent situation that has developed is that the potential for protecting the consuming public is being stifled by the government through its refusal to appoint the appropriate officers. Therefore, I move—

Transportation

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the hon. member presents his motion, I think I have the obligation to remind him and again to remind the House that the practice is well established in relation to motions under Standing Order 43. Hon. members are allowed under the Standing Order to propose such a motion, which is not debatable, because it is suggested that the matter is one of urgency.

In view of the fact there is no possibility under the rules for someone on behalf of the government or on behalf of another party to reply to allegations or charges made in the explanatory preambles to such motions, I would invite hon. members to refrain as much as possible from making charges or allegations which can only give rise to debate. I suggest to hon. members that they limit their motions as much as possible to the motion itself. I apologize to the hon. member if I interrupted him just at the moment he was going to make his motion.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to Your Honour for causing you to rise, but the subject matter necessitated some kind of comment prior to moving the motion. If the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) were in the House I am sure he would second the motion, but since he is not, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House is of the opinion that a more effective administration of the Combines Investigation Act on behalf of the consumers of Canada can be brought about if the government will exercise the authority given to it by section 5, subsection 1 of the Combines Investigation Act, and appoint immediately a director of investigation and research.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Skeena under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

PROPOSED LIGHT RAPID TRANSIT SYSTEM, TORONTO—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek leave of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Toronto transportation plan review, in recommending against the Scarborough expressway, proposed a light rapid transit system, and since the rolling equipment for such systems is now available in the United States only, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

● (1130)

That the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) consult with his counterparts at the provincial level for the purpose of working out a program for the production in Canada of the rolling stock that will be needed for light rapid transit systems.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

METROPOLITAN TORONTO—ACTION TO CURB SPECULATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on what I suggest is a matter of real pressing necessity. In view of the fact there is inordinate speculation in real estate throughout Canada, particularly in the metropolitan Toronto area, and that a lot of this speculation is financed directly or indirectly by lending institutions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Arrol):

That this House direct the government to use its powers over banking and interest rates to prevent lending institutions advancing money directly or indirectly on debt instruments registered or unregistered that affect the financing of vacant land or developed land and buildings where the land value represents in the valuation more than one-third the total of the value of land and buildings combined.

Mr. Speaker: This motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

EXERCISE OF RESTRAINT IN SPENDING—REASON FOR GROWTH IN PUBLIC SERVICE AND USE OF OUTSIDE CONSULTANTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In the budget speech of last year the Minister of Finance said that the government was determined to exercise restraint in spending. In light of the spending estimates, will the Prime Minister indicate very briefly to the House what the government's restraint program is and whether it is being implemented in the government's opinion?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is an ongoing concern of the government, which always looks at each program as it comes up, estimates its value and determines the effect of it on the citizens, particularly the needy ones, and chooses between a whole set of priorities which are constantly before the government, some of which even met with the approval of the opposition last spring. We are constantly making these assessments and obviously trying to spend as little money as possible as we are not interested in raising taxes unless we have to.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, has the Prime Minister issued any specific instructions or guidelines to his ministers directing them to institute any restraint or discipline in respect of the operations of their departments?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, quite frequently, Mr. Speaker, and generally I have the strong support of the President of the Treasury Board.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: The old rug ranker again.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the growth in the Public Service by nearly 25 per cent over the last two years and the growth in the use and cost of outside consultants from about $300 million when the right hon. gentleman took office to nearly $800 million next year, is there any explanation for this, particularly in view of the accepted fact that it is the poor who pay a bigger proportion of their income in taxes than any other group in our society, so this expansion in Public Service expenditures is really on the backs of the poor?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the concern for the poor shown by the Leader of the Opposition is a concern shared by all of us. That is why in the last budget the Minister of Finance brought in tax reductions which were particularly helpful to the poor.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

EXTENT TO WHICH CEMENT PRICES ARTIFICIALLY INCREASED BY REASON OF CONSPIRACY BY B.C. SUPPLIERS—STEPS TO RECOVER LOSSES SUFFERED BY PUBLIC

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that seven major suppliers of cement in the province of British Columbia have pleaded guilty under the Combines Investigation Act to conspiring to cut competition in that industry over a 14-year period, and in view of the fact that those companies control some 90 per cent of the cement market, would the minister advise whether any investigation has been completed or conducted as to the extent by which cement prices were artificially increased as a result of this conspiracy?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take notice of that question and refer it to my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works, to whom I have given some notice. In view of the fact that over this 14-year period of conspiracy in the cement industry in British Columbia the federal government was involved in the construction of the Vancouver International Airport, the CBC building, the Van-Term cargo terminal amounting to some $22 million, and many other major federal projects, would the minister advise the House what steps the government intends to take to recover the loss the public has suffered as a result of this conspiracy?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member does acknowledge the building construction that goes on in his province by my department. However, I am not aware of any conspiracy and I do not recall having received any notice from the hon. member on that topic.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, in view of the last answer my further supplementary will be redirected to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of this type of case where the public obviously has been overcharged in respect of major projects, and in view of the obvious failure on the part of the government to control this kind of thing, will the minister consider introducing legislation of a class action type so the public can protect itself when the government fails to do so?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think the particular abuses the hon. member has alleged or referred to are covered by the laws of this country as passed by the House.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW POLICY

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Last week, in his answer to one of the questions I had a chance to ask in this House, the minister's parliamentary secretary declared that the minister would announce a new policy for the dairy industry a few days after. I would first like to know whether this policy will be made public today or tomorrow, since it was declared it would be announced soon.

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, by law it has to be announced before April 1 or by that date, and it will be.

THREAT OF GRASSHOPPER INFESTATION IN SASKATCHEWAN THIS SPRING—GOVERNMENT PLANS FOR CONTROL

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the potential threat of a severe grasshopper infestation of a large area of Saskatchewan this coming spring, and in view of the fact that if there is a large hatch it will severely reduce grain production in the area, will the minister advise what plans he has to combat this threat and, in particular, has he met, or does he intend to meet with respresentatives of the municipalities involved, and is it the government's intention to release dieldron as a chemical to combat this threat?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, to answer the last question first, at the present time we have no intention of releasing dieldron. Our officials have had ongoing meetings with some of the concerned people in western Canada, and I hope to have some meetings with them myself. We are making as sure as we can that we have all the other chemicals we feel are proper to use in that they will have no damaging effects with regard to either animal or human consumption and no carry-over effects in the end product. We are doing everything we possibly can to make sure of this, but it is anybody's guess how many grasshoppers there will be this year.

SUBMISSION BY CERTAIN INDIAN BANDS FOR SHARE OF RETURNS FROM OIL EXPORT TAX

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is he aware of the submissions made to his department by oil producing Indian bands regarding the export tax, and has his department made any decision as to the return of that export tax?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, indeed we have received submissions of that kind, and we will discuss this matter with both the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Department of Finance.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

EXERCISE OF RESTRAINT IN SPENDING—DEPARTMENTS TO WHICH GUIDELINES DIRECTED IN LIGHT OF TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and is based on his reply to the question of the Leader of the Official Opposition regarding spending guidelines. May I ask the Prime Minister if the guidelines have been directed to government departments whose budgets are not concerned with transfer payments in order to ensure that the cutdown in their budgets will accommodate those higher budgets that include transfer payments?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, not necessarily. Some departments do not have transfer payments but, for example, in the case of External Affairs which has a general budgetary responsibility for CIDA we have indicated we would not cut back on foreign aid. There are many examples where we do not necessarily effect this type of guideline. We look at each case on its own merits.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN FORECAST EXPENDITURES AND ESTIMATES AS TABLED

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the great difference between the forecast of estimates and the actual estimates that have been submitted, which I think indicate a possible increase of 50 per cent, can the minister give an explanation why the forecast was so far out of line with the actual expenditures indicated in the estimates?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what the hon. gentleman means by the forecasts being out of line with the estimates. The estimates are the plans based on forecasts. If the forecasts are out of line, obviously the plans would be out of line also.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might be recognized for a further supplementary, following which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, I might indicate that in the estimates which were tabled there is a footnote stating that the forecast is as of December 31, 1973, and then the actual estimates which were tabled are actually over 50 per cent above the forecast. I was asking why the actual expenditures or estimates are so far above the forecast that was made in December?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I understand now. I think that if the hon. gentleman will compare the forecast presented in the main estimates and the total expenditures in the current fiscal year based on the December forecast, because that is when the estimates have to go to the printer, he will find they are substantially the same as the main estimates plus all the supplementary estimates with the exception, however, of one major item, the proposed payments in relation to compensation for the oil freeze. That was not included in any way in the December forecast.

INDUSTRY

INCREASE IN PRICE OF ASBESTOS BY JOHNS-MANVILLE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Could the minister tell this House what action he proposes to take in view of the announcement made by the Canadian Johns-Manville Co. Ltd. of Asbestos, a region well known to the Prime Minister, that it will increase its prices by 10 per cent starting April 1? This increase follows one of 8 to 16 per cent enforced on January 1 which had on the Canadian economy consequences quite easy to figure out.

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to look into the situation referred to by the hon. member. I think I should make clear, however, that although none of us favours the kind of increases we have seen recently on the part of industry, industry too is faced with rising costs including rising material costs.

SOCIAL SECURITY

OLD AGE SECURITY AND CANADA PENSION PLAN PAYMENTS—POSSIBILITY OF REDUCTION OF AGE OF ELIGIBILITY TO 60

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the deep concern and the need of many Canadians between the ages of 60 and 65, and in view of the wide support in Canada for the proposition that pensions should be available at age 60, may I ask the minister whether the government is giving consideration to proposing amendments to the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to establish pensions at age 60 on a voluntary basis?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the hon. member that there are many people below age 60 who are also in need of support. The policy of the government is to provide income supplementation and some form of guaranteed income to all those people in need in this country without regard to age. Therefore I do not plan to introduce a piecemeal amendment of the type the hon. member is proposing.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if his professed concern for all those in need includes concern for those between the ages of 60 and 65?

Mr. Lalonde: Obviously, Mr. Speaker. That is what I said. There are a lot of people in need in this country of all ages and our concern and that of the House, I would think, would be with all those people in need and not just a particular group.

PRICE OF HEATING OIL PURCHASED BY GOVERNMENT—RESULT OF TRANSACTION

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Last Wednesday I asked the minister what price the government had paid for the middle distillate it purchased late last year. He indicated that he did not have the information at that time. Can the minister tell the House today what price was paid for that heating oil?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is the same situation I have outlined last week.

[English]

Mr. Andre: In view of information given to me that the price paid for this heating oil was in fact 52 cents a gallon compared with the retail price of 33 cents a gallon, would the minister indicate what plans his department has for selling this oil, upon which they are now paying storage costs, and disposing of it so as to limit the losses which are already in excess of $5 million?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the hon. member's premises, but we are now looking into various possibilities regarding the use of this surplus oil, due to the fact, as I have already mentioned, that our winter was quite mild.

HOUSING

METROPOLITAN TORONTO—ACTION TO CURB SPECULATION AND GOUGING

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Is the minister aware that houses in the Toronto area are now increasing in price at a rate in excess of $50 per day, seven days a week including Sundays, and is the government prepared to take any action whatsoever to curb the speculation and gouging now taking place in housing prices?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that was outlined in a speech I made in the House two days ago in which I indicated that in the capital allocations of Central Mortgage and Housing areas such as Toronto and Vancouver, where there are either very low vacancy rates or high escalation of costs, would receive priority attention.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, since I cannot get anywhere with the minister and since he does not seem to understand that there is speculation, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that a great deal of the problem is caused by lending institutions financing mortgages or loans on vacant land where the vacant land cost is more than one-third the value of the land and building together? Will the Prime Minister use his influence with the lending institutions to get them to control the speculation in land that is taking place so that the price of housing, at least to some extent, will be controlled against such speculation?

● (1150)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to pass on the recommendation to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hastings.

Mr. Blenkarn: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Hastings who has been trying to ask a question for a few days. Perhaps he should be given the opportunity. I will recognize the hon. member afterwards for a supplementary, but I would hope hon. members would limit supplementaries in order that we may satisfy as many questioners as possible this morning.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REASON FOR INSTALLATION OF HEAVY DUTY LOCK AT BELLEVILLE REGIONAL PAY CENTRE

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In light of the comment by the hon. member for Verdun yesterday that information flows freely from the Unemployment Insurance Commission, will the minister tell me why he found it necessary to instal a special extra strong and heavy duty lock at the Belleville Regional Pay Centre worth over $600, and has he found it necessary to do this at all other centres?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, until I read the hon. member's speech in Hansard a few minutes ago I was not aware of the installation of this lock. That is a matter for the administration of the commission. I have confidence in the judgment of the commission and I would assume it was done for a very good reason. Perhaps the hon. member could give a better reason than I could, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Mississauga and will then recognize the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway.

[Mr. Basford.]

HOUSING

METROPOLITAN TORONTO—ACTION TO CURB SPECULATION AND GOUGING

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, my question is again directed to the Prime Minister. I am afraid he does not understand that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs is concerned only about social housing and does not think about the ordinary guy who wants to buy a house.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. the hon. member has been recognized in order to ask a supplementary. Perhaps he might "streak" to the point.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: Is the Prime Minister aware that the increase in the supply of credit by the banking system, finance companies and mortgage companies is financing speculation in private housing? It has nothing to do with the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and his responsibilities. It is the Prime Minister's responsibility to govern the credit institutions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway.

Has the Department of National Health and Welfare uncovered any recent additional quantities of chocolates produced by the Regent company of Saint-Hyacinthe that are contaminated by Salmonella? If so, is the department ordering the immediate recall of these chocolates?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, all the chocolate produced by Regent has been recalled and production has stopped.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): For the protection of the public, will the government immediately publish the names of firms and retail outlets selling these chocolates, and the brand names under which they are being sold?

Mr. Lalonde: As I have said, we have published the brand names of those—

GRAIN

SPECIAL EFFORT TO MOVE TOUGH AND DAMP GRAIN FROM COUNTRY TO TERMINAL ELEVATORS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In light of the fact that a survey would indicate there is a considerable amount of tough and damp grain in country elevators, particularly in the northern parts of the three prairie provinces, has any special effort been made to move this tough and damp grain to terminal elevators, which are only half full at the present time, particularly with the prospect of the Seaway opening in a few weeks? Is there any such attempt being made at this time?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a very special effort has been undertaken by the Canadian Wheat Board, in co-operation with the railways and the elevator companies, to move the damp and tough grain that exists throughout much of the northern prairies to the terminals as fast as the terminal cleaning and drying facilities can handle the grain. Good progress is being made in that direction.

Mr. Korchinski: May I ask the minister, in light of the results he has had so far with the railways, whether he or the Minister of Transport intends to introduce legislation to force the railways to accommodate the farmers, particularly during the next two weeks before the Seaway opens?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the effort that has gone on has been to make use of the available cars as fast as they can be turned around in order to move this tough and damp grain. This has meant in certain cases that places with grain in good condition have gone somewhat short of service because of the over-all shortage of cars that resulted from the operation of the system this winter.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Transport a question concerning the airplane crash which occurred last week at the Frobisher Bay Airport.

Could the minister indicate to the House whether the electronic or visual beacons in Frobisher Bay were fully operating during the critical period, that is at the time of the landing?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the House is unfortunately aware that a Sabre Liner crashed near Frobisher Bay and that, when the accident occurred, one of the electronic indicators, commonly called beacons, had apparently not been operating for 75 minutes.

Investigators are at the site of the accident. I have received various reports concerning it. Some say that this beacon was not essential and that other means available could have been used. However I prefer to reserve my judgment pending the reception of the investigators' report.

MANPOWER

ADULT RETRAINING—ALLEGED REDUCTION IN NUMBER TO WHOM PROGRAM AVAILABLE AT FANSHAWE COLLEGE, LONDON

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Because of the fact that small businesses in particular are desperate for skilled and semi-skilled labour, and in view of the fact that the general success of the adult retraining program has helped to fill this need, can the minister inform the House why Manpower has decided to reduce the recipients by 13 per cent, or an actual 61 students, attending such a program at Fanshawe College in London, or is this reduction a general Manpower policy in all community colleges across the country?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, such training is, of course, purchased with the co-operation of and through the provincial governments. There has been considerable escalation in the cost of such training which, applied to a general restraint on the budget of Manpower, does result in some reduction in the number of days of training. I am not aware of the particular technical college to which the hon. member refers, but I will certainly examine his remarks in Hansard and try to get him a specific answer in that case.

Mr. Frank: Do I understand the minister to be saying that the provincial governments may be cutting down their budgets? If that is the case, why is there a new school being built in Cornwall when existing facilities are already available in London?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the selection of a particular school is sometimes based on the kind of course that school gives compared with another school. I will check into the details of both situations and will get back to the hon. member. I did not say that provincial governments were necessarily reducing their budgets. I said that the total dollar expenditure is somewhat increased but because costs are going up the number of days of training is slightly reduced.

In view of the fact that the Metro Toronto transportation plan review recommends a light rapid transit system for eastern Metro Toronto, using rights of way of the CNR and the CPR, will the minister state whether he intends to instruct the railways to bend all efforts to make these rights of way available for light urban rapid transit at nominal cost?

I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether his department has been making plans to provide for the construction in Canada of the rolling stock which will be used in such light urban rapid transit systems, considering the fact that such stock is now only available in the United States and its purchase would involve an outlay of tens of millions of dollars in Canadian funds?

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Communications.

In view of the recent statement by the Quebec Minister of Communications that the essence of the Confederation itself is at stake as concerns a record such as that of communications, that the basic issue concerns the conflicting powers of the provinces and the federal government, and that in order to progress we must work outside the federal concept, does the hon. minister believe that it is now time to review the policy of his department on this matter?

IMMIGRATION

POSSIBILITY OF RESCINDING DEPORTATION ORDER AGAINST MRS. DOROTHY HERTZBERG—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It concerns a deportation order served on a former Canadian citizen, a native-born Newfoundlander, Mrs. Dorothy Hertzberg, while an inmate in the mental institution in St. John's, Newfoundland. Can the minister tell the House if that deportation order has been withdrawn and, if so, for what period?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this kind of case is a very unhappy situation, and I am aware of it. I do not like the responsibility it places upon us. I think that technically there was no question that she was in violation of the Immigration Act as it stands now, and that means there was no jurisdiction to change the deportation order or to withdraw it. Having said that, however, and as I have said publicly, I intend to do everything in my power to try to alleviate, in some fashion but within the law, the distress that this causes.

Mr. Carter: Would the minister give the House the assurance that this lady will not be deported while a patient at the mental institution in which she is now confined?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I cannot meet my responsibility and give a guarantee that the deportation order will not be carried out because the law requires me to see that it is carried out. We are, however, in contact and liaison with the medical advisers and we certainly do not intend to precipitate anything that would cause greater difficulties, but it is my responsibility to carry out the deportation order.

VALIDITY OF DEPORTATION ORDER AGAINST MRS. DOROTHY HERTZBERG IN VIEW OF MENTAL CONDITION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wonder how the minister expects the deportation order to be effective if the woman upon whom it is served is incapacitated mentally?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware of the difficulties there, and we are judging them in taking advice and in consultation with the medical authorities.

HARBOURS

VANCOUVER—DECISION OF HARBOURS BOARD TO RECLASSIFY CERTAIN CORPORATIONS CAUSING LOSS OF TAXATION TO MUNICIPALITY—POSITION OF MINISTER

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact the National Harbours Board has been trying to reclassify certain corporations at Centennial, Ballantyne and Lapointe piers, so that the city of Vancouver will lose about half a million dollars annually in municipal taxation, can the minister advise the House whether this somewhat shifty manoeuvre was done with the knowledge and support of his department? The minister has notice of my question.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the notice. Under the law the National Harbours Board can pay grants in lieu of taxes. When there is disagreement between the city and the National Harbours Board, as in this case, there is a right of appeal to the provincial assessment board. This is the place to go in order to have the decision changed.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister assure the House that he is personally looking into this matter which is of considerable concern to the city of Vancouver? The situation has arisen as a direct result of a member of the National Harbours Board entering into so-called contracts of service to get around corporations being classed as occupiers.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, even this morning my parliamentary secretary, the well-known hon. member for St. Boniface, met with the mayor of Vancouver and members of the National Harbours Board.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—REQUEST FOR SETTLEMENT OF CONFLICT BETWEEN LIMOUSINE SERVICE AND PRIVATE TAXIS—POSSIBLE REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received a report or is he aware of the growing transportation difficulties experienced by airline passengers at Toronto International Airport because of the conflict between the limousine service and private taxi services? If so, what recommendation is he going to make to correct this serious situation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I am aware of this very difficult case. Our people are there meeting with the provincial people and trying to solve the problem.

Mr. Gilbert: Would the minister refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications so that they may study it in depth and make recommendations to the minister?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): If in a short time nobody succeeds, maybe that will be the solution.

SOCIAL SECURITY

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST VETERANS BY NOT COUNTING OVERSEAS SERVICE IN ESTABLISHING ELIGIBILITY FOR OLD AGE PENSION

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. May I ask why there was no mention in the throne speech of legislation to end the discrimination against veterans who cannot count their overseas service as time in Canada when applying for the old age pension?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe that this session will show that many bills which were not specifically mentioned in the Speech from the Throne will benefit all Canadians. I hope that one of them will cover the case mentioned by the hon. member.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSSIBLE ELIMINATION OF ISOLATED POST ALLOWANCE FOR EMPLOYEES IN WHITEHORSE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the uncertainty among many hundreds of civil servants in Whitehorse concerning the rumoured cutting off of the isolated post allowance, can the minister assure those government employees now that no such consideration is being given by the Treasury Board and that isolated post allowances in that city will not be denied to such employees?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, fortunately I know something about this because I have just been getting a briefing from the minister responsible, but we have not yet reached the conclusion of our discussion.

Oral Questions

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF REGIONAL PAY DIFFERENTIAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the President of the Treasury Board. Bearing in mind that in certain regions of Canada public servants are being paid approximately 20 per cent less than in other regions, in the interests of national unity I wonder if the minister would indicate whether the government or his department plans to modify or eliminate the regional pay concept?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think it has been adequately demonstrated that the notion of regional pay is productive of rather more satisfaction than attempts to distort the reward relationship between employer and employee in any given area.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF REGIONAL PAY DIFFERENTIAL—POSITION OF DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the minister is not aware of the facts surrounding the regional pay rate problem, perhaps I could put this question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that the original reason for the regional pay rate concept was to keep wages in line with prevailing rates in industry and that in most cases prevailing rates now exceed regional pay rates in a number of areas which I could specify if time permitted, would the minister indicate whether his department has accepted the position that the regional pay rate concept is discriminatory, antiquated and should be eliminated, and is he pressing this position on the government?

● (1210)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, without casting reflection on your office, I find it difficult to reply to that sort of question without being argumentative. I will say, however, with regard to that area which is my own responsibility, that if the hon. member will read Hansard of yesterday he will see that I recognize that in the Atlantic provinces in particular there is a necessity to do everything we can to increase wages in the private sector. In fact, future job incentives will be based on 30 per cent of the total payroll in an industry in the second and third years of its operations.

ENERGY

PRICE OF HOME HEATING OIL IN OTTAWA-HULL AREA—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister give the House any report on the apparent price gouging with regard to home heating oil in the Ottawa-Hull area?

[Mr. Drury.]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the hon. member's questions I have been in touch with the industry in this regard and put forward the view that the price seems to have been excessive in light of the fact that some of the feedstock was based on western oil. I now have a detailed report which I will be glad to furnish to the hon. member, indicating how the additional oil was made up and how that affects cost.

EFFECT OF CLOSING OF TORONTO-OTTAWA PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF REPRESENTATIONS TO KEEP PIPELINE OPEN

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister arising from the question asked by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier. Can the minister tell us why the pipeline between Ottawa and Toronto is to be closed this weekend, what effect this will have on oil prices, if any, whether fuel oil pumped through that pipeline has had a beneficial effect on oil prices and whether the minister is prepared to make representations or issue an order to keep that pipeline open?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the pipeline was used for the purpose of supplying home heating oil to the Ottawa area. We are approaching the end of the home heating season and stocks on hand are more than adequate to meet requirements. That is why the pipeline is being closed down. As I indicated, as a result of the detailed questioning of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier I will be furnishing him with a full report on the matter, and if the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is interested I will be glad to furnish it to him as well.

TRADE

REASON PRIME MINISTER DID NOT MEET HEADS OF COUNTRIES OF EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY DURING RECENT TRIP

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the vital importance of Canada's trade with the European Community and the stated policy of the government to promote trade with the community, will the Prime Minister say why he did not take at least a little extra time when he was in Europe in January to meet with the heads of some of our principal trading partners in view of the fact he has not done so in Europe for some four years now?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the intent of this question is at least hypothetical. The reason why is that negotiations are going on. The Department of External Affairs, through its various representatives abroad, and other departments like the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, through their representatives and their travels abroad, have been pursuing an assiduous path of cultivating this relationship. There is a time when it will be opportune for me to go and bring to a conclusion certain negotiations. At that time I will be pleased to seek the support of the House for one of my prolonged trips.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period. I will recognize the hon. member for Calgary South and the hon. member for Greenwood, and then call orders of the day.

Mr. Bawden: On May 10 last year I asked the Prime Minister about his intentions with regard to going to Europe. He said he was pleased that I had suggested that he should do a bit of travelling. He went on to say that he intended to prepare travel plans for the coming year. Will the Prime Minister say whether he will be going to Europe later this year or whether he is going to wait for the ski season to open again in the Swiss Alps?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR COPIES OF REGULATION RELATING TO INDEPENDENT AND NOMINATED APPLICANTS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. He announced a little more than one week ago a new regulation dealing with the admission to Canada of immigrants, independent applicants and, I think, nominated applicants. I have been trying during the week to get a copy of the actual regulation. Will the minister make it available to groups who are interested in this subject so they can see the actual text of the law which affects them?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, most certainly. I will do so as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Tom Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader whether he has been able to dig up any business for next week? May I also ask if we could have the permission of the House to allow the Minister of Transport to put on record his answer with regard to the case of the missing coins. He has been trying to get the story all week. Would he say, in particular, why this matter was concealed from the government for so long?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know now that the hon. member was quite right and that the railway lost a certain amount of money in the form of nickels. How much I do not know. They want to keep the amount secret because they say they are not sure. These coins were spread over a distance of about 80 miles—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rose on a point of order. I believe the first part of the question was in order as a point of order. Perhaps the other matter might be pursued later. I am not sure whether there will be a reply to the hon. member's point of order.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise the House that Tuesday and Friday of next week will be opposition days in order to complete the number of days which are required by March 26. On Wednesday and Thursday we will be dealing with government legislation. There are three items on the order paper. I hope to give notice of several others today, so it may be that on Monday we can discuss which bills the House would like to deal with. There will be an ample number available for consideration.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, is the government House leader aware that we will give very quick despatch to any matters having to do with inflation and the problems thereof?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader whether the bills, of which he will give notice later today, will include the proposed amendments to the Canada Pension Plan and the War Veterans Allowance Act so that we can get on with those fairly soon?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the notice to be given later today will not include the items my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Pretty slow.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning an answer given to me on March 6 by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. This is a matter of great urgency because it concerns the health of an individual, as supported by correspondence from a director of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. I think it is only proper that an answer should be forthcoming because the physical condition of this man, according to the report of the board of directors of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, is such that urgent action is required on the part of the minister. I would refer the minister to my question and emphasize the urgency.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Thursday, March 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stollery for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

The Address—Mr. J. H. Horner

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in participating in the throne speech debate we should, I suppose, pay particular attention to some of the things in that speech. Of course, it deals with the fact that a minority government is in power in Canada. Minority governments may not be bad. The speech tells us how successful the minority government hopes to be in the coming session.

Minority governments have become the rule rather than the exception in the western world, as is evident from the results of the recent election in Britain. As I said, such governments are not necessarily bad. Some of them might be quite good. In the speech, the government mentions the alienation of western Canada and how it hopes to alleviate or eliminate that alienation. After listening to this morning's news, I realize that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does not intend to alleviate or eliminate the alienation of western Canada. He hopes to use it to his own advantage, since there is a possibility of an election later this year. He wants to use that fact to obtain a majority, so that he need not be so nervous in this House.

● (1220)

The Speech from the Throne makes reference to the age old chestnut of freight rates, and how the government intends to eliminate discriminatory freight rates in western Canada. Because Canada is divided into regions this problem has been with us for 100 years. There is much talk about the Crowsnest Pass rates. I will deal with them at length in a few minutes. However, with regard to eliminating discriminatory freight rates, if western Canada did become a separate country there would no longer be any discriminatory freight rates. The freight would either move at comparable rates or not at all. The railroads would be serving western Canada and not eastern interests as they are today.

The Speech from the Throne touches on many agricultural subjects. It is interesting to note they are geared toward increasing supply. In the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), which is recorded at page 112 of Hansard for March 4, three things are specified. The minister said, and I quote:

The government's food policy has been set, first, to make sure that Canadians continue to have an adequate and dependable supply of wholesome food and, second, to ensure that food continues to be available at prices that are reasonable for the consumer and adequate for the farmer.

The second is nearly the same as the first.

The third objective of the government's food policy is to develop a continuing Canadian supply and increasing production—

All of a sudden the government is obsessed with continuing supply. A few years ago they wanted to limit supply, and there was much talk about supply management. The government is still playing around with that idea. The concept of supply management of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board was illustrated by Operation Lift, a colossal failure which cost western Canada millions and millions of dollars and cost the Liberal party millions and millions of votes. It should cost the minister his seat.

The third interesting point is the much talked about movement of grain. What is the boxcar situation? It is true that cars capable of carrying grain have decreased from

88,000 to 44,000. How many boxcars will be needed to move the 16 million bushels of wheat which the minister said must be moved before the end of July in order to meet our commitment? If the turn around time on a boxcar is three weeks, we would require something in the neighbourhood of 24,000 cars. It is not right to say there is an absolute shortage of cars, but it is right to say that the cars are not moving. There have been many pictures showing boxcars sitting idle on sidings. The railroads have not put their heart into the movement of those cars. Let us analyse why they have not done this.

There is a great lobby taking place on the prairies. The minister in charge of the wheat board has travelled across Canada attempting to convince farmers and farm organizations that the root of the trouble is the Crowsnest Pass rates, how terribly low they are and how they have to be changed. The minister from western Canada is deliberately trying to destroy those rates. He is encouraging the railroads to destroy them. How can they do that? By not moving the grain. No wonder the minister is not getting the co-operation of the railroads. He is encouraging them. He is in bed with them.

A former Minister of Agriculture, a nice fellow from Renfrew, Ontario, was politically astute. He knew the one thing he had to do as Minister of Agriculture. He attacked the railroads. He attacked the CPR. You do not hear the present ministers attacking the railroads. They want to wreck the Crowsnest Pass rates. Many farmers agree that possibly they should be changed.

What do the Crowsnest Pass rates really mean to western Canada? To move 100 pounds of grain from Regina to the Lakehead costs 20 cents under the Crowsnest Pass rates. To ship 100 pounds of grain from a point in the United States directly south of Regina to the Lakehead would cost in the neighbourhood of 72 cents. It would cost two and a half times more, quite a difference. With regard to grain moving from Regina to Vancouver, it would cost 26 cents a 100 under the Crowsnest Pass rates. From a point directly south of Regina to Vancouver, it would cost 96 cents, two and a half times more. With wheat selling at $5.85 a bushel, many farmers say they can afford to pay the extra rates, but it is necessary to move the grain. I am not certain the price of wheat will remain at $5.85 a bushel. However, I am absolutely certain that if the Crowsnest Pass rates are wrecked, the cost of moving grain will be two and a half times greater and that cost will never come down. The farmers must realize this.

The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board is supposed to work for the farmers, not the railroads. He is supposed to make the railroads work for the farmers. However, the minister is in bed with the railroads. He certainly is not concerned about Saskatchewan farmers or, in fact, farmers generally on the prairies. The minister's announcement that wheat used for human consumption within Canada would be frozen at $3.25 illustrates that fact. He stated the government would pay an extra $1 a bushel. The farmers of western Canada must pay an extra 85 cents a bushel on top of that. We hear a lot of talk about the increased price of bread. Canada has become a nation of consumers of bread, so bread is the last thing that should be subsidized. If housewives find bread too expensive, they can always go back to baking their own. That is more economical than buying it in a store, whether it is sliced, wrapped or otherwise.

We should concern ourselves with protein production. We have built up a tremendous feeding industry in the poultry, hog and cattle business. The minister in charge of the wheat board has deliberately raised the price of feed grain, whether it is to the Quebec farmer feeding hogs, the maritime farmer feeding poultry or the western farmer feeding cattle. By deliberately raising the price of feed grains, he has placed the livestock industry in jeopardy. If the government wants to do something meaningful, it should subsidize the cost of feed grains within Canada for the livestock industry. The livestock industry includes the feeding of hogs, poultry and cattle. As I said, Canadians are consumers of protein. They are not huge consumers of starchy foods. The policy in which the minister is engaged is wrong. It should be changed. There is no mention of such a change in the Speech from the Throne.

Recently, there has been a great deal of concern over the huge number of cattle coming into Canada from the United States. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture both made snide remarks this week about this subject. They said "We wanted to put cattle into the marketing bill, but you people over there did not let us." If Bill C-176 had included cattle, that would not have stopped American cattle coming into this country. It would not have helped the present situation one bit. They may be fooling themselves and a few of their Liberal friends across the country with that idle remark, but they are not facing the truth. One becomes used to them not facing the truth in this area.

● (1230)

I read the speech of the hon. member from the New Democratic Party. He talked about the huge profits various companies across Canada have made in the past year. I am not afraid of the word "profit". I like to make a profit—it is the only way I can feed my family and buy them the things they want. But I do not think it is fair to talk in terms of the percentage increase in profits, because if I make a dollar today and two dollars tomorrow my increase will be 100 per cent. And that is what they have ignored when talking in terms of percentage increases. Then again, they have failed to take into consideration the growth in demand for a given product.

The agriculture industry faced a very troublesome year in 1973. This was a year which had all the potential to be one of the great years but it really did not fulfill this expectation; it ended up in chaos. Government spokesman said it was not their fault—that it was the fault of President Nixon in the United States. The minister said the price of wheat might go up, that farmers might expect to get more for it. This has turned out not to be the case; the price of grain is going down. I notice the hon. gentleman smiling. He attempts to blame the railway strike, or the U.S. government—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Or snow.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Or snow. It is always something like that. But the railway strike should never have occurred. The men should have been given the increase they wanted. There was no real reason for that strike. They wanted to prove, I suppose, that they could be tough with the workers. Well, it did not work out for Heath and it did not work out for the government. At all events, there was a prospect of a great year for agriculture, but it turned out not to be so because of government intervention at one time and the failure of government to intervene at another when it should. I think the farmers have learned a lesson not to rely on governments but to rely on their own initiative if governments will allow them to do so.

Another subject I want to talk about is energy. There is a great deal of talk across Canada about it. The speech from the throne presented to the Alberta legislature did not really deal with the question of how expensive energy should be. In its own report, this government said the cost of all forms of energy should be the equivalent of the cost of electricity, and eventually that will be the level. All Canadians should be warned that they cannot continue to expect oil to come from Alberta, or any other part of the country, if a price is fixed which bears no relationship to the world price. Looking at our conventional oil reserves, we find there is only ten or twelve years supply left. Thus, the future really depends on a supply from the tar sands.

Production from the tar sands means a labour intensive industry—it really amounts to mining the sands, and much labour is necessary before oil is produced from them. The cost of labour and materials goes up every year. Inflation has a tremendous effect upon an operation of this kind and the price of oil is, therefore, bound to move up whether we like it or not if these tar sands are to be developed. It is easy to ask where the tar sands have been all this time. The tar sands were first discovered in 1775 and the first survey was carried out in 1875. We are only now talking about developing them, 200 years after their discovery. Naturally, we wish to encourage the development of the tar sands but if we are limited by the short term concept that eastern Canada, or the whole of Canada, for that matter, must be supplied with oil at a price far cheaper than the world price, our efforts to do so will be brought to nothing. Canadians should be well aware that the price will have to fluctuate with the world price if the essential reserves in northern Alberta are to be developed.

The other subject on which I should like to speak briefly is the subject of inflation. Much was made of it in the Speech from the Throne. I myself do not believe in the widely held concept that there is any solution in wage and price controls. They might have worked at one time, when the United States was imposing wage and price controls, but with the United States economy moving toward a greater volume of supply, and in the absence of controls there, I do not believe controls are any answer in Canada. But how is it possible to eliminate the western feeling of alienation when the only controls this government imposes are controls on wheat, controls on feed grain and controls on oil? It seems odd that all the controls the government is interested in imposing should be controls on products coming from western Canada. It may be a case of selective controls, as the Prime Minister suggested the other day. They are selective, all right. They are hurting western Canada, and westerners are very much aware of that fact. The Speech from the Throne makes no mention of any move to eliminate those controls.

Inflation began, I think, when we allowed our dollar to go down in value in relation to world currency. Canada and the United States have devalued their dollar by about 40 per cent since 1971. The result has been inflation, world inflation, and the government from time to time attempts to hide under that umbrella. That is not the only reason we face inflation in Canada. Another reason is wholesale spending on the part of the government. This year's estimates, supplementaries included, indicate an increase in spending amounting to 29 per cent as compared with last year. The increase in the staff of the civil service alone amounted to 25 per cent. These wasteful expenditures only spur inflation to greater heights.

Another factor is the government's failure to control the growth of the money supply. In the past, Canada's money supply increased at the rate of about 8 per cent a year. For the past five years or so it has been increasing at the rate of 19 per cent or 20 per cent, so it is no wonder we face inflation today, given sloppy management of this kind. I suppose if we were all law abiding citizens the country would be able to operate on the basis of very little government. But then, of course, we are not perfect. The fact remains that whatever government is in power it should endeavour to manage the affairs of the country more or less efficiently, and the government presently in power has failed to do so.

The Prime Minister suggested that if the income tax amendments had gone through in the right way, all the ills which confront us would have been cured. I remind hon. members that when the white paper on taxation was introduced, the then minister of finance told us it reflected almost in full the recommendations of the Carter Commission—that a buck is a buck. That was his concept. The Carter Commission provided no real answers, in my opinion, to Canadian economic problems.

I disagree strongly with the concept that a buck is a buck. From time to time we see high rates of unemployment in Canada, yet I repeatedly hear that in all parts of Canada we cannot get people to go to work. Surely, some of the brilliant professors we have in our society should examine this phenomenon. Why cannot we get someone to go to work when we have high unemployment? Farm labour is short, the fisheries are short of labour, yet we cannot get anyone to go to work in those industries.

Why is this, Mr. Speaker? It is because people are not given the right incentives by society. I have listened to many TV personalities saying that no one wants to do menial tasks any more. Even the Prime Minister told our young people that they did not have to work. Dairy farms are going out of business because no one wants to milk cows. Four dairy farms a day are going out of business in the province of Ontario and about four dairy farms a week are going out of business in the province of Alberta, some of them major concerns.

I suggest that tax incentives should be offered to encourage people to do menial tasks. The present system really discourages people from doing any real work in our society today. There is a great tendency among people to go after what are called the white collar jobs, the easy or soft jobs in society, leaving much of the productive work undone. This, too, gives impetus to the kind of inflationary psychology that is abounding in Canada today. We must change our whole tax structure, but not in the manner Carter suggested it should be changed or in the manner the Prime Minister suggested it should be changed. We must change it to give incentives to get people to work, and this will slow or curtail the rate of inflation. We must have more efficient government and less wasteful spending.

[Mr. Horner (Crowfoot).]

In addition the railroads must move our produce to market. The Crowsnest pass rates were set about 50 years ago, but does that necessarily mean they are inappropriate today? If the railways want to move grain efficiently, they can. It is interesting to note that in the years when the railways moved large amounts of grain, their profits were highest. For example, take the years 1971 and 1972, or even go back to 1966 when the railways hauled 800 million bushels of grain and the profits of both CNR and CPR were at a record level. So just because these rates were set a long time ago does not necessarily mean they are too low today.

The railroads are attempting to force a break in what is often referred to in this House as the Magna Carta of western Canada, and it is really shameful that the hon. member in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and who represents a western constituency is really assisting the railroads to break this long held Magna Carta of western Canada. He is not worried about movement of grain because he fully believes that the price of grain will rise even higher two or three months from now, and that if grain is kept on the farms it will be worth more. Therefore, he does not really worry whether we meet our commitments or not. He is attempting to accommodate the railroads, I suppose hoping that this will further his political career and his climb to the top in the Liberal party. I guess that is his objective; he must have some motive since it is very difficult for a westerner to understand his actions. Why would he work in this way unless he has some ulterior motive such as this?

I am not going to take up any more time in this debate, Mr. Speaker. I urge the minister to divorce himself from the railroads and to get back to serving the people who sent him here as well as the grain farmers of Saskatchewan. I ask him to work towards seeing that they move their products to market. If we lose our present sales we might never recapture them in years to come and somebody else will take them. We must remain a major supplier of grain throughout the world, and we must retain our dependability for supplying grain to the world.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the Speech from the Throne I should like to say a word, first of all, of congratulation and welcome to the new holder of the office of Governor General of Canada. I think we have been singularly fortunate in the quality of the people who have occupied this office, and I certainly see in the present incumbent the maintenance of this very fine tradition of service to this country.

I should like also to congratulate the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) on their moving and seconding of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Their contributions were noteworthy indeed and have begun this session of parliament in an auspicious way.

I am particularly pleased to participate in this debate, Mr. Speaker, because of the nature of the document to which we are giving consideration. The throne speech is a positive and constructive document and holds substantial promise for all Canadians. It is a document which I believe will prove to be truly historic to western Canadians—historic in the fundamental way that it commits this nation to the spirit of the Western Economic Opportunities Conference and to the task of pressing toward the full achievement of the crucial objectives identified and espoused in Calgary last July.

The western conference, which was conceived of and called by this government, and in particular by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), provided an essential national forum for the expression of basic western concerns. The government of Canada and the entire nation were watching and listening, and hearing a good many things about the vast western portion of this country which perhaps were never fully understood before. The grievances, the inequities, the discontent, the so-called alienation, are real. In western Canada the problems have been growing steadily for some considerable length of time. This goes back through a succession of governments involving different political stripes.

Let me take the House back to just over a year ago now. The throne speech of January, 1973 which opened the first session of this parliament represented a key breakthrough for westerners in the quest to re-establish for themselves a new role within confederation. That throne speech gave fundamental recognition to the problems lying at the root of their discontent—formal and concrete recognition for the first time in the history of this nation. That throne speech, too, committed Canada to doing something about those problems, and the first step was to be a conference on western economic opportunities.

The Prime Minister invited the western premiers to come together to discuss with him and with other representatives of the government of Canada the basic things that had to be done to build for the west a proper place in Canada's great nationhood. In preparation for that historic meeting the resources of this land were brought by this government to focus powerfully upon all aspects of the problem. Literally thousands of man hours were devoted to the job; nearly every department and agency at the national level has been involved.

Why was this, Mr. Speaker? Because this government, the Trudeau government, was determined, and remains determined, to get at the roots of that thing we call western alienation, to tackle the real causes and to eliminate them. As the Prime Minister has so aptly described this federal initiative, no other single project, outside of wartime, so fully occupied the time, the talents and the resources of the government of Canada. The throne speech confirms our dedication and our continuing work.

● (1250)

The Calgary conference touched upon a broad spectrum of issues: The need for regionally sensitive financial institutions; the need for a more decentralized approach for the government itself; the need for a broadly based, stable and productive agricultural sector; the need to diversify economic activities in the west and to build new industrial strength upon the west's great resource and energy base, and the need to develop a fair and impartial system of transportation free from inequities and discrimination. In all these areas we have come a long way since last July, and the Speech from the Throne at this time discloses further initiatives.

We are in the course of evolving and implementing a new national policy. The task is not a simple one. The answers to a hundred or so years of western dissatisfaction are not found easily and painlessly. If they were, perhaps even some Conservative administrations of days gone by might have found and applied them. Tories always seem to have the sure, quick, simple ready-made remedy, at least while they are not in government and not at all responsible for trying to do the job.

It is rather interesting, I believe, to look back to July 1973 and to examine just how far we have come in the last seven and a half months with these western economic questions and initiatives. As a westerner it is exciting for me to see the progress that has in fact been made, in concrete and specific fact, and to look ahead to the greater goals highlighted in the Speech from the Throne.

In Calgary we talked of decentralization, and we see a move toward decentralization of governmental operations highlighted in the proposed centering in Saskatchewan of the western regional headquarters of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, a move that will reverse the proportion of persons in that department serving in Ottawa and in the rest of the country with approximately 70 per cent of that department spread out in different parts of the country. This decentralization is not just a paper thing, not just a matter of persons being located out in the regions, but a move which places real decision making responsibility up to the level of an assistant deputy minister who is to be located there.

I might also mention the additional location of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce operations throughout the country and other moves that have taken that direction. We see a move toward a federal business development bank which is to be more sensitive to the various interests of the regions of this country, to be located more effectively in them. We see also moves on the part of the Department of Supply and Services, a continuing exercise in an attempt to spread purchasing in this country throughout the different parts, as well as a move toward allowing for participation of the provinces in the banks throughout this country to promote decentralization of our banking institutions. We see, too, the pledge for further processing of resources being carried a step further with the introduction of the export-import act, which will allow for the control of movement out of this country of our resources in an unprocessed state, if that is required, to encourage further processing here. That must be of particular interest to a resource-rich area such as western Canada.

In the area of transportation policy, the throne speech pledges an end to the discrimination in freight rates which has aggravated westerners for so long. Work is well underway toward that end. A federal-provincial committee of officials has been hard at work since last July, and there have been a series of meetings regularly at the ministerial level, led by my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand). Something in the order of 160 references of specific rate problems or discriminations have been made to the Canadian Transportation Commission for review. I have indicated that, as the Minister of Justice, I will be prepared to intervene on behalf of the government in rate cases where that is necessary in order to assist individuals in obtaining justice in respect of claims they may have. There will be further cost disclosures, so much desired by provincial governments. The federal government has decided to move toward more adequate disclosures of the facts and background so that the true case of freight rates can be known.

We have made a good beginning in this work, but the work must be pressed on. It is our purpose to press ahead with steps in many directions in respect of transportation and, indeed in the handling of our grain. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) talked about our problems in handling grain. Of course, he neglected to note the fact that with the steps we have taken in the past years regarding the block system, coordinators at the terminals, with additional hopper cars and an attempt to turn around trains as rapidly as possible, with the existing system we have in three successive years set three successive records in the volume of grain moved. For three years in a row we have moved more grain out of the prairie region into export and domestic markets than was available from production in any of those particular years. In each of those three years our disposition of grain exceeded the actual production of grain, and this was done with the transportation system we now have.

In this year, with all the difficulties again which have beset us, we likely once again will move and dispose of more grain from the prairie region than was grown in the last year of production. That is what is happening with the transportation system we have. But we are not satisfied and we will be taking additional steps to go on beyond that. We will not be taking them in a way which attempts to seek only political advantage from a particular situation in a particular location, trying to run in all directions at once as the hon. member for Crowfoot always does so marvellously.

In connection with the subject of agriculture, the throne speech bears the clear imprint of the Western Economic Opportunities Conference. My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), dealt thoroughly with this area in his remarks to the House earlier this week. The activities planned by this government in connection with agriculture comprises a list that is impressive and extremely important, and shows our determination to improve the lot of the farmer, the great producer in this country, and to improve also the situation of the consumer by giving him security of supply. This can only come about in the long run if there is a fair and decent return for our farmers who will produce the food for the consumer. May I call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

[Mr. Lang.]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, just before the adjournment I had indicated that my colleague the Minister of Agriculture had reviewed a good number of measures which are proposed in the Speech from the Throne to deal with particular problems of agriculture and food production in Canada. I do not want to go into the details of this list or of these actions again. However, I do want to refer to one of them in particular. I should like to deal with the general approach of the government and with its intentions in regard to stabilization in the area of agricultural production.

● (1410)

We have proposals to put before the House in connection with stabilization of animal production as it relates to the production of meat. We intend also to bring back before the House the proposal in regard to stabilizing income for grain farmers to offset the vagaries which can occur because of the ups and downs that are almost inevitable in an export oriented grain market. Hon. members will, of course, appreciate that this is an old friend, one which could have been in place now, to provide protection for farmers in the grain producing region of the country, to protect producers against downturns in income, but it was blocked by a variety of tactics adopted by the opposition in a previous parliament. Now, we propose to come back and give the opposition parties a chance to repent, and to see this important form of protection for farmers put in place.

In the days when it was first introduced, members of the opposition tended to cry that it was stabilization of poverty, although as a matter of fact it was intended as a level of protection related to the returns to farmers over a period of time. This measure was designed to put cash in their hands if income took a significant down turn because of prices or, more likely, because of changes in volume of crops in the rest of the world were especially good when compared with the average year, or especially when compared with a bad year. The current level of grain income in 1973 and 1974 flowing into the prairie region shows how silly was the cry respecting stabilization of poverty at that time, and makes it perfectly clear to everyone why a program such as we propose would be a significant element in the days ahead.

We propose, in coming back to the plan, to introduce a voluntary feature, so that if any farmer finds he does not want to be a part of the program he will have an opportunity to opt out of it, although I certainly hope that all hon. members in all parties will bring the advantages of such a program to the attention of individual farmers so that this option is not widely used by those who, in the long run, would find it hurt them to get out of the plan. We have been working on the program as it was designed to be passed into law in 1971, and there will be some specific detailed alterations in it as a result of that work.

The work on stabilization, Mr. Speaker, the work on grain generally, from the purchase of hopper cars with money spent on behalf of the people of Canada, the move toward two-price wheat, work on the LIFT program, and work on extending credit for the Canadian Wheat Board—all of these items in the grain area are a monument marking the constant determination of the government to take steps, as those steps are required, to improve the position of western Canada, and in particular of the grain industry. Those steps, and other things done since the Western Opportunities Conference, show that the government is fully committed to the improvement of conditions for western Canada, and to a new national policy which will meet the aspirations of western Canada.

There are those in politics in Canada who would like to suggest that in some fashion the government is prepared to write off the west from a political point of view. To them, and to all hon. members of the House I wish to say that nothing could be farther from the truth. It is the intention of the government to pursue its long and historic role of attempting to find the policies and programs which are satisfactory and fair to all sections of the country. It is true that the job we face in regaining support for our party in the prairie region may be a long and hard one, and it is going to be a longer and a harder one because of the simple fire power that is possessed by other parties. I stress that that fire power is sometimes pretty simple. It takes false situations and distortions, and spreads them about, stirring up discontent, which it then seizes on in order to make ground in a political manner.

It feeds on the kinds of things we heard from the hon. member for Crowfoot just before he sat down earlier today, when he asked wasn't it just like this government that we have controls on wheat, feed grain and oil. But what are the facts, Mr. Speaker? The hon. member mentioned feed grains, and I asked what did he mean by speaking of controls on feed grains? I know of none that are holding down the price of feed grains in terms of returns to farmers in the prairie region. But, of course, this will not stop the hon. member for Crowfoot, and other hon. members opposite, because the simple truth of the matter is that we can never expect them to hold off if they feel that they can stir discontent in the prairie region in an attempt to gain political advantage.

In the case of oil, we have had discussions concerning what a fair price for oil ought to be when a free market no longer exists throughout the world. I suggest to hon. members opposite, particularly to those from the west, that there is no sound reason why we in Canada have to accept a cartel price imposed from abroad, and definitely not any more than we would want to accept a cartel price imposed from inside our country. But that is quite a different question from wage and price controls. Incidentally, I was interested to note that the hon. member for Crowfoot disagrees with his party leadership in recognizing the futility of controls, and he said so directly.

Where are the controls on the price of wheat, Mr. Speaker? In fact what we have is a stabilized price, with a stipulated floor price and a maximum of $5 in terms of returns to the producers. It is quite wrong to categorize a floor-ceiling arrangement as if it were only a stipulated ceiling price. It is as a result of the $5 price that the consumer in Canada is benefiting by some 70 cents or 80 cents with respect to the grain he purchases, just as the producers benefited when, during a long period of time, we held the price of wheat in Canada above the world wheat price when that price fell below the levels set out in the International Grains Agreement. In the same way the consumer, in times ahead, may pay more in terms of bread if the international price falls below the present floor. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not a control. That is not a matter to which the hon. member can point as though it were in some way contrary to the interests of western Canada. This is an example of the kind of difficulty that will exist when we are attempting to demonstrate to the people of western Canada the firmness of the government's intention to meet the aspirations of western Canada with a new national policy.

I say that what has been done in the case of grains, the fantastic turn around in that area in recent years, and the tremendous efforts of the government will stand as a monument, as evidence of what we are doing, and will be doing in pursuing the objectives and spirit of the Western Economic Opportunities Conference.

When the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) was speaking the other day in this debate he once again started his speech, as he has done for some four years now, with some remarks about the LIFT program. I always find it interesting that opposition members, in seizing on one thing which they feel is simple to point to as an error, have to go back four years to 1970 to find something in the grain area. They ignore the hopper cars, the two-price wheat, and the other things that we have done. The trouble with picking on this particular program is their error in how they treat it. Once again, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar did what opposition members are so likely to do. He suggested that the LIFT program discouraged the planting of barley and rapeseed, forgetting that it was directed only in relation to wheat at a time when we had 1,100,000,000 bushels of wheat on hand, with a new crop ready to come off the land. In fact that program encouraged people who wanted to grow anything to go into barley and rapeseed. In fact, Mr. Speaker, we moved to record volumes of barley and rapeseed.

Through that program we were allowed to cope with the tremendous amount of wheat we had on hand, in elevators and on the farms, and one result of that was that we could move other grain such as rapeseed and barley more efficiently. This allowed us to achieve record volumes of exports that year and in each of the succeeding years, so that for four years in a row we have exported more than we produced. In those four years, Mr. Speaker, we have moved grain out of this country at a fantastic rate and still, by next August 1, we will have in reserve about the amount of grain which the prairie premiers last July said was the right amount to have in reserve in this country. That is four years after LIFT, Mr. Speaker, and after four years of exporting more than we have produced.

● (1420)

Those are the facts about the program; it was a program which allowed us to revise the quota system; to put the emphasis on marketing and move from an old pattern of inefficiency and ineffectiveness to a sensible system with information to the farmer and production by the farmer. From 1970 until the year which we are approaching, the farmer has not felt that he wanted to build up his stocks of grain to the extent that he would fertilize to the degree that was wise from a crop production point of view. It is only as 1974 approaches, and to some extent in 1973, that he wants to fertilize and once again increase production, meeting the challenge put to him in four successive years of selling more than is produced.

I understand why the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) is sensitive on this subject because when I go to his constituency, as I have in the years since 1970, I find that many a farmer who listened to him in those days—as when they listened to the hon. member for Crowfoot—felt that the right thing to do then was to ignore LIFT; to do the opposite. That was the advice given by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar but when I examined his own farming operations I found that he did not take that advice himself but followed the LIFT program and benefited from it. If he had given that kind of advice to his constituents he would not now have on his conscience the advice that he did give them.

In this Speech from the Throne we see not only these great matters which interest me from the point of view of my responsibility as minister in charge of the Wheat Board and a member of parliament from western Canada, but we see also that significant steps are being taken in the area of improving our legal and judicial system. Once again we will have before the House a series of criminal law amendments. These are important enough in themselves but perhaps they are more important as a process to which we are committed, that of a regular, ongoing reform of our criminal law.

We do not intend to wait four, eight or twelve years for changes as has been done in the past, but to respond on a more or less annual basis to the need that is felt, to bring our law up to date, to improve it or to remove anomalies from it. We will have before this House what amounts to an omnibus bill to keep up the work. We will also watch the reports from the Law Reform Commission which are continuing to flow, and will attempt to make use of the valuable advice and information that they contain in order to continue the process of law reform which this government has carried forward with such vigour in the last half dozen years.

We will also have a very important piece of legislation with the introduction of a Rights and Interests Commission at the federal level. I see a commission which will work effectively with, and as a counterpart to, those commissions which exist in the fields of human rights and ombudsman's work throughout the provinces. Work is being done in the provinces in these areas which are within provincial jurisdiction and we intend that these commissions will have a complementary body which can work in those areas, as a federal commission, which cannot be covered by existing commissions. These commissions will work closely together.

The federal commission will have as a major role the promotion of research, information, education and enlightenment in the field of human rights. It is through better understanding and a greater willingness on the part of people to be fair to others that human rights are best protected. We can create legal techniques to enforce the rights and improve the position of individuals, but in the end it is through the understanding of the great majority of our people, and the willingness of individuals to be fair and fair-minded that those rights are best protected.

This, Mr. Speaker, is my view of my own responsibilities and of the very exciting and vigorous amendments which will come before the House in this session as this government attempts to continue putting before parliament and the people of Canada legislation which makes and keeps Canada the great country it is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that I have had the opportunity of listening to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) take part, as have many ministers, in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. As I heard of his great concern about the gap in credibility between western people and the government here in Ottawa, and as I heard him reread the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) which listed all the things which have been done since the Western Economic Opportunities Conference of last summer, I tried to picture in my mind what it all represented.

I thought of that doctrine of the middle ages whereby you should spend your time on great academic matters. The only picture that came to mind was that of a mosquito with a wooden leg trying to bore a hole through a dill pickle. That is the measure of effectiveness of the answers of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Justice to the gap that exists between western Canadian thinking and to the actions of this government. Another picture that flew through my mind was that of a pygmy sandpapering the side of an elephant—the problem is so big. With these mosquitoes and pygmies running around talking this middle ages sterile nonsense that we have heard today, it shows better than I can how that gap will never close.

The minister spoke about his responsibilities in connection with grain and mentioned the grain stabilization bill that failed. I say to him very bluntly that whenever he brings into this House a grain stabilization bill that does not make it necessary or mandatory for the farmer to receive the share of the money he put into the fund dependent on the whims of a few civil servants, then the farmer will look at it. Any type of stabilization bill brought into this House must be based on a formula that everyone knows in advance and not, as the minister once said, upon farmers doing what they are told in order to get money out of their own fund. I think that indicates some of the reaction he is going to get from western Canada before he introduces the stabilization bill. Base it on a formula which ensures that the farmer who puts money in has the right to draw it out in certain circumstances.

The minister is sensitive to LIFT. If he wants to bridge the gap between the west and Ottawa all he has to do is say to the west and any others, "I listened to the wrong advisers; I goofed when I recommended to the government that we restrict the production of western grain and when we paid farmers not to grow things." The whole world knows that this winter between 10 million and 50 million people are in various stages of starvation. How many died we do not know. Every government which took advice on restricting production in a hungry world has committed a moral crime that people are not going to forgive. The minister is so inflexible that he is not going to bend his knees and say "I listened to the wrong people". Why does he not say that to the farmers, so that he can say, "You have heard the truth from my own lips?" If I were caught beside a cherry tree which had been chopped down and I had an axe in my hand and my old man asked me what happened, I would tell the truth. That is what the government must learn to do.

● (1430)

I did not enter this debate in order to teach modern methods of thinking to the Minister of Justice. That would be impossible. I entered it, in part, because I want to pay my respects to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I say to those hon. members that I recognize the honour the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has paid them in allowing them to move and second this important and traditional motion. Speaking as an older person and member, I always look at those speeches to see if any new contribution has been made by those bright members. I think the congratulations extended by hon. members to those two speakers are well founded.

I think we should be aware, in this debate, of speeches made in the House which are different from the ordinary, that is to say, unusual. Such a speech was made one week ago by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche): I do not know how many members have read his speech or how many listened to him in the House. His speech was unusual. He bared his soul and thoughts as he dealt with the sickness that is evident in the western world today. I commend the hon. member's speech to members of the House and to the country. Not all may agree with his sentiments, but it should be noted that there is at least one member who is groping for the truth and the way ahead.

I, too, want to speak about the malaise gripping ministers who are supporters of governments adhering to the western style of democracy. This malaise can be seen in Japan, France, Italy, Israel, the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. The malaise is a common denominator in those countries. People in them are looking at their leaders and asking what is wrong. They say, "Our leaders do not seem to know what they are talking about and, despite all the pronouncements made by the use of public relations experts, what they say still does not ring true." What governments say has little bearing on the deep worries of individuals. So, my criticisms of this government today are aimed not merely at this government. They are aimed at the ministerial malaise which grips western style democracies.

I do not know if I am right. This I do know: ever since the war, ever since the great penetration by governments into the affairs of private individuals, we have developed, all of us, a charming, amiable, dedicated but determined bureaucracy which, more and more, has run the countries of the western world and which has left to members of parliament and to cabinets the task of making their announcements ex cathedra.

This process is of concern to me, a member of parliament in a western style democracy. On several occasions in this House, in 1966 and 1967, and again last September 13, I spoke about two or three problems in this area and about ways of solving those problems. Let me begin by referring to an article written in the magazine Executive by one of the older and more experienced members of the news gallery, Douglas Fisher, who, in more than one way, is one of the more substantial members of the gallery. I think most members know that Douglas Fisher at one time used to sit in this House in opposition as a member of the NDP. I shall refer to his views about the role of ministers of the Crown in the present government, and to that of deputy ministers.

Apparently, it was the dream of the socialist from the Montreal milieu to set up a substructure when he was in power, and to employ experts in that substructure. He wanted to leave all decision making to the bureaucrats within the substructure, so that politicians would only need to take their advice, run the country accordingly and all would be well. Apparently this structure did not work too well. It has fallen apart. Actually, the election of 1972 ended its role, and now we have a government that is no longer run by the bureaucracy or a government in which one bureaucracy watches another; according to Douglas Fisher, we have a government in which ministers of the Crown are flying by the seats of their pants. I welcome that. I would rather see a minister with common sense speaking for the people he represents and making decisions on the basis of the facts before him than the horrendous system of bureaucracy, of committee on committee, trying for years and years to arrive at a consensus.

In this modern day when conditions are changing so rapidly and becoming so complex, the middle ages approach to running government is obsolete, and has been for some time. So, I welcome that article by Douglas Fisher. I commend it to members on the government side as well as to members on my side, who some day soon hope to make up the government party. We are living in important times and we shall need to make individual and important decisions to overcome problems.

I wish to add to my remarks of September 13. There are three areas of concern in the economic field. They are of concern to all thinking politicians in the world, regardless of the form of government they support. What are these concerns? First, economic advisers of governments, of both the so-called free enterprise countries and of the socialist countries, have no model, no framework for decisions dealing with a new phenomenon that has developed noticeably since the war, the phenomenon called cost-push. That is something which concerns ministers of socialist governments as well as those of free enterprise countries. I will return to that subject.

Second, all governments, regardless of their political outlook, are worried about the threat posed by huge capital accumulations or concentrations which endanger the precarious monetary and fiscal systems we have evolved for running the world. I am referring, of course, to the $120 billion odd in Eurodollars. It does not matter how these Eurodollars were accumulated. They are now a threat to world economic stability. In addition, of course, there is a great concentration of money in the hands of oil producing countries, many of them Arab countries. This concentration of capital which has no easy access to investment has brought the world into the position where it has never been closer to worldwide recession than in the last year or so. We are still in that position. I will return to that problem.

Third, what is even more serious is that economists in Canada, Japan, Europe, the United States and elsewhere do not have models of economies which take cognizance of the fact that the world no longer has a surplus of every form of commodity. Since the last war, the fact has become increasingly clear that in the next century or two we are going to be facing a series of shortages in strategic commodities that affect the whole economic stability of the world. We had a little taste of the phoney oil shortage of this past year, but I will come back to that so I can maintain my remarks in a coherent fashion.

● (1440)

Let me briefly review my first point, the cost-push inflation problem. Cost-push is simply made up of a number of factors that force costs up and have the effect of raising the price of the end product. The rapidly increasing costs of government in all our western countries is the number one cost-push force. The deliberate policy on the part of western governments of forcing up the interest rates as an attempt to carry out Keynesian doctrine at a time when that was something they should not have been doing is the second cost-push factor of major importance forcing up prices. It is this clownish behaviour of the stop and go money supply.

As several speakers have already mentioned in this debate, for years our money supply was a constant. I recall sitting on the treasury benches for five and a half years. The money supply remained almost the same, around $13 billion. It now goes up at the fantastic rates of 15 or 20 per cent a year so that we now have over $50 billion in circulation, yet the amount of goods in circulation is not five times greater. Obviously, there has been some misuse or bad use of the technique of issuing the money. This has created a tremendous upward pressure on prices.

There is also the fact of municipal and provincial governments allowing land costs around our cities to get out of control so the speculator has had a field day. This has added tremendously to the cost-push at the centre of industry around our cities which has the great impact of higher prices. At the end of the list is always the labour cost. The labouring men who live in the cities naturally have to fight to keep up with all of these costs and, with their organizational strength, try to keep ahead of the rat race. God help the unorganized labourer or person on fixed income.

These factors of cost-push are well known. This government has set an example of exacerbating all of it. Every time we get into a situation like that of 1969 when it was said that prices were rising too fast, we get the same medicine. It is as if those price increases were caused by a demand factor when they were in fact caused by cost-push. I am reminded of a story I have told many times concerning youngsters going into an apple orchard. Never having seen an apple orchard before, they gorged on the apples. One or two of the group got a bellyache. I can recall the lady of the house calling in the whole bunch of us. Bellyache or no bellyache, we all got the same medicine which was designed to get rid of any problems of the stomach very quickly. This is what the government has done, not only in the last five years but the last 25 years.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

As the Porter royal commission made very clear, it is a matter of wrong fiscal and monetary policies. This has been well discussed on many occasions. I want to point out again that some of us tried to make positive proposals in arguments with civil servants. I am not too immodest to point out that I have tried to suggest positive proposals. I made a series of remarks on three or four separate occasions over the past 10 years in the House about the necessity of refining the Lord Keynes doctrine in a country like Canada with so many regions, something which has been almost completely ignored by the government for the past 15 years. In our model of handling our economic system, we need to have some recognition of the regional nature of our country and the varying demands of industry. In a moderate industrial strategy where you strengthen the ones with the best chance of succeeding, you bring in the question of the social purpose of the monetary and fiscal policy. This all boils down to the fact we have to accede to the principle of selectivity.

I will now turn to the question of timing. I read the speech which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) made the other day. He said on three days of the week the opposition is expansionary and on three days it is restrictive in monetary and fiscal policies. He is quite right in that criticism because with modern monetary and fiscal policies, you have to go both ways at once when dealing with a country as big as Canada. When you are in a boom situation in Montreal, you can be stagnating in Toronto. We are stagnating in the areas north of Toronto and in Montreal all the time. You need to have conflicting policies in theory working at the same time.

It is as true as I am standing here that when you have to deal with a country with at least 17, 18 or 19 regions, there have to be policies that are different and they can be the opposite at different places at the same time or even in the same area. However, I do not want to repeat all those types of positive proposals in this one speech. I have made it in the House on three or four occasions. I know that the Minister of Finance and his officials have read it. However, I do not see evidence of any thought being given to it in the form of action by this government.

The second problem that I mentioned is the danger to the world of these concentrations of capital. I am not only referring to the Eurodollars. The finance ministers of the world and their officials still have not put anything forward about funding those Eurodollars and getting this floating danger off the backs of reserve funds of the various nations of the world. More important is the tremendous buildup in the Arab nations. Some Arab and African nations can put the money they receive for their oil back into investment in their own country, but many of them cannot such as Kuwait, Abu Dhabi, Saudi Arabia and possibly Iraq. There is no possibility of the billions of dollars pouring into their coffers being used in a prudent way so quickly in their countries. Therefore, it is a job for all thinking people in the western world.

Japan is going to be very short of oil energy sources for an indefinite time, as will western Europe. The United States is moving into a period of shortage, but will, I think, be out of it in about 10 years. There are some surplus nations. These problems seem very remote. Imagine a group of nations 12,000 miles away having $60 billion, $80 billion or $200 billion of surplus investment money. This does not have anything to do with Canada? No country is more under the gun than Canada. We are an export nation. We depend on the stability of the monetary and fiscal systems of world nations, both domestically and internationally, to keep up world trade.

● (1450)

I say to Canadians who wish to give the proper thought to such a situation that the danger of a recession in Canada and in the United States is not on the horizon at the present time. There is too great a demand for goods. But there is a danger at the international level. However, it should not be without some pleasant aspects. Hundreds of billions of dollars, almost one hundred billion dollars are available for investment. And what have we in Canada to contend with? What is the difficulty? Well, it amounts to a difference in attitude. Let us be frank and realistic. The Japanese are frightened of an invasion of cheap money from the Arab countries. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, the reaction of the United States government today if there were an offer backed by Arab money to take over Ford—seven billion dollars in one swoop? The attitude of the Americans, of the Japanese and ourselves has to change. All these surplus money nations can get for their money is about 3½ per cent or a little more in Swiss banks. Our countries take the attitude that Arab money is dangerous. One can imagine civil servants saying: By God, if we bring 5 per cent money into Canada it will ruin our high interest policy.

Today, thousands of Canadians are in desperate need of homes. They are wired into this 10 per cent interest rate which our masters on the fiscal side have decreed they must accept. There is cheap money available but it is accompanied by dangers. We have to pay it back in 20 years from now at the exchange rates prevailing at that time. This means we must work hard and export sufficient to keep our dollar in relation to those currencies. But that is not impossible. There is nothing wrong with borrowing money providing bonds for us to develop our economy in Canada. Canada's interest lies in owning the equity; we want to own our country. We can soon pay off the bonds.

Still on this subject, the newly developing nations are in tremendous need of investment capital. However, they can only absorb it at a certain rate—it is difficult to get huge amounts into those countries quickly. Machinery is lacking at both national and international levels to encourage the speeding up of the movement of needed capital into, say, Pakistan or Indonesia or Malasia. It is true a World Development Bank has been set up, but in my book it is really a delaying mechanism. I do not see why Canada and other countries which are not suspect in the eyes of the world cannot build up the necessary machinery taking advantage of the tremendous know-how possessed by Canadian companies allied with the enormous investment funds belonging to the Arabs.

Such an organization should be capable of acting quickly so that part, at least, of these huge sums which are overloading the monetary system and threatening the whole stability of the world monetary structure can be usefully employed. As I say, Canada would need to adopt domestic and foreign policies designed to keep our dollar in relation to the value of other currencies. But this is not beyond possibility. In other words, the problems affecting us here are mostly monetary and fiscal. I am warning Canadians that if we do not get with it there could well be a world wide recession.

I turn, now, to another point—the tremendous change which has to come over the minds of the experts who guide our governments in the formulation of policies. We have no model for handling the problems raised by a worldwide shortage of commodities. All the economic doctrines and theories which guide our policies are based on the fact that there will always be an abundance of commodities and is concentrated on the use of labour and capital. Somebody, or a group of people, has to devise a model to cope with the likelihood of the world being short not only of oil but of steel, fibres and other key materials. By the year 2000 the Americans alone, using the prices of a year ago, will be importing minerals at the rate of some $60 billion a year. We shall be facing a tremendous shortage of fibres, that is, wood. I know these things, because warnings have been given out for years. This is all the more reason for putting some original thinking into designing an economic model to cope with the situation when it arises.

I come back to the argument by Douglas Fisher. I am simply saying that even though I give warning of these dangers I have great confidence in the fact that the human mind, once faced with a challenge, has always responded. We do not necessarily have to wait for another Lord Keynes to come up with a model to solve our problems as he did in connection with a demand-pull type of inflation in the thirties. Among ministers, among members of the opposition, among parties of all types in all the western democracies I believe there is a tremendous fund of commonsense, an ability to sit down and do the type of thinking which has to be done to produce new ideas for testing out. When I hear supporters of the government yelling "tell us your policy" as they have done for the past year, I know there is no thinking there. The same sort of thing is happening in every country. It is in these circumstances that governments say: Inflation is worldwide and we cannot do anything about it. This is being said by French ministers in Paris, by British ministers in London and by Japanese ministers in Tokyo. It is the same attitude as ministers took in 1929, and as a result, we spent ten years—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have just one sentence to go.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have said I am optimistic. We can avoid an international recession if we use the brains we have—the resourcefulness of our civil servants and of our elected members. I have faith that in the monetary field they can produce the ideas if only they will get down to the job of grappling with the situation.

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate warmly Their Excellencies Mr. and Mrs. Jules Léger on their appointment and I also extend them my best wishes in the discharge of their high responsibilities.

I would also like to congratulate the member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) who have well discharged their task in proposing and seconding the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I cannot refrain, Mr. Speaker, from pointing out also the outstanding intervention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the debate last week. I think that columnist Charles Lynch was right when he stated:

[English]

In his opening speech of the session it was a different Trudeau—involved, scrappy, funny and confident. It was easily Trudeau's best speech ever in parliament.

● (1500)

[Translation]

That performance does not surprise me at all. It reflects very well the leadership, the stability, the ability of the Prime Minister of Canada. I think it is not superfluous to compare that leadership in Canada to that we can find now in most industrial countries of the free world. In Europe, if you except a few totalitarian régimes, most countries are governed by shaky coalitions or are simply not governed at all.

Almost every country in the Common Market suffers from political unstability. There is no government in Italy, we do not know exactly what type of government they will have in Belgium, Chancellor Willy Brandt's régime is on the brink of disaster, Premier Messmer, in France, has had to reshuffle his cabinet in order to hang on and the British have just given themselves a government that was truly elected by the skin of its teeth.

I think that the situation is not much more rosy in the United States where they are wondering from one week to the other when President Nixon is going to resign. Canadians can therefore rejoice in the fact that they have political stability thanks to a statesman who governs with vigour and dynamism. In my view, all Canadians have realized that in these difficult times they needed a strong man to lead the country. The leader of the official opposition (Mr. Stanfield) may be a likeable chap, but he has not and will never have either the strength or stature to be the leader or Prime Minister of this country. In my opinion, it is quite clear that his many attempts to overthrow the government are as useless as his efforts to convince the Canadian people that he is a "valid alternative" to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). His efforts are fruitless and will remain eternally so. No matter how hard he struggles and frets, he will fail because, as the popular saying goes: "He simply hasn't got it!"

I should like to avail myself of this opportunity this afternoon to deal with a matter of very great concern to me. It is a fact that, in addition to my duties as Postmaster General, I have been entrusted by the House with the responsibility of marketing commemorative postage stamps and coins to help finance the Olympic Games. No matter what a number of hon. members in the opposition may think, I am as eager to fulfill my responsibilities as Postmaster General as I am to sell the commorative stamps and coins. I strive to discharge my responsibilities to the best of my ability so as to give satisfaction to the Canadian people in these two areas.

For the benefit of the House, I want to come back on some declarations made here that have no doubt caused great prejudice to the whole olympic program. I think that those allegations affect me in so far as I am in charge of the sale of olympic coins and stamps. It is necessary that neither doubt nor smirch should depreciate the olympic organization, and that is why I want to set the facts in their true light and bring some order back in a situation where the privileges of this House have been used to tarnish the reputations of certain individuals and highly commendable organizations.

Mr. Speaker, hon. members know very well what I am talking about. I am talking about the recent statements made in this House by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) on the sale of television rights to the 1976 Olympic Games. To set the record straight may I first be allowed to point out that the television rights to the Olympic Games are owned by the International Olympic Committee and not by Montreal, COJO or Canada. And the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley should know that very well. So COJO sold its rights on behalf of IOC. And I quote from section 48 of the 1972 IOC regulations:

The television broadcasting rights to the games will be sold by the organizing committee by delegation of the International Olympic Committee and subject to its approval.

Since the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley made those very serious charges without substantiating them with evidence, I had the opportunity to meet personally and ask those mainly concerned in that business. Commissioner General His Excellency Roger Rousseau, Mr. Snyder of the Olympic Committee and member of that committee dealing with the adjucation of that television contract, Mr. Arlidge, President of ABC, all told me that the hon. member was completely off the track and the victim of either his imagination or his maliciousness. I leave it to the House to determine whether it is his imagination or his maliciousness.

Members of COJO told me that with respect to the 1976 games a protocol identical to that of Munich and previously Mexico was adopted for the sale of television rights with one exception—COJO hired an expert for the negotiation of television rights and on the advice and recommendation of the organizing committee for the Munich Games. It is through the advice of that expert that a goal was set of $25 million as compared with $4.5 million obtained by Mexico City in 1968 and $13.5 million collected by the Munich Games in 1972, for the sale of television rights to the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to give the House the information that I received on the state of the negotiations. As you know, three American television networks were entitled to submit tenders for the games broadcasting rights. I am told that all of them were invited to do so. However, Munich authorities had warned the organization committee not to give the networks the opportunity to set up a common front which would have allowed them to set in advance the maximum amount payable for broadcasting rights in the United States.

It is therefore with full knowledge of the facts that the organization committee sought expert advice to obtain the best possible contract. This is why there were no public calls for tenders; the committee did not want to be boxed in by such a move and perhaps forced to accept an amount that it considered too low.

Mr. Speaker, the negotiating committee came to an agreement in principle with the ABC network for the amount of $25 million on November 17, 1972. This agreement was then ratified by the COJO and ABC boards. A contract duly prepared by the legal services of both parties was signed on January 3, 1973.

I find it simply absurd that the member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) could not even differentiate between an agreement on principle and a formal contract when speaking of this matter. Throughout the negotiations, the CBS and NBC networks had the possibility of making better offers than the ABC proposition of which they were fully aware.

In its own interest, COJO encouraged CBS and NBC to make offers, even after the official signature of the contract. Until the ratification of the agreement by the International Olympic Committee, that is May 12, 1973, the CBS and NBC networks were absolutely free to approach the International Olympic Committee with a better offer. Nothing was done under cover, as it were; all three networks knew perfectly well what they had to do. The hon. member should know that it is the International Olympic Committee that had the last word. Since the contract was ratified only in May, they had enough time to make any offer they wished.

I am assured by COJO officials that there lies the real reason for the reserve clause put into the contract by ABC, because the other networks could make directly a better offer to the International Olympic Committee.

Therefore, the CBS and NBC networks had all the time required to make an offer, even after that of ABC, and they deliberately chose not to exercise their option. The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley tried to make the House believe that the IOC repudiated the way in which the contract was awarded when he quoted Lord Killanin, president of IOC, as saying, and I quote his words as reported on page 90 of Hansard:

Future television negotiations will be conducted jointly by the organizing committee and the IOC board.

The sentence is quoted out of context and I say once again to the hon. member that he is either ignorant or malicious.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that COJO asked for the censure of IOC by negotiating a contract whereby the latter must share the cost of television technical services as well as the income. Those services will cost something like $9 million. The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley will therefore be happy to learn that COJO will use those $9 million to make up part of the $25 million it will pay the CBC as official telecaster of the games. If Lord Killanin is unhappy, it is not because IOC feels the contract was unsatisfactory but because he realizes that as a result of the decision of the Canadian committee IOC will get less than it had originally hoped. In any event, I want to quote Lord Killanin, and it is important that I do so, since the hon. member tried to impute motives to the president of IOC. Lord Killanin said: "It is very clear that the contract between COJO and ABC was in order; that is why the International Committee sanctioned it in May last."

And in a press release from Lausanne, one can read this:

● (1510)

[English]

Lord Killanin, president of the International Olympic Committee, declared that he is convinced that claims of irregularities in the awarding of television contracts for the 1976 Olympic games are without foundation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in Munich in 1972, the international broadcasting rights for television were sold for $17.5 million. The Innsbruck winter games in 1976 will be sold for some $10 million. By comparison, COJO sold the rights for the United States for only $25 million and it hopes to sell them to Japan, Europe and to the rest of the world at a price much more reasonable and much higher than that paid in the past by those countries. This is why it has hired an expert to help it negotiate these contracts and obtain the best conditions and as much money as possible. Mr. Speaker, $25 million is the biggest amount which has ever been paid for television rights. The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley should be delighted about such a contract rather than trying to reflect discredit upon the Olympics Games.

On January 11, 1974, this member made in this House unfounded statements particularly when he declared as you can read at page 9280 of Hansard and I quote:

... when the National Broadcasting Corporation had in fact indicated that they were prepared to bid up to $32.9 million, without any strings attached?

The representatives of COJO have told me that NBC never made such an offer. Furthermore, newspapers reported that one of the people in charge of NBC had denied that the network was prepared to pay such an amount.

On page 9280 of Hansard, the same member states that Mr. Carl Lindeman, Vice-President of the CBS network, was told point blank that he would have to pay $5 million to the Quebec government as payment for contract negotiations with COJO.

Mr. Speaker, I have this to say: When any one makes a statement with such implications, such a serious statement, he should verify his facts, he should not say whatever he thinks. Mr. Carl Lindeman does not belong to the CBS network, as the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley claims, but he is Vice-President of the NBC network in charge of sports. This shows clearly how accurate the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley can be in his statements.

The hon. member by his statements in and outside the House has brought such doubts about the integrity of ABC that the network communicated with him to ask him for details and a retraction, because he was hurting the network's reputation. This is what the hon. member was forced to do. In a letter addressed to Mr. Roone Arledge,

President of the ABC network, sports section, last January 30, he wrote as follows and I quote:

[English]

To clarify some of the misquotes in the press following my so-called allegations, I want to make it clear that at no time did I accuse or suggest that ABC was aware of any underhanded or illegal dealings that I believe arose as a result of the ABC contract with COJO. Nor have I ever indicated that the negotiations conducted by ABC in obtaining the exclusive television rights were ever "shady" or illegal or in any way improper.

I do, however, want to reiterate my belief that somewhere along the line, funds did in fact find their way into the Quebec provincial Liberal coffers as a result of the completion of the contract.

I hope this clarifies my position in this matter.

It is signed by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek).

[Translation]

There! We see the true face of the hon. member. Forced to retract because of a doubt he had spread about the integrity of the ABC network, he retracts; but he continues to claim that money was paid to the Quebec Liberal Party. He has no proof of it, but he continues to throw mud, to discredit Quebecers. This is the typical way to act for some members of the Progressive Conservative Party!

● (1520)

[English]

I think a television program "the City at Six" which was broadcast on March 1 following the second intervention in the House of Commons by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley is a pretty good resumé and a pretty good answer to the allegations made by the hon. member. In a press notice in the parliamentary gallery he announced his intervention in the throne speech debate in these words:

I hope to, among other things, explain my position on the Olympic issue, as well as disclose further evidence as to the irregularities of the awarding of the contract.

The following is a portion of a transcript of the TV program to which I have referred. Bob Jeronomie, TV broadcaster, said:

There was to have been a bit of drama in the House of Commons today. Otto Jelinek, the Conservative MP, had promised to document his charges of bribery in connection with the awarding of television rights for the 1976 Olympics.

That did not happen. Mr. Jeronomie continued:

Tim Knight has worked on this story for weeks now. He got a copy of the agreement between ABC and COJO, he went to Ottawa and New York city and he talked to the people involved. Here is his report.

Mr. Knight interviewed Mr. Rousseau, Lord Killanin, Mr. Josephson and Mr. Arlidge, and all of them absolutely denied any wrongdoing in this matter. He said that when he interviewed the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley and asked what proof he had, what evidence and documents, that there were some shenanigans going on there and that some money had found its way into the Liberal Party of Quebec, the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley answered:

As far as the money finding its way into the Liberal Party, I have absolutely no proof at this time.

Mr. Knight concluded his inquiry by saying the following:

[Mr. Ouellet.]

The problem is, of course, that it is incredibly difficult to prove innocence, but it seems to me that unless Otto Jelinek or somebody else does come up with a lot more details and facts than they have—there is no foundation for all these rumours or these allegations. All the principals involved deny any kickbacks, any bribery. It is a fact that NBC or CBS could have challenged the ABC deal at any time up to May last year. Then, and only then, did ABC officially get the television rights to the Montreal games. There is some friction, of course, between the International Olympic Committee and COJO here in Montreal, but that's not unusual in a contract as big as this. All in all, this reporter throws this case out of court for lack of evidence.

[Translation]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think the time has come for the Progressive Conservative Party to reveal its true intentions, without ambiguity, about its position on the Olympic Games in Montreal and Kingston, in 1976.

The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) claims to be the spokesman for the PC party on olympic matters. He was one of the first to take the floor after the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in the name of his party in this House, during this debate. So he surely speaks in the name of the Progressive Conservative Party. But he does not deserve to speak in its name on matters relating to the Olympic Games. He has explicitly and clearly proven that he is incompetent or that he is not in good faith. In my opinion the time has come for the official opposition to seek in its ranks someone else to speak on olympic matters. I know that several members of the opposition are undoubtedly favourable to the games. If I may, I would like to suggest to the Leader of the Opposition to ask the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) or the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) or the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) to speak about the Olympic Games but let him get rid of this man who makes charges that are likely to be very prejudicial to the 1976 Olympic Games. This is not worthy of a member of parliament. Otherwise, I will have to conclude, as will the people of Canada, that Progressive Conservative members are opposed to the games. They cannot keep on playing that game. When they go to Montreal, they tell the people that they are pleased, but when they go in other parts of the country, they say that the games should have been divided, one part being held in Montreal, another in Toronto and another still in western Canada.

This hon. member who already took part in olympic competitions is perfectly aware of the fact that the games cannot be divided in this way. He knows perfectly well that the games must take place in one main location. Since the beginning of this debate, the Progressive Conservative party have indulged in peanut politics. They unduly and incorrectly pestered us in committee, through the voice of this member who keeps on sullying Quebecers. The Progressive Conservative party continue to divide people in this country whereas, thanks to the games, we should unify Canada. And all of us should be very proud that these games will be held in Montreal and Kingston in 1976. Athletes from all parts of Canada will take part in the games. People from all parts of Canada will come to attend these games, both in Montreal and Kingston.

Therefore, I say that the Progressive Conservative party show their real position, otherwise we will understand that they are always sitting on the fence and that in the end they are opposed to everything stemming from or directed to the province of Quebec. The Progressive Conservative members are against French Canadians and they always have the odd greenhorn to sully people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Does the hon. member for Lafontaine (Mr. Lachance) wish to ask a question or is he rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lachance: I wish to put a question to the minister, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Since the time allowed to the hon. minister is not completely expired, the minister may, if he so wishes, answer a question. Does the minister agree?

Mr. Ouellet: Agreed.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, could the minister give us the date of Lord Killanin's statement?

Mr. Ouellet: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The President of the International Olympic Committee made this statement at the beginning of March, and I have here a copy of the Toronto Sun of Tuesday, March 5, reporting Lord Killanin's statement.

[English]

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) for relinquishing his position today and allowing me to take his place since I have another engagement on Monday. I should also like to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McKinley) who was instrumental in making these arrangements.

The Speech from the Throne in the main has recognized a number of economic issues which prevail both at home and abroad. Whether or not the issues to which the government has made reference will be resolved as time progresses is really another matter which is dependent upon the attitude of the government and, indeed, the course of its legislative program. One would have to possess a short memory not to note that basically this Speech from the Throne is very similar to the Speech from the Throne delivered at the commencement of the previous session a year ago, possibly with the exception of a little more emphasis on energy and agriculture and items such as the status of women. The government really is saying that basically we have the same problems today as we had a year ago, gravitated by a year of government inaction. It is saying, in effect, "We have failed to correct them, but give us another chance and we will stumble along with the aid of the NDP, hopefully for another year."

● (1530)

The Speech from the Throne speaks of a serious disturbance in the international economic situation arising from problems of supply and the price of a number of commodities, particularly oil. It makes reference to problems relating to food, the shortages of foodstuffs here in Canada and throughout the world, the dramatic increases in the price of food, the causes and the effects, and it proposes some solutions. It proposes to increase production of a number of agricultural products. This is rather a turn-about because only a couple of years ago the government was paying farmers to slaughter chickens, it was paying farmers not to grow wheat and penalizing the dairy industry for producing dairy products. It speaks of inflation, and in that area the government is in a league of its own. It refers to inflation as a phenomenon, for which no real concrete solutions are proposed. It speaks of the necessity for increased job opportunities. It speaks of matters relating to greater control over our economic affairs. It speaks of the need to overcome regional inequalities and disparities, and a few more crumbs are thrown out for the west. Of course, it mentions housing, transportation, the enhancement of our quality of life, aid to small business, industrial development policy, science policy, and so on.

Out of force of sheer necessity any government would be bound to recognize these problems which are very real, but we on this side of the House are in no way convinced that a year from now these problems will not be with us still, for in our opinion the major objective of the government is to cling to power. Moreover, it lacks the vision, the expertise and the determination to grapple effectively with the matters mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, matters which in effect threaten the economic fabric of our nation. I will have a little more to say about that later, particularly in relation to agriculture and transportation. However, before doing so I want to refer to another matter, one which concerns me very deeply. The throne speech has made reference to a number of economic disturbances. I shall refer to a disturbance of a social nature which in my opinion transcends the most important of the economic issues which we face.

I refer to the escalation in the decay of the human and moral standards which prevail in our society, a growing permissiveness, a growing disregard for discipline and the upholding of our laws, both human laws and those which are enacted by government legislation. I see the decline in our spiritual and moral fibre as a major threat to this nation and to neighbouring nations. I see the stability of family life being undermined by the direction of government legislation and its seeming disregard for the concept of the family unit which is a vital and integral part of our social structure. I see our educational system creating conflict and confrontation between generations and within family units. I see governments and society in general acquiescing in laws, written and unwritten, which are contrary to the laws of humanity and nature, where for example a person who has ambition and initiative is penalized if he looks after himself.

I see the incredible increase in the incidence of abortion, approaching a 30 per cent increase on an annual basis. And to think that in this chamber we have a number of so-called progressive-minded people who promote the concept of free abortion on demand! This is a philosophy which contravenes all the laws of nature and God. What hypocrisy, Mr. Speaker, when on the one hand we become deeply grieved and emotionally stricken over the loss of one baby, one man or one woman through violence or some other extraordinary event, or through some stupid accident, and on the other we spend great sums of money on protecting the safety of individuals, on search and rescue and on environmental protection devices—all aimed at preserving life. I agree with that, because I believe life is sacred; yet we condone, and in many cases promote, mass murder in the name of preserving the emotional health of a mother—this in the name of birth control.

The deliberate destruction of human life through abortion is without foundation in human reason and is opposed to human nature. The destruction of human life for selfish motives is contrary to all the laws of God and man.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I believe that we in this House and in this country had better realize that fact. We find ourselves in a society in which television and the other media engage in the perpetration of filth, violence and pornography, financed in many cases at public expense and referred to as "reporting it as it is." Much of this can only be categorized as cheap, unimaginative trash. Whatever precautions a parent might engage in, it is absolutely impossible for any parent completely to immunize his children against this kind of trash.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: We find ourselves in a society where discipline and punishment have been replaced by permissiveness and reform and in some cases reward, where the criminal is treated as an unfortunate misfit, in many cases receiving royal treatment under the name of rehabilitation while his victim is the hard luck guy. We find ourselves in a society where moral and spiritual attitudes receive no consideration in the quality of a man or in the evaluation of his ability to develop his full potential and contribute to society. We see an increase in the use of alcohol and drugs. We see an increased incidence of venereal disease. These are things that treatment alone will never conquer; they are social diseases, most of which are the result of the sad behavioural problem which we have in this society.

So we must ask ourselves—why? We live in a society with all the technical, intellectual and medical expertise and we have made great progress in these fields, but in terms of human progress it can only be categorized, in my humble submission, as shaky and questionable. Much of this is the result of a deliberate route taken by government and by liberal intellectuals many of whom, I would suggest, are over-educated for their brains, whose behavioural attitudes are based on ease and expedience rather than on firmness and natural sense.

Although our educational system is rather sophisticated and advanced, it has failed to provide us with the necessary tools properly to communicate with one another, to live in harmony, to understand, to co-operate, to tolerate and to accept human life—all forms of human life—as something sacred.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes, Mr. Speaker, the major afflictions which affect our society are by no means limited to the pollution of our air, water and land but are, rather, pollution of the mind. The prerequisites for satisfactorily grappling with this problem are discipline, clear thinking, regard for spiritual values, and work. I do not want to pose as one who has a monopoly on morals and who is a paragon of virtue. Nor do I suggest for one moment that the state and the government can legislate behaviour and morality. But I do say that our legislative measures and our educational systems can, and must, be tailored to restore and rededicate the family unit as the major pillar of our society.

We must adopt ways and means to strengthen family ties, for discipline begins in the home and that is where the breakdown commences, given the numerous counteractions which are deliberately perpetrated. These institutions must work in harmony, rather than in conflict with the family unit. Furthermore, the government must take firm and immediate action to stop the merciless acts which masquerade under the guise of therapeutic abortion. This is murder and is contrary to the laws of human nature. It is shameful, and it must be stamped out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Never in my life have I witnessed anything so blatantly wrong, with no response from government. The state is charged with the responsibility of preserving the priceless heritage of life, and particularly of those who are innocent and unable to fend for themselves. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we have reached the point in time where we will soon have to make a choice, and that choice is clear: it is whether we shall stand and fight for a philosophy of life, or whether we shall stand idly by and surrender to a philosophy of death.

● (1540)

I want now to deal with the subject of transportation for a few moments, particularly grain transportation and movement in this country. Grain movement in this nation has reached a very critical state. Shipments are behind something like 135 million bushels this year compared to last year. In Vancouver there are at present 14 ships waiting to be loaded, and ten more are reported due within the week. The Thunder Bay terminal is half full, with four weeks to go to the commencement of the shipping season on the St. Lawrence River. This is not a new problem but it has become particularly apparent to me since becoming a member of this House.

The railways have failed to discharge their responsibility, which is to move commodities and people across this vast land. They have a mandate to perform and they are not living up to it. The government has a responsibility to force the railways to carry out their mandate and their obligations. Just today Statistics Canada reported that for the first two months of this year railway car loadings were down 3.5 per cent compared with the same period last year. This comes at a time when all steps, supposedly, are being taken to get goods moving; at a time when the economy is moving fairly briskly and when the demand for moving bulk commodities is at an all-time high.

We hear from the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang), from the railways and from some farm organizations that the only way we can resolve the problem of grain transportation is to abandon the Crowsnest pass freight rates. Mr. Speaker, that is really what the railways want and what the minister seems to be engaged in with the railways. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) called it a lobby, but I refer to it as a conspiracy. I believe that the railways, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and some men in farm circles are engaged in a conspiracy, in effect, to undermine and, hopefully, abandon the Crowsnest pass freight rates.

I believe we have sufficient evidence of that, Mr. Speaker, because while we hear the cry for more rolling-stock and the need for more boxcars to move grain, we note that there are cars sitting around the country. On sidings at Perdue, Saskatchewan, for example, some 20 boxcars had been loaded with wheat since December. Cars located at Provost, Alberta, had not turned a wheel for four weeks. Three hundred hopper cars sat in Vancouver during September and October and their alfalfa pellets were not unloaded until November 13. Also, 25 government hopper cars were waiting at Kindersley for seven days for spotting orders; 26 hoppers were sitting at Glenavon, Candiac, Montmartre, Odessa and Vibank for over two weeks before the Christmas holidays; three-quarters of a mile of boxcars were sitting idly at Claresholm for a month, and there was a similar situation at Cayley and Aldersyde; there were 40 cars northeast of Cranbrook which had not moved for a month. Why, Mr. Speaker?

I am not sure that more rolling-stock will solve the problem. I say this is a deliberate attempt by the railways to squeeze the government and the producers, who need to move grain now, into abandoning the Crowsnest pass freight rates; and they are convincing a few people. I remind them and all hon. members that the removal of the Crowsnest pass freight rates will not automatically solve the grain transportation problem. Shippers of other commodities such as fruit, lumber and even the floral people, are complaining that they cannot move their goods adequately by rail, and these items do not come under the Crowsnest pass freight rates. The government has an obligation, and the railways have an obligation to see that the grain is moved. I warn the government and reiterate to the minister that if the government thinks it can open up the hornets' nest of revising the Crowsnest pass freight rates, it will create a situation which will drive every western Liberal into oblivion.

Yesterday we awaited the statement of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) with great anticipation. He had advised the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the morning that he would be making a profound statement on transportation policy. The statement was that this government really does not have a policy, has not had one since 1967, and even that one was not good. He admitted that and said they will look at devising a new policy. That was the profound statement that he indicated he was going to make. I reiterate, Mr. Speaker, that the Crowsnest pass freight rates are a Magna Carta to western Canada's farmers. If they are tampered with, we on this side of the House will fight the issue right into the ground.

I want to deal for a moment with the cattle industry, which is in a very serious state. The climate in the cattle industry at the present time, particularly the feeding industry, can only be described as frightening. The flood of U.S. cattle into Canada, resulting in depression of prices coupled with high and increasing input costs, threatens the life of a major Canadian industry. It is a very major industry because the spin-off and the ancillary effects of the cattle feeding industry allow many allied industries to flourish in western Canada. Last year, for example, 128,000 feeder cattle were shipped to the United States for feeding purposes; over 208,000 slaughter cattle were shipped back to Canada. This means, basically, that the Canadian cattle feeding industry has found itself uncompetitive with the United States. Canadians, therefore, are relying on U.S. feedlots to produce much of Canada's beef, resulting in a staggering loss of economic activity in this country. This year, to the end of February, in the order of 25,000 head of slaughter cattle crossed the U.S. border into Canada. It took eight months to reach that figure last year. This gives one some idea of the flood of imported cattle in comparison to what normally occurs.

What are the implications of this situation, Mr. Speaker? To put it simply, it will result in a shortage of beef down the line, and in much higher prices. The following appeared in the Alberta Farm Economist for the winter quarter, 1974:

● (1550)

> In the short run, producers may lose money at times when consumer demand weakens, yet the production level will continue with little variation. However, in the long run, the law of supply and demand will automatically choke off supply if the rapidly rising livestock production costs are not covered by market returns. Livestock and meat prices should be allowed to rise, following the market indicators, and thereby guarantee an adequate meat supply at equitable prices in the future. If livestock and meat prices do not move upward and the major inputs for livestock production continue to yield very lucrative returns to producers, consumers will eventually face a lower meat supply at very high prices.

That paragraph is to be found at page 2 of the publication. In a nutshell it tells us what we can expect if we do not solve this crisis. Last August, when beef prices skyrocketed, the government moved quickly. I urge the government to move as quickly in the present circumstances in order to save this important industry. Today, feeders large and small are losing between $100 and $150 per head. They cannot survive in this economic climate. The government must act with great haste at this time, just as it acted last year, to protect the consumer.

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I begin my remarks by extending best wishes to His Excellency the Governor General and to Madame Léger in their new responsibilities. I think it does honour to Canada to have men and women of such calibre representing us. Truly, they are a great example of the excellence which Canada can develop. Being able to say that there are Canadians of that style, calibre and nature to represent us does great credit to this country. I also wish to extend best wishes to the Hon. Roland Michener and Mrs. Michener. I hope they will find happiness and that their time will be more restfully spent.

Following tradition, I extend congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I do so with special pride for I believe that my colleague from metropolitan Toronto, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), has brought a refreshing approach to this traditional honour paid to him. He has a special insight because of his experiences as a world traveller. I think that because of his perspective, which comes from knowledge of poverty and hardship and of the political systems of people in other countries, he is better able to judge how good or how bad things really are in Canada. I also congratulate the seconder, the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier). It is obvious that his extensive academic background in political affairs has added much to his ability to serve his constituents well.

I perceive three major thrusts in the Speech from the Throne. The first is an effective and sensitive response to the factors of inflation. This is not the most politically easy response, true, and not a simplistic response but it is one that is fitting for our circumstances, one that can work within our system and will help us overcome our problem and help our people generally. It is not a simplistic approach. The simplistic approach has been tried and found wanting. I feel that the sooner the official opposition drops its wage and price control proposal, the sooner it will gain credibility with the people of Canada. Wage and price controls are painful and costly in application, painful and more costly in exercising and most painful and most costly when you try to escape from them. They have been tried in the United States but did not work, as the President himself admitted. They were tried in Great Britain and brought about the worst class confrontation to hit that great nation in many a decade.

Selective and sensitive reaction to the problem is not the easiest way of dealing with it, but it involves the most realistic approach. We have already seen examples of the government's realistic approach in its aid to pensioners. It is all very well to pooh-pooh these government expenditures. It is all very well for the Conservatives to make a great song and dance about amounts contained in estimates and supplementary estimates and to claim we are spending ourselves out of existence. It is those same people who thought they could outdo what the government, the NDP or even the Créditistes want to do. They were the ones who would give the Canadian people more. One day they talk out of the left side of their mouths and on the next out of the right side. When it came to helping pensioners, they talked out of the left side of their mouths, but when it came to estimates they talked out of the right side. Somehow they always seem to talk more easily out of the right side of the mouth.

Aid to pensioners has been increased by more than 25 per cent in the past 18 months. That is not to say that our pensioners will have as much as they deserve, or as much as will enable them to buy some of the luxuries available to people in the labour force today. I admit that we must try to do more. Nevertheless, the government's action shows that a great deal has been done. That expenditure accounts for part of the increase in spending. As I say, the money is to be spent in the months ahead.

The government has also increased family allowances. Surely to goodness, when we are faced with inflation which is world-wide—and this has been said a million times, despite the hearing difficulties of the opposition—it is up to us to help the needy. We have acted by bringing in these increases. Actually, in our first major increase we just about tripled family allowances so that children who are helpless will not suffer and children from poor homes will not be an additional burden. Having done these things, the government in a sensitive and selective way acted to help consumers by supporting the price of bread and of milk, two basic commodities which are essential to the health of Canadians.

[Mr. Fleming.]

The government acted in the field of energy. I will deal with that matter in a minute. Again, in this field there was explicit action in treating Canadians fairly and protecting them from increased oil prices in the world. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the cabinet will, as set out in the Speech from the Throne and in accordance with the commitment given last summer and early last fall, act as necessary and continue to take advantage of our resources in Canada so that we may protect our own people and, especially, protect the defenceless. The government's past actions have again proved that sensitive and selective action is right and that we should not adopt the simplistic formula which has failed both in Great Britain and in the United States. The government said it would follow this course. It has given a public commitment that all the negative stridency of the opposition party cannot hide.

There is a further point in this Speech from the Throne which apparently has been overlooked by the media. The point is that little attention has been given to the pledge or to the commitment of the government that it would consult with the provinces after it had considered a number of proposals. The government gave the pledge or commitment that it would act selectively, which is what brought in pension increases, family allowance increases and protection to consumers. The throne speech says that, particularly under the Ministry of National Health and Welfare, further necessary aid will be coming and that these proposals are still under discussion with the provinces.

So the first thrust of the speech is with regard to selective, sensitive action against inflation, protecting the defenceless and doing our best to help all Canadian consumers. I believe there is a second element or thrust to the throne speech. Measures must now be taken for the long-range protection of consumers across Canada. Nothing is more important than measures taken to encourage our farmers and fishermen to produce more. Because of the boom and bust conditions experienced by these workers in the past, nothing can be of greater assistance to farmers, fishermen and consumers than a stabilization program, especially in general agriculture, including prairie grain farmers.

These measures must not be enacted to be effective for one year only; they must be effective from this point forward. Notice that I said they should include the prairie grain farmers as well. Did I hear members mention that that would involve government action in western Canada? Supplies will be increased, fair farm incomes will be assured and Canadian consumers will reap the price advantages of Canadian produce. All this, much to the political agony of my friends opposite, will develop as this session progresses.

The third thrust of the throne speech has to do with regional disparity and its correction. That thrust does not specifically have to do with DREE. That program, of course, is giving assistance to areas of need such as the Maritimes, the like of which has never before been seen. I might mention, however, that DREE is not a success story in eastern Canada alone. Take the Medicine Hat story. That town is in Alberta, in case anybody has forgotten. DREE grants have been the basis for the development of energy resources and related industry in that city in Alberta and are bringing it unparallelled success in industrial growth.

● (1600)

The value of building permits in any urban area in a particular year is an indicator of the expansion of the area. In 1971, in Medicine Hat building permits were let in the amount of $889,000. Shortly after that, DREE began to give major assistance. In 1973, that $889,000 total soared to $21 million. The projected amount for next year in Medicine Hat, Alberta, is $150 million.

Coming from an urban area such as metropolitan Toronto, with the environmental problems and urban sprawl problems which we have, I would almost be frightened by such rapid expansion. Never let it be said the government is not attempting to assist in giving very real assistance to all parts of Canada, including the west. No one can claim that either the great resource-maker in the sky or the federal government forgot Medicine Hat. Similar extensive federal aid went to south Lethbridge and Slave Lake in Alberta.

Some hon. members might resent an easterner attempting to discuss the west, but I am concerned as one of those so-called wicked, greedy easteners. I spent some time in Alberta during the recent recess; in fact, in the general area of the hon. member opposite. My purpose was twofold. It was, first, to try to learn of their anger and frustrations. I think we all, as parliamentarians from all sides of the House and all parties, are deeply concerned about any situation that is divisive of our national unity. I was also there to better understand their problems and to express, as too seldom reaches western ears, some eastern problems—if you can convince westerners that we have problems—and some of the great advantages and potentials of their part of Canada as we in the east see and enjoy them.

I noted in Tuesday's Globe and Mail a quotation of the words of the Premier of Alberta with regard to the cushioning of rising oil prices in eastern Canada, the government's pledge to do that and to attempt to discuss it with the province. The Premier of Alberta said, "Well, that's Ottawa's problem." I wonder if back in 1961, when the national energy policy was established by the government of Canada, what might have been different if in fact Ottawa had said, "Development of your resources is your problem. Go to it." The federal government imposed regulations forcing Canadians west of the Ottawa Valley to pay more for western Canadian oil than offshore oil—that is, from the Ottawa Valley westward—even though in Edmonton, a few miles from the oil fields, it was more expensive than buying offshore oil.

Eastern problems or western problems, they are Canada's problems and not just Ottawa's problems if equality of opportunity, education or economic well-being are involved. They are not Ottawa's problems translated into a particular government or particular party. It is Canada that has to cope with them. This country cannot survive if the federal government alone must bear the burden and solve the discrepancies in lifestyle across Canada. East, west, central or north, the responsibility belongs to us all as long as any one of us says, "I am a Canadian."

There has been cause for western anger and frustration. I understand it better, having spent some time talking about it in the west with westerners. So did the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues because of the western economic opportunities conference. The anger and frustration in the west has built up over many years. You can see it very clearly, not so much when you talk to their leaders, who are very strident in what they tell us is wrong, but when you talk directly to westerners in their own homes. That same anger and frustration, amassed for so long, is now being nurtured by an opposition apparently blind to real progress or unwilling to recognize it because of opportunistic, political motives.

I think we succeeded in showing the rest of Canada the problem and showing the west there is interest here in Ottawa. Surely, if that was done on a raw political base it was a foolish move. If it was done to find solutions it was a good move, despite some political disadvantage to it. For the Prime Minister and the cabinet to go west and face the western press, which has hardly been our best friend over the years, and face at public meetings the leaders of those provinces was a daring, forward and honest move. It was done publicly, openly and on their own ground. There is no cheaper or easier shot these days in the west than to take on the federal Liberals, but is there a time when political stridency hurts more than it helps you politically in a particular party? Is there ever a time when it will hurt anyone else more than those seeking the regress of their long-standing grievances?

It was pointed out at the western economic opportunities conference that freight rates are a major problem in the west. At that conference the Premier of Alberta presented the federal government with 20 complaints of alleged tariff inequities. Over the following months that figure grew to almost 200. Day by day we hear the strident scream that nothing is being done. That conference was held last July. We are intensively investigating 200 different tariffs. If you want answers and some equity in the west because you have been treated poorly, surely you want responsible, proper answers so that the tariffs will be corrected forever in the future. Give the government a chance to look at it properly to analyse what the solution should be.

Estimates of revenues amassed by the 1961 national oil policy, as carried out through the years until a few months ago to help develop western resources, have ranged as high as $500 million. I am willing to admit that one of the problems was that all the money from most of Ontario and points westward went into developing the resources for not only Alberta but for all of Canada. We see the wisdom of that now and are further acting to see that the entire country can be supplied from western resources. The fact is that perhaps there was too much development of the refineries in the east. That situation should be corrected.

Obviously, the west has had real reason to say they have been disadvantaged in developing secondary industry, but judging from the actions of the last day or two by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) the pledges and commitments that were publicly made will be met by the government. This situation is in the process of being corrected; there is no doubt about that. Errors and mistakes have been made on both sides over the years. Alberta accused Ottawa of not consulting. The Premier of that province actually refused at one time to talk to the federal government. At one point he even threatened to sever relations. That is great Canadianism! Yet the same Premier developed the Syncrude plan over many months. He drew up a deal directly involving federal revenues. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) heard about Syncrude in a television newscast in a hotel room in Calgary.

Canada is blessed with almost unparallelled opportunities. We know that, despite the leering of my friends opposite. We have unparallelled opportunities, and we have a federal government listening to problems in all regions of Canada, especially the west although there is little political advantage to that at the moment. We have these almost unparallelled opportunities through no planning or foresight of our own. Canada—or is it just Alberta and Saskatchewan—is rich in resources; but the maritimes, Quebec, northern Ontario, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon have some real pockets of poverty and regional inequity.

If in practice there have been failures, or at least delays in helping Canada, has the spirit of our nation and its regions ever been "the haves shall have it and the have-nots shall not"? Were government omissions, shortsightedness or insensitivities in the past, at any level, ever a justification for that approach now or in the future? No matter how strident my friends opposite are regarding the past, in the long run who will suffer from a course of confrontation, regionalism or politically fortified frustration? Not the west in this case. Only, and especially, those Canadians who have suffered most all along.

No government in recent times has, with fewer political rewards to reap, concentrated more on seeking solutions to problems and inequities in western Canada. Never before in Canadian history—and I include my own province—has any region stood on the threshold of so much wealth and economic well-being as Canada's west. Before any oil embargo was announced by Arabia, this government volunteered to go into the lion's den and seek out the abcesses. Thus the western economic opportunities conference. It continues pledged and obliged to correct the wrongs of which the west has complained. Surely those pledges would not otherwise have been put so clearly in the Speech from the Throne, and the government would not have gone out west if they had not been prepared to do that. I only hope the pioneer spirit of westerners, of which we hear them speak and of which they are so proud—and so they should be—will make them Canadians first as their fate-found abundance moves them into the forefront of the Canadian economy in the decade ahead. There can be no doubt this is what their position will be.

The inequities in freight rates are to be remedied. Western farmers will prosper on a continuing basis as they never have before. The industrial development of the west will boom, as it has begun to do already, for instance in Medicine Hat, with the assistance of DREE. Over and above all this, the west's abundance of energy assures it of unparallelled wealth. Surely it is a time when Canadianism, not regionalism, should be bursting from them and from their leaders.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I join with others who have preceded me in this debate in congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I propose to deal with one subject and one subject only, and that is Canada's position in the international world.

I note that apart from a reference to the effect of the fuel crisis on the third world, there is no mention in the Speech from the Throne to international affairs. This is perhaps because, it must be acknowledged, international affairs are not the most attractive subject politically. Nevertheless, they are of tremendous importance to Canada. It is obvious that neither Canada nor any other modern nation can live in isolation, and it is trite to remark that the world is getting smaller and increasingly interdependent. Canada's welfare and even her survival depend on peace and security in the world as a whole, and we are bound to pay attention to the subject.

It is said that international affairs should be treated on a non-partisan basis. To some extent I agree with this statement. There are, naturally, many aspects of Canada's international relations upon which Canadians of all parties are in substantial agreement, and in such cases they can and should work together. However, there are very real differences of outlook and real differences in regard to international policy on specific issues. It is, in my view, worth while discussing these differences here.

I propose, therefore, to put emphasis on the points on which there is disagreement between my party, the New Democratic Party, and the present administration. I think it will become apparent that these differences are very real. First of all, I think there is a substantial philosophic difference. The government, in 1970, introduced a series of papers under the general title "Foreign Policy for Canadians." These papers reveal what can only be described as a desire to maintain a low profile in international affairs and a weariness with such activities as peacekeeping and, generally, a reaction against overemphasizing Canada's role.

We recognize, of course, that Canada is not, in terms of military power or influence, a major actor on the international scene. We believe, however, that there are aspects of international affairs in which Canada's leadership is both natural and essential. I refer to such questions as the development of international law in the protection of human rights and in the whole field of humanitarian internationalism.
