We share with some other countries an obligation to give leadership. I mention, for example, Sweden, Australia, Holland, West Germany, Norway, Denmark and New Zealand. There are, of course, many countries in the so-called third world which are in a similar position. We have not had, in my view, the clarity, precision, vigour or dynamic leadership which Canada could have given in these fields. There has been lack of a sense of urgency. In my view there is an urgent need to build a world community. The present administration, according to its own declarations, and indeed according to its practice, tends to put emphasis on narrow national self-interest and upon economic growth. For example, we find in "Foreign Policy for Canadians" six ingredients of Canadian foreign policy as follows:

(1) to foster economic growth
(2) to safeguard sovereignty and independence
(3) to work for peace and security
(4) to promote social justice
(5) to enhance the quality of life, and
(6) to ensure a harmonious national environment.

These are described as the six main themes of national policy and no one could quarrel with any of them, any more than they would think of quarrelling with motherhood. But on page 32 of the main pamphlet an effort is made to assign priorities and we find that economic growth is given the highest priority. Social justice and the quality of life are a mention. Peace and security, and sovereignty and independence are somehow placed in some degree of relative insignificance.

Mr. Speaker, we challenge this philosophy. Economic growth may be important, but as a determinant of foreign policy or the highest priority for consideration, we think it is both old-fashioned and wrong to put so much emphasis upon it. In our view, the emphasis should be on peace and security. Canada has no greater interest than in the maintenance of a stable and peaceful world. This, in turn, depends upon the development of a world community and the development of social justice not only within nations but between different groups of nations.

We also place supreme importance upon the maintenance of Canada's sovereignty and independence. Canada should indeed be a good citizen in the community of nations, but the best basis for this would be the preservation of Canada's own sovereignty and independence against threats to that independence not only military but economic, cultural or intellectual. For too long we have borrowed many of our attitudes in international affairs from large countries with which we have been associated by history and geography. For many years we were dependent upon the United Kingdom, and now our dependence is upon the United States of America. To some extent this may be inevitable, but in our view it has gone too far.

Mr. Speaker, I now propose to deal with three or four specific aspects of Canada's foreign policy. These illustrate the differences in outlook which I have outlined. The first of these subjects is development in the third world; the second, the situation existing in Viet Nam; and the third, Canada's relations to southern Africa.

There is no graver issue threatening the stability of the world than the growing disparity between the so-called rich and poor nations. The standards of living and consumption in one-third of the world vastly exceed those in the other two-thirds. The gap continues to grow. Grim poverty and hardship is the fate of large sections of humanity. Indeed, we are told on good authority that there is a prospect of serious famine in vast regions of the world this year. This is a time when the resources of the world are expanding and will expand, and it is a time when the culture of the western world has spread throughout the whole world and aroused expectations. Social justice within countries is based on a measure of equality. Social justice in the world depends upon a measure of equality between different nations and regions of the world.

I wish to mention two aspects of the relations between the developed and developing world. The first is aid and the second is trade, but neither should be considered in isolation from the other. The developed world has failed miserably to make an adequate contribution through aid. No countries, including Canada, have lived up to the standard set by the United Nations and in the Pearson report. This report called for not only a substantially increased volume of aid but also for changes in the nature of the aid given—the untying of aid, the expansion of multilateral as against unilateral aid, and in general the removal of aid from the taint of neocolonialism and self-interest on the part of the developed nations.

Canada, it is true, has made some comparative progress, and although I am sure CIDA is not a perfect institution, I would like to pay tribute to its work. During the course of the last year I visited both Tanzania and Bangladesh and had a chance to see at first hand some of the results of Canadian aid through CIDA. I believe that in these countries, at any rate, Canadian aid has been effective, and is highly spoken of by the recipient countries. However, we still fall below the international standards that have been set. The Pearson report mentioned a target of .7 per cent of the gross national product as a reasonable measuring stick. Canada contributes something between .4 and .5 per cent. Most of our aid is still tied. The greater proportion of it is unilateral.

The need for increased aid is particularly urgent at the present time. The Speech from the Throne mentions that the third world has been especially hard hit by the energy crisis. These countries import oil and other forms of energy, not for recreation or luxury but to keep their plans for development going. The increased cost of energy endangers the patient efforts of countries like India, Bangladesh and Tanzania, to take illustrations only, to reach the point of take-off from which their drive for development can be self-sustaining. All their carefully laid plans which we have supported can be wrecked by the rising cost of energy.

Canada has contributed foodstuffs to various areas of the world but as the prices have moved up, the same dollar value of aid produces a much smaller actual volume. We have to step up our aid in dollar terms if we are to maintain even the existing level. But aid alone is not the key to development, although it may be helpful. The main key is, in fact, the establishment of effective trading relations between the third world and the rest of the world. In the past GATT, UNCTAD and other international efforts to regulate world trade have been dominated by the developed countries. The share of the third world in world trade has dimished rather than increased. The prices of primary products upon which many third world countries rely have been grossly inadequate.

Canada and the other developed nations must listen to the pleas of the third world. They must provide special drawing rights, they must lower trade barriers so far as developing countries are concerned, and they must assist marketing and other methods of expanding trade with the third world. If there is disruption to industry in Canada, then legislation should be passed for adjustment assistance to those affected.

We now pass to the question of Viet Nam. As most members of this House are aware, there exists in Viet Nam at the present time a grave human problem of tremendous magnitude, exceeding in depths of human misery and cruelty anything that is occurring in any other part of the world. There is the clearest evidence that a very large number of political prisoners, over 100,000 in fact, have been subjected to continued detention and inhuman treatment, including torture. We have had before this House a host of reliable witnesses, British, American, Canadian and French. We have spoken to those who have spoken to these prisoners and heard their stories. We have seen vivid and authentic films of young men crippled by the treatment they have received in jails.

A large number of these persons are guilty of no offence except that they have sought peace between the warring factions in Viet Nam. They support neither the present regime nor the PRG or the communists. Their offence is one of neutralism and desire for reconciliation. This issue has aroused the conscience of many Canadians. Most of the members of this House—and I am sure that if the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) were here he would confirm this—have received numerous and spontaneous letters on this subject. A group of members of parliament and senators representing the three major parties of this House, most or many of them members of the external affairs committee, have presented a brief to the Secretary of State for External Affairs urging that Canada take the lead in bringing this subject to the attention of the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations for investigation.

We have furnished ample legal authority that in international law this is a proper course to adopt and in accordance with precedent. The minister has encouraged us with expressions of deep interest and has promised to give the matter the fullest possible consideration, but so far he has not come up with an answer. We understand he has been in consultation with other like-minded nations. Our own limited inquiries have revealed that the Italian foreign minister, the Netherlands foreign minister, the Swedish prime minister, the parliamentary secretary to the minister of economic collaboration in West Germany, the West German parliamentary secretary of foreign affairs, and the prime minister of Australia have indicated their deep concern with this problem. If we took the matter to the United Nations, we would not stand alone in our humanitarian concern.

We do not wish to interfere in the internal affairs of another country, but there is no doubt that where there is a consistent pattern of gross violation of human rights—and that condition certainly exists in South Viet Nam—then the international community has a right and an obligation to intervene, not indeed by military methods but by making clear what world opinion is. Even the most authoritarian governments are sensitive to world opinion. This is a case where Canada can give a lead, and I hope the members of this House will indicate to the Secretary of State for External Affairs their hope that the request of the non-partisan committee which has interviewed him on this matter will receive favourable consideration.

I now wish to refer to another aspect of Canada's policies in Viet Nam, and I do this on my own responsibility and not on behalf of the committee, though some members of the committee may agree with me. It is perfectly clear that despite the clear words of the Paris agreement of 1973 calling for the total withdrawal of American advisers and paramilitary personnel, for the negotiation of the release of political prisoners, for the establishment of civil liberties, and for the formation of a national council of national reconciliation and concord, both the Thieu regime and the United States government have disregarded these provisions of the Paris agreement. Indeed, an article from the New York Times was reprinted in, I think last Saturday's Globe and Mail giving a detailed account of the situation. It indicated as follows:

> The United States, far from phasing out its military involvement in South Viet Nam, has descended from a peak of warfare to a high plateau of substantial support dispatching not only huge quantities of weapons and ammunition but also large numbers of American citizens who have become integral parts of the South Vietnamese supply, transport and intelligence systems.

It may be said that this is a matter for the United States and not for Canada. But what has Canada's position been? First of all, we are talking about increasing our diplomatic representation in Saigon. Secondly, we have completely refused to recognize the PRG which was one of the parties to the Paris agreement and was thereby accorded juridical status amongst the nations. We act as though the PRG did not exist.

As far as North Viet Nam is concerned, we have indeed granted diplomatic recognition but we have totally failed to make that meaningful. Accredited to the Hanoi regime is our ambassador in Peking. He surely has enough to do representing our interests in the People's Republic of China without taking on North Viet Nam as well. In the meantime, we rely for day to day diplomatic contacts entirely on the British ambassador and his staff. So far as I know, we have not even discussed reconstruction aid with the Hanoi regime. Whatever the future of Viet Nam may be, it is highly probable that the authorities now installed in Hanoi will have something to say about the future of that country. It really does not make sense for us to play favourites with the authoritarian and unstable regime at Saigon and ignore in practice both the North Vietnamese and the PRG.

There is another aspect of this matter, and that is that the Saigon regime is deeply dependent upon the United States and outside aid to be able to maintain its present system of repression and continued war. International institutions, in which Canada has a part, will be called upon to extend aid to South Viet Nam, if they have not already been called upon. There have been reports to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development—incidentally, the reporters went nowhere except to Saigon and got all their information from the people there—and it is possible that the World Bank and many other institutions will be called on in a deliberate plan to get the rest of the world including Canada to finance the maintenance of the present regime in Saigon.

The immense, terrible war damage in all parts of Viet Nam cannot be repaired until the terms of the Paris agreement are accepted by all sides. Canada was one of the signatories to the final act of the International Conference of Guarantees of the Implementation of the Paris Agreement. We have assumed responsibility in this field and I suggest it is time we showed some responsibility.

I now turn to the last subject I want to discuss, and that is South Africa, a key area in the whole future of the world. Canada, consistent with its ambiguous stance as announced in its foreign policy papers has supported UN resolutions which condemn Portuguese colonialism, apartheid in South Africa and the illegal regime in Rhodesia. The government policy papers are abundantly clear—and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has spoken in this vein himself—about the moral revulsion felt by Canadians toward these racist regimes. Canada's actions have been very different from her rhetoric. Canada has aided and assisted the development of trade relations with South Africa and Angola. Canada still extends to South Africa a preferential tariff, supposedly based on membership in the Commonwealth many years after South Africa left the Commonwealth on the very issue of racial policies.

Canada has failed to give adequate recognition to the liberation movements in Angola, Guine-Bissau and Mozambique whose populations are fighting for freedom. Some people talk about them as terrorists, but I suggest they are not more terrorists than any other people fighting for liberation and freedom in their countries, and these people occupy in most instances the greater part of the area of their countries and have the support generally of the international community.

In 1972, I think in December or November, Canada supported a resolution in the United Nations which recommended—this is an almost literal quotation—that all governments render to the people of those countries, and in particular to the populations of the liberated areas of those territories, all moral and material assistance necessary to continue their struggle for the achievement of the inalienable right to self-determination and independence. Canada, with 97 other nations, voted for this resolution. I suggest we committed ourselves to it. It is true that the Canadian delegation then proceeded to explain away its support for that resolution with reservations and qualifications.

Recently, the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced that Canada would in fact give, through CIDA, non-military support to non-governmental agencies, one of which is the World Council of Churches, which were assisting the development of those areas which have been liberated from colonial occupation. There were a few critical editorials and letters to the newspapers which seemed to have caused this government to hesitate. I hope this hesitation amounts to a mere tactical retreat and that the government will stick firmly to its announced determination. I suggest to do otherwise would be to signal to the people of Africa and to people throughout the world that there is no consistency between our words in the United Nations and our actions, and it would indicate that in the struggle for freedom Canada is neutral.

We should take such practical steps as withdrawing trade commissioners from South Africa and Angola, as trying to persuade Canadian companies with investments in that area not to exploit the apartheid practices prevalent there, and we should withdraw the preferential arrangements with South Africa and give practical but non-military aid to those liberation movements.

There are other subjects I should like to pursue, as obviously international affairs range pretty widely, but time does not permit me to do so. However, I should like to make one reference to the fact that, despite the contempt that is sometimes heaped upon the United Nations and despite the disillusionment expressed by this government in its foreign papers with peacekeeping forces, the UN and its peacekeeping forces constitute an essential element in the maintenance of precarious peace in the Middle East.

The views which I have expressed may be thought to be idealistic. Personally, I am not afraid of that word. Unless our international policies are at least tinged with idealism, we will condemn ourselves to futility. I understand that the foreign policy of any country must be based upon self-interest, but that self-interest should be enlightened self-interest. I think enlightened self-interest in fields of development, in our relations with Viet Nam and in our relations with South Africa requires the policies I have outlined.

In closing, let me assure the government and this House that more and more people, and I include among them particularly young people and church people, are in fact deeply concerned about these issues and look to the government for the leadership they have not received in full measure in the past.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to join my leader and other colleagues in the House in congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I think they undertook this duty in commendable fashion. I was very pleased to be here to listen to their speeches. I did not agree with everything they said; none the less, I thought they carried out their duties extremely well.

I listened with great interest to the speech delivered today by the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet). I was very heartened, in fact I was absolutely delighted, to hear him open his speech, as so many other members have on the other side of the House, by attacking the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). If there is any great sign for optimism in our party, it is the fact that members on the government side have not exhausted their energies in attacking the opposition, and I for one want to express my thanks to the Postmaster General and others who have contributed.

● (1640)

I say to the Postmaster General that rather than extoll all the virtues of his own leader, of which I would not call him the most unbiased judge, I would suspect that he should have expended his energy, or the natural gas he exuded in this House, in improving the performance of his department which has perhaps the most disappointing record of any Post Office Department of any democracy in the world and, more than that, has among its staff perhaps the lowest level of morale since confederation. So I think that perhaps if he extended the same amount of energy to those things as he did in extolling the virtues of his leader, there might be great improvement. I do not wish to denigrate the hiring practices of the Postmaster General, but I want to underline the fact that the undermining of his department commenced notably the day the former member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton became his executive assistant.

Then I listened to the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) speak about the income stabilization program. I listened to him speak about the pain and cost of it all, and how the selective program, which is really backing into the control program of the government, is so much better. As I heard him extoll the virtues of the government's program and fight against inflation, I was reminded and perhaps the House was reminded of some startling statistics. For instance, the average Canadian worker has lost $5 a day in the past 12 months in purchasing power, due to inflation. His wages have declined since September and have remained virtually static since last April, in terms of purchasing power.

Food which cost $15 last year now costs $17.50. A house which cost $29,600 last year now costs $31,680. Clothing which cost $134.70 last year now costs $144.80. Canada Savings Bonds purchased in 1972 for $1,000 now have a purchasing power—and, mind you, this includes accrued interest—of only $959, a $41 loss in respect of what is supposed to be a gilt-edged security. The interest on it is taxable, in addition. Sales of Canada Savings Bonds have dropped sharply over the past year.

Here is another litany of failure. In 1972, Canada's annual cost of living increase rate was 5.1 per cent. It is now increasing at the rate of 9.1 per cent. The greatest monument of all was the announcement not too long ago that contributions by employers and employees to the unemployment insurance program had to be increased by 40 per cent—and this does not say how much is coming in from the public sector. Let us not have any comment from the government benches about the pain and cost of an economic stabilization program. Rather, I think we should listen to the Canadian people who pay the cost of what I can only call administrative slothfulness on the part of this government.

Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, I have the honour to represent in this House many people employed as public servants, employed by Crown corporations and agencies and by the armed forces of Canada, as well as their wives and children. I do not like to have to raise this matter, but as a result of the move to identify, and ultimately designate, positions in the public service as bilingual I have received more mail and telephone calls than on any other subject since I came here, including capital punishment. From the tone of these letters and telephone calls it is alarmingly evident that the difficulty of implementation of a policy of bilingualism in the public service that was to be overcome by the guidelines approved by parliament has in fact become more intense and as a result I believe the morale of the public service is being seriously undermined. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the service is being damaged as a result.

The tragedy of this impairment of morale is that it is happening in a service which, to their everlasting credit, has by and large accepted the principles of the Official Languages Act. Like most Canadians, they saw those principles as the instruments by which Canadians would be able to receive and obtain service from the federal government in both languages, and on that basis they were prepared to accept that as time went on the service would develop an increasing capability to work or communicate in both languages. It was not intended or expected by any reasonable person that 100 or so years of Canadian history would be changed in the public service or anywhere else in the short period of ten years; it was intended to be a process of evolution.

The difficulties and the anxieties which have been communicated to me arise from two aspects. The first is the mistake of setting a deadline of 1973, in the first place, now substituted by a deadline of 1975 which in terms of the volume of positions is impossible to meet. On top of this impossibility is piled an additional burden. The 1976 deadline was established for an estimate of 25,000 bilingual positions. Now, to everyone's disbelief, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) finds himself to have been about 100 per cent wrong: the true figure is close to 50,000. Once again, the minister finds himself among the growing number of ministers who are 100 per cent wrong.

Mr. Speaker, to find the true measure of the volume that this figure of 50,000 represents we have to consider the number of persons who will go on the courses and fail, and the number who will have to be trained in their places and, as well, the vacancies that will be created by retirements which will also have to be filled. Even if the designated positions amount to less than 50,000, I venture to suggest that the training program will be among the most costly since confederation, and there are grave doubts that its objects can be realized. I suggest that the only way it could possibly be done would be to consciously recruit an abundance of Canadians who were bilingual on entry into the service, or to water down the requirements of proficiency so that a great number of graduates would be no more than statistically bilingual. The one is discriminatory and the other is a flagrant waste of public funds.

The real flaw is the emphasis that this government has chosen to place on the implementation procedures. They have chosen to emphasize the secondary object of the program, namely, communication with the service, to a greater degree than the first object, which is the ability of the public service to communicate in the official languages with the public. With regard to that, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, in the presence of the President of the Treasury Board, that the government has put the cart before the horse. As a result, the pace of implementation has assumed revolutionary proportions. The cost in monetary terms, if the truth is ever ascertained, will be astronomical, and in human terms I suggest it will be beyond measure. Public servants feel themselves compressed into an impossible time-frame. They see careers endangered and they see advancement threatened. This is in fact happening in the public service today.

● (1650)

The basic and primary intent of the Official Languages Act is being ignored. The grandfather clause, as stated by Mr. Pearson in this House, is being overlooked. Pressure from the Treasury Board—in fact some have described the President of the Treasury Board as the platoon sergeant in this enforced march—have led us to excessive designation in terms of need, and I say with all the force of conviction I can muster that the time has come to recognize and face up to the excesses in a program that is causing anxiety to public servants, incalculable expense to taxpayers and is slowly but surely shaking the faith and lowering the morale of those who have dedicated their lives to the public service.

Consider how foolish it is, Mr. Speaker, to establish a goal that cannot possibly be accomplished with a time-frame that is itself unrealistic. This government is blindly on the road which is likely to lead Canadians to the point where they will have the worst of both worlds. What has been trumpeted as a program to "institutionally bilingualize" the public service has become a program to bilingualize the public servant, and we should get back to first principles very quickly.

As I have said before, and I say it again, the policy of bilingualism means that within the limits of practicability Canadians should have the right to federal government service in either official language. We should continue to search for equality. There ought to be a commitment to equality. We must not forget that entering the public service and advancing within it must be based on equality of opportunity for all Canadians. Every member of parliament has a duty to ensure that the public service is a place where Canadians can work together. All members, not just those who represent ridings with public servants in them, must ensure that the public service is a place where justice is not only done to every public servant but where it is seen to be done.

We must never forget that bilingualism involves the right to be unilingual, and that right applies to both English and French-speaking Canadians. There was a very heavy burden on this government with regard to the public service of Canada. It is a matter of history and record that the government failed with respect to that burden. On June 4, 1973, I joined with my leader in asking the government to go the second mile with public servants and put the so-called guidelines into law. The government has not done so, and in fact every one of the members of the government voted against that proposal. So much for their commitment to justice!

Nothing that has happened since that time has led me to any other conclusion than that this was the first step, that it was right then and that it is right now. There would be the assurance of an independent, trusted tribunal, which there is not now, and all of us would be assured that there would be no order, directive or regulation issued contrary to the law and, if there was, then important rights could be preserved and protected.

I believe that the time has come to review and reassess the basis of the procedure of implementation and the process of designation. This must be undertaken, not on some mystical quota system that does not square with the facts, or on some unscientific or subjective basis, or on the basis of pressure, whether subtle or otherwise, but on the basis of an examination of the real function, need and requirement for capacity of a bilingual nature based on a study of each position in each department and in terms of the requirement to give service. It would have to be recognized that the scope of this requirement would vary from department to department, but I believe that that is the real meaning of institutional bilingualism.

As part of a new approach to the problem of implementation, it goes without saying that the revolutionary aspect must be recognized as unreasonable and unacceptable. This means, of course, that we must end once and for all time-frames which have thus far been unrealistic and which as a result impose a coercive element upon the public service that is neither conducive to learning nor to anything else except resentment. This leads to pressures that are equally non-conducive to learning. Moreover, there is a growing feeling that the present procedure may be injurious to opportunities because superiors, who have a responsibility throughout all of this to get work out, are developing a noticeable tendency to fill the job with someone who does not need to go off on language training.

In this approach we would have to admit that the requirement for bilingual public servants would be reduced in the numerical sense, but I am willing to bet that the quality of the bilingual capacity and the desire to achieve that capacity among public servants would increase, and for the right reasons. To foster this desire the government, I believe, would be bound to provide language training. Most important, the public service would be a place which all Canadians would find attractive to work in and many of the anxieties and fears would be removed. I do not regard this as breaking faith with the principles of the Official Languages Act. Rather, I believe that the proposal is supportive and, moreover, that it is positive. These proposals are not intended to be exhaustive but, rather, to make a new beginning.

I want to make it clear that the Treasury Board, or any member of the government or of this House, ought not to be insensitive to the feelings of the public service of the country. For a start, all of us must face up to the fact that a new attitude is needed, because the pebble of insensitivity that was dropped into the pool has caused waves of misunderstanding that have travelled a fair distance and they will not go away because some members choose to ignore them.

In the few moments that I have left I want to turn to another subject which is important in this area, and that is the relationship of the people who live in it in terms of their local government and its relationship with the federal government. That relationship is best expressed to us in this area through the workings of the National Capital Commission. I am happy to say that of all the commissions and agencies of government, this commission and its workings are beyond the matter of party politics and dissent. I want to commend the government on its choice of a new chairman for the commission. He has held the office for some time. I have heard him speak, I have talked with him and I have come to know him. I believe he bears within his soul and heart the attitude of compromise that will make all the difference in the relationship between the federal government and local government.

However, it is important that there be a sound and strong contact between the two levels of government. I would hope the government would consider taking up with the National Capital Commission and, between the two of them, consider the appointment to the commission of the chairman of the Outaouais regional municipality board on the Quebec side, and of the chairman of the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton on the Ottawa side. I think there has been a good relationship between the two governments on the staff side, but the relationship has not been as sound and as continuing as it might be on the policy side.

I put forward this suggestion, which I made in the first speech I delivered in this House, for the government to consider because I think it is important that, with respect to the long-range aims of both governments, firm consideration be given to it. I think it is also important that, being the largest land owner in the area, the federal government should understand that it does have a responsibility through the National Capital Commission, and perhaps through the Minister of Public Works, to ensure that the land use plans which are developed for federal lands, in the minds of federal planners, do not collide with the work of local municipalities. I hope that through this step there is machinery to bring that about.

The Ottawa area is one in which there is an opportunity; in fact, where it is not too late for us not to make the mistakes that have plagued other areas and the larger cities in Canada with respect to the tendency that has been demonstrated to pack more and more people into fewer and fewer acres of land. I join with the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) in asking the government, over the long haul and in co-operation with the departments, to take a good look at the concept of development of centres of population around existing small towns which have at their root now the social and other amenities which are necessary for a reasonable life in an urban setting, rather than to continue the packing of a diminishing amount of land with larger and larger populations. This would involve the development of inter-urban transportation of a rather sophisticated nature. It would also improve the lifestyle of people not only in existing municipalities that are overcrowded, but perhaps existing municipalities on a smaller scale to which variety might be of benefit.

Now I want to speak about a problem that is close to you as well as to me, Mr. Speaker, and that is the problem facing eastern Ontario farmers today with respect to brucellosis which seems to have broken out in the county which you represent and the one which I represent. We must look at this problem very closely and we must have the courage to decide whether the government program with respect to it has worked. If it has not, we must admit it, and where it has not worked in respect of the individual farmer we must recognize the great difficulties placed upon him in a market where costs are high and returns small. He must be provided with compensation for animals that become more and more valuable, to the extent that compensation is less and less a consideration. Such a program would have to be developed in co-operation with provincial governments, but it is important that it be done because every herd that goes out of existence in the milk producing areas of eastern Ontario will not be replaced and our targets of food production will not be met.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you and hon. members of this House for the indulgence given me with regard to the clock. It is an honour for me to take part in this debate. In closing I wish to extend to you my best wishes and hope that you enjoyed the opportunity for rest provided by the recent recess of parliament.

[Mr. Baker.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions in order to propose a motion in relation to next week's business.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is there agreement to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REINTRODUCTION AND DISPOSITION OF BILLS, RENUMBERED C-5 AND C-6, RESPECTING CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS, AIR CANADA AND THE NATIONAL PARKS ACT

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, there have been negotiations through the usual channels, and I should like to propose a motion to give effect to the agreement announced in the House on January 11 whereby the CNR financing and guarantee bill and the national parks bill are to be restored at the report stage. In the case of the CNR bill there is attached to the motion the recommendation of His Excellency the Governor General. I would assume, in accordance with our procedures, that this recommendation will be printed in today's Votes and Proceedings.

[Editor's Note: For recommendation referred to above, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Drury: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet):

That, notwithstanding the provisions of any Standing Order or practice of this House, the version of the bill intituled "an act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from the 1st day of January, 1973, to the 30th day of June, 1974, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada," as reported with amendments from the Standing Committee on Transportation and Communications during the first session of the twenty-ninth parliament, and the version of the bill intituled "an act to amend the National Parks Act", as reported with amendments from the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development during the first session of the twenty-ninth parliament, be deemed to have been introduced, read a first time, ordered to be printed, read a second time, referred to and reported from a standing committee, and that the said bills be ordered for consideration by the House at the report stage on or after March 8, 1974.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the opposition, we concur in the motion of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). It is agreeable to us.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) is quite correct in his statement that there have been discussions leading to the presentation of this motion, and on behalf of the New Democratic Party I wish to indicate our agreement.

I should like to point out, however, that one of the understandings was that certain commitments that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) made to the committee that dealt with the bill last session would be implemented. The one that is of particular interest and which was spelled out in the committee was that at the appropriate stage, either at the report stage or at third reading, there would be agreement to the presentation of an amendment which would have the effect of deleting from section 6 of the National Parks Act the reference to the expropriation of the lands of Indians.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that this has been fully discussed and agreed to by those who are interested and concerned. It was felt, however, that the agreement should be on the record at this point. On that basis we are prepared to support this motion.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

At 5.09 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WAGNER—OBJECTION TO CERTAIN REMARKS BY POSTMASTER GENERAL

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning certain comments of a discriminatory and defamatory nature made in this House Friday afternoon by the Postmaster General and repeated by him outside this House during the entire weekend. These comments appear on pages 332 and 333 of Hansard for March 8, 1974, in particular.

Because an hon. member on this side of the House dared to ask for explanations, for his own information, on certain dealings presumably to the advantage of the Quebec provincial Liberals, the minister took this to be an insult to French Canadians in Quebec.

Like has often been the case in the past, the minister did not hesitate, by referring to matters of racial prejudice, to generalize his statements in order to sully all the members of the official opposition, including the hon. members for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), Joliette (Mr. La Salle), and Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner).

The minister conveniently forgot to mention the ardent campaign which the Liberal member for Matane fought in order to denigrate the Drapeau administration, to undermine the work of COJO authorities and to prevent the holding of the Olympic Games, and in the case of which no one, either on this side of the House or on the other side, had the slightest wish to pretend that the Liberals are against the French Canadians and always have the odd greenhorn to sully people, to parody the words used by the minister and reported on page 333 of Hansard.

Mr. Speaker, racism of whatever type has no place in this House or in this country and the comments of the Postmaster General are saturated with it.

In rising on a question of privilege as a member of the official opposition, I demand to the Postmaster General to have enough principles and courage to react as a gentleman and state that his comments were exaggerated. Otherwise, I will have no other choice than to believe, as millions of other Canadians, that elections will soon be called and that the narrow-mindedness so often shown by the minister will become for the Liberals a way to save their skin, as they think.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister—

Mr. Speaker: As the House knows, when a member is involved in a question of privilege, he has the opportunity, if he wishes so, to answer briefly, to enable the Chair to determine whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. I doubt whether the right to answer can be assumed by another member on behalf of the one now involved. Moreover, I think that the Postmaster General is in the House.

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I understand that my remarks may have caused a certain anxiety to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner). If he has personal recriminations against Mr. Desrochers or if he has some evidence against that man to support the charges of the member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) which I believe to be baseless, he should state them and they would be considered.

However, I think I know why he may have grievances against that man and I think that the hon. member's feelings ought not to prevail in a matter as important as the Olympic Games. I hope the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) will consider my recommendation and appoint someone to talk on behalf of his party concerning the Olympics, someone who has more common sense than—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Presenting reports from standing and special committees. Motions. Introduction of bills.

Mr. Haliburton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the Chair, but when you called motions you proceeded so rapidly that I missed the opportunity to propose a motion I had prepared. I would hope we might revert to motions so I could do so.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion is a little late. However, if hon. members agree, certainly there will be no difficulty about reverting to motions to allow the hon. member to put his motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Haliburton: Mr. Speaker, I thank you and hon. members.

FISHERIES

ILLEGAL CATCHES BY UNITED STATES FISHERMEN ON BROWN'S BANK—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It is one which is indeed of urgent and pressing necessity in my area of this country. It arises as a result of the ICNAF agreement which was reached in July 1973 and which was thought by Nova Scotia fishermen to protect a defined area known as Brown's Bank from fishing during a defined time of the year. In the last few weeks United States fishermen have been fishing in that area during the restricted period. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House direct the Secretary of State for External Affairs to promptly intervene with the United States government in order to request the immediate withdrawal of United States nationals fishing in the area of Brown's Bank, a protected area under the ICNAF agreement and, further, that this House direct the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry to convene within 24 hours to investigate fully the circumstances which have led to a situation where Canadian fishermen are the only group legally prohibited from fishing in an area lying within 200 miles of our coastline.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

TRANSPORT

CONSIDERATION BY CABINET OF PROPOSALS FOR NEW NATIONAL POLICY—CONSTRUCTION AND RENOVATION OF BOXCARS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Last Thursday the Minister of Transport told the House that Canada does not have a real transport policy for the future and at the same time indicated he will seek the authority of cabinet to elaborate a new policy. Can the Prime Minister now tell the House if the Minister of Transport has in fact made proposals to cabinet for a new transportation policy? If so, is the cabinet presently discussing this matter and what are their feelings in this regard?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are discussing elements of a new transport policy. The minister is in British Columbia today discussing with the four western transport ministers various elements of that policy.

Mr. MacKay: I thank the right hon. gentleman for his answer. Having regard to the fact the Minister of Transport stated on the same day that the federal government will try to build more railway cars to carry lumber, coal and western wheat, and as it now appears that the CPR and the CNR have refused a request by the federal government to construct and renovate some 4,000 boxcars, will the Prime Minister consider changing the transport policy and ordering the railways to comply with the directive of the federal government?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know on what rumour the hon. gentleman is basing his question. The least I can say about it is that he is badly informed.

Mr. MacKay: I am basing my question in part on a report in today's issue of Le Devoir. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he agrees with the statement made by the minister that Canada has everything to have fun with in rail transportation but has no policy in this regard? Does he agree with that statement?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think this is a proper description of the opposition's situation.

ACTION TO PROVIDE FREIGHT CARS IN LIGHT OF POSITION OF RAILWAYS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the statement made by the Minister of Transport in the House last week that the railways do not want to buy cars to carry wheat and "even if they were paid I doubt that they would do it", can the Prime Minister indicate to the House what action, if any, the government proposes to take with a view to seeing that railway cars are provided?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Leader of the Opposition will have gathered from my earlier answer to his colleague that the rumour was untrue and therefore, if things are being done, they will be announced in the proper manner.

Mr. Stanfield: Is it the view of the Prime Minister that a statement made in this House is simply a rumour—a statement by the Minister of Transport?

Mr. Trudeau: I was not referring to the statement by the minister. I was referring to the incident of the boxcars to which the Leader of the Opposition is obviously referring.

Mr. Stanfield: My question related to the supplying of cars and to the statement by the minister in the House that the railways would not provide them and would not do so even if they were paid. In view of that statement by his own minister, I ask the right hon. gentleman whether any action is being taken by the government and, if so, what?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is action being taken by the government. In answering the first question I said that the nature of this action will be announced. Elements of it are being discussed today with the four western transport ministers. I think that if they were not being discussed the opposition would accuse us of proceeding by confrontation and not by way of discussion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There appears to be great interest in this matter and a number of members are seeking supplementaries. Perhaps we might try to complete the first round of questioning, after which I will see the hon. members for Vegreville, Saskatoon-Biggar, Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe and others.

INCOME TAX

MANUFACTURING AND PROCESSING INDUSTRIES—INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING CONTINUATION OF REDUCTION IN RATE AND RAPID WRITE-OFF PROVISION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance based on the very striking increases in profits of corporations in this country, including those in the manufacturing and processing industries. Is it his intention to continue the income tax cut in favour of manufacturing and processing industries and, further, does he intend to continue the rapid write-off provision which he gave them last year?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I shall be submitting an interim report by March 31, as I undertook to do, upon the preliminary effects, as seen at this stage, of the manufacturing and processing corporate tax cuts but will leave it to parliament to evaluate them. But I restate my intention, that I interpret the corporate tax cuts in the manufacturing and processing fields as medium and long-term structural changes meant to encourage increased capacity, meant to encourage, by way of that increased industrial capacity, more jobs. I am glad to say to the House, as I said the other day, that last year there were 110,000 new jobs in manufacturing, 8,000 more than in the six previous years put together.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, we will look at the report which the minister says he will table before the end of the month, but may I ask the minister what evidence he is gathering other than the self-serving and biased questionnaire which he sent to the corporations? What other independent survey had he made of the situation resulting from his immense tax concessions?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that survey was designed by Statistics Canada without any input from myself. When I table that report I will not have seen it previously, and I have made it a point not to see it previously. But I think the questions in that questionnaire will bear scrutiny on any statistical basis that the hon. member wants to attach to them. I just ask the hon. member, when the survey is submitted, to look at the questions as they read and to judge the responses as they are.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I do not quite know how the Minister of Finance expects a firm to tell him that they did not benefit from these goodies, but we will certainly look at the questions and answers. May I ask this question of the minister. In view of the fact that the largest part of the tax loss to the Canadian people was in the fast write-offs, about twice as large as from the tax cut, is the minister intending to continue these fast write-offs for equipment, which cost the taxpayer over half a billion dollars, and will he be prepared to have them reconsidered by parliament at the same time as the tax cut can be considered under a provision of the law?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in calculating whatever the cost was to the Canadian people the hon. gentleman ought not only to take the gross effect of the cuts but should net it out with additional activity which brings in more tax and additional jobs which also bring in more tax. I think the hon. gentleman ought to consider as factual evidence the increase in jobs last year in the manufacturing and processing sectors, continuing into this year. There has also been a tremendous increase, some 46 per cent, in capital expenditure intentions. That was the purpose of the tax cuts, and—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —the purpose in being fulfilled.

FUTURE MAINTENANCE OF BOEING 727 PLANES IN WINNIPEG—REPRESENTATIONS BY MONTREAL MACHINISTS TO MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Transport is absent, I wish to put my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Last week, representatives of the machinists unions of Montreal met the Minister of Transport concerning maintenance of future Boeing 727 in Winnipeg. Can the Prime Minister say whether discussions have in fact taken place in this regard and, if so, what will be the answer of the cabinet?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I had the opportunity of indicating a moment ago, the Minister of Transport is in British Columbia at the present time, where he will meet the ministers of transport of the four western provinces. He did not report to me the meetings mentioned by the hon. member, but I shall bring the matter to the attention of the excellent parliamentary secretary to the minister. He will surely take action.

REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT OF RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that of the hon. member for Central Nova. In view of the fact the Minister of Transport has admitted that past national transportation policy is worthy of criticism, and in view of the fact one of the most critical areas has been removal of rail passenger service in Newfoundland, would the Prime Minister consider in cabinet reinstating this very important service to Newfoundland?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take it this is a representation to the minister and I will convey it to him on the hon. member's behalf.

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENTS TO NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT AFFECTING PRINCIPLE OF COMPETITION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Having regard to the statement made in the House last week by the Minister of Transport to the effect that in his opinion the fundamental principle of competition in working out an over-all and comprehensive Canadian national transportation policy was wrong, is it the intention of the government to bring forth amendments to the National Transportation Act since competition is the basic principle upon which that act is founded?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat what I said in answer to the first question this morning, that the minister is bringing elements of a review of that act before the cabinet. It is certain that the over-all philosophy of the act which he was criticizing, the National Transportation Act of some years ago as adopted by this parliament, is something which is not only being reviewed but being questioned certainly by many of the premiers of the western provinces. It is in response to this that the minister made his speech and in response to this that he is reviewing that act.

EMERGENCY PROGRAM TO PROVIDE RAILWAY CARS TO MOVE GRAIN TO MEET EXPORT COMMITMENTS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of statements by the Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board that our export position is in danger and that we may not be considered reliable suppliers because of the transportation situation, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether the minister or the Department of Transport has in hand an emergency program to supply the necessary transportation to move our grain to export?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As I tried to indicate in my previous answers, Mr. Speaker, the minister is bringing forth to cabinet certain proposals relating to railway cars, and I indicated that this would be announced in the proper way.

Mr. Gleave: In view of the fact the statement by the Minister of Transport did not really deal comprehensively with this matter, may we have some assurance that the minister will at an early date make a statement on motions indicating how he or his department is going to deal with this emergency situation?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the minister dealt at some length with this matter just a few days ago. If the hon. member wants him to deal with other aspects I am sure there will be many other occasions to do so—at the time of consideration of his estimates, on opposition days, or at the time of the minister's own action or announcements in the days and weeks to come.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. John's East for a last supplementary question on this subject in view of the fact that we are still on the first round of questions. Following that, the Chair will see the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys.

STUDY BY TRANSPORT COMMISSION OF GROUND TRANSPORTATION IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in his capacity as Acting Minister of Transport. Has the study undertaken by the Canadian Transport Commission into ground transportation in Newfoundland been completed and, if so, when will the results of that study be released?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that it has been completed, but I will be more than happy to make inquiries for the hon. member. As I recall, at the time it was indicated it would be released as soon as possible after completion. I will get that information and pass it on to him as quickly as possible.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROGRESS IN BRINGING ABOUT ESCALATION OF PENSIONS OF RETIRED EMPLOYEES IN LIGHT OF INCREASING COST OF LIVING

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of the ever-increasing cost of living, can he advise what progress is being made by the board of directors of Canadian National Railways in regard to a much needed escalation of the rates of pension of retired CNR employees?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Here again, Mr. Speaker, I will have to take note of the question on behalf of the minister.

Mr. Muir: In view of the fact that the right hon. gentleman, the leaders of other parties in the House and many other members have received representations from the Retired Railwaymen's Association of the CNR, and in view of the fact this matter was not on the agenda of the January and February meetings of the CNR, will the Prime Minister take a personal interest in the matter and ascertain just how soon these much needed increases will be forthcoming?

Mr. Trudeau: I will make sure that these representations are brought to the attention of the minister, Mr. Speaker.

LACK OF RAILWAY CARS TO MOVE BRITISH COLUMBIA APPLES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that apple producers in British Columbia are having to divert good, fresh marketable apples to processors at less money because of the lack of rail cars to transport them to market, what does the government intend to do about this matter of vital concern to the B.C. economy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated a moment ago, the minister expects to make a statement fairly soon on the question of cars, boxcars.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Transport but as he is not here I shall direct it to the Prime Minister. Is the Minister of Transport, when he introduces his new transport policy to overcome his stated lack of a transport policy, going to request the railways to pay heed to the needs of the apple producers of British Columbia?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am sure these representations will be very much foremost in his mind.

VARIATION IN GROSS TRUCK WEIGHT REGULATIONS IN WESTERN PROVINCES—ACTION TO ACHIEVE UNIFORMITY

Mr. Ed Nelson (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I should like to try the parliamentary secretary. In view of the inconvenience and cost imposed on trucking firms by variations in interprovincial gross vehicle weight regulations and in view of the concern of the four western provinces about this matter, what steps is the Minister of Transport taking to establish higher and more uniform gross vehicle weights across the prairie provinces?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): This is being looked into, Mr. Speaker. The minister also met with the trucking representatives and we also are waiting for a report from them at the present time.

Mr. Nelson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether discussion of this matter is taking place with the provincial ministers of highways?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I cannot speak for the minister on that particular subject, Mr. Speaker, but I presume this will be one of the topics.

INCREASE IN LUMBER PRODUCT PRICES—MONITORING BY DEPARTMENT

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Noting that Domtar Limited of Montreal will increase its prices of lumber products by $30 to $35 effective April 1, has the minister conducted a study or monitored these price increases in lumber and related industries to ensure that these commodity increases are not disruptive in view of what was indicated in the throne speech and the Prime Minister's statement that action would be taken as in the case of oil.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a matter which would fall more particularly under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Ritchie: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has he carried out any study of increased prices in the lumber industry?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have been monitoring the situation very closely. From a high in April, I believe, of last year there has been a 30 per cent reduction as at the end of January. There has been a slight increase of as high as 15 per cent during the month of February, but my information is we can expect declining prices so far as lumber is concerned for the rest of the year.

INCREASE IN WHOLESALE PRICE INDEX—POSSIBILITY OF CONTROLS ON COMMODITY PRICES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question originally was for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs but he has already indicated this type of question, which I had assumed would come under Consumer and Corporate Affairs, should go to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I therefore direct it to that minister. With the wholesale price index having increased by 3.4 per cent in January and by 27 per cent in the past year and with textile products, for example, up 5.5 per cent in one month and wood products up 3.2 per cent, is the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume the hon. member is now coming to his question.

Mr. Stevens: Your assumption is correct, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister contemplating placing controls on any of these commodities or on any other commodities?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has referred to a number of products which are imported into the country and has referred specifically to textiles. Clearly a policy of import controls would not in any way assist the prices of those products as their price is affected by the world supply and demand situation. On the export side, we have looked at this very closely and in my view export controls would be counter-productive. They would have the effect of slowing down the kind of increases in supply we are anxious to see in order to bring about a better balance in supply and demand.

Mr. Stevens: I wonder whether the minister could state simply whether he plans any controls over any commodity at the present time?

Mr. Gillespie: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be recognized for a last supplementary and then I will see the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Stevens: My question is again directed to the same minister, Mr. Speaker. With the purchasing power of the average worker having fallen by $5 a week and real wages having gone down by 2 per cent during the year, while corporate profits after taxes on a real basis went up 35 per cent, can the minister explain to the House who he feels had a very good year in 1973?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ENFORCEMENT OF MAINTENANCE ORDERS ISSUED BY FAMILY COURTS—RECOMMENDATION OF LAW REFORM COMMISSION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In light of the fact that 75 per cent of all family maintenance orders made by Canadian family courts against deserting husbands are defaulted, and in light of the fact these defaults cost Canadian taxpayers $365 million annually, does the minister intend to adopt through legislation the recommendation of the Law Reform Commission which would give family courts an investigative and enforcement apparatus to track down elusive fathers, thereby assuring compliance with any maintenance order issued?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a recommendation from the report of the Law Reform Commission, but as stated in the report, however, it is a matter of mostly provincial jurisdiction which will surely be discussed with the provinces when we will have the opportunity to meet on this question.

MANPOWER

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—LEVEL OF BUDGET IN SUDBURY AREA

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact northern Ontario has had the highest summer unemployment rate in Ontario for the past four years, and in view of the fact the 1973 manpower job market report for northern Ontario predicts high unemployment for young people this summer, can the minister explain why the budget for the Opportunities for Youth program for the Sudbury manpower area has been cut by 33 per cent whereas the allocation for the rest of Ontario has been reduced by only 14 per cent?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would hope we would not become involved from day to day during the question period with the budgets or details of every constituency in relation to the Opportunities for Youth Program. This might involve us in complications and difficulties. The minister might be allowed to reply briefly to the hon. member's question, after which we will go to the next question.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I repeat my answer that the final sub-provincial allocations have not yet been struck.

ENERGY

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF OIL MARKETING AGENCY AS WELL AS NATIONAL PETROLEUM COMPANY

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of last week's meeting between the Prime Minister and the premiers of Alberta and Saskatchewan, in addition to the establishment of a national petroleum company is the government also considering the establishment of an oil marketing or petroleum marketing agency?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, a national oil and gas marketing board is one of the mechanisms by which national prices for these two commodities could be established in Canada. This is very much under discussion at the moment.

FISHERIES

HADDOCK—TAKING OF CATCHES BY UNITED STATES FISHERMEN IN RESTRICTED AREA—REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADA

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (Southwestern Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Because of the agreement reached at the ICNAF conference last July it was understood that there was international agreement to protect haddock, our most valuable groundfish species, during the spawning season, and since contrary to that agreement hundreds of thousands of pounds it is reported, have been taken in the past two weeks by American fishermen from the restricted area, undoubtedly setting back the rebuilding of stocks and conservation for years, what action has the minister taken or what action will he take in order to see that American fishermen are restricted and pulled out of that area?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It will be our purpose to see that all these international agreements are observed, Mr. Speaker.

OBSERVANCE BY OTHER NATIONS OF ICNAF AGREEMENT CURTAILING FISHING OPERATIONS ON GEORGES AND BROWN'S BANKS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the closed seasons listed on page 4 of the government's order in council of January 15, 1974, would the minister inform the House if ships of all nations are abiding by the ICNAF regulation by curtailing fishing operations on Georges and Brown's Banks, or does the prohibition of fishing operations only apply to Canadian fishermen?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the information I have is that all nations other than the United States are adhering very closely to the regulations.

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Fisheries or the Secretary of State for External Affairs be kind enough to tell us whether in fact there is in existence at the moment an international agreement with regard to the haddock fishery?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, there is the undertaking which was entered into at the last ICNAF conference involving all 16 nations that fish in the North Atlantic.

PENSIONS

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER TO CONDUCT INQUIRY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the minister's commitment made in the House last August and confirmed last month in Edmonton that he would appoint a commissioner to go into all aspects of railway pensions, including the position of those already retired from all railway lines in Canada, can he say when that commissioner will be appointed?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall my precise wording. I do recall having stated to the parties themselves that we had under serious consideration the appointment of a commissioner if this type of arrangement could not be arrived at satisfactorily by the parties themselves. I would advise the hon. member, who I know has a great interest in the matter, that we would be prepared to give serious consideration to such action but we are canvassing the matter with the parties to see whether this could not be accomplished in this way.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister endeavour to bring this matter to a conclusion and make a statement to the House on it within a few days?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I have some information that I am checking now. I do not want to deal with the matter in the House at this time because I am not that sure of the accuracy of the information, but I think there may be significant moves afoot right now in this direction. I should like to check it out and I will advise the hon. member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INJURING OF VERDUN MIDGET HOCKEY PLAYERS IN MOSCOW BY SOVIET TEAM—REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In view of the bloody incident which took place this weekend at the Saholniki Park Arena in Moscow, when 14 and 15 year-old hockey players from Verdun, in the province of Quebec, were brutally assaulted and seriously wounded by some Soviet "Midgets" during a fight without equal in the history of hockey, does the minister intend to send a protest to the embassy of the U.S.S.R. and demand compensation for these acts of barbarism?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would hesitate to give that undertaking, but I will certainly look into the circumstances. I am sure the Soviet government itself had hoped that these games would promote international good will.

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the minister to request a complete report on this incident from the Canadian embassy in Moscow, and would he assure the House that it will be made public as soon as it is received?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Certainly there will be inquiries. I could not undertake to make the report public, but I hope I will be able to give an explanation if one is provided to me.

FINANCE

REQUEST THAT MINISTER SUGGEST TO BANKS THAT THEY REDUCE INTEREST RATES TO LOWER COST OF BORROWING

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's frequent statements regarding the close inter-relationship between interest rates in Canada and those in the United States, has he been in touch with the Canadian chartered banks recently to suggest to them strongly that they follow the example of American chartered banks, which have made several reductions in their prime rates in the past few weeks, as a means of lowering the cost of borrowing to Canadians and helping to bring the Canadian dollar back to par with the U.S. dollar?

Hon. John. N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, one of the main factors in the differential between short term rates in the United States and Canada at the moment is the difference between the economic cycles in the United States and Canada. We are in a stronger cycle than is the United States. I am watching the movement of interest rates, as is the governor of the Bank of Canada, with a view to the movement of the exchange rate on the one hand and the increasing money supply on the other.

Mr. Hees: Would the minister and his colleagues please get on their bicycles and pedal a hell of a lot faster than they have been doing recently?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a representation.

SOCIAL SECURITY

MEASURES TO ENSURE THAT TOTAL BENEFIT OF OLD AGE PENSION INCREASES GOES TO RECIPIENTS

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): I would like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

A recent press release reported an increase in old age pensions. This time has the minister taken any steps to see that total benefit be paid directly to old people so as to avoid any possibility of provincial governments, Quebec especially, stealing the increase by reducing social welfare or still by raising rent in homes?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, recently I had the opportunity of raising that issue with my colleagues, my Quebec counterpart especially, and I hope that all interested parties will find the situation satisfactory in April.

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): I should like to put a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

As this is another "as of April" provision, does the minister plan to adopt a formula guaranteeing the elderly an increase without having to spend time fighting about it with the provinces?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of "fighting" with the provinces. They manage housing for the elderly and are responsible for setting the rent. Representations must be made directly to the provinces, and pressures exerted upon them; I cannot dictate to them.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON EFFORTS TO REFORM INTERNATIONAL MONETARY SYSTEM AND VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact the minister failed in his speech the other day to go into the question of international monetary relations, the value of gold, the reform of the international monetary system and, may I say, the change of policy with regard to the value of the Canadian dollar, would the minister now consider making a statement in the House and so bringing the House into his confidence on what is happening with the Canadian dollar, thus avoiding some of the questions that have been put this morning?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member. I found that in the 30 minutes I wanted to do justice to a few of the domestic issues.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A few political ones.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Perhaps on another occasion we could have a discussion about the international situation, something I have been thinking about.

HEALTH

ACHIEVEMENT OF PATIENT-DOCTOR RATIO OF SIX HUNDRED TO ONE—ADMISSION OF FOREIGN DOCTORS TO CANADA

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact he has expressed the view that the ratio of patients to doctors should be 600 to one, and in view of the fact the throne speech contained no reference on that score, does he intend to move by legislative action or by regulation in order to achieve this desire of his, which I hope will not be achieved because I believe the ratio is a bit high?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I did not express the hope that the ratio be one to 600. I merely reported that among experts in the matter, in various countries, the ratio of one to 600 is considered reasonable.

Canada's objective has not been set definitely. The matter will be discussed with the provinces since they are the ones that will have final say in the matter when deciding on the number of doctors each province wants under its jurisdiction in relation to its population.

[English]

Mr. Korchinski: In view of the fact medical care insurance is available to all Canadians, is he considering consulting the Minister of Manpower and Immigration regarding the withholding of applications to come to Canada that have been made by foreign doctors in order that the ratio that he himself has established may be maintained?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: I am afraid the hon. member did not understand my first answer. This ratio is not one that I established personally or that is established for Canada, it is merely a ratio generally recognized.

As for consultation with my colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, I say once again that it is quite clear that no legislation can be introduced in this respect unless the provinces take a decision in the allocation of a certain number of doctors under their jurisdiction.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF AD HOC MEMBERS—INCLUSION OF INDIANS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Inasmuch as the National Parole Board has now been revitalized and increased in stature, can the minister tell the House when he will be able to make the announcement about the appointment of the ten ad hoc members which was authorized by parliament at the last session, and will there be included in that ad hoc membership a couple of people of native Indian origin?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have been interviewing potential candidates for the last few weeks and I hope to make the appointments shortly. Among those I am interviewing are several native people.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I have a short supplementary. Would the minister like to take the same enlightened approach he took in regard to the Chairman of the National Parole Board and apply it to the Commissioner of Penitentiaries?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PROGRESS OF PROGRAM TO DECENTRALIZE STAFF

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the minister's announcement at the Western Economic Opportunities Conference that decentralization of his department would be accomplished by switching the ratio of 70 per cent in Ottawa and 30 per cent in the field to the exact reverse, why is this program behind schedule and what is the minister doing about the hemorrhage of senior staff to other departments?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I could answer that question fully within the time constraint you obviously would impose. I can say that decentralization is moving ahead. Quite a few people are in the field and most of the senior positions have been filled. I will be very glad subsequently to answer any other question the hon. member may have, perhaps in committee or elsewhere.

Mr. Roche: How does the minister propose to have effective decentralization of the decision-making process without dislocating the lives of many career civil servants who live in Ottawa and without at the same time duplicating and adding staff in the field?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That appears to be argument. Perhaps the minister and the hon. member might get together and continue the debate some other time, possibly after the question period.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEAKAGE OF CLASSIFIED INFORMATION—INQUIRY AS TO SECOND INVESTIGATION—PRESENT POSITION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to know whether the minister is prepared to say if a second investigation is going on in his department or CIDA into unauthorized disclosure of classified information?

[Mr. Howard.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Only in the most general way, Mr. Speaker. There is no specific suspect in mind.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Will the minister then say that he is satisfied that the resignation recently accepted puts an end to unauthorized disclosures which eventually turn up in the House?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that all members of parliament would realize what a difficult and, for the employee concerned, rather tragic ending there was and that everyone would govern themselves accordingly. As far as I am concerned in my respective responsibilities I have given instructions that there are to be greater precautions than ever before.

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF ASSISTANCE TO CATTLEMEN IN LIGHT OF DIFFICULTIES

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, may I compliment you on giving priority to backbenchers today. The calibre of questions is definitely on the rise.

An hon. Member: It was until now.

Mr. Cullen: My question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the serious difficulties being faced by Canadian cattlemen, costing them thousands of dollars on a daily basis, is the minister or the Minister of Finance prepared to make some announcement within the next few days on what is going to be done in the short term and long term to cope with this problem?

An hon. Member: A good question.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I said last Friday, I believe, several suggestions are being put forward and we are considering those. What solutions we will come up with to aid these people in the plight in which they find themselves at this time I am not prepared to say at the moment because we are still considering them.

REQUEST FOR MORE FUNDS FOR MEDICAL RESEARCH

Mr. Trevor Morgan (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the deficiency in funds provided by the government for medical research in Canada, which will result in the stopping of many necessary research projects and stop very intelligent young doctors going into the research field, is there any hope at all that the minister will reconsider his position and grant more money for this necessary medical research?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all the Medical Research Council has been awarded much more money than last year. But then, funds allotted to medical research will always be inadequate. Third, I do not agree with the hon. member that many research projects will be stopped. This is not the information I have on that matter.

ACTION TO ENSURE THAT BEEF, HOG AND MILK PRODUCERS CONTINUE OPERATIONS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Agriculture is perhaps in a similar vein to the one put by the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton. In view of the fact that 90 per cent of the increase of $1.4 billion in farm income from 1972 to 1973 was received by the wheat and grain producers of Canada and approximately only 7 per cent was received by the beef, hog and milk producers, what immediate, concrete proposals and incentives does the government intend to undertake to ensure that these producers remain in these types of farming and do not take off, if the minister will pardon a pun, for greener fields?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we outlined some of the proposals in the throne speech and we hope to be initiating some of them with the farmers and my provincial counterparts as soon as we can. How soon that will be I am not prepared to say at this time. I realize, as does the hon. member, it is most important that some incentive and guarantee be provided to keep these people in production. I am not 100 per cent sure of his figures but I do know these people must have a decent return or they are not going to stay in business.

REQUEST FOR DEFICIENCY PAYMENT FOR BEEF PRODUCERS RATHER THAN HIGH TARIFFS

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture follows the same vein. In view of the fact the western cattle industry would be in a very detrimental position if the government introduced a program of high tariffs related to the movement of beef into the American market or vice versa, can the minister assure the House that in trying to resolve this question the government will stand by the principle of free trade and in fact bring in some program of temporary deficiency payments?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member's colleague asked the same question last week. I said we were considering many different proposals and that is one we are considering. I am also prepared to visit my counterpart in the United States and discuss the quota problem, the tariff position and also the DES problem.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster and then call orders of the day.

HARBOURS

PORT OF SAINT JOHN—FIRE ON WHARVES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REPLACE LOSSES

Mr. Tom Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Transport. In view of the disastrous $3 million fire on the wharves at the port of Saint John over the weekend, would the acting minister give an assurance that there will be a full survey of the losses and as soon as possible a statement of the government's intentions to replace the losses?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer would be yes to both questions. Obviously all of us regret the fire. I was advised this morning that the survey to which the hon. member referred has begun. As soon as there is anything to report both as to the problem and the interim solution, I will be glad to pass it on, or the Minister of Transport will.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for the Yukon rises on a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, since the President of the Privy Council has resisted the blandishment of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with respect to the introduction of the bill to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965, standing in his name on today's order paper, I wonder if he would consider by unanimous consent reverting to the introduction of bills for the purpose of introducing the bill standing in my name on page 10 of the order paper which deals with the same subject matter and probably in precisely the same terms.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will be giving first reading to the bill that was stood today very shortly, so that my hon. friends will have a chance to support it.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council rises on a point of order.

TIME LIMIT ON SPEECHES ON LAST DAY OF THRONE SPEECH DEBATE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is the last day of the throne speech debate and there are a large number of members who want to contribute to the debate. There have been discussions among the parties and perhaps it might be agreed that we limit the first speech by the representative of each party to 20 minutes and all the rest of the speeches to be made today to 15 minutes. If that is agreeable, perhaps we could make that an order of the House.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we agree to this. I think it was also part of the understanding that overtime would be taboo.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed, including the taboo?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Friday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stollery for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I join with other members in welcoming the Governor General and his lady to Rideau Hall. I also congratulate the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) for so eloquently moving and seconding the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. By so doing they demonstrated the good fortune of their own constituents and of the Liberal Party.

In the time allotted to me I shall talk about some initiatives taken or soon to be taken by the government to further assist Canada's industrial development.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, a great deal has happened since we met to debate the last Speech from the Throne. Canada has joined 101 other trading nations through the Tokyo round of multilateral trade negotiations in seeking to further liberalize world trade.

You will recall the industrial development policy framework that I have spoken about on numerous occasions. It involves objectives, a coherent set of industrial policies, and particularly strategies for particular industries. I think that during the course of this past year we have made substantial progress in the development of a coherent set of industrial policies and in formulating particular industrial strategies for particular industrial sectors. I think that as a result we have helped to build a stronger industrial base, and a stronger industrial base for Canada in the years ahead.

The House has also passed the Foreign Investment Review Act which, after its impending proclamation—I emphasize that proclamation is impending—will ensure by law that future foreign investment is to Canada's significant benefit. It will give to Canadians greater control over their own economic future.

Hon. members are aware of the important role that the Export Development Corporation has played and will play in providing competitive financing to enable the export of Canadian capital goods and related services to take place. They should also be aware of the direct benefits this brings to Canadians through the development of technology and the direct or indirect assistance to hundreds, indeed thousands, of Canadian small businesses. Hon. members will recall that last April the House passed an interim bill raising the lending ceiling for long-term financing by the Export Development Corporation to $1.5 billion. At that time I referred to the preparation of a more comprehensive bill. The forthcoming bill should provide ceilings sufficient for the corporation to operate for a number of years into the future. I look forward to speaking on and elaborating this topic during the second reading debate.

Small business is vital to our future industrial development and economic prosperity. It, too, will be greatly assisted by the establishment of the independent Crown corporation to be called the Federal Business Development Bank, as outlined in the proposals I made to the House last July. By building on the strengths of the old Industrial Development Bank and our highly successful counselling assistance to small enterprises program, the FBDB will be designed to meet the three greatest needs of small business, namely, access to expanded and more flexible financing, management counselling and training, and information on how to take advantage of other programs and services. The enabling legislation will be introduced this session.

As a result of initiatives taken by the federal government and the Western Economic Opportunities Conference, we are working in close co-operation with the provincial governments involved to make possible the greater industrialization of western Canada by taking greater advantage of its tremendous wealth of natural resources.

We have made progress in other areas. For instance, my department has decentralized and strengthened its regional offices in order to bring our services closer to businessmen. We are moving as well into the future through the introduction of the metric system. I shall be introducing a joint resolution in both Houses of Parliament during the present session to seek approval of a time table for Canada's conversion to the metric system.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I should like to concentrate my remarks on the further upgrading of Canada's resources in Canada prior to export. Since confederation, Canadian governments have wrestled with the problem of how to maximize Canada's benefits from our abundance of natural resources. It has always been generally agreed that our economic returns would be higher if we processed more of our resources here at home. There has been agreement, Mr. Speaker, but not a lot of action.

Since confederation, Canada, essentially, has followed some form of John A. Macdonald's old national policy. It was, essentially, a high tariff policy, building a wall behind which Canada's infant manufacturing industries could be protected from the competition of their southern competitors.

The old national policy worked reasonably well for the first 50 years. Increasingly, however, if we look back over the past 50 years it will be seen that Liberals were becoming apprehensive about the effects of protective tariffs on the efficiency and entrepreneurship of Canada's manufacturing industry. Obviously, a national policy based on a highly protected Canadian market would not, by itself, bring about any significant change in the degree of processing of our own national resources. Our market was too small then; it is still too small today. Canada, as you know, is a major industrial country, but we have the smallest market of any industrialized nation.

The other side of the coin is that the other major industrial nations—Japan, the European nations particularly, and to an increasing degree, the United States—have depended to an ever greater extent on increasing quantities of raw materials which they have had to import to fuel their industries. They provide access to supplies of raw materials like Canada's at zero or near zero tariff levels. But they, too, have maintained a protective tariff system on their manufactured products, products that mean jobs and need skills. In fact, the greater the degree of processing, the higher is the domestic tariff on imported products. That is the situation we face now as a competing, industrialized nation.

Of course, another thing happened in the past 50 years which did not help to stimulate the upgrading of Canadian resources in Canada. I refer to the near tidal wave, not of foreign investment per se as foreign investment, but of foreign investment which brought about foreign ownership and foreign control. The enormous increase in foreign control of our manufacturing industries and the even greater increase of foreign content with regard to some of our more important natural resource industries have had a serious effect.

One of the great ironies of Canadian history is that those policies which relied so heavily on tariffs to protect Canadian manufacturers against foreign competition failed utterly to protect Canada's manufacturing and secondary processing industries from foreign control. Indeed, those same policies encouraged the creation of branch plants and the takeover of existing Canadian enterprises. Yes, the almost complete laissez-faire approach to foreign investment effectively worked against upgrading of Canadian resources in Canada. Those who were exporting unprocessed raw materials to their affiliated companies and customers had a stake in maintaining the status quo.

As I have already said, Mr. Speaker, there is general agreement among Canadians that we should process more of our raw materials prior to export. However, there has not been a great deal more than that until quite recently. In the sense of policy initiatives and new measures to bring about the upgrading of Canadian resources, more has been done in this past year than in any year in the history of Canada. There was probably more done in the past year than in the last 50 put together.

Let me illustrate what I mean. I want to deal specifically with six major areas bearing upon this particular point. First, we introduced the corporate tax rate reductions for manufacturing and secondary processing to put Canadian industry on a fully competitive basis with the tax systems of competing countries and to provide an incentive to further processing in Canada. That was done about a year ago.

Second, we have taken the initiative in the current GATT negotiations to bring about common or zero tariffs in selected sectors. As I have often said in public forums, Canada will be seeking to eliminate, or at least significantly reduce, the bias which has promoted trade in raw materials and prevented the installation of world-scale, internationally competitive processing facilities in Canada. We have been encouraged by the fact that for the first time the sector approach will be included as a negotiating technique in the forthcoming negotiations. This will involve the negotiation of free or freer trade from the raw materials through to end products in industrial sectors consisting of closely related groups of products. For example, the zinc sector could be defined to include zinc ores and concentrates, zinc metal, alloys of zinc and zinc die castings. The pulp and paper sector could include wood pulp, newsprint, the bulk packaging papers and boards, fine papers and even printed matter in certain manufactures of paper. The successful use of the sector approach in these GATT negotiations would present many new opportunities to Canada.

Third, we have adopted an energy policy aimed at self-sufficiency for Canadians at prices below world prices. The question might be asked, why is this important to upgrading? I think there are two basic reasons why it is important.

First, upgrading is energy intensive. It is probably the most energy intensive of all our industries and the availability of relatively low cost energy will be enormously important in improving the comparative advantage of Canadian processing facilities and offsetting some of the comparative disadvantages that Canadian industries have to contend with today. I do not have to emphasize the harsh winters, long distances and high unit transportation costs.

The second reason why it is important is that oil and natural gas are feedstocks for the potentially very large industries of Canada. I am, of course, referring to the petrochemical industry, an industry which has been held back because historically feedstock costs to Canadian processors have been higher than feedstock costs which their competitors in the United States could obtain.

Hon. members are well aware that energy costs are moving upward much more dramatically in other industrialized countries. Canada has the opportunity to develop an energy policy which will support upgrading and which will not be neutralized by higher costs. Think about this for a moment. If Canadian industry, particularly the secondary processing industry, had to pay international prices, what would be the economic incentive to do the processing of, for example, Canadian ores in Canada rather than in Japan?

The fourth initiative I want to refer to is the Foreign Investment Review Act under which proposals for further processing our natural resources prior to export will be an important fact in assessing the whole question of significant benefit to Canada. It will be an important measure, an important lever in bringing about the further processing of our natural resources in Canada.

Fifth, we are actively supporting further processing through encouragement of research and development under our various support programs. They are considerable. Let me just run through them quickly. Under the PAIT program, we have been supporting the development of refining processes such as continuous copper smelting. We have been working with the province of Alberta and the private sector on new uses for sulphur through the Sulphur Utilization Development Institute. We have been working and supporting the wood products industry in a number of different ways. I will touch on only a few. For example, we have been participating in the development of new uses for poplar, a wood species which is at present under-utilized. We are also working with the Hardwood Plywood Association to develop thin veneer plywood for export.

We are participating with the government of British Columbia and the Council of Forest Industries in an overseas market development program which is in part aimed at promoting the upgrading of our lumber exports through the sale of housing components, particularly to the Japanese market. We are assisting in a number of projects aimed at encouraging further processing of grains and oilseeds and helping to finance a pilot project in Saskatchewan to develop the technology to produce protein, starch and oils from grains and oilseeds.

Sixth, we introduced amendments to the Export and Import Permits Act last week which can be used to bring about greater resource upgrading. However, I wish to emphasize that the policy of upgrading will be applied flexibly and selectively. Different commodities face different circumstances. There will be cases when it will still be sound economic sense to export some resources in a relatively unprocessed form, but where the upgrading of Canadian resources prior to export is or can be a sound and viable economic proposition, and we think there will be many cases, we will expect Canadian industry to seize the opportunities at its own initiative. It should not be necessary to resort to forceful or restrictive measures. There are, however, means at the disposal of the government to bring about the desired results in those cases where industry does not respond to the opportunities in the way we think it should. One such means, and I would like to strongly emphasize that this would be a measure of last resort, would be the imposition of export controls.

Hon. members are aware that the government intends to seek their approval of legislation to enable the government to introduce controls selectively on unprocessed Canadian resources. I refer, of course, to Bill C-4 which has been tabled for first reading.

I do not have the time to deal with what I consider to be some of the major opportunities in the petrochemical industry, opportunities which over the next few years, certainly by the end of this decade, should involve the investment of more than $1 billion. Here, the multiplier in terms of value added is very substantial. I hope to discuss these prospects with the government of Alberta later this week.

I have looked at the clock, Mr. Speaker, and I see that my time has just about expired. I thank the House for the opportunity which has been accorded me.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to join with my colleagues in congratulating the new holder of the office of Governor General and his lady and bring them greetings from the citizens of Swift Current-Maple Creek. I also wish to pay my respects to the mover (Mr. Stollery) and seconder (Mr. Pelletier) of the address. They were paid a very great honour by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

The Speech from the Throne is in very general terms and it indicates to me that the problems of western Canada still await a solution, that we are still awaiting some action. This is the second Speech from the Throne to which I have listened. Once again, the government is asking the people of this country to restrain their expenditure but at the same time we find that the government, in a year when inflation is running at some 10 per cent, is increasing its own expenditures by 20 per cent. So it seems the government does not really want to do anything about inflation. To increase expenditures by that dimension in an inflationary period makes no sense at all to me, and despite all the talk about inflation being a psychological problem I suspect it is more of a political one. All across the country we see a frightening picture of the declining value of money. Yet the federal budget this year contains provision for spending $1,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada.

Last year and again this year we have witnessed a horrible world scramble for food in which the rich eat and the poor go hungry. The wealth and industry of some countries will permit them to secure food. Possession of resources by many individuals will allow them economic advantages not possessed by most of their countrymen.

One of the worst features about inflation is that it diverts investment from production to speculation, particularly in commodities. This is natural, I suppose, since it reflects an attempt to neutralize the depreciation of the value of money. Already the traders of rich countries are contracting ahead for supplies and securing production franchises for the future. This is a whole new ball game for Canada. In the rich United States we see the sold-out sign on national stocks and reserves. This is angering the consumer sector which considers it has first call on these supplies. We may now face the truth. "Have" countries are to be blackmailed into reducing their standard of living to avoid violent retaliation from their trading partners. Events in the oil world clearly indicate what is possible from possessors of scarce resources, even those with wheat and rice producing lands.

It is obvious to most people that economic geography has been immeasurably more bountiful to Canada than to many other parts of the world. We occupy a commanding position in the world's agricultural arena, and our wallop as an agri-power surely offers us a golden opportunity to play a more decisive international role for peace and prosperity. The world protein revolution depends greatly on our production of foods and feeds. It is too far advanced to be stopped, but its acceleration has been supported by the bargain basis upon which our food products, particularly our grain, have been available, and I would guess that the revaluation of world oil prices is inviting a counter-revaluation of farm prices. This will not slow down the world protein revolution but it should bring an overdue correction in terms of trade with all our customers. It should, also, reassert our economic bargaining power and remind the world how powerful a political weapon food can be.

The same ferment as is racking the Arab world is also increasing demand in the world's meat markets at a hectic pace, but here, as is not the case with oil, the shortage is real and we in Canada should be one of the suppliers of last resort.

Food prices are poised on the verge of another take-off. For example, the Italians, although drained of dollars by oil outrage, nevertheless bid the latest California tuna auction up by 25 per cent. China has been showing herself to be a most resolute and realistic customer for the proprietary products we have, asking no political favours and counting herself lucky to pay her money. The rest of the communist world, the Arab world and Japan have no choice but to follow, Japan particularly now that the threat of polluted waters is endangering her historic fish diet.

It seems to me that the Speech from the Throne was very specific about measures that will hurt us in western Canada but very general about the things that would help us. In Saskatchewan, for example, with no international airport and no harbour works, we often wonder what we do get from the Department of Transport. For years we have been asking for some assistance to be given to the port of Churchill, the only port in the prairie provinces. I should like to quote from a report indicating the savings that use of the port of Churchill brings to producers of grain in western Canada. Here is a table issued by the grain Commission for 1972-73 showing the average cost of moving a bushel of grain from a mid-prairie point, in this case, Scott, Saskatchewan, to Japan and Europe. The figures are as follows:

Via St. Lawrence ports	56.9
Via Maritimes ports	70.1
Via Thunder Bay direct	49.1
Via Churchill	38.8

This represents a saving of more than 30 cents a bushel compared with the present cost of moving grain through Maritimes ports.

The history of federal government assistance to agriculture in western Canada is that it has tended to drive people from the land and to discourage new and young farmers from getting into the business of food production. As an example, the government's feed grain policy has resulted in more U.S. grain being imported, more U.S. cattle being imported, and empty feed lots in western Canada.

Our excessive inflation is the most worrisome aspect of the economy. It takes the ambition and starch out of everyone, and it is just fruitless for any businessman to really try.

One of the most important lessons to be learned from the history of agriculture is that no precise forecasts can be made, because the mood of mother nature is not constant. Thus, in any legislation which is proposed we should allow plenty of margin for error.

The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board has criticized some of my colleagues for attacking his LIFT program while at the same time taking part in it. The LIFT program was production control with a vengeance, Mr. Speaker. In order to get a quota to deliver wheat we were forced to join the LIFT program and leave our land idle.

One of the main reasons for lagging exports is that at the present time we have no ability in Canada to stockpile grain. All other bulk commodities can be stockpiled by the railways, such as coal, potash, ore, sulphur and so on. Blaming the farmers for not hauling grain to the country elevators is a real red herring.

I can quote the latest grain statistics showing that at the end of February our wheat supplies in commercial positions were 189.6 million bushels, while our overseas clearances of wheat up to the same time this year were only 184.5 million bushels. In other words, we have more supplies in commercial position right now than we exported in the first seven months of the crop year. Our grain industry is plagued with problems, many of them unsolved because of bad advice from experts who have never had to meet a payroll and have never missed a pay cheque.

I should like to mention some of the people at the other end of the spectrum, people who are practical and hard working and who can leave no room for error. I refer to the country grain buyers of western Canada. These people act as manager, secretary, janitor, bookkeeper, receptionist, adviser, weighmaster and inspector. These are the people who are really the key men in our great grain industry, an industry which this year will be bringing billions of dollars to the prairies.

The keystone of the country elevator operation is the mutual confidence that must exist in light of the reciprocity of interest between the producer and the elevator operator. In most businesses two signatures are required on a cheque to commit a company to pay money. Yet there are many country elevator operators who buy close to a million bushels of grain a year and write the cash tickets. I know of no other business where one signature commits a company to amounts such as this.

Country elevators have been declared by parliament to be works for the general advantage of Canada. Parliament has set out hours of work; they must be open at all reasonable hours. Yet grain buyers are still exempt from the hours of work limitations under the Canada Labour Code, and they work in dusty conditions that are often medically unacceptable. Right now we have only two companies whose country operations are affiliated to unions; the remaining six are not.

Grain buyers are required to work weekends, if necessary, for which they receive $5 for each boxcar loaded. They have to be able to identify the grain as there are many unlicensed varieties grown in western Canada. They must establish the grade, dockage and the weight. They must store the grain properly, cooper the grain car, load the car and do moisture tests. Yet we find that over 99 per cent of all the grain that is bought and graded by agreement is to the satisfaction of the company and the producer.

Let me refer to the latest report of the Canadian Grain Commission. Under the heading "Producers' Complaints" the report states:

> During 1971, the commission and the assistant commissioners investigated nine written complaints about producer transactions with operators of licensed primary elevators. In most cases, it was possible to arrange satisfactory settlements between the parties concerned.

Their workload is continually increasing and the requirement for protein tests at country elevators is only a short way down the road. Farm service supply needs are now a major item of paperwork. There has been a tremendous build up in the number of forms and paperwork to the point that, where the grain buyer used to be able to work seven hours and tidy up his paperwork in one hour, it now takes him at least four hours a day just to straighten out the forms and paperwork. These people certainly deserve our thanks.

We now have an economy operating on inflationary expectations, and I see nothing in the throne speech to break this situation. Government spending in Canada is approaching 40 per cent of our gross national product. In 1952 the figure was 21 per cent; in 1962 it was 31 per cent. Compared to other countries, government spending in 1972 in the United States was 32 per cent of the gross national product, in Britain 36 per cent, in France 37 per cent, in Germany 37 per cent and in Japan 17 per cent. I question whether we should by trying to lead the world in this kind of competition. In short, Canada has one of the most expensive and expansive bureaucracies in the world.

There has been a lot of mention made of ships' captains and seagulls in this debate. This government reminds me of a little group in a lifeboat who have lost control.

This is what a lot of my constituents see, Mr. Speaker. They see transportation needs increasing while the government watches our railroads decline. I could quote the latest Statistics Canada figures on railway carloadings, which indicate that the volume of freight loaded during the month of January, 1974, decreased by 2.7 per cent from the 1973 period. Similar decreases are occurring in the movement of coal, wheat, lumber and pulpwood, though there has been a great increase in the movement of potash. This would seem to give the lie to the story that because of bad snow conditions in western Canada the railways cannot move grain; all of our potash comes from western Canada.

My people see demand for dairy products increasing but the number of dairymen declining. Milk and butter production are going down. They see the need for red meat produced by farmers increasing. They see our feedlots empty, our livestock feeders going broke. The government is asking for more agricultural products; they will not get more by bidding less. I could go on and on. However, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) would say: "This is the Liberal way".

The election in Britain should serve to remind us that not so long ago the Canadian people told us that they wanted constructive action and not too many more words. They wanted the ship of state back on an even keel. This throne speech lacks what we all crave—a sense of unity and purpose.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join those who spoke before me in this debate in offering my respectful compliments to their Excellencies the Governor General and Mrs. Léger. I should also like to take this occasion to point out the excellent speeches made by the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier). To both I wish great success and a bright parliamentary future.

Mr. Speaker, the building of the new Mirabel International Airport in Montreal and particularly the expropriation it required have given rise for some time to criticisms in certain quarters and I should like to take advantage of this debate to answer some of the questions raised regarding that expropriation, and explain the solutions this settlement has brought forward to deal with those different problems.

One should remember that Montreal is a turntable in the field of transportation not only in North America but all across the world. The ever increasing importance of air transport in the world has made it an absolute must for Montreal to have airport facilities allowing it to take up the challenge. The government of Canada, Mr. Speaker, also had to make sure that the new airport would not be stifled after a few years of operation by restrictions similar to those now experienced at Dorval and several airports in the world. And the only way to do this was to control future developments in the noise areas. So it was imperative to foresee those developments inconsistent with the operation of the airport, particularly housing.

After consultation with the provincial government at that time it was thus decided to expropriate 93,450 acres of a vast rural territory, 17,000 of which for the so-called operational area, and 76,450 in the peripheral area.

It should be immediately pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that only the residents of the operational area will end up moving, that is 157 now and no more than 40 others in 1988. So 197 moving out is not exactly the great disturbance of 1755 whatever some local agitators might say about it.

Moreover, and this is for the guidance of hon. members, in the other great airport we are going to build, that of Pickering, only people from the operational area were expropriated, a 19,000 acre area. In Pickering almost all the expropriated people will have to move. Other owners in the outlying area will not have to move since the province of Ontario agreed to legislate so as to control the present development rights on lots extending over an 80,000 acre area. On the other hand, as far as the Mirabel airport is concerned, the Quebec government of that time refused to co-operate along these lines.

According to a totally unfounded assertion that was deliberately spread in some circles, the Sainte-Scholastique citizens were unfairly compensated as compared with the Pickering citizens. I wish to say today that such an assertion is untrue and entirely without foundation. It is true that expropriation for the Mirabel airport took place in 1969, therefore under the previous legislation, while that in Pickering took place in 1973 under the new legislation. Nevertheless, in both laws, the new one as well as the previous one, the sale value of expropriated property is used as the main compensation base and that takes into account the special value as well as the harm resulting from expropriations in the case of the owners. Both laws are based on the same principle of equity and justice, whether the expropriated people are from Pickering or from Mirabel.

The difference between the new 1973 legislation and the previous one, which goes a long way back, is in that the new law provides for a more flexible advisory mechanism, a more complicated and longer process as to the stages of the expropriations as a whole.

Now, even without any legal obligations, since expropriation in Mirabel have taken place under the former legislation, this government wanted to take present requirements into account. We decided that all Mirabel residents should benefit on a retroactive basis under the new legislation provisions like those who are expropriated from Pickering.

With this in mind, Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and myself went to Mirabel and announced that an additional compensation of about $16 million would be paid to those who had been paid as well as to people who had not been paid yet. Here are these five benefits: first of all, $3,000 to be paid to every homeowner-resident on the date of expropriation, second, every homeowner will get a 5 per cent interest with arrears to July 1, 1969, and 6 per cent from that date up to 1970. In addition, expropriated people in both Mirabel and Pickering will be exempt from paying rent during a period of 23 months. As well, every homeowner-occupant in Mirabel on the date of expropriation will get a reimbursement allowance for the usual notarial fees that he had incurred for the purchase of a new house to replace the house that was expropriated. Fourth, in Mirabel, every homeowner who would have lost the advantage of a preferential interest rate will receive an equal compensation, provided his claim is justified. Fifth, every homeowner in Mirabel who had to leave within fewer than 90 days' notice will receive an additional compensation of 10 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, even after the government has announced all these advantages, which I believe are very generous and offered under no obligation, another unjustified charge was made that the government had not followed any criterion to proceed with the basis assessment of homeowners in Mirabel.

On the contrary, as soon as the expropriation process began, the government had called upon three of the largest assessment firms of the province of Quebec, that are both independent and specialized in this area, thus providing two major guarantees of competence and equity, both for the expropriated people and for the government.

I can assure the House that the work of these assessors was certainly not easy, especially since it involved a rural area where the real estate market was not very active.

Under these circumstances, the assessors, after a detailed study, decided that the most adequate and equitable assessment method would be that based on the physical value, which reflects the real value and involves the following calculations: (1) the value of the piece of land itself, established after consultation with agronomists with good knowledge of the area; (2) the depreciated replacement cost of the buildings; (3) as concerns the improvements made to the properties, they were all included and assessed on the basis of current prices; and (4) the compensation for damages included the removal expenses, the loss on machinery and stock, the costs incurred for conditioning specialized cultures, notarial fees, etc.

It is not a secret that in cases of expropriation, compensations are somewhat more generous than required in order to reduce the risk of injustices and errors, which are always possible in evaluations and other operations involving the human factor. We thought it better to err by giving too much rather than the opposite.

Mr. Speaker, we are very pleased by the fact that 89 per cent of the Mirabel claims have already been settled. Of a grand total of 3,126 cases, only 349 remain to be settled. To hasten the settling of the 349 remaining cases, we have accepted the request made by the three members of this area, the members for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Fox), Labelle (Mr. Dupras) and Terrebonne (Mr. Comtois), and by the CIAC committee, a local committee, to establish a conciliation board formed of three men highly esteemed and very qualified residents of the area, Messrs. Lacharité, Faguy and Noël, all readily acceptable by the expropriated people and the government.

The first case analyzed by this board was settled in a few hours. With the express request of the CIAC, the board has begun the examination of a second case which took a long time, because the parties, especially the members of the CIAC, wanted to turn it into a typical case or, I should rather say a famous cause.

I must admit the three members of the conciliation board have displayed outstanding patience, hearing a great many witnesses, reports, experts and neighbours. Day after day, the CIAC members practically lived in the hearings room and analysed the matter from all angles and then some.

It is therefore at least surprising that in mid-February the CIAC members decided to deliver an ultimatum thus trying to get the conciliation board to publish a report immediately. Those same people who had brought forward so much evidence are now ordering the immediate release of a report.

As for ourselves, we are serenely awaiting the board's report. It will be our duty to correct any injustice to which it will give rise.

On the other hand, if the CIAC members keep on obstructing and prolonging the hearing of each case, we shall have to remind the expropriated that other avenues are open to them and could lead to solutions.

In other words, if the CIAC members delay the hearings unnecessarily, by producing numerous witnesses or through other even less democratic methods of obstruction we shall then advise the well-disposed expropriated either to negotiate directly with us or to bring their case to court, as they have the right to do.

Should the courts grant them more generous amounts than ours, we shall be pleased to pay them. Moreover, we shall pay their court and counsel fees.

Another exaggeration has been spread around by the CIAC and a few small politicians badly in need of desperate causes, namely that the government has played Santa Claus for people expropriated from Pickering but has been a miser for Mirabel residents.

These again are falsehoods which do not reflect great credit on the so-called statesmen who, at their best and in front of other people, claim to avow national unity.

Let us consider the facts: first of all, the total cost of the Pickering expropriation amounts to about $90 million, whereas the Mirabel expropriation is in the neighbourhood of $148 million.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry I have to interrupt the minister but his time under the rules has expired.

[English]

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I enter the throne speech debate. I should like to begin by extending my sincerest congratulations to both the mover (Mr. Stollery) and the seconder ((Mr. Pelletier) (Sherbrooke)) to the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I should also like to extend my very best wishes to the new Governor General and Mrs. Léger.

As we know, the throne speech itself is not that important. What is important is the legislation that will flow from it. If this parliament is to survive its second session, that legislation must be in the best interests of the majority of Canadians. Though we are all vitally concerned about the energy crisis, the soaring cost of living, exorbitant residential mortgage rates and the tremendous cost of building lots across the country, my primary concerns in this address are manpower strategies and unemployment insurance. The Speech from the Throne stated:

> Other measures will be taken to increase production and employment through providing workers with improved access to available jobs, and employers with improved access to Canada's manpower.

I am glad that the Department of Manpower and Immigration has finally decided to become an efficient manpower mechanism. It has taken nearly eight years and approximately $2.5 billion of the taxpayers' money even to reach inefficient levels of operation. Dr. W. T. Dymond, a former assistant deputy minister who helped set up the manpower department, stated in a paper dated December 28, 1972:

> Although CMCs were contacted by 76 per cent of all job searchers, they only had an 11 per cent success ratio in finding jobs as compared to much higher ratios up to 27 per cent scored by such methods as checking with employers and friends and relatives.

If these statistics are accurate, and I assume they are considering their source, then Manpower has been in a deplorable mess over the last seven years. To reinforce my argument still further, I quote from another source which is just as reliable. In an article entitled "A Critical Look at Present and Future Social Security in Canada", printed in the Social Worker, Volume 41, No. 4, winter of 1973, Professor David P. Ross had this to say:

> Manpower and employment services must be judged a failure when considered from the standpoint of the needs of those with low incomes.

I should emphasize here that Manpower's greatest caseload comes from low income job searchers. Canada Manpower Centres just cannot seem to attract skilled and semi-professional job searchers for some unaccountable reason. Professor Ross continued:

> Job placement suffers from the fact that Manpower Centres are almost exclusively employer and demand oriented, and as such they have tended to be little more than job bulletin boards. The needs of the unemployed have been paid scant attention to, and the special employment needs of long-term social assistance recipients have been all but ignored.

These are the people who need assistance in re-entering the work force the very most, and yet that $2.5 billion has been wasted. In fact, with respect to retraining Professor Ross had this to say in the same article:

> The federal adult retraining program has also had little success. The Economic Council of Canada concluded in a recent study that the average post-training income in earnings was in the vicinity of 5 per cent; this means that an individual with pre-training earnings of $2,000 per year could expect post-training earnings of $2,100. Not exactly a big push in the struggle to escape poverty. Moreover, the council conluded that the employability of the trainee was not noticeably enhanced: if you tended to be frequently unemployed before training, then you tended to be frequently unemployed after training.

Perhaps it is time to take a hard critical look at the entire Manpower retraining program, particularly in view of the fact that in my opinion it is far too classroom oriented. I would like to quote briefly from the eighth annual review of the Economic Council of Canada at page 104. It states:

> There are, in fact, a number of advantages to training in industry relative to institutional training, of which a few will be described here. First, it seems clear that some degree of experience with the work environment is essential for almost all jobs; familiarity with the physical plant, materials, co-operating personnel, the institutional rules of the work place, and the discipline and regimen of the job is required for satisfactory performance. This can rarely be simulated adequately away from the work place. In the latter environment, moreover, the relevance of the instruction to the job is much more readily apparent, and this tends to make the trainee a more attentive student.

One can argue that Canada Manpower does in fact have on the job training, but I would like to point out that this program is both too small and not sufficiently structured and administered. I have become quite suspicious of some employers who may fire or lay off steady workers in order to hire manpower trainees, three-quarters of whose wages are paid for by the Canadian taxpayer. I am also convinced that this kind of training is only a temporary or make-work nature in order primarily to hold down the unemployment figures to lessen the embarrassment of the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether it is the wish of the House that we allow the hon. member to continue for a few minutes. If not, we will call it one o'clock. I believe the hon. member has gone about one minute after one o'clock which would leave him something like 14 minutes following resumption at two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, before we recessed for lunch I was referring to Canada Manpower centres and I was levelling something of a barrage against the inefficiency of their operations across this country. I will continue now with my address.

Another negative aspect about the manpower centres' poor performance over the years is that it has been bad for morale among CMC employees who often feel a sense of helplessness and frustration. Indeed, as a result of a recent questionnaire sent out to manpower employees, it was found that a substantial percentage felt that, despite changes and so-called reforms within manpower operations, their work had not improved, nor had their services improved. Hardly a day goes by that I do not get a letter or telephone call from an unemployed constituent complaining that manpower "is doing nothing for me". This may be due to ignorance on the part of some job seekers or it may be an exaggeration, but the important thing is that the impression is left that manpower is somehow failing them. This feeling did not occur overnight; it has built up over the years. So, obviously, there is some truth to the allegation.

I also receive criticism from some employers who are hard pressed for employees, although some of these complaints come from employers who cannot or will not pay more than minimum wages. I will have something more to say on this point later, when I will make a positive suggestion for a solution to this one aspect of manpower's many problems.

One of the most demoralizing situations within many Canada Manpower centres is the heavy workload that counsellors must endure, particularly in the large metropolitan centres. As late as 1973, I am told on good authority, some counsellors were responsible for as many as 400 or 500 cases at a time. No wonder that in 1972 CMC placed only 11 per cent of those who sought employment. It is my understanding that this problem is being resolved, but many CMC personnel must still waste valuable time cutting their way through endless red tape instead of being able to devote more time to a person to person counselling relationship with employees and employers.

The constituency I have the honour to represent contains many tobacco and vegetable farmers. In recent years these rural employers have been finding it increasingly difficult to obtain sufficient numbers of workers and each spring I am deluged with complaints alleging inefficiency and indifference on the past of Canada Manpower centres. I know that it is difficult these days to attract people, particularly young people, to work on farms. Many farmers cannot compete with urban industries with respect to wages; working conditions on some farms leave much to be desired; and many young people just do not want to slug it out in the fields.

I am not, therefore, entirely blaming Canada Manpower centres for this shortage of labour, but farmers, who have enough worries to begin with, must be assured, before planting and harvesting, that they will have sufficient help. This means that if unemployment is down to about 3.5 per cent in southwestern Ontario, as it has been in recent months, leaving mainly older people and those with very poor work records searching for work, there must be greater mobility during crisis periods, not just of bodies but of reliable help. If we must import farm workers, we must increase the quotas and at the same time ensure that these imported workers are not exploited by a few unscrupulous farmers who give all farmers a bad name.

I should like now to return to the whole question of institutional versus on-the-job training to which I alluded earlier when I argued against present methods and strategies. It is my opinion that there must be greater co-operation between industry and business on the one hand, and our school systems on the other. Industry must take a more responsible role in the training of its employees and schools must give up some of their control over the education of those students who are in the industrial and business streams in the various school systems. I see a very real need for establishing a new apprenticeship system involving the federal government through manpower and the provincial governments and local school boards. Admittedly, there is a constitutional problem here, but I am sure legal and jurisdictional obstacles could be overcome.

My argument is based on the premise that more students at the secondary school level should be screened into industrial, business and other vocational programs and fewer into the purely academic. I should state at this point that while some parents might object to this early streaming, I think in the long run our young people would be much happier, the cost of educating a large proportion of our young would be considerably less, and our students would be much better prepared to enter the work force. I should also emphasize at this point that I am not suggesting that such an apprenticeship program be a mechanism to reduce employment, as were the LIP and OFY Programs. It should not be a "make work" program. Quite the contrary, it should be a well structured and positive program to challenge our young people to learn important skills and trades for a labour market that needs them. Mechanics, machinists, tool and dye makers, various kinds of office skills, and commercial and business positions are in great demand.

What I propose is that after the age of about 15, those best suited for industrial work or secretarial and business occupations, spend half the school day or half the school week in a work-training situation, learning skills that are directly related to changing conditions in industry and business, not to jobs that may be obsolete or redundant in ten years' time. The trainees, of course, would not be thrown to the mercy of a tough boss whose only aim was to get as much sweat out of them at the lowest possible subsidized wages. Rather, all trainees would be under the umbrella of local boards of education and local manpower centres. Supervisors from both the local CMC and board of education would oversee the program. Employers would be subsidized to some extent but the emphasis would be placed on wages for services performed while the student was learning a skill. Apart from learning a useful skill or trade and earning an income at the same time he is attending school, the student would gain a greater sense of responsibility and achievement.

It is indeed, Mr. Speaker, a sad commentary on modern educational techniques in Canada today that so many of our young people have become so disillusioned, not only about work, but about life in general. I do not blame the schools alone, but certainly they must share in the blame. Far too many of our young people approach life with indifference and apathy, wandering in a society that on the one hand damns them for being cynical and lazy, but on the other, gives them so little incentive to be productive citizens. This holds true, of course, for older people in the work force, who have become the victims of job obsolescence without any meaningful alternatives except, to a considerable degree, equally obsolescent manpower retraining schemes, or even worse, a life ahead of jumping from one job to another and living on social assistance between jobs.

Another area where Canada Manpower could improve its operations is in the north. It is painfully obvious that there is a lack of firm policy with respect to settling the north as well as developing it with well-trained personnel who will remain in the more remote areas of Canada as well adjusted people.

There are horrendous implications as both highly skilled professionals as well as tradesmen and labourers prefer the amenities and advantages of working and living in southern cities because of their relative comfort and social and cultural diversities. Obviously, the native peoples of the north should be given preference for jobs if they want to accept the white man's socio-economic work ethic. But greater encouragement should also be given to people from southern communities as well. If Siberia can be developed, then Canada's north can be, too. I am not here referring to slave labour camps, either.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in order to encourage Canadians to move north, provided there is suitable employment—and here we should be very careful to see there is guaranteed employment—certain steps should be taken. Not only should salaries and wages be higher, but these added benefits should not be wiped out by higher living costs so that in reality the northern worker is no better off materially than he would be if he remained in southern Canada. This, of course, is the major problem today. People move north because they are attracted by higher wage offers, and when they get there they find out that a loaf of bread or a quart of milk is five cents, ten cents or twelve cents higher than it is at home. Moreover, cheaper housing should be made available. No longer should there be paid holidays spaced throughout the year, including travelling expenses to southern Canada. I would also suggest higher income tax exemptions for those working in the remote areas of northern Canada.

I now come to one aspect relating to Canada Manpower that I find serious and unacceptable, in fact it is an insult to Canada Manpower itself. I am referring to the practice of government departments hiring what is termed "casuals" through private placement agencies, not through their own hiring agency, Canada Manpower. On any given day it is estimated there are 1,500 persons working as casuals in various government offices. The private placement agencies charge anything from 33⅓ per cent to 50 per cent, based either on the first day's salary or on a continuing basis, as long as the casual job exists. Mr. Speaker, some of these so-called casuals work for months. It is reported that one actually worked for two years and was still classified as casual. The average duration of the job is about two weeks. It is estimated that the total bill the government pays to these private placement agencies is about $8 million to $9 million a year, of which approximately $3 million goes in fees to the private agencies.

I have nothing against private placement agencies, Mr. Speaker, but why should the government not use its own Manpower facilities? And this could be done. I am not in the habit of praising the Ontario government because I do not often find anything to praise, but I would like to make the point that it has set up its own bureau or pool for casuals and charges the Ontario treasury only 5 per cent, not 33⅓ per cent or 50 per cent as the federal government is paying for casual workers. I suggest this kind of setup also has UIC implications as well. It encourages casuals to work only one day a week, say for $25 and still collect unemployment insurance, though I am told that the placement agencies try to prevent this.

Mr. Speaker, I was going to continue by discussing unemployment insurance in more detail but I realize that my time is running short so I shall not present that section of my speech.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to join those who have participated in this debate in congratulating His Excellency the Governor General and his wife on their appointment. The qualities they bring are the guarantee that they will perform their duties with dignity. I also join my colleagues in congratulating the movers of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier): they had a rather difficult task and they performed it well.

During this debate, I had the opportunity of hearing several of the speeches made by hon. members of the government and of the opposition, party leaders, ministers and ministerial hopefuls. However, I noticed that few solutions had been found to at least a reasonable percentage of the many problems now confronting the Canadian people.

I noted carefully the contents of the Speech from the Throne at the opening of this session and noticed that while it summarized good intentions, it gave few specifics on the means the government intends to use to improve the situation.

Our administrators are suffering from the inflationary fever they helped give rise to and maintain without trying to improve the situation. Our financial system is sick; it has grown into a cancer that feeds ceaselessly on the economic blood of the nation.

Our specialists, or those who think they are, try to give us the impression that they hope to find cures to the ills of society.

Evidence is such that they cannot deny the existence of economic unease. Still, the results of their research prove that there are too many doctors attending the patient.

Many of them have already admitted their inability to find solutions; they would have the people believe that the illness is international. That is easy to say, but by no means a solution.

Others, who aspire to the leadership of this country, advocate a price freeze, without foreseeing what would happen when the thaw comes. They should at least define their intentions.

I shall attempt to outline some aspects of the present economic situation which further complicate life for Canadians and whose ill effects, that are often demoralizing, could be alleviated through a better balanced distribution system.

Politicians are unable, it seems, to explain the fact that there are poor people who live miserably in a rich country. We see that the previous generation did not waste its time and that today's asserts itself through its knowledge in various fields.

There is however a fly in the ointment. Having reached peaks in the area of production and communication, we are unable to set up exchange methods for available goods.

Instead of basing our economic system on logic, according to a natural order, we remain stuck with a system of scarcity of means to distribute the existing wealth, with the result that thousands of Canadians live in slums even though we have enough materials available to build decent housing.

Many Canadians must depend on welfare not to starve in a country that can advertise through every possible means a whole variety of products.

I do not think it is necessary to have attended university to admit that man has been created with needs to be filled; the need to eat, to dress, to have a home, to love, to help each other and to unite. These needs were not instilled into man by politicians or financiers. All proceeded from creation. The natural right to live existed well before the formation of political parties or unions. We also admit that the Creator in His wisdom has provided for all our needs and we are fortunate in Canada to have abundant resources. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) travels in various countries to offer our excess production.

Our problems are not due to our inability to produce or build, but rather to our ability to pay. We have the physical capacity, but we do not have the financial means. Our production system is satisfactory, but our financial system is inadequate. This question is always with us and should be looked into more fully than it has been up to now in order to develop a mechanism which would make financially possible what is morally good and physically possible. If we really want to build a better future than today we will have to further our investigations in that respect.

This government has submitted a list of various bills it intends to introduce in this House in the second session of this 29th Parliament. I hope those bills will be drafted in a comprehensible style, thus avoiding the many difficulties that generally flow from bills that are too complicated which inevitably result in problems of comprehension and interpretation that often require for those who would want to take advantage of them the services of legal advisers to define what are the rights and privileges of each and everyone.

The 1971 Unemployment Insurance Act will undoubtedly have to be amended. I read recently in La Presse an article where the chairman of that group was reported as having put the UIC back on the track. One can only infer that it had been off the track for a while. The whole thing was operating strangely. I would hope that the methods of application and the amendments brought in will not be too complicated by technocrats who never experienced the difficulties faced by the unemployed. A situation of confusion was created with the results we know—months of backlog in the payment of benefits, overpayments, double payments, or no payment at all, for all sorts of reasons one as trivial as the other. Eligibility was compromised because of supplement periods, reference periods, extension periods, severance periods, holiday credits considered as gains. To complete the picture payments were centralized through a team of push-button civil servants who were fed often distorted statistics and who tried to control more or less—often less than more—by operating computers overloaded with income tax calculations which resulted in increasing errors and hardships for the unemployed.

I also noted at items 14 and 15 of the list of legislative measures two bills dealing with banks—one to amend the Bank Act and the other to set up a Federal Business Development Bank.

My colleague, the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Tétrault), explained in the House on March 7 the role of the present banking system with figures supporting his thesis. Let us hope that legislators will take into account the fact that man was created before money, that the latter is only an instrument of exchange and its role is to serve and not to enslave. We must establish a real mechanism for the distribution of wealth.

In the Speech from the Throne, there is also a measure concerning the status of women. Let us hope that we will recognize the necessity of establishing a satisfactory balance as regards women's rights so that they can benefit from the advantages they deserve.

There is also a measure creating a federal commission on human rights. I would like to note that there is already a Canadian Bill of Rights. However, the right to economic advantages are not mentioned in this bill. Freedom in its various forms is discussed, but political rights are involved and we know that the latter are often used to the detriment of others' right. There seems to be a tendency to claim rights while ignoring important duties. I regret to note this serious gap in previous bills of human rights. They don't deal with the economic rights of the individual. It is nevertheless logical to conclude that, if any individual has a right to live, he must have therefore a right to the goods which are necessary to life.

We are favoured with a wealth of all kinds of goods but apparently we are not clever enough to find a way of distributing the goods which are available to us and which could be multiplied by modern means of production which improve continuously.

The Speech from the Throne also deals with amendments to be brought to the Canada Pension Plan. I read from the speech and I quote:

The federal and provincial governments have agreed that the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans should be further amended to provide for increases, beyond 1975, in the levels of income upon which contributions may be made, and in the pensions which will be paid. Legislation will be introduced to remove the earnings test now required for people aged 65 to 69 from the Canada Pension Plan. Finally, federal and provincial ministers have agreed that the provisions which now accord differential treatment to men and women under the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans should be removed.

Several improvements will have to be brought. When revising the pension plan, it would be quite normal to try to examine the possibilities, and I know there are some, of establishing the retirement age at 60.

Several countries have already brought down the retirement age to 60: Denmark, New Zealand, Australia. And so it is in other countries too. Very often we follow the example of various countries. Let us follow it for good things, and not only for bad things.

Young people who don't work now and get discouraged would find, thanks to vacant positions, the work that would help them spend their energies, use up their time and give them hope to settle down and raise a family. Finally, the young people would find their ideals instead of losing them, as it happens at present.

Is it not a shame, in a nation like ours, that a family head of 60 years be compelled to provide a living to unemployed of 20 or 25 years. The contrary would be more in keeping with standards. In a country as rich and as prosperous as ours, it is normal that people retire at 55 or 60, but to find idle men aged 20, 25, or 30 is abominable and discreditable.

I would not conclude my remarks without saying a word about energy which has been talked about so much. I know there is a lot more to say on this matter. I had the opportunity of reading an editorial in Meunier québécois, which sums up the situation quite well, and I should like to onclude by quoting this article which, to my mind, reflects the opinion of the majority of Canadians.

The opinion expressed in the December 1973 issues of Le Meunier québécois concerning the chaotic situation resulting from the energy crisis is so pertinent that I shall quote a number of excerpts from it. Of course, I am still talking about Mr. Blanchard's article:

The great advantage of the present crisis is to make us realize how true federalism could function if it were really allowed to funtion fully and unreservedly to the benefit of all Canadians.

Oil and grains are both national products.

—for he was dealing both with agriculture and oil energy—

They are both treated with solicitude by the federal government which, with taxpayers' money, creates either a national oil corporation by investing $40 million as is presently the case, or a wheat board, as was the case in the past, again with money coming from all Canadians, and favoured by all federal services.

In all logic and fairness, these goods should be available to all Canadians at the same price, and mechanisms for equitable distribution should be provided through legislation. Otherwise how will it ever be possible, for instance, to reimburse eastern Canada for paying for western development and to compensate the Atlantic provinces for the artificial draining of industrial development willingly created by Ottawa policies?

[Mr. Dionne.]

The energy crisis will perhaps result in forcing central and western Canadians to think of all Canadians, to reconsider their economic philosophy, not in terms of a selfish and provincial development, but in terms of a planned and continental development.

A way was opened during the critical review of our grain policy which, while keeping eastern Canada as hostage, was annihilating eastern agriculture to the detriment of collective interests, especially consumers' interests.

Another avenue has just opened tearing away the Borden line that was devised to further benefit regional interests against the principles and practice of free trade between the provinces that are favourable to the development of a sound federalism. Through tearing into pieces a Canadian constitution that is soiled and torn by so many blows that reasons of state seem to justify, such as those that were struck according to Caesar's technique, will crises finally launch the country beyond its domestic disputes towards new horizons?

This is undoubtedly the dream of both smaller and greater Canadian citizens.

[English]

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, the new time limits unfortunately make it difficult to observe the courtesies that are normally extended during this debate.

Nevertheless, I wish to pay tribute to the dignified representatives of the Queen, His Excellency the Governor General and his charming wife, and to offer them the best wishes of my constituents for a quiet and flourishing future in their new duties, as well as to wish them a pleasant journey in the riding of Esquimalt-Saanich where they are expected in early April.

[English]

Without further ado, Mr. Speaker, I will turn to the substance of my contribution to this debate. My concern today is with that class of persons virtually overlooked in the Speech from the Throne, the elderly, those living on fixed limited incomes. However, I do not intend to get into any auction to outbid other members or other parties by suggesting increased pension levels. Rather, my plan is to explore the few ideas the intent of which would be to contribute to the alleviation of their present worries, that is shortage of real income to bear the brunt of inflation and taxation.

I ask myself why, in their advanced years, they should have the problems of inflation and heavy taxation to deal with in addition to all their other problems such as, sickness possibly, oft times loneliness and frequently frustration at not being able to do as quickly the things they once did with such ease. We cannot disregard this part of our community. We are what we are because of the sacrifices they made for us. They do not expect sacrifices from us for them, but I say, why should we not do something for them even if it costs a sacrifice or two? We are an extremely fortunate generation, thanks in large part to their efforts. Let us not forget that.

If this land is strong, Mr. Speaker, the credit goes entirely to those from whom we inherited this land and our institutions. It is arrogance supreme to suggest otherwise. I am hoping that out of the various proposals that I shall be making, one or two, individually or in combination, will prove acceptable to this government or its replacement after the next election, hopefully a Conservative government.

To set the scene in realism, I wish to read part of a letter that reached me only last week as I was preparing my remarks for this debate. It is a direct reflection on our performance as parliamentarians and, unfortunately, a well merited one. It confirms my decision that the line of my thinking is one I ought to take in this debate. The correspondence reads in part:

> Those of us who began to buy our pensions fifty or sixty years ago, and who have been forced into retirement for the past fifteen or twenty years, find that our pensions plus the Old Age Security amount to little more than the Old Age Security plus the Supplement. We struggled to save money and we struggled to pay our taxes and are now no better off than those who saved nothing and, in many cases, paid no taxes either.
> Now we still have to struggle to pay our little $300 or $400 income taxes . . .
> I'm sure that you . . . realize . . . the difficulties of those who find themselves on fixed incomes and pensions tied to pre-inflation levels. . . . I can only hope that my plea . . . will cause you to raise your voice even louder than before.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a cri de coeur. There is something drastically wrong when citizens with the foresight to make provision for their declining years feel compelled to let out a cry like that. Having saved in their younger days, they do not begrudge the man who tries to save today. What they deplore is that they should have to go on paying in order to support those who are unwilling to save, or who are deriving benefits from social services which are available now but which were not available in their day. A balance must somehow be restored. The middle income group, about which I am speaking, is the source of much of the government's income tax revenue. These people are the backbone of our society, not only in numbers but in attitude. Let us not forget this. Those who can continue to find employment and who can secure adjustments in their wages may be able to shoulder the burden of rising costs and heavier taxation. Those who have retired and who are living on fixed incomes cannot. They must be relieved of at least part of the burden under which they labour.

This brings me to the proposal I wish to put forward. Thinking through these ideas I found it necessary to develop a dual concept involving an existence income level and a comfort income level—those terms could be defined without too much trouble; their names convey what is meant clearly enough. My purpose in introducing these notions is to suggest that those on pensions should be permitted a deduction level much higher than the present level of deductions for income tax purposes in order to achieve the comfort income level. I am referring to those on fixed incomes aged 65 or more.

The existence level is introduced for the same class of person. It is much lower than the comfort level, as its name implies, and is intended to be the deduction level for income tax purposes applicable to persons who are fortunate enough to enjoy incomes in excess of the comfort level. What I am endeavouring to do is to discriminate in favour of the provident. I have no built in objection to making discriminatory judgments; I am sure we all make judgments of this kind day after day. Indeed, I see every reason for making discriminatory judgments in this case. Certainly, there is no reason for penalizing anybody once the age of retirement has been reached, and preventing him from taking advantage of his providence. Further, in these improvident days there is something to be said in favour of encouraging providence. The notion that one needs to provide for one's own future is being discarded as outmoded. But it is not. It is one we should strive to maintain, and for this reason I suggest a revised income tax scale applicable to the elderly.

Next, I think of the widow or widower who suddenly finds that the family income has been halved through the death of a partner. Unfortunately, it is not only those who draw OAS benefits who find themselves in this plight. It occurs equally to those receiving superannuation benefits, not to mention those in receipt of disability pensions. Why should this be? What puzzles me is the way in which those who devise these schemes ignore the fact that a number of expenses continue unaffected—telephone bills, mortgage payments, light and heat, household repairs, and so on. In the case of contributive schemes why, I feel obliged to ask, should income be halved when the nominal contributor dies but remain untouched when the other spouse dies, the so-called non-contributor. There is real discrimination here. By my reckoning, the partners in any marriage are contributors on an equal footing to any superannuation scheme they may have chosen.

As far as I am concerned, deductions from the pay cheque are deductions from the family income—the disposable family income is reduced by that amount. Why, then, should the wife, say, be deprived of half the pension just because the husband dies whereas, should the wife die, the husband's income continues unabated. This is discrimination on the basis of sex, if you like. I see that, according to the newspapers this morning, Ontario is thinking along these lines. High time we all did—but don't put me down as a women's liber for having said so. I am not. While we are on the subject of discrimination I might point out that the whole area of the pension rights of the housewife whether contributing or not, will have to be sorted out.

But let me get back to my main theme. I was asking how it came about that those who devised these various schemes failed to take into account continuing unaffected expenses. I had in mind the odd jobs around the house, like fixing a leaky tap or repairing an electrical connection or cutting a lawn. Such tasks now have to be paid for by a person living on half the pension which was formerly available. The method used in the treatment of widows and widowers also adversely affects persons receiving disability pensions. A friend of mine who was blinded during the war was awarded a disability pension on that account and received, as well, special pension assistance because his wife was an essential help to him. He lost that special pension assistance when his wife died. He even lost the monetary ability to hire daily help. And he was a blind man, at that. Who drew up these regulations which result in such hardship on occasion? Why do we not change them? So, I speak up for a more realistic and humanistic approach to the monetary consequences which flow from bereavement such as those consequences affecting income derived from annuities and pensions.

I also have in mind those whose income falls between my existence level and my comfort level and who are age

65 or over. I suggest they might be exempted from liability to pay municipal taxes on property. This may appear to be an invasion of the provincial revenue field, but my proposal goes further to suggest that any revenue which the municipalities might lose in consequence of such a remission would be made up by the federal authority, on application. This, again, is obviously a discriminatory benefit. Therefore, I would extend this tax advantage to those elderly people who are living in rented accommodation so that they would be exempted from the municipal tax portion of their rent.

I speak next of those who, in their earlier days, laid aside funds, as in our youth we were all taught to do, those who saved, and who now find that those savings are subject to a capital gains tax. They find that the time has come to use those savings either to meet a need, possibly because of high medical expenditures, or simply to enjoy a trip around the world. When they come to count their money they realize that part of it is subject to tax. Why should they now be denied, the full benefit of having put away a few thousand dollars? Do not trot out the argument about cheating succession duties. First of all, I am not talking so much about those who leave estates of a value which would attract succession duties. I am talking about those who have tucked $3,000 or $4,000 away for a second honeymoon splurge. I have in mind those below the comfort level. I insist that it should not be beyond the ingenuity of our tax collectors, if they are properly instructed and inspired, to set levels above which these advantages might not apply and below which they should.

Finally, I should like to elaborate briefly on a further benefit which, in my view, ought to be available to those of our elderly who, for one reason or another, choose not to take advantage of such pension schemes as old age security. Why should these people not be permitted, if they do not need these funds now, to arrange their deferment so they can be used later when they are in need or in want or, failing that, can be included in their estate when they die?

I have other notions, Mr. Speaker, but I see my time has elapsed.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to begin this new session by taking part in this debate. Let me, Mr. Speaker, reiterate my deep gratitude for the enormous work that this venerable House, under your presidency, has managed to accomplish during the first session. It is a considerable and positive achievement, considering the magnitude of the task that awaited us barely a year ago. That is something to be very proud of.

I join the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) in paying my tributes to His Excellency the Governor General and to Madame Léger. I represent, Mr. Speaker, the riding of Ottawa-Vanier where the vice-regal couple resides.

Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, how much I enjoyed my first year as a member. In the House of Commons, as elsewhere, it is very pleasant. I have met men and women with different cultural and professional backgrounds, but united by the same desire for objectivity, working and living an exceptional experience for the development of the Canadian society and the well-being of our people.

Therefore, I am immensely pleased with the tremendous work accomplished by the right hon. Prime Minister Trudeau's government.

Mr. Speaker, if I may, I would like to point out some of my pet projects which I intend to submit to the House this year.

One of them will be related to the creation of a school of higher studies in public administration. The objective is to guarantee the presence in the public service of people whose experience, competence and ability will designate as capable of fulfilling administrative duties, through democratic recruiting and a happy combination of knowledge and experience. A school of public administration would enable public servants to get further training, to specialize in the execution of their own duties, that is those of senior administrators.

The courses would also be offered to university graduates who want to pursue a career in the public service.

Today, training and development programs for federal public servants are partly within the jurisdiction of the Treasury Board and the Public Service Commission. We do of course send public servants to highly specialized institutions to complete their education. We are now sending some of them in Great Britain and France.

We also have agreements with Carleton and Ottawa universities for courses in public administration and management sciences. In addition we have the CAP program, which is the Career Assignment Program.

This study and training program, followed by on-the-job training periods, makes it possible for promising intermediate managers to develop their skills more rapidly and to accede later to senior managerial positions.

But this program is open to fewer than one hundred persons every year. Of course, many public servants will never have the opportunity to follow such accelerated courses, even if they have the required capabilities to apply for intermediate or senior managerial positions.

It is therefore important to consider seriously the creation of a bilingual school of higher studies in public administration.

If the government were interested in such a project, we could find here in Ottawa appropriate quarters where students could be given their theoretical and practical training, in the very heart of government activities.

[English]

Since the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has once again demonstrated, as usual, his lack of knowledge concerning bilingualism, I should like now to address myself to this most important question of bilingualism.

I, too, have the honour of representing in the House many citizens employed as public servants, by crown corporations and agencies. Members of the armed forces of Canada as well as their families who reside in my riding. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has implied that civil servants in his riding are critical of and impatient with the process of identification and designation of positions for the purpose of implementing the bilingualism policy of this parliament.

In essence, in his speech on March 8, 1974, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton said that he has received more mail and more telephone calls on this question than on any other subject. As reported at page 342 of Hansard for March 8 the hon. member said:

From the tone of these letters and telephone calls it is alarmingly evident that the difficulty of implementation of a policy of unilingualism in the public service that was to be overcome by the guidelines approved by parliament has in fact become more intense and as a result I believe the morale of the public service is being seriously undermined. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the service is being damaged as a result.

By virtue of this statement the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is again demonstrating his lack of understanding of the fundamentals of bilingualism. As the Ottawa Journal stated in their lead editorial of February 20, 1974:

Neither Grenville-Carleton MP Walter Baker nor anyone else is able at this time to say whether 50,000 bilingual positions out of some 260,000 positions in the public service are too many or too few. It is unfortunate that Mr. Baker rushed in so quickly with his intemperate criticism. His impetuosity and his apparent failure to recognize all the reasons for bilingualism call into question once more his commitment to the Official Languages Act beyond lip-service and mere tokenism.

Such an attitude may be understandable, even excusable in MPs from out of the way places; it is not to be condoned in any MP — from any part — representing a constituency in the National Capital region. Mr. Baker has yet to achieve the breadth of vision on this subject of his leader, Robert Stanfield.

I agree with the Ottawa Journal that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is only paying lip-service and giving mere tokenism to bilingualism, and by so doing he is rendering a disservice to Canada and Canadians.

To further demonstrate his lack of understanding, he stated, as reported on page 342 of Hansard:

The 1976 deadline was established for an estimate of 25,000 bilingual positions.

It has been stated time and time again by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) that the target date aimed at is 1978, not 1976. This is evidence again of his lack of understanding of bilingualism and, more importantly, its implementation as it affects the public service.

In the interest of truth and accuracy, I want to make it clear that the target date for designation of bilingual positions within the public service is 1978 and that it never was 1976. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton also stated on the CTV network on Saturday last that the target date was 1976, and this, as I have stated, is not true. It is now very apparent that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton's avowed policy of unilingualism in the civil service and, in the words of the Ottawa Journal, "his apparent failure to recognize all the reasons for bilingualism" call into question once more his commitment to the Official Languages Act beyond lipservice and mere tokenism. That, coupled with his inexcusable ignorance of the target date with respect to implementation and designation, indicates quite clearly that this House and the general public have been misled, not through dishonesty but through his ignorance of the facts.

This attitude does not surprise me. It is witness to his real intention and possible thoughts on this whole question, and it supports the position some of his colleagues in this House have expressed frequently. These ardent supporters of the status quo have been crying and moaning about things bilingual for the last six years. It is always, in their view, being implemented too fast, too much, too costly. The only avowed policy some Conservative members seem to extol regarding bilingualism is to give lip support to the principle, but by all means slow down and stop the implementation of this important and vital national policy.

Mr. Paproski: That is not true.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): That is what you say. Rather than help in the difficult task of achieving the effective implementation of institutional bilingualism, some members of the Official Opposition cultivate the fear psychosis, and suggest that whatever is done is always too fast, too costly and too much. As a matter of fact, some members in the opposition have become the moral guarantors for every bigot across this country who quotes them and uses them to destroy rather than to build this Canada of ours. At this time no one would deny that the working language in inter-departmental exchanges is English. I do not dispute this fact. No one can read anything into the present law in respect of such exchanges. Neither this parliament, the staff associations nor public servants are advocating a policy of unilingualism, and I suggest that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is retrograde in this approach.

Many bilingual Francophones have come to work and have had to work in the English language, not because of preference but because of necessity. In a document filed by the Public Service Commission it is stated that in 1971, for example, of the 88,484 public service appointments in that year 21.4 per cent claimed French as their working language, yet only 11 per cent were appointed to positions requiring this language. In subsequent years, 1972 and 1973, the same report stated that an increased percentage of Canadians working in the Public Service are able to work, if they so desire and are needed, in the official language of their choice. It is only fair to say that if anybody should be pressuring and showing their impatience it is the thousands of bilingual civil servants who have been working in their second language, or the unilingual French, for that matter, who have had little chance of making a career in the public service.

The resolution adopted by parliament last year is not a threat to job security or promotion; it is a reasonable plan for equilibrium and equality. Nobody is born bilingual; he or she must be trained. This government is making a determined and commendable effort to promote institutional and individual bilingualism through training and understanding. The Official Languages Act and the program of bilingualism in the federal public service simply recognizes the realities of Canada as it is today.

The real solution lies in our educational system. This government has, for this obvious reason and also because of the previous unproductive system of teaching a second language in our schools, encouraged language training, and has dispensed in the last five years $300 million to our provinces. These special educational grants were for the purpose of improving and extending second-language training. Was this too much, too fast and too costly? I suggest that only the results will tell us that. In the Ottawa metropolitan area alone the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) in 1973 added another $2 million a year for two years to finance an experimental program of new methods of teaching French to our English-speaking students. Provincial authorities should take up this program, particularly because of its importance in the Ottawa capital. Has this been too much, too fast and too costly? I suggest it has been quite the contrary.

Attitudes on bilingualism are changing and have changed. Bilingualism never meant, be it institutional or individual, that all Canadians should become bilingual. The capital of this country should rightly reflect the Canadian reality and, to the credit of the Ottawa and Carleton school boards, they are offering better courses in second-language training through government assistance to provincial education programs. I hope and pray that with understanding and love this issue of bilingualism will be better understood. Progress is apparent, and this is for the betterment and the unification of our country.

As a tangible example of understanding as to real bilingualism, I should like to deal now with my constituency and especially the city of Vanier.

Bill C-232 changed the name of my constituency of Ottawa East to that of Ottawa-Vanier. The purpose of such a change was certainly to promote further the bilingual identity of my constituency and more expecially to identify the city of Vanier as an integral part of our beautiful national capital. Under the able leadership of a far-sighted municipal government, the city of Vanier now has a master development plan. The recent decision to build the Vanier thoroughfare as a driveway rather than as a speedway, will contribute to the achievement of a road network through an economic commercial center, that will take into account the aesthetic aspect as well as the quality of life that citizens of that municipality wish to preserve. On account of its geographical situation, east of Ottawa's development centres, Vanier could not benefit from a swift and striking commercial expansion as some other sectors of our national capital.

Often forgotten as regards federal building projects, Vanier with its 23,000 citizens should hold the attention of federal planners when it comes to finding sites for public buildings. The National Capital Commission was created to draft plans for the development and improvement of the national capital area and should help Vanier so that the nature and character of the Canadian government centre may be in accordance with its national importance.

At the dawn of its new development, the city of Vanier should get from government agencies, such as the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the National Capital Commission and the Department of Public Works, assistance for preserving, restoring and improving that fair municipality.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

[Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier).]

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Had I been here this morning I would have risen on motions, but unavoidably I could not be here at eleven o'clock. There is a misprint in Hansard, the record of this House, which I can either correct now with the consent of my colleagues in the House or wait until tomorrow which would be the first opportunity in the normal course. I refer to page 342 in the second last paragraph where the word "unilingualism" appears. That should have been, and in fact the text that went to Hansard read in this way, "bilingualism". This may have caused some misunderstanding, and with the consent of the House I would ask that the word "unilingualism" as it appears in the second last paragraph of the first column of page 342 be changed to read "bilingualism" in order that the sentence would read—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member knows that there is a procedure by which one can make a correction. I understand the importance of the point he wants to bring to the attention of the House. I think he has made his point. All hon. members, I am sure, are aware of the importance of the matter to the hon. member, but I think he should follow the normal procedure tomorrow.

Mr. Baker: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am quite prepared to abide by that ruling, but of course this makes a considerable difference to the whole import of the last contribution to the debate.

Mr. Paproski: Especially when you have other speakers like Gauthier.

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, before getting into my remarks on the Speech from the Throne I should like to congratulate the hon. members for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) for their excellent presentations. Those two gentlemen talked in glowing terms about some country where all of the manifest problems of poverty, regional disparity, unemployment and all the other human problems had been solved by some supergovernment. I am afraid I did not catch the name of the country they were describing, but I assume it must have been Utopia, or perhaps Shangri La. They certainly could not have been talking about Canada, as anyone who can see, read and hear knows that those problems exist in Canada in abundance. In fact, they happen to be the most abundant commodities we have.

At page 12 of Hansard for February 27, the hon. member for Sherbrooke is reported as stating:

—the wealthiest country in the world, spending huge amounts, did not succeed in eliminating poverty.

I thought the hon. member was talking about this country and this government, but it turned out that he was speaking of the United States.

I do not know of a country in the world that has more resources, more unused manpower, more potential or more ingenuity when compared to our population than does our own country of Canada. Why then do we have so many people living in our bountiful society at or below the poverty line? Why do we have so many unemployed? Why do we allow inflation to run unchecked, eroding the buying power of millions of families that have to provide shelter, food and clothing for themselves and their children?

I was intrigued by the statement of the hon. member for Sherbrooke that the United States had spent huge sums of money, but had failed to eliminate poverty from that country. I wonder what the hon. member thinks his colleagues on that side of the House have been doing for the past six years. We all know they have been spending money as if it were going out of style. And I will tell the hon. members across the floor that they have failed, utterly and completely, to eliminate poverty from this country. They have failed to eliminate regional disparities, and they have failed to provide jobs for the people in our country who want to work. What they have succeeded in doing has been to destroy the work ethic, divide our country into regional blocs, and to destroy the efficiency of the public service.

I suggest to members across the floor that they might as well not close and lock the door to the public treasury. The cupboard must be pretty bare by now. Right now the government is spending money that we do not have, and that leads me to believe that there is not any more left in the treasury. Last year, for instance, the gross public debt was $51.8 billion and the net national debt represented about $1,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada. I do not know yet what it is for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974, but it must be in the area of $55 billion. We do know from the estimates, though, that it will cost $2.9 billions this year just to service the national debt. That is money we cannot spend on services or benefits because, in effect, it has already been spent. This is money down the drain. That takes care of Shangri La and Utopia, Mr. Speaker. It is a very sad awakening, but it is reality, and I say to the government members, and especially to the cabinet members who are squandering our money, stop building castles in the sky; stop living in a dream world and come down here and face reality.

The problems we had when the present government took over are still with us. In fact, they are even worse now, and there are some new ones. There are new problems that have resulted from over-spending, inefficiency and just plain bungling. Those problems will not just disappear. They must be dealt with. But first, Mr. Speaker, the government will have to face up squarely to those problems, instead of trying to smother them with borrowed money.

I see that, according to the estimates, the government intends to create a few more agencies and corporations, possibly even some departments. This is scandalous, Mr. Speaker, but I have to admit that it is typical of the way the present government operates. If a department or agency is not able to cope with a given situation, create a new agency alongside the old, and transfer the responsibilities to the new one. Then you have two or three agencies fumbling with the same problems. We have more agencies and departments in our government than any other country in the western world and more cabinet ministers. We have more ministers in our federal cabinet than either the United States or Great Britain, and yet we do not seem to be able to get a clear answer from the cabinet on even the most simple and clear-cut issues.

There are 47 members of the government caucus who are either ministers or parliamentary secretaries, almost 50 per cent of the entire caucus. I can't help thinking there must be an awful lot of jockeying over there for positions of power, and the authority to spend those billions of dollars in the estimates. It is easy to understand why they seem to have so much trouble making decisions on even the most vital issues facing the country. It is abundantly clear by now that whatever it is they are doing, they are doing very much for the Canadian people. It is time they started looking after the business of running the country. The present government has more than doubled the national budget in only six years, and I do not think it is too much to expect the government to start showing some results for all that money.

The Unemployment Insurance Commission is in a scandalous mess and, in fact, the whole system of social services in Canada today is in a mess. Who would have imagined just six years ago that the cost of the UIC would rise to more than $2 billion by the year 1973? And that seems to be only the beginning. UIC is already showing signs of surpassing that figure in the coming year, and still the government refuses to undertake a full inquiry of the program, and of the department that is administering the program. This is a very vital program, Mr. Speaker. It was designed to provide assistance to people in the work force who, for a variety of reasons, might find themselves unemployed. Every member of this House accepts the UIC, and the concept behind it, as a responsibility of the government. It is not the UIC to which we in the official opposition are objecting. It is the administration that we quarrel with, and for very good reasons.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has called for an inquiry into the operation of the UIC, stating that the agency has been operating under a cloud of suspicion for a very long time, and that it is time to clear the air. I agree with that wholeheartedly, and I would add that if we undertake an investigation into the administration of UIC, a lot of heads will roll. It should be obvious to anyone that a large percentage of the two billion dollars spent last year on UIC went to sources other than the legitimate claimants who had paid premiums into the program. An overhaul of UIC would give us an opportunity to do something else very important. It would allow us to restructure the whole manpower-UIC set-up. We would be able to develop programs whereby people could be trained for the jobs that exist, jobs that cannot presently be filled from the labour pool. Advances in technology have passed tens of thousands of people by, leaving them in a situation where they would like to work but cannot qualify for the jobs that are offered them.

I get letters from leaders in industry pointing out difficulties faced by employers in filling job vacancies. Many industries just cannot afford to train prospective employees. In many other cases people are trained for jobs and, after they have worked for the minimum period required to qualify for UIC benefits, they contrive to get themselves fired or just quit, forcing the employer to go through the training process all over again. Other employers have told me that people who are receiving unemployment benefits will conduct themselves in job interviews in such a way as to discourage employers from hiring them. In spite of the fact that the present government appears to be bent on destroying the traditional Canadian work ethic, I am convinced that the vast majority of Canadians want to work. They want to work at jobs that pay a living wage, jobs that have some promise of advancement and jobs that are not deadends in themselves. The provision of such jobs is not an impossible task for government. We have the human and natural resources; we have the ingenuity and, most of all, we have the responsibility to provide incentives and opportunities.

I should mention here that every time the government gets caught in an obvious blunder or boondoggle, which happens with tiresome regularity, the minister involved in the blunder tries to place the blame at the feet of the official opposition. Each time they try to do so, it is so obvious that it is often amusing. For instance, in the case of Bill C-125, the minister responsible for the UIC has been saying lately that it was the official opposition that prevented it from being tabled for debate in the House. Bill C-125 would have brought about some needed changes in the administration of UIC, something we in the official opposition have been urging the government to do for the past two or three years. The minister neglected to note that Bill C-125 was a government bill, and that after it had passed first reading it was put on the shelf. The government did not have to worry about the NDP on Bill C-125. The NDP will go along with anything. The government did not have to worry about the Conservative opposition. We were the ones who asked for the bill. No, Mr. Speaker, the minister was worried about his own causus. It was the Libera. caucus that was divided on C-125, and it would have proven embarrassing to the government to have its own members oppose efforts to clean up the mess in the UIC. I predict this failure will come back to haunt them some day soon.

Mr. Speaker, there is another example of bungling that deserves some mention, and that is the matter of the CRTC advertising in newspapers around the country. I have noticed that the CRTC places ads in French in English-language newspapers and in English in French-language newspapers. I ask my colleagues to think about this, Mr. Speaker. A person who does not speak French is asked to read and comprehend an advertisement in the French language. And, in Quebec, a person who does not understand English is asked by CRTC to read and comprehend an advertisement in the English language. This, in my opinion, is a useless waste of the taxpayers money. Unfortunately, that is not an isolated incident. There are indications that in some departments that sort of thing is the norm, and I doubt that the people responsible are aware of just how ludicrous it is. It certainly could not be in the interest of national unity. This sort of thing has the opposite effect. It tends to agitate and alienate people, and too much of that is being done already as witnessed by the remarks of the previous speaker.

I have been speaking out publicly for some time about the way our immigration laws are being administered, and in particular I have been drawing attention to the way foreign students are allowed to enter our country without proper screening and without follow up supervision. People who would not otherwise qualify for landed immigrants status are flooding into the country under cover of our lax foreign student programs, and some of these people are being aided and abetted by corrupt immigration officials. Some of these officials have already been uncovered, but it is highly unlikely that they will all be found out unless a full inquiry is undertaken.

Equally important is the matter of how many so-called students are living underground throughout the country with false documents or without documents of any kind. Those who have papers can get by for an indefinite time unless they are sought out and deported. Those who do not have documentation are at the mercy of unscrupulous employers and underworld figures. A few months ago we had a period of amnesty during which people living here illegally could come forward without fear of prosecution. This was considered to be cheaper than searching them out, and naturally it would have to be considered more humane. What this has done in fact has been to make us out to be a bunch of patsies as far as our immigration laws are concerned. We are the world's greatest pushovers for people who cannot qualify to enter and become citizens of countries with realistic immigration laws. The amnesty period last year was not exactly a success as far as bringing illegal residents out of hiding is concerned. The minister in charge of immigration admitted that only a small percentage of suspected illegal entrants actually came forward and that there are probably many thousands of them still living here underground. Since that time people have been pouring into the country, taking advantage of loopholes in the laws.

The question I ask now is not whether there will be another amnesty, but when. This raises another question, and that is just who is a refugee so far as our immigration laws are concerned. We have established what the government calls "an immigration presence" in Chile to handle applications from Chilean refugees, and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) said that these immigration officers will remain in Chile until at least the end of this year to handle an ongoing refugee program. Is there some magic formula for deciding who is a bona fide refugee, or is it only necessary for a person to sidle up to a Canadian immigration officer and say: "I am a Marxist terrorist and the present government in Chile won't let me engage in subversive activities"? I suggest that is something like the situation because if these people are in so little danger that they can wait for months or a year to be granted paid passage to Canada, then there is something fishy about this whole question of giving refugee status. According to figures released by the immigration department, only a small percentage of ordinary immigration applicants are approved in Chile at present while a very large percentage of refugee applicants are approved.

Our immigration laws are designed to give protection to those people who have a legal right to live in our country, and they are designed to protect our system from those who would come here and plot to tear down everything that we have worked so hard to build. At present these laws do not protect us. They protect the very people whom we should be turning away at our borders. If our immigration laws are too lax, then let us tighten them up. If our laws are adequate and the fault lies with the administration of the law, then let us root out those who are delinquent. I suggest that there is ample reason to undertake an inquiry into the whole immigration machinery and find out where the fault lies.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret the interruption, but it is difficult for me to allow the hon. member to go beyond his time. He has already gone beyond it by a few seconds. According to the order accepted by the House earlier, there is no extension of time allowed.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was just about to conclude. I believe you are counting the time that the hon. member used in his question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): No, I am not. I understand the desire of the hon. member to conclude his speech, but I cannot forget the order that has been accepted earlier. So, I will call upon the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, exactly 14 months ago, I gave my first speech in the House during the debate on last year's Speech from the Throne. At that time I outlined the five guidelines established by the government as a basis for a comprehensive review of the Canadian social security system, and I indicated the formulas that we had considered for implementing these policy statements.

From the start, we recognized that if such a re-organization of all the social policies of Canada were to become reality and meet its anticipated objectives, we had to obtain the commitment and active participation of all the provinces. Indeed, this is why the working paper on social security in Canada was tabled in the House of Commons in April 1973. In a way, this was the contribution of the federal government to the initial steps of the reform.

The working paper outlined five strategic schemes which appeared appropriate for us to follow with a view to achieving a model of social system. They were supported by 14 proposals which seemed likely to facilitate the implementation of those schemes.

In April 1973, the first of a series of meetings which were to follow brought the welfare ministers together in Ottawa. Moreover, it was with that federal-provincial conference that was officially launched the joint federal-provincial review of the social security system in Canada. Indeed, after having looked into the working paper, the provinces recognized by common agreement that the schemes and the proposals as outlined in the working paper could certainly serve as the starting point and as terms of reference all along the review work.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report that as a result of the leadership of this Liberal government and the hard work of both federal and provincial governments, the joint federal-provincial review group has made excellent progress over the past year. Significant improvements have already been made in a number of federal and provincial social security programs.

First, in July we introduced a new Family Allowances Act which tripled the average allowances for children starting in January of this year. We provided that these benefits would be automatically escalated each year in line with increases in the cost of living to enable Canada's low and middle income families better to meet the increased costs of raising children. Moreover, in order to protect the purchasing power of Canadian families in the face of a rapid worldwide inflation, the government acted swiftly in September to increase family allowance benefits as an interim measure until the proposed increases were effected in January.

The ability of the provinces to adjust family allowance payments to meet the particular needs of their people reflects a new approach to the integration of the social security system in each province under which there is greater provincial flexibility and, at the same time, better co-ordination of federal and provincial elements of the social security system. I suggest that this is a significant step in resolving the deep federal-provincial differences which had developed over how responsibility for social security measures should be divided between the federal government and the provinces, and I suggest again that this is truly a remarkable achievement for federalism.

Second, in April, 1973, old age security pensions were substantially increased. Also, in October we shifted from an annual to a quarterly basis for escalation of both old age security pensions and the guaranteed income supplement to ensure that these benefits keep pace with increases in the cost of living. We have raised the combined pension and supplement from $150 per month in March, 1973 to $187 per month in April, 1974.

Third, in October we introduced changes in the Canada Pension Plan to increase the earnings ceiling for the years 1974 and 1975 and to remove the 2 per cent ceiling on the annual escalation of pension benefits, so that in future benefits would rise in line with the full increase in the cost of living. In addition, the full purchasing power of benefits already in pay on December 31, 1973, was restored.

With these changes, the federal government and the provinces have, in a matter of months, taken together a major step toward harmonizing the Canada and Quebec pension plans. It is a tribute to federal-provincial co-operation as it can be practised, and represents the way this government approaches federal-provincial relations. Furthermore, the government has provided for the automatic escalation of virtually all federal programs, in accordance with increases in the cost of living. I am thinking here particularly of benefits to veterans and the superannuation pensions of federal public servants.

Mr. Speaker, the recent Speech from the Throne has already indicated a number of areas in which we hope to take action this year in order to further improve our social security system. In the very near future I plan to introduce further amendments to the Canada Pension Plan that have been worked out in conjunction with the provincial governments. These amendments will provide for a new formula that will tie the earnings ceiling on which pension benefits are based each year to an earnings index, the average level of wages and salaries for the year. They will provide for the elimination of the earnings test now in effect for people aged 65 to 69. Such people will then be able to apply for and receive their full Canada Pension Plan retirement benefit without having it reduced to take account of earnings from employment. It is estimated that approximately 35,000 persons, who are at present receiving no pension or only a partial one, will directly benefit from this measure. This removes a discriminatory feature against those persons who work to supplement their pensions because the earnings test only applies to earnings from employment and not from other sources, such as investment.

There will also be an amendment that will ensure equality of treatment for male and female contributors to the Canada Pension Plan. As the government indicated in the Speech from the Throne, this latter change is but one of several measures this government plans to take to improve the status of women in Canada.

As to the review of the social security system, the ministers concentrate all their efforts on two specific objectives: first, we must formulate a satisfying concept for an income supplement plan and, second, prepare an efficient collective employment policy.

In view of the enormous and complex task we are undertaking, my provincial counterparts and I do not expect to be able to be through discussing these questions before the end of 1974 or the beginning of 1975.

But there is a statement I wish to make today on a specific question, a specific service, that is daycare services.

[English]

The government has placed a high priority on daycare services where there is a social need for such services. This is in keeping with the government's objective of removing barriers to entry to the regular labour market. There is a definite trend whereby married women are entering and re-entering the labour market at all levels. In 1962, there were 870,000 married women in the labour force with a participation rate of 21.6 per cent; in 1970, there were 1.7 million married women in the labour force with a participation rate of nearly 34 per cent. In 1972, the participation rate of women aged 25 to 64 was 40 per cent but the participation rate of young married women aged 20 to 24 was even higher, at 47.4 per cent.

The need for day care services has also been amply demonstrated by the number of LIP projects in this respect. The government recognizes that this need is a continuous one and will make special efforts on a continuing basis to aid those mothers with young children in their care who seek employment but who also want to ensure that their children are properly supervised.

I would remind the House what this government is already doing in this area. As a result of amendments to the Canada Assistance Plan Regulations in 1972, shareable costs for day care services are the full operating costs, including costs of equipment and supplies and rent or depreciation on capital. For all other welfare services, shareable costs are restricted to salaries and related staff costs. The increased cost sharing has given considerable impetus to the development of day care services.

The Canadian Council on Social Development has been given a grant to develop national norms for the development of day care services for children, in collaboration with officials of my department. In addition, consultative services are provided by my department to provinces, municipalities, voluntary agencies and community groups. Hon. members will also recall that the government established in 1972 an information centre on day care. This information centre has proven very efficient and very useful all across the land.

If day care centres are seen by a community as essential facilities to enable mothers with small children to become self-supporting, then we believe we should help to provide such services. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to announce today our new position on cost-sharing with the provinces of day care services for low and below average income families. The government has approved new policy guidelines for day care services shareable under the Canada Assistance Plan. These guidelines are designed to ensure that federal sharing is available to low and below average income families who need day care services. Priority is given to single parent families, families with health and social problems, working mothers and handicapped children. The guidelines provide for income tested programs in line with the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. Several provinces have already initiated steps in this direction, and several other provinces have given evidence of being interested in the development of similar programs.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, since the social security review was launched we have increased family allowances substantially, provided for greater flexibility in meeting provincial social priorities through variations in family allowances, revised the Canada Pension Plan to bring the ceiling on pensionable earnings closer in line with average wages, provided for the automatic escalation of all federal pensions and allowances on an annual or in some cases a quarterly basis and have taken steps to improve the arrangements under the Canada Assistance Plan for sharing in the costs of day care services provided by the provinces to low and below average income families, and especially to heads of single parent families. All these major steps we have taken during the ten short months that the review has been under way.

Because of the spirit of co-operation evidenced in the federal-provincial conferences and because of the support, encouragement and suggestions received from scores of voluntary organizations, labour unions, trade associations and religious groups, the government is confident that the social security review can be completed by the target date of April, 1975, and that the agreed upon changes can be implemented over the three to five year period which began in April, 1973.

I would like to conclude these remarks, Mr. Speaker, by setting the record straight concerning my department's share of the increase in the budget for next year. There have been several articles recently on this matter and I must admit that I am never surprised, although I am sometimes dismayed with press headlines and editorials, admittedly in the minority, which on the one hand call for concrete steps by governments to solve various social problems and then complain when solutions result in increased government spending. They make me think of the double talk that we hear from the official opposition in this respect.

The proposed increase of $2.4 billion in the budget for next year over this year's forecast includes approximately $1.2 billion for the Department of National Health and Welfare. The real winners of this increase are the low and middle income Canadians and their families who have seen family allowances tripled, retired Canadians who have had their old age pensions benefits increased by over 32 per cent in one year and the provincial social assistance recipients, since federal spending in this area will increase by some $79 million, an increase of some 14 per cent in a single year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: There goes a seagull!

Mr. Lalonde: I believe, Mr. Speaker, that these measures accurately reflect the high priority which the government of Canada accorded to social policy in the previous Speech from the Throne and will continue to recognize.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about pensions at 60?

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to place on the record my comments on the throne speech. It is clear that at this time we are facing more uncertainty in the world than we have ever experienced since the end of the war. We see that the unprecedented rise in prosperity and affluence of the western world since the end of the war has been brought to a jarring halt. For many countries, this year will be a year of zero growth, or even of reduced growth. The United States is now in its second quarter of zero growth. Britain, it is forecast, will experience negative growth and Japanese growth is forecast at the low level of only 3 per cent.

For underdeveloped countries the situation is even worse. With regard to those countries, the increased cost of oil will make their economies much less productive and will prevent the modest increase that would have kept pace with the expansions of their populations. All this points to the fact that much of our affluence and production in society has been the result of the very low prices of energy, in the form of oil and gas. All the price increases of oil and gas really reflect the upward trend of basic commodity prices, which have not materially changed in 25 years. The price of wheat at $2 per bushel was reaching such a low level that production was being discouraged. This was the case with wool and other basic commodities. Yet, the price of manufactured goods and wages in general had risen markedly over the years. As this problem relating to the pricing of oil and gas is going to be very much to the fore in this parliament, we should realize that it is only part of the much larger problem of world supply of oil and gas.

It seems doubtful, Mr. Speaker, if the course being followed by the government in dealing with the producing provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan, is the best way to deal with the question of oil and gas. The government's approach will certainly leave scars on Canadian confederation long after the problem itself has been forgotten. Eventually, it will probably mean the drift of western Canada into an extremely independent position. Demand for energy is increasing all over the world. As the supply is decreasing, the price will go up regardless of what we, as politicians, say. In the handling of this problem it is important that we do not jeopardize supply for the future and bring about future shortages in our attempts to bring about short-term solutions.

Indeed, we are following, in many ways, the very course which the United States followed 20 years ago when it took a number of negative steps which, as a consequence, created its energy shortages of the present time. In the United States, price restraints were placed on producers, under the guise of providing assistance to consumers. It is painfully evident that, in the end, this was a great disservice to the consumer. The incentive for producers to explore was taken away; the finding rate fell drastically and reserve additions did not keep pace with consumption. The United States has now taken off price restraints and is allowing the competitive market system to set prices with regard to new supplies. In the final analysis, this will assist the consumer, as there is not much point in cheap oil if there is no oil to be had at any price.

In the United States, record expansion dollars are flowing back to help find much needed energy. We, in Canada, however, are largely following the pattern of the American administration of 20 years ago. We are more interested in the price of oil being low than in assuring the supply of oil and gas in future. It would appear, from many sources, it is generally believed that in western Canada there is an unlimited amount of oil to be scooped up for the taking. Such, however, does not seem to be the case. We are presently, and have been for some years, taking out of the ground half a billion barrels of oil more per year than are being found. Frontier oil may be very attractive in principle, but it is going to be terribly expensive by the time it reaches our consuming public.

It has always been assumed that the Alberta tar sands would be a source of cheap oil. It now seems abundantly clear that oil from the Alberta tar sands will be very expensive, but it will be useful in acting as a ceiling on what the Arab nations might demand for their oil. A comparison of relative costs of drilling and procuring oil from the tar sands indicates that recovery costs from conventional oil wells, in particular from ones as good as the Arab states now have, will be a governing factor in world oil prices for the balance of this decade or even this century.

An examination of statistics relating to relative costs of oil from the two sources is interesting. It has been estimated that it takes $10,000 of capital investment to extract one barrel of oil per day from the Alberta tar sands. Conversely, it takes $2,000 of investment in conventional oil wells in continental North America, including Alberta, to produce one barrel per day. But, for the Arab states, it takes an investment of only a few hundred dollars for a well that will produce one barrel per day. A good well in North America is rated at 50 barrels per day, whereas in the Arab countries a production rate of 5,000 barrels per day is quite average.

Then, again, the Alberta tar sands product involves a mining operation rather than drilling for a conventional oil well. The exploitation of the tar sands will require a lot of manpower, which will be highly unionized. Workers will demand high and steadily increasing wages as their rightful due. In the case of oil wells, on the other hand, once they are brought into production, the labour content is not high. So, it is not difficult to see how the Arab nations will control price in future. We must also bear in mind, however, that the price of oil on the markets of the world seems to be declining. It is now forecast that about $8 per barrel will be the new price.

The United States President has told his nation of the measures to be taken to handle the serious American oil shortage which has been caused by the Arab denial of petroleum, and of other measures which will be necessary if the Arab squeeze continues. He has stated that by the end of this decade his country will have developed the potential to meet its energy needs without dependence on any foreign nation. The President did not make any reference to any nation as being an exception. The Americans have talked about the continental concept under which Canada and the United States would work together. It now seems likely that the United States has reversed its attitude with regard to Canada.

As late as in 1969, the United States Cabinet report on energy futures recommended close relations with Canada on energy, but suggested that Canada could only be counted on as a secure source of oil and gas if Canada took steps to reduce the dependence of Quebec and the Maritimes on overseas imports. Ottawa rejected this plan. Later on, with regard to the possibility of Prudoe Bay oil being brought by the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, Ottawa declined to put the matter on the agenda for intercabinet discussion, on the grounds that Ottawa had not set up its own policy and, of course, the United States plumped for the TransAlaska oil pipeline. At the present time it also seems likely that the Prudhoe Bay Gas will also go by Alaska, as the Americans have indicated they are in favour of an Alaskan pipeline.

One cannot blame the Americans for their sharp change in official and public attitudes when, without consultation, Ottawa slapped on the export tax in September. The situation was made even worse when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) stated that he would cut petroleum exports to the United States if the Arabs demanded it.

These were Ottawa's actions against the United States, whose oil saved Canada from the long energy crisis in World War II and whose oil fields sustained Canadian growth, including that of western Canada, up to the mid-fifties. The United States has provided three quarters of the oil market growth for western Canadian oil for the past decade and thus made possible the productive capacity of the Alberta oil fields today. In view of the present huge trade between the two countries being balanced heavily in Canada's favour it is quite possible and likely that retaliation on the part of the United States will occur.

The federal-provincial energy conference is over. It adjourned with Canada being still no closer to a national energy policy, although all the provinces had shown their positions before the conference. Ottawa had remained quiet. In view of the proposal that the price of crude oil be raised to $6 per barrel, that $1 per barrel go to the eastern consumer, 56 cents to the oil producing provinces, 33 cents to industry and 13 cents to the federal government, it was obvious that there was not enough money to satisfy all. In the long term, after the restraint period, there was to be an agreed increase in price. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) suggested that, somehow, we could insulate ourselves from the world. There was to be one price across the country.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said the other day that he was not interested in confiscating any province's resources. Nevertheless, the oil export tax cannot be construed as anything but the confiscation of a province's resources, in its present form. The charge made that the export tax was necessary to prevent so-called windfall profits, is not exactly true. Most of the extra money would still have found its way to the federal or provincial treasuries. But, if there are to be windfall profits, one sees the importance of having in place an excess profits tax which should be applied in all circumstances, and not just to the oil industry. It should apply to all industries which show a very high profit ratio.

The recent move by President Nixon with regard to the 22 per cent depletion allowance—that allowance, now granted to U.S. companies in foreign countries, would be eliminated—means that Canada would lose a certain amount of money that would have come from U.S. investment in Canada. That means that Canadian institutions and individual Canadians will need to make up this loss out of their savings.

The social security program in place in Canada, as announced and elaborated on by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) makes savings by ordinary, individual Canadians almost superfluous. As the rapid rise in inflation largely eats up these savings, one wonders for how long Canadians will be foolish enough to invest. Western Canada was founded by many races, but had in common the symbolism of the British connection. However, the British connection is diminishing in its force, prodded and abetted by Ottawa, and the new symbols of central Canada found little acceptance in the western mind. The maple leaf is an example because many western Canadians have never seen an actual maple leaf.

A legal and constitutional battle, by which this federal government intends to lay the provinces low, is intended, in view of the apparent packing of the supreme court by the appointment of certain justices recently. Chief Justice Laskin is noted as being left of centre and a strong federalist. Then there was the appointment of Jean Baetz, the former constitutional adviser to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). At the opening of the University of Saskatchewan law school in 1965, the Chief Justice made the statement, and I quote:

Power contracts by a failure to use it.

He later said:

> I borrow a phrase from my friend, Professor Frank Scott. Provincial autonomy means national inactivity, and I would add that the more we have of the one, the more we have of the other . . .
> I find it difficult to believe that our federal system can endure unless Ottawa is accepted as a source of national power and authority exercisable in respect of and for all citizens of Canada.

In view of that statement, it is not to be wondered that the president of the Law Society of Alberta called the appointment of Laskin as Chief Justice an overt political act. Has the Prime Minister decided to pack the court? By so doing, does he hope the federal government will usurp the power of the provinces? Can provincial jurisdictions expect to have a reasonable hearing in a packed supreme court? Western Canada has come of age in its political thinking. Its resources and its people give it new impetus and a new direction. It is more confident that it is equal to the rest of the Canadian confederation. It is confident that it can stand on its own if it needs to do so. It does not wish to be a hewer of wood and a drawer of water for central Canada. It doubts that the excessive reliance on prohibiting the export of resources and products, except in the processed form, will be enough to sustain the Canadian economy at the level that it wishes. The manufacturing industry is hard put in Canada to maintain its job numbers and its only major market, the United States, will find it increasingly difficult to absorb its high price products.

Mr. Speaker, it is very fashionable to blame oil companies and other large companies for rip-offs and so on which the leader of the NDP seems to favour as his attack on the bad guys. In deference to him, no doubt, the Prime Minister suggested that his government would also be after the bad guys, the oil companies, if they charged too much. However, Mr. Speaker, it should be realized that a corporation is not a person in itself. The implication of these attacks is that profits benefit some person or persons in the corporation, but a corporation is made up of shareholders, management and the working force.

If a company makes profits, someone must benefit. If the workers receive more income, they pay more income tax. If management receives more, they also must pay further income tax so that the federal and provincial treasuries benefit. Before dividends are paid, a corporation tax of 40 to 50 per cent must also be paid and if citizens receive dividends, they in turn must pay income tax. The corporations cannot have depreciation allowances that are not also available to unincorporated individuals in business or to the great cooperatives which pay no corporation tax and are able to pass along dividends to their shareholders or patrons without a corporation tax.

Those who feel that corporations and other firms of private enterprise are bad for the country must agree that things should be better because over 50 per cent of our GNP is now being spent by the three levels of government. There are vast areas of the so-called private sector filled with Crown corporations such as CNR, Air Canada and public utilities such as the provincially owned telephone systems. Those utilities which are privately owned have rigid rate structures set by the governments concerned. Even the agriculture industry, with many individual farmers, has a myriad of boards, mostly government, controlling the sale of their products and setting the price the producer will receive.

All investment counsellors will tell you that the largest single factor in the investment market is the employees' pension funds, mutual funds and insurance funds, all designed to gather in the savings of the small person and to have them invested in the market by managements. When we talk about corporate rip-offs and excessive corporate profits, we are also talking about the earning in these employees' pension funds, mutual funds and insurance funds and saying they are too high. In the few minutes that were available to me, I hurriedly put forward a few ideas on what I feel is the role of a member in this speech from the throne debate and the important part of that speech which is being discussed today.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to participate in the throne speech debate. My first words must be words of congratulation to the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Several years ago I had that distinction myself. At that time the Right Hon. Rolland Michener was Governor General of this country. I commented at that time on what a distinguished career he had and what a force he had been in that particular role. I, along with all of my colleagues, am satisfied that the right choice has been made for his successor. I look forward to the role that the new Governor General will play in that particular office. As one who had some dealing with him when he was with the office of the Secretary of State, I remember being very impressed with the careful manner with which he dealt with each problem brought before him, and the courtesy he extended to people who were dealing with him. I am sure he will bring that kind of dedication and courtesy to his office.

The Speech from the Throne makes reference to the petrochemical industry. As one who represents an area which has sometimes been called the chemical valley of Canada, it was heartening indeed to see that specific reference in the throne speech. Shortly after 1968, when I became a member of parliament, I made it my business to meet with officials who, in some circles, have become known as bad people, multinational corporation executives and members of boards of directors, to find out about the petrochemical industry, what problems it was facing and what was being done to help it because when the petrochemical industry in Canada is strong, there are a lot of people who have reason to be thankful, not only the shareholders and management, but the people who work for the corporations.

We had a sad experience in Sarnia. It was necessary to lay off something like 100 employees of Polymer, now Polysar, people who felt they were in a secure position. They were not worried about being laid off, but they soon learned the effects of being laid off. Some people had 18 to 20 years experience with that particular corporation. If anything highlighted the problems being faced by the petrochemical industry, that certainly was the spotlight that pointed me to the target area about which we should be doing something.

At that time it was very heartening to know that the Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin was Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. After speaking to him, I found that the companies and the government had decided to stop warring with one another and do what could be done to help the petrochemical industry. A joint government-chemical industry committee was established, not to deal with recriminations but to determine the problems being faced by the petrochemical industry and what it was within the power of the Canadian governments to do about it.

At that time there was some concern that it was the size of the market that was having a disastrous effect on the size of the industry. It was not possible to build one world-scale plant, yet you might have several companies which felt that in order to get feed stock prices down to a particular level it was necessary to build plants on a world-scale level. Therefore, they looked at this.

Arising out of the report handed down by the joint government-chemical industry committee came the opportunity for not one, but two world-scale plants. These will have the beneficial effect of giving to the petrochemical industry feed stocks at competitive prices. That is all the petrochemical industry was asking. They wanted an opportunity to compete on an equal base or slightly less advantageous than the Americans. They said they could do it because they had the men, women, machinery, technology and skills. All they needed was world-scale plant. Of course, if it was possible to secure a larger market, that was to be not only the responsibility of the companies but of the Canadian government.

The beauty of the petrochemical industry is that, despite what has been said and reported for some years, the petrochemical industry is developing, and not only in the Sarnia-Lambton area. I suggest with respect, hoping not to be too parochial, that the Sarnia petrochemical complex constitutes the real heartbeat of the industry and that when this particular section is strong the whole petrochemical industry is strong. I was heartened to note the Dow-Dome people had made an application to the National Energy Board and this will lead, if the application is allowed, to the construction of a world-scale plant in Alberta producing feedstock in the order of one billion pounds per annum. This is the kind of operation that is very helpful to Alberta. It will not only have a world-scale sized plant but, as a result of that one plant being there, derivative plants are likely to be constructed. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, if the operation is strong in Alberta it will work to the benefit of the petrochemical industry in Ontario and in Quebec.

● (1600)

It may not be the national dream of a national railway but I would suggest, with respect, that a strong petrochemical industry is good for all of Canada. Four companies are now, I believe, about to embark on an application for the construction of a world-scale plant called the SOAP plant for purposes of brevity. The SOAP plant at the present time I assume, is making an application to the National Energy Board. This will have the effect of building or creating a world-scale plant for the production of ethylene. I am somewhat concerned about what impact it might have on Esso chemical who are at the present time meeting, as far as they are able, the needs of the petrochemical industry. But it seems to me, given todays booming economy, that this will not work to the detriment of Esso chemical but that Esso will, in fact, be able to pick up at a considerable amount of market, since most, if not all, of the products to be available from the SOAP operation, will not meet the market at the time that plant comes into production.

I have to comment at this point about the 40 per cent tax rate, the reduction which was given to the manufacturing association. This was an area that caused some concern to me, because a promise was made by the government in May, 1972. and after the results of the election in October, 1972 were known the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) could I think quite justifiably have said "No, we can't go ahead with this; the people have indicated that they do not support it". But this Liberal government had made a commitment to business, and I was very proud of the fact that the Minister of Finance saw fit to honour that obligation; he did not wait for several months of discussion, but indicated almost immediately thereafter that this particular tax rate would become law. I do not know what the end result will be; we shall have to wait until the end of March. But it seems to me from anything that I have been able to read in the business sections of various newspapers, and in trade journals, and from what I heard the minister himself say earlier today, that 110,000 more jobs have been created in this particular industry, which seems to speak for itself as to the correctness of the action taken by this government.

I suspect, if I may look into the future, the report will indicate that there has in fact been a large capital expenditure by the manufacturing industry as a direct result of this 40 per cent figure. I am pleased to see the Minister of Finance had the guts, the good sense and the honesty, to go ahead with this particular commitment made prior to the October election. I do not often agree with the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie), but I have to agree with him that there seems to be a ham-handed effort in progress on the part of the New Democratic Party to give Canadian business a black eye. This is of some concern to me, Mr. Speaker, because, as the hon. member for Dauphin has said, when you give corporations which are creating jobs a black eye, you are giving it also to the people who invest in that company; you are making them uneasy, suggesting to them that perhaps they are investing their money in the wrong direction.

They are looking for a fair return on their investments. They are not looking for excessive profits. Selective use of statistics bothers me because it only leads to part of the truth being told. The figures are probably correct but I have learned to look with some suspicion on statistics ever since they were described to me as being like a bikini bathing suit—what they reveal is interesting but what they conceal is vital. I think we owe it to Canadians to see to it that multinational corporations do not become too strong. I think we are under an obligation to impose controls where controls are necessary, using the fiscal and monetary weapons at our disposal, to see to it that they act as good Canadian corporate citizens. I believe this is our responsibility because they are so strong. But by the same token I think there is a glorious opportunity to take advantage of the presence of these multinational corporations, bearing in mind that they do many splendid things for this country.

Unhappily, the right wingers in this House have been content to say very little on the subject. I think of myself as a left wing Liberal, certainly left of centre, and I am surprised that hon. members who hold themselves out to be Conservatives and right wing in their views have not yet seen fit to refute some of the statements made by the New Democrats. It is time we devoted a day to a good debate on this subject in order to hear not only their viewpoint but other points of view. Let us get out all the statistics and find out what really is happening. If there are abuses, they can be controlled. But to suggest the picture is all black is, surely, going too far. The NDP remind me of certain people who profess to be experts without any practical experience. None of them, to my knowledge, have ever run a business. They remind me of child psychologists who have never had children of their own but who can tell us how children should be raised.

Although I represent primarily an urban constituency I wish to speak for a few moments about the situation in which Canadian cattlemen find themselves at the present time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Have you ever raised any cattle?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member asks me whether I have raised any cattle. I want to say that I have spread a little bull in my time.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to serve as chairman on the committee on food prices, so it may seem ironic I should be suggesting the imposition of some form of control over cattle imports. If low prices give rise to a situation in which a large proportion of Canadian cattle production is destroyed, the consumer is bound to suffer in the long run. We are obliged to make sure that this does not happen. Even if we pay a little more by way of higher prices it will be money well spent, and will ultimately reflect to the benefit of consumers.

The Speech from the Throne tells us that supplies must be increased. Undoubtedly this is the way to cope with rising prices. We all saw the disastrous effect of imposing controls at a time when supplies were short—they act in the long run to the detriment of the consumer. I disagree with the position taken by NDP speakers that the Food Prices Review Board should be given the authority to roll back prices. Any action in that regard should be taken by the government itself, and the government should be directly responsible in the House. In my view it would be wrong for a government to shelter behind the Food Prices Review Board. Any obligation to roll back prices rests with the government not with an appointed tribunal. I do not see the Food Prices Review Board in such a role.

While I am on this subject, I should like to commend the Food Prices Review Board. Many who are critical of this board never bother to read its reports. I refer particularly to a recent report on the effect of controls in Britain and the United States. I have the opinion that the board is served by an excellent research staff. Critics of the board should at least take time to read its reports before they sound off.

In the field of veterans' affairs, I am concerned about three issues. The first is, whether or not the date for the receipt of applications under certain veterans' legislation ought to be extended. I hope this will be very carefully studied. Second, I think the transfer of hospitals is a good idea and I support it. However, I am apprehensive that eventually our veterans will reach the age where young doctors will not be entering veterans hospitals but will be dealing with senior citizens, therefore the veterans will not be getting the specialized treatment that they should have. By the same token, I am concerned that we should not forget that they are veterans hospitals.

I recommend to the minister that serious consideration be given to appointing an ombudsman to supervise all hospitals, or that each hospital have an ombudsman. I can say from my own experience with veterans that some of the veterans now being treated in veterans hospitals are afraid to raise a ruckus because they feel they might be sent home early or that they would only cause trouble for themselves. I do not think this sort of situation should be allowed to exist, and this is why I suggest an ombudsman.

The last matter I want to raise I have raised over and over again. Statistics on the backlog of pension cases being cleaned up are impressive, but I think that even more haste is required in this area.

I should like to go on, Mr. Speaker, but I see my time is up.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, at the outset, may I welcome to the gallery this afternoon a group of young Newfoundland students under the Reverend Brother Brennan who are visiting their capital from Corner Brook and several other communities around that area.

In rising to take part in this debate I should like, first of all, to associate myself with the other members of the House who have paid tribute to the new Governor General and Mrs. Léger. On behalf of my constituents and my province I wish them good health, success and happiness during their term of office. I am sure I am expressing the feelings of my constituents and my province when I say how much we look forward to a visit by His Excellency and Mrs. Léger in what we hope will be the not too distant future. I join with my colleagues in extending my sincere congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply. Considering how little these two hon. members had to work with, I think they did a very good job and excelled themselves in their speeches.

I should also like to congratulate my leader, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), on the brilliant speech he made during this debate. I am sure that he was echoing the feelings and beliefs of the vast majority of Canadians who have been confronted with, and will continue to be confronted with, unemployment, high living costs and inflation generally.

The Speech from the Throne, not unlike the one delivered last year, held no real surprises. There is nothing in the speech to instil any real confidence in our people.

Noticeably absent from the speech is any meaningful indication of resource policy, trade and income policy, monetary policy and, what is more important, any policy of worth to fight inflation. We must recognize the fact that unless the problems of inflation are eliminated no other domestic problems in this country will be solved. Therefore, it stands to reason that it should be the first priority of this government to tackle inflation.

What do we have before us, Mr. Speaker? We have a speech that indicates quite clearly that this government are content to go their merry way in the belief that we are merely the victims of world wide inflation. They are content to bury their heads in the sand and let things ride on the basis that all of our problems are the direct result of inflationary pressures from outside this country, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), this government, and indeed the people of Canada, are innocent bystanders. The people of Canada, particularly those in the middle and low income brackets, are not buying any longer the excuses and indifference of this government. If the Prime Minister and his colleagues have been listening to responses from the people of Canada, it will become abundantly clear to them that it is time they got down from their academic ivory towers and started to mix with the bare facts of reality.

The first thing that this government must do is to be honest with itself and with the people and recognize the fact that inflation in Canada is not the total responsibility of outside forces, but that there exist in this country problems that are adding to inflation. This government must change its defeatist attitude; there is no use trying to change this situation when the people responsible are not convinced themselves that change can come about. The government must be willing to admit to themselves, and to the people, that their handling of the situation has been wrong. It is no tragedy to admit failure. To err is human. But to continue in the full knowledge that you are wrong, and without regard for the future welfare of millions of our people, is a tragedy and is inhuman.

It will be essential for this government and for the people of this country to work together in order to get out of the mess in which we now find ourselves. A short-term freeze on certain elements of the Canadian economy is essential if we are serious about fighting inflation. This must be followed by an economic, income and monetary policy. One without the other will not work, but together they will work. If this government is serious about the future welfare of Canadians, then it is time it swallowed its pride and listened to the people. It is time it implemented the policy for fighting inflation put forth by the leader of our party.

I listened with a great deal of interest for some mention in the throne speech of the government's objectives in regard to the development of the food producing segments of our economy. Being a Newfoundlander I was, of course, particularly interested in the government's objectives as they relate to the fisheries. May I quote this extract from the Speech from the Throne:

> The government's objectives will guide a re-assessment of existing programs in the areas of agriculture and fisheries.

This, sir, is the first mention of fisheries in the speech. Other references to fisheries relate to the government's intention to improve harbour facilities for fishing fleets and the promise of guaranteed loans and other forms of assistance to both farmers and fishermen to assist them in purchasing or modernizing their equipment. The throne speech also promised incentives to increase Canada's catch of unexploited stocks of fish. I hope that the government's reassessment of the agriculture industry has been more productive and meaningful than their reassessment of the fishing industry. Otherwise, I am afraid we will have more than empty stockings next Christmas; we will have empty bread baskets and probably empty stomachs as well.

What I am about to say now I have said before, because last year the same situation prevailed. I refer to the government's expenditures on badly needed small craft harbour facilities in the Atlantic area. Let us for a moment translate into actual fact the government's promise to improve harbour facilities for our fishing fleets. For the benefit of hon. members who are not familiar with the problem, I should point out that harbour and wharf facilities are to our fishermen what grain elevators, storage facilities and boxcars are to our western farmers. Without these facilities our wheat farmers cannot produce and successfully market their crops. By the same token, without adequate harbour and fish landing facilities our fishermen cannot produce or attain their full potential in the fishing industry.

The entire federal budget this year for the provision and improvement of small craft harbour facilities is less than that being spent by the government in the city of Ottawa on the acquisition of properties on Sparks Street. Indeed, in Newfoundland, where there is such a desperate need for these facilities, the federal government proposes to spend approximately $4.2 million during the coming fiscal year. That is approximately the same amount being spent by this government on the provision of an underground parking facility in the city of Hull.

On March 6 last, I received a letter from the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. Davis) to which he attached a list of the works to be undertaken by his department during the 1974-75 fiscal year, together with a list of other projects that have been considered essential but, according to him, will of necessity be deferred due to budget constraints. The cost of the projects selected for the 1974-75 program for my constituency amount to $445,000. The cost of the projects that have been deferred, notwithstanding their urgency, amounts to $1.5 million. How naive does the Minister of Fisheries think we are? Is it any wonder that our people have lost faith in this government and are fed up to the teeth with what is taking place in this country today? Is it any wonder that there is a growing resentment among a large segment of our people in respect of the present government and its attitude toward the have-not regions of this country?

Fishing facilities are vitally important to Newfoundland and, indeed, to other fishing areas in this country. Without them fishermen are unable to fish productively and make a living for themselves from this industry. Does the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) expect us to accept, without question, the extravagant spending on the part of his government in certain areas when primary producers including fishermen are told to eat cake? Does he expect us to accept without a murmur the huge amounts of money provided for in this year's estimates for the acquisition of properties in and around the capital for the provision of bigger and better public buildings, and for bilingualism which this year is costing the Canadian taxpayer in excess of $200 million while the real problems of this country are being swept under the carpet?

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Carter: The fishermen of my constituency are being denied their fundamental right of being able to earn a living from the fisheries, while at the same time we see in the estimates typical examples of this government's misguided sense of priorities. It is no wonder that a lot of Canadians are getting fed up with this government's preoccupation with matters that are receiving priority such as those I have mentioned. As I have said, this year alone we will spend in excess of $200 million on bilingualism in Canada. This represents about 9 per cent of the government's budget. I am not suggesting for a moment that there is no need for a policy on bilingualism in Canada. I think we all recognize that need and members of this party have gone along with the proposition, but I do believe there are times when other things should take priority, and this also applies to certain areas of the province of Quebec. Certainly, in the Atlantic area there are problems which should not be deferred in favour of other programs the government has seen fit to initiate and finance.

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Carter: It must be obvious to the Prime Minister and to his government that not enough attention is being paid to the needs, wishes and desires of the people, and I include the fishermen of eastern Canada who are in many cases being denied their basic rights as citizens of this country.

Our concern in eastern Canada, certainly in my province, is not in respect of cultural sovereignty. That is something we probably will start worrying about in 50 years' time. We are concerned about the right to be treated equally as Canadians, and the right to earn a decent living. I am sure that statement will shatter the delicate ears of some of my colleagues opposite but, be that as it may, I can assure you I am not alone in that view.

An hon. Member: That's a lot of bull and you know it.

Mr. Baker: You wouldn't know a bull from a flounder.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must be quite familiar with bull, so I will not deny him his right to say that.

An hon. Member: Don't pretend to be the only one speaking for Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Carter: You will have your chance, and then perhaps you will stand up and be heard. These people have had enough of this government's costly policies. Of course, we know what is happening. The Prime Minister is not fooling us. We know it is the philosophy of the Prime Minister and the Liberal party to divide and conquer, to keep political power at any price, and that is what they are setting out to do. They are pitting one segment of our society against another. The Prime Minister is not content with that, he is now working on a program to pit the east against the west and region against region.

An hon. Member: And fishermen against farmers.

Mr. Carter: Yes, and fishermen against farmers as my hon. colleague suggests. The Prime Minister is doing all this under the name and guise of national unity. Of course, his real reason is to retain the political power he has, and he is not too concerned about what the outcome will be so far as this country is concerned.

Let me tell the Prime Minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that he is playing a dangerous game. He is playing with fire. The majority of Canadians can see through this sinister plot and are not having any part of it. Indeed, the obvious philosophy that has been adopted by the Prime Minister and the Liberal government will have the opposite effect in this country in that it will be responsible for creating prejudices and bigotry. There is a lot of rumbling in this country and particularly in my province, as a result of this government's obvious intention and determination to reduce certain areas, including certain parts of the Atlantic region, to that of colonial status.

It is really paradoxical when one realizes that the government is spending hundreds of millions of dollars, allegedly to bring the people of Canada together, when on the other hand it is doing its best to alienate the people of other provinces, including Newfoundland, making them feel a non-part of the federal system. I refer, of course, to the policy of this government to reduce its presence in Newfoundland to that of a branch office with headquarters in one or other of the Atlantic provinces.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Ed Nelson (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, if I begin my brief remarks with comments on the speeches of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I do so in the spirit of reflecting on their party policies and not on them as individuals.

I was not disappointed with the speech of the Leader of the Opposition because, as the saying goes, blessed is he who expects nothing for he shall not be disappointed. Perhaps the best part of his speech was the metaphor he used in describing members in the government benches as an orchestra, with various ministers playing designated instruments albeit discordantly, while he himself, like little Johnnie one note, sang the monotonous and discredited theme of the Tory party, wage and price controls. This term has been variously disguised as a prices and incomes policy, a freeze followed by unstated measures, or a freeze followed by specific measures which are never specific. Whatever term one falls for, this still means locking in the inequities that already exist and, as for the measures that follow the freeze, it is unlikely that the leopard will change his spots.

There was a lot of meat in the speech of the Prime Minister who said:

Our problem is the equitable distribution of our most abundant wealth.

That is a beautiful statement. He went on to state:

I find it appropriate at this time to destroy the myth that the cost of labour has been a dominant factor in contributing to the present inflationary round in Canada.

That is a wonderful statement. Then, he fired his big gun and said:

We will not hesitate to go after the so-called big guys if action is necessary to protect the Canadian consumer.

These statements may come back to haunt the government in the months or weeks or days to come. Well, Mr. Speaker, let me emphasize now, as our leader already has and our members have over the months and during this debate, that action is necessary to protect the Canadian consumer. In 1973, as we all know, the consumer price index went up by 9.1 per cent, hitting the average family in the two most vital spots, food and housing, which together account for 56 per cent of average family income. The government admits that labour is not to blame, and statistics show that wage and salary increases in the last half of 1973 actually decreased by nearly one per cent while corporation profits, on the other hand, in 1973 were over-all 40 to 50 per cent higher than in 1972, which was a good year too.

I will not list the profit figures of the huge corporations because they are already a matter of public record. Despite the comments of the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), we are not anti-business; we are anti-business abuse. Most multi-nationals could be included in that category. I remember our leader, during a speech in this House, complimenting a large Canadian corporation for its corporate business practice. The government said it would not hesitate to take action. In 1963, the three largest sugar importers were convicted of price fixing. Now, they are at it once more and are being prosecuted again. But in the intervening time, between 1963 and today, it is estimated that the price fixing activities of these three firms have cost the Canadian consumer $125 million. Now, there is hesitation for you—eight years of it. Now, the steel companies and the cement companies are under suspicion. Is it any wonder that we look askance at statements that promise action when necessary?

The public is beginning to catch on, but they know now what to expect of the oil companies. A recent Gallup poll conducted by the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion shows that over half of the Canadian public has lost confidence that the multinational oil companies will act in the interests of Canada. Anyone who has visited the United States lately will hear the same distrust widely expressed. Even there, the public is calling for investigations and for public control. Now, the wolves are starting to gather around the Athabasca tar sands. What will the government do to protect the interests of Canadians? Will they use the proposed national petroleum company to serve the interests of Canadians or will this be another sell-out of our national resources?

As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) has pointed out, unless this government gets into the oil business in co-operation with the provincial governments to place this huge resource under public control, the confidence that the oil companies have lost will extend to the government, as it probably has already. In light of the fantastic profits quoted by so many members on this side of the House, excluding the Tories who have their sights trained on smaller game, how can the government in the name of all that is reasonable deny the need for greater controls over the activities and profits of the large corporations.

The Tories complain about the high cost of welfare programs and of UIC, but do you ever hear them quote the $4.7 billion in deferred taxes to large corporations? They speak with feeling about the need for housing and of the plight of those who do not have decent shelter, but they seldom make specific mention of the 516 per cent increase in profits in 1973 of one of our largest real estate and development institutions and others like it. Yes, the Tories have their sights trained on smaller game. That champion of the working man, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) zeroed in only last Thursday on the extent to which people are 'cheating' or 'ripping-off' the Unemployment Insurance Commission. No one would condone cheating on UIC or any other program, but according to my information, in 1972 only 908 persons were prosecuted by UIC for having cheated on their claims. That is .05 per cent of all claims. As for the rip-off, I was interested to hear from no less an authority than the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), whose humanitarian approach to the workers seems incongruous in the context of the present minister's attitude that:

The people who went on unemployment insurance in 1972 with eight weeks work represented 2.5 per cent of all claims in Canada. That is what all the excitement is about—2.5 per cent, 11 weeks or less, 35,000 people.

Let the Tories fire their salvos, not at the working people but at the real rip-off artist whose embarrassingly high profits are published every day—the multinational corporations who manipulate the pricing and distribution of goods to their own advantage and the wealthy people in this country who, according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, under-report their investment income by as much as 50 per cent.

I want to mention pensions only briefly because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has already spoken and when he speaks he leaves nothing left for the rest of the seagulls. Since his speech, however, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has made it clear that the government does not intend to lower the pensionable age. This news will come as a great shock and disappointment to thousands of weary Canadians who have worked hard all their lives and who desperately want to lay down their tools before age 65. The Canadian people want adequate pensions at age 60, and until a step is made in this direction, the remarks that the minister made this afternoon will have a hollow ring.

I have in the past 14 months worked closely with the claims officer in my own branch of the Canadian Legion. I have always found the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) to be co-operative and I believe he is doing his best. I note that the processing of claims has been speeded up and the backlog reduced last year from 9,000 to 7,300. From the minister's point of view, and taking into consideration the difficulties of processing which he evidently faces, this is no doubt a significant achievement. From the point of view of the needy applicant who is far down the list, however, settlement seems remote and time short. I thank the minister for past courtesies and urge him to bend even greater effort toward speeding up the processing of these claims.

One of the greatest achievements of past Liberal governments was the administration of the veteran's education rehabilitation program which concluded in the mid-fifties. I know this from personal experience. It would now be a most appropriate gesture on this 25th biennial convention year of the Royal Canadian Legion to extend the deadline for the Veterans Land Act, and I would hope that the government will consider doing so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, time is streaking by and because of the agreement to limit speeches at this stage I will make only brief reference to the problems of urban development in the lower mainland region of British Columbia. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) has spoken of specific projects related to port development, and I am aware of the developments taking place to improve port facilities. I want to mention, however, a matter of particular concern to me and to many community groups in my riding, namely the future development of the Burrard Inlet east of the Second Narrows bridge. On both sides of the inlet there is an ever present danger that too much industrial and commercial development will result in congestion and environmental damage. I believe the communities involved should have greater representation on the local National Harbours Commission.

For my part, as the federal member representing both sides of the inlet in this sensitive area, I recognize the right of local councils to make decisions regarding the planning and development of the communities which they represent. For that reason, I have not raised my voice against the installation of yet another refinery on the Burnaby side or the projected development of a large commercial enterprise on the north side of the inlet. Yet, it is my feeling that this vital growth area stands at the crossroads at this point in time. I pray with all my heart that the federal government, the provincial government, the greater Vancouver regional district and, most important of all, the municipal governments will catch the vision of the future and, putting partisan politics aside, work together, in the words of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) "to develop in a co-operative way good techniques of managing urban growth to avoid congestion and pollution". The four levels of government that I have mentioned can, with frequent consultation with community groups, so manage developments that the people of this area, which extends far out into the Fraser Valley, will be assured of the ultimate goal: the development of a truly livable region.

If I may conclude on a parochial note, may I finally beg the indulgence of the House to pay tribute to the fine work of the co-ordinators of the provincial debating finals which took place last week in Burnaby-Seymour. Winners from all provinces will compete in a national debating final in May here in Ottawa. This is an excellent national program for training future citizens and politicians, and an excellent example of community involvement. I am proud also that Burnaby-Seymour has provided so many world skating champions through the fine work of the North Shore Winter Club.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North-Nipissing East): Mr. Speaker, first of all, along with the other members of the House, I should like to extend my congratulations and those of my constituents to Their Excellencies, the Governor General and his good lady, on taking office and wish them well. Secondly, I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the cabinet and the many members of the government caucus for their contribution to the throne speech debate and to a dynamic and useful program for the second session of the twenty-ninth parliament. There is one thing to which I do not pay much heed, and that is the criticism of rubber stamping that this party receives, but I can say on behalf of my own colleagues that every member is a part of the party in general.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hopkins: This session has been taken up, to a large degree, in discussions on petroleum and energy in Canada. But there is one thing that should be made very clear and kept foremost in everyone's mind and that is that over the years since the 1940's federal governments in Canada have been spending millions of dollars on nuclear energy research in this country. Today, we are foremost among the nations of the world in the development of nuclear power and its domestic uses.

One of the things that has not received nearly enough emphasis throughout 1973, and throughout the debate on the energy crisis in Canada, is the happy fact that Atomic Energy of Canada at Chalk River and Deep River, which I am glad to have in my constituency, is the mother of the most efficient and successful power source in the world today. Indeed, it is the mother of the entire Ontario Hydro plant in Pickering. Ontario Hydro had the courage to go ahead and make the decision to try it, but it was the expertise of Atomic Energy of Canada that has made that plant possible and will make other plants possible. In our constituency in particular, and in the country at large, we should be taking our hats off to the science community at Atomic Energy in Chalk River and Deep River, as well as the National Research Council for leading the way to a new and bountiful source of energy for the world.

Sometimes we become so involved with our own problems that we forget to tell people about our successes. We had a very famous Canadian in the past, who went down fighting in the election of 1957, in the person of the Right Hon. C. D. Howe. I should like to remind members of this House today of something that has probably long since been forgotten, but it was the Right Hon. C. D. Howe who was the initiator of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. It is because of his initiative, in spite of the criticism that he received in this House and in spite of the fact that sometimes he arrived at decisions in a hurry but they were usually the right decisions, that one of the most expensive research institutions that we have in Canada was started, one which produced much good for mankind, not only in Canada but in the world at large. This nation owes him thanks for taking leadership and for his courage back in the 1940's.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hopkins: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) has been named "man of the year" by the business section of the Toronto Globe and Mail. He has carried himself well through a very difficult period and in the debates in the House of Commons. I do not care who laughs or what comments are made about him. He has taken a stand in this House and he has done his work well. He deserves the credit of the Canadian community.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: Especially the big companies.

Mr. Hopkins: Recently, I have had the honour to visit our Canadian armed forces in Europe where I had several briefings and visited our servicemen in the field. I have also had the privilege of visiting the U.N. forces in Cyprus. We now have a large contingent in Egypt. I do not think people really appreciate how difficult U.N. work is for Canadian servicemen. It requires a lot of patience and great dedication. Our servicemen who serve in these positions around the world in the NATO forces and in our Canadian forces in Europe are to be commended to the nth degree for the image of this nation that they are giving around the world.

While in Cyprus I also had the opportunity to speak to some of the people on both sides of the conflict there. It still looks like a very difficult issue to settle. But there is one thing that must be said for the senior officers as well as the rank and file in the armed forces, and that is that regardless of the tasks they are given to do, they take these tasks seriously. In spite of the problems with which they are faced, they go ahead and do the job.

I would be remiss if I did not say a few words about the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the work it has done in parts of eastern Ontario. In the upper part of the Ottawa valley, a large section of which I have the privilege of representing, as well as in other areas that I do not represent directly, such as the towns of Renfrew, Arnprior, Eganville and so on, if it was not for DREE and its input into that region we would not be getting ahead nearly as well as we are today. In spite of all the criticism this department has received from various areas across Canada, it is welcome in our section of eastern Ontario any day. I will stand up in the House and support the minister any day.

In the new agreements that will be forthcoming on DREE, some of which have already been made, I hope there will be a considerable input and that my area of eastern Ontario will continue to benefit.

Mr. Speaker, I would be very remiss if I did not congratulate the mayors, the reeves, the industrial commissioners and the people who have really tried to make this system work. We all know that it is one thing for government to bring in policies, but it is another thing for the people in the local areas to pick up the ball and carry it down the field, making use of those policies. I hope we continue to have strong and dedicated people in municipal governments in this part of Canada, and indeed across the country. Scmetimes we do not give municipal politicians the credit they deserve.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make a further point about the town of Deep River. Because of the existence of large plants of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited at Chalk River and Deep River, which employ 2,450 people, it is sometimes thought by both senior levels of government that since the town of Deep River receives a grant in lieu of taxes from that Crown corporation the town does not qualify for the award of other grants. This is unfair to the town. It has been in existence since the 1940's and now requires a lot of money for maintenance as well as growth. I do not feel that the existence of that grant in lieu of taxes from AECL should be used as an argument to refuse the town of Deep River the same grants it should normally receive, just as any other community of its size across Canada.

There have been many discussions inside and outside this House in regard to the LIP program and the minister has come under fire about some projects. We have to realize that human beings are not perfect, not 100 per centers. In spite of the criticism that has been levied at the odd LIP program, in my estimation it has been one of the most successful programs for providing services and worthwhile work in small communities that would otherwise be absolutely forgotten.

There are many small communities scattered throughout my constituency, which is the largest of 77 in southern Ontario. I would not be ashamed to take anybody to any part of my riding to show them the work undertaken through the Local Initiatives Program to service the small communities. I hope the criticism, which has been overemphasized, of particular projects, that have failed will not be used as a sledgehammer to kill a program as a result of which much good work has been accomplished.

Mr. Speaker, a part of the Speech from the Throne dealt with freight rates and freight policies across Canada. These are probably equally important to the DREE program. Many industries have been assisted in settling in various parts of Canada, but perhaps they should be encouraged into slow growth areas with a freight rate policy that would assist in their success. This is the way to put permanency into the usefulness of the DREE program, and I do not think we can talk about the one without talking about the other. We have also a key role to play in providing roads for transportation, and I hope that greater emphasis will be placed on this in eastern Ontario in the future as an enticement to economic development.

Earlier, Mr. Speaker, I mentioned that our forces in Europe, Cyprus and Egypt are dedicated but their job is a very trying one which demands a great deal of patience. When talking to the men in the field I realized that the one thing they missed was sports news, hockey results and so on from Canada; things which are a way of Canadian life. Upon my return I wrote to a major oil company in Canada to ask if it would sponsor tapes and video taped programs for the armed forces in Europe, Cyprus and Egypt. I sincerely hope that this will work, and if it does I will be approaching the appropriate ministries to assist in bringing these facilities to the armed forces overseas.

There are many things that our armed forces do of which people are not aware. For example, in the preservation of ecology, our maritime aircraft and naval vessels monitor pollution on our coasts and report major offenders to the appropriate government department for action. I had a very interesting experience approximately two weeks ago in visiting Maritime Command.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret that I must interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to offer my congratulations and good wishes to His Excellency the Governor General. I think that the installation of our new Governor General reminds the country of the importance of his office, and the Crown which he represents, an importance that over the years has been lost sight of by the government of this country, until very recently. We are aware of how the government began to take a new look at the monarchy and the representation of it after October 30, 1972. I think it is fair to say in a quarter of a century before that, that a series of Liberal governments had reduced the importance of the monarchy, it is vital for us to take this occasion to recall the importance of the Crown and the parliamentary system, to recognize the tactical value it has in the way our country is governed.

I think one of the lessons that we, as Canadians, can learn from Watergate is that in the parliamentary system we have a far superior form of government, and basic to that system is the function and role of the Crown.

I wish to congratulate both the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) set forth their case with clarity, conviction and sincerity, although with somewhat misguided enthusiasm for the subject on which they had to speak. Both hon. member made fine speeches.

I wish, in passing, to refer to the address of the hon. member for Sherbrooke because it was in great contrast to some of the speeches I have heard by other hon. members from his province, speeches which have contained inflammatory language, which have shown a derogatory spirit on the language issue. That attitude should not be brought to this House and should not be evident in this country. What we need, as some of us recognize, is that issue to be taken outside the realm of controversy and party competition. I regret that some of the remarks made on the Speech from the Throne have done little but contribute to the ill-will and misunderstandings of the past.

Most serious of all is the way in which the Speech from the Throne has failed to give the people of Canada and members of this parliament the sense of direction which we need because of the critical situation which Canadians face. The speech has been described by many commentators as lacking rhetoric. It certainly lacks a program. The country can stand absence of eloquence; it cannot endure an absence of understanding. At this point in Canada's history we need leadership. The country does not need a government which give top priority to its own survival: it needs a government that will give it a sense of direction.

I recognize that it is scarcely possible to find this sense of direction under a government which cannot decide whether it should follow the Liberal direction or the socialist direction. The country cannot be given that direction if the government does not know its own direction. This is of vital concern to us all because of the crisis situation in which this country now finds itself.

When a general election is held in Canada, and held it must be despite the chameleon adaptiveness of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the choice for Canadians primarily will not be between two parties but between two ways of life. One way of life is to be seen by the present alliance between Liberals and socialists. It is based upon the conviction that the government should be a kind of Big Brother, at the centre of life, and take over every aspect of life of the Canadian people. That way of life we see demonstrated in the way in which the role of government is expanding in Canada under the present administration which is taking on behemoth proportions.

It is now expected that the public service of Canada will expand to over 330,000 employees in the forthcoming fiscal year. If we add the members of the armed forces and others directly or indirectly on the federal payroll, we find that there will be working for the federal government directly or for the public service, including Crown corporations, in the neighbourhood of 500,000 persons, representing 5 per cent of the labour force of this country. The cost of that massive force mounts every year. The bill for the federal government is rising at a speed 50 per cent greater than the growth of the gross national product. The federal budget is such that there is now a levy on each person, adult and child, of $1,000 or more per year. The cost of living for Canadians last year increased by 9.5 per cent, but the cost of government will increase by more than 20 per cent.

I ask this question: what do Canadians have to show for this? Much of this increase in cost is based upon the faith claim made by supporters of the government that whatever problem the people face, the government knows best what the solution ought to be. Name a single need which Canadians have experienced and you will find there has been some attempt by the government to present a fully funded program to deal with it. We have agencies, boards, commissions, corporations and groups of all kinds drawing on the public purse. We have projects, coalitions, organizations and committees, all reaching out with open hands for federal grants.

We have poured billions of dollars into programs for removing regional disparities, eliminating slums, creating employment and improving the quality of life. Yet Canada still has deprived regions, substandard housing, jobless persons, mounting rates of crime, marriage breakdowns, drug addiction and alcohol abuse. It is clear that the spending of more and more public money by the federal government is not going to meet the needs of the Canadian people. We see that, for example, in the escalating costs of prisons. Last year the cost of operating our penitentiary service increased. The cost of keeping an inmate in prison has risen from $11,000 per year to $13,000 per year.

When we debated this issue in the previous session of parliament, I hazarded the prediction that if the rate of increase in the cost of running our penitentiary service continued to the end of this decade, by the end of the 1970's we would be spending $20,000 per inmate per year. I was wrong: we will reach that figure by 1978 if we continue to escalate costs at the present rate. Yet we see no indication of the government being aware that these expenditures do not achieve what they purport to achieve. The government has inflated the cost of its penitentiary program in order to put greater emphasis on rehabilitation. That aim I am sure all parties support. Certainly I do. Yet in exchange for the great expenditure the government has put out we have had little that is effective under the heading of rehabilitation. Actually, despite all the expenditures on our prisons, we have a recidivism rate of 80 per cent, which means that 80 per cent of the inmates of our penitentiaries have been in a penal institution previously. We find that instead of being rehabilitated, progressing and developing as normal citizens, a great proportion of prison inmates return to the penitentiary.

I cite this example to show that in one area undiminished growth in government expenditures will not achieve the objective which the government claims as justification for the growth in expenditure. In the Speech from the Throne I find no hint that the government will conduct a major re-examination of penitentiary services and the penal system in our country. Editorials in the Toronto Globe and Mail and the Toronto Star in recent weeks have reflected analytically and critically on the increased cost of our prisons and on the failure of our prisons to deliver the rehabilitative goods.

Those newspapers have challenged the government to face this issue honestly and to see if there are not more effective ways in which the public purse can be protected and offenders against the law dealt with. In this matter we have another example of the way in which the government is spending, spending, spending without being able to demonstrate to the public that in exchange for the massive outlay in public funds it is able to deliver the goods which it has set out to deliver. I hope, therefore, this House of Commons will be far more critical of the attempts by the government to inflate the federal budget.

One of the facts of life in Canada today that the government has refused to recognize is the hard fact that a major element in the high cost of living is the high cost of governing, and that the government of Canada is itself a contributor to the inflationary crisis that is now affecting the people of Canada. The hon. member who preceded me spoke with some enthusiasm about the way in which all Liberal members of parliament contribute to the thinking of the Liberal government. One gets the impression that the caucus of the government party is one great, expanded cabinet meeting. If that is so, it would certainly be salutary and in the interest of the people of Canada if more and more Liberal members had an economizing influence upon their high-spending ministers.

One thing that has become clear to the people of Canada is that they are being required by the taxation process to put more money into their government and they are not getting back from the government the kind of service to justify this outrageous expenditure. For example, I have here editorials from the Ottawa Citizen commenting upon the growth of the federal budget. The Ottawa Citizen states it is costing us more for the public service to do less. The Montreal Star refers to the way in which thousands of persons have been added to the federal civil service, while the service gets worse.

We have to realize that across this country it is becoming more and more clear that simply having a program initiated by the government at extraordinary expense will not meet the needs of the people. We must recognize that it is time we had a government that has some trust in the people of Canada and which recognizes that if the people of Canada could have more of their own hard-earned income remaining in their hands, they would be able to deal more effectively with their own problems.

We need to replace the Big Brother complex of this government, which believes that it primarily has the right and capacity for meeting the needs of the Canadian people, with one that recognizes the Canadian people have within their competence the wherewithal to meet their needs and to deal with their problems. What they require most is some freedom by which they can have more control over the income for which they have laboured. The Big Brother mentality of Liberal socialism that now governs Canada is robbing each taxpayer of that for which he has laboured.

If this parliament were really serving the needs of the people of Canada it would be seeking a program, enunciated in a throne speech, that would emphasize the way in which a government ought to trust the people of Canada. We have had too much Big Brother government: what we need is more faith in the people.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join other hon. members in congratulating the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier).

They showed that they are not only able parliamentarians but also that they can speak with conviction and are concerned with current problems, not only with those within their constituencies but also with those that concern us as Canadians and citizens of the world.

Mr. Speaker, as my time is limited, I shall spend less time than usual on discussing the Speech from the Throne, especially when dealing with my constituency and its problems. I shall restrict my comments to one problem, which I believe is a very important one at this time. Even if this is not a local problem, one which concerns only my constituency, in view of its importance at the national level and the effects that it could have on my constituents, I shall deal mostly with unemployment insurance, with the criticisms aimed at this system and with the famous reforms and investigations that some people in this country, particularly the members of the Progressive Conservative Party, would like to see undertaken.

[English]

Before doing that we must deal with one other issue that has been discussed in this debate and all over the country. That is the issue of inflation and rising costs in Canada. I wish to put on the record—I will not use the word "stupid"—how illogical is the position of the Progressive Conservative Party with regard to inflation and rising costs.

There is no evidence at this time of cost-push inflation. The inflation is being caused by extreme shortages, not only in Canada but in the world. To suggest the simplistic solution of wage and price controls only because it is an appealing political slogan is very irresponsible. The Conservative Party says it has its roots in regions of this country including my own area in the maritimes. They want to freeze the salaries of the people in my constituency and in other parts of the maritimes. These people work for $2 an hour, and sometimes less. Even if they earn $2.50 an hour, how will their problems of inflation be solved by freezing their salaries for 90 days? That is not only ridiculous but irresponsible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: Members from Newfoundland and Nova Scotia have been talking about the terrible rise in food prices. The price of fish in Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia has never been so high. For the first time in my short experience I can see fishermen getting a fair price for their catch. They are finally receiving a good income with which to support their families. However, the Conservatives would like not only to freeze the price of their product but their income.

I can cite figures to show that salaries of fish plant workers in Newfoundland and New Brunswick are about $3 an hour for the first time in the history of the maritimes. However, the Conservatives are saying to these people that they will solve their problems by freezing their income. Not only does it not make sense from an economic point of view, because it has failed in Britain, the United States and anywhere else where it has been tried, and not only is it stupid, but how can those people talk about social justice on the one hand and policies like that on the other?

Mr. Blenkarn: Oh, oh!

Mr. Breau: The hon. member for Mississauga (Mr. Blenkarn) comes from the Toronto area where people earn $5 or $6 an hour. He does not understand what it is like to work in a fish plant for $2 an hour. I can appreciate his position. However, even if there were no members of his party from areas of the country where people work for low wages, I thought he would have enough heart not to suggest economic policies which mean that poor people have to bear the cost.

● (1720)

An hon. Member: That is unfair.

Mr. Breau: I wanted to speak about unemployment insurance because again we hear the same two standards expressed by the Conservatives—

Mr. Danforth: The same old bunch over there.

Mr. Breau: Time and time again members on the opposition benches bring up errors in administration, dramatizing everything that occurs. The Liberals brought in this program in 1971 at a time when they were in a majority position in the House. We did so because we believed it was good legislation, a step toward social justice; and we did so because the labour movement in Canada has failed to organize or to represent poor workers. It is well known that the labour movement has not succeeded in organizing strong labour movements among the poor.

When the Liberal government brought in the new act in 1971, a measure of social justice was brought to these people for the first time. By doing so we ensured that those workers, too, would enjoy a degree of independence of the kind possessed by workers in the riding of the hon. member for Mississauga who can bargain successfully for $5 or $6 an hour and compensation in the event of lay-offs. In my constituency, the large majority of workers do not have that power.

I should like to read part of an article by Mr. James Stewart which appeared in the Montreal Star. We have heard a great deal of nonsense about employers in New Brunswick and elsewhere being unable to get workers because of the effect of unemployment insurance benefits. That picture is completely false. I have lived in New Brunswick all my life and I know a great many poor people, people who draw unemployment benefits, and I have yet to meet a man who has refused a well paid and secure job. It is true that I have met people who have refused jobs that I would not give to a slave. It has been stated that because of unemployment insurance, employers cannot get workers in the fish processing or the forest industries. The article to which I referred states the following with reference to a study which was made of the forest industry in New Brunswick:

> Out of approximately 550 persons identified as having left employment in the forest industry, only some 90 have been identified as drawing unemployment insurance benefits.

This means that some 460 people left for other reasons. Many industries have been asking people to work like slaves. When members constantly raise questions directing attention to weaknesses of administration, they should remember that when we brought in the new act we had to merge two acts together. When that is done, problems are bound to arise. Critics are playing upon the fears and, in some instances, upon the hate of those who are against this system of aiding the less fortunate in society. They are encouraging those who wish to destroy any program which gives defenceless workers a chance to become more independent. A lot of workers in my constituency have become more independent because of the UIC. I do not apologize for this. Neither do I apologize for those associated with the labour movement in other parts of the country who can bargain from strength and achieve security and a decent standard of living. Many people in my constituency no longer have to go out into the woods in December, January and February in six or seven feet of snow. They can draw benefits—

An hon. Member: In other words, they don't have to work.

Mr. Breau: Would the hon. member who made that comment like a job in the woods, in seven feet of snow at forty bucks a week? Could he live on that? This is what has happened over the years. We have given people a chance to become independent. In the past they were exploited. I am not saying there are no weaknesses in the act or in the work of the commission. There are bound to be some administrative weaknesses. But I draw it to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that last year a new concept was introduced into UIC administration—I forget the English term, but in French it is called "le concept d'administration par modules ou les modules administratifs." The administration of the UIC offices was broken up in such a way as to bring the staff closer to the unemployed worker, with the result that the civil servant dealing with a case is better able to understand the worker's claim and the worker, for his part, has an opportunity to understand the act better. This humanization process will probably lead to fewer abuses.

In this program there are, of course, bound to be weaknesses and abuses, but there is not one government program or area of public policy of which I am aware in which no abuses occur. I was in business myself. I used to meet a lot of businessmen and I know how they can arrange quite legally, to avoid all sorts of taxes. Why is it so bad for poor people? Why is it so bad if a person does abuse the unemployment insurance program, when others are allowed to go unchecked just because they have a better education and a different life? The UIC was established by a Liberal government because it saw the need for social justice, because the labour movement has failed to protect poor workers. Any review of the work of the UIC had better not detract from that concept of social justice. As I say, this measure was not brought in at a time when we had to bow to pressure from the New Democratic Party: it was at a time when we enjoyed a majority in this House.

Last year there was a lot of talk about Bill C-125. That bill was brought down by the government as a measure of the concern for some of the abuses to which attention had been called. The reason the bill did not move through all stages was not simply because of opposition from the NDP. It is probably a good principle to say that workers leaving their jobs without just cause should not receive unemployment insurance, but there is no way in which this principle can be administered before we are sure that humanization and decentralization of the administration has been tested thoroughly. We must make sure that people are not judged by a civil servant who is 100 miles away.

In addition, we must drastically change the appeal procedures. More appeal committees are required in rural areas and small communities so that decisions are made in a humane way. I conclude by saying that this review had better not retract from the concept of social justice from which the legislation was born.

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a pleasure for me to join with other members in the final stages of this throne speech debate. I should like to preface my remarks by extending my best wishes to His Excellency the Governor General and Madame Leger. He has already made his mark felt in the Canadian fabric, and I am sure all Canadians look forward to seeing His Excellency and his wife in the near future as they begin their tour across the provinces of this great country.

I should also like to pay tribute to that great statesman who will be sadly missed, not only here in Ottawa but indeed all across this country, the Hon. Roland Michener, a great man who has reached into the hearts of all Canadians. To him and his wife I wish many joyous years in their new life. Congratulations should also be extended to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

In the past week a great deal of criticism has been levelled at the government by many members of this House for the failure that it displayed so remarkably during the past session. To me, this Speech from the Throne sounds no different from others I have heard and read. In particular, it has a very familiar ring; it reminds me of that given a year ago. Speeches produced as of late by the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for such occasions always sound dull, dead and full of the same old promises and hints that the government is taking the wishes and desires of the people and the provinces into consideration.

The Prime Minister has described the throne speech as a matter of fact program setting out the intentions and the priorities of the government in this second session of the twenty-ninth parliament. It is a matter of fact speech in that the government has forgotten, or just plain refused to deal with, the important issues that face Canadians today. One of the greatest issues, of course, as one only need ask any Canadian, is inflation, not the so-called energy crisis. Another is the spiralling cost of goods and extreme shortages, particularly shortages in the construction and building industry at the present time. It is obvious that the government has tried to buy time by hiding the facts from the people.

As much of the press and news media to the south of us say, if you give the people a new crisis or problem it will take their minds off the real problem. This is why the minority government has leaped at the opportunity to use the energy crisis as a cover-up. What does the government want to cover up? Obviously, the one thing it did not want to acknowledge was the cancerous effect that inflation was having on the health of the economy of this country. Inflation has turned those on fixed incomes into nothing better than beggars who are reliant upon the few crumbs that this government saw fit to throw in their direction last year. Inflation has been blamed on worldwide problems such as the United States economy, even the Zulu problem in Africa. In other words, Mr. Speaker, everyone has become the scapegoat instead of the goat, which in this case is this government and its partner in the coalition that we have seen in the House during the past year.

This throne speech has been termed by many hon. members a complete and absolute failure. It has failed to provide a means for halting the inflationary spiral that my party has been warning of for months. It has failed to give hope to the people of this country. Instead, it has given them the story that we will have to put up with it for a little bit longer. Many people have noticed the mild form of brainwashing that has been going on in recent weeks in press releases and statements made on behalf of the government. First we were told that the economy of Canada was growing at a fast rate. Then we were told that it was growing even faster than the rate of most other countries. Then we were told that we could afford to suffer more because we had had it so good up until now. It all adds up to one thing, Mr. Speaker, and that is that the worst is yet to come.

Last Thursday the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who made, as always, an eloquent speech in the House, presented a detailed analysis of the actual rate of inflation that has been experienced in Canada in recent years. As he pointed out, in 1971 the Prime Minister said that inflation was licked, that we in this country had beaten it. This, of course, was at the expense of the workers; we experienced the greatest rate of unemployment we have ever known in recent years.

In 1971, inflation began at the mild rate of 1.6 per cent. By the end of the year it had risen to 5 per cent, and so on until at the end of 1973 it had reached the rate of 9.1 per cent. These figures reflect the government's attitude to government: it is a group of people who are reluctant to act, each relying on the other to prop up the boat. In other words, the boat is out of control and we can all expect to be floundering in the future under the ineptness that this government has displayed.

Today Canada is beset with deep-rooted and chronic problems. It is up to us to decide whether we want to cure those problems or to sit by and do nothing about them. There are many signs in Canada today that unemployment will continue to rise in some regions of this country, while in others, such as my own area, labour shortages will exist. There will be further price increases, creating more social inequities and requiring more government expenditure, resulting in even greater inflation. We have a serious economic problem, and if we are to survive something must be done about it.

One thing that a government must not do is to put forward the proposition that we sit idly by and do nothing. But this government's policy seems to be to sit and wait, hoping that the inflationary forces will go away and that things will work out all right in the end. This is the road to disaster. There has to be a recognition of the responsibility to maintain price stability. To pursue the government's present course of action, to take more of what we have had already—which is really what the throne speech promises—will lead to higher inflation, greater increases in prices and more frustration for those unable to meet those prices.

The list of failures one can draw out of the throne speech evidences the lack of mention of any of today's important subjects. For example, there was no mention of a planned reduction in or elimination of the federal sales tax on all clothing and building materials. Why not? There was no mention of the program of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to consult and negotiate with his provincial counterparts to lower the age of eligibility for old age pensioners to 60 from 65, either on a voluntary basis or on a year by year basis.

No mention was made of any inquiries into profits from oil, intercity rapid transit and a host of other items needing legislation. No provision has been made for a full inquiry into the Unemployment Insurance Act and the way the commission has been administered. The government has failed to deal adequately with the acute shortage of farm labour. If there were provision for the same number of farm labourers as there are government employees hired to administer the schemes and many plans that exist today, there would be no difficulty in this area and Canadian farmers would not have to scrounge all over the world in an effort to find workers to harvest crops.

Too many people find it more profitable to collect unemployment insurance benefits, and the benefits of other schemes, than to work. Others who work and receive less than those on unemployment insurance and other government schemes are understandably dejected. It is an undeniable fact of human nature that an individual is happier when he or she is productive. Human beings cannot be content for too long without achieving, without striving, whatever their goal or the end result. Just being, without doing, runs counter to human nature and to history. Therefore, the man who wants to work but cannot feels deceived and rejected.

Perhaps the most serious consequence of all this is that people who have lost their incentive to work and to succeed have lost faith in themselves and their government. The first is disastrous, but the second, of course, is understandable. This is a tragedy beyond description. It is particularly a tragedy for a young country which has so much in the way of human and material resources, a country which should be on the threshold of its greatest era.

This is the path down which this government is leading us. So preoccupied is it with its so-called crisis of the moment, so preoccupied is it with its lust for power that it is blind to the course of events which, I am sad to say, is not unfolding as it should be. Recent figures released by Statistics Canada show that the consumer price index is reaching ever higher points. In fact, it was only a few months ago that we saw the highest percentage increase in almost 30 years. Although these trends have been forecast, it is still depressing to have the cold reality verified by statistics. To me, it seems inevitable that if we remain on our present course Canada will suffer economic chaos and disaster.

It is the bread and butter issues that make Canada, and it is the bread and butter issues that are foremost in the minds of the people. It is the things that affect bread and butter issues that should be examined, if we are to resolve our problems. Canada's problems on the domestic front will not be resolved by spending hundreds of thousands of dollars in financing groups to overthrow the white regime in Africa. Our problems will not be solved by the spending of hundreds of thousands of dollars on metal abortions called sculptures, while people live at or below the poverty line. Our problems will not be solved by wasting money in refurnishing government offices at high cost, or by having the plants inside public service buildings changed every few months.

We in Canada require a new, imaginative and different economic policy. We need a policy that will embrace the future in security for all Canadians—the old, the young, the French, the English and the new Canadian, as well as the poor and the not so poor. No other objective is appropriate for Canada than the objective of making a nation that is truly great. That objective, I submit, has been missed by this minority government.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, during the recess of parliament, my colleagues and I from northern Ontario travelled rather extensively throughout that vast region which extends from the Manitoba boundary to the boundary of Quebec. Incidentally, that huge region of which I speak is much more than the hinterland of Toronto. It is also something greater than the underdeveloped backyard of Ontario. Northern Ontario in itself is, and must continue to be considered by the federal government as one of the major economic and geographic regions of this country.

During our tour, my fellow members of parliament and myself sensed a new attitude of optimism among the people who inhabit this region. Far from feeling neglected and forgotten, these citizens of Canada now see that the future is on their side and that greater prosperity and economic development is on the verge of being theirs.

Mr. Baker: The Davis government is on their side.

Mr. Penner: The Davis government has just recently discovered northern Ontario, as indicated in their Speech from the Throne. It has paid lip service to the region but we in northern Ontario are not fooled by that, and that is why we have not elected any Tories to the House of Commons from our region.

In this world of serious shortages, we in northern Ontario possess a great deal of what is needed and what is in increasing demand throughout the world, including pulp, paper and paper products, lumber, iron, copper, lead, zinc, gold, freshwater fish, wilderness areas for recreation, and breathtaking natural beauty to satisfy the eye of the most discriminating artist. It is even suggested by some that before too long we may be producing oil from wells located near the shores of Hudson Bay.

Facing all this development as we are, we are also confronted with a serious difficulty, namely, the need for an adequate labour force to bring on-stream the resources which we have and which the world needs. Strenuous efforts are urgently demanded to attract many thousands of new people into northern Ontario to work in the mines, the mills and the forests of this region. Much of the work is hard and we require a hearty breed of people who are physically fit and who during their time off are able to enjoy and find satisfaction in outdoor recreation such as skiing, skidooing, fishing, hunting, boating and hiking. To bring these people from the congested cities of this land and from overcrowded countries abroad, we must make available to them a number of basic requirements, including adequate housing, of course, essential community services such as sewage treatment, water, health care and recreational facilities including radio and television communication. Many communities in my constituency badly need upgraded facilities for recreation in addition to that which is offered by the outdoors itself.

We are very pleased with the announcement by the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) that additional funds will be provided the CBC for its so-called "accelerated coverage plan." It may surprise some hon. members of this House to learn that while city dwellers have multi-channel television, there are communities in northwestern Ontario still lacking even the basic radio-television services provided elsewhere by the CBC. Pressure is also continuously being exerted on Bell Canada to expand and upgrade telephone communications in remote areas of sparse population. The capital cost of these projects is immense, but we do not apologize for one moment in expecting people in Canada who already have these services to help us and to share the cost. After all, we have provided much of the natural wealth which has helped to make possible the very high standard of living enjoyed elsewhere in Canada and now we are asking for some return.

It has long been the practice in this country to extend certain tax advantages to those companies engaged in resource development, particularly mining. This system was altered to some considerable extent by the federal government's tax reforms and most provinces are now making changes also to reduce these tax privileges. Be that as it may, one possible solution to the manpower shortage in the resource sector, which has never been applied in Canada to my knowledge, would be the offer of special tax advantages to those who work in the mines, the mills, the forests and on the railroads in our resource regions—those who work hard under certainly less than favourable conditions and those who live in communities which lack many of the amenities which people elsewhere in Canada, particularly in the urban areas, have come to take for granted.

It is one thing to work in air-conditioned offices, with coffee breaks, lunch hours, soft chairs, conference rooms and cafeterias; it is quite another thing to handle a chain-saw all day, operate a heavy drill deep in the earth, or run a deisel locomotive for hundreds of monotonous miles through a tunnel of coniferous trees. If we want the natural resources of this country to be processed and turned into manufactured goods for our use and for export, and if we want to provide the liquid wealth for business and investment—and I am sure we do—then we must give extra consideration to those who work so hard in developing these resources. They must be well paid, better paid than most, I suggest. They must be given improved housing, health care and recreational facilities. In addition, it seems to me we should consider that an extra tax exemption is due to the workers of this country who produce our natural wealth. We now give special consideration to those in business. The previous speaker mentioned the way in which people in business are able to use the tax laws to their benefit. I argue that those who dig the ore and cut the trees need, and deserve, a special resource-developer exemption of at least $1,000 per year. This will, of course, cause some bureaucratic outcries to the effect that such a proposal is complicated and may be difficult to administer. It will be asked, who is a resource developer? There is no doubt that if you drill rock in the damp and dust of a mine, you are a resource-developer; or if you handle a chain-saw in the forests of this land in all kinds of weather, you are a resource-developer. Because of the difficult nature of their work, less of what these resource-developers earn should be destined for the government treasuries of this land.

The time is brief for participation in this debate, but before concluding I should like to make a few comments about our railroads. The railway companies of this country certainly need a vigorous shaking up. Employee morale on the CPR is appallingly low. Although morale is somewhat better on the CNR, it still leaves much to be desired. Those in the running trades on the CNR, for example, are terribly overworked and fatigued. They put the maximum number of trains through the railway towns of northern Ontario. In the very midst of this situation, the CNR and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers have conspired together—there is no other word for it—to force upon the CNR engineers in Nakina and Hornepayne, Ontario, a run-through proposal which involves extra miles, longer hours, more time away from home, further fatigue and an additional threat to safety.

Tomorrow morning a meeting is scheduled with a union representative and officials of the Department of Labour to make a plea for a moratorium on this run-through proposal. We will also ask for an inquiry in the town of Hornepayne with the workers who will be affected. We hope that during our discussion tomorrow the union leader will remember that to call another man "brother" means to act in his interest, to defend his rights and to be concerned about his well-being, rather than to work in concert with the company to initiate change in the name of efficiency, which seldom proves to be the case and which only imposes new hardships on these men.

During the life of this parliament, and no doubt in the next one, more and more attention will be paid to the natural resources of Canada which we possess in such abundance. New policies will be required to guarantee a continuity of supply, more processing in Canada and better communities located in our resource regions. Certainly, as I have indicated in my brief remarks, fresh incentives are needed for the worker who performs the hard labour in order to raise still further the standard of living for Canadians wherever they live.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to compliment the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Also, I echo the best wishes of other members to His Excellency the Governor General upon his appointment. While I have nice words to say, I should like to compliment the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) for finally realizing that the shortage of serviced land has created the enormous problem-which exists in respect of housing in this country. He referred, unfortunately only in minor detail, to the proposal made by members on this side of the House and adopted, so to speak, our suggestion that this government has a responsibility to use its funding, its power over the money supply of this country, to make it possible that efficient land be available for building.

An hon. Member: A deathbed conversion.

Mr. Blenkarn: It certainly is a deathbed conversion, but finally, once again, this government has adopted policies proposed on this side of the House.

I was also pleased to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say that he intended to get tough with the big guys big business, big labour and big government. I am surprised that he did not speak to the parliamentary secretary from the riding of Gloucester and advise him that that essentially is the basis of an incomes policy. It is unfortunate that the party which governs this country cannot understand economics.

However, what I really wish to speak about today is the inordinate cost of housing and, in particular, housing land. It is unfortunate that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs is not here. When I spoke on the question of housing costs and housing lot costs in the debate last year, the price of a lot for a single family house in my city of Mississauga was about $20,000. Unfortunately, I must report to the House that because this government has done nothing about the cost of housing land, and because it has allowed inflation in respect of housing to run rampant, the cost of a single family lot in Mississauga—not just one, but 90 lots in a subdivision; and not an ideal lot or subdivision but one which backs on the Queen Elizabeth Highway, with all its noise has been negotiated for $42,500, an increase of well over 100 per cent in one year.

Mr. Speaker, May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, before the supper adjournment I stated that land prices, indeed house prices in my constituency certainly and also across the country, were disastrously high a year ago for a young family wanting to buy their first house. To describe them as disastrously high today would not even begin adequately to describe the problem. A year ago the Urban Development Institute indicated that possibly no more than 5 per cent of families could afford to purchase a new house with the minimal down payment required to cover the financing. I suggest to you, sir, that even though we have the increases in wages this year, under no circumstances can any but a very few young people raising a family begin to contemplate the purchase of their own house.

As I said before supper, I welcome the indication by the minister that he is prepared to do something about serviced land. There is an old political saying that members of the opposition often use: too little, too late. With prices of housing rising today at an unprecedented rate, it is certainly too little, too late. Presumably one of the problems is the fact that this government continues to rely on Statistics Canada for an indication of housing costs. I would like to remind them that Statistics Canada, in determining housing costs, is not referring at all to new houses prices; it is referring to the cost of maintenance of housing. To most of us, the cost of keeping our house does not increase because we have an existing mortgage or an existing lease on an apartment, so Statistics Canada does not really reflect the enormous escalation in costs. It may refer to heating costs increasing, it may refer to electricity costs increasing, or to some increases in interest rates, but those increases are only a bag of shells compared with the real costs for those wanting to enter the housing market, for those who have no home, who have a new family and who want to get started in life.

In Toronto alone the average price of a house sold under the multiple listing service last year increased by $9,000. I doubt that there are many members of this House who, relying on the salaries paid here, and even if their wives are working, would be able to save in one year $9,000 after payment of taxes. That is the extent of the increase. It boils down to this fact, that those who have been trying to get a few dollars together to buy a house suddenly see the cost of that house going up and up.

I can say to you, sir, that in my city of Mississauga the price of a house is increasing at the rate of nearly $2,000 a month. When I asked the minister last Friday what he was going to do, and did he realize that the price of every house was going up at the rate of $50 a day, seven days a week including Sundays, the minister said something about social housing and he mentioned the Speech from the Throne. I say that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and this government have no concept of the social damage they are causing in condemning forever most young families and their children to wandering in apartment corridors or using apartment parking lots for playgrounds. That is the policy of this government. They are not really concerned about what in fact is happening. They rely on Statistics Canada and say that the cost of housing went up 7 per cent or 8 per cent. That is not the case at all. Perhaps for the average person it did go up by only that amount, but for those who have young families to raise the cost of housing has become prohibitive. Yet my friends to my left continue to support this excuse for a government.

We in this party welcome the government's suggestion that it will support urban transit. There are now arrangements for service on both the CNR line running through my constituency and the CPR line servicing Streetsville and the centre parts of Mississauga. That rail line could well support commuter service. This boils down to the whole question of servicing, because the Speech from the Throne seems to suggest the minister thinks that just increasing sewage assistance programs would be an answer to the problem of the cost of servicing. Surely by now the minister realizes that urban transit, parks and water service are an integral part of making serviced land available so that houses can be built. Surely the minister realizes that just increasing sewage assistance programs is not enough. Although it is welcome, it is just not enough. As I have said, it is too little, too late. In fact, it is very much too little, and in many cases very much too late.

That brings me to the very serious problem now confronting this country. To a large extent it was set out by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) when he spoke earlier in this debate. He suggested that we have a housing problem, but that housing problems cannot be solved in the inflationary climate that exists. So long as prices continue to escalate, this government's answer seems to be more social housing. Pretty soon they will have people earning $20,000 a year qualifying for social housing.

[Mr. Blenkarn.]

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: These people would have everybody in blue jeans.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Governor General and the Prime Minister live in social housing.

Mr. Blenkarn: One of the major problems is that people throughout this nation have no confidence in paper money because this government has no confidence. This government has no intention of stepping in with an incomes policy or with a commodities policy. I am glad the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) is here, because I was after him earlier today. He said that what I said was rhetoric, but look at the way he produces blue books. The only increase in size is, not physically but in the size of the figures at the bottom of the pages. Billions of dollars are allocated by this government for one expenditure after another, and the cost of government grows and grows like a snowball rolling down a hill. Surely in a government that was concerned about people there would be some control over government expenditures, but the money supply has been increased by 50 per cent or 60 per cent in three years.

People in this country have no confidence in paper money: witness the lines in banks to buy gold and silver; witness the price of Olympic coins and their shortage. People with no confidence in paper money are rushing into the housing field to buy residential housing; they feel that real estate will protect them and their savings against the ravages of inflation. Housing is already in short supply, but the price is being pushed up by one speculator vying with another. "Every man for himself" is all this government talks about. The message is, "Protect yourself against inflation in this country, because Trudeau's gang is not going to help you". That is fine for the rich and for the privileged, because they have the credit with which to buy real estate; they can get a bank loan or go to a mortgage company and get a mortgage loan. They can buy and bid up the price. You fellows would like to continue to support them because you really do not believe in the ordinary fellow; you believe in the privileged groups such as the big unions.

That is exactly the kind of attitude of this government and its lackeys to my left. They really do not care about the ordinary person. This government does not care about organizing and using its powers over banking and financing to make sure the banks will no longer advance money directly or indirectly on second mortgages. It does not care that trust companies and loan companies will continue to use the sale price as the valuation price, even though the value of the bricks and mortar represents less than one-third of the total price in many cases; even though most of the value is in land, and land values are bid up; even though all sorts of people who need housing compete with speculators, real estate agents and lawyers. Those who have the bucks in their pockets and the credit allowed by the banking system, which should be under the control of the Minister of Finance, continue to finance speculators.

Let me tell you a couple of stories, Mr. Speaker. One of my senior employees bought a house the other day that was listed at $79,000. Before he bought the house he heard that three or four other offers had been made, so instead of bidding the list price he bid $81,000. He was lucky; he got it by bidding $250 higher than anyone else.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him by the rather exact rules decided upon today has expired.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, recently there has been some publicity about a private member's bill that I introduced which calls upon this House to have a committee formed to examine the request that has come to Canada from the council of the Turks and Caicos Islands for a closer relationship with this country. The press coverage on this matter has been very large. From the smallest to the largest newspaper in Canada the idea has been examined. It has been covered by radio and by both national television networks. The story of the islanders wanting to join Canada has taken on a life of its own away and beyond my advocacy in putting it forward and many people have become interested in the idea.

Mr. Yewchuk: Would you like to be the first governor?

Mr. Saltsman: I would not mind.

Mr. Yewchuk: I thought you were looking for a job.

Mr. Saltsman: I have not seen an idea capture the imagination of the public to the extent that this one has, during my years in parliament. It is not that this is the most serious problem facing Canada and deserves priority, because Canada has many weighty problems to deal with. We heard of those problems in the Speech from the Throne. But in some ways the idea of these islands is a relief to Canadians from the discussions of inflation, housing, employment and all the other great issues in this country. This is nevertheless an important idea, Mr. Speaker, and many people in Canada want it examined. My office has received hundreds and hundreds of letters urging me to continue bringing the matter before the parliament of Canada and enlisting the support of the members of this chamber.

The idea has developed from the initial reaction of newspapers taking a sort of humorous view of it, as a kind of winter madness thing that seizes a member of parliament. Reaction has ranged from the idea that I was seeking publicity in bringing this matter before the country, to the idea that after nine years parliament is finally getting to me: "The man is off his rocker even to be thinking about things like that". I hope neither of those two extreme views is true, Mr. Speaker, because I have been serious about this matter from the very beginning. It is not the sort of thing that one plays around with. One does not play with the emotions of a group of people who have made a serious request to this country. I am asking the Canadian government and the House of Commons to respect the sincere petition that has come to this country to examine the idea of a closer relationship.

Basically, what I want to do in the few minutes available to me tonight—because there is not enough time to go into detail—is deal with essentially the attitude that has emanated from the government and which presumably is the position of the Department of External Affairs as expressed by the minister. First of all, they do not want to hear anything about it; they want it to go away. They do not even want to examine the idea, and they certainly do not want to discuss it. I can understand that there are some serious issues involved in a closer relationship with a group of islands in the Caribbean regardless of how well intentioned the islands, or myself or others advocating the idea may be. It means that we would have to examine our foreign policy in the Caribbean. You cannot just talk about whether 6,000 people in the islands are going to come into Canada as if that is the end of it. It has repercussions on our foreign policy in the Caribbean and our relationship with other countries there, and their future.

If these islands were to come into some kind of closer union, they would receive benefits from this country and we would receive benefits from them. Other countries in the Caribbean might then make the same request to the Canadian government and we would have to decide what our foreign policy would be. So I am not discounting the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has a perfect right to be wary of a proposal of this kind and to consider its seriousness.

It is also very obvious that if the Turks and Caicos Islands were to come into Canada in one form or another, they would probably be better off than other countries in the Caribbean with the repercussions that flow from such a situation. It would also mean that Canada would be challenging the United States in the Caribbean. The United States dominates the Caribbean in commercial matters because of the port facilities in Florida. If we were, by taking in these islands, to become part of the Caribbean, we could challenge the commercial supremacy of the United States in that area. It also means we would be willing to accept black people into confederation in the same way as we have accepted white people.

When I talk about the Turks and Caicos Islands becoming part of Canada, people say, "That is pretty well impossible. It cannot happen". I always respond by saying, "Why not?" If Newfoundland became part of Canada, why cannot these islands become part of Canada? They are closer to Ottawa than British Columbia. So distance should be no object. We must decide whether the only people who are eligible to become citizens of this country are white or whether blacks as well are to be eligible.

I do not discount the seriousness of my proposal. I like to think that we in this country have advanced to the point where colour, religion and similar factors do not make any difference and men and women are accepted into our society for what they are. Many can say that; on the other hand, many will say that we have not reached the point at which we are without prejudice and can comfortably assimilate many people of different kinds. That will be the point we shall need to determine. We must ask if we are ready to remove distinctions between people, especially people who are asking to become part of this country.

They are serious about becoming part of Canada, and it is quite proper for the Department of External Affairs to raise such issues and to worry about them. However, I object when the Secretary of State for External Affairs raises issues which are less than real and are designed to confuse rather than to clarify the situation. First, the minister talked about a new form of imperialism. He has since modified his position: he no longer talks about imperialism, he talks about colonialism. He said that our action, if we assimilated the islands, might be interpreted as imperialism or colonialism. Why in the world did he make a statement like that? It is not Canada which wants to take the islands in; it is the islanders who have petitioned Canada for they want to become part of this country.

The minister's utterances reflect the views of liberalism. According to modern liberalism, it is fine for such islands to seek independence. We will give them a little foreign aid, pat them on the head and tell them to go their own way, but we want no part of them. Such thinking masquerades as modern thinking. It is all right to atomize the world! I suggest that by taking members of a poorer society into our midst we would be fulfilling our responsibility as a richer society.

The minister talked about building a fence around the islands. Has anybody built a fence around this country? A fence does not keep out the poor. It is our immigration policy which keeps out the peoples of the Caribbean. That is the fence we have built around this country, and if you take the islands in we car build it around them, if that is what you want to do. The situation would not be the same as in Grenada: the people in the Turks and Caicos Islands want to belong to Canada.

The minister does not understand the reason for so much unhappiness in the Caribbean. White people give almost nothing to the people in the Caribbean, even though they may invest money and spend time down there as tourists. The real benefits which come to a people do not come from the few jobs you may provide in the tourist season. They come from being part of a society, part of a social structure, part of its wealth. If we want to help people, if we really want to redistribute wealth, we will take them in. If we take them in we may see the beginning of the end of people being pushed around, and perhaps the introduction of a modern form of federalism. Talk of modern federalism is not popular: talk of countries splitting apart seems to be more in vogue.

What bothered me most about the minister's statement was his bland suggestion that we must not raise expectations. How patronizing! We must not raise their expectations. You could almost hear him saying, "After all, they are people who do not have much education. They are not sophisticated. They would not understand." Mr. Speaker, these people are educated, and they do understand. They understand only too well how remote is the possibility of their being taken in. Yet remote though the possibility is, they want to see it debated in this country. They badly want to be part of this country and are willing to take a chance on the acceptance of this idea.

I can almost hear the minister saying what was said 20 or 30 years ago about programs like medicare. Some said, "We must not talk about medicare. It will raise the expectations of people, expectations which can never be satisfied. You must not talk about old age pensions of $35 or $40 per month. You would only raise expectations. The poor will be upset because they cannot get such a pension and we cannot afford to give it to them."

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is exactly what Paul Martin said.

Mr. Saltsman: When you do not want to do something, you can always say that talking about it will raise expectations. Bringing forward this subject has laid a heavy responsibility upon me. I am fully aware of it. The alternative was to do nothing. It seems to me that what has been happening in the Turks and Caicos Islands is unique. It offers us a challenge to which we can respond. The danger of raising expectations must be faced, in the hope that we can provide a better future for the people in the islands and bring a new and beautiful area into Canada.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to speak in this debate and to extend my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier). They are typical of the young, vigorous, knowledgeable and enthusiastic people who come to parliament. That is why this is such a dynamic place wherein so many things happen. I congratulate both hon. members on their speeches. Both members are bilingual. Even though they come from different types of ridings they display the same esprit de corps and the same enthusiasm for their work here. I also extend my best wishes and the best wishes of Algoma riding to our new Governor General and Madame Léger. We wish them well in discharging their new responsibilities as representatives of our country.

Perhaps more interesting than anything else has been the change in attitude of the opposition that we have seen in this parliament since the last speech from the throne was debated. The first session of the twenty-ninth parliament opened on January 4, 1973, with the opposition practically sitting on the edge of their seats waiting to move across the aisle to become the government. We do not see that kind of anticipation or expectation now. We do not hear them saying, "Within the next couple of months or so, when we take over the government of this country . . . " It is very understandable why they now have reduced enthusiasm and expectation. Their whole outlook has really dampened because of the progress made in the first session of the twenty-ninth parliament.

That session was one of the most productive sessions of parliament in many years. Over 50 pieces of legislation were passed. All of the major commitments for legislation outlined in the Speech from the Throne were carried out in that session, including many important items. The energy debate and the debate on legislation concerning privacy and wiretapping seemed to dominate the scene during the last two or three months of the fall session.

However, when historians write the pages of history for the first session of the twenty-ninth parliament they will find it significant because of the very many important pieces of social legislation that were passed. I think of the family allowance bill which increased family allowances from $7.21 a month on average to $20 a month on average across the country. I think of the significant changes that were made in the old age security system, both the universal old age security pension and the guaranteed income supplement, and the fact that even though we previously tied this to cost of living increases, it was accelerated to become effective quarterly if there were increases in the cost of living.

I think of the changes that were made to the Canada Pension Plan to remove the 2 per cent ceiling in the benefits of the plan due to inflation. I think of the whole outline of attack on our social problems through the orange paper which the Minister of National Health an Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) brought forward in the spring of 1973. Much progress was made in the discussions with the provincial premiers on this policy, and more is to come. Certainly during 1973 the biggest and most expensive items were adopted as legislation by this House. Many pieces of legislation and policies adopted by the government were to counteract the effects of inflation on those who cannot protect themselves, people in the low income brackets and pensioners.

I think, also, of the assistance provided in respect of food prices, such as the subsidy on bread. A long-term agreement was made with the Canadian Wheat Board to ensure a stable price in the cost of flour over a seven-year period, combined with a subsidy not only to give the wheat producers a stable price for the next seven years but to give stability to this essential item in the diet of Canadians. I think of the consumer subsidy for milk. The government took action to control the increase which was inevitable in regard to oil produced in our country when world prices rose rapidly. I believe the 1973 session was very productive. I am confident that the session now beginning will be equally productive.

The Speech from the Throne refers to maintaining high levels of income, production and employment to increase the supply of food and other commodities. It refers to increasing the production of our country so that we may produce as many new jobs this year as in 1973. In his budget speech in the spring of 1973, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) very modestly talked about creating at least 300,000 new jobs. By the end of the year over 430,000 new jobs were created in Canada, a record for this country. This is certainly the kind of fiscal and monetary policy which we need in a country whose work force will increase by 50 per cent from 1965 to 1980. There can be no doubt that with this continued increase in our economy there will also be more jobs in 1974.

There is also reference in the Speech from the Throne to protecting people from the effects of inflation by programs which were implemented in 1973. These were designed to help those on fixed incomes and large families through family allowance benefits and increases in veterans pensions of some 25 per cent. These programs were all implemented in the 1973 session of this parliament. Likewise, the government has acted to cushion increases in prices to consumers. I refer to the action that was taken relating to oil prices and subsidies on essentials such as bread and milk.

In his speech on December 6 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave the initial outline of a national energy policy; a plan to have one price for the whole country, a plan to be self-sufficient later in this decade by the construction of a pipeline, and the use of some of the export tax revenues to ensure that the price of oil in eastern Canada will be at reasonable levels. Perhaps one of the most important thrusts of the Speech from the Throne is the plan to ensure adequate supplies and production of food. To do this it is proposed to place many bills before the House in this session which will ensure there is a fair price for the consumer and a reasonable return for the producer.

It is planned to place a bill before the House relating to the Agricultural Stabilization Act to ensure that producers can produce their products and that if there are large-scale fluctuations in the producers' price, they will be protected. There will be changes in respect of advance payments. In the past we have had a scheme of farm stored produce on which advances could be made. This will be extended. I understand the limits will be raised in all parts of Canada.

The Speech from the Throne also refers to improved assistance to encourage young men to go into farming. This is very important. During the recess I attended a conference in Ottawa on the need for farm labour. This problem is being faced right across our country. At an earlier time farmers could perhaps run a simple operation without much help other than from the family. However, as the family grows up and moves away, and as farm units become larger, there is a greater need for hired help.

The conference went on to discuss in detail the measures necessary to encourage more people to work on farms. We also talked about a program being implemented this year by the Department of Manpower to establish farm labour pools especially for the assistance of market gardeners and fruit growers who require a large number of people for relatively short periods. Under this scheme, young people and others who wish to enter the labour force for a short period will be transported to countries where the crops are grown in an effort to overcome the labour difficulties faced in these areas.

Perhaps no greater problem faces Canadian agriculture today than the shortage of feed grain and its high price.

An hon. Member: There is no shortage.

Mr. Foster: Certainly, those who produce feed grain are fortunate to receive the price of they do today—possibly three times higher than it has ever been in our history. There is certainly a crunch felt by those producing beef, on the basis of this high-priced grain. I am confident the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), in his usual capable way, will be coming forward with a solution in the coming days or weeks.

There were one or two items of great interest to my constituents announced in the Speech from the Throne and elsewhere. I refer especially to the announcement by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) that changes are being made in the DREE program under which incentives are given to industry to locate in slow-growth areas. Under the new program, smaller enterprises are now able to qualify for assistance. The minimum limit has been lowered from $60,000 to $25,000 or five jobs, whichever applies. In November, 1973, a development seminar was held in my constituency and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion was the keynote speaker. The question of the size of the enterprise which would be eligible for a grant was raised on that occasion.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House are not so naive as to believe we have no problems to face in this second session of the twenty-ninth parliament, nor do we fail to understand their depth and the difficulties in finding solutions to them. But I ask the members of this House, "Would you be willing to trade these difficulties and the material and human resources which we have to deal with them with those of any other country in the world—Britain, United States, West Germany, you name it?" Not one person here would be willing to make such a trade. So let us not pay too much attention to the negative, carping criticism of the opposition. Let us not adopt stupid simplistic solutions such as the wage and price freeze which the Conservatives have advocated and which have failed in other countries.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, let me first pass on to the new Governor General my best wishes and those of the people of my constituency. I wish him well and I wish his good lady well as they enter their first year of office.

I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) for having replied so brilliantly to the Speech from the Throne.

[English]

I want to use my time tonight to talk about some of the problems in British Columbia. We have heard of western alienation. I believe there are good reasons why the present government is in disfavour among the voters of my province. In the next election members opposite may get the shock of their lives when they find their party has no representation whatever from that province. I am happy to see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé) here tonight. One of the first things I want to talk about is the expropriation in connection with the Vancouver international airport which happens to be in Richmond, British Columbia, a part of my riding. About one year ago the minister said, as reported on page 1829 of Hansard for March 2:

I can assure the House that each owner will be dealt with compassionately and given the full benefit of the new Expropriations Act.

Today, a little more than a year later, there are still people in the area whose claims on the government have not been settled. With the cost of housing rising so fast across Canada, especially in British Columbia, there are people who cannot afford to go out and buy homes because the government has been dragging its feet when it comes to settling their claims. A further cause for concern arises in connection with the new bridge which is being constructed in connection with the airport. Everybody was very happy with the lay-out of the bridge some nine months ago. They were very pleased that a ramp was to be constructed leading into Richmond. Only in the last few weeks did we find out from the staff of the Department of Transport in Vancouver that a ramp which was to have led into Richmond via the Dinsmore bridge would not now be built. It had been cancelled on orders from Ottawa.

The people not only of Richmond but of Delta and Vancouver want to know the reason for this decision. That ramp would have assisted the people of Delta, Richmond and Vancouver by giving them speedy access to the city of Vancouver. One of the engineers of the Department of Transport, a Mr. Bruce Groves from Ottawa, is quoted at a meeting out west as saying that the ministry's top priority was to reserve the bridge for airport traffic and that commuters from the main part of Richmond would therefore be detoured to make it as inconvenient for them as possible. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the government would not make it inconvenient for residents of central Canada if this issue was before them. A year ago, the government, in a letter to Mr. Charles Johnstone, a lawyer representing some of the people in the area—the letter is dated March 13—went into a lengthy explanation as to why the property involved with the ramp was being expropriated. The Minister said they had done so because that ramp was so necessary. The study, paid for by the federal government and carried out by N. N. Lee and Associates Limited—the title was the "Sea Island Highway Network"—recommended the construction of this ramp.

Now the government has changed its mind. The people in my riding want to know why. Right now they are signing a petition, and I can tell the government that before long 50,000 people will have signed this petition demanding that the ramp be reinstated. I hope it will be. I am sure that if we sit down with representatives of the government and talk some common sense, this ramp will go back.

Seventy-five homes are being rented by the government in the Cora Brown and MacDonald subdivisions of Sea Island. The people affected are supposed to be out of their homes by August, but now, because of studies being carried out, we know that construction will not go ahead on schedule. We are asking the government to allow the people who are renting these homes an extension of at least a year. I am sure the minister and the parliamentary secretary who has been so fair to us in the past will grant the people this extension. In the city of Vancouver right now there is a great shortage of housing, and the people who are renting these 75 homes do not have anywhere to go. I hope that some time this week I can sit down with the minister and his parliamentary secretary and discuss this issue so that we can solve the problem.

Another issue that has come up in the province of British Columbia—I am glad to see the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) in the chamber—is the energy crisis. The people of British Columbia do not believe there ever was an energy crisis. They believe there is a transportation crisis in this country and that the government just will not admit it. They wonder seriously why the people of British Columbia have just had to absorb a one-third increase in freight rates as well as a large increase in the price of freight for the soft fruit industry in British Columbia.

Why have they had to absorb these large freight rate increases when the people of eastern Canada are asking for equality of oil and gas prices? We have the resources in western Canada, a lot of them in British Columbia, and we are willing to share those resources with the people of eastern Canada. We also want them to help us out on freight rates. We think that this is only fair.

Another issue bothering the people in my riding is the Post Office service. We see some grand advertisements in the newspapers about how the Post Office offers this great one-day service: put your mail in by eleven o'clock and get it delivered the next day, say the advertisements. I see examples all the time where that just is not so. In fact, I asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) to investigate the Post Office for false advertising. The people of British Columbia do not know what is happening with their mail. It is not arriving on time. A municipality the size of Delta, with some 65,000 people, has just one post office and that is all. We asked the minister for another one, but the department is not even considering it. The post office in British Columbia is now jokingly called the "royal snail" because it seems to take a very long time to get mail from British Columbia to anywhere in Canada.

Unemployment insurance is another matter that has been bothering the people of British Columbia. As most hon. members who have a constituency office in British Columbia know, their secretaries are receiving about five phone calls a day citing problems with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. These problems are very legitimate. People who deserve to get their unemployment insurance are not receiving it because of some problem within the commission.

The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) said in a speech in his riding about two months ago: "When we go back for the next session this government is going to bring in some strong laws to straighten out this problem". The minister in charge of the Unemployment Insurance Commission said that this was not true. Since then we have had the throne speech and it now appears the government is going to do something about the Unemployment Insurance Commission and manpower.

Why will not this government do what the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) asked, and hold a full inquiry into the Unemployment Insurance Commission so we can find out what is wrong before the government introduces some other program? People within the commission are working very hard at their jobs, but the government is going to disrupt their work with another program which probably will not work any better than the one it had in the past.

Regional economic expansion is another area that bothers the people of British Columbia. In the last election I said that we were not getting our fair share of money; the government said that we were. I put some questions on the order paper and found out that in 1972 the province of Quebec received $66 million. The province of British Columbia received only $650,000. This answer was given by the minister, so I presume the figures are factual. The people of British Columbia do not believe that this is giving them their fair share.

The year before that a company by the name of Evans Products opened a mill in Golden, B. C., and received a $2,250,000 grant. They employed 250 people, and everybody thought it was an excellent program. This past year the same type of mill was closed down in the city of Vancouver by Evans Products, which put 250 people out of work. I think this is one area the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should look into and make sure that such things as this do not happen. This is only one example that occurred in British Columbia, but all members of the House know of other examples that parallel this one.

Information Canada has also been an issue in the city of Vancouver. This government opened a beautiful office at the corner of Granville and Robson Streets. There was a bit of an uproar in the city when people found out that they paid $11.67 a square foot in the building they leased for both the first and second floors. After an investigation the people were told that other people were renting space in the same city block for between $2.50 and $5.50 a square foot on the second floor, and that $5.50 was the maximum price that anybody else paid. Yet, as I say, this government was paying $11.67. On the first floor in that block, people were paying anywhere from $6.50 to $11.50 a square foot.

The value of the building that the government leased was $550,000. When the government took a five-year lease from the firm that leased the building to them for $126,000 a year for the first year, building up to $156,000 for the fifth year, it increased the value of the building to over $1 million. I think the people of Canada deserve a better answer than the one the government has given them to date as to exactly why they paid so much money for this building, and who decided that the building would be leased instead of bought, since the building was for sale a few months before the government leased it.

I should like to touch for a moment on housing. This is a problem in my riding where there has been such a startling increase in population. The government says it has done a lot of things to help housing, but what are the things the government has not done? Firstly, it has not removed the sales tax on building materials. This adds to the cost of every home and apartment in this land. The government has eliminated tax incentives for investors in apartment buildings. As a result, apartment buildings are now 99.5 per cent full in Vancouver and just about equally full in other parts of the country.

The NDP government of British Columbia froze land development and automatically land prices skyrocketed. If the government would only let free enterprise build houses without government interference, there would be plenty of housing in Canada and prices would be reasonable. We have only seen a large increase in the price of housing during the last couple of years because the government has been interfering. I have a clipping advertising houses in Houston, Texas. A 1,700-square foot home there sells for $22,900. If houses at this price can be built down there, they can be built here in Canada. But the cost of housing in Canada has increased as a result of government interference at all levels. The federal government must take the biggest share of the blame because of its sales tax on building materials and its elimination of tax incentives for people who invest in housing.

I should now like to say a few words about penitentiaries. We have a large penitentiary situated in our area. I give the present minister a lot of credit for what he is doing in our penitentiaries, but I question some of his decisions, such as hiring three people with a Master's degree to go into the British Columbia penitentiary to work in the recreational area and looking for two more. They are not promoting the people who have been working in the penitentiary for years. They are not giving them the opportunity to take further education to increase their own abilities so they can get ahead in their jobs.

Why do we need five professional people in recreation in the British Columbia penitentiary, serving a population of 600 people, when the city of New Westminster and the city of Delta cannot afford to hire that many people? Why does this government not invest some money in the youth of the nation? Perhaps then we will not have so many people in our penitentiaries.

I should like to close, Mr. Speaker, by mentioning an issue that has been given prominence in our area. I refer to price fixing among seven major cement companies in British Columbia. These seven companies were accused of, and pleaded guilty to, conspiring to prevent or lessen competition and were fined a total of $433,000, the largest fine ever imposed under the Combines Investigation Act.

I think there are some questions that have to be asked about this matter. We must remember that Jimmy Sinclair, a former cabinet minister in the party of the government sitting across from us here, was president of Lafarge Cement, one of the seven companies. The late Frank Ross was chairman of the board of Lafarge Cement, and he also had a close relationship with one of those across the floor. We must also remember that when the charges were laid, the minister of justice at the time who was in charge of the investigation was quickly shifted from that portfolio to another. The present minister of housing and urban affairs was also shifted into his present portfolio pretty quickly from consumer affairs.

Why did these things happen, Mr. Speaker? I think that question needs to be answered by this government. Why did these companies plead guilty so quickly? Why did not some of them go to court and try and fight this charge? I think they are just trying to hide something and that this government should have an inquiry made into price fixing in British Columbia.

It is of interest to note that after these charges were made and these firms pleaded guilty, on January 1 of this year Ocean Cement and Lafarge Cement increased their prices again by the same amount. Then on March 1, Lafarge and Ocean Cement increased their prices yet again by the same amount. So these companies are still up to their same old tricks. They have paid the largest fine ever imposed in Canada. In view of the connection of these companies with members of the Liberal government across the way, I think the Canadian people deserve an inquiry into price fixing and that this government should hold this inquiry with the utmost haste.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the present session of the 29th Legislature I owe to myself to participate in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. First, I wish to congratulate the movers of the Address, the hon. members for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier). It is quite appropriate, in a democratic Parliament, when someone is making a first speech in the House, for his colleagues to congratulate him because they know from their own experience that it is a first step which will allow him later to express himself better and participate more easily in the debates.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to join my colleagues to congratulate His Excellency the Governor General and Mrs. Léger and extend to them the best wishes of the people from the Bellechasse riding that I represent. I was pleased to see, with many others, the great humility with which the new Governor General has presided over the opening of this second session. I was very pleased to see that the Governor General chose to renounce the traditional dress and that he was really like everyone else, someone who holds his position with a great competency but also with a great humility.

I also wish to say to the Chair how pleased I am that we can continue our work under his humble guidance. I also wish to congratulate the Deputy Speaker and Chairman of Committees of the Whole House (Mr. McCleave), the Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole House (Mr. Laniel) and the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole House (Mr. Boulanger): I wish them all a long and fruitful career in this House.

The first session of the 29th Parliament was quite productive, Mr. Speaker, since many bills furthering the respect of human and family rights were carried in spite of a minority government in the House which shows that even under a minority government, when we do our best, it is possible to provide for our country a more efficient administration that under a majority government. To be convinced, one has only to consider the 28th Parliament and note that a majority government, Mr. Speaker, was unable to increase family allowances. The amount of old age security pensions had also been increased by a ridiculous percentage, contrary to what happened since the beginning of the 29th Parliament. This shows that Canada, even under a majority government, can do more to provide security for the aged, but it nevertheless remains that thanks to the goodwill shown by all, it was possible to implement those material, physical and financial possibilities and ensure to old people a maximum of security.

Mr. Speaker, it is with satisfaction that Canadians see that this minority government is much more responsive to their demands. It is less arrogant and more inclined to accept in a democratic system the rules of a true democracy, those of a government of the people, by the people and for the people. Obviously, there is yet much to be done before it becomes reality because, Mr. Speaker, trusts, multinational corporations and financial powers still have a strong hold on the government through their contributions to the treasuries of traditional parties.

To be convinced, one only has to consider the goings-on in the oil, sugar and food industries controlled by big corporations.

Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne is nothing but a conventional procedure still used in Parliament for it does not always reflect the legislative measures that the government intends to have adopted by the House. Indeed, the throne speech of the first session of the 29th legislature announced many more radical measures than what was in fact introduced. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, the throne speech of the second session of the 29th legislature promises very few measures that would solve the many problems facing the Canadian people, while it is highly possible that this Parliament will be presented numerous bills which have not been mentioned in the speech.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I say that the Speech from the Throne is part of a parliamentary tradition that we respect, of course, but that we should modernize and adapt to modern times, to the present times, to this century.

So I make the wish that this session will be one of deep reform, particularly in the financial area, so we can finally make financially possible what is physically feasible, and the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave an affirmative answer last week to my colleague for Champlain (Mr. Matte). I welcome this because formerly, not too many years ago, there was a denial of that suggestion, that possibility to make financially possible what was physically feasible by the people of this country.

However, Mr. Speaker, I accept less than I ever did the fact that a sovereign government, as should be that of Canada, should let its policies in all sectors of the economy of this country be dictated by those who have the privilege to control the economic blood of this nation, that is the real credit of this country, namely the privilege of minting the real credit of this nation which is produced by the over-all activity of its people.

Mr. Speaker, the activity of all those working in this country in any field or branch is the real credit of this country whereas the financial institutions to which I referred earlier are the banking institutions of this country which are governed by the Canadian Bank Act and now have the privilege to mint the credit of this nation, and that is why I say that in 1974 things should no longer happen that way.

We, in this Parliament, should give back to our government sovereignty in that field so it will act as a genuine manager, a genuine steering office, as is done in a co-operative, so that everyone may really benefit from the activities of the members of the Canadian society.

However, Mr. Speaker, I read in the throne speech the wish to submit a measure finally allowing the provinces to have and control a sort of provincial bank, as proposed by the former premiers of Alberta and British Columbia, the hon. Mr. Aberhart and Mr. Bennett. Last week, by the way, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) admitted that this initiative or proposal had been initially taken or made by the former premier of British Columbia, and I do hope that the minister, who is now smiling at me, will continue to benefit from the experience of this politician who still can, although he retired from political life, render many great services to our nation.

I hope that measures to be brought in to this effect will not solely be make-believe ones but sound projects giving to provinces a useful tool which will enable them to financially help municipalities fulfill their task as governments closer to people, by providing for a city or a municipality the essential public services at a cost in line with its paying capacity and with reality.

I would also like, Mr. Speaker, to talk about the young unemployed, educated or not. It has become an acute problem in Canada, a problem in which all serious Canadians as well as any responsible government should be interested in order to bring in a solution before it is too late. This problem of unemployed youth is in my view narrowly related to the difficulties that are facing people from 60 to 65 who have also some serious troubles in seeking employment or still in earning an income giving them financial security until they are 65, when under the present legislation an old age security pension will be paid to them.

Mr. Speaker, the unemployment problem is disturbing since according to a document tabled at the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee following a sitting on November 22, 1973 by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), 47 per cent of Canadian unemployed are aged 24 or less.

The main difficulty of young people in getting on the labour market is their lack of experience, and that is the traditional excuse that employers use in refusing a job to the young people who offer their services, either in the public or private sector.

Mr. Speaker, if more understanding is not shown to these young workers, the country will certainly pay for it. Indeed, instead of taking advantage of the energy of these young people to develop the country and make it more prosperous, we will have to give them a certain amount of security, otherwise we will bear the brunt of their dissatisfaction, and instead of enjoying the effects of their dedication, we will suffer the effects of their frustration instead of benefitting the effects of their devotion. Because of the experience we have acquired, it is our duty as adults to take the necessary steps so that our young may become assets in this country instead of liabilities, as it is much too often unfortunately the case within an economic system which disregards the contribution of the young. We are influenced against our will by a society which is profit-oriented instead of being service-oriented.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must regretfully interrupt the hon. member, but his time has elapsed.

[English]

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my few remarks I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on the appointment of our new Governor General, Mr. Léger. I wish Mr. Léger and Madame Léger godspeed and every good wish as they carry out their very important work on behalf of Canada. I think they are off to a good start. I am sure those of us who attended the ball Their Excellencies held at the opening of this session of parliament appreciated the very fine hospitality shown to us all. I should like to say that Madame Léger is very charming. She has a very difficult role as the wife of the Governor General. It is a very important role. She has that very fine attribute, a good memory. When I met Madame Léger the night of the ball, she told me that she had met me a couple of years ago at a dinner held at the National Arts Centre. Her memory is a great attribute, and I believe she will carry out her duties very well.

I also wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I believe both members gave excellent addresses. They conducted themselves very well at the start of our debate on the Speech from the Throne. In 1968 I had the honour to second the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and my colleague the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) was the mover. This is an important honour that is given to members. I know that my constituents of Kamloops-Cariboo at that time very warmly received my nomination by the Prime Minister. I am sure the constituents of these hon. members also appreciate the honour bestowed upon their members.

I am very happy about a number of very important things contained in the Speech from the Throne. Some of the matters worth mentioning have started to unfold. I refer in particular to the legislation in respect of native housing. Mention of this appeared in the Speech from the Throne and later the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) announced a very important policy regarding native housing. A number of ingredients contained in this announcement are very important.

First of all, it met almost verbatim the representation made to the government by the Native Council of Canada. The Metis, the native people not under the Indian Act, I believe for a long time have been left out of society. I do not think provincial governments by and large have done a very good job on behalf of the Metis people. These people have come under provincial jurisdiction, and by and large they have been left out of society. In addition, society has tended to leave out the non-treaty Indian people. I think this announcement by the minister is probably one of the most significant statements in respect of housing or any othe matter to be made in a long time by the national or any other government on behalf of the Metis people in this country.

I hope that as progress is made down the road to implementation of this policy the native groups will be consulted more and more and will be used a great deal more in the implementation of the policy. When the announcement was made, I believe it was very warmly received by the president of the Native Council of Canada, Mr. Tony Belcourt. Very often when announcements are made, the native people are skeptical, but that was not the case this time. They said that maybe they were entering a new era.

All too often there is confrontation between native groups and the government, and this is not the way to proceed. There must be consultation between them and understanding, and policies worked out and implemented. I welcome this decision by the minister. I think it is farsighted, and I hope that the provincial governments which have been responsible over the years for the Metis people and the non-status Indians will respond in a very positive manner to the minister's call to them to meet the other part of the policy. If they cannot, then I suppose the minister will perhaps have to look at it again. However, in all sincerity I call upon the provincial governments throughout the country to respond positively to the needs of the Metis people and the Indians.

I think there is the highest concentration of Metis in the prairie provinces. I believe the province of Alberta has been trying very hard to respond in positive ways to meet the needs of the Metis and Indians. It is a rich province and there is no reason in the world why they cannot respond positively to the lead that has been given by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. We find that Saskatchewan has by and large been pretty responsive, but the policies of Saskatchewan and Manitoba have not been sufficiently far reaching so far as the Metis and the Indians are concerned. I think that with this policy we are entering a new era of responsiveness to the needs of the native people and I hope we can really do something with the new housing policy announced by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

I want to join a number of my colleagues who have spoken about the needs of Canadian cattlemen. I represent a constituency that has quite a large cattle population. I suppose the cattle population of British Columbia numbers up to half a million in peak periods. In my own riding it is perhaps up to 100,000. It is probably one of the constituencies with the highest cattle population in British Columbia.

Mr. Nielsen: That's lot of bull.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I should say that a good bull sale is going on in Kamloops tonight. It is one of the best shows. Kamloops is the centre of the cattle industry in B.C. and we are proud of it. It means that $37 million to $40 million a year passes through the city of Kamloops from the cattle industry, which is pretty important. The cattlemen of Canada, and the cattlemen of B.C. in particular, have had a pretty tough time. I hope that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), together with his colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) who is here tonight—

An hon. Member: He doesn't care.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): —and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie), have taken note of the real needs of cattlemen. Their needs are quite acute at this time, and I hope the government will see fit to impose a positive program of tariffs so that the situation of Canadian cattlemen will not be jeopardized any further. I know that the Minister of Agriculture has been responding in a positive way, since he became minister, to the needs of cattlemen and I believe that he will come through again.

I want to say a few words about the cattlemen in my own riding and cattlemen in British Columbia and expand upon why they have had such a difficult time. The winter of 1972 was a very difficult one. As a result, the hay crops were frozen out and a number of ranchers in the interior of B.C. had no hay last summer. Also, the dairy farmers found themselves short of hay because of the severe winter. The crops were frozen out and they did not have time to reseed. This was coupled with a very dry summer in the interior of B.C. The dairy farmers and ranchers in British Columbia were paying up to $110 a ton for hay this winter. That has hit them very hard. I spoke to a number of the producers who were having to sell their herds. This is one of the worst things that they can do at a time of inflation; it means that in time the supply will not be there because many of the producers have sold their herds due to the severe shortage of hay.

In the few minutes that I have left I would like to touch upon another matter that has very much concerned the residents of Kamloops. A week or so ago CRTC, which is an independent commission, rendered a decision for the provision of cablevision to Kamloops. One might say that we should have been happy, but most of the people were not very happy with that decision. Many of them felt they were being treated as second-class citizens. The decision provided that the cablevision company could provide only one commercial non-Canadian channel. You can go up a little way to Merritt, 60 miles from Kamloops, and find that there they have access to all three commercial non-Canadian channels. If you go to Penticton, Kelowna, Cranbrook or Kimberley you will find that these places, all of which are not very far from Kamloops, have access to all the American networks. In Vancouver they have access to all the channels. But the CRTC in its wisdom decided that Kamloops could have only one commercial American channel. The people of Kamloops feel very strongly about this decision. They feel it is the wrong policy and the wrong decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Why should they be treated any differently from the people who are in Kelowna, Penticton, Merritt and Vancouver? If big, bad American television is not good for us, then it should not be any good for the people on the coast either.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I will commence by extending the traditional compliment to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier). However, I will not follow the usual tradition of speaking this evening about matters affecting particular concerns in my constituency, although I have good cause for doing so particularly since in this session we have embarked upon a study of legislation affecting our two northern ridings, Yukon and the Northwest Territories, which is rather important to the people of those territories. I could speak about the bill introduced by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) today which will bring about what he is going to characterize as certain large steps forward, but there will be an opportunity to debate these matters later.

I was somewhat surprised today at the reluctance of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) to go ahead with the introduction of the bill to amend the British North America Act 1867-1965 in order to provide two more seats in the other place which undoubtedly are to be occupied by one appointee from the Yukon and one from the Northwest Territories. This would be in keeping with the recommendation of the joint committee of the House and the other place on the constitution which held hearings all over the country a few years ago. I am glad to see that legislation coming forward. I think members will find it to be almost verbatim with a bill that has been standing on the order paper in my name for a good many years.

Rather than deal with those matters concerning the ridings of Yukon and the Northwest Territories, as opportunities will be provided in the future to speak about them, I want to speak about something that is nearer to the hearts of all Canadians. That is inflation, taxes and the ever increasing cost of living in the country and the part the government is playing in contributing to the absolutely uncontrollable situation that confronts us today.

It is a fact that in the years 1968-69 to 1974-75 the percentage increase in the main estimates is 103.5 per cent. They went from $7,170.3 million in 1964-65 to $22,022.9 million in 1974-75. I am happy to see the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) in their places tonight because some of these figures perhaps have not been presented to them before in this fashion. One might call them Peter and Paul. The lid is off; the Minister of Finance obviously cannot control the spending of his colleagues, and the President of the Treasury Board is obviously unable to bring his influence to bear.

In the last year, 1973-74 to 1974-75, the increase in the main estimates was 9.7 per cent. One of the greatest areas of wasteful government spending is in departmental information services. We all recall that when Information Canada was set up it was supposed to do away with the information services hitherto provided in each of the departments. It was supposed to be a central place where information would be available to all Canadians. Now we see that the public relations offices in the departments have not been diminished at all but have been increasing. Even after the advent of Information Canada in 1970 there has been a multiplication of costs rather than a reduction.

The latest statistics of February, 1974, reveal that there were 747 publicists on the federal government payroll, with 378 openings, for a total staff of 1,125. The number of government-owned buildings in the national capital region alone is over 600, and buildings leased by the government either in whole or in part stand at over 150. The value of the annual leases has jumped 50 per cent to $29 million in the last five years.

A return which was tabled to a written question revealed that in the fiscal year 1970-71, the total—and here are some statistics: I saw the Minister of Finance smiling a moment ago but perhaps these might be drawn to the attention of his colleagues because they are rather embarrassing—entertainment bill for the year 1970-71 for government departments and agencies, including the Prime Minister's office, amounted to $1,892,194.

The breakdown for travelling expenses in the same year was very interesting. In 1970-71, travelling expenses for all departments, including the Prime Minister's office but excluding the agencies of the Crown, which are plethoric—to hit a few of the highlights—were, Department of the Environment, $7,201,886.15. One might ask where they went. The Department of National Health and Welfare, just for travelling, spent $3,987,377. That department is very active in the entertainment field and spent $49,050.

The Department of Transport, which one would think could get around less expensively, spent $6,970,189; and the Postmaster General, whose department has one of the greatest deficits in government, spent $3,004,970.23. In entertainment, the Department of the Environment spent $55,716.83. Sir, spending in this government is entirely out of control.

Mr. Baldwin: How about that $20 billion farce—the budget?

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, and one might ask about the $8,000 cabinet meeting held last year. Rather than choosing one of two more than adequate cabinet rooms on parliament hill or one of the Prime Minister's establishments, the Prime Minister decided to hold a one-day cabinet meeting at the O'Brien estate, an NCC property. It took the NCC two weeks and between $6,000 and $8,000 to put the house in shape. These expenses did not include the cost of trucking furniture from the Conference Centre, security men, the luncheon caterer, cars to transport the ministers to and from the meeting, or the time of the Privy Council staff dispatched to provide wood for the three fireplaces.

I should like to go into another area of uncontrollable inflation, Mr. Speaker, namely, government growth. In 1969, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) pledged to freeze expansion of government personnel, the size of the public service was 230,000 excluding commissions, corporations, the armed forces and contract employees. Since then the public service has increased by over 57,000. In the Toronto area alone the increase was from 18,450 in 1971 to over 20,000 in 1972; in the Ottawa-Hull area from 66,000 in 1971 to 75,000 in 1974, and in the Montreal area from 23,400 in 1971 to 25,400 in 1972.

There was a constant barrage of criticism of the government for these uncontrollable increases. If put in terms of a monthly increase, it becomes more staggering. Who in his right mind would say that it is reasonable to expect growth in the civil service of this country of some 1,300 per month?

An hon. Member: Drury.

Mr. Nielsen: I suppose the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance think that is a normal growth rate.

Mr. Drury: It is research staff for the Tories.

Mr. Nielsen: Let me speak now about ministerial absences. We are faced with the highest inflation rate, the highest tax rate and the highest cost of living in the history of the country. The government called for an extended Christmas recess, ostensibly for the purpose of working out a legislative program which would meet these crucial problems. Then we found in the last week of February that the only minister of the Crown in Ottawa to be dignified with the rank of acting prime minister was the nineteenth ranking member of the cabinet, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray). He was the only one who could be found. What a way to guide a country!

• (2240)

This happened when most of his colleagues were enjoying the sun in southern retreats and the Prime Minister was skiing in St. Moritz. I do not suggest that ministers should be begrudged holidays, not at all; but it is a bit much, when both unemployment and inflation are on the rise, that the only minister who can be found at his desk in Ottawa is the nineteenth ranking member of the cabinet, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Where were you?

Mr. Nielsen: I was working in the Yukon, not sunning myself and getting lovely and brown as the Minister of Finance did.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You have to pick up your mail sometimes, Erik.

Mr. Nielsen: As Mr. W. A. Wilson said in the Montreal Star, referring to the energy conference of last January 22 and 23:

Conferences that fail, broadcast the lack of preparation that went into them. The rush from the failed conference to the ski slopes and the beaches suggests strange orders of priorities.

There we see one reason for the uncontrollable situation which we face. Government members are simply not doing their jobs. Would not the cabinet have been better advised spending their recess in preparing legislation to get at the roots of the major problem facing Canada today, unemployment and inflation, rather than vacationing or spending their time attending foreign conferences which should be given a much lower priority?

Sir, I do not have time to put the rest of these disgusting statistics on record. All I can say is that the sooner the government leaves the treasury benches opposite, the sooner there will be some sanity in this country.

AIR CANADA

STATUS OF CERTAIN FEMALE EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. It arises from the fact that women who work for Air Canada are faced by a "male only" policy which prevents them from becoming pursers, even though in some circumstances they may be called upon to perform as acting pursers with none of the better pay, status and working conditions attached to the position of purser. In view of this unjustifiable discrimination I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather):

That this House direct the Minister of Labour, who has responsibility for the status of women, to introduce immediately the legislation creating a Federal Commission on Human Rights and Interests which was promised in the Speech from the Throne as the means of protecting women from discrimination.

Mr. Speaker: This motion is presented to the House under the terms of Standing Order 43. It requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

SHORTAGE OF FERTILIZER IN EASTERN CANADA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that it will soon be sowing time and in view of the shortage and skyrocketing price of artificial fertilizers in eastern Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the government seriously consider asking the Canadian Transport Commission and the potash and artificial fertilizer producers to take action in order that eastern farmers can obtain sufficient supplies of this necessary product to maintain their farming production.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. According to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

HOUSING

SALES TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS—INTEREST RATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to consider immediately an urgent matter.

In view of the fact that the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials and the high mortgage interest rates underlie the prohibitive costs of construction, especially for people earning less than $10,000 a year, or about 30 per cent of the population, it is urgent that this government introduce legislation to eradicate once and for all poverty, unemployment and inflation. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House take immediate action to remove the 11 per cent sales tax and reduce the interest rate to 3 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent; the motion, therefore, cannot be put.

COMBINES

MEASURES TO CONTROL MONOPOLIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of very urgent necessity.

Considering the cost of living increase and the control exercised by some individuals on several sectors of the market, and considering also that control appears as a real spreading monopoly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Rondeau):

That the matter be immediately deferred to this House in order to prevent, through specific regulations, monopolies from altering the play of free competition and contributing to destroy Canadian private enterprise within a relatively short time.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot therefore be put.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF PUBLIC BILLS AND NUMBERING THEREOF

On the order: Introduction of Bills.

Mr. Speaker: On today's order paper some 163 bills in the names of private members are standing for introduction and first reading at this sitting. The House will recall that for several years it has been the practice to introduce and give first reading in a group to all such bills by unanimous consent. I assume that today the House will be willing to follow what may be termed as the usual practice in regard to these bills.

In a preliminary way, it must be said that there is some concern in the mind of the Chair concerning a number of the bills standing for introduction. By way of example, the very first bill standing for consideration by the House is one in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West. This bill came forward last year in the very same terms as it appears today for consideration of the House. At that time it was ruled out of order after considerable procedural consideration by hon. members. I mention this bill because it is No. 1 on the order paper and the hon. member for Hamilton West may wish to give the matter some thought in the meantime. I considered that in fairness to him this should be mentioned. It may be that any further comments in that regard or with regard to other bills should be deferred until the occasion upon which these bills are first taken up during private members' hour.

In addition, it might be said that some difficulty has arisen in recent years with regard to the grouping of private members' bills with government bills. In order to facilitate the filing and reference to each class of bill it is proposed in future to begin the numbering of private members' bills at C-101. The traditional pro forma bill will continue to bear the number C-1. Government bills will then begin at C-2 and continue for the first 100 numbers. It is thought that all government bills to be introduced in this session can be accommodated within that range of numbers.

May I ask, then, whether there is unanimous consent that all public bills listed on today's order paper in the names of private members for introduction be deemed to have been introduced, given first reading, ordered to be printed and to stand for second reading at the next sitting of the House subject, of course, to subsequent examination as to regularity of each bill. Is the procedure to which I have referred agreed to?

ENERGY

PROPORTION OF EXPORT TAX PAYABLE TO OIL PRODUCING PROVINCES—APPLICATION OF EQUALIZATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister fo Consumer and Corporate Affairs but perhaps he will be here a little later. In the meantime I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance relating to the statement by the Prime Minister last week that the present position of the government is that funds that the oil producing provinces may receive from the federal export tax are not subject to equalization. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether, in these circumstances, he has any explanation for his assertion at the time the export tax or charge was debated in the House that these funds were subject to equalization and that, in fact, for the months of October, November, December and January some $25 million would have to be found by the federal government to equalize the portion of the export tax received by the producing provinces?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): My statement has to be taken in context, on the assumption that if equalization were due as a share of export tax revenues, then, of course, it would be paid. I have been advised by counsel that a share of revenues under the export tax is not subject to equalization under the statute and regulations.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I must say the minister disappoints me. May I remind him that the statement he made in the House was not subject to any such qualification but was stated as the position of the government. May I ask the minister, without going beyond the bonds of decorum, why he said to me in the course of discussions relating to the charge for the months of February and March, and in seeking unanimous consent, that these payments would be subject to equalization?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I cannot explain any further than I already have. I have been advised that, under the law and regulations as they now stand, any sharing or division under the Export Tax Act is not subject to equalization.

Mr. Stanfield: Will the Minister of Finance then agree that the statements he made in the course of debate in the House as to the position of the government and the statements he made to me in the course of seeking unanimous consent for the change required to enable the House to deal with the export charge in the manner in which he wanted were without foundation?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, sir.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

RETAIL PRICE OF BEEF—GOVERNMENT INTENTION RESPECTING ACTION TO ROLL BACK PRICES IN APPROPRIATE CIRCUMSTANCES

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would be in his place this afternoon, but in his absence may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. It arises from the statement made yesterday by the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board to the effect that retail beef sellers have not responded to the drop in wholesale costs by lowering prices. I want to ask the Prime Minister whether the government currently has before it consideration of any steps to rectify this situation?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to take note of this question for the minister.

Mr. Grier: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I thought I had addressed the question to the Prime Minister. May I have another run at the Prime Minister and ask him whether the government now has before it consideration of any plans to empower itself or any ministry of the government to intervene in order to roll back prices in appropriate circumstances?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for missing the first question. I was checking about the presence of the minister. It appears that he has gone to Winnipeg where he is meeting with his provincial counterparts and is also addressing the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce. Very properly, the acting minister did take notice of the question on his behalf.

As to the second question, the answer is yes. The government is considering various ways in which it will be able to ensure that the process spelled out several months ago by myself will take place—in other words, what we do when the Food Prices Review Board has made a recommendation, has met with the industry, has found they are faulty and that they have refused to redress the situation, and it is then up to the government to act. I believe the hon. member is asking: Have we any plans along these lines? The answer is yes.

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, in asking my final supplementary question may I parenthetically urge the government to urge itself and the Food Prices Review Board to accelerate the process to which the Prime Minister has referred. May I now ask him how soon the House may expect an announcement by the government as to the specific steps?

Mr. Trudeau: Soon, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

HYDROELECTRIC ENERGY—POSSIBLE NATIONALIZATION OF BRINCO—CONSEQUENCES RESPECTING DISTRIBUTION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could he tell us if the government intends to enter into negotiations with the Newfoundland government to discuss the effects on distribution of energy which would follow from the nationalization of Brinco Corporation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not aware of such a plan, Mr. Speaker, and I do not understand either the importance of this question. I do not see how the distribution of energy could be affected if the Brinco Corporation or Shawinigan Corporation were to be publicly owned or not.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ACTION TO CONTROL PRICES OF STAPLE FOODS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and is supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore. In view of the fact that prices for all staple foods such as meat, potatoes, sugar, flour and edible oils are increasing at a rate more rapid than the increase in the price of bread, is the government contemplating taking the same action with regard to those staples as it took in connection with bread?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we would take any specific action in the way we did with bread by making an announcement in the House, and the House will be made aware of that action at the time we take it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East will be recognized for a supplementary question. We are still on the first subject matter, and after the hon. member's supplementary the Chair will recognize the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the government House leader. I should like to ask whether it is his intention to carry out the recommendation of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices brought in on the final day of the last session and concurred in by the House, calling for the setting up of a standing committee on consumer affairs, so that these reports by the Food Prices Review Board can at least be referred to an appropriate committee of the House?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am in sympathy with the objective of that committee in desiring a method of continuous review of these reports. I am concerned, however, about the increasing burden we are placing on the committee system by the creation of special committees. I should like to consider further whether it would be possible to achieve this objective within the present committee structure.

Mr. McGrath: By way of a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, the committee did not recommend a special committee; it recommended, and the House concurred, the setting up of a standing committee. My question to the minister is, does he propose to carry out that recommendation of the House and set up a standing committee on consumer affairs?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe the modification suggested by my hon. friend serves to buttress my dilemma in respect of adding another standing committee to the committee structure which presently prevails and which is regarded on all sides as placing a very heavy burden on members. I should like to examine whether this objective can be achieved without creating an additional committee.

SPORTS

AUTHORITY FOR ACTION BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE TO PREVENT ENTRY OF WORLD FOOTBALL LEAGUE INTO CANADA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As a football fan, sometimes designated as a nationalist, I should like to ask the minister under what statute or order in council he claims to act in endeavouring to prevent a World Football League team being established in Canada? He has never made that clear yet, and I should like to know the basis.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is called the British North America Act.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to note the emphasis on "British". I would now ask the minister under what portion of that act he is pretending to act, and is his threat against this organization bluff or bludgeon, or both?

An hon. Member: You are the expert.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I intend to meet this afternoon with representatives of the interested parties.

An hon. Member: Bring in the bill.

Mr. Lalonde: I am trying to convince them that it is in their own interests as well as the interests of Canada that they should abandon their plan. If they do not, I am sure parliament will have the opportunity to make up its mind, and I am sure that members of the Official Opposition will have an opportunity to decide where they stand on this issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I again ask the minister to tell me, without any fatuous bluff answer, what section do you rely on or whether or not what you are endeavouring to do is plain bluff and bludgeon?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume that question is being directed to the Chair.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the name of the act once more is the British North America Act. The section is section 91.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What subsection?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether this discussion revolves around seeking or giving legal opinions, but I do not think we are going to resolve the situation or the difficulty. We will go to the next questioner, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. The right hon. gentleman, I understand, rises on a point of order or question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I simply point out this fact, that the minister is playing with the House of Commons—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —in giving an answer such as that. He knows it is bluff on his part and he is afraid to give the subsection.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman rose on a point of order. I am not sure that it was a point of order. The minister now rises on a point of order. I am not sure whether it will be a point of order, but I guess we will have to hear him.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, it is not a point of order; it is a point of privilege. I reject the accusation that I am playing with the House on this question. I was asked quite clearly twice by the right hon. member under what section I thought the federal government or parliament could act and I said section 91. I suggest that the right hon. member go and read the section and find out for himself.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. After these points of order and questions of privilege the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

ENERGY

POSSIBLE APPLICATION TO CONSTRUCT MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE—DIVISION OF THROUGHPUT BETWEEN MACKENZIE DELTA AND PRUDHOE BAY GAS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that an executive of Canadian Arctic Gas Studies Limited has announced they will be making an application for the construction of the Mackenzie Valley gas pipeline within a few days, and in view of the fact that both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources have already committed the government to this project, can the minister tell the House what share of the throughput of 4.5 billion cubic feet per day will be gas from the Mackenzie Delta and what part will be gas from Prudhoe Bay in Alaska?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might remind the hon. member that the commitment of the government is to the line subject to the usual regulatory approval and protection of the interests of the native people. With regard to the share or nature of the project we will, of course, only know this in any detail once an application is filed with the National Energy Board.

POSSIBLE APPLICATION TO CONSTRUCT MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE—PERCENTAGE OF THROUGHPUT FOR CANADIAN AND AMERICAN CONSUMERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nananimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is amazing that the government has committed itself to a project without knowing how much Canadian gas and how much American gas will go through that pipeline. May I ask the minister now whether he is aware of the fact that 70 to 75 per cent of the gas for the first five or ten years will be Canadian gas, and can he tell the House what percentage of the throughput of that gas will be for Canadian consumers and what part will be for American consumers?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member again that the application, of course, is subject to the full jurisdiction of the National Energy Board. On the remaining question, he seems to know more about the application than I do. I will have to wait until it is officially made to the board.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a last supplementary after which I will recognize the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

● (1430)

POSSIBLE APPLICATION TO CONSTRUCT MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE—INQUIRY AS TO FINANCIAL COMMITMENT BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the National Energy Board's tragic advice to the government on gas reserves in 1970 I thought the minister would have familiarized himself with some of the conditions with respect to this gas pipeline. May I ask the minister now whether the Canadian government has been approached at any time to make any financial commitment to the construction of the Mackenzie Valley gas pipeline, either by way of equity capital or by way of loan capital and, if so, what commitment is the government contemplating at this time?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada as such has not been approached. There are two emanations of the government of Canada which on their own decision have participated in this study group, namely, Canadian National Railways and the Canada Development Corporation, but financial assistance directly from the government has not been sought for the project.

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF PETROCHEMICAL COMPLEX IN SASKATCHEWAN IN RETURN FOR PROVINCE ACCEPTING LOWER PRICE FOR OIL

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. In view of the negotiations going on at present with the government of Saskatchewan about a lower price for oil for Canadians in return for the location of industries in western Canada, has the federal government proposed use of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to establish water storage in the Souris River so that a petrochemical complex could be started in southern Saskatchewan based on the coal, oil and gas fields in that area?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be in a position to answer the question. In general terms, the matter to which the hon. member has referred has been discussed with the Saskatchewan government. At the present moment the Saskatchewan government, I believe it is fair to say, is interested in getting additional information. We have agreed and undertaken with them to support various studies. That is as far as that particular project has gone although, of course, in terms of the Qu'Appelle area the hon. member may know that we did in fact sign an agreement a few weeks ago for some considerable improvements in that particular region.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I wonder if I might put the question to the Prime Minister again. My question is really on the matter of the negotiations on a national price for oil across Canada which is part of the negotiations with the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Has this particular proposal been brought into the discussions as a quid pro quo that the Canadian government is willing to offer Saskatchewan?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should have thought that the minister's answer cleared that up. If the hon. member wants to know if in a particular conversation I had with Premier Blakeney this week this subject was raised, the answer might be different from what it would be if the question were whether this question was generally current between the two levels of government, and the answer to that has been given by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to ask the hon. members for their co-operation. If we have two or three supplementaries on every question, we will not have many more questions before running out of time. I will recognize the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain on a supplementary and then will see the hon. member for Central Nova.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, again I should like to ask a question very specifically of the Prime Minister. I know that discussions are going on between the two governments and have been on for nearly a year. I am asking the Prime Minister: has this particular project been raised with the government of Saskatchewan as part of the negotiations with a view to getting the Saskatchewan government to accept a lower price for oil in Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: I would disclaim that that approach has been used at all. I think the federal government made its position quite clear some months ago, namely, that we did not accept the quid pro quo approach, and we undertook long before the energy crisis, certainly when DREE was founded and then again at the Western Economic Opportunities Conference, to do various things to help the balanced growth of the western part of Canada, particularly the prairie provinces. Therefore we do not tie this project to any particular agreement on gas and oil. We hope that they will stand independently one of the other, that in the one case it will be the federal government trying to achieve the balanced economic development of various parts of the country and in the other case it will be two oil producing provinces understanding that it is in the national interest that they undergo some restraint in their price in order to help the general Canadian economy.

AIR CANADA

DISPUTE WITH MEMBERS OF AIRLINE EMPLOYEES ASSOCIATION—INITIATIVES BY MINISTER TO RESOLVE ISSUES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Can he advise us whether, in view of the present work to rule policy of the Canadian Airline Employees Association, which is resulting in a considerable drop in airline passenger traffic, he intends to take any further initiatives to resolve some of the issues troubling the members of CALEA?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in terms of a rotating strike, I understand they occurred yesterday but did not occur today. Furthermore, the hon. member might be pleased to know that the parties are meeting with the mediator tomorrow morning in Vancouver. We are hopeful that this dispute may be resolved.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. I was aware of those particulars but I should like to ask the minister one brief supplementary. Has the minister received a request that he not intervene at this time in the present dispute between our national air carrier and members of CALEA?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I have not checked as to telegrams in the last hour or two, but I do not recall having been asked not to intervene. However, this does not seem pertinent at the moment in view of the willingness of the parties to meet the mediator tomorrow morning.

FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING STRENGTHENING OF POWERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs being absent, I shall direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the evident impotency of the Food Prices Review Board and the incapacity of Chairwoman Plumptre for explaining the reason for this board to exist, could the right hon. Prime Minister indicate whether the government intends to amend the mandate of this board to increase its effectiveness?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I find both the preamble and the question extremely strange, considering that hardly a few days have elapsed since the House strongly urged the government to give effect to a recommendation the board chaired by Mrs. Plumptre had made in connection with the price of bread. I do not think that hon. members may one day ask the government to give effect to the recommendations of a board and complain the next that it is not doing its duty.

AUTOMOBILES—ALLEGED WIDENING OF DIFFERENTIAL BETWEEN CAR PRICES IN CANADA AND UNITED STATES—REPRESENTATIONS ON SAFEGUARDS IN AUTO PACT

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The latest report of the President of the United States to Congress on the auto pact, just released, for the second successive year shows a widening of the price differential between cars purchased in Canada and those purchased in the United States. What steps is the minister now prepared to take to narrow this gap other than those taken last year which were obviously unsuccessful?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my information and the advice I have received is contrary to that which the President of the United States has received. My information is that the price gap has narrowed.

Mr. O'Connor: For the purpose of my questions we might rely on this report and the minister can dispute it at his will. The report also continues to refer to the Canadian safeguards as being of a transitional nature despite the minister's representation last year that this was not the case. Has the minister made any representations to his counterparts in Washington to correct this inaccuracy?

Mr. Gillespie: I would hope that at some time in the near future we will have an opportunity again to discuss with the American authorities potential improvements in the automobile pact. As I have said on previous occasions, if we do, such improvements will be based on protecting present Canadian jobs and equally participating in the growth of the industry in North America.

MANPOWER

REASONS FOR ALLEGED CUT IN TRAINING

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I ask the minister whether he or his officials have met with representatives of the provinces and informed them that in the coming year his department proposes to cut purchases of manpower training places in community colleges and vocational institutes by just under 10 per cent? If this is a fact, what are the reasons for the adoption of this policy?

● (1440)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the information with regard to the manpower training budget and the allocations to the provinces has been given to the various provinces. The fact of the matter is that there is a reduction in the number of manpower training days because, while an increased dollar budget is available, the cost of manpower training has escalated. Educational costs went up far more than the original provincial forecasts, which placed a squeeze on the actual number of training days that can be purchased from the said colleges.

Mr. Orlikow: I should like to ask the minister whether implementation of the policy he is pursuing now will not mean either that the provinces will have to pick up much more than the 50 per cent of the cost they have been bearing up until now or cut back on the number of teachers and the number of students they have been educating and had proposed to educate during the coming year?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, to a degree one or the other will result based on the fact that in some cases the provinces themselves forecast increased costs amounting to about 7 per cent or 8 per cent and finally came up with increased costs amounting to as much as 18 per cent.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE OPENING OF MISSION BY SAUDI ARABIA IN OTTAWA AND CANADIAN EMBASSY IN IRAQ

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to our distinguished maestro, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Following his announcement today that Canada is to open an embassy in Saudi Arabia at an early date, can he indicate when that country plans to establish a mission in Ottawa, and can he say when this country will open an embassy in another important oil producing country, Iraq, which has had a mission here for many months?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the hon. gentleman has said, Mr. Speaker, in furtherance of the announcement I made in the House some months ago we have now agreed with the government of Saudi Arabia to open an embassy in Jedda, and we hope this will be under way in the fall of this year.

We are now discussing with the Iraqui government the establishment of a mission in Bagdad. I am not quite sure when that one will be opened, but the plans are under way. Of course, we would welcome the establishment of a permanent mission here in Ottawa by both of these countries. We have Iraqui representatives here now and we are very happy to have them with us. If Saudi Arabia would like to open a mission here we would be very pleased to have them too.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—ACTION TO OFFSET RISING CANADIAN PRICES AND DECLINING CAPITAL INVESTMENT

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is a supplementary one directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the report referred to by the hon. member for Halton, which indicates that retail prices of automobiles in Canada are increasing while they are decreasing in the United States, and in view of the fact that capital investment in the automotive industry in Canada declined more than 11 per cent and it appears that we will have a sizeable deficit on the auto pact in the fiscal year 1973-74, what action does the minister intend to initiate in his department to offset or overcome this condition?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have already made clear to the presidents of the automobile companies, to the presidents of the parents in the United States as well as to the Canadian presidents, that we are concerned about the level of investment and, further, that we would expect that level of investment to come up in Canada so that it would balance the production and share of the market that we have in North America.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—
PUBLICATION OF REASONS GIVEN BY COMPANIES—POSITION OF FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I realize perseverance is a beautiful virtue.

In view of the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, I shall direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Will he tell the House if the reasons given by the companies to justify a higher increase in the price of bread than that suggested by the Plumptre Board have been made public? If so, has the board studied and accepted them?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, to follow the sequence of events, the companies had announced an increase in the cost of bread, and the Plumptre Board considered it unjustifiable. The minister then made suggestions to the companies. They accepted, as a result of those suggestions, not to decree the planned increase. I believe a meeting is to be held at the end of the month, around March 25, with the legal counsels of the bakeries, and we will then know the answer of the Plumptre Board.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE ALL IMPACT STUDIES WILL BE RELEASED TO PUBLIC

Mr. Peter P. Masniuk (Portage): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Can the minister assure the House that all environmental impact studies will be released for public investigation?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): No, I cannot, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Masniuk: Will the minister guarantee this approach by making a statement on motions in the House that the release to the public of all environmental impact studies is government policy?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I expect to be making a statement to the House on this subject in a few days time.

REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF STUDIES OF IMPACT OF JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the urgency in making public environmental impact studies with regard to the James Bay project, studies for which the federal and provincial governments have allocated $10 million, will the minister assure the House that he is not blocking publication of these studies and that they will be made public forthwith?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): I am glad to give the House that assurance, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF EMERGENCY LEGISLATION DEALING WITH TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact grain transportation in certain parts of the country has deteriorated to a frightening degree, has the government any plans or is it making plans to bring forth emergency legislation to deal with grain movement in order to ensure that Canada may achieve the maximum possible exports?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw to the attention of the hon. member the fact that the minister did make an announcement this morning regarding an increase in boxcars being brought into service to the number of 2,400. We hope this will help to alleviate the serious problem.

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—IDLE BOXCARS—PROVISION OF CARS BY RAILWAYS IN LIGHT OF CROWSNEST FREIGHT RATES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Is he aware of the fact that as of March 7 some 65 boxcars were sitting idle just north of Nanton, Alberta, and have been sitting idle there for six months, and is he prepared to investigate this situation as well as the numerous other sidings on which a large number of boxcars are sitting idle and unused?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is a long list of cases of cars being idle during the course of the winter months, and we are investigating each of these cases. Of course, in a general way I have indicated to the House that the railways did suffer some serious problems because of the worse than usual snow conditions—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I know that you and hon. members opposite appreciate that it snows in the prairies every year, but most of them who visited home in the last few months will know that it snowed a good deal more this winter than it does in an average winter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should bring to the attention of hon. members that we have only a few minutes remaining before the end of the question period and I appeal to them to limit the number of supplementaries. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vegreville and then the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. Mazankowski: I appreciate your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, because this is a very important subject. I would like to ask the minister one further supplementary. Can he tell the House whether, from his discussions or meetings with the railways with respect to the whole matter of grain transportation, he has been able to determine if it is a fact that the railways are deliberately attempting to undermine and weaken the Crowsnest freight rates by not providing sufficient boxcars to meet the demands of the prairie grain producers?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to determine whether there is any such intent. The railways have indicated an intention to get back to the levels of their own commitments, and we will be urging them to improve upon this in order to catch up on the shipments that we would have liked to have sooner. In addition, we have created an emergency committee to deal with possible short-term steps that can be taken by the railways, by the elevator companies and by everyone involved in the movement of grain in order to get better use out of whatever equipment can be committed by the railways to the movement of grain, because it is in the interests of everyone to see maximum movement between now and the end of the crop year.

ACTION TO ASSIST CATTLEMEN IN LIGHT OF EFFECT OF IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES ON MARKET

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture. It arises out of the fact that last week the Minister of Agriculture told the House he would very quickly give an answer to the House with regard to the situation existing in the beef industry, which is very critical and requires immediate attention. Will the government be able to tell the House within the next very few days of a program to save the beef industry from the very bad situation that now exists with regard to feeding cattle?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is, first, that the minister is in Lethbridge presently meeting with the industry leaders.

An hon. Member: With the Liberal Party, you mean.

Mr. Trudeau: I agree that many of them are Liberals, as the hon. member opposite has suggested. He will repeat to them the assurance he has given the House previously, which is that the government would act in this regard.

Mr. Gleave: As the representatives of the Canadian cattlemen are here in Ottawa, would it be possible for the Minister of Agriculture to come back to Ottawa and talk to them instead of to the Liberals in Lethbridge?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, it is within the duties of the minister to do both, but there are so many Liberals in Alberta that he cannot bring them all back to Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

PROPORTION OF EXPORT TAX PAYABLE TO OIL PRODUCING PROVINCES—APPLICATION OF EQUALIZATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Prime Minister is deliberately trying to destroy confidence in the government. My question is for the Minister of Finance. It is a very serious question. I ask the Minister of Finance whether he denies that he represented to the House and to me personally, when the export tax and export charge bills were before the House, that the funds received by the producing provinces from the export tax were subject to equalization and that he said those things for the purpose of getting the legislation through the House and of getting my consent to unanimous agreement?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. My statement, if properly construed, would indicate that if equalization were due it would have amounted to $25 million and would have been a deductible charge from the export tax. But the advice I have received is that there is no equalization due on any division of the export tax.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister is laughing. I think this is a serious question.

Mr. Trudeau: I am laughing at you, not at the question.

Mr. Stanfield: I regard this as a serious matter, if the minister made the statement. I make no pretense that, so far as I am concerned, this goes to the credibility of the Minister of Finance. I ask him once again, sir, and if he wants to say to me that he made a mistake, I will accept that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I ask him again whether he denies that he said in the House and represented to me that these funds received by the oil producing provinces were subject to equalization.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that was not the context in which I put the matter. I am advised that the act as it stands and the regulations as they stand do not nor did they provide for the payment of equalization.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question with respect to the business of the House. Since tomorrow is to be the first day, hopefully, for government business, I wonder if the acting government House leader can inform us what will be the business for tomorrow and perhaps for Thursday and Friday as well.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe, as indicated previously, that it is planned to have an allotted day on Friday.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY. S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO EXTEND DEADLINE OF VETERANS LAND ACT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe) moved:

That this House regrets that the government has not extended the March 31, 1974 deadline under the Veterans Land Act and calls upon the government to consider taking immediate steps to extend this deadline.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, on behalf of my party, to move this motion today, even though I know that the vital question of the day is the uncontrollable increase in the cost of living which is affecting most Canadians. I am pleased to be given this opportunity because, sir, we have almost reached the deadline; in 19 days the government intends to phase out the Veterans Land Act.

You are well aware, Mr. Speaker, of the number of times that I, along with other members of my party and of other opposition parties, have tried by every means at my disposal to convince the government and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) to reconsider the phasing out of the act. May I mention that several colleagues in my party and in the other parties have collaborated on this issue. I have collaborated on a number of occasions with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in bringing motions before the House for just this purpose. My most recent attempt was made on January 11, just before the House recessed, when I moved a motion for the adjournment of the House, since I felt that this situation was an emergency one at that time.

In your reply, sir, you acknowledged the number of times on which I had brought up the issue and indicated that there would be other occasions in the new session when I could direct attention to the issue. You mentioned that several allotted days were set aside for such purposes. I have taken advantage of the present allotted day to raise this issue once more. You are well aware, too, of the number of ambiguous answers given by the minister, who did nothing more than leave the door open by stating that the matter was under review.

In his speech to the House last Thursday the minister literally slammed the door shut on any hopes that remained in the minds of veterans still qualified that anything would be done, when he stated, as recorded at page 305 of Hansard:

On January 11 last, as reported at page 9281 of Hansard,—

The minister was referring to the question I had asked.

—I stated that if I had sufficient information to make me think the deadline date should be changed I would so recommend to the government. I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I have carefully considered all relevant representations and data, including that determined by the Royal Canadian Legion in the survey it conducted last December. I am unable to conclude that such a recommendation would be warranted or appropriate.

However, what he was really saying was that he has disregarded the many thousands of replies to questionnaires sent out by the Legion, I think the total is around 8,000, and the many resolutions submitted to him by national veterans' organizations on behalf of thousands of veterans, plus the countless letters he has received from individual veterans. I am surprised that this did not justify the extension of the legislation. If this is the basis for his decision, all I can say is that judging from the letters my party receives every day, there must be two national veterans organizations, one which writes to him and one which writes to me.

● (1500)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: These veterans organizations represent the majority of some 900,000 veterans still living in Canada. I cannot accept the suggestion that the decision was based on what the veterans want or on the advice they offered. I believe it must be based on some other factors. Our motion today reads very simply, and I quote:

This House regrets that the government has not extended the March 31, 1974 deadline under the Veterans Land Act and calls upon the government to consider taking immediate steps to extend this deadline.

I am sure many members of the House might wonder why my party, on its first allotted opposition day, has raised as a national concern one section of the veterans charter when such a matter might be relegated to a very low priority. I hope that my remarks will provide the answer to that question.

First, I feel it might be worthwhile to review the act. It was enacted in 1942 and consists of three parts. Under Part I, financial assistance, grants and loans may be provided to qualified veterans who desire to settle on land as full-time or part-time farmers or as commercial fishermen.

Part II provides that any qualified veteran who is approved for a loan under the National Housing Act may receive financial and other assistance to build his own home, provided he assumes his own construction contract with a maximum ceiling of $18,000.

Part III makes available additional fully repayable loans to full-time and part-time farmers and fishermen at the time they are established under Part I of the act, and to those previously established under Part I and still have a subsisting contract with the director. At the same time, low cost group life insurance is available to assist in the repayment of a veteran's remaining VLA debt in case of death.

Under Part I, financial assistance may be approved up to $40,000 or 75 per cent of the security value of the land, whichever is the lesser amount, for basic herd livestock and farm equipment. One advantage is that under this part of the act, the first $6,000 is available at only 3½ per cent and the remainder at the current rate which is presently 7 per cent. Under certain conditions there are other stipulations of varying degrees, including conditional grants. Similar conditions prevail for commercial fishermen with varying grants and/or loans depending on the circumstances.

Under Part II of the act, loans are available up to $18,000, repayable at the going NHA rate of interest. This section of the act was introduced to assist veterans of World War II and Korea to become homeowners, particularly those who because of the nature and location of their employment could not be established on two or three acres of land as part-time farmers under the act and whose income was insufficient to meet payments on the cost of a home built by a regular contractor under the National Housing Act.

Under the regulations, it is required that a veteran applying for a loan under Part II must hold a parcel of land of one half acre. However, when a parcel of land does not contain this minimum and no other land is available to make up one half acre, this requirement is reduced by 20 per cent with the exception that those veterans who are in receipt of a 50 per cent disability pension may be exempted from this minimum acreage requirement.

Over the years amendments to the legislation were introduced, both with regard to the amount of the loan ceiling and the deadline dates for certification. For example, in 1965 the loan ceiling under Part II was raised from $12,000 to $18,000. This remains today, almost 10 years later. It must be pointed out also that deadline dates for certification were extended as a result of changing conditions. It was established in 1962 that deadlines would be introduced. October 31, 1968 was established as the deadline date for certification with March 31, 1974 as the date for applications for loans.

Today, there are over 100,000 veterans certified who cannot apply because of the restrictions of loan ceilings and lot requirements. Many of these veterans are still serving and are not ready to locate at a predetermined location. The minister keeps repeating, and his department reports predict, that a small percentage of the some 140,000 became certified in October, 1968 in case they may want to apply before the March, 1974 deadline. Nothing could be more far-fetched, Mr. Speaker. As everyone knows, the real reason is that with today's housing costs, it is impossible to build a home and provide a lot of over 17,000 square feet for $18,000. They actually do not get a loan of $18,000 since the down payment required is $2,600.

Purely and simply, governments past and present, even with their good intentions, failed to predict what changing conditions have brought about. I am sure the minister and some of his colleagues will use the argument that when the deadline was established, there was unanimous consent in the House and that it occurred during the time of the Progressive Conservative government. However, there were earlier deadlines established by other governments, and they were changed to meet increases in costs over the years or for other reasons. There have been countless amendments over the years to help cope with changing conditions, regardless of which party happened to form the government of the day, or who made the decision to impose deadlines. Therefore, why do they not admit that it is only fair and reasonable to extend the deadline, something which they have the power to do?

The main point I want to bring out is that the motion goes beyond the material advantages that would accrue to the veteran as his right. It is not wholly because the government has failed to increase the amount of the loan and amend the lot requirements. It is not merely because of the other factors I have mentioned. It goes beyond that. There is a principle involved here, not only an important principle but one which indicates a breaking of faith by the government of Canada which, in the name of every citizen of Canada, made a commitment to the veterans of World Wars I and II and Korea.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: That commitment was made when the Prime Ministers of the day stated clearly and emphatically that no veteran, whether he remained where wars were fought or returned, would ever have cause to say that Canada broke faith with those who died, those who remained or those who returned.

Our motion today goes beyond the mere denial of the veteran's right under the Veterans Land Act. It brings into focus how easily we forget and points out the lack of recognition of what our country is all about. I am the first to admit that, in spite of the criticism by the opposition, myself included, as a country we are the envy of other nations of the world insofar as prosperity and freedom are concerned. How did we reach this state of affluence? We reached this status because we built a base of greatness through the initiative and dedication of the people who make up our citizenry. We also reached our status through the suffering of people who came to Canada because of the opportunities that existed.

We are made up of people of every race, and from all parts of the world, who were willing to participate in the building of a nation. They helped build Canada through sweat, toil and suffering. They were willing to suffer. When they were called upon during wars, they offered their lives to defend their country and to join with their neighbours to ensure peace in the world.

The minister also mentioned in his speech that this year would mark two important events for the veterans of this country. First, this coming June will be the 30th anniversary of the landing of the allied troups in northern France which resulted in the liberation of Europe and the end of World War II. He said the government, and rightly so, will take a very active part in the ceremonies. I am sure that all members feel the minister will be a worthy representative of our government and our country. Perhaps I can suggest he would be wise to include in his address an extract from the booklet entitled "Veneration for Valour, an assessment of the veterans charter and its impact on Canadian veterans and on Canada as a whole". I should like to read from this booklet. In it, we find these words:

How have we dealt with those who served and came back? They offered their lives as citizens of the Canadian nation, and they gave much. How have we dealt with the widows and orphans of those who did not come back? How did they expect to be repaid? The answer, in their name, was given by the Canadian Legion at its founding convention 46 years ago. Through all of those years the work of the Legion has involved, in the words of Senator Arthur Laing, Minister of Veterans' Affairs, "the awakening of the peoples' indebtedness, a sense of compassion for those who have suffered, and a veneration for valour." Its twin objectives, as defined by its first president, were "the welfare of Canada and the proper care of all who served their country in time of war.

It is well to note the priorities in those objectives. The welfare of Canada came first, the care of the veterans second. Yet both were linked together. They remained in the same order, and they remained linked, at the close of the second World War. There could never be a sound nation, a national at peace with itself, without adequate recognition of its veterans' claims. It must be just, but it must be feasible within the limits of our national resources. And what did that demand? It demanded first, without thought of any limits, the generous care of the disabled; and that was always given. It was recognized in the years following the first World War as demanding a measure of help to all returning men. By the end of the Second World War, in a changing nation and a changing world, it had assumed a new dimension. Rehabilitation, both as a national obligation and as sound national policy, had come to mean helping the veteran to establish himself in civil life in a situation at least as good as he would have occupied if he had not gone to war. It was a large objective, pursued through a quarter century and still being pursued. Both in money and human efforts the work of the Department of Veterans Affairs represents one of our greatest national projects. It is a successful project, and a living force in the nation. In keeping faith with our veterans we have not only served them; we have joined with them in the building of a better country.

This may sound emotional, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps, when we stop to consider what is going on around us, we should get emotional more often.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: In this same booklet, Mr. Speaker, a reference is often made to the Veterans Land Act, in particular to land settlement and home construction. The performance statistics show a large measure of success. Some 32,000 veterans have been settled on farms and 85,000 on small holdings. More than 36,000 have been assisted to build houses. The booklet goes on to say that these figures are of little help in themselves as a means of measurement, and that the work is not yet complete. More homes have yet to be built; more farms are being enlarged. So, I ask the minister this question: Why, when only a year and a half ago there was so much more to be done, should this work suddenly become unnecessary?

Let us turn for a few moments to the way in which the act has been administered, and look at a few of the statistics which the government uses so readily. Investment of public funds stands at present at $535 million. Total revenue received from veterans during the year prior to the publication of the report amounted to $69 million—$43 million representing new payment of principal, and $26 million representing interest payments. During that year some 2,100 loans were negotiated. House construction starts increased in Quebec and the Maritimes, remained steady in British Columbia and the Prairies but declined in Ontario, due mainly to rising costs and the difficulty of finding suitable land. The cost of new construction, alterations, additions and repairs amounted to nearly $80 million. Under the small holdings provision, the most popular form of assistance, some 3,000 veterans were established.

A staff of 536 is employed in the VLA administration. The annual report states that work production increased to 103.5 per cent relative to an index base of 100 for the year 1969-70. The administration, in addition to its other work, provides an appraisal service to other departments, particularly the Department of National Revenue, and in the year referred to completed almost 23,000 reports for that department's data bank. I wonder whether the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) has heard about that? So, here we find a competent administration working above the acceptable performance level, working for other departments, maintaining an acceptable business record. Yet the government has announced its intention of phasing it out.

How many amendments have we seen brought down in the past few years to the housing legislation for which the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and Housing (Mr. Basford) is responsible? How much money is being poured into this area? Certainly, everyone would agree that further vast amounts of funds must be provided for housing because of the housing crisis. But is there any reason or justification for phasing out legislation which is serving the veteran at no unreasonable cost to the public, particularly since doing so would have the effect of throwing thousands of veterans into the mainstream of the demand for housing which today is so acute?

The minister told us in his speech that he would be attending the biennial convention of the Royal Canadian Legion. Again, I say he will be a worthy representative. I am sure he will make reference to the increases effected in war veterans' allowances, civilian war allowances and in disability pensions. And so he should. I shall be proud, as will all members who played some small part in passing legislation to effect these increases. I am sure the minister will mention the fact that Canada's veterans charter compares with the best in the world, if, indeed, it is not the best. So he should, Mr. Speaker, and once again my colleagues and I will be proud to be associated with him.

But will it be fair to tell the 2,500 veterans who will gather from across the country at the Dominion command convention that after reviewing all the factors he was unable to conclude that the extension of the March, 1974, deadline was warranted or appropriate? I say it will not. I hope he will be able to sell them something along these lines—that the government, realizing the commitments made by past governments over the years are in the name of every Canadian citizen, has decided to continue to keep faith with its Canadian veterans and not only to extend the March, 1974 deadline but, as well, to extend the October deadline. Further, that it has decided to increase the maximum ceiling and reduce the lot requirement in line with today's needs, and that it will undertake to ensure that no veteran would be denied the right to acquire a home, or a small holding or to improve his home under the terms of the act as long as he lives.

As I said in my opening remarks, I have attempted over the past many months, with the support of my party, by questions in the House and in committee meetings, by way of motions, a private members' bill and other means, to persuade the government to reconsider its decision to phase out the act. I have attempted to do so in a responsible manner. Nevertheless, I understand there are rumblings going around that there are ulterior motives behind the motion we are putting forward today. All I can say is that I am sorry for those who think that way.

With only 19 days left before the phasing out of the legislation, the motion before us is a last effort of mine to appeal to the government to take steps to extend this deadline. It is a known fact that on matters concerning the veterans of Canada the members of this House have always stood together. This attitude has been exemplified from time to time on many occasions, particularly at meetings of the Veterans Affairs Committee. I am sure that all hon. members, some 50 of whom are veterans, appreciate the emergency which exists. I am sure, too, that all members of the House will support this motion, and, in doing so, indicate that as representatives of every citizen in Canada we are fulfilling our commitments to the veterans of this country to whom we owe so much.

[Mr. Marshall.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in my first words I wish to commend the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) for presenting this motion to the House today. I also wish to commend him most warmly on the clear and responsible manner in which he presented the case asking the government to reconsider the question of the deadline on the Veterans Land Act and to continue that legislation beyond the end of this month.

● (1520)

It has been my privilege—and I thank my hon. friend for having referred to it—to collaborate with the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) on a number of matters relating to veterans affairs. I should like to take this opportunity to acknowledge once again that he did me the honour of seconding the motion that I presented to this House on November 9, 1973, under Standing Order 43. That motion called for a reconsideration of the whole question of the Veterans Land Act. I shall refer to its terms in a few minutes, but I wish to emphasize the fact that unanimous consent was given to the making of that motion and that the House supported it unanimously.

That is perhaps one of the reasons, along with the others that he stated, for the tone in which the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe spoke this afternoon. He spoke not just for himself and for the members of his party, and I hope that I speak not just for myself and for the members of my party. I believe we are speaking for members in all parts of this House, and I am able to say that not just because of a personal judgment of what all hon. members think, but because there was unanimous approval of the motion that was made on November 9, 1973.

I realize that in a speech that he made last week the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) seemed to say that he had given this matter all the consideration that he could, and that he was not able to bring himself to continue the legislation. However, I join with my hon. friend, and with others who will speak after me, in making the strongest appeal I can to the minister. My appeal is that when he speaks in this debate today, as I trust he will, he will be the big man that all of us know him to be and will be prepared to say that, despite what he said last week, in view of the desire of the House he is now prepared to do what this motion asks, namely to reconsider the phasing out of the Veterans Land Act. I hope I can be pardoned for saying that if the hon. minister is already a hero, he will be a hero again today if he accepts and reflects the thinking of this entire House by stating that the time has come to make it clear that the Veterans Land Act will be continued beyond the end of this month.

If there were time I would recite events other than the motion of November 9. Questions were asked by my hon. friend from Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe and myself on November 21, 1973, which resulted in a late show on Tuesday, December 4, 1973. There were motions and questions in January when we were back here for the end of the session. There were motions on Friday, March 1. The matter has been discussed at length at meetings of the veterans affairs committee.

Even though this question may be one of the lesser issues in the field of veterans affairs, it is before us now because of the deadline of March 31. It is also before us because of the feeling in all parts of the House that it is an issue on which the government should now respond to the will of the House, even though this means changing a position that the minister was very close to taking when he spoke in the debate on the address last Thursday night.

So, Mr. Speaker, that is my plea. I deeply appreciate the manner in which the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe made his plea. He was speaking the absolute truth when he referred to the way in which we get along in the veterans affairs committee and the way in which we deal with veterans affairs in this House. The last thing that we want today is partisan conflict, especially when we are all agreed.

I do not know when the minister will speak. If he wants to sit and listen to the debate before he answers, then that is fine with all of us. But I do hope he knows that in the hearts of all of us in this House we want a clear, unequivocal, good faith assurance today that this matter will be reconsidered.

Thanks to the speech of my hon. friend who preceded me, there are details about the legislation with which I do not need to take part of my 20 minutes to deal. However, I should like to make a few brief comments, and to support my comments by reading extracts from a letter, in regard to some of the arguments that the minister has been putting up when he has been resisting our wish that the Veterans Land Act be continued.

One of his arguments has been that the purpose of the Veterans Land Act has become confused in the minds of veterans in recent years. The minister has pointed out that originally the act was to assist veterans to get settled on a small holding of land on which they would do a certain amount of do-it-yourself agriculture. The minister says that what is happening now is that veterans are trying to get grants under the Veterans Land Act for the purpose of erecting a house for their retirement years.

The other night when the minister made that comment in his speech I interjected—and it is the obvious interjection—"What's wrong with that?" I remind the minister that the motion which was passed unanimously by this House and accepted by him, by all members of the cabinet and by members of all parties on November 9 dealt with that very question. These were the words of the motion, as recorded at page 7693 of Hansard:

> That this House requests that the Minister of Veterans Affairs give urgent consideration to the amending of the Veterans Land Act regulations to permit veterans to acquire small holdings, even if the main purpose of most of the older veterans now applying for loans under the Veterans Land Act is to meet their housing requirements, it being the view of this House that entitlement to a piece of this land ought to be the right of any veteran.

At the risk of repeating myself over and over again, that motion was passed unanimously by this House on Friday, November 9. The entire cabinet concurred in it. Surely, the cabinet is not going to go back on what it agreed to do at that time, namely reconsider the whole matter, and to include in that reconsideration the justification that veterans have in seeking grants under the Veterans Land Act, even if housing is the main or the only purpose they have.

I remind hon. members, and I remind the government, that with housing costs as they are today some assistance is necessary. I ask hon. members, what group can this parliament more justifiably assist in the matter of housing than our older veterans? Really, Mr. Speaker, there is no answer to this plea: the government cannot say no. The government really has to come through today and agree to the request in this motion, which is that it reconsider the deadline placed on the Veterans Land Act.

Another argument the minister has used has been the assertion that some veterans were trying to get more than one of the various post-war benefits which were available to them. If I had the time I should like to develop that point myself, but I think the easiest way to deal with it is to read a part of a paragraph from a letter written to the minister on January 28, 1974, by Mr. E. V. Heesaker, Dominion President of the Canadian Corps Association. This was a letter in which a strong, and I think very effective appeal, was made to the minister to wash out the March 31 deadline.

Mr. Heesaker in his letter referred to the comments made by the minister in reply to the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) on November 6, 1973 about this effort to get extra benefits, and he said:

> We would like to point out here that there were many veterans who were not aware of the Veterans Land Act or the University Training Program until after they had used up all their re-establishment credits. And, of course, they had to refund their re-establishment credits before they could become eligible for Veterans Land Act Benefits. So they were not trying to take advantage of two forms of rehabilitation, they were merely changing one for the other after they had learned of the existence of Veterans Land Act.

I think the argument the minister is trying to make in that connection just does not stand up, and even if it did stand up, as I shall suggest by a sentence from Mr. Heesaker's letter a little later on, I suggest our duty to those who served is such that we should not quibble over this sort of thing. Therefore, the plea today for the Veterans Land Act to be continued is one that should be met.

As I have already said, and as my friend who preceded me said, there are many issues affecting veterans in respect of which we want improvements, and we will keep up the battle for them. I agree with my friend that we have done pretty well in the last couple of years, but this happens to be an issue which is crucial as March 31 is only 19 days away.

Another argument the minister uses at times, and really it startled me that he would use it at all, is that it would be unfair to former veterans who did not get this benefit to give it now to today's veterans under different terms. That would be like saying we should not be paying old age security pensions of over $100 a month today at age 65 because that is unfair to our parents and grandparents who back in the thirties got only $20 a month at age 70.

An hon. Member: And what about disability pensions?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My friend from Edmonton refers to increases in disability pensions. What about the veterans who have died over the years since World Wars I and II on disability pensions at much lower rates? Is it unfair to them that we now pay better disability pensions to those who are alive today? Really, I think that argument is one that the minister would like to reconsider. What we are concerned about are the veterans who are alive today, and if those who have died before them whether on the field of battle or since the war, could speak they would say they would like to see their comrades get the best of what is coming. This is a different society with more affluence and greater costs, and I suggest it is completely unfair to judge what is done for veterans today by what was done for veterans in days gone by.

Another argument the minister has used is that many of the hundred thousand to whom the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe referred, who got their certificates of qualification before the cutoff date in 1968, were just taking the precaution of getting their authority in case they wanted to use it. The minister says we should not now take those people seriously because they really did not mean it, but just wanted to be sure in case.

In answer to that I should like to read again a paragraph from the letter that Mr. Heesaker wrote the minister on January 28. He said, addressing himself to the minister:

> You say that you are satisfied that the vast majority of veterans who hold Veterans Land Act qualification certificates simply took the precaution of obtaining such a certificate before the deadline of October 31, 1968. This is just like the precaution they took in 1914, and again in 1939, to ensure that no enemy soldiers set foot on Canadian soil, except as a prisoner of war. However, they were not so cautious with their own personal safety.

I suggest that is not the kind of argument that should be made in this debate, that many of these veterans were only taking a precaution. The fact of the matter is that times have changed, problems in gettting housing have become very serious, and in my view we should treat seriously the fact that many of these veterans who have these qualification certificates would like to be able to get themselves located on a piece of land for a home, even if they are not able to do so before March 31. As a matter of fact, I like the sentence in the concluding paragraph of Mr. Heesaker's letter in which he states:

> In view of the above facts, we believe that a veteran should be eligible for benefits under the Veterans Land Act until the day he dies. He offered his life in a time of crisis and this is little enough to give him in return.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is what we said in the motion we passed in this House on November 9, 1973, that it is the view of this House that entitlement to a piece of this land ought to be the right of every veteran.

I have quoted two or three times from that letter from Mr. Eugene Heesaker to the minister speaking on behalf of the Canadian Corps Association, and expressing the view of many veterans and veterans' organizations. It is interesting, of course, to know what the minister said in his letter of reply to Mr. Heesaker dated February 18. The letter expresses appreciation for the points made and contains some arguments in respect of the points set out by Mr. Heesaker, but when Mr. Heesaker sent some of the rest of us copies of that letter he suggested there was some hope in the last paragraph of the letter over the signature of the minister. That paragraph reads:

> I appreciated receiving your letter and having the views of your Association. You may be assured that I will keep them in mind as this matter receives further consideration.

I know the minister can say he wrote that on February 18, 1974, and 10 or 12 days later made a speech in which he said he had concluded this consideration and saw no basis on which he could agree to continuing the Veterans Land Act beyond March 31. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe said he slammed the door shut. Perhaps that is not too strong, but at least he did not lock it. He shut the door on the hope that something could be done, but he did not lock it. What we are trying to do is open that door, and I plead with the minister to give serious consideration to this motion. I am about to sit down, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the House will give the hon. member its unanimous consent to his continuing. That is why I interrupt the hon. member at this moment.

● (1540)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the suggestion, but it is not necessary. I have about concluded my remarks. I feel this is one of the most important days we have had in this session of this Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As the two of us who have already spoken have indicated, there are other issues affecting veterans and we will be dealing with them when the time comes. However, March 31 is very close and this issue, even if the number of veterans affected is not great, should be resolved today. I remind the minister, as I remind the House, that even the veterans who themselves may not be involved in the desire for a VLA grant are concerned about the well-being of their fellow veterans, and I therefore suggest that all veterans of Canada have their eyes on this House today. They will be glad to know that members in all parties want the Veterans Land Act extended, and its provisions improved as well, although that is not in the motion today. We will be counting on the minister, and I am hopeful that he will not disappoint us, to agree to the request in the motion by telling this House before the day is over that he and his government will reconsider the matter of extending the Veterans Land Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on the motion introduced by my colleague the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), calling upon the government to extend the deadline under the Veterans' Land Act.

I share the interest of all previous speakers in this matter, for I am one of those who served our country during World War II, a war which was believed to be the very last of all major conflicts.

On a number of occasions, and especially during the past few months, similar motions were introduced calling upon the government to disregard the deadline which had been unanimously agreed upon in 1968 and to extend the benefits of this act later than March 31, 1974. On November 6, 1973, a similar motion was introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and another on December 4, 1973, by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe. These two motions, Mr. Speaker, were received with many reservations. I remember the debate that followed the motion, the kind that can be termed a "motherhood" motion. It is very difficult to object to the government paying increased benefits to those Canadians, who are first-class citizens because they took the responsibility in the difficult years of 1939 to 1945 of enrolling, going into training and defending their country.

Mr. Speaker, before developing further my ideas on this motion, I would like to return to the spirit of the act adopted in 1942. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read from the preamble or interpretation of the act. I quote:

In this Act

"veteran" means a person who at any time during the war declared by His Majesty on the 10th day of September 1939 against the German Reich and subsequently against other powers, has been therein engaged on active service in a naval, army or air force of Canada, or of any of His Majesty's forces if at the time of his enlistment he was ordinarily domiciled or resident in Canada,

It can be immediately gathered from this preamble, Mr. Speaker, that the purpose of the act was to favour those young Canadians who answered the call to arms and decided voluntarily, after being called, to go defend their country. The government of Canada has therefore taken very definite obligations towards them.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, with your indulgence I should like to read some of the notes in the preamble to the act entitled "An act to assist war veterans to settle upon the land".:

Whereas many men now serving in the active forces of Canada have recorded their desire to settle on land or engage in farming when hostilities cease, and it is desirable that suitably qualified veterans be encouraged to seek rehabilitation in the agricultural industry;

And whereas part-time farming coupled with other employment is an increasingly important aspect of rural and semi-rural life in Canada;

And whereas it is in the public interest as a measure of rehabilitation to assist in acquiring the ownership of farm homes by qualified veterans . . .

And whereas the great majority of prospective veteran settlers have limited financial assets and the lack of such assets has proved to be the main obstacle to the fulfilment of settlement contracts and to the acquirement of farm home ownership;

And whereas it is the purpose of the Dominion Government to provide a measure of financial assistance to veterans on their performance of prescribed settlement conditions in order to promote their engaging in agricultural pursuits either as a full-time occupation or as a part-time occupation coupled with some other employment:

Mr. Speaker, I believe the title of the act and the preamble clearly set out the purpose and intent of the legislation drafted by the framers of the legislation and adopted by Parliament over 30 years ago. The reason I go back to the spirit of the law in 1942 is simple. During those days, of course, we had to create some incentive for, or some interest on the part of, young Canadians to join the service, to abandon careers, leave their families or wives or leave their studies in order to enter the service of their country not knowing whether they would come back or not knowing in what condition they would come back. Of course, the Canadian government took upon itself the task of preparing a program so that the experience of going over and fighting for their country would not deprive young Canadians, of whom I was one, of a career or business to which to come back. If there were no career or business to which to come back or studies to pursue, then if they wished to settle on a farm they could do so with the assistance of the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this makes me wonder whether we are not somewhat stretching the spirit of the law. If, for instance, the benefits were increased or, for instance, the government, on the recommendation of the minister, were to recommend that in fact extension of the application of the act be studied seriously, I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether as a veteran who made his option some 27 or 28 years ago, I would not feel that I was being cheated in some of my rights because at that time I was not told that in 1974, following the representations of some veterans, the government or Parliament would consider extending the benefits of the act.

I wonder if my decision would have been the same in 1945, had I then known that, much later, I could change my mind. In any event, we must not forget that 100,000 veterans have already taken advantage of the act. Out of these, 48,500 who are still committed live on these tracts of land and are repaying their loans.

Of these 100,000 no fewer than 40,000 have already benefitted from the grant or benefits and finished paying their debt. Mr. Speaker, I wonder what attitude, and I urge my colleagues to think very seriously about this, those who have already made their decision could have. I wonder whether they will not have the very justified feeling of having been denied their rights by accepting benefits which could have been much more interesting had they waited like a few thousands have done.

This is a most indeterminate number considering that today as many as 48,500 are still committed concerning their land, and considering also the age of these veterans. I consider myself as one of the younger veterans, and yet I celebrated my 50th birthday in September 1973.

So, my information is that the present average age of veterans, as described in the original act of 1942, would be 55.

I believe that when I reach 55 I shall probably have behind me a good many of my productive years, and it is not at that age that I shall consider settling down on a farm.

Perhaps you are right. Some of my colleagues say with a smile that I have many more years to go. They are very kind to smile in the expectation that I shall still be here for a few years. It is probably the military service that kept me so young, Mr. Speaker, Nevertheless 55 is not an age to think of going into farming or building a house, because one must not forget that this act was originally meant to help the veteran contribute to the building of his house. At the same time, he was committed to farming some of the time.

In any case he had a commitment. I recall reading this commitment and considering it very seriously. However, I was reviewing that act, Mr. Speaker, at an age when one enters a new career, that is at 24, 25 or 28 years. When I refer to the average age of veterans as being 55, it means that most of them are over 55. I wonder if they are taken in consideration when one asks that the benefits of the legislation be extended beyond March 31, 1974. Those citizens have already had 30 years to consider settling on a piece of land or an adequately large lot to make a living.

I do not know whether I was overly eager to select my profession when I decided not to settle on a farm after my release from the armed forces. Mr. Speaker, I know that many veterans 55 years of age or over are seriously considering farming. However, to draw some allowances under the Veterans' Land Act, veterans must undertake to pay a 25- or a 30-year mortgage. Therefore, if the average age of most veterans is 55 it means that a significant number of them are 60 or over. Is it possible to spend still 25 or 30 years on some land and build a home that late in life?

I have serious reservations about the motion introduced. However, I am keeping an open mind on the possibility of extending the application of the Veterans Land Act.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, if the debate—

● (1550)

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I interrupt the hon. member? As a veteran who is not qualified, I am very interested in the hon. member's remarks. For my edification would he say if he is going to vote for the motion or against it?

Mr. Chrétien: You will see tonight.

Mr. Hees: You guys haven't made up your minds yet.

Mr. Dupras: I fail to see a point of order in the hon. member's remark. I do not want to prejudge your decision, Mr. Speaker, but I fail to see a point of order in the hon. member's presentation. If the hon. member is here long enough today he will find out which way I will vote. Now, with your permission, I would like to pursue my ideas on this matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, before taking a decision, I shall wait for the new ideas which may be voiced during the following debate and which will authorize Parliament to consider seriously the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe.

I have listened carefully to the previous speeches, Mr. Speaker, but none contained challenging thoughts which could stir hon. members. In my opinion, nothing at this time authorizes or prepares me to agree to such an extension and to consider it seriously. The following speeches might bring in new suggestions. In any case, my brothers in arms—

[Mr. Dupras.]

[English]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dupras: With your permission, I will pursue this and then the hon. member can speak afterwards.

[Translation]

Anyhow, Mr. Speaker, I have quite regular contacts with my brothers in arms, since I had the honour of presiding the Veterans Affairs Committee in 1973. I have received a great many comments on benefits, laws, measures which the government has approved in recent years on behalf of veterans.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a brief look at what the government has done about the increase in pensions paid to veterans and their families.

Mr. Speaker, Canada is one of the few countries that still have a Veterans Affairs Department; in fact, in all the main western countries, very few governments have a secretariat, department or ministry of veterans affairs.

Our department is strong, Mr. Speaker. Its budget this year nearly tops $600 million. This very simple fact shows clearly and eloquently the deep concern of the government for veterans affairs.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat that I welcome any action aimed at improving the life conditions of my former brothers in arms. But I would like to see the members for Ottawa, among others, to speak up and present valuable arguments to convince me and my colleagues of the need to maintain these measures concerning veterans affairs.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I take part in this debate on the motion put forward by the Progressive Conservative party.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the act referred to in this motion did not meet the legitimate aspirations of our brave soldiers. Naturally, an ill-conceived act is an obvious reason for nobody wanting to take advantage of it, to the point where Canadian veterans did little or nothing to avail themselves of the act. According to my calculations about 1 per cent of veterans saw fit to do so.

It is also obvious in these times, Mr. Speaker, that an amount of $18,000 is absolutely ridiculous when one considers that, because of taxes on building materials, prohibitive interest rates and inflation, the cost of construction nowadays is clearly too high to provide those brave soldiers with a decent house where they could spend the rest of their lives.

From a practical point of view, the act should be more comprehensive for those brave citizens most of whom gave up the nicer days of their youth and their dearest hopes in the madness of the last two wars.

Yet they had been given high hopes and promised a nice future upon their return. Unfortunately, faced with all sorts of obstacles, rebuffs and misunderstandings, they soon lost their illusions.

Judging from the speeches made by other members it seems there was an oversight in the act to provide those veterans with second mortgages while allowing them to build larger houses to accommodate a tenant in order to help them meet their obligations.

Furthermore, it seems the size of allocated lots was often out of proportion with the bylaws of municipalities or cities where they wanted to settle.

Of course it is quite difficult to draw practical conclusions from this motion since it does not bring anything new and simply perpetuates a situation which is absurd since the provision of the act is ineffective. The best evidence is that hardly one per cent of our veterans have taken advantage of this right.

Our government should certainly act in a more humanitarian way for all those brave citizens who are at grips with hardships resulting from the fact that they wanted to defend our freedoms. We suggest that the application of this legislation should be extended and the act amended to give more discretion and freedom to those concerned with veterans so as to satisfy their claims in the best and quickest way.

Let us not forget that the last amendments to the Veterans Land Act were made over thirty years ago. I believe that in 30 years, an individual or even a government is entitled to change his or its views to meet the requirements of the moment. It is obvious that thirty years ago, the veterans' needs were not the same as today. I think that this government should amend the act, maintain it and extend its application so as to do justice to all these brave soldiers who, as I said earlier, sacrificed their youth to defend our freedoms. We all know that nowadays, like most of our fellow citizens, they have difficulties finding a suitable shelter.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my comments and ask whether it would be possible to preserve the present act and to amend it not so as to spoil our veterans, but in such a way as to be more human towards their claims and to understand that these people have made many sacrifices. Most of them lost their lives on battlefields. I think that at the same time we should have a special thought for veterans' widows and children who often suffer from our lack of gratitude and appreciation.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I hope that every one of us will do his utmost to ensure that the amendment we shall bring to the act will satisfy all Canadian veterans.

● (1600)

[English]

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate to present the views of the 11 Legion branches, and army, navy and air force units in my area. The motion is a short, direct one, simply calling for the extension of the March 31 deadline for the Veterans Land Act.

When beginning these remarks I would like to look back to 1917 when the then Prime Minister of Canada addressed the Canadian forces on the eve of the great battle of Vimy Ridge, during which Canada became a nation and her troops were recognized throughout the world. It was Sir Robert Borden, speaking to the troops on that occasion, who said:

> The government and the country will consider it their first duty to see that a proper appreciation of your effort and your courage is brought to the notice of your people at home.

He ended by saying:

> We will do these things so that no man will have just cause to reproach the government for having broken faith with the men who won and the men who died.

I believe those words, used in that situation, had the impact of a solemn obligation and sacred promise, not only to the veterans of world war I but to those of world war II and of the Korean war. Veterans throughout Canada, and indeed members of this House, are perturbed that the government seems bent on cutting back and ultimately phasing out the Department of Veterans Affairs. It is starting with the Veterans Land Act, and the cutoff date which is being debated today is one of the biggest steps towards the ultimate elimination of the work that act is able to do for the veterans of Canada. As I say, we are disturbed about this and so are the veterans.

The basic argument today is on whether or not to extend that deadline, and from it flows two things. If it is extended, then an extension can be sought of the ceiling with respect to grants given to veterans to build houses or buy property, to make that ceiling more realistic at the present time. The second factor related to this extension governs the lot size stipulated in the act, which is presently half an acre and which, under special conditions, can be reduced by 20 per cent. This could be modified so that veterans could take advantage of the VLA act to purchase city lots.

These two factors are the main reasons that many veterans have not come forward to take up contracts, even if they have been certified as being able to do so. When the minister says that very few veterans have come forward to take advantage of this program it is because of the discouragements and roadblocks that these two factors represent. The failure of the 150,000 veterans who established eligibility to take out loans is the direct result of these two major difficulties.

Pertaining to this date of March 31, 1974, we must remember there was the decision made first establishing a termination date of October 31, 1968 for qualifying for these loans. This date would also have to be altered if we can persuade the government to change the March 31 date. As envisaged, all lending under the VLA act will cease on March 31, 1977. I mention the lot size requirement and the ceiling because these, fundamentally, are tied in with the extension of this deadline.

That veterans are concerned about this issue is shown by correspondence which has come across the desks of all members of parliament. I will read one extract from one letter sent by a veteran who lives in Simcoe, Ontario. Mr. Wilfred Lauzon said in his letter:

> I am a pensioned veteran, drawing a disability pension and also a holder of a VLA contract. I am interested to see the deadline extended beyond the date of March 31/74 . . .

He said that he would like to see the loan ceiling raised as well. He then said that he had talked to other veterans who are interested in seeing the deadline extended, and that they had filled out the questionnaire which was referred to earlier this afternoon by the mover of the motion in his opening remarks. I commend the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) for his speech and for the compelling arguments he raised for extending the deadline.

I think the minister and the officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs have argued on various occasions that we are merely making house lots available to veterans. When the Veterans Land Act was first passed it was meant to provide small holdings for veterans. This was to enable them to become part-time farmers. Some of them, no doubt, became full-time farmers. As I say, that may have been the original intent of the act. Conditions today are materially different from those existing at the time the act was first passed and when men first obtained benefits under it. We are now in a totally different ball game. I do not see any earthly reason why the Veterans Land Act cannot become a vehicle for providing a means of easing the housing shortage which is being felt across this country.

I could say more, but I do not want to repeat what has been said. I will conclude by telling the House why we, on my side, have moved the motion and why we think all members of the House will support it. First, if the deadline is not extended, 100,000 veterans will be denied their rights under the Veterans Land Act. I am speaking of those men who have been certified as eligible for benefits. Second, the act can become an important vehicle for fighting the acute housing shortage in this country. Third, the motion gives an opportunity to all members who so wish to participate in this debate and present arguments which may further convince the minister of the necessity of doing what we propose. Fourth, and equally important, by means of this motion we will strengthen the hand of the minister. Basically, I feel that if the minister alone had the power, he would decide in favour of doing what we ask. I know he has to persuade the other members of the cabinet that this is a good idea. I hope, as a result of our debate today and the arguments which have been and will be advanced, his hand will be strengthened when he is dealing with the other members of the cabinet, so that the government will see there is widespread support for the motion we are now proposing.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, having heard the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I suspect that they are as good as if the government had spoken. I suspect that it will only be a matter of hours before the minister tells the House that he agrees with the motion introduced by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). I cannot bring myself to believe that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would have gone that far out on a limb in expressing his own opinions and risking the defeat of the government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't be too sure.

Mr. Wagner: It is with considerable pride that I participate in this debate. I begin by congratulating the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe for the motion which he introduced earlier.

[Translation]

This motion is put before the House at the right time because it is aimed at getting justice for those who served their country. Personally I have not had the privilege of serving in the armed forces; this is why I try to compensate by serving in politics, although it is perhaps not comparable. I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I often have the opportunity, in my constituency and particularly in Saint-Hyacinthe and Ottoburn Park, to meet members of the Canadian Legion and appreciate what they do in the community and their activities.

• (1620)

I am proud to pay tribute to them in this debate and to underline to what extent their contribution is necessary to the progress of Canadian society.

I take part in the debate at this moment because the most elementary fairness requires the extension of the deadline under the act, in order to enable those who fall under its jurisdiction to defend their rights.

To begin with, Mr. Speaker, it is a question of gratitude from the Canadian people and particularly from parliamentarians towards veterans. We must remember—and not only on Remembrance Day when with much noise and pomp we pay tribute to those who gave their lives and made tremendous sacrifices to protect their country. This memory must be externalized, manifested, translated in to acts and gestures which have significantly more value and meaning than the words that can be said in front of a memorial each year in November.

I recall that I was deeply moved last year when listening in this House to the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe on the 29th anniversary of D Day. We were then paying tribute to our soldiers who took part in the allied landing in Normandy. Veterans remember the events that took place on French beaches 29 years ago and they remember their brothers in arms who fell at their sides, those who were not fortunate enough to come back to Canada and reap the benefits offered by as prosperous and promising a country as ours.

It is significant, Mr. Speaker, that we should have to recall that 29 years ago that crusade was being undertaken in the name of national unity and that nowadays national unity is still the main objective, an issue from one end of this country to another, the objective we are trying to achieve through our speeches as well as our legislative measures. But alas, we do not realize that this country has grown up and that we owe it to thousands of our young fellow citizens, including a good many—and I am privileged to sit next to them—who are members in this House. As volunteers in 1939 and 1945 they went to fight for their country to protect Canada and the free world against other nations' voracity and thirst for power. They fought together irrespective of race, religion, colour or origin. They fought together as Canadian citizens.

Mr. Speaker, we can keep on building a still more splendid country if we take the trouble to look back on the past and draw our inspiration from that spirit of comradeship created among our veterans through the suffering they shared on battle fields, a comradeship that will stay at the bottom of their heart for the rest of their life. We must think of that today. We must remember those fellow citizens of ours who lie in a foreign land because they performed their duty.

We must remember those veterans who came back after carrying out their duties, crippled or disabled, and who defend upon help. We must not forget our responsibilities to those veterans who have fought for our freedom to govern and build a proud, prosperous and peace-loving Canada where Canadians can hopefully live in a climate of unity.

However, Mr. Speaker, it is more than a spirit of remembrance or a feeling of gratitude which compels me to take part in this debate. It is also a sense of justice towards our veterans who are entitled to proper living conditions and accommodations and, like any other Canadian, to the benefits provided for them in the legislation.

I am aware that the department concerned tried to explain why such a large number of veterans did not ask for these benefits, indicating that they had merely asked for eligibility certificate before October 1968, in case they should want to apply for a loan later.

Mr. Speaker, there may very well be some cases of that type but judging by the number of letters and complaints addressed to us, and I know that all members could say the same, the Veterans Land Act is still behind the times and not in keeping with the present conditions, in spite of numerous amendments made over the years.

Let us go quickly into the matter a little deeper without any claim to expertise on my part for the reasons that I gave from the outset. For instance, under the provisions of Part II of the Veterans Land Act, veterans may borrow up to $18,000.

We know, Mr. Speaker, that it is impossible to build a house for $18,000. One can hardly have a basement built for this amount. If the act had been amended so as to keep up with inflationary costs, thousands of veterans would be now taking advantage of their rights.

But there is an even more serious limitation and it is that related to the lot, namely the requirement for half an acre. In some cases, this figure can be reduced by 20 per cent. As everyone knows, Mr. Speaker, when planning to build a house—veterans are not alone in this situation; it is the same for all Canadians—the price of lots is so high today that it is impossible for a man to provide a house for his family.

In this area, the government has unfortunately been unable to adjust to the situation, and this at the expense of veterans. As concerns the deadline of October 1, 1968, for housing, it is difficult for me to understand the uncompromising attitude of the department in stating that every veteran had the opportunity to apply before that date. The minister is well aware that many veterans did not know about the deadline for reasons beyond their control and now have their rights denied under this charge. This is true even though the minister pretends that everyone was aware of the situation. If there ever was a time when it became imperative to put off the deadline for housing entitlement, it is right now when the housing shortage has never been so critical in Canada. Despite all its improvements the National Housing Act today cannot meet the needs of low-income people. Under the Veterans Land Act we are in a position to cope with the needs of thousands of Canadian veterans to whom the government has made a pledge years ago when the prime minister of the day stated in 1917—a long time ago, Mr. Speaker—that no Canadian would ever say that the government was not honouring its obligation towards the veterans who had served their country.

Today, we may wonder whether the government is not repudiating the undertaking pledged in 1917? Is it being ignored? If they want to, the government can remove the deadline, for there are still a few days left until March 31.

In the light of all the speeches delivered in this House and the fact that hon. members have expressed their unanimous wish that it be done, the government would be justified in removing this deadline by means of a piece of legislation that could be introduced within a few days. The loan ceiling could be raised and the requirements relating to land could be watered down. The government could also remove all restrictions with regard to deadlines. I am sure this position is appreciated by the minister for whom we have the greatest respect since we consider him as one of our great heroes, one of the most distinguished citizens of Canada. I am sure he will understand why we so earnestly want valiant veterans like him to be able today to count on the generosity and the sense of justice of the government toward them.

Mr. Speaker, mine is a very modest voice you have just heard. I trust the minister will hear our plea, and the government act towards the veterans as they did for the government, in a spirit of utmost generosity.

Mr. Béchard: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Wagner: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Béchard: The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, in his peroration, wondered a while ago whether this government, by respecting the March 31, 1974 limit, was going to go back on the promises made by the Canadian government in 1917.

Here is my question: Does he consider that the Progressive Conservative government of 1958 to 1963 was reneging on the commitments of the Canadian government when, in 1959, it set, for the first time, the time limit to September 30, 1962?

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, that question coming from the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine does not surprise me. As for me, in my speech, I tried to avoid petty politics because I consider the subject too important to all Canadians for anyone to discuss it with a narrow-minded and biased attitude—

[English]

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, it is naturally with considerable trepidation that I enter this debate. There are many in the House who had the honour to serve their country in the armed forces during the war. There are others of us who were of too tender an age to be eligible for service, and who have enjoyed the luxury of being defended by those gallant troops without ever having to don uniforms ourselves.

I suppose it can be said, quite rightly, that only those who endured that struggle can understand the nature and extent of the sacrifice entailed by those who left their families and their homes, those who answered the call to combat in the service of their country, particularly in a war which initially was not of our own making but rather, a summons to defend our allies, which probably makes the sacrifice even more acute.

It is with this mind that I take part in the debate. While I defer to those who actually saw service, I have always been extremely conscious of the fact that I was able to grow up free of fear and danger because of the tremendous sacrifice made by those who did answer the call. To them, I, and members of my family, owe a debt of gratitude which we can never repay, and which no government can repay, notwithstanding whatever generosity we may show to these veterans.

I trust hon. members will bear this in mind when I say the reason I enter into this debate is that I believe the use of the motion before us, presented and worded as it is, on an opposition day, after we have just concluded eight days of debate on the Speech from the Throne, during which the opposition had any number of opportunities to discuss whatever subject it wanted to discuss—indeed, the minister was a participant in that debate, and the question could have been raised at that time—

An hon. Member: You are wasting time.

Mr. Jerome: Bearing in mind, too, that the estimates of the department will be before the standing committee later this week and next week, at which time all members would have an opportunity to appear—

Mr. Alexander: You are wasting time.

Mr. Jerome: In answer to the catcalls from across the way, I say the reason you should listen with a little shame to what I have to say is obvious. The use of a motion worded in this way does nothing more than justify the worst fears and the worst criticisms expressed by members of the public who come to watch the proceedings of this House. It turns this chamber into nothing more than a playground for political games.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is sufficiently aware of the rules to know he is not allowed to make comments of that kind particularly in the light of the fact that he, together with members of his party on November 9, 1973, voted unanimously against a motion of this kind. That is why we were compelled to take the action we have taken today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jerome: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) knows perfectly well why he raised that point of order. It was in response to the fact that we have struck a sensitive nerve. It is as simple as that. The motion before us amounts to a motion of non-confidence in the government. This afternoon the House has to consider whether the country ought to be deprived of a parliament, whether the government should fall and an election be held to constitute a new parliament. What are the terms of the motion which would bring all this about? They are that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) ought to give consideration to extending the March 31 deadline.

There is not a member opposite who seriously believes that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has not, in fact, been giving active consideration to this question every day, and that he will not continue to do so. Is it seriously pretended that the effect of this motion, if passed, would be that the minister would begin to consider this question? Is it being advanced, in short, as a serious motion?

An hon. Member: Get to the point!

Mr. Jerome: My point is that there can be only one purpose for such a motion as this. Not long ago, a motion was put forward by the New Democrats under Standing Order 43 asking the minister to consider extending this deadline. The wording of that motion was almost identical to that of the motion now before us. The House knows that it is the habit of the government to refuse such motions, not on the ground of their merits or demerits but because of a procedural difficulty. If they were accepted the business arranged for the House would have to be set aside.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Nonsense!

Mr. Jerome: For that reason, motions under Standing Order 43 are usually turned down by this side of the House. It is only the most exceptional motion which receives unanimous consent. And this was one of them. Yet notwithstanding all this, the official opposition has put forward the motion that consideration should be given by the minister to the question of this deadline. What is the real reason behind it? Is it concern for the veterans, a genuine concern for their well-being? Not for one moment. The real reason is to try to trap the New Democrats on the basis of the motion put forward earlier by that party so that the opposition can go to the electorate in an attempt to take office, something they have been trying to do ever since they got here. They will never succeed in doing it by this kind of cheap political sham.

• (1640)

Mr. Nielsen: How are you going to vote?

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, the reason that—

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting here and becoming impatient as the minutes have passed. I thought that this was a very important and serious debate concerning the veterans of this country, but if my memory serves me correctly the hon. member has not mentioned the veterans at all. All he is attempting to do is to chastise the opposition for doing what they have every right to do on an opposition day.

I hope that the hon. member, for whom I have a great deal of respect, will discontinue his senseless, partisan remarks and get down to the meat of the motion, which is calling for an extension of the March 31 deadline. I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member, for whom, as I have said, I have a great deal of respect, has not addressed himself to this motion in any respect at all. If we are to have some sort of order in this chamber I think it is high time, with respect, that Your Honour intervened and put the hon. member back on the right path.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has raised a point that is properly raised by way of debate but not properly raised by way of a point of order. There will be ample opportunity for some kind of response to be made, if response is felt to be necessary, to his remarks. The hon. member for Sudbury has been speaking within the rules of order. The hon. member for Sudbury has the floor.

Mr. Jerome: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: Get down to something relevant.

Mr. Jerome: The relevance relates to the comment that brought the hon. member to his feet. He knew very well that he was not raising a point of order but a point of debate. He will have his chance to get into the debate, as will his colleagues. The politics of this matter are more than relevant, I think, because it has been a very rare occasion, as I understand it, in the history of the House when veterans affairs—as a matter of fact, I am informed there is almost no precedent for this—has been used in the political way it has been used today. I think that that is a valid comment and that it should be made.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, what I think the hon. member is doing is casting personal reflections on the characters of members of this House who are veterans, and this includes myself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Neither I nor any other veteran on this side of the House is going to listen to that kind of canard. The veterans on this side feel the hon. member is making a personal reflection on their own characters and they categorically deny the insinuations of the hon. member, who is the first hon. member in this debate to have injected this kind of disgusting flavour to the debate.

Mr. Jerome: I do not care if I am the first speaker to inject this note into the debate, Mr. Speaker. The facts are right in front of me and I cannot ignore them. I think we should know what the facts are if we are going to hear all these comments.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, you did not rule on the question of privilege that I raised. The hon. member has compounded the error of his ways by asserting that we veteran members on this side are associated with political motivation in the bringing of this motion. I submit that that is a personal reflection on veterans on this side of the House and I would ask you, sir, to direct the hon. member to desist. It is most undesirable to inject this kind of attitude into this debate, and it should not be done.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair realizes that the subject of the debate this afternoon is going to be one that will generate some considerable heat, but there will be opportunities for members on all sides to express their points of view. I think it has been the accepted practice in the House that a member can, in a general way, try to determine why certain motions, certain legislation, certain spending programs, all of the items that we as parliamentarians consider in this chamber, are being presented to us. I appreciate there is considerable emotion in the debate, but, as I say, there will be an opportunity for each side to have its say in the matter.

When the hon. member for Sudbury has completed his remarks, his point of view may be met with equally strong vigour by some other member. I cannot find that the hon. member has raised a question of privilege or that I should make any direction to the hon. member for Sudbury.

Mr. Jerome: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for your ruling. It is true that we sit in this chamber as elected members of the House without regard for our personal backgrounds, our race, religion, creed, colour or otherwise. We are all equal members of the House and entitled to comment. I have specifically tried to set out the fact that I recognize that a debt of gratitude is due those who did don uniform—I am one of those who did not—for enabling us to raise our families in peace in this country through the service they rendered.

The nature of the legislation relating to the Department of Veterans Affairs, and specifically the Veterans Land Act, the re-establishment program, the program of educational credits extended to veterans and so on, is well known and understood, I believe, by all Canadians. When men are in the trenches we cannot compensate them with dollars and cents or with paying them an hourly wage, so the least we can do for them is to offer them some programs when they come home that will enable them to become re-established in society. Many thousands of veterans took advantage of the re-establishment programs, the educational retraining program and many other programs. In addition, they also took advantage of the benefits conferred under the Veterans Land Act, which recognized that we owed it to the veterans, as a prior right, to assist them with our tax dollars to establish a homestead.

Even the veterans pensions are based on a different premise from other pension legislation. Veterans pensions are quite different from any other kind of social welfare legislation that we have, and are in repayment of a debt of gratitude that we can never adequately repay. I think the nature and background of that legislation is very well and very widely understood. Bearing that in mind, I think we must accept the fact that the intent of the legislation which in 1968 put a deadline on the Veterans Land Act, legislation which was fully debated in this House at the time, was legislation that was also well understood. Some 25 years had elapsed since the end of the war, and most of the veterans who were to take advantage of the legislation had probably opted for it by that time. It seemed that in the interests of fiscal orderliness, to say the least, the time had come when we should look to a date when the books could be closed.

As I say, this proposal was put forward in the House in 1968 and was widely debated. There was no opposition in principle at that time to the concept that the books should be brought to a close in a reasonable and orderly way so that the country could understand just what the outstanding obligation was, and what were its dimensions. Thus, the program was entered into and veterans were invited to enrol and to qualify themselves for a certificate entitling them to any benefits that were outstanding. The program was well advertised and information about it was widely distributed in the press and through the radio. There was a high level of understanding throughout the country in 1968 of this deadline date. Any veterans organization today would be able to verify that. The veterans were made very well aware of the importance of that qualifying date, and it was advertised far enough in advance. Again, I suggest that the spirit of that legislation was not challenged.

What then is the nature of the problem today? The nature of the problem is that in spite of understanding the nature of veterans benefit legislation and recognizing its merits, and also recognizing the wisdom of endeavouring at one point in our history to close the books on the benefits to World War II veterans, we have arrived at a stage today where, perhaps in isolated instances, there may be hardships to veterans. I speak with some personal knowledge of that because I can tell you there are a number of veterans in Sudbury, whom I represent, who found themselves in 1968 living in company houses owned by the International Nickel Company or Falconbridge Nickel Mines. They knew that as long as they worked for these companies they could continue to rent these houses at very reasonable rates, but never for one moment did they visualize that these houses would be offered to them for sale or, if the houses were offered for sale, that the Veterans Land Act would be of any benefit to them. Perhaps this was because the houses are very small on very small lots and would never have qualified under the program in any case.

However, both situations have changed. Therefore, there are a number of veterans about whom I have been making representations to the minister, and about whom I intend to continue to make representations, who have found themselves in a difficult position. Knowing in 1968, and I think this is the key, that a deadline had been set beyond which the provisions of the legislation would not be applicable, they did not apply for their certificates of qualification because they could not visualize these circumstances which have changed so drastically in the intervening five years. If these veterans, some 70 or 80 of them in Sudbury, could not visualize these changed circumstances in that rather short period of time, then is it not perfectly understandable that the drafters of this legislation could not envisage these changed circumstances?

Is it not, therefore, understandable that a law which was properly conceived, debated and enacted containing a deadline which was properly advertised and under which every veteran was given a proper opportunity to qualify, may yet, despite every precaution, cause some veterans to regret today the fact they did not apply for certificates of qualification? There are others, of course, who did apply who find themselves in a position where they cannot make application by March 31 for a specific piece of property, which is what the deadline requires.

We are dealing with a small number of people and, indeed, a different kind of situation from that of the hardship which might exist under a piece of social legislation. If there is any hardship at all to the veteran and any way to counteract it to help those veterans who served this country, by somehow extending the provisions of this act or simply through straightforward generosity under a new piece of legislation, I am sure every member on both sides of this House would want to see to it that this is done.

I know the minister, whose record of service during the war is almost legend, which I think can be challenged by no one either inside or outside this House, is one who is keenly aware of the situation. Be that as it may, the circumstances surrounding the introduction of this legislation in 1968, which imposes this March 31 deadline, made it good legislation. The reason I entered this debate was to say that if circumstances come to light which indicate that a single veteran has been aggrieved, even though that may be the result of his own actions, we have to recognize that we can never adequately repay him. If there is any way that the Cabinet can be persuaded at any time to somehow extend to that veteran some kind of a privilege, whether by new legislation or by interpretation of the old legislation, that is something we must always do.

Be that as it may, we do have to proceed in an orderly way to keep the books in respect of the extended dimensions of these applications so that we can run this department in an orderly way. I am about to conclude now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, and I have given him extra time because of certain interventions, but his time really has expired. Unless there is unanimous consent I must recognize another hon. member.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimity.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I was quite amazed when listening to the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome), who has just resumed his place, at the vehement manner in which he attacked the very straightforward and simple resolution before the House this afternoon. As I understand it, the purpose of this motion is to guarantee the rights to at least 100,000 veterans in Canada who will be denied them unless prompt and emergent action is taken to extend the deadline under the Veterans Land Act, which is to be phased out on March 31, just some two weeks away.

This motion has been put forward, as demonstrated by other speakers this afternoon, because there was a unanimous agreement in the House to a motion under Standing Order 43 that the government take action to this effect. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr.

Knowles) praised the official opposition for bringing this motion before the House this afternoon. Therefore, I find it incomprehensible that the hon. member for Sudbury should impute political motives.

Surely it is not playing politics to express a desire on the part of members, particularly those who are veterans, that veterans' rights should be extended as expressed by a unanimous decision last November. That was not only the will of parliament, I am sure it was and is the will of the people of Canada. I say that because during my experience in the House of Commons the veterans charter is one piece of legislation that has received unanimous support from all sides of the House. I do not think it is stretching the imagination too far to suggest that the veterans' charter is regarded almost with the same sanctity as the Magna Carta in another context.

It has been my experience with successive governments that they have not only honoured the letter of the law as it was laid down under the veterans' charter, but have gone out of their way to make certain that the charter should also embrace the spirit of the law. Therefore, it is passing strange to me that we should find it necessary as members of parliament to force this government for the first time into action in this regard.

The purpose of the motion this afternoon is to force the government into action in respect of extending this legislation. In my experience, which now covers several governments since 1951, this is the first time that pressure of this kind has been necessary to get government action. I know that hon. members will stand in their places and praise the contributions of the men who served in World War II and during the Korean conflict which has added so much to the greatness of this nation. Some government spokesmen have already indicated the improvements which have been made to the veterans charter by this present administration, but I should point out that those improvements were again made under pressure.

Hitherto governments have always automatically reviewed the veterans charter in order to bring it up to date and meet changing circumstances. I think the main point behind this motion this afternoon is to indicate to the government that we feel the time has come to make a further change in the Veterans Land Act so as to bring it into line with the drastic change which has taken place, for example, in the housing situation in this country. Who could have anticipated five years ago that the cost of housing would be such that it would be prohibitive not only for veterans but for almost every other category of Canadian to have suitable housing over their heads? This is why pressure has been brought to bear in this country and in the Parliament of Canada to get the government to recognize that this change has occurred. It would appear there is unanimous support for this motion at least on this side of the House. I am hopeful that there will be the same unanimity on the government side of the House before this debate is concluded.

The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras) suggested that the amendment was unnecessary because veterans are getting older. We are already age 55 and above. I was surprised that the minister in his speech in the House on March 7 took somewhat the same line when he emphasized that the need for the rehabilitation of our veteran population has now passed. I suggest this is the sort of attitude that has downgraded the benefit of doubt clause which is one of the basic rights of veterans of Canada.

In addition to discussion on the matter of extending the VLA deadline beyond March 31 of this year from time to time we hear the suggestion mentioned in this House that there is a backlog of pension applications amounting to 9,000 or 10,000. This is because the government does not give the benefit of doubt automatically to the veteran. This benefit of doubt has been one of the major rights and privileges of the veterans of Canada.

I suggest too, that to say that the need for continuing the rehabilitation program for veterans has now passed is flying in the face of the spirit of the War Veterans Allowance Act, known as the "burnt out pension". This was not contained in the original veterans charter. It came into being because it was recognized that the veterans of Canada who had served in the front line trenches and had suffered the hardships of front-line service as a result of premature aging were suffering from disabilities which were not obvious in terms of specific injury incurred in service.

This legislation was brought in to ensure that no veteran who had served his country with distinction would be denied the sustenance of life. This is the reason Parliament enacted the War Veterans Allowance Act. I suggest the same spirit is being extended under the motion we are debating here this afternoon. I do not doubt that the minister is in support of this measure. I am waiting anxiously to hear him speak in this debate. He was half-way to his feet a short time ago. I do not know why he has hesitated to take the floor. I wish he had spoken before the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) introduced the political overtones into the debate this afternoon. I am hoping that the minister who is a distinguished veteran will speak on behalf of the government this afternoon and indicate that this also is the viewpoint of the government. This is the only interpretation we can get from the unanimous vote of last November under Standing Order 43. Obviously the minister is having difficulty persuading his colleagues on this point. There are not too many of them in the House this afternoon which indicates there is not a profound interest in that fundamental right of the veterans in this regard.

I say to the minister that when one looks at the cost of a program of this kind and places it alongside the astronomical expenditures contained in the budget of the government one sees that this is indeed a small expenditure. Why should the program be phased out now? There is a housing shortage. There is inflation and there are rising costs. Rather than phasing out this program I would suggest to the government and the minister that they should be going through the procedure that has always been the practice of government of amending the Veterans Land Act in order to bring it in line with the present economic and financial circumstances which prevail in Canada. Basic to this and because the deadline is imminent should be the renewal of the 1968 and 1974 deadlines. We might even introduce a measure, because of the present crisis in housing, to provide for the rehabilitation of existing veterans' homes to make sure that the veterans are adequately housed in the face of exorbitantly rising costs. Obviously there should be an increased ceiling because there has been no change in that regard in almost a decade.

The regulations in respect of a lot should be made compatible with the regulations of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Instead of moving in to restrict the rights of the veterans in this regard the government and the minister should be making the changes some of which I have suggested this afternoon. What is happening in respect of some 150,000 veterans who have not taken advantage of the Veterans Land Act? They are forced into panic buying under coercion as a result of the deadline. This is one of the points that is made in the letters I receive. The suggestion is made that the veterans will become involved in binding financial obligations which rather than being of assistance will result in a financial albatross around their necks because they are being panicked into making a decision because of the deadline that is being imposed. The "old sweats" are reaching retirement age. The hon. member for Labelle pointed this out. Why should they be denied the right to have a home in their declining years? This was one of the purposes of the Veterans Land Act. While they may not return to the farm and become full-time farmers or perhaps even farmers occupying a small farm holding, I am sure hon. members will agree that the need for housing has increased manifold because of the housing crisis which is all too obvious today.

One hon. member directed a question to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) concerning changes made in 1959 by another government. That was in line with the necessity to streamline the legislation because it was realized that the demand in respect of the VLA provisions concerning farming and small farm holdings was lessening as the veteran population became older. But at the time those amendments were made, it was recognized that there was a need for housing facilities and accommodation and for lots that would make it possible for the veterans to be adequately housed in their declining years. There was a unanimous vote under Standing Order 43. Parliament has expressed its will. The people of Canada will express their will in no uncertain terms on this matter unless the government is inclined to accept the motion that is before the House today.

● (1710)

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to participate in this debate I must say I welcome the opportunity and I want to state at the start that I feel for, and understand the needs of, veterans as well as anyone in the House or outside of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I certainly do not intend to turn a deaf ear to the veterans, neither do I intend to take second place to anyone in looking after the needs of veterans. I have spent my last year as minister and a portion of the previous one with veterans, dealing with them. I think this House and this country are well aware of some of the many measures that were implemented and put in place in that time.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): One of the many things I have done was to visit the war graves of our dead in Europe and to contact many of their loved ones, the survivors in this country. This brought back vividly to me the sufferings and the trials that those veterans of ours, ladies and gentlemen, did suffer a good number of years ago.

The motion before the House today asks that the government consider the possibility of extending the March 31 deadline for qualified veterans to apply under the Veterans Land Act. In case there should be any doubt left in somebody's mind, I wish to emphasize at the outset that I am quite prepared to give such an undertaking right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Is that just to consider it?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): For many months now, together with the officials of my department, I have studied very closely the possible implications of such an extension. I can assure you that, although, as I stated in the House last week, I carefully considered all relevant representations and data including that provided by the Royal Canadian Legion, nevertheless I wish to further emphasize that I am quite prepared to take another look at this whole question in light of the plea made today. If, after looking at all the evidence, I can conclude that the deadline should be extended, then I would be prepared to so recommend.

In my remarks in the House last week, I pointed out many of the advantages that the VLA program had provided to veterans since the end of world war II. I do not think it is necessary for me today to repeat those facts and those arguments. Many of them have been reiterated already.

However, I wish to point out to all hon. members that since becoming Minister of Veterans Affairs over a year ago, I have made it quite clear to all veterans across this country that I was their representative in the federal government and that I intended to speak on their behalf and in their best interest. I certainly intend to continue to live up to that commitment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Those of us who came back after world war II, and who needed some help to get re-established in civilian life, were quite fortunate in obtaining such assistance from the Canadian government. It has been made abundantly clear on many occasions that the federal government does intend to live up to the commitment it made to those who went overseas to fight in the defence of freedom. As Minister of Veterans Affairs, and as a veteran, I wish to assure hon. members as well as my comrades across this country that this government intends to continue to live up to its commitments to all veterans.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): There is one further point I should like to make. Although the motion now under consideration refers only to the Veterans Land Act, it could be read as suggesting that the government's concern for veterans is lessening. If any hon members read any such implication into the motion, let me assure them that it is wide of the mark. In my speech in the House last Thursday I mentioned that Bill C-148, passed last March, authorized a 25 per cent increase in war veterans allowance rates and ceilings for single recipients and a 28 per cent increase for the married recipients. In addition, Bill C-202, passed last June, provided an increase of 24 per cent in basic rates under the Pension Act. Let me also remind honorable members that the recently tabled estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs for 1974-75 amounts to $597 million as compared with $480 million in the main estimates for the current year. This indicates clearly that the government's commitment to veterans is not reducing but is growing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Since this motion has been brought forward, I am certainly glad to listen to the discussions today. In the light of these discussions, I will be happy to consider the whole matter again and to make a recommendation to the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, as a predecessor of the minister in the important post of veterans affairs, albeit it was a very short period for me 12 years ago, I want to say first of all that no side of this House can claim a monopoly on concern for servicemen. All I will say at the start is that today there are far less ex-servicemen in this House than there were, say, 10 years ago. The calendar took care of that. However, I make nothing of that, with the exception—and I am sure I am joined here by the minister—that there are members in the House who, when this legislation was brought into effect, were but a gleam in their father's eye, while others as very young members of veterans families were housed or taken care of under the Veterans Land Act in its early years. To that extent I think they have the same sort of obligation and concern about the whole subject. I regret that we have had to take the step of using an opposition day provided for by the rules under which there is to be a vote because of the urgency of the March 31 next deadline.

● (1720)

There are 14 working days left before the expiry of this deadline which says that veterans, qualified by notice in 1968, must complete their applications. That is to say, in many instances they must have title to the land in their hands before they can complete their applications. Unfortunately, I have heard reports from some of them that they are finding an extraordinary working-to-rule in some VLA offices with regard to this matter. I hope those reports are wrong, because I think this House would severely castigate any officials of VLA who in any way dragged their feet in order to have this deadline pass and applications thus disqualified.

As I say, I hope those reports are wrong, but I have heard them. They are in the minds of many veterans. I have had telephone call about these reports.

An hon. Member: How many, Marcel?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have had at least half a dozen call me, and that was in the last few weeks. I have done my best to allay their fears because that has not been my experience with VLA officials. I know a lot of them, and I believe they would be the last ones to do that. But somehow this impression has gotten out. There is this difficulty.

The minister says that he promises to consider the matter. Gracious me, Mr. Speaker, I could send him a letter every day, repeating the letters I have sent him over the past year and a half on this subject, and he would still be considering it. That would not do a damned thing for a veteran who was otherwise qualified. I regret I must say to the minister that I think his words this afternoon were empty in so far as they were directed to the purpose of this motion. This motion says—

Mr. Lewis: It asks for consideration. Read the motion.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West):

This House regrets that the government has not extended . . . and calls upon the government . . . to take immediate steps—

I mean:

—to consider taking immediate steps—

Mr. Lewis: To consider taking immediate steps!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): All right, but the minister has not given that undertaking. This was not in keeping with the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Railton: The minister has considered it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister regrets, too, that the extension has not been given.

Mr. Railton: Read his speech again.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If you want consideration I will put on the record a letter written to me by the minister on January 17, in which he puts this aside again.

Mr. Railton: This is March 12.

Mr. Dinsdale: And no action.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Is this the conversion of Saul on the road to Damascus, I ask the hon. and gallant member for Welland (Mr. Railton)?

Mr. Railton: I saw a great light. It's too bad you couldn't see it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is remarkable. We are now going to get a conversion. I am not going to be satisfied with the minister on April 1 when he may be able to stand up here and say, "April fool. I have considered it, and I do not wish to extend the deadline."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I would just like to ask the member a question. He is quoting letters I wrote before I made my statement in the House. I say to him: Sir, if you with your experience in the House cannot quote something better than "April fool" then I suggest you had better smarten up.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I really appreciate the minister's point of order. Here is his letter of January 17, addressed to me:

I refer to your letter to me of December 4, 1973, in which you requested that further consideration be given to extending the March 31, 1974 deadline for veterans to apply for establishment under the Veterans Land Act.

Similar representations were made by Mr. Jack Marshall, M.P., in the House on November 6 and December 4, 1973. I assure you my reply on each occasion reflected the conclusion reached after giving careful consideration to the matter—and I believe there is little to add to my remarks reported, respectively, at pages 7605 and 8423 of Hansard.

I think it is inevitable that, with respect to any terminal date, there will always be some who will find it inconvenient or impractical. We are dealing here, however, with a land settlement program which, like the other two measures that were alternative to it, was intended to assist in the rehabilitation of veterans following the completion of wartime active service rather than on retirement from post-war occupations or careers.

By March 31 next almost thirty years will have elapsed since the end of World War II. Relating this period to the intent and purpose of the act, and having regard for the arrangements that have been in effect for a number of years to facilitate the establishment of veterans still serving in the forces, I cannot help but feel that all veterans interested in land settlement assistance have had ample time in which to apply.

I appreciate your interest in this matter and regret that I am not convinced the deadlines established by Parliament nine years ago for phasing out VLA lending operations in a reasonable manner warrant alteration today.

That was less than two months ago. I have other letters from the minister's predecessor which are to the same effect, and which indicate that there has been a hardened attitude in the department, indicating that there will not be any budging on this point.

I have heard similar undertakings regarding further consideration with respect to non-resident war veterans and the war veterans allowance. The government was going to give consideration to them, serious and favourable consideration, year after year. Where are those men today? They are in the same position they were in three and four years ago. That is how much flexibility there is with respect to this matter. It hurts me to say this.

An hon. Member: You are bleeding.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member says I am bleeding. When we are talking about veterans affairs let us consider what the veteran did. I am no professional veteran, Mr. Speaker, but some people seem to have forgotten, if they ever knew, that there is an undertaking, and it is not a terminal undertaking.

There is no terminal undertaking about the rehabilitation of a veteran, whether it be five years or ten years. The 22 year old veteran parachuter in Korea—where is he today? He still has years of service left in Canada's armed forces. Is it the thought that those men should have gotten out of the forces? My God, if those veterans of World War II and Korea had gotten out of the armed forces we would perhaps have a bare 30,000 men today, and I am not sure that that might not meet the approval of some hon. members opposite.

The fact remains that those men have as much entitlement as I have, or had. They have as much entitlement as any other man who was qualified fully for entitlement. They did not put any terminal date on service to their country. They did not put a terminal date on their exposure to danger on behalf of their country. Why should we? Why should this be done for administrative and tidying-up reasons? We are told that this is a phasing-out program. It did not change ceilings on mortgages. We are completely unrealistic today in asking a veteran in an urban community to buy half an acre of land. What silly, damn-fool nonsense is that? Land values being what they are, most veterans cannot even begin to make the down payment on land today.

Incidentally, there are close to 100,000 men who were qualified in 1968. Their applications have to be approved or not as of March 31, 1974, and they may not qualify. There can be no mortgage disbursements beyond 1977, but there are scores and scores of veterans who will not come out of the service until 1976 or 1977. Who among us will tell a man who was 22 or 23 when he was in Korea, "I am sorry, but Canada's undertaking to you has been statute-barred. We have barred, by the statute of limitations, your entitlement which was unrestricted as declared because you served your country. We are now going to impose this statute of limitations"? All I can say to such a suggestion, Mr. Speaker, is "Shame". There is not one administrative argument that is valid, even if only a dozen men have entitlement.

I know what government administration is involved. I have been around here for a long time. But, Mr. Speaker, consider the rights of these men. Should we in the first instance have told them, "You are subject to limited gratitude, with a time expiry, and even though you have served your country with continuous service we are going to deprive you of those rights"? There is no way I can accept that and there is no way the great majority of Canadians will accept it.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was eloquent in outlining the undertaking. Other hon. members have read it into the record. The Canadian Corps, the Royal Canadian Legion, countless letters that members receive, as well as veterans who have made personal representations, all say that this deadline should be extended. I would have hoped that we could go much further. Certainly, I intend to go much further. I do not intend to desist from asking that mortgage ceilings be raised. That will not cost the government one jot or tittle. I will ask that the maximum with regard to land values be changed and that all the restrictions which apply at present be looked at, so we can give to those men who have entitlement benefits which are in proportion to those they received originally.

We know that part of the VLA was designed to provide housing for servicemen when housing was very tough to get. In many instances it was non-existent after the war.

Where is it today? As far as many of them are concerned, it is non-existent. Physically it may be there, but financially it is not. Is this to be Marie Antoinette's cake which they are to eat instead of bread? That shows, I think, what is wrong and why this program has to be updated. It may cost us a few dollars. Certainly the increase in mortgages and the restrictions with regard to the increase will need to be dealt with so that a mortgage is within reach of the veteran. The veteran is going to repay this money: it will not cost the Crown anything. There is not one iota of gain in this so far as the veteran is concerned. So why do we not go ahead and let the veteran who wants to, and who may be able to, avail himself of what is his entitlement and right?

Today there are sergeants, sergeant-majors, captains and majors who started out as troopers or aircraftsmen. Quite a few of them have worked their way up and been promoted. They have given their lives to the service of their country. Many of them saw war service which entitles them to benefits under the Veterans Land Act. Are they to be deprived merely because somebody says, "But it is 30 years since the end of the war"? What have these men been doing in the interval? Have they been on a free ride? Not very likely. And what about service wives and families who are posted every three years and live in PMQ's, or on the economy as it is euphemistically called. They have had hard, tough lives and have never been able to say, "This is my home." Now we are turning around and telling many of them, "You cannot now have a home." That is the effect of the government's action, Mr. Speaker. I hope the minister reads my speech.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I will read it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I think I have argued sufficiently as to why this change should not be effected. The minister is a veteran and I think he recognizes that what we have said is right. What we must do is convince his fellow cabinet members. There is where some of the difficulties lie. They do not understand the problem as the minister does.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member thanks me for reminding him that his time has expired. He may continue if he has the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, listening to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) made me wonder whether he had read with care the motion put forward earlier today and debated so cogently by spokesmen of his party. The motion reads:

> This House regrets that the government has not extended the March 31, 1974, deadline under the Veterans Land Act and calls upon the government to consider taking immediate steps to extend this deadline.

The minister—I think this must be said in all candour—has changed his mind. On Thursday in this House, when speaking in the throne speech debate, he indicated that having given the matter some consideration he had reached the conclusion that the course of action requested by members of all parties should not be followed. I stress that members of all parties put forward these views, because some partisan speeches have just been made. I am thinking of the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) and the hon. member for Edmonton West, who indulged in what I regard under the circumstances as unnecessary, partisan rhetoric.

In any case, last week the minister concluded that he could not grant the extension which many members in all parties desired. He has come forward today and has candidly said he has listened to the voices from both sides of the House who have urged that the government reconsider its position. He made an unequivocal commitment today that the government will make such a reconsideration. One of the fundamental principles of parliamentary democracy is to be able to achieve the kind of situation we have achieved today, namely, if the members of the House of Commons exercise through their voting power, behind which lies reason, a change or shift in government direction, that is what parliamentary democracy is supposed to be all about.

I say quite frankly that my party has been able to support the present government on a number of specific decisions precisely because they have been prepared to move from one position one day to another position some time later.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I hear the Conservative members to my right laughing at that. I take this seriously; I do not think it is a laughing matter. If they or, indeed, my party were in a minority government position I would hope we would have just as responsible a government.

Instead of chastising the minister as the hon. member for Edmonton West has just done, for doing what the mover of the motion, his party and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in whose words the original motion was put last November and duplicated today, have urged we should make the gesture of saying the government has seen some wisdom. In other debates not long ago the Conservative Party said the government was adopting many of their party's policies. They should be pleased with this kind of shift, rather than condemning the government.

Some members of my party are in veterans' organizations; some are not. Basically, that is irrelevant. The important question is whether we have a commitment to do justice to the men and women who served in our armed services. Many members of my party, as well as members of other parties, have made representations to the minister to not only extend the Veterans Land Act for a limited period of time but to extend it indefinitely. I will speak very briefly on that subject. What was good for men and women who risked their lives in battle in order to preserve the integrity of our nation should be offered to them for the rest of their lives. They should receive the benefits provided by this legislation. There is no principle for setting a terminal date on this legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: If it was deserved for serving in action or for risking their lives—if indeed it was given for that reason—it is not something the government of Canada should withdraw after so many years. Indeed, it is something that should remain with the veterans all their lives.

My second point is that there is need for improvement in the legislation. After the minister has further considered this matter I urge there will be a positive decision. I hope the legislation will not simply be extended in its present form but will be improved along the lines suggested by the Canadian Corps Association, the Legion, a number of other bodies and members of this House.

I wish to make a suggestion that has not yet been made in this debate. Any provision in the act for World War II veterans should apply to members of peacekeeping forces in the Middle East or Cyprus. In fact, it should apply to all members of the Canadian armed services in the recent past or indefinite future as long as they are prepared to risk their lives for the preservation of our country or for what it stands.

In conclusion, I welcome the minister's commitment to the House that the cabinet will give serious consideration to this extension. I hope the consideration will take place soon, that the decision reached will be a positive one and that the veterans of this country will get their just dues.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to participate in this debate and to speak after the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) whom I understood to say—and he can correct me if I am wrong—that he will oppose this motion. I take it from his statement that he will vote against the motion. If I am wrong in that assumption, he can correct me. I am glad that he is satisfied with what the minister said. In his satisfaction he showed that easy acceptance of government positions which this party has not been prepared to accept from time to time. I accept the minister personally. From reading between the lines of what he has said here and elsewhere, I believe he would genuinely like to be able to accept our motion.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) would genuinely like to be able to come into this House and say that his cabinet colleagues have authorized him to categorically indicate they will in fact bring forward a bill to remove the repugnant section in the act and the deadline. However, he has not been able to do that. He has not given any unequivocal, categorical assurance, although he easily satisfied my friend from Oshawa-Whitby. I think the record will bear that out.

What is this motion? It is not couched in the loudly condemnatory terms it would have been possible for us to use. It is not, as suggested by the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome), a motion dealing with the political aspects of this very serious problem. It was said by our spokesman in this House today, as we said earlier, that we regret the government has not taken the action urged upon them by this party and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to remove this deadline. That is the position we take. We said, "Do it." We regret they have not done it.

This is probably the last opportunity that will be available to extend this deadline for the benefit of the veterans of Canada. What is there political in that? If we did not make a motion of this kind we would be derelict in our duty, because that is why we are here. I am a veteran. I have no conflict of interest because I did not qualify prior to 1968, and I have no intention of doing so. However, as a veteran I understand the feelings of other veterans.

Having said that about the motion, what has been the situation? Various motions have been put forward by my hon. friend from Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and others. On November 9, 1973, one of my hon. friends put forward a motion as the latest of a series of attempts to focus attention upon this situation. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre also sought to persuade the government to act, and the House unanimously accepted the motion. That was as far as we could go on that occasion.

My hon. friend from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) produced a letter dated January 17 of this year in which the minister indicated he was unable to accede to the request contained in that motion unanimously approved by the House. On January 11, just before the recess, the minister said he would review the position, but obviously between January 11 and January 17 the minister had taken an irrevocable decision.

If anything more was needed to convince us that this was the position of the government, a position which the minister was unfortunately compelled to put forward, I would refer to the minister's speech of March 7. I was not in the House at the time he made it, but I read that speech with interest. The minister built it up in careful, logical steps, reason by reason. He ended by saying he was convinced he could not accede to the request made by veterans organizations and by this House to extend the deadline. That is a clear and final expression of the minister's position. How else, then, could we act than by bringing forward the motion we have put down today, couched in terms which I consider to be mild and temperate?

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says he appreciates the view taken in the motion and would like very much to support it. Obviously, he will not do so. I refer to this matter because on May 4, 1970, the hon. member moved a motion calling upon the government "to give consideration to an immediate and substantial increase in the basic amount of the old age security pension and of veterans' pensions and allowances, and this House also urges that still further steps be taken to improve the quality of life of all our older and retired people". A procedural argument arose. I am sure that Your Honour, with the advice of your assistants, with the careful attention to detail which you always pay, has examined this matter and is not unfamiliar with the relevant citations. In the course of that debate the hon. member said:

> I quite deliberately avoided using the words "this House condemns the government" for such and such a thing because I know that there have been over the years a number of non-confidence motions, particularly in the days when there were supply motions which the opposition sought to amend, which expressed views which the government was prepared to accept; and when the government accepted those views, saying it had no objection to the motion that had been presented, the non-confidence motion lost its non-confidence character.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was aware of this motion, aware of its significance, and in the circumstances under which this motion was drafted we did have that consideration, as well as other considerations, in mind. Now, if the minister has the authority to take a decision to abolish this deadline, let him stand up and vote for the motion; let him persuade his colleagues to vote for the motion.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Baldwin: Let the members of the NDP, sitting down there in despair and confusion—they have already held half a dozen caucuses to decide how they are going to vote—stand up and be counted in favour of the motion. Not one member of the Hydra-headed monster composed of those two parties has had the intestinal fortitude to say, "We approve of and shall support the motion." I suggest this is an illustration of the political dishonesty and deceit exhibited in the peculiar antics of the government party and their allies cowering over there to my left.

If the dragon of politics was introduced into this motion, it was introduced by the hon. member for Sudbury, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. Ours was a non-political motion motivated by a wish to assist the veterans who stand to lose benefits in just a few days. Today is March 12: there are 19 more days left, of which I believe 14 are sitting days, including six or seven opposition days. I did not get authority from my party to say this, but I believe my hon. friends would bear with me if I said we are prepared to give up one or two of the opposition days allocated to us if the minister will stand and say he is prepared to bring forward a Veterans Land Act giving effect to the motion which my hon. friend has put before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Big deal.

Mr. Baldwin: If members of the NDP can accept the policy which the minister was unfortunately compelled to put forward against his better judgment, there is not much hope for this House.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, when the clock interrupted me at six o'clock I was engaged in the very fascinating pastime of inquiring why hon. friends to my left were so easily satisfied with the statement made by the minister today. Let me go into it a little more fully. What did the minister say? He said that the government would consider the possibility of extending the March 31 deadline. That is not good enough for us, Mr. Speaker. It is not good enough for me and it is not good enough for the veterans of Canada.

The minister also said: "I am quite prepared to take another look at this whole question in the light of the pleas made today, after looking at all the evidence". That is not good enough for me either, Mr. Speaker. Also, it is not good enough for my party or for the veterans of Canada, even though it may be good enough for hon. friends to my left, who since this parliament started have parked their once great principles outside their offices and, politically speaking, have indulged in the business of political expediency ad nauseam. It may be good enough for them, but it is not good enough for us.

What else did the minister say? I think this was his concluding sentence, and it is what we must take to be the limits of his undertaking: "I will be happy to consider the whole matter again and to make a recommendation to the government". What kind of recommendation, Mr. Speaker? What is the minister going to do?

The motion we have put before the House today, couched in the words it is, is not the kind of motion that perhaps we would have liked to move. There are limitations of wording. But when you put together what we have said in our motion, we are saying that we regret the government has not indicated that it is prepared to extend the deadline and we want the government to take immediate steps to extend it—not tomorrow or the day after, but immediately. This means but one thing. It means that the minister, or if not this minister some other responsible minister, must give us an undertaking today that legislation will be brought forward to deal with the matter.

This undertaking must be given unequivocally and categorically. Legislation must be introduced by the government. I cannot do it as a private member and neither can the members of my party. Only a member of the cabinet can introduce legislation to extend the deadline, and we want the government to give an undertaking to this effect. If we do not get it, we are not satisfied.

The minister's remarks today have to be read in light of what he said just five days ago. When he spoke five days ago he was speaking calmly, with a prepared speech, following meditation and consideration on this issue that had extended over a period of months. He was not at that time under the pressure he is today, and neither was the government. What the minister said last Thursday was the careful, reasoned, calculated statement of a man representing the government. Let me refer to just one passage in the minister's statement of March 7 which appears at pages 304 and 305 of Hansard:

> Almost nine years have elapsed since that deadline was established. The terminal date has been well publicized. I am of the opinion, therefore, that veterans sincerely interested in obtaining VLA benefits for the purposes contemplated by the act have had ample time in which to do so. Virtually every veteran who obtained a VLA certificate of qualification by the deadline of October 31, 1968, had already utilized the benefits alternative to those of the Veterans Land Act.

Finally the minister said:

> On January 11 last, as reported at page 9182 of Hansard, I stated that if I had sufficient information to make me think the deadline date should be changed I would so recommend to the government. I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I have carefully considered all relevant representations and data, including that determined by the Royal Canadian Legion in the survey it conducted last December. I am unable to conclude that such a recommendation would be warranted or appropriate.

That is the cold, calculated, careful and deliberate statement of the spokesman for the government, stacked up against those weaseling words that the minister used today. I apologize for using those words about the minister because I know if he had the opportunity on his own he would not, on behalf of the government, had used the weaseling, limiting words that were used today and which can give no hope to this House or to the veterans of Canada that this deadline will be extended.

We cannot accept that, and we must press ahead with a vote on this motion unless the government indicates it intends to do something about this matter. I do not think it will, because the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) insisted on writing those words for the minister after the intercourse—I use that word in the best sense—between the two sides. There was a heavy movement which took place between the government and the NDP. Both sides knew what was going to be said, and those words were used to take my friends to the left off the hook. They think they are off the hook, but when this is all over they will be hanging suspended for all the world to see.

If there is any sense of political morality and decency left in this House, somebody on the government side will stand up before this debate is ended and give a clear, categorical assurance to the people of Canada that legislation will be introduced to extend this deadline. That is all that needs to be done, and that will be accepted. If the government will not do that, then I issue the challenge to my friends who sit over there so complacently to vote with us and force the government to accept this motion. Apparently they have no regard at all for the veterans. Perhaps I should clarify that by saying they have no regard for our veterans unless they indicate before this debate ends that they are prepared to vote with us to compel the government to accept the motion.

There are limits to what private members or the opposition can do. Day after day, session after session the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe and other members of this party who have been our spokesmen for veterans affairs, as well as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and members of the Créditiste party, have brought forward motions similar and akin to this one asking that something be done. This was not only done by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, although he has been assiduous in this matter, but by other members. However, the government has steadfastly rejected our motions and refused to give us this right, so we had no alternative but to bring forward our motion couched in these terms to find out precisely what the government is going to do. At a quarter to ten this House, its members, the people of Canada and especially the veterans will know where the government and the NDP stand on this issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, let me say to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) that what the veterans of Canada will know after what is happening here today is that the Conservative Party is ready to play politics with their welfare. That is what the veterans of Canada will know.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The hon. member says to the New Democrats that if we cared for the veterans we would vote with the Conservatives tonight to defeat the government. That, of course, would mean that all this hypocritical stuff they are talking about would really come to pass, because March 31 would be gone and that would be the end of the Veterans Land Act. And where would the help for the veterans be then?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Innuendo.

Mr. Lewis: Imagine making the suggestion that if we really cared for the veterans of Canada we would vote tonight to bring down this parliament so that nothing could be done in time to extend the Veterans Land Act! Do they call that being friends of the veterans? As a matter of fact, the hon. member said—I took down his words—that if the New Democrats really cared for the veterans they would vote with them to compel the government to do what they ask of them. What an incredible sentence that is. What government would be here on March 31, if we voted with the Tories on a non-confidence motion and defeated the government?

An hon. Member: You are really backing off now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I am sure hon. members know that the rules are very clear in that only one hon. member can have the floor and he is the only one to address the House. Perhaps we could have some order.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. You are quite right, but the hon. member for whom I have the greatest respect, has no right to misconstrue my remarks. I am entitled, under the rules, to make the comment I did make, and he should not misconstrue my words. I suggested that if they would indicate their intention to vote for our motion, there is no doubt that the government would change its mind and do something about this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the more the hon. member explains the inexplicable, the more he gets his foot in his mouth. What guarantee has he or anyone that if we vote to bring this parliament down, anyone will be able to do anything afterward? Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. member, for whose integrity until this evening I have had great respect—he may have changed my mind to some extent tonight—to read the motion his party has moved. What are they asking for in this motion which states that

"this House regrets that the government has not extended the March 31, 1974, deadline under the Veterans Land Act"? What does the motion say after that? It calls for the government "to consider taking immediate steps to extend this deadline." The motion does not say "we are calling upon the government to take immediate steps." It does not say that at all. Had it said that, the situation might have been different for the government tonight. What the opposition is doing by this motion is asking the government to consider taking immediate steps, rather than to take those steps.

What was the purpose of this motion? As I listened to the very moving and excellent speech of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) I understood that the purpose he had in mind was to persuade the government to accept the suggestion that it consider taking steps. That is what his speech was all about, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in his speech made an appeal to the minister to accept the suggestion in the motion, to consider taking steps to extend the deadline.

Mr. Nielsen: Why don't you amend the motion?

Mr. Lewis: When the minister did exactly that by saying three times in his speech that he was quite prepared to consider taking steps to extend the deadline, the Tories were not satisfied because they were not interested in that. I am not talking about the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe and others of his colleagues who are as concerned about this matter as he is, but obviously some members of the Tory party were not really concerned with getting a commitment from the government to do something about the Veterans Land Act. They are concerned with nothing else than bringing down this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) referred to conversations back and forth between the Liberals and the NDP. Let me tell him through you, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself discussed with members of the government the necessity for the government to make a definite commitment to accept the substance of this motion. I make no apology for having done that. I feel that in doing so this party has again served the necessary purpose of making this parliament work in favour of the interests of Canadians at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The hon. member for Peace River read from the speech the minister made last Thursday and then said, quite rightly, that it was a calculated and carefully prepared statement—and so it was. That, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, makes the minister's commitment that much more important. If he made last Thursday, as he did, a carefully prepared statement in which he concluded that the deadline should not be extended, and then rises on the floor of this House and as an honourable and gallant veteran himself says it is his intention to reconsider this matter and it will be considered in light of the discussions, pleas and speeches made in this House—that is what the minister said—then I suggest to the hon. member for Peace River that unless he is going to call the minister a liar, what the minister said today has real force precisely because he made the prepared statement last Thursday.

● (2020)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Furthermore, I say to the minister that precisely because he told us last Thursday he had reached one conclusion against the purpose of this motion, we in the New Democratic Party accept his commitment today as meaning not merely consideration but taking action after consideration has been given to the subject.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I know he did not say that, but that points up the stupidity of those who drafted this motion, because they did not make it necessary for him to say that. I therefore emphasize to the minister that if he was not playing games today—and I simply do not believe he is capable of that kind of game—and if he was sincere about it, as I am certain he is, and if he made that statement after consultation with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other members of the government, I accept his sincerity and believe the government is sincere, and that this reconsideration will result in an announcement to this House by March 31 and that action will be taken along the lines the motion requests.

Mr. Baldwin: What will you do if he doesn't?

Mr. Lewis: Just wait and see. Don't be in such a rush. The Conservatives are always in a rush to put someone in a corner, and every time they do it they get themselves in one. Don't continue that game. The game that is being played here has become obvious. It seems to me that for years the issue of veterans affairs has been a non-partisan issue in parliament. For years members of all parties worked together as best they could to arrive at conclusions for the benefit of the veterans of Canada. I think it is regrettable, indeed I think it is shameful that certain members of this House are determined to make the veterans a partisan issue in this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Lewis: I say, Mr. Speaker, that if the Conservatives had been as sincere as the hon. member who moved this motion, and as sincere as the minister when he made that statement, they would not have forced this House to a vote. They would instead have said to the minister that they would hold him to his word, because his statement of today must mean something different from the statement he made last Thursday when he said he could not extend the deadline. They should have said that to the minister and given him a chance in the next couple of weeks to come up with what is implied in his undertaking. But they are not ready to do that. They are not ready to serve that kind of decent, constructive, objective purpose; they are not interested in that.

I wish to pay a warm tribute to the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe for the way in which this motion was introduced, in a totally non-partisan manner. He explained what he wanted, which I am sure is what other members here want. I also wish to pay tribute to my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for the non-partisan way in which he approached this matter. Both the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked for an undertaking by the government that it would consider taking immediate steps to extend the Veterans Land Act. They made that appeal to the minister, who responded. This is a credit to the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and a discredit to the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Speaker, as I have said, it is a pity that this subject is put in the context in which the Tories are now determined to put it; but also, as I have said on many occasions since January 4, 1973, we do not intend to play this kind of game. We believe that the action of the minister today is an unequivocal undertaking to reconsider his position in respect of the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. Baldwin: No.

Mr. Lewis: Ask him, for heaven's sake. Let the hon. member for Peace River stop being a silly ass. You asked the minister to give an undertaking that he would reconsider. When he gives the undertaking, you say it is not enough. He has given what you asked for, but you say it is not enough. What kind of logic is that?

I say, Mr. Speaker, that what has happened today in respect of the government's response to the motion moved by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe again underlines the value to Canadians, to veterans, of making the people who have been elected do something for the benefit of Canadians instead of chasing non-confidence motions as gladly as the Tories chase them. We have no intention of streaking naked with them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I imagine the hon. member for Peace River would make a very good sight streaking across this hall, but I do not want to compete with him in that. All I say, Mr. Speaker, is that today has shown once again the value of the policies that have been pursued by my colleagues and myself. If there was sincerity of action in this chamber, then we say to the minister that he made a commitment and that commitment must be implemented by March 31. We say to him that we expect from him a statement by that date that something like that will be done, and do not intend to force this House into a divisive vote.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the entire debate this afternoon on what we put forward as a very serious matter affecting a great many veterans in this country. We heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) speak in favour of the veterans and this motion which he has moved many times before, and just now we heard the speech of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). Instead of taking the political course of criticizing the Conservative Party, the hon. member for York South should have asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) to give us a commitment that he would introduce an amendment to extend the deadline of this legislation.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs has made no commitment. Last Thursday, as mentioned by the hon. member for York South, the Minister of Veterans Affairs said emphatically—and it has been mentioned many times today in the House—that there would be no extension. Yet the hon. member for York South stands in his place and tries to criticize the Conservative Party. If he is sincere in his allegations, why did he not bring in an amendment to correct our motion which he says is not right? No, he just wants to play politics and keep the government in power. This matter is serious. I would call the performance we have seen "courtroom politics." I know there have been agreements and that bargains have been made, and that is why we heard the speech just made by the leader of the NDP.

Many things have concerned me for a good many years with respect to veterans who have applied for benefits under the Veterans Land Act. These veterans are probably working in the cities and in large metropolitan centres. Under the rules and regulations of the Veterans Land Act they have found it impossible to buy a house or to find a location of their choice on which to build a house, not through any fault of their own but because they are making their livelihood in the large cities of Canada. But today many of our veterans have reached the age when they can retire. I have letters here telling me that some of them have picked out locations in which to build a house in smaller communities. But what happens? One of these letters reads as follows:

> I am writing you as our duly elected member of the federal government to find your views on the possibility of an extension of time from the deadline of March 31, 1974, to extend the Veterans Land Act closing date. Many veterans of the war have, for a variety of reasons, to this date not taken advantage of this form of gratuity for their service. In my own case I have not as yet taken this up. Now I wish to do this.
> I have my letter of qualification from the DVA but as this must be exercised by March 31, 1974, this leaves me with a problem. I have no doubt there will be many veterans in a similar position. With the escalation of real estate prices it is almost impossible to acquire the added moneys beyond the maximum $18,000.

This veteran says in closing:

> I would appreciate hearing your views and intentions in this matter. I do not know if the closure or extension would require an act of parliament or would, like the old soldier, just quietly pass away—

This is something that is happening to far too many of our veterans today: we are forgetting about them and they are expected to just pass away. I have another letter from a chap who applied. He is qualified and has submitted the deed to VLA, but he cannot build the house in the very nice location of his choice because at present there are no sewers servicing the property. However, within two years there will be such services to this area. This is what we are denying our veterans by closing out on March 31, and that is why I beg the minister, who is a sane and reasonable man, to extend this deadline.

If the minister had today given the House his word that the deadline would be extended, not that he would take the matter up, I am sure a different course would have been taken in the House today. This is a serious matter. My friends to the left are trying to make us believe that we are just playing politics. That is not so. With very few days left, the veterans are duly concerned. And why should they not be concerned? For far too long we have neglected our veterans who have offered their lives so that we may have the freedom which we enjoy in this great country of ours. They did not ask us, "What will you give us when we join?" They did not ask us, "What have you to offer us?" They served hoping that they would come back with their lives. They were ready to lay down their lives in order to give us a better way of life in a free world.

All they asked was to be fortunate enough to come back; and they had faith in us to grant them some consideration for their services. They did not barter with us. They went, they offered their services and some of them lost their lives. The least we can do is to give them some consideration in return. I want to emphasize again that many thousands of veterans are planning their retirement and are begging for an extension of the Veterans Land Act. I hope an extension will come about.

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to be asked to speak again on a motion put forward by the able veterans affairs critic of the official opposition, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). I spoke on a motion moved by the hon. member on May 18 of last year. That was also a motion to urge this House to meet a solemn obligation to those of our citizens who fought in Canada's wars.

I doubt that there is a member of this House who does not go back to his riding from time to time and tell veterans groups that their parliament recognizes their sacrifices and that we accept the obligation and responsibility to them that has been passed down to us by previous parliaments. Yet we seem to be continually debating in this House whether we will in fact honour the pledges that have been passed to us and which we ourselves have made.

It seems to me at times that this government approaches legislation dealing with veterans as though it were something to be got over with as quickly as possible and at the least cost to the public treasury as possible. I have heard statisticians remark that veterans of World War I will all be dead by such and such a time, and that veterans of other wars will all be dead by a certain time. Then they go about working out cost estimates of the various programs that we have set up to look after veterans. These are not statistics or mortality tables with which we are dealing. These are brave men and women who answered the call when we were being pushed to the wall. These are people, Canadians, human beings. These are people who hate war because they know how horrible war is. These are people who knew when they left home that they might never return. It sometimes appears to me there are people who wish they could just forget that these people did come back; who wish we could just forget about them until we need them again. That is the feeling I get when I hear members of parliament debating dollars and cents when they should be debating how soon they can pass a bill to erase some of the wrongs we have committed against veterans and their families through our omissions and our procrastinations.

Statistics and actuarial tables aside, we are thinking and talking about veterans who are alive, veterans who have aspirations and problems and dreams that are no different from those of other people. Those of past generations who gave their lives in our wars are honoured in many ways—with statues, parks, buildings, scholarships, and on memorial days. This is fitting, and in this respect I believe we are living up to our solemn responsibilities. I believe that the vast majority of people honestly and sincerely acknowledge their debt to those who died in order that we might live. However, we owe the same debt of gratitude and thanks to the living veterans and the monuments we erect to those veterans must be living monuments. The Veterans Land Act is just such a living monument and it must be kept alive.

There was no intention, on the part of the parliament that passed the act back in 1942 that it should be terminated before the end of its useful life. It was passed as veterans' legislation and it has the same validity and purpose today as it had in the year it was enacted. No one would suggest that we should phase out veterans pensions, veterans hospitals—at least I hope not—or war veterans allowance simply because some statistician can produce a time when he says all veterans will have passed from the scene. Why, then, should anyone single out the VLA and suggest that it should be given an expiry date?

A previous parliament passed an act that would extend to veterans the right to borrow money from their government to purchase land and a home. They were not told that they had to sit down, there and then, and decide where they would like to build a home or when they would be able to start. A later parliament, or perhaps I should say a later government, decided that this right granted to veterans must have some strings attached to it. Veterans were told to make up their minds by a certain date, or forget it. We have been told during the past few days, and in fact we were told in this House and in committee meetings last year, that the veterans had been given ample warning that VLA was going to be terminated and that any veterans who wanted to qualify had sufficient time to get in under the wire.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, it has been ably stated by many of my colleagues, on all sides of the House, that there is no compelling reason why an expiry date should have been imposed and no good reason why that expiry date should be allowed to stand. It is for us today in this House to decide whether or not that expiry date should be expunged from the record. We are not bound by any past government or any past parliament in this matter. Experience has shown us that the expiry date is unpopular with those for whom VLA was established, and if it is unpopular with the veterans then we must reinstate this very important legislation.

I could talk at length about the positions that have been taken by my colleagues in today's debate. But, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer in particular to some remarks made by the very able veterans affairs critic for the New Democratic Party, himself a veteran, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). During the debate of last May on a motion moved by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, the hon. member for Timiskaming proposed a solution that was excellent at that time, and I believe it would be as acceptable today not only to his party but to mine as well.

The hon. member for Timiskaming outlined a three-part proposal that would extend the Veterans Land Act provisions and would also raise the ceiling on loans from $18,000 to $25,000. The increase in loan ceiling would erase part of the effect of inflation on land prices and in my opinion is an excellent proposal. On the hon. member's first point I quote from Hansard for May 18, 1973:

> First, we will have to convince the minister and his officials that it is necessary to wipe out the qualifying date, at least with regard to smallholdings.

The "we" to whom he referred were the members of this House. The second point dealt with the raising of the loan ceiling, while his third point dealt with the alleged problem of administering the smallholdings provisions in the Veterans Land Act. He proposed that if this indeed was a problem for the Department of Veterans Affairs, then it could and should be turned over to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for administration.

While I accept the hon. member's proposals as going a long way toward solving this problem, if it is a problem, I cannot accept the argument that the high cost of administering the program is a valid excuse for allowing the government to squirm out of the responsibility for continuing VLA beyond the present expiry date. Every program that we have in operation at the present time has its own administrative problems and administrative costs. But the programs go on and we continue to establish new ones.

The reasons for continuing the VLA program are obvious, and there are many of them. First of all, as I and many of my colleagues have said, the VLA program was designed for veterans, and as long as there are veterans who want to take advantage of the program then the Veterans Land Act should be available to them.

Another good reason is that before the arbitrary deadline to qualify for a VLA entitlement certificate passed on October 31, 1968, 150,000 veterans had been issued certificates. Of that number only about 25,000 have actually received the benefit of the program. This means that 125,000 certificate holders have yet to decide where they want to build and when they would like to start. Obviously, there are some certificate holders who will not take advantage of the program no matter how long they have to make up their minds. I think the minister also alluded to this fact. And it is likely that quite a number of those to whom certificates were issued are not living today. However, Mr. Speaker, this is not a criterion for deciding whether to retain the VLA program or to allow it to die 20 days from now. As long as there are any veterans at all who have not taken advantage of the program, it must be retained for them.

In addition to the veterans of past wars who returned to civilian life there are many, perhaps several hundred, who are still serving in the armed forces. Right now they must be wondering if we are really going to extend something to them with one hand and take it away from them with the other. Some of these people will not be out of the forces for another five or six years. They may be presently serving in Egypt, Cyprus or Germany. How can they be expected to know at this point where they will decide to settle a few years from now or when they will be ready to start building?

The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras) made some interesting remarks during the debate this afternoon. I would like to refer to two of them. First of all he said that the government of Canada in 1942 was forced to provide some sort of incentive to Canadians to volunteer for service, and that one of the incentives was the Veterans Land Act. If that is so, Mr. Speaker, then I cannot think of a more solemn pledge for a parliament to pass along to all succeeding parliaments. If we are to take the hon. member's remarks on faith, then the government of that time said that anyone who would volunteer to risk life and limb in the service of his or her country would be rewarded by, among other things, the right to settle or resettle under the provisions of the Veterans Land Act. Could the hon. member deny that this is a pledge that has not been completely fulfilled? And could the hon. member deny that this pledge has been passed to us and must be passed along to succeeding parliaments so long as there is one living veteran?

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I must accept the version which says Canada was able to maintain the largest volunteer force overseas of any country engaged in World War II and that it was able to do this without incentives and without conscription. Further, the hon. member for Labelle suggested that those veterans who have already taken advantage of VLA could be angered by any move on our part to increase the ceiling on loans from $18,000 to $25,000. I doubt that, for a couple of reasons. In the first place, the original ceiling was $12,000 and it was raised to $18,000 for the same reason we are proposing to raise it to $25,000.

Further, the homes that were built ten years ago at a cost of $18,000 are now worth $36,000 or more, and there is no way in which those who build now are going to realize such a dramatic gain in equity over that period. Another reason is that the veterans organizations themselves are pushing hardest for the extension of VLA and for the increase in loan ceiling. Many of those who are pressing the issue are veterans who have not taken advantage of VLA.

I would like to end my remarks by referring to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). I said in my speech in May, 1973, that the Minister of Veterans Affairs was admirably suited, by experience and temperament, to the task he has undertaken. He has shown compassion and understanding as well as objectivity in his approach to veterans problems. However, Mr. Speaker, I have detected a change in the minister during the past few months.

● (2050)

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Smart fellow.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): It is not a change for the better, in my opinion. It is a change I have detected especially since last month. In February the minister gave every indication that he viewed with some favour the representations of veterans groups urging the extension of the Veterans Land Act. The minister has since been accused of raising false hopes in the minds of veterans. I cannot believe, or at least I do not want to believe that the minister would build up the hopes of veterans groups on a premise that he knew to be false.

Did the minister really believe that his cabinet colleagues would support him in a bid to extend or remove the deadline on VLA applications? I want to believe he was sincere, but today he made some statements which seem puzzling. For instance, the minister said he would be prepared to take another look at the Veterans Land Act question. He would take another look at what? That he never intended to push for extension? Also, he said he would be happy to reconsider; that is, to reconsider if he considers it to be warranted. Again, he poses the question as to what would or might be warranted. Did he mean the extension of the deadline, or did he mean the Veterans Land Act itself? After all, Mr. Speaker, the Veterans Land Act is the expression of the will of parliament—of several parliaments. I hope the minister does not mean that he will consider at some later date whether he feels the Veterans Land Act to be warranted. I cannot help feeling that the Canadian people will have the last word on that matter.

By not extending the deadline of the Veterans Land Act the Liberal government appears to have conspired to get us to use up one of our opposition days, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): What a laugh!

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): If that was their game, they have succeeded.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Why don't you quit playing games?

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): I cannot think of a better way to use up an opposition day than drawing attention to Canada's veterans and the need to preserve and update vital veterans programs. We make no apology for that, Mr. Speaker. Regardless of what the leader of the NDP says, this has not been a partisan debate.

In conclusion I want to take members back to a Remembrance Day ceremony of past years and to a short poem recited by a legionnaire which goes like this:

> No doubt he cherished his life,
> Not unlike you and I,
> But if we take for granted
> The reason that he died,
> We don't deserve our freedom,
> Because we've never learned
> It was our peace and liberty,
> These brave soldiers earned

My hon. friends, if we fail to build a better world for our returning veterans, the hero in that poem died in vain.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, at first blush the motion before the House today might appear to be a routine opposition day motion, as it calls on the government to consider taking immediate steps to extend the deadline for the phasing out of the Veterans Land Act beyond March 31 this year. On looking more closely we find that it is a motion of non-confidence against the government, moved under section 58(4)(a) of our rules of procedure. So it is a motion on which the House will divide, something which is most unusual. Why do I say that? In the six years I have been a member of parliament, this is the first time the House has divided on party lines on a matter relating to veterans who served this country so gallantly in war and so capably in the building of the country since the war.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), when he spoke, almost seemed to excuse himself and his party as, half humorously, he called on members on our side of the House to support a motion which he knows is a motion of non-confidence. I suggest that if any member on this side wanted to join the PC party, he would do it directly and not by supporting a "bassackwards" motion like the one now before the House. The theory of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Beattie) was interesting. He suggested that there was a government conspiracy for the government to use up or waste an opposition day. That is a strange theory, as the opposition party chose and moved the motion which is now before us.

I served on the veterans affairs committee during sessions of the last parliament and from time to time in the first session of the present parliament. I can say sincerely that it has been a non-partisan committee which has rarely divided. Usually, all members worked together and discussed a matter until consensus was arrived at. That is why I feel so uncomfortable about this debate, because for the first time in several years we are seeing a partisan approach to the problems of veterans.

There are fewer veterans who are members of the House now as compared with the last Parliament when I believe about 25 per cent of our members were veterans. Of course, the percentage of veteran members at present is considerably lower than it was in the first parliament after 1945. Nevertheless, the veterans affairs committee of the twenty-eighth parliament was perhaps one of the busiest committees of the House of Commons. Naturally, all committees worked more because the rules were changed and the estimates of various departments were considered in committee and not in committee of the whole. Even so, the veterans affairs committee did a tremendous job in that parliament. It studied the Woods committee report and made recommendations to the government which resulted in Bill C-203 coming forward. It was the most complete overhaul of pension legislation affecting veterans to be introduced in the last 50 years.

There was a tremendous spirit of co-operation among the parties and veterans associations. That, essentially, was the spirit in which the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs worked, the committee in which the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) has been a most active member. As I said, the committee worked in a non-partisan way. Its efforts were bent to providing better pensions, better health services, better welfare services and more special assistance to veterans, rather than to partisan activity.

The bill I have mentioned was a milestone in pension legislation. It provided for the Pension Review Board to be separate and independent from the Canadian Pension Commission, for the establishment of the independent bureau of pension advocates, for the exceptional incapacity allowance, for a stronger benefit of the doubt clause and for special benefits for Hong Kong prisoners of war.

The idea of extending the VLA deadline is not new. It was extended in 1959 to 1962, in 1962 it was extended to 1968 and in 1965 it was extended from 1968 to 1974. This afternoon the minister said he would give serious consideration to extending this deadline beyond the March 31 limit established back in 1965. We are proud of our Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Foster: We are proud of his career in wartime; we are proud of his career as a farmer in his native province of Prince Edward Island; we are proud of his record as minister of agriculture in that province and the work he has done in this parliament.

A year ago the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs recommended that benefits to veterans on a 100 per cent incapacity allowance be increased by relating them to the standard of living which would be directly related to the minimum federal civil service wages. Some members considered it would be very difficult for the minister to persuade his cabinet colleagues to adopt this principle which had first been proposed in 1918 or 1919. Veterans organizations had made representations on this for many years. It was the present Minister of Veterans Affairs who was able to bring forward this legislation last spring and have it adopted in order that the veterans of this country would receive a pension related to the minimum wage rates of the federal civil service.

We are proud of the way the minister has kept the budget of the Department of Veterans Affairs in line with what these men and women require. I note that in 1972 the departmental budget was $432 million. In his speech today the minister announced that in the 1974-75 estimates it will be $597 million, an increase of $165 million for the some 200,000 in this country who receive some level of pension benefits.

Unlike the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who spoke this afternoon suggesting they were not able to accept the assurances of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, I am willing to accept the word of the minister that he intends to review this matter and place recommendations before cabinet. Taking into account the minister's distinguished war record, I am sure most members of this House are willing to accept the minister's word.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I consider it an honour to take part in this debate and to endorse the motion put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). I would in fact go further and offer him my congratulations and the thanks of many, many people in the constituency I represent for having brought this urgent and important matter before the House of Commons today.

[Mr. Foster.]

I was equally impressed with the remarks of the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the eloquent and passionate manner in which he pleaded with the minister and all in this House to agree to an extension of the deadline of March 31, 1974, when the government proposes to phase out the Veterans Land Act. These speeches dealt with the issue in a non-partisan and compassionate way; compassionate because at stake are the future plans of many thousands of Canadians who served in World War II and the Korean war.

The government's proposal to phase out the Veterans Land Act at the end of this month has met with a strong variety of responses from members on all sides of the House—from strong objection to at least serious reservation. Regardless of some of the heated remarks made earlier today, I hope that when this motion is voted on we will be united as a parliament in seeing that humane treatment is accorded to that large body of men and women throughout this country who genuinely deserve our consideration.

The constituency of Kingston and the Islands has a long history of military involvement. For over 300 years it has continued as a base for armed forces operations. Today its inhabitants include many who are still actively serving in the forces as well as many hundreds of former service personnel who have retired. Among the latter group are numerous individuals who have submitted applications so that they can qualify for loans under the VLA. The fact that they have not taken advantage of their applications is due largely to the inflexible terms of the act, terms which indeed prohibit them from purchasing their own homes.

The $18,000 limit for a lot and a house is a ludicrous figure in this day and age. The $18,000 would hardly pay for the lot, let alone the home, and the one-half acre stipulation has its own restrictions. For those wishing to locate on farmland in the country the acreage is inadequate. For those wishing to purchase land in a suburban area of the constituency the one-half acre lot is too large. These are factors within the Veterans Land Act that could be significantly modified if the government were to accept the motion presented by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe. Extension of the deadline should allow sufficient time for consideration to be given to modifying the act in terms of contemporary values.

For the men and women still serving in our armed forces, men and women who served throughout World War II and the Korean War, the phasing-out of the Veterans Land Act is particularly reprehensible. It is true they could have taken their discharge at the termination of hostilities; taken advantage of the benefits offered to them at that time under the Veterans Land Act and gone on to other and perhaps more lucrative careers. Instead, they chose to stay and serve, serve in our Canadian armed forces, make it a career, bring to it the high respect and renown it has maintained down through the years. The government's reward to them is to deny them the benefits they had been led to expect were theirs.

For men and women still serving in the forces and with some years still to go before retirement it is well nigh impossible to say what particular lot or piece of land they may wish to purchase. In fact, many have not yet determined where they will reside upon retirement from the forces. How can they take advantage of the loans available under the Veterans Land Act before the March 31 deadline, when they are in no position to even consider the purchase of a lot or the construction of a home? Their present endeavours are directed to the contribution they are making in the active forces of our country, not in thinking about retirement. Of necessity, they have become used to a life of mobility and change and many of them would find it impossible at the present time to decide where they will reside when they have retired. But surely the government's contribution to their retirement should not be to refuse them the benefits that have been accruing to them, just because they chose to continue serving their country. One of my constituents has written as follows:

I have served in the armed forces continuously since World War II and can continue to serve in my present rank until February, 1976—if promoted, until February, 1978. Due to frequent service postings I have had neither the time nor the opportunity to exercise my entitlement to build under VLA. In fact, with the possibility of one or two more postings I have not even selected a possible geographic location.

It would appear that those of us who elected to continue serving are being penalized, first, by the increase in interest rates a few years ago, and, secondly, by a closure date which will prevent many of us from taking advantage of our entitlement.

It is interesting to note that he uses the word "closure". This is a word that the government certainly knows something about.

It is a well known fact that the morale of the armed forces is not at an all-time high. There have been frustrations, disappointments and setbacks for many of those who chose the military as a career. The marvel is that they maintain their present high standards despite these frustrations. But I know, having talked to many of them both in my constituency and elsewhere, that the phasing-out of the Veterans Land Act, the denial of justice to these people, would be a blow to their morale that is uncalled for, unjustified and unnecessary.

Earlier today my hon. friend from Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe said this question goes beyond the materialistic; that there is a principle involved, the principle that we should not break faith with those to whom a commitment was made in the name of the government of Canada and the people of Canada. I deplore a situation in which any of us might stand accused of having broken faith needlessly and over such a small matter when viewed in terms of dollars and cents. For the number of people who can ultimately take advantage of the VLA is not large in terms of our over-all population, and the funding required is minimal in terms of our over-all budget.

A debate such as this calls into consideration many of the old-fashioned virtues such as trust, faith, civility—virtues often overlooked in this day and age, but virtues which can and must be applied in the case of Canada's veterans if we in this House are to merit the term "responsible representatives". Every day I receive letters of appeal from those whose future security is jeopardized by the manner in which the government has vacillated in regard to this act.

Today the minister said he is prepared to consider an extension. For my part, I am willing to accept his word as given in good faith—that he and his colleagues will give earnest consideration to the positive, humane aspects of extending the deadline while rejecting their present negative, discriminatory approach. Having given his word, having raised the expectations of thousands of veterans and servicemen, having given them cause to believe that their case is a just one and that they can hope for some action within the next 19 days, let him come forward with legislation to extend the deadline within those 19 days. Let him not dash the hopes of veterans by peremptorily announcing on March 31 that his promise to consider an extension has not led to the results they desire, that his words were hollow rhetoric.

If this is his intention, if this is the government's way of getting off what they consider to be a sticky wicket, better the minister should stand here this evening and tell the House, the veterans organizations and the nation the truth as to his intentions, for he is dealing with people who, above all else, do not deserve to be misled. I urge the minister and those associated with him to give an unequivocal guarantee to the House that the March 31 deadline will be extended.

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the previous speaker, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), who told us with some pride that the constituency she has the honour to represent has a distinguished military history. If I were in her place, I would say exactly the same thing. I might remind hon. members, though, that all of us should have great pride in the constituencies we represent because I am sure that in times of trouble, in times of war, all Canadians have enlisted and done their duty for king and country.

Having said this, may I suggest the hon. lady should remember, again with pride, that a great deal has been done for veterans not only in the constituency she so proudly represents but in constituencies right across Canada, because nowhere in the world have veterans been treated so kindly as in this great country of ours. I speak not only of the present government but of previous governments. I speak as a veteran of six years' service, as one who served in all the active theatres in the last war. I listened with tears in my eyes as opposition speakers suggested that nothing had been done for the veterans of Canada. The fact is that more has been done for Canadian veterans, including the veterans of Kingston and the Islands, than anywhere else in the world, bar none.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: When we consider the motion put forward by the opposition today we should not think in terms of the Veterans Land Act alone. If the minister had not said he might change his mind, a deadline would, it is true, he applied to the legislation on March 31. We should think of other things. For example, there just happened to come into my hands tonight a number of figures as to monthly rates of disability pensions paid to veterans under the Pension Act. I do not say these veterans are getting too much, by any means. As a matter of fact, over the years, along with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and many others in this House, I have striven to secure increases for veterans because I believe pensions should increase with the cost of living. But consider this. Today a married pensioner with one child receives $541 a month absolutely tax free. And it should be tax free. The fact is, he or she is getting this rate in this Canada of ours. This increase was given by this House of Commons, and all members of the House should be proud of the fact that we have looked after our veterans better than any other country in the world.

May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that our veterans also have other benefits, such as war veterans allowance for which my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre has fought so valiantly over the years, as have the rest of us though perhaps not quite so eloquently as he. Nevertheless, legislation unequalled anywhere in the world has benefited our veterans in Canada. As a matter of fact, the wealthiest country of the world, the United States, has no legislation that equals or can even be closely compared with our war veterans allowance. As I myself have said on many an occasion, only two countries of the world have a minister of veterans affairs. One of them is France. The other is not the United States, the wealthiest country in the world, or England, or Germany, or Japan; it is Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: This is why I am pleased to be a member of this House of Commons, and I say to my hon. friends in the Tory opposition that they should be proud of it too. They should be proud for three or four reasons, one of which is that the legislation that has given Canadian veterans the highest pension in the world was passed to a large extent by their own votes.

As far as I can remember, during the few years I have been here veterans pensions, legislation concerning the Veterans Land Act, and so on, have been discussed and have passed through this chamber by unanimous vote. In all sincerity I suggest that the motion put before the House today by my hon. friends on the opposition benches is, as far as I am concerned, politics at its very lowest. They are trying to take advantage of the veterans of Canada who have fought and died for this country. They are trying to overturn the government because they have been unable to do so in any other way, and they are now trying to hang this on the necks of our veterans.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Whicher: The other day I heard the remark that the bigger they are, the nicer they are. As far as this opposition motion is concerned, I say to my Conservative friends, "Sit down, Shorty". I am sure it is not one that they will be proud of in years to come.

I cannot be critical of the Veterans Land Act, because I happen to be one of those veterans who was successful in obtaining a block of land under the Veterans Land Act. Fortunately, I received my piece of land in the year 1946, at a time when many people had a similar opportunity. Many others have had this opportunity over the past 29 years and have taken advantage of it, and for that they deserve our admiration.

On the other hand, they should remember that this opportunity was given to them not just by the Liberal Party but also by the Conservative Party who are condemning this provision today. It was also granted to them by our New Democratic friends, and indeed by our Créditiste friends. It was agreed to unanimously by this House and it is one of the pieces of legislation that I am very proud of indeed.

If I were going to be critical of the Veterans Land Act, I would suggest to my Conservative friends who have moved this motion that perhaps they should change the "V" to a "C". This legislation has proved to be a most successful housing project and has greatly assisted many veterans who live in this great country of ours. If it has been successful for our veterans, perhaps it could be successful for all Canadians. Perhaps we should change the wording of the Veterans Land Act to the "Canada land act" and give all Canadians the opportunity that our veterans have had over the years. I think this would help the housing situation in which we find ourselves today. If my Conservative friends would put forward such a suggestion, I would be the first to support it.

However, the Conservatives are hanging this motion on changing the deadline from March 31 to some time in the future. When we think that the Conservative Party is challenging Canada, that there could be an election tomorrow or even in two years as a result of this motion, then I say my Conservative friends are playing with Canadians. They are not playing with us, because we regard ourselves as at least semi-professionals; they are playing with Canadian citizens from Vancouver to St. John's, Newfoundland.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, there are other subjects that are more appropriate. As a member of the government party I can think of some myself, as a matter of fact. Quite frankly, if hon. members opposite are looking for an opposition motion, let them come and have a chat with me and I will give them one that is far better than the one they moved this afternoon.

Mr. Alexander: Your time is up.

Mr. Whicher: My time may be up, but let me tell my hon. friend that he is not going to have a chance to speak tonight. I will take the advice of my hon. friend from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) because my time is up.

Mr. Alexander: I always give you good advice, Ross.

Mr. Whicher: But before I sit down, let me remind the House that the veterans legislation that we have in Canada, including the Veterans Land Act, is the finest veterans legislation in the world. All Canadians should be proud of that fact, more particularly those Canadians should who sit in this chamber, not simply the Liberals, members of the New Democratic Party or the Créditistes, but even the Conservatives who today have condemned it to the best of their ability.

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this motion moved by my colleague for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) because of my sincere concern for the position of many veterans in respect of the deadline, that this government insists will be kept, regarding their right to acquire a home under part II of the Veterans Land Act, a provision that has already been fully explained in previous speeches today.

I am a little surprised at the speech just completed by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher). I had always considered him to be a reasonably fair member. However, I think history will prove who is playing politics in this House today. I do not think anyone on this side of the House has been criticizing the legislation we have already passed for our veterans. Certainly we agree that our veterans have a lot of good legislation. What we are criticizing is the fact that veterans in Canada today are concerned about what is going to happen and they are confused by the government's inaction at the present time.

As the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe stated, this motion is being presented as a last-ditch plea to this government, in the very limited number of days left before the end of the month, to reconsider its very negative stand in regard to extending the deadline on this important provision. It is not a cheap political ploy, as some hon. members have frantically tried to make out today. To me, the main thrust of this motion originated from a commitment made many years ago by the then prime minister of Canada, Sir Robert Borden, who in a speech in 1917 had this to say:

> The government and the country will consider it their first duty to see that a proper appreciation of your effort and of your courage is brought to the notice of your people at home, and it will always be our endeavour to so guide the attitude of public opinion. That the country will support the government to prove to the returned men its just and due appreciation of the inestimable value of the services rendered to the country and empire, and that no man, whether he goes back or whether he remains in Flanders, will have just cause to reproach the government for having broken faith with the men who won and the men who died.

That was a pretty strong statement from the prime minister of the day, and some 50 years since that date similar statements have been uttered. However, never before, as now in 1974, due to the rapid rate of inflation as it effects our veterans of all wars, is there such a need for change in all acts referring to veterans, and there is a particular need to change this particular part of the Veterans Land Act which we are debating.

While it is true there have been many improvements over the years as conditions have changed, it is also true that there are many thousands of veterans who, possibly through their own ingenuity and good fortune, need not be concerned for the future and their own well-being. Nevertheless, thay are sincerely concerned about the well-being of their fellow comrades who are not so fortunate but who, in the minds of members of our party, still deserve full consideration. Members of this party are anxious to ensure that no veteran will be denied the right to acquire a home under part II of the Veterans Land Act because of the restrictions presently imposed, which include of course the October, 1968, deadline for certification, the March, 1974, deadline for application, the phasing-out of the act, the restricted lot requirements, land costs in urban centres and the financial ceilings which inhibit loan applications.

Like many of my colleagues, I have received numerous letters from veterans who through no fault of their own somehow missed the deadline of October, 1968, for certification. Just because of their oversight, it is difficult for me to understand the position the department is taking in stating that everyone had an opportunity to apply before that date. Surely the minister recognizes the fact that many veterans were not knowledgeable of the deadline and are now being denied their rights under the charter.

Even though the minister has stated that we have no right to deviate from the legislation as it now stands, it has to be admitted that there have been many hundreds of amendments brought forth in the last 50 years, along with many new pieces of legislation, because of increasing costs and lot requirements as land values and availability have changed from time to time.

The veterans are not asking for the extension of just another give-away program, which is so prevalent within the government of today. They are asking for the right to continue to borrow money at a reasonable rate of interest, with the opportunity to pay it back. It has been mentioned by several previous speakers that the $18,000 ceiling should be raised, and I most heartily agree. A figure of $30,000 has been mentioned and that appears to me to be within reasonable limits, depending on just how fast the inflationary spiral we find ourselves in today keeps going up.

Another area which is closely related to the concerns expressed in this debate which I should like to refer to briefly is the right of the spouse of a veteran who qualifies under the Veterans Land Act to have the same rights and privileges as the marriage partner in respect of title to property. I have had this point brought to my attention, as I am sure have many other members. In essence, the wife of a veteran who has a VLA mortgage does not have any legal claim to the property until such time as there is an estate. In this day and age of the so-called free society, if the husband chooses to simply take off and not honour his mortgage obligations the wife could then find herself in a very financially embarrassing situation.

As a working wife and mother, such a marriage partner could have contributed as much money to the home as her husband. But even if she did not work outside the home, her contribution as a wife and mother would still be sizeable in meeting the mortgage obligations over the years. To me, this is a very important area that I feel is supplementary to this motion which is so clearly emphasized here today.

As I understand the act, any time a veteran becomes separated or divorced, the wife cannot claim any right to the property until the mortgage is paid off. But by that time the family may be grown up and the wife may not need too much help. If the husband becomes ill, mentally or otherwise, or is incompetent for any reason, the public trustee takes over the administration of the property to which the wife, as I have said before, may have contributed a sizeable effort in keeping the mortgage payments up to date.

Although departmental administrators of the legislation in most cases act in good faith, their answers to some of the questions raised by veterans and their wives do not give those Canadians the confidence I feel they deserve in order that their remaining days be as free of frustration as possible. One such departmental answer is this: The arrangement as it now stands has not created any undue hardship so long as the family relationship remains normal, because when the veteran's debt is paid off, the title is conveyed to the veteran and upon its registration the wife's dower rights are attached. If requested, the director will convey title to a husband and wife as tenants in common, or joint tenants. If the veteran dies, the wife takes over the agreement with the director and may enjoy all the benefits that would otherwise accrue to the husband.

That is all true, but the one reference in that statement which is the key to the concern I have tried to outline is the part which says that as long as a family relationship remains normal, that is the case. As we look around today we see many family relationships that are not necessarily normal, and this is where the concern of the spouse arises. I feel it is a legitimate concern. The director will convey the title to the husband and wife as tenants in common, or joint tenancy, if it is drawn up that way to begin with; and that is fine. However, when a marriage begins to break down and either the wife or the husband can foresee a possible separation, there is no way in which it would be possible for the spouse to get a legal agreement for joint tenancy.

This is just one more reason that we as parliamentarians must continually analyze acts such as the one in question today in order that they are kept current with the living standards and conditions we find ourselves in from time to time. I doubt if there is a member in this House who does not have a current file on his desk expressing concerns of some kind by veterans in his riding. It makes our hearts bleed that when veterans eventually turn to their members for at least an explanation of the situation in which they find themselves, we in many cases are helpless to do anything. Consequently, I fail to see how our motion today can possibly be defeated when it would give us the opportunity, as members, to at least try to support a situation that to me makes common sense.

The leader of the socialists to our left today accused our party of being very hypocritical and claimed he could have voted for the motion had it not contained the word "consider". Let me read the motion as follows:

> This House regrets that the government has not extended the March 31, 1974, deadline under the Veterans Land Act and calls upon the government to consider taking immediate steps to extend this deadline.

The leader of the socialists said he could vote for it without that reference to "consider". If he and members of the party to which he belongs were as sincere in their interest for veterans as they make out, and as he so frantically tried to suggest this afternoon, why did not that member, or a member on the government side, stand up and move an amendment leaving out that word? They could then have voted for the motion and, as somebody suggested, saved face.

I have a great deal of respect for the minister. As a matter of fact, I have become acquainted with him as a result of living next door in our apartment house; but if the minister and his government were as sincere as they claim they are in their regard for the veteran, why could they not vote for this motion? This would make the veterans happy and there would not be this so-called hypocrisy, political ploy or game that we are supposed to be playing on this side of the House.

The hon. member for Bruce said that we are playing politics. As I said before, history will prove who is playing politics and it will be shown that it is the government and its coalition cohorts. I am sure the media will understand what is going on here today. I am also sure our some 140,000 veterans will soon understand who is playing politics. The record will be set straight.

I have tried to outline in a very humble way my sincere opinion as a backbencher. Several other backbenchers over here I am sure look at this matter in the same way. I think what the leader of the socialists to my left recorded in Hansard tonight is a disgrace.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I believe what has become very clear in the course of the day is that the official opposition is using the cause of the veterans as a battering-ram in order to obtain their political objective. Hon. members opposite know perfectly well that today traditionally is a day when the opposition moves a motion of non-confidence. They also know that almost invariably in the last 25 years the government has been obliged to vote against motions put in these particular circumstances. Only three times in the last 25 years has it been possible for a government—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. MacEachen: —to adopt a motion put on an opposition day. It has happened only when the motion has been put in a constructive way.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 9 of Standing Order 58, to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The question is on the motion of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall).

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion I rise on a point of privilege. Under Standing Order 11 I wish to indicate that I am unable to vote because of a conflict of interest. The indication of the government that it agrees to extend the deadline may result in a considerable windfall to me because I have qualified. I have a certificate. I have no intention of taking action on it before March 31, but if the deadline is extended I may do so; therefore I request permission not to vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Marshall) which was negatived on the following division:

URBAN AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CREATION OF URBAN DEMONSTRATION PROGRAM AND FUND

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, further to the urban goals set forth in the Speech from the Throne, I wish to inform the House today that the government is creating a $100 million urban demonstration program and fund to be administered through the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: This demonstration program is designed to foster projects that will find solutions to urban problems and demonstrate those solutions for adoption and implementation in all regions of Canada.

The fund applies to the five-year period from 1975-76 to 1980-81. It is a further indication of the clear determination of this government to meet the urban goals announced in the Speech from the Throne, and it will also provide a strong and imaginative foundation for Canada's full participation in the 1976 United Nations Conference-Exposition on Human Settlements to be held in Vancouver. I hope this conference will be known as Habitat 2000.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this $100 million fund will be used to support urban projects in many critical areas. We need to develop innovative projects to show the effective working of new methods of house design and house construction, to demonstrate the feasibility of new, low energy urban systems, to illustrate new ways of getting the utmost value from scarce and expensive natural resources by recycling for multiple use, and to apply new technology to many other critical areas such as improved public transportation and arrangements for the financing, building and administration of new communities, or renewed communities.

The new fund is intended to launch a program of innovation in the urban field. It will apply to federal programs, provincial programs, and to programs developed by municipalities. It will also apply to projects put forward by the private sector and individual Canadians.

Innovation is a difficult thing to foster and support. This fund will be used to enable projects to embody desirable innovations that would not be possible without such additional support. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, it is not tied to any existing federal program but, rather, it can be used in a discretionary manner as opportunities and circumstances require.

Moreover, we intend to manage the program and fund so that the impact on innovation will be as pervasive as possible. I would hope that over the five years we can translate this initial $100 million into innovative projects valued at many times that figure.

It is difficult to say how many projects will be selected but I would hope that perhaps as many as 20 or more would be launched over the next two years. From those 20 or so projects, Mr. Speaker, a smaller number will be nominated as Canadian demonstration projects for inclusion in the United Nations conference. The program and fund will also be managed, of course, to ensure that all regions of the country share equitably in its benefits.

Proposals for demonstration projects can be put forward by federal departments and agencies, by provinces, by municipalities, by the private sector and by individual Canadians, including, I hope, as a result of the very keen interest of the members of this House. Proposals for projects should be sent to the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs, where a secretariat has been established to plan and implement Canada's participation in the United Nations conference.

In addition to interdepartmental and intergovernmental review the proposals will be subjected to a thorough evaluation of their potential effectiveness in solving urban problems and demonstrating solutions by a special committee which I have appointed to advise me on project selection. This group of experts is headed by Dr. Kenneth Hare of the University of Toronto and former president of the University of British Columbia.

This evaluation process, I should add, Mr. Speaker, will involve full consultation with other levels of governments, where necessary. Governments must press forward with immediate solutions employing existing methods and programs relating, for example, to housing and transportation. But we must also adopt measures to generate new approaches, to generate improved technology and innovative solutions. That is the purpose of this program and of this announcement.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, today the minister has announced a $100 million urban demonstration program—I emphasize the word "demonstration"—and fund to be administered by himself. He will be the czar of this demonstration. The program will extend over a five-year period, from 1975-76 to 1980-81. The object is not to build houses; the object is to provide a strong foundation for Canada's participation in a conference to be held in Vancouver sponsored by the United Nations, dealing with the question of human settlements.

No one has any complaint about or criticism of that conference. The minister wants the conference to be known as Habitat 2000. That is one of the problems with this program; it will be the year 2000 before the minister will be able to build any houses for the Canadian people.

On the second page of his announcement is the thrust of his novel suggestion, a suggestion made at a time when there is a national housing crisis in Canada. In addition, the latest figures for the cost of living have just come out and the cost of living has never been higher. From 1972 to 1973 the average increase in the cost of housing in Vancouver was 32 per cent, in Calgary 23.2 per cent and in Toronto 29 per cent.

In face of this crisis, Mr. Speaker, let us analyse this demonstration program, which I say is a lot of fluff. We would have other names for it out west, but it is just straight bluff. The minister called it a program of innovation. I wondered just what the word "innovation" meant so I checked. It means "a program of change from the established custom; a program to create a new thing or a new method". I think it is a program of inhalation, because the minister must have been sniffing glue to bring in a program of this kind.

Let us see what this great program of the Liberal party is going to do. It is going to develop innovative projects. It is going to create new methods of house design and construction and low energy urban systems. It is going to apply, whatever that means, new technology in many areas. But it is not going to build one new house in Canada. There is a low housing vacancy rate right across this country, .6 per cent. Here we are at a time when there is a real housing shortage in Toronto and Vancouver as well as in other cities; at the present time the vacancy rate in Toronto and Vancouver is less than one per cent. People must have housing, but we are presented instead with a program to spend $100 million over five years to demonstrate the good will of the minister at a time when we have a national housing crisis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: The situation is chronic right across the land. Interest rates on first mortgages are 10 per cent to 12 per cent and on second mortgages 21 per cent, at a time when only 5 per cent of Canada's wage earners can afford to buy new houses in many cities. Yet the minister has decided now to present this bunch of bluff as a means of solving the national housing crisis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Basford.]

Mr. Woolliams: The only thing we lack is innovation in leadership. The only change that will bring about a new and effective housing program is a change of minister and, above all, a change of government.

I need not say more, Mr. Speaker, except—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I should like to see those hon. members go back to their home cities which are experiencing these high costs in housing and clap there as they are clapping now in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: The United Nations is, of course, the world organization for peace and security. I am always pleased to see Canada participate in any conference, but at a time when there is no peace of mind, at a time when we should be declaring war on the national housing crisis, the government is setting up a bluff of $100 million. It is a joke.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the program announced by the government involves wrong spending at the wrong time and in a completely wrong area. The minister said in his statement that this is a "demonstration program designed to foster projects that will find solutions to urban problems", and that it will also provide the foundation for Canada's participation in the 1976 United Nations Conference to be held, incidentally, in the city of Vancouver.

An hon. Member: In his own riding.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister said he wants this conference to be known as Habitat 2000. I suggest in all seriousness that all this program is going to mean is $100 million down the drain, of no help to people in meeting housing requirements in Canada.

Why do I say that, Mr. Speaker? First of all, the minister knows full well that under Part V of the National Housing Act his own department in the past few years has spent almost $100 million on grants for research and development. But what results have we seen from the expenditure of all that money on research and development? The first point to be made is that most of the information has not even been published. We have not had access to the studies that have been carried out by people in his department. Second, most of the studies that have been done have led to total inaction. We do not know what was in those studies, but we do know that they have not led to programs of any real significance produced by this minister. The most glaring example of the results of that research program is the Dennis report, a serious study of low income housing in Canada, but the minister did not have the decency to publish it and its conclusions did not come to light until the NDP got a copy and released it, following which the government produced a truncated version many weeks later.

We do not need more research at this time in respect of the problems of housing in urban Canada. If we do need more research and development it is in respect of the problems of housing in rural and northern Canada. That would be meaningful spending in terms of research and development. We have already been researched to death in terms of where 85 per cent of the population of Canada lives and do not need another dollar spent in that area.

I strongly suspect that the only reason—I will not say what I was about to say—that the government is spending $100 million in this area at this time is that the minister resides in the city of Vancouver. There is to be a conference there in 1976 and it will do him no political harm to pour lots of money into that area of the country. Otherwise, it is being spent to disguise the fact, in terms of urban Canada where 85 per cent of the people live, that no one will get a house in the next few years because the minister will say they are looking into that area and are going to come up with an imaginative new program.

I remind the minister of what happened in respect of Habitat. He says he hopes the conference will be known as Habitat 2000. What happened to Habitat in Montreal? I do not know how many millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money were spent on it. Who is living there now? Upper income Canadians. Those with very high salaries are living in that highly subsidized housing paid for by the majority of the taxpayers of Canada. That is what happened to Habitat in Montreal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: We can do without that kind of example. We need action and not more studies on housing. I remind the minister that his home province of British Columbia has set aside $100 million for housing, $50 million to be used for land assembly and $40 million to subsidize mortgage rates. In contrast the federal government with all its resources is spending just a little more than $300 million. An amount of $100 million is being spent by one province with an NDP government and $300 million is being spent by this inactive Liberal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The gentleman and lady on my right are doing some yelling. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) concluded his statement with a criticism of the government but presented not one iota of a solution from the Conservative Party. All they do is criticize.

I conclude with this observation. What is needed is action in two areas of housing policy that affect Canadians. One is interest rates. The situation is the same in England and the Labour Party is now acting in that regard. We need to tell the banks to make money available at 6 per cent and frankly say: You are not going to make a profit in that area, but so what? People need housing and you can make a profit in other sections of your investments; we are going to get investment money for housing. That is one thing. Second, the government needs to move in a serious way in respect of land assembly. If they would take this $100 million and add a little to it, there are in 15 cities across Canada 50,000 acres of quick-start land that could be bought up and put into land assembly, and that would drive down the price of housing.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of State for Urban Affairs has just announced a $100 million program to promote initiatives for solving urban problems.

Mr. Speaker, never have the Canadian people, housing developers and Canadian municipalities been more slighted.

Is the minister implying that Canadians, municipalities and builders lacked initiative? I could give the minister and the government a long list of the most varied initiatives for municipal housing development and housing construction. From the point of view of research, I do not think the builders have remained idle either, because each day we hear about scores of new constructions and new proposals. For instance, besides traditional housing, we have heard about highrises, mobile homes, prefabricated units, modular, flying-saucer and low-cost houses. If the cost of houses keeps on rising, we will have to go back to tents and log cabins.

The cost of houses has become excessive, as well as the cost of installing the utilities that municipalities must provide when developing new housing projects.

Mr. Speaker, in northwestern Quebec for instances the director of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation office in Val-d'Or said recently that 2,000 new houses would be required in 1974 alone. But the problem is that there are not enough services to prepare the land needed to build these houses. The problems which the municipalities face are therefore not initiative problems but financial problems. They have to go on the market and borrow at and excessive rates, which prevents them from installing the required sewer and water systems and building the necessary streets.

Mr. Speaker, the House is well aware of the position of the Social Credit Party. On behalf of municipalities, these public bodies which exist not to make profits but to administer the common property of the community, we request Bank of Canada interest-free loans so that they may proceed with whatever developments are required to meet the demand of new houses.

Moreover, in order that Canadians may finally become the true owners of their houses, we request that the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials be abolished as soon as possible, that the excessive interest rates be lowered, and we shall see that instead of spending $100 million to try to finance new programs when we already do not now what to do with those we have, we can use this money to promote the construction of houses. Then Canadians will be happy.

POSSIBLE PRICE FIXING BY B.C. CEMENT COMPANIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that two of British Columbia's major cement companies have increased prices twice since January 1 on the same day and in the same amounts, I move under Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That the House set up an inquiry into these two cement companies in British Columbia to see if price fixing is still taking place in British Columbia in the cement industry.

Mr. Speaker: This motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

● (1430)

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

PRICE FIXING BY B.C. CEMENT COMPANIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a similar motion. I also rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the recent conviction and sentence imposed on the seven major cement companies in British Columbia under the Combines Investigation Act. In view of the fact that many of the projects were public projects and that the fine imposed does not necessarily relate to the public loss caused through this conspiracy I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard):

That this House advises the Minister of Justice to obtain forthwith legal advice and thereafter commence civil proceedings to recover the loss suffered by the federal government on the many federal projects undertaken during the period of the conspiracy.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

AGRICULTURE

REDUCTION IN PIG BREEDERS' INCOME—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I beg leave for unanimous consent to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. It has to do with the producers and consumers of food. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That this House consider immediately the reason for a sharp decline in prices paid to hog producers without taking into account the rising increase in the price of feed, which dangerously jeopardizes the balance of their enterprise and, on the other hand, the delays in making consumers benefit from the lower prices of that commodity, and that the Food Prices Review Board be also requested to look immediately into this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. According to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

THE MINISTRY

COMPOSITION OF CABINET—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask permission of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion which arises out of certain events which have occurred since October 30, 1972, and which occurred as recently as yesterday and last night in the House. I ask permission to move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse):

That it is the opinion of the House that a new form of coalition government exists in Canada and the House requests the Prime Minister to make a statement as to whether or not appointments will be made to the cabinet and to the Senate of members of the New Democratic Party in return for services rendered.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I assume there is not unanimity. The hon. member for Skeena.

TRANSPORT

SHORTAGE OF RAILWAY CARS FOR B.C. LUMBER—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish I had had the opportunity to second that last motion—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Howard: —in order that in the ensuing debate I could have pointed out the true economic conspiracy that exists between the old-line parties.

An hon. Member: Why did you vote the way you did last night?

Mr. Howard: My friend wants to know why I voted the way I did last night. I would be glad to explain to him except that with his limited intelligence he would not understand.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope the hon. member does not want to do that under Standing Order 43.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity relating to the continuing shortage of boxcars for the shipment of lumber products, which was brought into focus yesterday by the decision of the government to make a gift of $3.4 million to Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways to repair old boxcars and by the decision of Canadian National to spend $36 million to buy hopper cars to transport potash. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House urges the government and the CNR immediately to take action relating to railway cars for lumber shipping purposes similar to that taken with respect to railway cars for the shipment of grain and potash.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion which the NDP has agreed to second.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. O'Connor: I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 43, to seek consent of the House to move a motion of pressing and urgent necessity. In view of the obvious and lamentable lack of knowledge displayed yesterday by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) about investment and pricing trends in the Canadian automotive industry I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House instruct the minister to familiarize himself with the latest relevant data in this industry so that Canadian interests may be protected when negotiating with Washington.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair takes issue with the form of this motion. Hon. members know very well that motions proposed under Standing Order 43 should not be prefaced by allegations or accusations when hon. members who may be the subject of these allegations and charges have no opportunity to rebut. I invite hon. members to be careful when drafting a proposal under the terms of Standing Order 43. We have had five or six such motions already today and there are other hon. members who want to propose motions. I suggest to hon. members that there can easily be an abuse of the Standing Order if they proceed in this way. The hon. member for Nickel Belt.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DECREASE IN FULL-TIME AND INCREASE IN PART-TIME JOBS FOR WOMEN—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the revelation by Statistics Canada on March 12, 1974, of a seasonally adjusted figure showing that full-time jobs for women have declined by 41,000 over the one-month period of February, 1974, in view of the fact that Statistics Canada also reports a seasonally adjusted figure of a 40,000 job increase in part-time jobs for women over the same period, and in view of the serious implications these drastic fluctuations hold for women in the labour force, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis):

That this House instruct the Minister of Labour to investigate immediately and to report to the House the causes of these fluctuations.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair is tempted again to take exception to the form of the motion proposed by the hon. member. I suggest that these motions should not be preceded by that which, to the Chair in any event, sounds like a speech. That is the impression I have from the introductory remarks of the hon. member. Having said that, I will inquire whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have heard that there is not unanimity in this respect.

TESTING OF CONAT BLUE FLAME BURNER

Question No. 37—Mr. Hellyer:

Has the government tested the CONAT Blue Flame Burner and, if so, what were the results of the test?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: A prototype burner, of the small industrial size, produced by CONAT Industries, was fired in the experimental tunnel furnace at the Canadian Combustion Research Laboratory (CCRL), Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, during May 1972. The burner was installed and operated for four hours by representatives of CONAT Industries, and CCRL staff assisted by making a series of measurements of waste gas composition and temperature. This prototype burner did not have an automatic ignition system, nor a flame failure protection device, which would be required to become a marketable product. No other small industrial burners were compared, under identical conditions, to the CONAT system.

*KARL KRISTIAN RING

Question No. 40—Mr. Hellyer:

1. On what date in 1972 did Karl Kristian Ring enter Canada?

2. Has he been in Canada continuously since that date and, if not, what was the date of his latest entry?

3. Did he have a valid passport at the time of entry and, if so, from what country?

4. Did he have a valid visa at the time of entry and, if so, in what place was it issued?

5. On what date did the Department of Manpower and Immigration order his deportation?

6. On what date was the deportation order appealed?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the six parts of this question are: 1. May 28, 1972.

2. No, September 28, 1972.

3. Yes, the Federal Republic of Germany.

4. No.

5. July 30, 1973.

6. July 30, 1973.

CONSTRUCTION OF MAINTENANCE BUILDING, ELGIN, ONTARIO

Question No. 44—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 3,310 of the First Session of the 29th Parliament that tenders have been called for construction of a division maintenance building by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development at Elgin, Ontario (a) on what date were such tenders called (b) on what date did tenders close (c) from whom were tenders received (d) what was the amount of each tender (e) who was the successful bidder?

2. Was the call for tenders publicly advertised and, if so (a) in what publications (b) on what dates?

3. If the call for tenders was not publicly advertised, were invited tenders extended and, if so (a) to whom (b) on what dates?

4. Who drew the plans for the building to be built at Elgin, Ontario?

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. (a) November 30, 1973; (b) official tender closing time: December 20, 1973 at 3.30 p.m. (E.S.T.). A sudden 12" snowfall on that date created almost impassable road conditions in the Ottawa area with the result that no bids arrived at the designated receiving office by the official tender closing time. Within minutes after the closing time, a telephone call was received from a representative of Smith Building System & Supply Ltd., Kingston, advising that, in attempting to deliver his firm's bid, he had become stranded in Ottawa some distance from the tender receiving office and was unable to proceed further. This firm's tender eventually was delivered by hand on the morning of December 21, 1973. Under these abnormal conditions and in view of the pressing need for the maintenance building, it was agreed, in consultation with the Legal Counsel of the Canadian Construction Association and departmental officials, to canvass all other plan takers to determine if they too had attempted to deliver bids on or before the official tender closing time and, if so, to formally establish a later closing date in order that their bids might be considered; otherwise, to open and consider the sole bid received. (c) After verification that no other plan takers had bid on the project, the tender of Smith Building Systems & Supply Ltd., Kingston, was duly opened by the Tender Opening Committee at 2 p.m. December 21, 1973; (d) the sole tender received was for a fixed price of $160,298; (e) Smith Building Systems & Supply Ltd., Kingston, Ontario.

2. Tender were publicly advertised as follows: (a) Citizen, Ottawa; Journal, Ottawa; Whig-Standard, Kingston; Daily Commercial News, Toronto. (b) Daily issues of November 30 and December 1, 1973. Plans and specifications were also sent to Ottawa and Kingston Builders' Exchange.

3. Not applicable.

4. C. A. Richards & Assoc., Ottawa, Ontario.

COST OF OPERATING PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Question No. 52—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 3,073 of the First Session of the 29th Parliament, what are all the principal reasons why the cost of operating the Prime Minister's Office has risen from $900,839 in 1970-71 to an estimated $1,486,814 by the year 1973-74 when there has been an increase of only three persons in the total staff during this time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The principal items contributing to the increase in the estimated 1973-74 expenditure over the 1970-71 expenditure include funding of the Special Study on the National Capital, Great Plains Project (reply to Question No. 3,327 in the First Session of the 29th Parliament refers), Western Economic Opportunities Conference (the portion payable from PMO funds), plus the general increase which has occurred in salary budgets since 1970-71 and the three new man-years.

REVENUE FROM SALES TAX ON BUILDING MATERIAL

Question No. 146—Mr. Marshall:

What revenue has been derived by the government each year from the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials since the tax was levied?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): In so far as National Revenue is concerned: The tax on building materials was introduced on June 14, 1963. However, revenue statistics were not available until 1967 when the general sales tax rate was changed to 12 per cent while the tax on the specific building materials listed in Schedule V of the Excise Tax Act remained at 11 per cent. The department was thus enabled to identify the revenue derived from the sale of those building materials taxable at the lesser rate. This was done until March 1972. At that time, in order to ease the tax accounting burden of taxpayers, the practice of having them report those taxes being paid at the 11 per cent rate separately from those being paid at the 12 per cent rate was discontinued. Accordingly, statistics with respect to revenue derived from the 11 per cent tax on building materials are not available for the period prior to 1967 and subsequent to March 1972. The amounts set out below represent the revenue derived from the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials during those fiscal years for which statistics are available. 1967-1968, $226,650,497; 1968-1969, $212,905,892; 1969-1970, $223,-719,276; 1970-1971, $207,654,246; 1971-1972, $249,973,653.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PROJECTED EXPENDITURES FOR NEW EQUIPMENT

Question No. 163—Mr. Forrestall:

What specific guarantees are built into the recently announced Program of Modernization and Renewal for the Department of National Defence to ensure that this program will result in a spending of "almost 20 per cent of the total budget" on new equipment "by the end of the 70's" as indicated in the Minister's statement to the Press October 10, 1973?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): The new financing arrangements announced last autumn provide for specific amounts to be allocated annually for the next five years for the defence program as a whole, rather than for individual components of it such as the purchase of new equipment. Preliminary targets for capital expenditure have however been established, based on these totals and on projections of personnel, operations and maintenance costs reflecting the experience of recent years. These targets envisage an increase in capital expenditure from $245 million this year to $530 million by 1978-79. While there is no specific guarantee, it is reasonable to expect that actual expenditure for new equipment will approximate these targets and hence, as indicated in the announcement, will amount to almost 20 per cent of the total defence budget by the end of the decade.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—FIVE YEAR NATIONAL DEFENCE BUDGET

As part of the recently announced Modernization and Renewal Program for the Canadian Armed Forces, has the Department of National Defence projected levels of actual strength for the Forces over the next five years and, if so, what are the actual levels of manpower broken down into regular and civilian components anticipated as opposed to the authorized strengths in this five year planning cycle?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): The objective of the modernization and renewal program is to improve over-all military capability which can only be done through an appropriately balanced relationship of capital equipment and construction, operation and maintenance costs, and personnel. The Department of National Defence currently expects the strength of the Armed Forces and the number of DND civilian employees to remain at or near their present levels over the next five years.

However, $2.5 million will spill into fiscal year 1979-80, the year following the five-year program period to complete the required projects.

Order Paper Questions

CIVIL EMERGENCY FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM REDUCTION

Question No. 175—Mr. Forrestall:

What specific written communications and consultations with provincial and territorial authorities preceded the decision by the Minister of National Defence to reduce by half the annual budget for the Civil Emergency Financial Assistance Program?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): The Department of National Defence is in continuous communication and consultation with provincial and territorial authorities concerning civil emergency matters. Although there was no written communication with other levels of government prior to the decision to reduce the national defence civil emergency financial program, in making the announcement, the Minister of National Defence stated that detailed consultations would be held with provincial and territorial authorities prior to the reduction of Emergency Measures grants coming into effect commencing April 1, 1974.

MODERNIZATION AND RENEWAL OF THE DEFENCE PROGRAM

Question No. 176—Mr. Forrestall:

For what reason did the Minister of National Defence choose to announce his proposed program for funding that Department over the next five years by way of press conference rather than by way of a statement in the House of Commons?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Prior consultations with U.S. and NATO authorities, as well as preparation for advance notification of municipal and provincial authorities concerning the modernization and renewal program for the Canadian Forces had to be made. However, once these arrangements were made it was essential there be no delay. These arrangements could not be completed before October 10, 1973, a day on which the House was not in session.

[Mr. Richardson.]

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Participation of the Canadian Forces in peacekeeping or truce supervisory operations is a long established role assigned to the Armed Forces by successive Canadian governments. Financial provisions to carry out authorized tasks within this role is the responsibility of the Department of National Defence. The financial arrangements with the appropriate international bodies for Canadian participation in international peacekeeping or truce supervisory operations are negotiated by the Department of External Affairs with the assistance of the Department of National Defence. Financial provisions for the DND portion of the costs to the Canadian government are made by the Department of National Defence, under the authority of the government decision or order which authorized Canadian participation in the operation. 3. Will there be any lay-off of civilian staff at CFB Ottawa capable of performing this work and, if so, is it the intention of the government to phase out civilian employment within the Department of National Defence?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. The number of man-years of employment anticipated in each of the projects listed hereunder is as follows: (a) Interior painting of 123 PMQs, file WA 366 10, 2.56 man years; (b) Supply and install power humidifiers and rewiring furnaces in 156 PMQs, file WA 303 10, 1.41 man years; (c) Exterior painting various buildings, CFB Ottawa, file WA 370 10, 1.92 man years; (d) Supply and erection of chain link fence, CFB Ottawa, file WA 310 10, 3.27 man years; (e) Construction of gate house, CFB Ottawa file WA 309 10, 4.61 man years; (f) Supply and install vanity units in 736 PMQs files WA 304 10 and WA 305 10, 5.61 man years.

2. For Canadian Forces Base Ottawa North and South three other projects of a similar nature are planned to be tendered in the next six months.

3. There is no intention to phase out civilian employment within the Department of National Defence, but as a result of the consolidation of Canadian Forces Base Ottawa, lay-off notices effective March 29, 1974, were issued to a number of civilians, most of whom are term employees. Every effort is being made to place those affected in other employment by that date and recent developments have indicated that the majority of those under lay-off notice will be retained for developing maintenance projects expected to commence in April 1974.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—LOGISTIC SUPPORT OF ARMED FORCES IN ARCTIC

Question No. 185—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What level of funding has been provided by the Department of National Defence to provide logistic and supply capability for Armed Forces operating in the Canadian Arctic in each of the past four years?

2. What level of funding is anticipated in the next five years to ensure such capability is year round and to ensure that equipment, clothing, etc., is suitable for large scale operations in any given month of the year?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. The Department of National Defence does not allocate specific funds for the provision of logistic and supply support for operations in the Canadian Arctic. Funds allocated for the Canadian Forces logistic system are designed to support the Canadian Forces wherever they may be deployed in Canada and abroad. Therefore, to try to determine what funds were provided during each of the past four years for purely Arctic operations would mean searching data at a large number of field units, as well as the headquarters for which additional staff would be required, the cost of which would be very high; even at that the accuracy of the data might be questionable since a great deal of the logistic support for Arctic operation is also used for other operations; that is, Twin Otter aircraft of which two are located in Yellowknife and six in other parts of Canada.

2. No specific funding is provided in the next five years to ensure year-round logistic and supply capability for Arctic operations in terms of equipment and clothing since the Canadian Forces already possess this year-round capability to the extent required by the currently foreseen threat or challenge.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): (a) The staff studies conducted by the Department of National Defence into possible building programs for vessels intended for operational use North of 60° north latitude have been completed. (b) The studies spanned a period of two years. (c) The terms of references of these studies are classified. Hon. Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Central Travel Service was established under authority of Treasury Board Minute 676442 of January 25, 1968. The Service commenced operation in February 1968 with an establishment of a manager and two clerks. It continued with the same staff until April, 1972 when one additional clerk was added. The present establishment remains a manager with a staff of three.

2. The terms of reference are: (i) provide a fast, efficient and economical centralized service for the procurement of domestic and overseas travel and accommodation arranged for civil departments. (ii) provide a base for gathering travel statistics necessary to obtain the benefits of group fares and to minimize travel costs. (iii) minimize departmental staff involvement in making travel arrangements.

3. The Minister of Supply and Services.

4. (a) April 1, 1973. (b) The costs of operating Central Travel Service are to be recovered from customer departments and agencies. The costs arise from: (i) The cost of auditing carriers' charges on behalf of customer departments and agencies, and adjustment and payment of carriers' accounts. (ii) Supervision of travel arrangements made by carriers' agents, the investigation of complaints and enquiries and the implementation of appropriate service improvement action. (iii) The negotiation of favourable rates with hotels in Canada, USA and throughout the world; the publishing of a hotel index, which is updated quarterly and provides a current listing of hotels and the related negotiated rates. (iv) Interest charges arising from the financing of travel costs prior to receipt of payment from customer departments and agencies. The charge for these services is 1 per cent of the value of the travel expenditures audited and processed by Central Travel Service. (c) Treasury Board Minute 719002, 10 May 1973. (d) Not at the present time.

CENTRAL TRAVEL SERVICE—CHARGING POLICY

Question No. 213—Mr. Forrestall:

What is the rationale behind the charging policy of the Central Travel Service to government departments?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): It was a recommendation of the Royal Commission on Government Organization (Glassco), subsequently accepted by the cabinet and implemented under Treasury Board direction, that services provided to other government departments and agencies by the Supply Administration of the Department of Supply and Services be provided on a full cost recoverable basis.

POST OFFICE—INCREASE IN RATE FOR DOMESTIC FIRST CLASS MAIL

Question No. 215—Mr. Forrestall:

Does the government anticipate an increase in the rate for domestic first class mail from the present eight cents for the first ounce in the next 12 months and, if so, is it the policy of the government to ensure that the portrait of the reigning monarch will always be employed on the low-value definitive used with most frequency namely, the stamp representing the value of a first class domestic letter of one ounce or less?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Rates of postage for domestic letter mail are set out in section 10 of the Post Office Act. Changes in these rates, therefore, are possible only by act of parliament. Any proposals for amending the Post Office Act would be announced in the government's legislative program, at the appropriate time.

Hon. The loan is repayable over a term of 50 years at an interest rate of 6-7/8 per cent.

REVISION OF 1968 CALURA REPORT

Question No. 331—Mr. Reynolds:

At any point following the preparation of the 1968 Report of the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act for publication, was material destroyed or revised and, if so, what was the purpose and what was the nature of the differences between the original version and the version subsequently printed and issued?

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act report, part II, for 1968 was completed and printed while the Dominion Statistician was out of the country. It was held for review and approval of the Dominion Statistician on his return. Some parts of the textual material of the report were not considered to be appropriate and therefore it became necessary to amend the text and correct some typographical errors before presentation to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce for tabling in parliament. No charts or other summary tables were altered or deleted from the original draft on which the analyses were based.

LAW FIRMS RETAINED BY CMHC FOR LOANS APPROVED IN SURREY, WHITE ROCK, LANGLEY AND COQUITLAM

Question No. 332—Mr. Reynolds:

1. What law firms in Surrey, White Rock, Langley and Coquitlam in British Columbia drew CMHC mortgages in uninsured loans in 1971, 1972 and the first six months of 1973?

2. How much did each of these firms receive in legal fees from the government for handling these mortgages in 1971, 1972 and in the first six months of 1973?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: 1. The law firms listed below were retained by CMHC to handle mortgage documentation for loans approved in Surrey, White Rock, Langley and Coquitlam in 1971 to June 1973. Burnaby, Hean, Wylie and Company; New Westminster, Hogarth, Oliver and Hughes; Richmond, William H. Mulholland; Surrey, James L. Davidson, A.K.N. Virani.

2. Legal fees in connection with CMHC direct loans are paid by the borrowers and CMHC, therefore, has no record of the amounts paid to these lawyers.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—CLAIMS COMMISSION

Question No. 340—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

1. Has the government firmly rejected a Claims Commission as a means of determining the valid claims of Canadian Native People?

2. If the government proposes to settle claims by negotiation, what procedure is proposed to guarantee that one group of natives will (a) know the terms (b) receive the same terms of settlement applied to another group?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. It is assumed that reference is being made to an adjudicatory claims commission. The government believes that negotiation is the preferred course, having regard to the nature of these claims. Negotiation fosters more direct involvement of those concerned and permits more comprehensive treatment of the issues. In his recommendations to date the Commissioner on Indian Claims, who is responsible for studying claims and facilitating the development of settlement processes, has proposed negotiation as the preferred course to be followed. Adjudicatory machinery may be necessary at some point for certain types of claims, but the government feels that it would be premature to deal with this possibility at this time. Neither Mr. Barber nor the government has so far encountered a situation in which the judgmental processes inherent in an adjudicatory claims commission seem necessary or desirable.

2. (a) Appropriate steps will be taken to ensure that terms of any settlement become public knowledge. (b) It is expected that settlements will vary to take into account the divergent circumstances on which claims are based. No doubt participants will want to feel that any settlement is comparable to others and this will be a factor in the government's approach to any proposals put before it.

The exchange of old certificates continues and the amount of these old coupon bonds still not exchanged is estimated at $429,700. (e) (i) No exchange of fully registered bonds was necessary (ii) This information is not available and would be very difficult and expensive to obtain. (f) In each year, $1,650,000, representing 3 per cent interest on the $55 million outstanding perpetual bonds, was credited to a special account to meet interest payments. (g) For fully registered bonds, interest is paid by mail automatically. Interest on coupon bonds is paid when the coupons are tendered to a paying agent. When coupons are not tendered, the interest is maintained in a special account. Holders of original bonds may still exchange them for new bonds with all coupons attached.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I have noticed that a number of members who had questions on the order paper when the House was prorogued have not yet put them down on the order paper again. We have done the research into these matters, have the information and would appreciate it if members would do so if they want that information.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: It had been my hope to present enough answers before the conclusion of last session to give me a 100 per cent average instead of only 89 per cent.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN CONSUMER PRICE INDEX

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express a sense of urgency and shock with regard to the figures on the cost of living released today. In so doing, I would seek to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a special and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the announcement today by Statistics Canada that the January to February increase in the food index is the largest such increase in a quarter of a century.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East has provided the written notice required by section 2 of Standing Order 26. As hon. members know, the Chair has always been reluctant to concur in the putting of a motion for the adjournment of the House on the basis of monthly statistics produced and provided by Statistics Canada. In spite of the importance of the matter, I have the same reluctance today. The statistic on which the hon. member bases his proposed motion has reference to the matter of inflation which has been under discussion during much of the throne speech debate. The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) was concerned with the problem of inflation.

In addition to these considerations, the Chair is required to consider whether other opportunities will be available within a reasonable time to debate the issue. For one thing, I would be very surprised if the subject of inflation remained unmentioned while the House considers Bill C-7, the first order of government business this afternoon. Also, the Chair cannot overlook that there are six remaining allotted days before the end of the current supply period on March 26, that is, six non-legislative days out of ten.

My conclusion is that a motion under Standing Order 26 to debate the subject of the hon. member's motion should not be allowed today.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

COST OF LIVING INCREASE—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT CONTINGENCY PLAN—DATE OF BUDGET

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. the Prime Minister. In view of the cost of living figures published today and in view of the statement by the government House leader at the opening of the session that in the next couple of weeks or thereabouts he would bring in some bills related to the whole question of food supply, inflation and so on, may I ask the Prime Minister when we are going to see these bills, now that the two weeks have expired?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is one bill before the House today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Oh, come off it!

Mr. Trudeau: I see that hon. members have not taken advantage of first reading to notice its contents, but if they do they will see that we are beginning to put into practice the program announced in the Speech from the Throne.

An hon. Member: We have read it, all right.

Mr. Stanfield: Since it must be apparent to the Prime Minister that inflation is running throughout the entire economy—

Mr. Sharp: Throughout the world.

Mr. Stanfield: And the economy in Canada.

Mr. Sharp: And throughout the world.

Mr. Stanfield: —I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is going to invoke his so-called contingency plan and, in particular, can he tell us if we are going to have an immediate budget and on what date the budget will be brought down?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, to answer the questions in reverse order, the date of the budget will not be announced by me today. As to the second part of the question, yes, there will be a budget, which will deal with this and many other matters. As to the first part of the question, the answer is that the government is indeed very concerned about these rising prices, particularly the fact that 60 per cent of the increase in the cost of living is attributable to food and almost half of that is an increase in beef prices. We do know that the quarterly report of the Food Prices Review Board, which will include a review of beef prices, will be out at the end of next week.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: We hope that by then the situation will have clarified.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is very gallant of the Prime Minister to try to hide behind Mrs. Plumptre.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

An hon. Member: Get out from behind that woman's skirt.

An hon. Member: It is getting kind of crowded there.

An hon. Member: Herb Gray is there already.

An hon. Member: She is quite a slender girl; remember that.

Mr. Stanfield: Since the Prime Minister has emphasized the extent of the increases in the cost of food and food prices, has he any over-all plans with regard to levelling off or holding down rising costs or, as he might say, the inputs into agriculture so that there might be some prospect of prices levelling off?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we do, and we gave an outline of that in the Speech from the Throne.

An hon. Member: That is what worries us.

Mr. Trudeau: I must point out to the Leader of the Opposition that just last week, when the newspapers were indicating that beef prices were falling at the consumer level, members of his own party were complaining that those prices were going down.

Some hon. Members: Not true.

An hon. Member: That is a distortion.

An hon. Member: Pierre the twister.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I must correct the Prime Minister. What we object to, as does his friend, Mrs. Plumptre, is that the—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Stanfield: —retail price of beef has not been falling—

Some hon. Members: Question!

An hon. Member: Shut up!

Mr. Stanfield: —despite the falling of the price to the producer. I should like the Prime Minister to stick to the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do want to say that the very day these questions were posed I cut out of the newspaper, and I can show it to the Leader of the Opposition—

An hon. Member: Oh, you read the newspapers?

An hon. Member: Have your press agent write a letter.

An hon. Member: Are you keeping a scrapbook?

Mr. Trudeau: As hon. members who attended the press gallery dinner know, I spend three days a week now looking at newspapers.

An hon. Member: That is all you are doing, obviously.

● (1450)

Mr. Trudeau: There is a very large article indicating that the prices of beef and meat had fallen substantially. I repeat to the opposition that they should make up their minds. Do they want to have prices go down or do they want to complain when prices go down?

COST OF LIVING INCREASE—POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO EMPOWER GOVERNMENT OR REVIEW BOARD TO ROLL BACK UNJUSTIFIED PRICE INCREASES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to pose a question to the Prime Minister. In view of his repeated statements in the House and elsewhere and in view of the further disastrous rise in the February consumer price index, is the government now ready to introduce legislation to give itself or the Food Prices Review Board power to roll back unjustified price increases?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have answered this question before. The answer is that we are prepared to take measures to do that.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact the government has already had evidence with regard to bread, beef, sugar, cement and housing, how long is the Prime Minister going to wait before he puts legislation on the books to give the government or a reconstituted Food Prices Review Board power to stop the gouging of the consumers of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Very simply, Mr. Speaker, I would repeat what we have said before, that we do not favour at this time over-all prices and wage control. I do not think the hon. member does either. Therefore we are acting in each particular case. The leader of the New Democratic Party pointed out a series of cases on which we had acted, for example, on milk and bread. Only last week the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs obtained assurance from the bakeries that they would not bring in the increase they had announced they would, as a result of the representations of the minister and the work of the Food Prices Review Board. Therefore my answer is the same. If we find villains, to use that word, or if culprits are identified by the board as being guilty of gouging, to use the hon. member's word, and if they do not respond to the entreaties of the board after they have had a chance to explain their case, the government will then step in. This is the position we have always taken. It is the position I repeat today. The hon. member cannot quote cases of increases in prices which have been rolled back after pressure from the minister as cases where the government did not act.

Mr. Lewis: It is precisely because I do not accept the over-all price and wage control method that I am asking the Prime Minister whether he is now or when he will be prepared to introduce legislation that will give power to somebody to stop unjustifiable price increases, particularly in view of statements by the Prime Minister during the throne speech debate and outside the House that the government is prepared to stop profiteering at the expense of the consumer. I ask the Prime Minister whether it is possible for the government to act effectively without the necessary legislation. Since it obviously is not, when will the government produce the necessary legislation?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I must point out that the fact that a member alleges there has been gouging or profiteering is not sufficient reason for the government to step in arbitrarily and impose its will on any private sector of the economy. That is not the philosophy of this government. However, when gouging or profiteering has been established before the independent board and those who are alleged to have gouged have been given a chance to state their case, if they do not take corrective action that is when we will act and not on some arbitrary suggestion by the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Lotbinière and then the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings and others on the same matter.

INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO HELP CONSUMERS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the problem caused by the increase in the cost of living, especially that of the basic needs, which affects especially the fixed-income citizen, would he be willing to study the possibility of helping the consumer directly or paying him a compensated discount? Would he also be willing to study, positively, such measures in favour of those citizens who are powerless because of the game of the mighty?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should not ignore the fact that the story of the last session and the last few months proves specifically that the Liberal government intervened in favour of those citizens. Surely, he knows that we increased the old age pensions, that we will escalate them according to the increase in the cost of living, and that we have tripled family allowances. If he does not know that, then he should find out.

Oral Questions

INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO HELP WORKERS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière will be recognized for a supplementary, after which the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings will have the floor.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister who talks about his endeavors on behalf of these people explain why he lost complete interest in the builders of our country, in workers whose income is insufficient, who have many children and who, furthermore, are strictly limiting themselves as regards salary demands, at the government's request. I would like him to tell us if he really intends to encourage not only those who cannot work anymore but also those who are building our country.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should read again my reply to the previous question. It is aimed mainly at those workers who are building our country, who have children, as the hon. member said. We have—and I repeat it—more than tripled family allowances. In the federal field we have also increased the minimum wage. Perhaps the hon. member should make inquiries before asking questions.

[English]

COST OF LIVING INCREASE—MEASURES TO ENABLE WORKERS TO REGAIN PURCHASING POWER

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As the figures released by Statistics Canada show that average weekly earnings increased by 5.9 per cent during the past 12 months while during the same period the consumer price index increased by 9.6 per cent, is the government now prepared to introduce specific measures which will enable workers to regain the purchasing power of their dollars?

Right Hon. P.E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is a contradiction in the question asked by the hon. member. He ended up talking about purchasing power of the dollar. Therefore he should be talking about disposable incomes and not average wages. If one looks at the figures for disposable income, the average money received by the average Canadian over the past year, it has risen considerably higher, something in the order of 6 per cent higher.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: I am simply quoting figures produced by the government's own agency. It is obvious from the Prime Minister's reply that if the figures are distasteful to him he claims they are wrong.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I must correct the hon. member. I did not say the figures are wrong. I say it is the intelligence of the hon. minister which is lacking.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Hees: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member is entitled to one more round, after which I will see the hon. member for St. John's East.

● (1500)

Mr. Hees: On a question of privilege, I think I should advise the Prime Minister that he is premature by just a few weeks.

Mr. Trudeau: On the same question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that is hardly a question of privilege. The right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings are exchanging remarks. Perhaps we might try to continue with supplementaries on this important matter.

Mr. Lewis: I rise on a short point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of what the Prime Minister said, reflecting the true coalition, may I ask him to inform us what portfolio the hon. member has been given?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INCREASE IN FOOD PRICES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CONTROL PRICE OF BASIC COMMODITIES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to get back to a more serious subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs what he proposes to do by way of legislation, faced with the hard evidence produced today by Statistics Canada of a 2.3 per cent increase in food prices, representing the highest February over January increase since 1949, and whether he will now bring in legislation to control the price of essential basic food items in order to protect people in the lower and middle income brackets.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I am glad the hon. member recognizes the importance of this subject compared with his hon. friend on the front bench.

Mr. Hees: Stick to the straight stuff, Herb.

Mr. Gray: The Prime Minister has stated on behalf of the government, and I can confirm this, that we have taken action in the past through specific measures to deal with this type of problem and we are committed to be prepared to do this type of thing in future.

Mr. Hees: You are not even good at the straight stuff.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the fact that the price of beef went up by 7 per cent, may I ask the minister what steps he has taken to ensure that the Canadian people are not being gouged, especially since this increase in the price of beef did not go to the cattle producers of this country?

Mr. Gray: The Prime Minister has already noted that the next quarterly report of the Food Prices Review Board is expected to deal in part with this subject.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: I am also informed that the board has under way a special four-week study of beef price margins. This was begun a week ago. When it is completed, the report will be published. The Prime Minister has pointed out that the board's action in this way is a vital supplement to our basic action in working to increase supplies of major commodities and also to help Canadians, through improvements in their disposable income, to cope with rising prices. I think we have taken effective action in the past, and we shall continue to take effective action in the future.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. John's East on a further supplementary, and then the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I think it is about time you came to the rescue of the members of this House and stopped this dangerous tendency of the Prime Minister and other ministers to cower behind Mrs. Plumptre's apron-strings.

DECLINING FARM GATE PRICES—ACTION TO ENSURE CONSUMERS BENEFIT THEREFROM—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON BEEF PRICES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I want to get down to a very particular case again inasmuch as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs did not give an answer to the previous question. In view of the fact that the 7 per cent increase in beef prices last month confirms that declining farm gate prices are not being passed on to consumers, what immediate steps is the hon. gentleman taking to ensure that such beef price reductions will be passed on to the consumer?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I have mentioned the urgent studies being conducted by the Food Prices Review Board. I repeat that the government is committed to take appropriate action in light of these reports.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): I have a question for the Prime Minister in light of the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture that the consumer must be prepared to pay 30 or 40 cents a pound more for beef. Would the Prime Minister tell us whether this is the policy of the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would have to look at the statement made by the minister and consider in what context he made it. However, I do not think hon. members opposite would object to the Minister of Agriculture suggesting that the cattlemen should get a better return for their beef.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the Prime Minister did not hear my question. I was not talking about the cattlemen getting more for their beef; I was talking about the fact that the Minister of Agriculture said the consumer has to face an increase of between 30 and 40 cents per pound for beef. Is this the policy of the government and, if not, what is the policy?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. lady did not hear my answer, I imagine. I told her I would have to look at what the minister said. Certainly it is not the policy of the government that the consumer must pay more. It is the policy of the government that supply must be increased, and in order to increase the supply of food products in Canada it is necessary for the producers to have an assured and sufficient income. I would hope we could count on the support of members opposite on this point.

FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN POWERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who is fully informed regarding this problem, one which has received so much attention today and in the last several months. I want to ask him, to begin with, whether he is satisfied with the operations of this price control board. Does he not feel that its powers should be greatly increased so that, instead of simply being a peripatetic group which asks for information here, there and elsewhere, it would have power to act?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): First of all, it is not a price control board. But I am interested to see this great expression of confidence by a former prime minister of this country in the work of the Food Prices Review Board. I think it helps confirm that the board is doing a good job and has the power to carry out the kind of job which the food prices committee of this House said it should undertake as a supplement to the constructive action of this government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have over the years heard humorous things said in this House, but the hon. gentleman goes to the head of the class by that answer.

An hon. Member: What a great comedian!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I find, in looking at Hansard, that there are interruptions from time to time by nonentities who do not get identified on the record. I think there was another one just then. I now ask the minister this: Is he satisfied, and is the government satisfied, with the way in which prices are galloping ahead in the absence of action by the government except for frivolous remarks such as those just made by the minister, which do him no honour?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister will, of course, be allowed to reply to the right hon. gentleman's question, but it seems to me this is an argumentative exchange between the right hon. gentleman and the minister, who is now recognized.

● (1510)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. If you will check the record I think you will find that the right hon. gentleman described the members of this House as nonentities. I think he should reserve that sort of comment until he has departed Parliament Hill by at least 50 yards.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have heard of the devil rebuking sin. Have I forgotten that the right hon. gentleman called members of parliament nobodies? What is the difference between a nobody and a nonentity?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. I am not sure that much is to be gained by this exchange. I do not know what hon. members ate today but it certainly has inspired them.

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSSIBILITY OF PRODUCTION OF COST OF LIVING INDEX RELATED TO GOODS AND SERVICES PURCHASED BY PENSIONERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in relation to the rising cost of living, and particularly with respect to the rising cost of food and other essentials, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the minister discuss with Statistics Canada the possibility of producing a cost of living index that relates to the actual goods and services that senior citizens—

Mr. Nowlan: And veterans.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —and Veterans have to purchase, so that the escalation of the pensions of our senior citizens—

Mr. Nowlan: And veterans.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —and veterans—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —will bear a meaningful relationship to their situation?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure, but I believe that Statistics Canada is reviewing its cost of living index. I will certainly take note of the hon. member's suggestion. However, I should like to point out that this can be dangerous in two ways. If the food index were to come down or not rise as fast as some other elements of the cost of living index, the old age pensioners might be the ones to be hurt. This is what would have happened during the last ten years when food was not rising as much as the other components of the cost of living. It can work also against old age pensioners, but I will certainly look at this suggestion.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROTECTION AGAINST LOSS OF BENEFITS BY TEMPORARY WORKERS IN MAPLE SYRUP INDUSTRY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Since the operators of sugarbushes are experiencing difficulties in hiring workers to gather the maple sap, even in this period of the year when there are great numbers of unemployed drawing benefits, can the minister tell us whether in view of that emergency situation he is prepared to suggest amendments to the unemployment insurance regulations in order to enable beneficiaries to work at sap gathering without being penalized?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving notice of the question. My understanding is that the requirement is that they work for a period of two to three weeks. This can be done by unemployment insurance claimants, though their benefits would stop during the period they were earning other money. They would not have to requalify when their work ceased, provided their payments are not stopped for a period in excess of four weeks.

INDUSTRY

ASBESTOS—SUGGESTED TARIFF ACTION TO FAVOUR QUEBEC INDUSTRY

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the leader of the government.

In the light of a suggestion I made last week, could the Prime Minister tell the House whether he is considering the possibility of intervening in the asbestos sector by taxing Canadian exports thus favouring Quebec industrialization?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not remember, Mr. Speaker, that the member made that suggestion, but I will certainly consider it.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister intends to consider this proposal, could he reach a decision before the beginning of the GATT trade negotiations?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am of course willing to look into that matter as soon as possible. It might help me achieve this if I could know the Progressive Conservative party's policy relating to export tax. Would this tax be applied on every Quebec product or only on certain products mentioned by the hon. member?

GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS

PRIME MINISTER'S RESIDENCE—SUGGESTED CANCELLATION OF RENOVATIONS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Noting that the Prime Minister himself has suggested to Canadians that they must learn in these days of shortages to make do with less, I ask the Prime Minister whether he will consider following his own advice by cutting down expenditures such as ash trays at $30 each, book matches at $76 and wooden matches at $161?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly prepared to consider putting these up for auction if this is the desire of the House. I think perhaps all hon. members should consider cutting back on their salaries, too.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will observe that we are running short of time. I have serious reservations about a question asked in those terms. It is really in the form of a representation and is the kind of question which normally would be placed on the order paper. I will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary, after which I will recognize the hon. member for Malpeque.

Mr. McKenzie: In a more serious vein, Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister take under consideration the cancellation of the continuing renovations at 24 Sussex Drive that are already approaching estimates of $90,000?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Malpeque.

FARM CREDIT PROGRAMS—REQUEST THAT INTEREST RATE BE STABILIZED AT PRESENT FIGURE

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that input costs for farmers are rising even more rapidly than the cost of food, can the minister assure farmers that the current 7 per cent interest rate on farm credit programs—for example, the Farm Improvement Loans Act—will not rise beyond that point at the next adjustment; and in any case would he give some assurance to the agricultural sector of Canada so that they can plan for the difficult financing of their greatly increased input costs?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the significance of the hon. gentleman's question and I thank him for giving me notice earlier in the afternoon that he would put it to me. I am unable to predict what the interest rate will be, for obvious reasons, but I will have in mind both a realistic access to funds by the farming community, fishermen and small businessmen under the various guaranteed loan programs and, at the same time, a reasonable incentive to the private sector to enter this guaranteed loan field.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING FARM CREDIT POLICIES AND PROGRAMS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I have a brief supplementary to the President of the Privy Council, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture. Since his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, stated in Manitoba a couple of days ago with regard to government policy that the second major thrust for the coming year is a complete revision of farm credit policies and programs, could the President of the Privy Council say, since this apparently will involve legislation, when such legislation will be brought down and the bills made available so members can at least study them and the agricultural sector can be given some indication of their prospects for the next crop year?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there will at an early date be some items of legislation introduced. At least one that I have in mind at the moment will be put on the order paper very soon. There is a series of items that will be coming forward. However, I doubt whether we would be able to deal with them in any event before the end of March and probably they will not come forward until April or later.

HOUSING

GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE TOWARD REDUCING MORTGAGE RATES—POLICY RESPECTING LAND SPECULATORS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that Statistics Canada cites the increase in mortgage rates as one of the reasons for the increase in the cost of housing during the last month, can the minister inform the House whether he intends to bring forward a proposal that will effectively reduce mortgage rates in Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no because, in the tight housing market we now have, any subsidization of interest rates would probably be reflected in adverse capitalization of the value of a house.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I will try another area of policy and direct this question to the same minister. Considering that the cost of land for serviced lots in urban Canada has gone up by about 60 per cent in the last three years and, not unrelated to that, the profits of housing development corporations have gone up by a somewhat higher rate, can the minister inform the House whether he is considering bringing in a 100 per cent capital gains tax on speculative land dealings?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my colleague has of course been leading us toward land assembly stabilization in conjunction with provincial and municipal governments to stabilize land prices across the country. On the particular aspects of the question, that is a budgetary matter upon which I would be precluded, by the practice of the House, from expressing a view at this time.

STUDY OF HIGH COST OF HOUSING—REQUEST FOR REDUCTION OF SALES TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister responsible for housing and urban affairs. Has his department concluded a study relating to the high cost that Canadians must pay for housing to determine whether it is internationally induced, and will he now confer with his cabinet colleagues in order to reduce the burden of the 11 per cent federal sales tax on building materials?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, naturally there have been a number of analyses made within my department and others as to factors relating to the cost of housing. The budget program of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for land assembly and, the program of assistance to home owners are designed to answer some of these problems. I think the question in respect of the sales tax should be directed to the Minister of Finance as it is a budgetary matter. The cost of housing and the cost of land obviously represent serious problems in the country, but I regret the incredibly ignorant statements from the opposition parties about the way in which we are endeavouring to seek new solutions to these problems in an effort—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would seek the co-operation of hon. members in limiting the number of supplementary questions as we are coming to the end of the question period, particularly if we are to have two or three additional questioners.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I have one short supplementary question for the minister following his answer. Noting that the increase in the average selling price of houses in the year 1973 in Canadian provinces ranged from 4 per cent to 26.2 per cent, what specific proposals will the minister offer to alleviate this burden upon Canadians?

Mr. Basford: First, Mr. Speaker, to build as many houses as we can, and we have been building houses in this country at record levels over the last three years; second, to develop a very active land assembly program to stabilize the cost of land. We are engaged in allocating to the public assembly of land more money than governments of this country have ever done. Third, to have a well financed social housing program involving more money than has ever been involved at the federal level to assist people on low and moderate incomes to acquire houses; and fourth—

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FINANCE

REQUEST THAT SALES TAX ON TEXTILE PRODUCTS BE REMOVED

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. With the increase of 5.5 per cent in the wholesale price index of textile products in the past year, and particularly in view of the fact that this increase has its most adverse effect on those in lower income brackets, will the minister take immediate steps to remove the sales tax on textile products?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, again, I am not the Minister of Finance.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could redirect the question to the Minister of Finance in the hope that he will not pass the buck quite so quickly.

INDUSTRY

ASBESTOS—SUGGESTED TARIFF ACTION TO FAVOUR QUEBEC INDUSTRY

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, of which he has received notice.

Does he intend to modify the tariff applied on the exportation of crude asbestos with a view to encouraging mining companies to process the raw minerals in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government is examining the desirability of further processing in Canada of Canadian raw materials, and we are also hopeful that at forthcoming negotiations of GATT there will be an opportunity to negotiate more opportunity for upgrading Canadian raw materials.

PUBLIC SERVICE

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING HIRING OF TEMPORARY STAFF

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. As excessive government spending is one of the main factors leading to inflation, and in view of the fact the government has spent in the neighbourhood of $6 million to $9 million in the use of private placement offices to hire temporary help for government services, I should like to ask the minister why the Department of Manpower, the function of which is to find placements and jobs for people in government departments, is not hiring these people.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the particular placement agencies to which the hon. member refers are generally involved in taking on temporary employees whom they then provide to people needing overload help. The Department of Manpower is in the business of referrals and has not yet been authorized to have a temporary pool of employees on its own staff to be then made available to others. We are looking at such alternatives and I will be discussing this matter with my colleagues, but the general policy thrust would come from the minister of another department.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize hon. members, without allowing supplementary questions, as we have reached the end of the question period. Perhaps for that reason the hon. member for Wellington, who has a supplementary question, might wait until tomorrow. I recognize the hon. member for South Shore.

FISHERIES

HADDOCK—CUT-OFF DATE FOR UNITED STATES TRAWLERS AND OPENING DATE FOR CANADIAN FISHERMEN IN CERTAIN AREAS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the heavy haddock landings at Boston on March 4 and March 6 by United States trawlers operating in ICNAF areas 5 and 4X, would the minister indicate whether any cut-off date for haddock fishing in these areas has been agreed upon with the United States, and when will these areas be opened to Canadian fishermen in order to increase the supply of food and thereby help keep food prices in check?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that no other country has breached the haddock regulations, we hope that United States trawlers will cease taking haddock by March 17.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY AS TO SIGNING OF AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

When does he intend to make a statement in the House concerning the Ottawa-Quebec agreement and will that be soon?

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, first I must draw attention to the fact that the minister has just left the House to meet senior officials from the Manitoba government concerning the general agreement which will eventually be signed with that province.

As regards the question of the hon. member for Sherbrooke, the minister does not intend to make any statement concerning agreements signed with each of the ten provinces. There are five remaining and I can assure him that, concerning the province of Quebec, the signing will take place next Friday in Quebec City.

INDUSTRY

GENERAL INSTRUMENT CORP., SYDNEY, N.S.—REDUCTION IN WORK FORCE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO FIND EMPLOYMENT FOR WORKERS AFFECTED

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of the fact that the normal work force of approximately 1,000 employees at the General Instrument Corporation plant at Sydney has been reduced by 300 employees in the past few weeks, and the fact that much of the production of that plant is exported to the United States and Europe, will the minister investigate the problem as quickly as possible and also give consideration to having officials of his department meet with senior officials of the General Instrument Corporation to see whether we can get these people back to work?

● (1530)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. gentleman's advance notice of this question we have already been in touch with the company. I have instructed my officials to explore with the company whether there are ways in which we can assist the company to regain its export business. As the hon. member knows, some 90 per cent of its business is export.

Oral Questions

COMBINES

SUGGESTED REVOKING OF BUSINESS LICENCES OF COMPANIES CONVICTED OF PRICE-FIXING

Mr. Ed Nelson (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of repeated prosecutions of three large sugar importers on charges of price-fixing and of concrete evidence of similar practices by other companies and indications that the imposition of fines appears to have little deterrent effect, is the government considering implementing legislation to provide for the lifting or suspension of the business licence of any company convicted more than once of deliberate price-fixing?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will realize that the issue of such licences is under provincial jurisdiction. I would hope he would make representations to the appropriate provincial government. Insofar as the criminal aspect is concerned, of course we do act under the restrictive trade practices legislation and the House will have an opportunity to express its opinion on that subject.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before calling orders of the day the Chair will recognize one question by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta and another hon. member.

ALLEGED PRICE-FIXING BY B.C. CEMENT COMPANIES—INVESTIGATION THEREOF

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that the Lafarge and Ocean Cement companies in Vancouver have had two price increases since January 1 and those price increases were of equal amount and were released on the same day, and in view of their past record, can the minister advise the House whether these two companies are under investigation again for price-fixing in the province of British Columbia?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that specific question would be more properly directed to the minister responsible for the Combines Investigation Branch than to myself. In that regard, it is not ordinarily appropriate to comment upon investigations under way until there is a result in terms of action.

ENERGY

POSSIBLE CONTINUATION OF CANADIAN CRUDE OIL PRICE FREEZE

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In order to protect the interests of the consumer, will the Prime Minister continue the oil price freeze in light of the fact that an end to the freeze would add more points to the consumer price index; or is the Prime Minister satisfied that Canadian consumers can cope with the cost of living?

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member surely knows that at the federal-provincial conference in January the federal government undertook to ensure that further increases in price in the five provinces east of the Ottawa Valley line would be absorbed by the federal government, and that a very heavy subsidy will be paid in that regard for the benefit of consumers. The estimate is before the House now, and I hope we will have the support of all hon. members in passing that estimate. As for the future, after the end of March, beginning on April 1, negotiations are going on between the producing provinces and the federal government. We hope very much that before the end of the month we will be able to announce a continuation of the freeze, but not at the same level. We have committed ourselves to let the producing provinces increase their price at the wellhead, but not to the international level. The exact figure for that price is under negotiation now.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, ADMINISTRATION AND OFFENCES

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill C-7, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and to repeal an act to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to propose the second reading of Bill C-7. The purpose of the bill is to implement the first stage of the government's new competition policy. It is my intention today to outline the major provisions of the bill mainly in general terms. While I would be happy to answer questions and points raised by hon. members to the extent I have the opportunity to do so during the course of this debate, I look forward to the committee study of the bill where there would be an even greater opportunity for me to deal with hon. members' questions, ideas and suggestions and to discuss these with them, as well as all the various proposals of the bill, in full detail.

This bill reflects the view that all Canadians can benefit from having a marketplace subject to the stimulus and the pressures of the forces of competition. However, it places particular emphasis on measures to assist them as consumers and also as small businessmen. A fundamental necessity for consumers, if they are to operate successfully in a market system, is the availability of full and accurate information about the goods and service that are offered to them for sale. Therefore, the bill proposes to make considerably stronger and clearer the sections of our present competition law, the Combines Investigation Act, dealing with misleading advertising. The new bill forbids the making of a representation to the public that is false or misleading in any material respect.

As the House may know, this is a broader coverage than in the present law which applies largely to published advertisements. The bill would define a representation to the public as including anything imprinted on or attached to the article offered for sale, expressed on a point of purchase display or on display advertising. In fact, it would also include statements made by the salesmen. In addition, the bill would make clear that a representation may be misleading, and therefore forbidden by it, equally because of the general impression it conveys as much as from its literal meaning. But one can well argue that even full and accurate information about goods and services offered is not sufficient for consumers when those products, and often those services, more and more frequently involve advanced and complex technology beyond the knowledge and understanding of most people today. Therefore, I believe the consumer today must have greater assurance than is the case at present concerning the basic standard of performance to be reasonably expected from the product or service in question.

This, I think, means improving and strengthening our laws on warranties and guarantees. Much of this area falls within the provincial jurisdiction, pertaining as it does to the law of contract. However, the federal government also has jurisdiction in this area and has proposed in Bill C-7 new protection in this field using this jurisdiction to deal with the deceptive and misleading aspects of warranties and guarantees. I think these proposals should complement any provincial reforms which eventually would come in this area. They would at the very least provide some basic form of protection for consumers across the country irrespective of the extent the province in which they live may or may not come to update its law in this regard.

The bill therefore proposes that it would be an offence to make a representation to the public in a form that purports to be a warranty or guarantee of a product that is materially misleading. It proposes that it would be an offence to offer a warranty or guarantee if there is no reasonable prospect that it would be carried out. Any warranty or guarantee that limits the supplier's liability to a standard lower than that which would apply under the civil law would be deemed to be materially misleading unless the fact that it is limited in this way is clearly stated in it. Also, warranties that confer no material advantage on the purchaser would be considered misleading in a material respect, and therefore contrary to the proposed bill.

The bill would also prohibit under criminal sanction a number of selling practices if they are carried out as defined in the bill. I think it could be said there has developed a commonalty of view about them that they should not be allowed in these forms in the marketplace. These practices are: referred selling, pyramid selling, bait and switch selling, double-ticketing and sale above advertised price, and I propose to discuss them in full and complete detail when the bill is before the appropriate standing committee.

Another necessity for the effective operation of the marketplace is that arrangements and agreements between sellers do not deprive consumers and businessmen as well of the benefits of competition with respect to such things as price, quality and range of products available. Bill C-7 would strengthen the government's ability to deal with collusive agreements in restraint of trade by redefining the test that must be met in order to prove that such agreements are contrary to the law. The present law states that for an agreement to be contrary to it, it must be proven that the agreement prevents or lessens competition unduly. But in some cases in recent years the courts have interpreted the word "unduly" to mean the complete or virtual elimination of competition in the relevant market. In other cases, the courts have disagreed with such a demanding interpretation.

In any event, cases can and do arise in which competition is lessened to an extent that is obviously detrimental to the public but which might not meet the severity of the test of complete or virtual elimination of competition. The bill proposes, therefore, that in order to prove that an agreement prevents or lessens competition unduly, it would not be necessary to establish complete or virtual elimination of competition in the relevant market. In other words, the amendment would make clear to the courts that parliament does not intend the more rigorous interpretation, which has been a matter of argument in the courts for some years, to be the one to be applied.

Let me turn to another matter important to the development of law whose purpose is helping to ensure the effective operation of the marketplace in the interest of the consumer and of all Canadians. This is the extent to which that law in fact applies to activities carried out in the marketplace. At the present time, our competition law, the Combines Investigation Act, does not apply to services, aside from a few limited exceptions. Yet the service sector comprises some 20 per cent of our gross domestic product. The bill, therefore, would extend our competition law to cover services generally. I think this is a major step forward in the development and putting in place of competition policy in Canada. The bill itself mentions some limited exceptions, but one basic exception to this coverage would be with respect to those activities authorized or regulated by other valid federal or provincial laws.

This exception is not stated in the bill itself but arises out of existing jurisprudence. The effect of this jurisprudence, taken together with the proposals in the bill, would mean that all economic activity in Canada would be subject to some form of social control on behalf of the public, either through federal competition law or through other specific provincial or federal legislation. If a sector is taken out of the purview of competition law through being placed under another law of a regulatory nature, I think it can be said that this means in effect that the Canadian people, through their elected representatives at the provincial or federal level, have decided that this form of social control is more desirable and more in their over-all interest than the form made possible through competition policy.

Turning to another matter, the bill would make bid rigging, that is, the practice of entering into agreements to refrain from bidding on tenders or submitting tender prices arrived at by collusion, to be an offence without further proof of the intention or effect of this practice.

Also, the present law regarding resale price maintenance would be strengthened by the bill. Resale price maintenance keeps selling prices higher than they would otherwise be by eliminating competition at wholesale and retail levels. One of the ways the bill strengthens the present law is to make it an offence not simply to require a customer to resell a product at a specific price but to make any attempt to influence upward or discourage the reduction of a price.

The bill also strengthens the rules for competition in the banking industry but proposes that their application be the responsibility of the Inspector General of Banks.

The bill deals with a number of trade practices which under certain circumstances could be acceptable but not in others and which could have detrimental effects, again depending on the circumstances. The practices dealt with in the bill are: refusal to deal, consignment selling, exclusive dealing, tied sales, and market restriction. Such practices could, under certain circumstances, be used to prevent the free operation of market forces and limit the consumers' choice. They have been the cause of many complaints to the combines branch, particularly from smaller businessmen who feel they have been restricted in their business activities on the part of suppliers or would-be suppliers. But, the present law does not cover these particular practices.

Under the bill, the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission would be given the power to issue orders forbidding or modifying these practices. These orders would have the same effect as orders of a civil court and they could be made by the commission following hearings on particular situations brought before it by the director of the combines branch. The bill also proposes that failure to comply with such an order would be grounds for a criminal prosecution.

The sections setting out matters reviewable by the commission make provision to protect the rights of the parties against whom an order is sought. Each practice is defined, as are the conditions under which an order may be made in each situation. Moreover, before any order can be issued, anyone against whom an order is sought in the words of the bill, "must be afforded a reasonable opportunity to be heard." These words in the act, when read together with the Federal Court Act to which I will refer in a moment, are intended to cover such matters as the right of the person against whom an order is sought to know the case against him, the right to call evidence to answer it, the right to cross-examine and the right to appear in person and be represented by counsel or otherwise.

Appeals from decisions of the commission will be provided by the Federal Court Act to the appeal division of the Federal Court where the commission failed to observe a principle of natural justice or otherwise acted beyond or refused to exercise its jurisdiction, where it erred in law in making its decision or order, or where it based its decision or order on an erroneous finding of fact that it made in a perverse or capricious manner or without regard for the material before it.

[Mr. Gray.]

One very important proposal in the bill, in my view, is that the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission be given the jurisdiction to make orders to forbid the implementation in Canada of foreign judgments, laws or directives where it found them to be contrary to the Canadian public interest. This would include such matters as their effects on Canadian trade and industry. The bill proposes that the director of the combines branch would have authority to bring such situations before the commission, and where the orders are not obeyed this would be grounds for criminal prosecution.

I think that recent events have demonstrated the importance of this proposal and have provided a strong argument for the House to make a favourable decision on this bill at the earliest possible date.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: Let me go on to say that the benefits of the proposals in a bill like the one now before the House, in my view can become meaningful only to the extent that there is improvement in the procedures and remedies available for their application and enforcement.

Here, too, I believe the bill would bring about positive change. The bill calls for the Attorney General of Canada and the provincial attorneys general to be given the power to seek interim injunctions to prevent the repetition or continuation of alleged offences against the act until the main issues are settled by the courts. This would be a completely new procedure in so far as competition law in Canada is concerned.

Equally new is the proposal that anyone injured by a violation of the act would be able to sue for full damages and costs. As I have said previously, I believe that to be meaningful this right should be exercisable not only by an individual citizen or government but also by citizens as a group through class or representative actions.

It is my hope that the bill in the form in which it is finally approved by parliament will enable class actions to take place for damages caused by violations of it, in so far as the federal parliament has the authority to make such a decision. As also I have said previously, I have already asked officials of my department and of the Department of Justice to explore what further drafting may be required to accomplish this important objective.

The bill also contains proposals that could well lead to a speeding up of the bringing to trial and disposition of cases dealing with competition matters. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the present law states that such cases can be brought either in the provincial courts or in the Federal Court, but in order to bring such cases in the Federal Court the consent of the accused must first be obtained. The new bill proposes that where the accused is a corporation it would not be necessary for the Crown first to obtain its consent in order to bring a case under our competition law to the Federal Court. It also proposes that trials could be held either in the place of residence of the individual or company involved or in the place where the offence was committed. These proposals, I think, would enable the Crown to have regard to the volume of work already pending in a particular court before deciding where to launch a certain proceeding.

Hon. members will have noted that the proposals in the bill are cast in the form of amendments to the existing Combines Act and not as a complete replacement for it. This, I submit, will make easier to apply and will make more immediately effective this first part of the government's program to modernize our competition law.

I would also submit that the bill deals not only with matters of direct and current concern to consumers and small businessmen but also proposes important changes in broader areas of competition policy which are applicable to large as well as small companies.

I think this is demonstrated by what I have said about such matters as the extension of the total purview of our competition law to services, the change in the definition of the term "unduly", as well as giving the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission the authority to review certain kinds of business practices.

What, then, remains for the second stage of competition policy? I think it could be said that generally speaking there is a need to develop legislation containing additional criteria and methods upon which to judge mergers, monopolies and specialization agreements. These, although they may be restrictive of competition, could on balance be in the public interest through their effects on efficiency and productivity, depending on the particular circumstances involved.

There have been many arguments made that there are circumstances where the criminal law approach alone should not be used, but instead there should be a way of applying statutory tests to determine what the effects of a proposed merger would be on competition and efficiency. If the tests are not met, it could be argued that there should be a procedure for dealing with the transaction by appropriate remedial orders.

Certainly a high priority will have to be given in stage II to provisions which will enable competition law to play its part in helping improve the efficiency of Canadian business and its ability to compete abroad. In the bill to implement stage I which is now before the house it is proposed that the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission be given new jurisdiction to review and, in certain circumstances, to make remedial orders about certain kinds of trade practices. Another aim for stage II is to decide what other trade practices should be made subject to review in the same way.

Among the practices which we are looking at are interlocking directorates, delivered pricing, reciprocal buying, quantity discounts, and loss leaders. Their effects may vary depending upon the circumstances, and these practices, I think, are candidates for handling in the same way as are the trade practices covered in stage I, that is, initially by a civil approach rather than by a criminal one so that under proper circumstances the economy would not be deprived of what could be instruments useful for competitive purposes.

As I have said, I think we should consider whether general jurisdiction in the trade practices area should and could be created at the federal level similar to that exercised by the Federal Trade Commission in the United States. This body, as the House may know, in addition to having jurisdiction to prohibit or modify specific activities has broad authority to prohibit unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices generally in the marketplace. It has authority to issue cease and desist orders under threat, initially, of civil penalties and to issue guidelines with respect to practices in a specific industry or with respect to certain kinds of practices, irrespective of the industry in which they are found.

I have said previously that one argument for the federal government using a general approach in the general trade practices area would be that it would be done on a national basis and would therefore help bring about a useful degree of uniformity across the country. I have argued that this would avoid a multiplicity of possibly overlapping and confronting rules, and thereby facilitate Canadian economic activity.

All that I have said so far underscores the necessity in stage II of making decisions on appropriate institutions and procedures to enable any possible policy changes of the kind I have mentioned to be carried out fairly and effectively. Decisions in this area are another objective of the second stage of competitions policy. By having the areas which I have just mentioned, particularly those dealing with mergers and specialization agreements, dealt with in the second stage of competition legislation, I think there can be greater certainty that this will be consistent with the government's evolving industrial policies and its foreign investment policy. At the same time, by asking the House to deal now with Bill C-7 I am taking action on behalf of the government to enable parliament to take decisions earlier than would otherwise be the case in some important areas particularly relevant to present public concerns linked with current inflationary pressures.

Let me now take a moment to pay tribute to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) and to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) for their efforts which helped lead to the bill now before the House.

In conclusion I want to say that the proposals in Bill C-7 to implement the first stage of the government's new competition policy, as well as the proposals to come in the second stage of policy development will, I submit, result in legislation which will at one and the same time help bring about a more efficient and productive Canadian economy, and help provide expanded consumer protection in a marketplace characterized by high technology and massive organization of production and distribution. I therefore urge the House to give second reading to this bill as quickly as possible so that it can go at the earliest possible stage to committee for detailed but, I hope, speedy consideration and decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, it is with mixed feelings that our party joins this debate on major amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. On the one hand we are glad that the government has finally learned its lesson after the debacle it created with its infamous Bill C-256, the competition act, in the twenty-eighth parliament. The bill before us today represents a rejection of the omnibus nature of the earlier proposal, and it rightfully proceeds in an incremental fashion. It is in a form which is more manageable in size and is less radical in its philosophical and legislative thrust. Also, I think there are practical advantages to bringing in this scaled-down competition policy as an amendment to the existing act, as opposed to introducing a brand new act.

We are also pleased that the government appears to be giving some priority to the consumer protection aspects of competition policy, a course of action strongly recommended by PC members of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices last spring, which recommendation eventually found its way into the first report of that committee. I suppose that if this government is going to do nothing to try to stop inflation, the very least it can do for consumers is to provide some means of redress against the misleading or unfair practices of unscrupulous merchants in the marketplace.

I said we approach this debate with mixed feelings. On the negative side, we are rather puzzled by the sudden haste of the government in introducing a bill of this magnitude and importance on a Monday and rushing it into second reading on a Wednesday, two days later. The legislation involves fundamental philosophical considerations of a political, legal, economic and federal-provincial nature. It creates, to all intents and purposes, a new, highly centralized agency which has the potentiality of interposing itself into a major segment of Canadian political and economic life. Affecting matters within both federal and provincial jurisdiction, the bill will permit the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to alter or restructure market distribution systems in Canada in an unprecedented fashion.

The point is that this bill, in its substantive impact, is no minor tinkering or legislative patchwork job. It is major legislation and deserves careful scrutiny and a full and informed debate, not only by members of this House but by the many businessmen, consumer groups and provincial governments who will be directly affected by its provisions.

I want to make it clear to the minister that it is the position of our party that persons, associations or provincial governments wanting time to study and analyse this bill should have it in order that meaningful briefs can be presented to the standing committee to which it is referred. We would suggest that a minimum period of some four to six weeks prior to commencement of committee hearings might be in order to permit this study, analysis and preparation, fully acknowledging of course that this bill is identical in form to the one the minister introduced on November 5, 1973.

A more important reason for our mixed reactions to this bill relates to the main reason why the bill was probably brought on in such haste. That is the shocking revelation over the past few weeks of the apparent inability of the Canadian government to protect Canadian economic sovereignty, as was so clearly evidenced by the almost aborted sale of Canadian locomotives to Cuba by MLW-Worthington Limited of Montreal. Members will recall that the company is a United States subsidiary carrying on business in Canada but which felt bound by the provisions of the United States trading with the enemy act. That foreign law would have prohibited the sale to Cuba.

Obviously, the minister has felt compelled to bring in the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act because they contain provisions granting powers to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to review instances where foreign judgments, foreign laws or directives from foreign managers are contrary to the Canadian public interest and, after according full opportunity to be heard, to make orders forbidding their implementation in Canada. As indicated by my leader on several occasions in this House last week, we agree with the goal of this legislative provision. It is obviously designed to prevent another MLW-Worthington situation from occuring.

Yet let us examine what the bill before us actually does in this area. Decisions which can have a fundamental policy impact on relations between sovereign countries, and adversely affect Canada's foreign trade or external relations, are delegated to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. Who ever heard of it before this bill was introduced? The government, wrongfully in my view, will be abdicating its own responsibilities to make policy decisions of this magnitude. We would strongly urge that the government reconsider vesting decisions of this sort in the Commission and consider vesting these decisions in the governor in council, in the same fashion that it does in making decisions to reduce tariffs or in making decisions respecting "significant benefit" under the Foreign Investment Review Act.

It would be all right for the RTPC to make recommendations to cabinet, but let us not have any abdication of responsibility on fundamental questions of economic policy. The Canadian public are entitled to know what the government of Canada will do about the implementation of a foreign law or directive that may affect our external trade or relations. The government should take the responsibility and not pass the buck to the RTPC.

What are the dangers of allowing the government to abdicate its responsibility in this area of fundamental policy? One has to refer only to the speech last Thursday of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) in the throne speech debate to see a graphic example of what I mean. In explaining to the House why he had been unable to pursue any real transportation policy as Minister of Transport, the minister gave this little anecdote:

> Hon. members may say, "You are the minister: you do it." I have a few answers to that, Mr. Speaker. It is true that hon. members gave responsibilities to the minister, but they forgot to give any authority at all in many instances . . . I told you I would not make a political speech. I am just trying to tell you the facts. Everything is done the same way. We have the CTC, which has final authority over almost everything, except in a few cases where there is provision for an appeal to the minister.

That explains the whole problem. The government must not be allowed to abdicate its responsibility to a subordinate agency and then come back and tell the Canadian people that it does not have the power to pursue a policy which it considers necessary.

Now let us move on and look at some of the other powers granted to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. The most far reaching power granted to the RTPC is to review instances of refusals to sell a product and to order a supplier to supply, or to recommend tariff changes. At first blush this power seems disarmingly simple and reasonable. But upon further examination one can see that its practical implementation may have a radical impact on the nature of distribution systems for products in Canada which may well be inconsistent with the real economic and structural facts of life in this country.

The provision effectively will put the onus on the seller to justify his distribution system when he is called before the commission. That will likely be the general approach since the act invites the imposition of sanctions if the commission finds that the reason for inability of the person to obtain adequate supplies of the product is "an inadequate degree of competition in the market". There is no onus on the Director of Investigation and Research who brings the initial application to prove the inadequate degree of competition. Clearly, there is an open invitation for the commission merely to find it. The conclusion that refusal to sell is synonymous with inadequate competition may be too inviting for the commission under these circumstances.

But perhaps even more important than this reversal of the onus of proof is that this section represents a denial of the fundamental right of any seller to deal with whomsoever he wants. Not only does this right have a solid foundation in the common law of English jurisprudence, but the American legislation, with all its sophisticated provisions, clearly has no restrictions of this nature. Neither was any such restriction ever considered by congress when the legislation was last amended. Yet in that country, discount selling, which apparently is the aim of the minister in proposing the power for Canada, is flourishing to a far greater extent than in this country.

From the manufacturers' and distributors' point of view, taking away their right to refuse to sell in Canada would have a huge impact on their existing marketing systems of distribution. The provision also raises serious questions for various franchise systems, the practice of private branding, offshore suppliers and technical servicing requirements. These are matters of detailed substance which will have to be explored at the committee stage of this bill. One would hope that the minister might provide a fuller explanation of what he is trying to achieve and how he justifies the means that he has adopted. Also, one would hope there would be some explanation as to why this provision permits the commission to single-out one supplier for attention rather than merely authorize an order of general application to be applied to all suppliers in the same position.

There are also problems of procedure with the powers that are granted to the RTPC over refusals to sell, exclusive dealing practices, tied sales, market restrictions, etc. The minister very ably went through some of the procedural problems and provided some of the answers. While the act does specify that in the exercise of these powers the parties affected must be given "a reasonable opportunity to be heard", and that is a matter subject to judicial review in the Federal Court, the commission is left to make its own rules for the regulation of its proceedings and the performance of its duties and functions under the act. This may well lead to uncertainty and possible arbitrariness in proceedings before the commission, problems which might otherwise be overcome through specifying certain minimum procedural protections in the legislation itself. That is the drafting approach we would favour.

For example, the act is silent as to a right of reasonable notice of the hearing, the right to call and examine witnesses and to cross-examine other witnesses, the right to reasonable adjournments of the hearing and the right to a written decision with reasons. Perhaps more important as a practical matter is the silence of the act on the extent to which a party to be affected by an order of the commission will have access to and advance notice of the research done by the commission's staff in preparation for the hearing. With respect to a hearing on a refusal to sell application, for example, a manufacturer or distributor would want to have some advance information as to the concentration ratios the commission would be likely to adopt as its test for determining who is the dominant seller supplying goods in conditions of "inadequate degree of competition."

Even more important is the relationship of the commission research staff to the commissioners who will, after all, be making judicial and quasi-judicial decisions on many of the applications before them. In order to maintain the decision-making integrity of the commission in a quasi-judicial context, should not the commission's staff be attached to the Director of Research and Investigation, who makes the initial application, instead of the commission in order to guarantee fairness and the appearance of fairness?

Finally, it is our view that the standing committee giving clause by clause study to this bill should examine carefully whether there is need for a substantive right of appeal to the courts from an order of the RTPC. It is acknowledged that sections 18 and 28 of the Federal Court Act provide a comprehensive right of review of commission decisions made on a judicial or quasi-judicial basis. The minister is quite in error when he calls it a right of appeal. I hope the minister will provide the rationale for the sufficiency of this review right in light of the recommendations in many of the briefs already submitted for a broader right of appeal.

One of the significant and more desirable aspects of the bill before us today is the application of many of the prohibitions of the act to service industries. This obviously has been included as a result of a very strong recommendation of the Economic Council of Canada in its interim report on competition policy released in August, 1969. The importance of this change is demonstrated by the fact that service activities previously not subject to the prohibitions of the act make up approximately 20 per cent of the gross domestic product of Canada.

There are various classes of service industries which are exempted for one reason or another. The largest, most important class of exemption is service activities which will be covered by laws, usually of a province or municipality, which regulate or authorize them. For reasons not entirely clear, the minister has not specifically included the exemption in the provisions of the bill but has taken the position that it flows from judicial interpretation.

The minister points out that following the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act reference to the Supreme Court of Canada in 1957 it was held that regulatory schemes based on valid legislation, whether federal or provincial, could not be held to be "to the detriment of or against the interests of the public", as the then Combines Investigation Act put it, nor could they be schemes "to unduly limit or prevent competition" within the meaning of the then section 411 of the Criminal Code. This class of exemption will include services such as the professions, telephone companies and other forms of communication, and electrical power industries. They will all continue to enjoy immunity from combines prosecutions to the extent that their activities are specifically regulated or authorized by law.

We seriously question whether the reliance on judicial interpretation is really the right way to go about providing this class of exemption. As a practical matter, it will create uncertainties for various service industries which will be unable to determine whether their pricing practices are exempt from the federal prohibitory net. The securities industry is a case in point. While the bill specifically exempts bond and stock underwritings and primary distribution by groups of investment houses acting together in order to spread the risk, it is silent as to the rates of commission charged by brokers on the purchase or sale of listed or unlisted securities. The commission rates on all listed shares are set by the by-laws of the stock exchange which are subject to review and approval of the provincial securities commission in most cases.

On the one hand, it may be argued that because the bill specifically exempts bond and stock underwriting and primary distribution, then by implication it would include within the net of its prohibitions agreements as to its commission rates. Yet there is a 1907 judicial precedent, King V. Gage, holding that the by-laws of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange were not an undue restraint on trade and therefore exempt from federal combines law. However, that precedent would apply only to commodities regulated by the exchange which would not include unlisted shares traded by brokerage houses, the commission rate for which is generally agreed on as a matter of practice.

The practice of leaving the matter of judicial interpretation not only flies in the face of the normal doctrine of paramountcy, but it leaves quite an unacceptable and uncertain result for service industries wanting to know where they stand. In this regard, reference should be made to the remarks of Professor Bruce MacDonald of Queen's law school, an expert in the combines field, in an article in the 1969 Canadian Bar Review. I quote:

> It may be that the courts, in refusing to apply the doctrine of paramountcy in favour of the Combines Investigation Act over provincial regulatory legislation, have achieved a politically viable solution. But when political accommodation is dependent upon a legal solution formulated by the courts, completely satisfactory results are fortuitous.

I suggest that the minister give consideration to providing a specific clause outlining the nature of this exemption for activities subject to special regulation. Clause 92 of Bill C-256, the competition act, in the last parliament attempted to do this, and I think a clause along these lines would be preferable to the form of the act before us today. In this way, service industries could have a much clearer indication of whether their activities violated the act and whether they required special provincial legislation to legitimize their situation. I would mention, in particular, real estate agencies, advertising agencies, optometrists and telephone answering services which will find the situation somewhat unclear and which, along with the investment houses, would be assisted by a more specific clause.

I also want to indicate support for the clause of the bill providing that proclamation of the law in relation to agreements in restraint of trade in the service sector may be brought into force at a later date than the remainder of this legislation. This is necessary, obviously, to permit a reasonable time for the service sector to modify its practices in the light of the new provisions, or for them to be covered by valid provincial legislation, a process which takes a considerable period of time.

There are other specific exemptions of service industries which we find puzzling. For example, no rationale has been given for the exemption of collective bargaining activities. We think it is high time in Canada that the government applied anti-combines laws to the labour unions. We wonder whether it is the government's present coalition arrangement with another party in this House that prevents them from moving in that direction. Last September 20, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave an interview to Anthony Westell of the Toronto Star in which the right hon. gentleman said this:

> We accept that big business and big unions are monopoly type powers that can be the cause of certain types of cost-push inflation, and we acted to counter that. The main thrust of our competition act didn't pass in the last parliament, but we said in the Speech from the Throne that we are going to reintroduce it in a different form. The main thrust still will be to counteract that monopolistic power. It will be to restore competition so that big businesses, monopolies, oligopolies will not be able to keep prices up or wages low because they have such a large hold on the market.
> I intend, as Prime Minister, to counter that type of monopoly. I would include eventually the monopoly of labour in some of the large unions. But as you will see from our bill, as you saw from the last one, we are dealing first with the monopoly of business because that is the more dangerous one . . . having dealt with that, if we are successful, we may also act in other laws to deal with the monopoly of labour.

Well, let me tell the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, that we think the government should deal with the monopoly of labour in some of the large unions right now, in the context of the bill which is before us.

Another curious exemption is the banks. While the bill creates minor amendments to the Bank Act dealing with agreements as to service charges, the amounts or kinds of loans or services, or persons to whom the loans or services will be made, we believe the minister should at least provide an acceptable rationalization as to why the banks should continue to be treated differently, under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance. This is a different and softer type of combines regime than exists for other financial institutions such as the trust companies and insurance companies.

The banks in this country, while they have been prosperous and efficient, have never been noted for their competitiveness. This is only too well known by small Canadian businessmen unable to secure adequate financing for their proposed business activities. Perhaps at the next ten-year review of the Bank Act there will be time to consider this question. In the meantime, I hope the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) will provide an acceptable rationale for their exemption from the present bill, at least something better than has been contained in the flurry of documents emanating from his office over the past few months.

Now, going back to the consumer protection provisions dealing with such matters as misleading advertising, bait and switch selling, untrue or misleading warranties or pyramid selling, it is in this area that we have the fewest differences of opinion with the government. However, there are a few matters of principle which give us cause for concern and which we would like the minister to consider prior to the committee stage of the bill. For example, on the misleading advertising provisions, why has the government eliminated the defence of mens rea or honest mistake by the merchant or advertiser prosecutions under those sections? In moving from the "credulous man" test to the "general impression" test, why did the government consider it necessary in section 36(5) to insert a "literal meaning" test as well? Why has the government sought to exempt printers and publishers from misleading advertising prosecutions, but not broadcasters? Should they not all be liable to prosecution if what they print, publish or broadcast is materially false or misleading?

To what extent, if any, has there been consultation with provincial governments which, after all, have power to introduce their own legislation on warranties and testimonials, pyramid and referral selling, bait and switch selling, and so on. What assurances can the minister give us that the legislation will not duplicate or conflict with provincial legislation, thus causing uncertainty and confusion for those in the marketplace? It is significant in this respect that the minister, upon introducing Bill C-227 on November 5 last, told us that he planned some form of provincial consultation after the bill had received second reading and been referred to committee. This was certainly a presumptuous posture on his part, indicating that he wanted to establish a parliamentary toe-hold as a bargaining tactic before approaching the provinces.

This, surely, is not the way to conduct federal-provincial relations; I would have thought that the government, as a result of its experiences in the field of energy, would by now have learned its lesson. This subtle but gradual erosion of provincial powers through unilateral extension of the criminal law is inimical to most provincial governments and it is about time the federal government started consulting and co-ordinating in the consumer area, rather than confronting and cajoling.

As a general proposition, and speaking personally, I am inclined to support the section of the bill bringing professional and amateur sports within the ambit of the Combines Investigation Act in the same way as other services, with the exception of specified arrangements among member clubs of the same sporting leagues. The commercial exploitation of young Canadian athletes has been going on for too long now, particularly in professional and amateur hockey.

We want to take a close look in committee at the provisions which purport to take into account the need for clubs to agree on arrangements for maintaining a balance among teams in their own league, particularly as this may affect many local amateur baseball and hockey leagues throughout Canada which could not survive without this sort of guarantee. At the same time, as the government moves in this direction it might consider ways and means by which a portion of the large signing bonuses paid to coming young professionals might be returned to the communities which developed their playing abilities, for the promotion and maintenance of the amateur leagues there as well as for the further development of young players there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Atkey: There ought to be some sort of economic return when those young players come along and hit the big time, and I believe the government should give us a commitment that they will do something about it. I am pleased to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in his place. I cannot help but wonder why the sections promoting competition in professional sports could not somehow have been brought to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare who is blatantly seeking to protect the monopoly of the Canadian Football League against the competitive threat to the Toronto franchise of the World Football League. It is a sorry spectacle to see one minister of this government promoting competition and another, in the same week, seeking to deny it. Perhaps the Prime Minister might reconcile these ideological differences of opinion and clear up the confusion.

The bill before us provides important new civil remedies for persons who have suffered loss or damage resulting from a violation of the act or an order of the commission or a court, together with his full costs. Under the previous competition act, Bill C-256, there was provision for double damages, but the government has now wisely concluded that this was overreaching. The bill also provides that, for the first time, the courts will be able to issue interim injunctions to prevent the commission or continuation of suspected offences against the act until the main issue is disposed of. In many practical business situations this protection is even more important than the right to recover damages, because it allows victims of anti-competitive practices to take immediate action to protect themselves, pending ultimate court adjudication.

I thought the minister was really becoming quite bold when on February 2, in a speech he made in Toronto, he recognized the necessity for civil damage suits through class or representative actions. He said at that time:

> It is my hope... that the bill in the form in which it is finally approved will enable class actions to take place for damages caused by violations of it, insofar as the federal parliament has the authority to make such decisions. I have therefore asked officials of the combines branch under the Department of Justice to explore what further drafting may be required to accomplish this important objective. Of course, it may well be unlikely (and here I am not expressing a final opinion) that the federal parliament will have the power to authorize class actions in those courts whose procedures are determined by provincial authorities. However, the bill proposes that the right to sue for damages which I have mentioned can be exercised not only in the provincial courts, but in the federal courts as well. And, I would presume that the federal parliament would have authority to deal with procedures to be used in a court created under federal law.

Well, Mr. Speaker, some time between February 2 and last Monday the minister lost his nerve, for unfortunately we see no class action provisions in the new bill that he has brought forward. I sincerely hope that his courage returns by the time the bill is discussed in committee.

As for the criminal penalties in the bill, the government has apparently learned its lesson and is no longer trying to bludgeon the business community to death as it did with its $1 million and $2 million fines in the earlier bill, and the invidious section which presumed directors liable for offences of which the corporation had been convicted, which was really a denial of the due process of law.

However, by leaving the maximum fine under this bill at $10,000 with an alternative or supplement of imprisonment for one year, there may be the danger that the courts will be invited, perhaps to an excessive extent, to make use of the imprisonment section for serious contraventions of the act. I would prefer to see the maximum monetary fine increased to, say, $25,000 both as a move away from imprisonment as a means of regulating the economy, and in recognition of the fact that a monetary fine must on occasion be sufficiently high in order that it does not become just a licence fee as the price of continuing illegal activities.

There are many more problems with this bill which will undoubtedly come to light in the course of discussions in committee and as a result of the submissions that I know will come forward from consumer groups, business groups and from provincial governments. The far reaching powers to be granted to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission will require the closest scrutiny both as to substantive standards and as to matters of procedure. Throughout the complex legislative process that lies ahead in which the government seeks to grant new powers of intervention in business, to create a new agency, and to set up new standards of business behaviour, it will be good discipline for a member involved in the process to ask himself from time to time whether all the provisions of the legislation are really necessary, given the economic and structural facts of life in Canada today. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that members on this side of the House will ask themselves that question from time to time, and that will be our pragmatic approach as we assess each area of regulation.

As for the minister's purported second stage of his competition policy dealing with industrial restructuring, mergers, monopolies and specialization agreements, let me simply say that he should proceed with extreme caution. My colleagues on this side of the House will have more to say on this later in the debate.

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party I offer this bill a qualified welcome. I think it is a useful piece of legislation, by and large, so far as it goes. I agree with the decision of the government to proceed with this phase of the competition policy about which it has talked for some time. Meanwhile, we await the second, and in my judgment more important, phase that the government suggests will be along before the end of the year.

[Mr. Atkey.]

However, I want to say at this point that I do not agree that we need to wait that long for the second stage of the competition bill. Just because we move now to consider the implications of the legislation before us does not mean that there is any good reason to delay stage two. I therefore begin by urging the government to accelerate its schedule and to introduce the second stage of its competition policy at an earlier target date than it now appears to plan.

I should like to make one or two comments on the remarks made by my hon. friend from St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey). I do not fault the government for its haste in bringing in this bill on a Wednesday, having first introduced it on Monday. It is, of course, the same bill that was introduced in this House in the last session, and it is in many respects the end of a process that began a couple of years ago when the government initiated a wide ranging discussion on competition policy.

From my point of view, this legislation has appeared none too soon. I hope the bill will proceed to committee without lengthy debate and, in view of the fact that much discussion has already taken place on the general principles and philosophy of competition policy, that we can avoid the bill's being bogged down in committee as it is lobbied by one group or another over a lengthy period of time.

Of course, this is not to deny the right of interested parties to appear before the committee. But I am not anxious to be party to a procedure which sees the effective implementation of this bill delayed for a long period of time while many of those groups which have already had a substantial say in the formulation of the government's basic, philosophic approach come back to have another crack at it.

On many aspects of this bill I defer to the expertise of my learned friend from St. Paul's and associate myself with some of the caveats that he has entered against specific aspects of the bill. I would, however, most emphatically dissociate myself and my party from his views on the collective bargaining process and, I may say, from the views which he quoted as being those of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In this respect I am afraid his bias got the better of his learning.

The organized labour movement will indeed be surprised to discover from my hon. friend that it is a monopoly, especially when organized strikebreaking is allowed to flourish across the country, not excluding in provinces governed by the same party to which my hon. friend from St. Paul's belongs. As far as I and my party are concerned, the fundamental premises of collective bargaining are inviolable.

I should like to comment upon some of the specific aspects of the bill which relate to its objective of creating an environment of fair play in the marketplace. We heard evidence before the committee on trends in food prices last year indicating that in that particular industry, as indeed in many others, such fair play was not currently being provided to consumers. In its survey of retail food stores published in November, 1973, the Food Prices Review Board drew specific attention to a number of practices. I had a look through that report to see to what extent their recommendations were reflected in this bill. For example, the Food Prices Review Board drew attention to the practice known as double-ticketing. Let me quote from their report, page 7:

> The practice of raising the price of a food product which is on the shelf of a store, and on which the price has already been marked, by restamping or adding another price label, is one to which consumers object strongly. It may well be that it is an accepted business practice to revalue inventories as prices change, but the practice of raising the price of food items in the store by double-ticketing is unacceptable to consumers.

I note that the bill accepts the recommendations of the review board to eliminate the practice of double-ticketing, but I also want to draw to the attention of the House the fact that the bill in no way interferes with—and I emphasize the words—the accepted business practice to revalue inventories as prices change. All that the bill does is to make it an offence, where two prices appear on an item, to sell the item at other than the lower price. But it takes no position on what I regard as the reprehensible policy of very many retail stores, of increasing the price of commodities already in inventory when the price of new shipments is increased. All this bill will do is to make the retail stores a little more efficient at changing labels; it will not solve the problem being faced by the consumer when inventory stock is increased to the price of new shipments.

Secondly, the Food Prices Review Board drew attention to what it refers to as the unavailable supplies of specials. The report states that many stores advertise weekly special prices for specific food products, and that although in some cases these specials are available in sufficient quantity to meet the demand, in many cases they are not. The bill deals in some respects with the problem but it does not really deal with the point emphasized by the board, that even where a store provides a so-called raincheck, some stores may adopt as a matter of policy the practice of not providing sufficient stocks of specials. Instead, they hand out rainchecks for the purpose of drawing customers back to the store on perhaps an unnecessary visit in the hope that when there they will purchase more than they would otherwise have done.

Other aspects of retail food practices which the board found unacceptable are misleading in-store practices like end-aisle displays, red lights over meat counters, hidden cash-register windows, misleading price signs, and so on. As the board said, these practices often confuse and deceive customers and it recommended specific action in each case, which so far as I have been able to make out is not reflected in specific provisions of this bill. Exaggerated price claims, proliferation of size in packaging, strengthening and bolstering of the inspection services of the department are all features of the Food Prices Review Board report which, again, so far as I have been able to make out are not included in the bill as it now stands.

While on the one hand, as I have said, I welcome the bill in a qualified way, I draw to the attention of the House that not even the limited range of practices which the Food Prices Review Board identified has been dealt with in the bill, and I therefore give notice to the minister of our intention to proceed in committee to move amendments to fill in the gaps.

There are other features of this bill that perhaps are worthy of brief comment. I welcome efforts to broaden the provision under which action may be taken against misleading advertising and false marketing information. Here, again, I am of the opinion that these provisions require strengthening. I feel it is hightime the consumer was protected in a stronger way, not merely from deceitful statements in advertising but also from statements which create an impression or a broad representation that turns out not to be the case. I applaud the fact that the bill addresses itself to this problem.

Certain selling practices to which my hon. friend has referred, such as exclusive dealing and tied selling, are covered in the bill, and I welcome their inclusion as a logical and inevitable addition to the range of economic activities covered by the bill. I have some misgivings about that part of the bill dealing with extraterritoriality. As has already been mentioned, the implications of this problem have been brought home to us forcefully in the last couple of weeks in the case of MLW-Worthington Limited. I am not at all sure that the avenue being explored by the government in this bill to deal with the problem is adequate or is the best one, and I hope my colleague, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), will have something to say on that matter during this debate.

I cannot help but welcome the reference to and provisions to correct what the bill refers to as abuses against intellectual property. That is similar to occasions when the Liberal government steals an NDP program. Out of self-interest, if for no other reason, I think that is a proper focus in the bill.

Certain features to protect small businesses—and I gather this is the principal purpose of their inclusion—such as refusal to deal provisions, consignment selling, exclusive dealing and otherwise, again at least begin to come to grips with the problems we heard much about in the food prices committee. There was a great deal of evidence to the effect that this was an important feature of the relationship between retailers and their wholesale distributors. The Food Prices Review Board in its February 28 review of bread prices had something to say on that matter and I quote from page 14 of their report:

> The independent regional bakeries have found access to retail shelves limited or blocked by integrated or exclusive contractual arrangements between retail chains or groups and major bakeries.

Therefore, out of my interest in the matter of food prices, to say nothing of my concern for fair play in the marketplace, I again welcome the move the government is making in this direction. There is a provision in the bill, on which I do not propose to comment in detail, that deals with protection of athletes under certain conditions. It may be that my colleague, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose), will have something to say on that matter.

There are one or two omissions I had hoped the government would deal with. One which has been referred to is the matter of class actions in which my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), has taken particular interest. Another is the vexing problem of what to do about loss leader selling. The minister indicated before the committee during the last session that the government did not intend to proceed at this time in respect of these matters, I gather because it had not made up its mind what policy to follow in this area. I would make the point that I suspect no blinding rays of inspiration are likely to strike the minister in the coming months and we might just as well deal with them now as later. Certainly in one area, where confectionery and tobacco distributors in eastern Canada have been affected by loss leader techniques of certain wholesale companies, real hardships have been created. I know this group hoped this bill would deal with this problem, as indeed I did too.

So much for a brief rundown of the bill itself. Let me now turn to some other aspects of the over-all problem. First of all, it seems to me that in passing a bill of this kind we are in a sense placing our trust in the effectiveness of the department, and the agencies which report to it, to implement the bill in an aggressive and effective way. I must say that my impression of the department has been that it is suffering from a severe case of tired blood, to put it as charitably as I can.

Let me give some examples. The bill refers to strengthening the powers of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, but it is a fact, as has been adduced in the House recently, that this commission is understaffed and that the commission itself is minus most of its members; there have been vacancies for some time which the government has not moved to fill. I could not help but wonder why the government is moving to give more power and authority to that commission without at least providing it with a full complement of members. We give it new responsibilities in this bill, but there is no one there to carry out those responsibilities.

Looking through the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ending 1973, I noticed that the funds which were appropriated for the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, which in that year totalled $248,000, were far from having been spent. While I do not wish to criticize the government for measures of economy, at the same time I cannot help reflect that a commission which began with a modest appropriation of one-quarter of a million dollars and which ended up spending only something like $100,000 is a commission which is not exactly burning out its bearings. I am led to the conclusion that there is a good deal of room for new energy and initiative in that area.

The minister admitted in the House recently that the department has been doing virtually nothing in the way of monitoring price movements. I can think of two examples, beef prices and steel prices. I know that is not central to this bill, but to me it is symptomatic of the lack of aggressiveness and concern by the minister on behalf of the consumers. The increase envisaged in the current estimates which have been tabled in this House for the combines investigation branch and the competition policy section of the minister's department is not reassuringly large compared with the remainder of the department. It would not appear to make any sense, having given the combines investigation branch and the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission new power under this bill, that we should not expect an increase in the way of costs.

[Mr. Grier.]

Again, I do not want to criticize the government for saving the taxpayer's money, but I wonder how seriously the government intends to take the commitments which are implicit in this bill. This bill, and indeed the whole area of consumer affairs, requires an interventionist department and an interventionist minister. Can we reasonably expect this from that department and minister? On the basis of the performance so far, can we be sure that the government and the department are committed to take the muscular role on behalf of consumer which the minister has suggested in this House, and to stand behind the kind of commitment that is contained in the words of this bill?

I hope the minister, whose evasiveness is a byword in Parliament, will alter his performance in the coming weeks. We nead no more thrashing about as on the bread price issue. I refer, as well, to the curious new schedule the minister and the Prime Minister have announced in respect of the Food Prices Review Board. This does not reassure me, nor does the refusal of the government to say anything specific about the need to empower the minister, or his department, or the Food Prices Review Board, or a new prices review board, or any agency, to enforce the roll-back of prices when increases cannot be justified. The minister's refusal to do this leaves a question in my mind concerning whether the government is serious about its commitment.

There is in my party great skepticism concerning competition bills and policies. We worry whether these bills and policies are designed to lull the consumer into the assumption something is being done, while in fact no serious effort is being undertaken by the government to interfere with the traditional right of the business community of Canada to lay down the terms and conditions on which it will do business and to set prices as it sees fit.

At the core of any competition policy that seeks to come to grips with real problems lies the matter of market structure. Some kinds of market structure, such as those we can see in Canada, are the very antithesis of competition as the average person understands the term. There is the domination of an industry by one or a few companies, or the domination of one sector of the economy by a few dominant and related industry leaders. There is a good deal of evidence that this kind of industry domination, this oligopolistic domination, is the norm in the Canadian economy rather than the exception. I concede that the minister readily accepts that this bill in no way tackles that problem. Presumably the so-called phase two of the bill will do so.

However, let us not be under any illusion in this House that passage of this bill, with its useful measures, will in any serious way come to grips with the problem of domination of the economy by a relatively small number of corporate giants and the consequent problems which flow from that domination. Let me mention some aspects of the problem. There is the problem of administered prices which reflect not the cost of production but what the traffic will bear. When we come to the performance of Canadian companies in the past year, we do not have to look very far to see abnormally high profit levels, manipulation of supply, monopsonistic purchasing methods, and excess capacity. There are industry or sector common fronts vis-à-vis the consumer, as we saw a few weeks ago with the bakeries. And there are those very unfair retailing practices with which this bill does deal.

If we did not have in this economy a prevalent condition of market domination and concentration, we would not have nearly so many instances of unfair treatment in the marketplace as we have today and much of the necessity for the bill would be obviated. It is true that market concentration does provide some economies of scale. That, of course, has been the traditional argument for concentration. However, we must ask ourselves whether the advantages which accrue from such concentration go to the firms, or to the consumer and whether the leverage of domination is being used against, and not for, the consumer.

In many instances the consumer does not enjoy any economies arising from large scale. I recognize that my allegations are broad, but I am sure any member who sat on the committee on food prices last year or who has dealt with the problem of competition over the years will recognize the force of my remarks. After all, what is the incentive to efficiency, low prices and public service, when competition is minimized and you can make your buck anyway? Our over-all policy objective, as we begin the process of establishing a so-called competition policy for Canada, surely must be to preserve the genuine economies of large scale and advantages which accrue from them and translate those into benefits for the public.

I have mentioned evidence of market concentration in Canada, some of which we heard before the food prices committee. I had hoped that committee would have been reconstituted in this session so that in that vitally important sector of the economy we might begin to hear evidence in a detailed and systematic way on the matter of concentration. I regret that my colleagues both in the Liberal and Conservative parties did not see fit to support my motion to recommend to the government that that committee be reconstituted.

The kind of concentration that I am talking about does not always result in criminal, premeditated collusion to which this bill and the Combines Investigation Act address themselves. What happens in so many cases is simply that there exists a tacit understanding that prices will be kept within recognized bounds, rather in the same way as one country manipulates its currency with regard to another. There is no collusion, no obvious premeditated interrelationship, but rather a general, tacit, unspoken but nonetheless effective agreement that competition per se will not be allowed to get out of hand.

We heard in the food prices committee about the so-called supermarket price war of three or four years ago and how the retail chain which initiated that earned the undying resentment of its competitors, what commotion its activities created within the retail food industry, and how grateful all the major supermarkets were when that kind of price competition was brought to an end and stability restored. By and large, it remains true today, and it does not really matter what supermarket you shop in, there is little difference in price and the price is always wrong.

An hon. Member: By gosh, it is.

Mr. Grier: A few years ago a royal commission in western Canada undertook an in-depth study of monopolistic grocery retail trade practices. I refer to the Batten report which concluded that there was indeed a high degree of concentration resulting in excess profits, excess capacity, self-cancelling and costly advertising campaigns and luxurious and expensive supermarkets. The report in fact calculated the cost of this to a family of four as being almost $120 a year. That is a high price to pay for concentration. The report said specifically that Canada Safeway and George Weston Ltd., possessed sufficient power to enable prices to rise above competitive levels. It recommended investigation under the Combines Investigation Act. There have been efforts to discredit the Batten report, but it is interesting to note that a recent ruling by the Alberta Supreme Court has ordered Canada Safeway to reduce its domination of retail grocery markets in Calgary and Edmonton.

In a speech made last year, as reported in the Financial Post, an advertising executive said the following when speaking to the Canadian grocery distributors institute meeting in Toronto:

> So what's so bad about industry co-operation? After all, your competitors aren't your enemies but your consumers are.

I suggest that that kind of attitude is engendered and bred by the absence of any vital competition. If we take a look at the instance of concentration in the food industry—and I only give a few examples because I do not have a great deal of time left—we discover, for example, that in the breakfast cereal manufacturing industry the four largest plants account for 90 per cent of factory shipments. Sugar refineries account for 65 per cent of the four largest plants. In food retailing generally the four largest establishments account for 41 per cent of all the sales in Canada. In the slaughtering and meat processing industry, the four largest firms account for 58 per cent of the value of factory shipments. In flour milling, the top four firms account for almost 80 per cent of the value of factory shipments, and so the story goes.

Moving out of the food industry and taking a look at industry generally across Canada, we discover that in the pulp and paper industry the four largest enterprises account for 36 per cent of factory shipments. In newsprint mills, the four largest enterprises account for 44 per cent. In iron and steel mills, they account for 77 per cent. In steel pipe and tube mills—and we will need a lot of steel pipe in this country if we are going to build pipelines—the four largest firms control 78 per cent of factory shipments.

In motor vehicle manufacturing, a classic example, the top three or four firms account for 93 per cent. In cement manufacturing, a group recently in the news, the top four firms account for 77 per cent. In petroleum refineries, the top four companies account for 80 per cent of factory shipments; and among manufacturers of mixed fertilizers, about whom we will hear a good deal in the weeks to come, the top four companies account for 62 per cent of factory shipments.

These are all terribly important and positive sectors of the Canadian economy. As consumers and as builders of the Canadian economy, we will rely upon these manufacturers and industries for supplies in certain vital areas in the years to come. I want this House to ask itself to what extent parliament and the government, to say nothing of the ordinary consumer, can be assured of fair treatment by the suppliers.

There has been evidence in recent weeks of certain companies being prosecuted under the Combines Investigation Act for activities in restraint of trade. The fact is that right now the Canadian people are terribly conscious of the fact that they cannot be certain, either at the retail level with which this bill deals, in areas of advertising with which this bill deals, or in the far more fundamental areas of the kind of structure under which this economy operates, that they are getting fair treatment in the marketplace. Until we deal, not merely with the provisions of this bill but with the whole area of the market structure, we will not have dealt with so-called competition policy.

This bill, rightly, deals with certain kinds of retail practices, certain types of wholesale transactions which go some way toward assuring a greater degree of fairness in the consumer marketplace, and this is important. But the bill really addresses itself to the result of lack of real competition and to the symptoms of the problem, rather than to its root causes.

The minister says he will be coming along within a year with the other three-quarters or 90 per cent of his competition policy. I think the minister would do well to reflect that a year is a long time in the life of this parliament, and that it would be in the best interests of all of us, not the least of whom are Canadian consumers, if he would hurry up the process. Let us get that phase two before the committee as soon as possible, particularly if my hon. friend wants to lead a large number of lobby and pressure groups by the hand before the committee, in which case we are going to need some time. That is just another reason why I think we should proceed.

Mr. Atkey: You want to ram it through; you don't want to listen.

Mr. Grier: The people of Canada have been putting up with a lot for a long time. This parliament has listened for a long time to the pros and cons of competition policy. I sometimes wonder what we are going to hear that is new. I am not interested in providing the louder voices with another opportunity to shout against the efforts of the Canadian consumer to get fair play in the Canadian marketplace.

I suggest, notwithstanding the interjection of my learned and hon. friend from St. Paul's that the separation of this stage of the competition policy from the more fundamental area of market concentration, although valid for the purposes of expediting discussion, is an artificial separation and ought not to be regarded as grounds for unduly delaying the introduction of the far more important sections which we yet await.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the bill introduced by the minister a few days ago and read for the first time in this House on March 11, Bill C-7, concerning the combines and bank acts, is a most important bill and also fairly bulky.

This bill contains several technical amendments and we will have the opportunity of giving it further consideration in committee and in this House on third reading. Our party will have several amendments to propose. This bill is extremely important because it deals with mergers, monopolies, limitations of all types on trade and free competition, and with other matters vital to the Canadian consumer. I read all the amendments contained in this bill and it reminds me of a gardener in the spring who finds that his tree is diseased, that some of its branches are dried out, that there is something wrong with it, and decides to water it when it is the roots that are diseased.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) wants to deal with the problem of mergers, combines, by looking after the branches when our economic system is ill.

Mr. Speaker, there are, on the other hand, some interesting points and before going into the crux of the matter, I should like to say to the minister that some amendments are valid, for example, those dealing with misleading advertising, misrepresentations made by salesmen or retailers when selling their products and also misleading or invalid warranties or guarantees when the products are sold to the consumer. Those are the three items which I consider extremely worthwhile.

I think, however, that the more important amendments are those dealing with competition. I do not find in this bill valid amendments which could alter the fact that in Canada monopolies are still in control. The elimination of competition, Mr. Speaker, is extremely detrimental economically to the consumer. For years we have objected to American or foreign companies coming to Canada to develop our natural resources. When we object to those foreign companies developing our natural resources, Mr. Speaker, I think it is not enough to expose them, we must have legislation that would then allow Canadians or Canadian companies to develop, here in Canada, our natural resources. I have absolutely nothing against foreign companies. If they settled in Canada, it is because we did not develop our natural resources. We have been unable to shape a policy to allow us to benefit from our own wealth without resorting to foreign capital.

Mr. Speaker, that is why it was proposed to do away with the elements which made competition impossible until now because the production or distribution of our goods were in the hands of monopolies, we have never been able to suggest positive solutions. We have heard much that is negative until now, but few positive suggestions that would allow the Canadian economy to be developed by Canadians in Canada. Even now, we are studying a bill that advocates a negative solution to that problem which has always existed.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to define the distinction we, Social Crediters, make between private enterprise and monopolies.

The Social Crediters have always been against monopolies, but they are in favour of private enterprise.

Some of our socialist friends take pleasure in confusing "private enterprise" and "monopoly". Free enterprise must be denounced and means should be taken to make it powerless. We are in favour of private enterprise but not of free enterprise.

Free enterprise enables a group to control the market in a given area. Free enterprise is not private enterprise.

Some companies in Canada are no longer private enterprises because they have no more competition. Those, in our view, are actually monopolies and that is why Social Crediters are opposed to free enterprise, monopoly; they are in favour of private enterprise.

That is why Social Crediters have always wholeheartedly supported private enterprise in Canada and why we denounce free enterprise at times. Free enterprise and private enterprise are two different things.

So, in the proposals, recommendations, suggestions that we make on various bills introduced in the House, we advocate an economic system based on private enterprise and not on free enterprise or, in other words, monopolies.

Through this bill, the minister meant to put teeth in the Combines Investigation Act. He has incorporated into this bill some positive political measures, but such measures without the adoption of positive economic measures at the same time does not solve anything at all. If we pass positive political measures which are not supported by economic measures enabling individuals to compete against monopolies, we will remain in the clutches of monopolies, mergers and combines, which will have to pay fines, but according to the figures quoted today, less than 1 per cent of the profits made by monopolies have been subjected to a fine.

The measures that the minister has included in this bill deal especially with the small businessmen who will be subject to this bill like anybody else, but they will have no effect on the multinational companies.

How can this bill bring about a change? What can bill C-7 do against multinational companies which are now increasing overnight all prices at the same time, invoking the false pretext of the oil and gas shortage? Under such a bill, the minister cannot act against the multinational companies which hold sway over our economy. The only thing he can do is to fine them $2,000 or $5,000, a ridiculous amount for them which is tax deductible.

What shocked me about this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to note that the government is trying to punish and restrain everybody. However, at the same time, banks are given special privileges.

Mr. Speaker, as we have always said, the banks are the basis of the existing monopoly which controls the others. According to its whim, the monopoly of money and credit can create a monopoly of production or destroy it. And when I hear people who strongly denounce monopolies, and rightly so, in such and such a sector of industry, and yet, refrain from attacking the very monopoly which creates all the others, I feel they fall short of the target. They go only after the small fry, overlooking the villain who will go on with his dirty work.

Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration will enable us to look after the sick while allowing the disease to spread. The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) referred earlier to a US firm in Montreal which recently sold locomotives to Cuba, something it could not do in the United States because of the American embargo on Cuba. This same firm located in Montreal, imposes on its competitors a 210 day waiting period for the delivery of the parts required to repair Diesel engines and locomotives thus compelling big industrialists who own locomotives with Diesel or other engines, to go to this one company in Montreal which has the parts on hand. This means that this firm has the monopoly of repairs and maintenance, that no one will dare compete with it because its competitors must wait 210 days for the delivery of parts. Yet, even the National Harbours Board, with Diesel engines in need of repair must go to this American firm if it wants quick repair or delivery and pay the price asked.

Mr. Speaker, what is this bill going to change in respect of this American company which exerts a monopoly on parts and delivers them to its competitors when it is good and ready, thereby compelling users of heavy machinery to do business with it.

Mr. Speaker, in the speech he delivered on January 24, 1974, to the County York Law Association of Toronto, the minister said on page 8, and I quote: "Among those practices, there is the refusal to sell, the consignment sale, the exclusive rights, binding sales, market restriction".

Mr. Speaker, I do not see anything in this bill that will prevent that American company in Montreal to restrict the market or to impose exclusive rights. In fact, it presently has the exclusivity of the market, with no competitors or no other company to take its place. There is another thing that struck me in the Royal Commission report: from 1972 to 1973, there have been 188 inquiries, i.e. 100 less than in 1971-72. And of the 3,470 cases that were studied, in only 68 cases a verdict of guilty was brought in. But of those companies found guilty, most have not yet paid their fines.

Let me now quote from an article by a company accountant, published in the Globe and Mail issue of Tuesday, March 12, 1974, page 5:

[English]

A fine of $150,000 against Ocean Construction would be comparable to a fine of $750 against an individual earning $50,000. The same fine against Canada Cement Lafarge would be comparable to a fine of $130.63 against the same individual.

● (1730)

Mr. Speaker, the present Combines Investigation Act is inefficient. Nothing in the wording of this bill proves that we will be able to apply it without going back to the source. In our economic policy, we have not developped any means designed to encourage private enterprise in Canada, to help the individual to compete with large companies, to maintain and control free enterprise. We want to assist private enterprise in Canada, but we want to do it with positive means and not negative legislation so as to enable private enterprise to compete with free enterprise in Canada.

I have here a letter dated November 2, 1973, which appeared in the National Association of Tobacco. The second paragraph states and I quote:

Our group is very concerned by our federal government's lack of interest and shortsightedness as regards certain deficiencies of the Combines Act. Ever since its implementation, businessmen throughout Canada have challenged Section 34 of the Act and predict what would happen if no change was brought about. Their predictions have now come true but we are still doing nothing to bring about the necessary changes. The serious dangers anticipated for small business are now reaching their highest point and they will soon have reached the point of no return. Therefore, we ask that this matter be raised in the House during this session and that a solution be found in the next few months.

Mr. Speaker, as I said in this House, on March 1, 1974, we are living in an economic system where production is in the hands of a very small group. At present, economic organizations have absolute control over a given type of production. Me. Speaker, whatever regulations we may pass, as long as there is no competition between producers to enable them to dispose of their own production, without having to go through monopolies of distribution, Mr. Speaker, no anti-combines legislation will be efficient. We keep going around in a circle and we shall never get any results.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, the Social Crediters maintain that we should put into effect a consumer policy thus making production available to consumers. We must put forward a policy designed to finance production so that producers may control it entirely thus escaping the control of any monopoly which may exist between production and consumption.

This is why it is utterly silly and inconsistent to speak of nationalization, government control, socialization, of putting everything in the hands of the government, of public concerns, of multinational corporations or cartels. It does not make any sense at all. Why? Because in an exclusive system of production there are people—and we know some in Quebec and everywhere else in Canada—who lay down the law. They challenge it, they pay fines and do not fear convictions. They are then exclusive agents, masters of both consumers and producers.

Mr. Speaker, with regard to private enterprise, concrete legislation is needed at all costs to bring it to heel. My hon. friends from the NDP do not seem to make any distinction between private enterprise and free enterprise. That is why from time to time they wonder if we are socialists when we expose monopolies, combines, multinational corporations which have exclusive power over a given production.

We use roughly the same terms as they do but we do not want to replace a multinational enterprise by a state enterprise as they want to do because when we create a state enterprise it hides behind bureaucracy and legislation. With the principle I put forward and which we already stated in this House on March 1, 1974, we will allow producers to become independent from multinational corporations, combines and those who now have the economic power.

Mr. Speaker, once again, we do not see anything in this bill. Wider powers are given to those who hold the monopoly over creation of credit. There is no reference to the ten chartered banks in Canada which have the power to create an economic crisis or prosperity in this country tomorrow morning.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

A good friend of mine was telling me recently that he once borrowed $240,000 from the Industrial Development Bank, made all his payments and cleared his debt. He had become even more solvent than he was when he borrowed in the first place. And now he has not yet received approval for a loan of $30,000. The thing has been dragging on for six months. That means that banks are now creating a climate of economic crisis and if tomorrow morning they want to start a crisis in Canada this Bill C-7 will be of no use whatsoever because it does not deal with the control and creation of money.

Small combines, trust companies, those that own billions of dollars in assets are exposed but not those that make billions, that create billions as banks can do.

The greatest monopoly of all is the monopoly of credit, of that money which is reserved exclusively for banks. Six years ago, a U.S. Senate committee of inquiry was instructed to investigate combines and monopolies in the United States. When the chairman of the committee made public the inquiry report, he said: There is only one monopoly in the United States, and that is the monopoly of credit, for it is the one that breeds all the others.

Mr. Speaker, Social Crediters have often denounced this in the House. We want the Bank of Canada, the bank of the people, which is our institution and our financial organization, to be the one authorized to give credit to Canadians when they need it. We do not want the banks to retain this power they now have. Banks should be business institutions that accept deposits and lend the depositors' money, institutions in the money business that have a right to make profits. But banks should not have the monopoly to make this kind of money called "credit money".

Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister is quite convinced that his bill will make tremendous reforms in our combines system, our monopoly system, but it will affect only the small businesses, not the big ones, for the latter are quite able to dodge the regulations, just like banks will manage to evade the bill.

● (1740)

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to take part in this debate as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray), and all the more so because this is one of the most important and progressive pieces of legislation this government has introduced since it has come to power.

Indeed, the purpose of this bill is to maximize human and capital resources, so that the whole Canadian economy and all Canadians, consumers as well as producers, can benefit from it.

Indeed, the policy on competition is one of the basic elements of policy on commerce and because of this, its complexity and its scope, the minister has introduced this bill as a first step in an in-depth revision of the various measures that bear, directly or indirectly, on the whole field of competition.

Hon. members will recall that in 1966, the Liberal government asked the Economic Council of Canada for an in-depth study on that matter. In 1971, the present Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) introduced Bill C-256 which gave rise to virulent debates through the country and when the present minister was invested with this portfolio he decided to conduct an in-depth study, step by step, in that field.

Recently I heard the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) criticize some alleged shortcomings of that bill. I was listening with all the more suspicion because I remembered that the last review of the Combines Investigation Act had been made under the last Progressive Conservative administration in 1960.

And what happened in 1960 when the Progressive Conservative government decided to amend the Combines Investigation Act? I wish to quote an article by Queen's University Professor H. G. Thorburn, in a book entitled Le système politique du Canada published by the University of Ottawa in 1970 under the direction of Mr. Louis Sabourin.

In this article, Professor Thorburn declares at page 217, and I quote:

> When the Conservative party gained power in 1957 after 22 years in opposition, it did not feel at all bound by the combines legislation passed under the Liberals. The Conservative government announced that the act was going to be revised, encouraging everyone concerned to make representations. Two years later, the Conservatives introduced their bill in the House of Commons. The bill was aimed at meeting the requirements of the financial world.

And I quote now from page 219:

> Voluminous briefs were submitted by commercial associations representing the interests of large businesses. They included amendment proposals which were obviously aimed at blunting the teeth of the legislation—
> Since the government bill was largely a favourable answer to the demands of businessmen, it was normal that consumers, farmers, and workers organizations, which were all dissatisfied with it, appealed against it. However, the legislation was written in such technical terms that several groups that would reasonably be against the bill, considered they did not have the expertise to assert their objections. However, the Canadian Consumer Association, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture... were outrightly opposed, with the support of some economists and political scientists.

On the subject of economists, the professor says, and I quote:

> They were the only group not representing a large sector of the population. On one hand, they possessed unequaled competence and were obviously disinterested. Personnally, they stood to gain nothing in this matter, whatever the outcome, except as average citizens. Economists were therefore unanimous in their opposition to the bill. In all, twenty-eight economists and five political scientists made their opinion known to government. ... They made very serious representations and their analysis was also supported by highly technical demonstrations. Their conclusion, however, was clear and unanimous.
> One economist even stated that the amendments were meant to undermine the effectiveness of the steps taken by the Canadian government against combines, since it would become much more difficult to lodge successful legal proceedings.

Mr. Speaker, this is how some economists in 1960 considered the planned revision of the competition policy advocated by the then Conservative government. They unanimously rejected it to say nothing of the Canadian Consumers Association and other groups which I mentioned a while ago.

When the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) wants to point out some deficiencies, we must listen with much misgivings, since the policy followed by the official opposition when it was in power gave rise to the objections to Canadian consumer groups and all the economists who then submitted briefs to the committee.

I quoted a study by a Queen's University professor, one who is uncommitted, in order to prove how we took a step backward in 1960, on account of a Conservative government.

I was saying at the beginning of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, how proud I am to take part in this debate because the bill introduced by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray), is a very ambitious one, not because of the various phases that will follow but because of its very substance. Indeed, it takes the form of an amendment to the Combines Investigation Act and not that of a replacement. Therefore this part of the government program to modernize the legislation on competition will be easier to administer and will come into force more quickly since it will be based on the process and the machinery related to the Combines Investigation Act.

Since the bill constitutes a set of amendments, the jurisprudence which will accrue from it will of course still be useful, except to the extent that amendments will make some parts obsolete. In other words, the practitioner who will be called upon to make a decision about the enforcement of the legislation will be on rather familiar grounds.

Some people are wondering what makes a bill such as this so important. In that regard, I would like to read a paragraph from page 8 of the 1969 report of the Economic Council of Canada, and I quote:

> It would be wrong, however, to leave the impression that the consequences for efficiency of a relative absence of competitive pressure are invariably an esoteric matter, beyond the capacity of an ordinary intelligent person to discern. As everyday observation will confirm, lack of strong competition in a company's product market increases the risk of sloppiness, poor use of productive resources, and excessive production and distribution costs. An environment is created in which both waste and a comfortable, if not necessarily spectacular, profit margin can persist, undisturbed by clear and urgent signals from the market.
> This brings us to a fundamental tenet relating to competition policy. The institution and maintenance of a competition policy such as presently exists in Canada may be taken to reflect a belief that, over the greater part of the economy, competitive marker forces are potentially capable of allocating resources better and more cheaply, with a less cumbersome administrative overhead, than any alternative arrangement such as wholesale public ownership and control, detailed government regulation of enterprise, or self-regulation by large industrial units within a corporate state.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, a competition policy is extremely important since it enables all Canadians to share the wealth of the country and obtain the best products at the lowest price possible.

What are the various points covered by that essential bill? Obviously, as the minister stated earlier, the first is:

(a) A series of prohibitions on specific commercial practices prejudicial to the consumer's interests. Those provisions provide criminal offences or bring desirable amendments to existing prohibitions as follows:

(1) The provisions of the present bill dealing with misleading advertising are altered and made clearer to apply to all kinds of false statements made to the public about products and services rather than only to printed material.

If the bill is passed, as I hope, the general impression of statements as much as their literal meaning will be taken into account.

(2) false or misleading guarantees or warranties are forbidden.

(3) any sale at any price that exceeds the lowest of two or more prices is forbidden in the case of goods with double ticketing.

(4) pyramid sales are forbidden within limitations and referral sales as defined are forbidden,

(5) bait and switch and replacement sales are forbidden,

(6) sales above advertized prices are forbidden,

(7) promotional contests are forbidden subject to certain rules,

(8) the prohibition of resale pricing is strengthened.

And, Mr. Speaker, I only touched on one of the aspects of this bill now before hon. members. I could go through everyone of those points on misleading advertizing. We now know how we are going to be able to get more readily to those who want to go around the market rules, the area of warranty, list all possible cases where to comply with the act warranties will have to be other things than misrepresentations beyond the safeguards of civil law.

Another thing contained in this bill introduced by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) is that from now on,

(b) Upon a request from the Director of Investigation and Research the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission may

(1) examine cases of refusal to sell and after giving the supplier every opportunity to make his case, order him to supply his customers or recommend tariff changes;

(2) still upon request from the Director of Investigation and Research—

(2) examine cases where consignment sales were used to control the prices of a dealer or set price differentials between competitors and after giving the supplier every opportunity to make his case, order him to cease that practice;

(3) to review cases where exclusiveness, that is to say to demand that a buyer only trades in a few specific products, is practiced by large suppliers in order to substantially limit competition and, after giving suppliers reasonable opportunities of being heard, to issue the necessary order;

The Commission, when requested by the Director of investigations and research, is authorized:

(4) to review cases where tied selling, that is to say the sale of a product tied to the sale of another, are practiced by large suppliers in order to substantially limit competition and, after giving the suppliers reasonable opportunities of being heard, to issue the necessary order.

(5) The Commission is authorized to review cases where the market restriction, that is to say when the supplier, as selling condition, imposes restrictions as regards the market where his customer may carry on his business, is practiced by large suppliers in order to substantially limit competition and, after giving the suppliers reasonable opportunities of being heard, to issue the necessary order.

[Mr. De Bané.]

And finally, the Commission, when requested by the director of investigations, is authorized

(6) to examine cases where foreign judgments, laws or directives from foreign directors are found to be contrary to the public interest and after having afforded people concerned a reasonable opportunity to be heard, to issue orders to forbid their implementation in Canada.

Here is something else, Mr. Speaker, concerning this extremely important bill, namely:

(c) legal prohibitions as to interest associations, mergers and monopolies limiting themselves mainly to articles and staple production and trade, are more far reaching and concern all services and industries that supply services.

As hon. members know, this is a major change that does not concern services but only the supplying or sale of articles. Service provision represents a more and more important part of the Canadian gross national product, and it was only normal for the government to include from now on certain aspects of the service sector in the field that is covered by the legislation. I continue:

(c) ... According to the already well-established jurisprudence, prohibitions under the law do not apply to restrictive trade practices expressly authorized under present federal or provincial legislation.

Of course in some sectors the market is controlled, and it is not our intention either to disturb certain practices that are not meant to be prejudicial to the market system in Canada.

In another field, it is said that:

(d) it is clearly stated that for a restrictive agreement to be considered as contrary to the law because it unduly reduces competition, it is not necessary to prove that its effect would be to remove all or almost all competition.

As we know, the Supreme Court recently interpreted agreements to reduce competition. It forbids only those which would eliminate all competition.

And again:

(e) According to the bill, the following practices become new offences:

(1) a company established in Canada cannot apply guidelines coming from abroad implementing an agreement which is against this legislation;

(2) offer rigging;

(3) unreasonable agreements on participation in amateur and professional sport;

(4) failure to comply with an order of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission will become in itself an offence in the future.

Another subject covered by this bill is specified in the following clause:

(f) Provisions are included to authorize and facilitate civil prosecutions to recover the loss or damage resulting from a conduct which is against the act, up to the total sum in question, plus the cost of the inquiry and of the prosecution.

This is, in my opinion, a measure that the present government is very courageous to put forward and it will greatly contribute to the stabilization of the market system in the country.

Here is another important clause:

(g) Clause 32(2) already stipulates that a court cannot hand down a conviction if it is established that an agreement relates only to some particular questions. These questions are complemented by agreements on the size or on the shape of containers, the adoption of the metric system and measures for the protection of the environment.

The bill also includes new proposals providing for the presentation, when the proof is made, of non-confidential official statistics and it indicates how they should be prepared and presented.

Mr. Speaker, I did not deal with all subjects covered in this bill but I think I did mention enough to show hon. members that the legislation introduced by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) should be supported unanimously by all members who have at heart the promotion and progress of the Canadian economy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SCREENING OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PROJECTS

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, beginning April 1, 1974, federal government projects will be screened to ensure that they do the least possible damage to our natural environment. Most of these projects will be cleared with little comment. Others, because of their likely effect on the quality of life in this country, must be examined very carefully indeed.

Federal departments, Crown agencies and private companies with government contracts, grants and loans will have to prepare environmental impact statements. These statements will be screened by a panel of experts in my department. Recommendations for action, that is, for approval, for modification or for denial, will be made to the Minister of the Environment. Final dispositions will, of course, have to be worked out in consultation with other ministers of the Crown.

Essentially, our new environmental assessment and review process is this. The initiator will be responsible for securing, at the earliest possible stage in the planning of a project or other environmentally significant activity, a forecast of likely environmental effects. This statement must use baseline data and procedural guidelines provided by Environment Canada.

If the initiating department, Crown agency or private firm has sufficient expertise it will prepare its own environmental impact study. If not, it will have to obtain this advice from outside sources at its own expense. When completed, the statement will be screened by a panel of experts in Environment Canada. Any element or aspect of the plan which the panel finds unacceptable must be noted and referred to the Minister of the Environment before the project proceeds.

Public disclosure is important. Written assessments made by the panel will, therefore, be published. Public participation is also vital. In cases of broad public interest, the Minister of the Environment, in consultation with the minister of the initiating department, may, therefore, appoint an environmental review board, the membership of which may be drawn from outside the Public Service. This review board will be able to hold public hearings and make recommendations which will be published.

More specifically, the initiator of a new project or activity with possible environmental consequences must:

1. Take environmental considerations into account from the outset;

2. Submit their project to a panel in Environment Canada or a public review board before financial or other commitments are made;

3. Incorporate recommendations made during the course of our screening process into the design, construction and operation of the new project or activity; and

4. Prepare to publish, or otherwise make public, their findings and plans in this regard.

In order to meet local needs, regional panels may also be necessary. They will be struck from time to time and in such places as the need for assessing and reviewing the environmental consequences of particular developments dictates.

This environmental assessment and review process will help to round out the resource management and environmental protection programs already under way in my department. It will be implemented in stages. It will also be put into effect in close consultation with the provinces and with industry.

I hope, in the process, that we can avoid the delays and other pitfalls which a strictly legalistic approach would cause in this country. Our approach, I believe, is the right approach. We will not hold up important developments which are clean from an environmental point of view and, in contrast to the situation which has developed in the United States, we will not bring the environmental assessment process into disrepute. We will not be charged with blocking everything. At the same time, we will make a great deal of information public. We will, I believe, deal effectively and efficiently with certain projects which are bound to be controversial because of their impact on our environment. In some instances, as we all know, these effects can be very serious indeed.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, the other day the minister, in answering questions put to him in the House by my colleague the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk), said he would be making a statement to clarify government policy on environmental impact today. With respect, Mr. Speaker, if this statement is supposed to be clarification it falls far short of what is needed in this country.

There was a great deal said in the minister's statement about making public the contents of environmental impact studies. But if one looks at the statement of the minister carefully he will find that this policy has been carefully geared to make sure that anything the government does not want the public to know will not be revealed. If you look at the procedure outlined by the minister today you will see it is quite clear that it is not until after a panel of experts of the minister's department have prepared a report based on their consideration of the environmental impact statement put forward by the proponent that anything will be made public. How are we to know whether the government, for its own purposes, will tell us everything that was in the initial statement? It is quite clear that if this is supposed to be an attempt to enlighten the public about considerations that have to go into the decision-making process before a major project with significant environmental impact is undertaken, it comes very close to being a fraud.

The minister is trying to give the impression that the public is going to be involved, but again it is only after an environmental review board is set up, which is permissive, not mandatory, that there may be public hearings. The fundamental difficulty in the policy the government is following is that it is still determined to pursue a process of secretiveness and of holding unto itself anything it does not want the public to find out about. This, of course, is based on the assumption that the government knows best. If the government knows best there is no need for environmental impact statements and there is no need to have public participation in the decision-making process.

Let me point out what the minister said in his statement. These words appear on page 4 of the statement the minister kindly gave me:

> I hope, in the process, that we can avoid the delays and other pitfalls which a strictly legalistic approach would cause in this country. Our approach, I believe, is the right approach.

I should like to know what the minister means by "our approach". Does he mean the government's approach or does he mean the approach that was taken by the task force set up some time ago by this same minister to report to the government on the policy that ought to be followed with regard to environmental impact? The report of the task force is dated August 30, 1972, and the first policy position the report sets out is as follows:

> The federal government shall offer leadership in the area of environmental impact assessment in respect of significant effects on the environment through the pronouncement and implementation of a policy and procedure to be based ultimately on legislation.

This is the exact thing the minister and the government have rejected. They do not want this to be mandatory; they do not want it set up in legislation. They want to have their own cosy little system of review, which means it does not matter how much in error they may be, or to what extent they are proceeding with something that is their political policy for the moment, the public is not going to get a look at it.

Recommendation no. 7 is as follows:

> The policy shall provide for appropriate public information and participation in hearings and in reviews of statements.

How does this policy provide for that? I say again that I am quoting from the report of the task force set up by this minister, which was five months in the making and was highlighted by consultations with environmental experts of the United Kingdom, Holland, the United States, the other provinces of Canada and other federal departments.

I think I can sum up by quoting again from the front page of this report where it is stated:

> The task force recognizes that there are alternatives to some proposals in this report.

[Mr. Fraser.]

We have had an alternative today. It goes on to state:

> However, consideration of these alternatives may best await the decision on just how strong a stand the federal government takes on environmental impact assessment.

The stand the government has taken on environmental impact assessment is not strong. It is not going to work, it is in defiance of its own report, and is a fraud.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to thank the minister for making a copy of his statement available to me before the opening of the House today. Our group welcomes this move by the minister to set up an environmental assessment review process as far as it goes. I agree with the last speaker that it certainly does not go far enough. But the mere fact that for the first time we are to have Crown agencies and federal departments go through the process of an environmental review is good. We have been advocating for years that where any project is carried out by the federal authorities, or by other agencies where there is partial federal authority, environmental impact studies should first be made and those studies should then be fully evaluated before any money is allocated for projects or a start made on projects.

An excellent example in this field is in the James Bay area. There have been several in British Columbia. The Columbia River was one and the Peace River Dam another. I could name a number of projects throughout Canada where environmental studies should have been made and evaluated before the project started. It is too late now. Immense damage has been done that can never be corrected regardless of what we do. Federal departments and Crown corporations will now be forced to make these studies. This is good.

But there are several weaknesses in the statement the minister made today. One is the fact that the Crown agency, or private firm given money to do a job for the government, will prepare its own environmental impact study. Whom is the minister trying to kid? All we need do is go into northern Canada where, under the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development we find that certain projects are under way, many of them being carried out by the minister's own department or let out by him to other groups, in respect of which we are not getting the protection in the northern part of Canada we should be getting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harding: We have complained over the years about this kind of tactic and have urged that action be taken. I urge upon the minister that the very first department he tackle is the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development insofar as northern Canada is concerned.

For this reason that part of the statement which says that a private company or government department can carry out its own environmental impact study does not mean too much when one realizes that the minister's own department is the one which will assess the good or bad of the impact study. There is one bright spot. There could be some public input for the first time. The mere fact that statements by the board will have to be made public and that in respect of some of the larger projects public hearings may be held is, I think, credit insofar as the minister is concerned on this point.

In closing I again want to point out that if the environmental impact studies are really to do the job which I think should be done we must get into the field where we can insist on these impact studies being made in those areas where we have only partial jurisdiction. One is in the field of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. Does this House know that a Crown corporation in the name of a province cannot be touched under that act? It can build any dam it wishes and does not have to come to the federal authorities for any license. It does not have to let the minister know what damage might be done behind the dam that is to be built.

● (1420)

I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken. We have to expand impact studies to cover the whole of Canada in order to really do a job for the people of Canada in the future.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): As usual, Mr. Speaker, this statement is a necessary one, but it comes belatedly, which has been the characteristic of the government administration for many years.

When all our rivers are polluted and when only perfunctory legislation has been created and nearly nothing is being done to rectify a persisting situation, the minister tells us that in the future all projects that may interfere with the environment must be approved by his department. The planning must incorporate any corrections or recommendations made by his department and, lastly, all the findings must be published.

In no way does the minister indicate what penalties will be imposed on those who do not obey these regulations and, even less, how they will be forced to do so. Money will once again be spent, not to rectify an existing situation but only to study and recommend a type of action which nearly never was applied in the past.

The House certainly recalls the nice briefs on pollution in the Great Lakes and in the rivers and water resources of Canada, but they are still polluted. Consider the Ottawa river, for instance, which is certainly not too far away from Parliament to go unnoticed. Pulpwood driving had been forbidden, but last summer tugboats still ran on the river with their shipments of wood. Nothing is being done. Then why make such a statement today when we are powerless to implement previous decisions?

Does the minister simply seek to toss good wishes in the air, or is he really prepared to get down seriously to the job of correcting present problems first?

This statement for the future is appreciated, but I have yet to be convinced of its effectiveness for, as I have said earlier, the minister puts nobody under the obligation of believing his statement, and moreover he sets no time limit for effective implementation.

I must therefore conclude that the minister simply perpetuate a deplorable situation and is absolutely not interested in correcting the problems we are now facing regarding the environment.

PUBLIC SERVICE

TABLING OF REPORT BY JACOB FINKELMAN ON EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table Part I of the report on employer-employee relations in the Public Service of Canada prepared at the request of the government by Mr. Jacob Finkelman, chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board. Mr. Finkelman's terms of reference were outlined in the House of Commons on April 17, 1973.

The report is comprised of three parts. Part I of the report, which I am tabling today, is the substantive or main part of the report. Parts II and III will be tabled as soon as they are prepared in final form. Part II is to be a compilation of the recommendations that are set out in Part I and will be, in essence, what might be termed a ready reference document. Part III will be in the form of a draft bill which will simply embody in legislative language those recommendations contained in Part I that deal with the revision of the Public Service Staff Relations Act. The draft bill, of course, like the rest of the report, will be the work of Mr. Finkelman and it should not be regarded as being a government proposal or government bill.

As indicated earlier, it is the government's position that no major amendments will be made to the Public Service Staff Relations Act without a full opportunity being given to the employee representatives to express their views. The employee representatives, of course, will probably appear before the standing committee charged with the consideration of Mr. Finkelman's report. In addition, there shall be full consultation between the government and the employee representatives before the government brings forward any bill making major amendments to the act.

On behalf of the government, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure on behalf of members of the House, I should like to thank Mr. Finkelman for his thorough study of employer-employee relations in the Public Service of Canada. Mr. Finkelman's experience and reputation in this field are evident in the quality of the report he has prepared.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOCKEY GAME BETWEEN MEMBERS AND PRESS GALLERY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion.

Considering that it was vital for the honour of this House to avoid defeat in last night's hockey game between

hon. members and reporters, considering that the match was of prime importance within the minor hockey tournament organized by the Optimist Club in Hull and finally since the Press Gallery Club obtained an import from Air Canada named Howie Riopelle even under the watchful eye of the minister responsible for amateur sport in Canada, thus compelling hon. members to be satisfied with a tie game, I move, as captain, seconded by the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger), coach:

That the minister responsible launch an inquiry into that disloyal tactic and demand a life suspension for coach André Bellemarre of the press team and the player involved.

SHORTAGE OF RAILWAY CARS FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA LUMBER—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek consent of the House to move a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity resulting from the government's decision to assist Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway to repair some of their antiquated railway cars for the shipment of grain and the resulting refusal on the part of the government to afford similar generosity so far as lumber producing areas are concerned. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That this House expresses its regret that the government has taken the course of denying lumber producing areas the same consideration that has been extended to grain producing areas in so far as it is assisting railway companies to renovate and repair boxcars.

Mr. Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not. The motion cannot be put.

SHORTAGE OF RAILWAY CARS TO MOVE PRODUCTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact the complete breakdown of rail transportation in Canada could cost western producers half a billion dollars in grain sales, and in view of the Minister of Transport's apparent rejection of the National Transportation Act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Nesdoly):

That this House calls upon the government to place the CPR under immediate trusteeship and to appoint a boxcar allocator to begin placing boxcars in position to bring essential commodities to market.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That the conflict between the statement made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on March 7, 1974, that offshore drilling in the Beaufort Sea would not be permitted until 1976, and the announcement today that Imperial Oil has drilled a well in the Beaufort Sea, be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development for study.

SUGGESTED ACTION TO COMPEL RAILWAYS TO MOVE WHEAT IN SUFFICIENT QUANTITY TO MEET EXPORT COMMITMENTS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Having regard to the fact that prairie grain farmers have lost more than $300 million in wheat sales during the current crop year and that the Canadian Wheat Board has now fallen behind by 35 million bushels in committed sales for 1974 because the railways have failed to meet their transport commitment, and the fact that the government has obviously failed in its attempts to persuade the railways to face their obligations, may I ask the minister if the government is now considering action which would compel the railways to move western grain in sufficient quantities to meet export commitments?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is, of course, a subject which I discussed at length with the prairie ministers yesterday and the day before. As you know, we incited the railways to repair a certain number of cars but I do not think that is going to solve the problem. It is one solution, but I think we should have a more permanent one. I know there is another solution which is now before cabinet and I hope a decision will be taken very soon. I have a very close relationship with Canadian National Railways and I saw this morning that they have decided to build I do not know how many thousands new cars in order to discharge their responsibility. This does not mean that we are going to have the cars tomorrow. This is the problem.

An hon. Member: No, it sure does not!

ALLEGED DELIBERATE SABOTAGING OF GRAIN MOVEMENT BY RAILWAYS TO FORCE CHANGE IN CROWSNEST FREIGHT RATES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the minister agrees that his solution will not necessarily cure the problem.

May I ask the minister in charge of the Wheat Board whether, in light of the charge made by the President of the National Farmers' Union that the railway companies are deliberately sabotaging grain movement to force a change in the Crowsnest freight rates—I happen to agree the charge is true—he is consulting with his colleague, the Minister of Transport, in regard to this serious charge and are discussions taking place with a view to instituting an immediate inquiry into this very serious charge?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, discussions are, of course, going on between myself and my colleague the Minister of Transport about this very important area. The charge is without any real foundation except in terms of the difficult performance over this past period and we are, of course, looking into that matter. The railways themselves set certain targets which they were unable to meet. The challenge to them now is the additional problem, for them to get back to their targets and to co-operate in additional steps to improve performance beyond the original targets in order to make up for the backlog. They know this is the challenge facing them. If they fall short in their efforts to bring about this result we certainly will be taking further steps.

POSSIBILITY OF USING TRUCKS TO MOVE GRAIN FROM INLAND TERMINALS TO PORTS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Has the minister in charge of the Wheat Board considered the possibility of employing the trucking industry to move grain from inland terminal positions to the ports with a view to speeding up delivery, and is the government considering the possibility of payment of the charges in excess of the statutory freight rates?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have been looking at virtually every possibility. There are, in fact, a limited number of trucks available for the movement of grain in the large commercial quantities that would be required. A great number of these, almost to the fullest extent possible, are being employed in moving grain from country elevators to terminals so that it can be put into unit trains with quick turnaround. We are looking at other means including the possibility of encouraging farmers to haul grain longer distances in their own trucks and whether or not further compensation in that regard would encourage farmers to do so. The Wheat Board has been looking at that and is concerned that it does not have the power to do so or it might have done so already. We are looking at the question of whether we should step in.

EMBARGO AT PORT OF SAINT JOHN—ACTION TO ASSURE GRAIN MOVEMENT

Mr. Tom Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the very unusual embargo placed on the port of Saint John last night, would the minister check into the entire matter, particularly to see that grain continues to move, since the fire and the strike, the supposed reasons for the embargo, should not affect the movement of grain?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is something I am looking into. I have been looking at it this morning because the position in Saint John is a very serious one and I hope we are going to solve the problem very soon.

SUGGESTED REIMBURSEMENT OF WHEAT BOARD FOR DEMURRAGE CHARGES INCURRED BECAUSE OF SHIPS HAVING TO WAIT FOR GRAIN AT VANCOUVER

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question on the same subject to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the shortage of grain in export positions which is causing a serious build-up of ships in Vancouver—22 are loading and waiting and 18 more will arrive in the next week or ten days—and in view of the fact that the delay of ocean vessels will result in demurrage charges being assessed, will the minister say whether the government is prepared to reimburse the Canadian Wheat Board for such demurrage charges incurred through no fault of the board or of the western grain producers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the question of when demurrage charges are payable depends on a number of circumstances. We do not ordinarily attempt to step in and offset a specific problem in this regard in this industry or any other, and it would be a serious question of principle for us to do so.

EMERGENCY ACTION BY RAILWAYS TO OVERCOME BACKLOG IN MOVEMENT OF GRAIN

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport further to that asked by the hon. member for Vegreville. In view of the fact that some $600 million in grain exports are in jeopardy and that the railways are 11,000 carloads behind at Vancouver and 7,000 behind at Thunder Bay, can the minister say whether the railways are now taking or have they informed him of any emergency priority action they will be taking in an effort to catch up on this backlog?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a new idea proposed at the conference I attended yesterday was—it was suggested, I think, by the right hon. member for Prince Albert the other day—to have somebody who is going to supervise all this and see whether the best use is being made of the cars. I propose to suggest to cabinet that we implement as soon as possible some kind of monitoring system so that we are sure that all cars are used to the fullest extent at this moment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre for a further supplementary, after which the Chair will complete the first round of questioning by recognizing the hon. member for Champlain and then return for supplementaries to the right hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Assiniboia.

SHORTAGE OF BOXCARS TO MOVE GRAIN—SUGGESTED PLACING OF ENTIRE RAILWAY SYSTEM UNDER PUBLIC OWNERSHIP

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the recurring situation in our transportation system, in view of the statement made by the Minister of Transport last Thursday in which he said that the principle of competition in the National Transportation Act is wrong in Canada and that the government does not have a real transportation policy, to use the minister's words, and in view of the present emergency situation, will the Prime Minister advise whether the government will now adopt and announce a policy of taking the entire national railway system in Canada under public ownership and control—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Benjamin.]

Mr. Benjamin: —so that the principle of the provision of adequate railway services will be the first priority rather than competition and profit?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this seems to be an interesting proposition. Perhaps the hon. member could give me details of his suggestion. Would it include, beyond the railways, the bus systems and other forms of local transportation or would it only apply to the railways? If the hon. member can work it out, perhaps he might want to write to me about it.

POSSIBLE BEEF SHORTAGE—ACTION BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Since Canadian breeders seem to reject a request by the federal government inviting them to increase their herds of cattle so as to prevent beef shortage and too high an increase in the price of this product, what other measure does the government intend to take to prevent such a ridiculous and stupid eventuality in a country like Canada which has such an enormous potential and cannot enable its citizens to get some good food at a reasonable cost?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to make sure that the people of Canada have food at reasonable prices and that producers get reasonable prices for their input. We are working on a program that I hope is long-term and also on one that will be short-term to make sure that these people do not have to sell their herds.

SHORTAGE OF BOXCARS TO MOVE GRAIN—REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF CONTROLLER WITH POWER TO DIRECT ALLOCATION BY RAILWAYS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport was kind enough a few moments ago to refer to a suggestion I had made. For several months I have endeavoured to get the government to bring in legislation to provide for a boxcar controller—I know the House would pass it very quickly—with power to direct the railway companies to make a proper allocation of cars not only for wheat but for all other commodities. Would the minister now do so? The situation is desperate on the prairies and all over the world we are losing contracts because of failure to live up to contractual agreements. I make this appeal to him because I know he wants to do something and he has the knowledge and the power to do it. Will he do it?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I can say at this moment that I will discuss this very soon with my colleagues. I have just come back from the west and I think I can make a report next week. I should like to have the reaction of my colleagues to this concept, which I am inclined to support entirely.

SHORTAGE OF RAILWAY CARS TO MOVE GRAIN AND LUMBER—RETURN OF CANADIAN CARS FROM UNITED STATES—REPAIR OF ROLLING STOCK

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. As there were some 15,500 Canadian railway boxcars on United States rail lines as of February 22 of this year and in view of the shortage of cars for the movement of grain and lumber, will the minister inform the House what action he has taken to get these boxcars back for the movement of Canadian products?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is a little bit too simple to say that because there are a certain number of American boxcars in Canada.

An hon. Member: How many?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I am not sure of the figures, and that is why I would be interested in having a monitoring system so that we can discuss not only suppositions but facts.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, I put it to the minister that there are half as many American cars in Canada as there are Canadian cars in the United States. As the government has put forward $3.43 million to repair some 2,400 boxcars and as on February 22 there were 7,400 box cars in need of further repair, will the minister inform us if the railways have taken on the obligation of repairing the other 5,000 cars?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the problem is to know—and I am not in a position to say—if it is worth while repairing certain cars. I have heard that the CNR alone has just placed a $40 million order for cars and locomotives. Maybe it is preferable to buy brand new cars than to repair cars when it would be too expensive.

INQUIRY AS TO NEW NATIONAL POLICY—REFERENCE OF PROPOSALS TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The minister mentioned that he has just returned from the west where I understand he had meetings with the four western provinces regarding a transportation policy. May I ask the minister what the general mechanism of this new policy will be, and will these proposals be put forward as soon as possible and referred to the appropriate standing committee?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I mentioned last week that, after a statement is made in the House, it would be only honest for my colleagues to produce a formal paper. Before going further I have to have the approval of cabinet, which I do not have at this time. I hope I will get it so that we may follow the procedure the hon. member has indicated.

SHORT-TERM ACTION TO ENSURE MOVEMENT OF GRAIN BY RAILWAYS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As the minister in his statements today said that his proposals were long-term proposals, what short-term proposals is the minister able to put forward today in view of the fact that loaded grain cars are presently standing on sidings for as long as three weeks in the western prairies?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know this. I saw the brief prepared by Mr. Atkinson. I want to check into these alleged facts. I have some people working on this. Maybe they are correct and maybe they are not. Let us not jump to conclusions before the facts are properly in. We have all kinds of shortages with regard to cars in Canada. I met with the premier of British Columbia, Mr. Barrett, in order to solve the problem between the British Columbia Railway and Canadian National and I hope that today we will have the answer. I have no global answer for all these questions. However, I think we are going to solve the problem of rail cars in Canada very shortly.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The minister questioned whether the statement I made was true. I should like to inform the minister that it is a fact that rail cars have been standing that long on sidings in western Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont.

CONTINUITY OF CNR FERRY SERVICE TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND IN THE EVENT OF FUTURE LABOUR DISPUTES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I hope he will find it easy to answer because it is straightforward. It is with respect to the disruptive tie-up of the CNR ferry service to Prince Edward Island last summer during the rail strike. Can the minister report whether arrangements have now been completed with the government of Prince Edward Island guaranteeing continuity of ferry service by the CNR in light of the possibility of any future labour dispute?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I took this matter up with the premier of Prince Edward Island. I also asked for the co-operation of the Minister of Labour because there is the problem, too, of the unions involved. They have acquired rights. We want to know, if we change the system, what is going to happen to these men and if they are ready to co-operate with us in order to be sure that there will be no stoppage in future. All this is in the process of being done. I do not think anybody in the House would like to see the government, or the House, take a decision before the workers are sure their rights will be protected.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): As it is now six or seven months since proposals were begun to be put together, can the minister indicate whether there are firm proposals before the union, Canadian National Railways and the two governments involved in order that there can be some effective resolution of this problem before we are faced with another disruptive strike?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, so far as the union is concerned, I asked my colleague, the Minister of Labour, to see if it is possible to meet with the union and at what level. He is working on this now. He may know the exact situation better than I do.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Labour is prepared to indicate if such meetings are in progress and whether there are firm proposals between the unions and other participants?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, officials of my department have been meeting with officials of the appropriate unions in an endeavour to work out some acceptable arrangement to make sure that there will not be a work stoppage in future. That is all I can say at the moment. I believe the talks are still going on.

REASON ADVANCED BY RAILWAYS IN SEEKING FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO REPAIR BOXCARS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and is with respect to the boxcars for the repairing of which the government granted the railways some $3 million. Did the railways give as the reason for asking for that help that the cars were not worth repairing, or did they ask for a subsidy to the extent of over $3 million in connection with maintaining the service?

● (1450)

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I said in very plain words last week, rightly or wrongly, that there is no doubt that the railways are not interested in moving grain. They move grain because they are compelled by law to do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That's true.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): So they do not make the effort they probably make in regard to other products where they make money. That is why we have to make this contribution. I think that is the truth.

ENERGY

REASON IMPERIAL OIL ALLOWED TO DRILL FOR OIL AND GAS IN BEAUFORT SEA BEFORE COMPLETION OF ENVIRONMENTAL STUDIES

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development related to the recent announcement that Imperial Oil has found oil and gas in the Beaufort Sea. In view of the minister's oft-stated concern for the people of the north and desire to protect their environment, and in view of the cabinet's decision to allow drilling in the Beaufort Sea only after completion of the necessary environmental studies, will the minister explain why Imperial Oil was allowed to drill in the Beaufort Sea before the environmental studies had been completed?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my English may not be very good, but my statement the other day applied to drilling offshore. This last drilling was done from an island, so it is not offshore drilling.

Mr. Firth: An artificial island.

Mr. Chrétien: It is not offshore, as far I know. It was an island. As to the second part of the question, before a permit was given to the company to drill at this site, there was consultation with the Eskimos of Tuktoyaktuk the hunters' association, and so on. They have approved the granting of the permit and I am sure the people of the north are very happy that once more we have been proven right and there are great resources in the north.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Firth: Mr. Speaker, may I point out that it was a man-made island, an artificial island.

Mr. Chrétien: It was an island.

Mr. Firth: Can the minister tell us whether the type of drilling being carried out on this man-made island has been approved by the Department of the Environment and by environmentalists like Dr. Pimlott?

Mr. Chrétien: There was interdepartmental consultation among all the departments involved. Dr. Pimlott was not consulted because he is not working for the government—he is a self-appointed expert. As far as I am concerned we have the approval of the Department of the Environment, we have the approval of the territorial government, we have the approval of the people of Tuktoyaktuk, and I am sure the people of Canada are happy we are finding a lot of oil there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a supplementary question intended to clarify government policy, whether or not it is in keeping with the minister's statement that he will not allow drilling until after a two-year study has been completed in offshore areas of the Beaufort Sea. Is it government policy to continue to permit the creation of artificial islands made by dumping gravel into the Beaufort sea for the purpose of drilling activities or will such activities as these cease, in order to permit the completion of the two-year study of which the minister has spoken?

Mr. Chrétien: I make a distinction between offshore drilling from a platform or from a ship and drilling from man-made islands which are a very safe device approved by all the experts. If companies come forward with other plans which are as safe as this one, wherein we have been proven right—they have found oil and no disasters have occurred—we will grant a permit as long as the plans are all right. But as far as drilling from ships or platforms is concerned we shall not grant any drilling permits before 1976.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Would the minister be willing to table the environmental studies which he says prove that these artificial islands are so safe?

Mr. Chrétien: I will inquire whether there are specific documents on that aspect. I am saying there was inter-departmental consultation and that there was approval by everyone. I would rather have the confidence of the people of Tuktoyaktuk than of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

TRANSPORT

SHORTAGE OF RAILWAY CARS—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport.

Since there is a shortage of cars and also locomotives apparently, could the minister say whether he considers using his influence with the Treasury Board so that an amount of money be lent to the CN at an interest rate not exceeding administrative costs in order that this company may take delivery of the order which had been destined to Cuba?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member might perhaps repeat his question. I have the feeling that the minister did not hear it.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, I will repeat it word for word. Since there is a shortage of cars and also locomotives apparently, could the minister say whether he considers using his influence with the Treasury Board so that an amount of money be lent to the CN at an interest rate not exceeding administrative costs in order that this company may take delivery of the order which had been destined to Cuba?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I referred a while ago to a CN ruling. In my opinion, the first responsibility regarding the construction of railway locomotives and cars falls on the railway companies, not on the government. Then I reported that the CN had decided to spend $42 million. We shall let them spend it and if afterwards there are other problems, we shall see.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REQUEST FOR ROYAL COMMISSION INTO INCREASING COST AND EFFECT IN FEEDING INFLATION

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Will the President of the Treasury Board consider arranging for a royal commission of inquiry into the large and growing cost of government administration and the effect that such expenditures have in feeding inflation?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I think the House is well aware that some years ago there was an inquiry by a royal commission into government organization. I would be prepared to consider whether such an initiative should be repeated, either now or in the future.

PENITENTIARIES

POLICY RESPECTING PAROLE AND TEMPORARY PASSES IN LIGHT OF MURDER BY INMATE WHILE OUT OF INSTITUTION—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Solicitor General. I put a question to him last week in reference to a man by the name of Booth. My question today refers to a man by the name of Kully who was allowed out on temporary passes. During the period of his incarceration, having been convicted of raping and killing a five-year-old girl in 1966, he had received no psychiatric treatment. While he was out of the institution he committed a second murder for which a judge has now sentenced him to 20 years imprisonment, saying that no parole or temporary pass can be given. Can the Solicitor General tell us whether this policy is to be accepted by the government and by the Parole Board?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Last year, when Mr. Kully was away from the institution and committed the offence for which he has now been found guilty, he was not on unescorted temporary absence; he was with an escort.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: He escaped from the escort. I might add that he has not been sentenced to 20 years. He has been given a life sentence but in accordance with the new law we passed in December the judge has stipulated he will not be eligible for parole for at least 20 years.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you very much. I should like to put one more question. Since it is very difficult to obtain information about cases like this—there are several similar cases I could list though I will not take the time in which to do so this afternoon—will the minister tell us whether he now agrees with what the Prime Minister said last session and call for a judicial inquiry into the whole mess which has arisen in connection with these convicted people, particularly since there seem to be abuses which are destroying the parole system?

● (1500)

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is correct. I have always given full information on any case I was asked about, and I will be pleased to continue to give full information. Furthermore, the parole and temporary absence system is not a complete mess. There has been a very low rate of failures, approximately 2 per cent, and we are trying to improve that still further so there will be no failures, if that is at all possible.

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I seek the co-operation of hon. members at this point. I see at least 25 members seeking to ask questions or supplementaries and there are only eight or nine minutes left, so I hope there will be not too many supplementaries. When 25 to 30 members are rising with only eight minutes before the end of the question period, I am sure the House will realize that some will have to be left aside. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Calgary North on a supplementary.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I will make my supplementary brief. Will the minister tell the House and the country how many people who have been convicted of crime and murder are at the present time on temporary absence or out on parole and have not come back or have not been found by the RCMP? How many are there? Give us the information.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, it is rather difficult to understand the hon. member's question. I do not know whether he is asking about murderers or about persons convicted of all offences. If he is asking about persons convicted of all offences and he wants to know how many have been let out on parole or on temporary absence and have not returned, then I will have to get the figures for him and am quite willing to do so.

COMBINES

CANADA CEMENT LAFARGE—REASON FOR FAILURE TO LAY CHARGES FOR PRICE FIXING IN 1973—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF B.C. CEMENT PRICES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that Canada Cement Lafarge has been involved now in three separate incidents and charges under the Combines Investigation Act arising in different periods of time, and in view of the fact the minister was asked in June, 1973, by the hon. member for Selkirk to inquire into the activities of three cement companies, Canada Cement Lafarge being one of them, in fixing prices at $28.72 per ton of cement, would the minister advise the House why no charges were laid in that particular case?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member has confirmed that as a result of the work of the combines branch action has been taken in these areas. Under the act the director of the combines branch is obliged by law to undertake an inquiry whenever he has reason to believe that an offence may have been committed. He is aware of the situation and I am sure he is carrying out his responsibilities. But under the express provisions of the act it is impossible to comment on whether or not an inquiry is being carried on until the matter is completed either by a statement of the director or the taking of legal action.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. In view of the recent conviction in Vancouver of the seven major cement suppliers, Canada Cement Lafarge being one of them, and in view of the fact that those charges only cover a period to December 31, 1971, would the minister now advise the House whether an inquiry is in fact going on into that particular incident to determine whether the price of cement in the province of British Columbia is now being fixed, as it was prior to December, 1971?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the act itself creates a policy that is followed not only by myself but was followed by previous ministers in this portfolio, not to confirm or deny the existence of an inquiry until the matter has been determined by the statement of the director or by action in court. However, I would be happy to see what further information I can properly provide.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta on a supplementary question and then the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister. In view of the fact that Lafarge and Ocean Cement of British Columbia have made two price increases since January of this year, both of which were released on the same date and both of which were in the same amount, would the minister consider holding a public inquiry into the cement industry in British Columbia in view of the connection of former Liberals with one of the companies that is presently fixing prices?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act are that any inquiry that is carried on must be on a confidential basis. I would be happy to consider this matter with my colleague the Minister of Justice.

TRADE

BAUXITE—MEETING WITH PRIME MINISTER OF JAMAICA—EFFECT ON CANADA OF POSSIBLE PRICE INCREASE

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister state in general terms the outcome of his meeting yesterday with Prime Minister Manley of Jamaica regarding increased prices of bauxite from that country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the meeting was the day before yesterday. I had an evening meeting with the Prime Minister and he explained to me that he was meeting later this week with the presidents of the various aluminum companies operating in Jamaica. He put to me various types of proposals which he would be putting to them. I would not want to betray his confidence, but I am sure they will become publicly known as soon as he puts them to the companies.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the Prime Minister or perhaps the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs say whether the government has undertaken any studies to determine the effect both on Canadian prices and on Canadian export markets of the various proposals being put forward by the Jamaican government?

Mr. Trudeau: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member realizes that the developments are just a few days old. The meeting in Conakry was a few days ago. There was an earlier meeting when the bauxite producing countries got together, but they are still at the initial stages and I think it would be impossible to calculate the effects of what they are going to do until they say what they are going to do and agree among themselves.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—EFFECT OF AMENDMENTS TO COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and relates to the response of the Prime Minister yesterday during the question period to an inquiry about legislation dealing with inflation. In view of his claim that the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act now before the House represent the initial thrust of the government's anti-inflation program announced in the throne speech, could the Prime Minister point out what sections of that bill have anything at all to do with the current cost of living increases facing Canadians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not, I believe, use the words "initial thrust". I said that this was part of the total thrust of the government. I would be very happy as the debate progresses to underline the parts of Hansard that the hon. member should read, and if he cannot understand them I will have someone explain them to him.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary and then the hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

Mr. Atkey: If the Prime Minister had remained in the House to listen to my speech yesterday instead of rushing out after the abysmal effort of his minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. I hope we are not going to import into the question period the debate that is to take place later. It seems to me that would be quite out of order, but the hon. member may ask a supplementary.

Mr. Atkey: May I simply ask, Mr. Speaker, what aspects of that bill are going to help keep down prices within the immediate future? I also wonder whether the Prime Minister is taking into account the rather large increases in public expenditure which will result when the bill sets up the new bureaucracy in the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister is rising to answer that very interesting question.

Mr. Speaker: I indicated a moment ago that the question was not in order and that is why I will not allow the right hon. gentleman to reply to it. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST RESULTING FROM EMPLOYMENT OF INTERTASK—POSSIBLE DISPLACEMENT OF INFORMATION CANADA

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I will put a question that is, I hope, in order to the Prime Minister in a spirit of conciliation. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would tell the House, in view of the conflict of interest guidelines that he tabled in the House some time ago, whether he can reconcile those guidelines with the employment of Intertask, which not only makes press arrangements for the government but one of the principal officers of the company reports on affairs of the government? Can the Prime Minister reconcile the tabling of the conflict of interest guidelines with employment by the government of Intertask?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I see no conflict of interest between the government and the people in Intertask. If the hon. member would ask a supplementary perhaps by way of additional explanation, I will attempt to answer him.

● (1510)

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have a short supplementary question which is not quite what the Prime Minister suggested. In view of the employment of Intertask at the federal-provincial conference last year, is Intertask going to be substituted for Information Canada or will Information Canada have any purpose left in the plans of the government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the functions are the same but, even if they were, I do not see the conflict of interest that seems to be on the hon. member's mind. Would he explain that?

TRANSPORT

REPORT ON PUBLIC TRANSPORTATION IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO—AVAILABILITY FOR DISTRIBUTION TO MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport, and I apologize to him if it was asked in my absence. In light of the minister's commitment that the CTC report on public transportation in southwestern Ontario will be discussed at the next Ontario tri-level conference, has the minister seen fit to make copies of the report available to the municipal councils of the area and provincial members of the legislature so that they will be in a position to make a coherent response to that report?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, the first two volumes of that report were tabled in the House last week, so it is available. The third volume has not yet been tabled becaused I asked the CTC to do some more work on it. I expect this third volume shortly, perhaps in a couple of weeks.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister did not hear my question properly. My question was whether or not the minister had made the report available to municipal councils involved. In light of the fact that his office has refused to allow it to be distributed, or to supply sufficient copies for distribution to municipal councils in my area, is the minister willing to see that the supply is sufficient so that officials interested can get copies or that copies can be supplied to them?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, maybe I am wrong and I will have to check that, but I understood that once it is tabled in the House it becomes a public document and it would be normal to send the document—

An hon. Member: That hasn't been done.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): If it has not been done it is going to be done immediately.

ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST IN APPOINTMENT OF PAUL WHITE AS EXECUTIVE ASSISTANT TO MINISTER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question of the hon. member for Annapolis Valley, and I direct it to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It has to do with the guidelines in respect of conflict of interest tabled by the Prime Minister. Since his newly appointed special assistant, Mr. Paul White, was elected to and accepted a directorship in the Yukon Liberal Association last month, is it to be the policy of the government to permit executive and staff assistants to accept active participation at the official level in the office structure of the Liberal party across the country?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if there is a conflict of interest but I will check.

An hon. Member: You wouldn't know.

Mr. Chrétien: He is a well-known Liberal and he is proud of it, just like I am.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Chrétien: If you are bothered about it I will ask him to resign as a director of the Liberal Association, but I will keep him on my staff because he is a good person from the Yukon and he is doing a damn good job.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Yukon on a supplementary question and then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the Leader of the Opposition, after which I will call orders of the day.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not quarrel with the appointment. That is the last thing I would want to do, and the minister knows that. What I am trying to do is establish government policy. If it is going to be government policy to permit executive and staff assistants to hold such official positions within the Liberal organization, will the government be extending that policy to include other civil servants or quasi civil servants?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have not discussed that with Mr. Paul White, but I will do so. He was a director of the Liberal Association before we appointed him and he was re-elected. He is a well-known respected citizen of the Yukon. Anyway, he would be very willing to withdraw from the Liberal Association if necessary—

An hon. Member: I don't blame him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You can't blame him for that; more power to him.

WINNIPEG POST OFFICE—CAUSE OF COLLAPSE OF LARGE BLOCK OF CEMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the fact that about ten o'clock last night a section of the Winnipeg general post office, a concrete portion measuring about 30 feet by 60 feet, fell to the street—

An hon. Member: Was it the coat of arms?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —will the minister arrange for an immediate investigation into this accident and take steps that will assure the people of Winnipeg that there will not be a repetition?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, my information is that a portion of the overhanging roof above the public entrance to the post office in Winnipeg fell during the night. Fortunately, no one was injured. Our consultants are at the present time searching for the cause of the accident, and hopefully will find a solution.

FINANCE

FLOAT OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—POSSIBLE CHANGE IN GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in respect of policy regarding the Canadian dollar, particularly in respect of the clean float policy of the government in the past. I should like to ask whether this float is still what you might say cleaner than clean, or does the expenditure of some $300 million odd in recent months in respect of foreign exchange operations indicate that there has been some change in policy and that the float has become a little dirty?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, there has been no change in policy. The Bank of Canada intervenes on behalf of the exchange fund only to maintain an orderly market. Sometimes that involves purchase and sometimes sale. If the hon. gentleman will look to the year 1973 he will see that the bank intervened on the other side.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I note that several hon. members are seeking to ask either supplementary questions on this subject or additional questions. We have already gone five minutes beyond the question period. I will try to give priority tomorrow to those who have tried to ask questions today, including the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, the hon. member for Gaspé and others.

POSSIBLE PERFORMANCE OF WEDDING CEREMONY BEFORE CENTENNIAL FLAME—INQUIRY AS TO PERMISSION

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to rise on a question of privilege, but I wonder whether you would allow me to ask my question as it is of some importance and relates to an event that is to take place on Parliament Hill tomorrow. Apparently a wedding is scheduled to take place at 2.30 on Friday in front of the centennial flame on Parliament Hill to draw attention to religious discrimination in Canada. The marriage will be performed by a minister of the Church of Scientology. My question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Will he inform the House whether permission was granted to allow this mock wedding in violation of our marriage laws which require that only licenced clergy or officials should perform such a ceremony?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I was not invited to the wedding, but I will inquire.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, my question has a marriage connection. How are the two co-house leaders of the House coming along with plans for business for the next few days?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, today we will continue—

Mr. Wagner: "We"!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: We will continue with the competition bill, and tomorrow, as my hon. friend knows, is an opposition day. Monday I hope to deal with the bill in the name of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), Bill C-9. On Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week we will call opposition days, as well as on Monday and Tuesday of the following week. In order to satisfy the requirement under the rules we must call those opposition days. If my hon. friend will tell us the business he wants to call on those five days we would be grateful for his co-operation.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a question in respect of the business of the House. I did not hear the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) say that Bill C-12 would be called on Monday along with the bill in the name of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). Is that not the case, to have the two bills on the one day?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to add that. That is the amendment to the British North America Act.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes.

● (1520)

Mr. Whelan: I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. It has just been brought to my attention that it is reported in the Ottawa Citizen that I said we need a 40 cents per pound increase in the price of beef. I said no such thing. We do not need this kind of increase in beef prices to make the industry a healthy one.

Competition Bill

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, ADMINISTRATION AND OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Wednesday, March 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray that Bill C-7, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and to repeal an act to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, if this bill had been introduced 30 or 40 years ago it would have been considered quite radical. Today, as a reminder of just how far out of date in its thinking the government actually is, it represents, in so far as it is intended to be economic reform, a myopic and dated approach. As the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) indicated, we approach it with mixed feelings. Of course, there are some provisions that are welcome. Some of the provisions to strengthen consumer protection and to prohibit bait, switch and pyramid selling are steps in the right direction.

The small businessmen of Canada are delighted to see the wings of their giant suppliers gently clipped. Heaven knows the small businessmen have suffered much, both in the hands of the government and the giant enterprises. Any relief for them can be greeted with enthusiasm and appreciation. We also applaud the move to require, by law firms operating in Canada to operate in the interests of this country and not under the yoke of extra-territorial restraint. But, and this is the nub of the argument, the suggestion that this bill will guarantee for Canadian consumers the benefits of genuine price, quality and service competition is a cruel hoax. It is misleading in the most blatant sense, and if uttered in the private sector after passage of this bill would be an indictable offence.

This is exactly what the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) suggests. Yesterday in his opening remarks at page 480 of Hansard he said:

> This bill reflects the view that all Canadians can benefit from having a marketplace subject to the stimulus and the pressures of the forces of competition.

Well, the minister will be lucky if he does not wind up in jail for making a suggestion like that. The government's position is based on the view of many orthodox economists that a more aggressive competition policy, coupled with a responsible combination of monetary and fiscal policies—a restraint, incidentally which the government has rejected in its unrestrained expenditures—will, in itself, be the best solution to the double disaster of high unemployment and high inflation. This approach, in my opinion, is very naïve and neglects to take into account the structural changes in the real world of economics. The theory of genuine competition in the marketplace is well known, but is it feasible? It implies the dismantling of some of the greatest trade unions that have developed in the history of the world. It implies a rejection of the whole theory basically of trade unionism. It implies that there is genuine price competition in big industry and that somehow the great monopolies and oligopolies of our economic system can be broken up in such a fashion that genuine market competition in so far as price, service and quality is concerned would take place.

Is the prospect of either one or both of these developments realistic in the present context? I do not think so. I do not even think, under the circumstances and taking into account the real benefits available for the Canadian people, that either would be desirable. Could Canada support enough steel companies, for example, to have real, basic cut-throat price competition? How many would be required—10 or 15? Could Canada support 10 or 15 steel companies or is something in the order 3, 4 or 5 the limit of an economy our size. Could we support unrestrained competition among air carriers? Would we really want to? Would we want to subject them to the kind of cut-throat competition which might under some circumstances cause them to perhaps not maintain the standards of service and safety the Canadian people would expect of air carriers? Could Ottawa support sufficient numbers of ready-mix concrete suppliers, for example, to ensure genuine price competition. There is inevitably a trade-off between competition and the economies of scale.

With some notable exceptions, such as hockey, the Canadian economy has been moving in the direction of smaller numbers of larger units. The question is, does this bill do anything to change the situation in a fundamental way? The answer I think is an unequivocal no. Except for the employment of some additional dozens or hundreds of bureaucrats, and the additional work they will generate for the legal and accounting professions in the private sector, the effect on unemployment and inflation will be negligible.

First of all, and probably most significant in economic terms, labour is not included. In fact it is specifically exempted. This thinking goes back to the days of Mackenzie King when he was Minister of Labour. In those days, as hon. gentlemen know and recall, the situation was different. At that time the economy was operated in such a way that from time to time there was a surplus of labour and there was not an opportunity for meaningful work for people who wanted to be members of the working force. The working man was downtrodden relative to the rest of society. He was opposed by the establishment, the judges and the politicians. Basically everyone was against him. So, under the circumstances at that time it was logical—as a matter of fact in my opinion it was just and inevitable—that trade unions would be exempt from the provisions of the laws in so far as they relate to combines and restrictive practices.

But, that was decades ago. The situation has changed enormously since that time. The world in which we live is not the same world as that of the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King. It is not the same world as the world of the early 1900's, the depression days, and the early post-war days. The situation has changed dramatically, in many respects for the better. Today our mastery of demand management and employment techniques has made it possible for us almost—I underline the word "almost"—to provide meaningful employment for those who want to work at any one time.

Today more than half Canada's gross national product is taken up in wages and salaries. It is true that not all labour is unionized, but we have developed big, powerful unions in the course of the last few decades. This was a natural evolution from the conditions in which we found ourselves in the 1920's and the 1930's. Nothing else could have happened based on that historical set of circumstances. So today you have giants of the labour field as well as giants on the industrial side. The big unions have the power to achieve in the marketplace industrial settlements, often based on the productivity of their particular union, and these set the base, these provide what is now known as wage leadership. The most powerful unions, operating usually with the most powerful companies, can and do effect settlements which are two or three times the average increase in productivity per person.

Now I am speaking of what is happening at the moment. These settlements set the pace for the rest of our economy. Everyone wants to keep up, everyone tries to keep up, everyone thinks they are entitled to a similar share when wage negotiations take place. Not only do all members of the labour force, including those who are non unionized, want the same kind of wage increases but in fact in order to maintain their comparable position they must obtain them. If they do not obtain comparable wage increases, then their relative position will deteriorate proportionately. The impact on prices is enormous. It is axiomatic that wages rising two or three times faster than productivity must be reflected in prices. Although it is futile to get into the argument as to whether rising wages cause rising prices or rising prices cause rising wages, it really does not matter. It is a chicken and egg proposition and you can argue about which comes first for decades. The important point to remember is that the two must be taken in context, that they are related, that you have to cope with both at the same time rather than trying to ascribe responsibility or blame to one or the other. The relationship between wages and prices cannot be ignored.

I should like to cite very briefly something of the British experience. In an excellent book, that I recommend to any hon. member who is interested in the subject of inflation and possible methods of bringing it under control, called "The New Inflation" by the Right Hon. Aubrey Jones, a book well worth reading, Mr. Jones has some very interesting statistical information which is worth looking at. First of all, he shows what has happened in so far as labour's share of the national income is concerned and he shows that, going back as far as 1855, for example, labour's share was about 53 per cent of the national income in Great Britain. This fell in 1870 to about 45 per cent. But in the succeeding years it has increased until it is now more than 70 per cent of the total. Labour's share of the national income has been rising. At the same time, labour unit costs have been rising, and this inevitably has played an important part in the establishment of prices. There is an index in the book which I cannot find at the moment. Perhaps my colleague could look it up and I will return to it.

The important part of the graph is that, first of all, the unit cost of labour has increased dramatically over an extended period. But from our standpoint perhaps the lesson to be drawn is that the two graphs of labour unit costs and the consumer price index virtually parallel each other throughout the entire period. They are almost identical. One lies almost on the other. I tried to find comparable figures for Canada but was unable to lay my hands on them this morning. However, it is interesting to note the relationship between wages and prices in this country. In my book, "Agenda", I propose a formula. All other things being equal, which of course they never are exactly, I suggest that P equals W minus Q. This means that the rate of change in our consumer price index is equal to the rate of change in wages in money terms, minus the rate of change in productivity in real terms.

It might interest you to know that in the ten year period from 1963 to 1972 the average annual percentage increase in wages and earnings in Canada was 6.5 per cent, the average annual percentage increase in productivity was 3 per cent, the average annual increase in consumer prices for the ten year period was 3.5 per cent. The increase in consumer prices was exactly the difference between the wage increases in dollar terms and real productivity throughout on an average throughout the ten year period.

My colleague the Conservative House leader has now found the chart to which I referred earlier, Mr. Speaker. It is an index beginning at 100 in 1948 to 1970. It has gone from 100 to about 270 in so far as labour unit costs are concerned. In the same period of time, the price index has gone from 100 to about 250, almost parallel to the increase in unit costs.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told the House of Commons the other day, as recorded at page 33 of Hansard, the following:

> I find it appropriate at this time to destroy the myth that the cost of labour has been a dominant factor in contributing to the present inflationary round in Canada. That is not true.

To put it bluntly, the Prime Minister in this case is full of hops. To make that kind of statement in spite of the professional expertise available to him is outrageous. If he is not careful, he will wind up in jail with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray).

I do not want to give the impression that labour is primarily responsible for inflation. I think that government expenditures and high taxes have put a tremendous pressure on the working man. But there is a relationship, mathematically, between wages and prices, and this must be taken into account in any discussion of inflation, along with taxes and profits.

If the bill does nothing to control the influence of big monopolistic labour, the question arises as to whether or not it will be more effective in controlling industry. Certainly, on the basis of past experience there is little hope. I should like to quote, if I may, two paragraphs, again from my book, as follows:

> The Canadian approach to these questions was suggested by Mr. King in presenting the bill. Like his colleague to the south, Mr. Roosevelt, he indulged in no sweeping condemnation of trusts but differentiated between the good ones and the bad ones. And the formula for enforcement was publicity and conciliation resting on the conviction that "light is the sovereign antiseptic and the best of all policemen".

Does that not sound strangely reminiscent of the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and his hopes for Mrs. Plumptre and her rather ineffectual enforcement group?

● (1540)

Notwithstanding this faith in light, subsequent legislation has opted for a bit more flesh, though only a bit more. In addition to attempting clarification of what a combine was, the revised Combines Investigation Act of 1923, which is the basis of present law, provided for permanent officers and staff and gave independent powers of initiative to that staff. Despite these powers, from 1923 to 1959 there were only sixty-five reports issued and twenty-three convictions. One non-admirer of the law has observed with perhaps more than a trace of bias:

"Either Canadian business has been very good or our administration has been very loose. In either case, business seems to have little to worry about whether or not the law be strictly construed."

This new law provides little substantive change. Oligopolies don't need to have agreements in restraint of trade. They don't need to engage in identical bidding. All they have to do is follow the well established practice of price leadership.

For the benefit of those who may not understand from personal experience how oligopolies work let me give two examples. One I often cite is of, say, five companies in the city of Toronto. Their representatives get together for lunch. The representative of the largest manufacturer will say, "The cost of transportation has gone up; the cost of labour has gone up; the cost of energy has gone up, and on April 1 I am going to put up the price of bricks $5 a thousand." Then, perhaps they talk about how last week's warm spell has affected the buds on the fruit trees in the Niagara peninsula, and about whether or not John Bassett has met his match in the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). They then go home, Mr. Speaker, and there is no contract, no agreement—not even a handshake. This is the way oligopolies operate, for the most part through understanding.

When I visited Australia a couple of years ago I was entertained to lunch by our trade commissioner there. He took me to a very interesting club known as the Bamblers' Club. He said, "Do you see the table on my right? The 14 people there are the Viniers of Australia. By the time they finish lunch they will have divided up both the domestic and foreign markets for the next quarter." Nobody was taking notes, Mr. Speaker. Nothing was obvious whatsoever. There was just that kind of mystique, that almost mysterious understanding that people who operate in an oligopolistic situation have with each other.

Not long ago when an increase in the price of gasoline was proposed in the city of Toronto a spokesman for one of the companies said, "We will have to wait until we see what Imperial Oil does." The proposition was that Imperial Oil was the leader. It was the biggest and most powerful company. Consequently if it figured its cost situation demanded a certain increase in prices then the others would more or less automatically follow along, without any agreement, without any understanding, without any contract, and without sanctions, having in mind the way oligopolistic industry has developed not only in our country but in other countries as well. Inevitably when a small number of companies occupy a major share of the market, imperfect price competition will prevail.

Added to the fact that this bill excludes labour, and will be largely ineffective for business, is the list of additional specific exemptions. The doctors won't be included if they are subject to provincial law. The dentists won't be included if they are subject to provincial law. The lawyers won't be included if they are subject to provincial law. The real estate brokers won't be included if they are subject to provincial law. The banks can be excluded on authorization of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). Hydro power won't be included if it is subject to provincial regulations. Air fares won't be included if they are subject to federal regulations. Telephone charges won't be included because they are subject to federal laws. Postage stamps won't be included because they are subject to federal regulations.

If the bill will be largely ineffective for big business, and if labour, the professions, energy and transportation, among other things, can under normal circumstances be excluded, then what is left? The answer is very little—not much indeed! The great majority of the Canadian economy is not included. It is exempt, or it is insignificantly affected except for additional red tape and the consequent higher costs that it will entail.

As the hon. member for St. Paul's indicated, Mr. Speaker, we will support the bill, subject to some reservations and amendments, in the hope that some of its provisions will be beneficial to small business, and that others will provide some additional consumer protection.

As some of its provisions are far-reaching in so far as they may interfere with existing distribution techniques we feel they deserve serious study, and that all interested parties should be given ample opportunity to present their views. Consequently, the government may wish to give consideration to the possibility of splitting the bill, which would allow speedy passage of the more urgent sections while allowing more extensive discussion of the other far more reaching sections. On the broader front, as a contribution to price stability one can only conclude that the approach is totally inadequate. It is outdated. It is, in fact, archaic.

We must admit that we have a split economy. It is not a homogeneous economy. It is an economy where some prices obey the law of supply and demand, where some wages are negotiated between small operators and their employees directly; and where, on the other hand, some prices are set by market power, by the big oligopolies, and where some wages are negotiated by unions which have sufficient power that they can in fact exercise a monopoly with respect to the supply of labour, and where a settlement is reached between a company and a union, perhaps not on the basis of the public interest but on the basis of the interests of the two participating parties at the negotiating table.

So, Mr. Speaker, the first thing we have to do in order to come to grips with the over-all approach is to admit, once and for all, that our economy is split; that it consists of two parts, and that probably of the two parts the rigid, oligopolistic and monopolistic part has more power and more influence on what happens in the economy than the remaining market sector which is in fact very much influenced by the more rigid sector. We must abandon the approach of the last century which held that we have a genuine market economy. In fact, we do not. We must introduce a new concept of reconciliation. The real economy must be reconciled with the public interest.

We regulate transportation costs in the public interest. We do not always do it well, as is evidenced by the transportation mess that we have in the country at the present time, but the principle of reconciliation is accepted. We permit the Minister of Finance to authorize banks to set uniform interest rates on deposits, as indeed well we might. Certainly, if we start moving into a situation where we want to get inflation under control and where it is public policy to reduce interest rates, this is a power that must reside in the Minister of Finance because it is one of the most important aspects affecting the over-all interest rates situation in this country. Those of us who believe that something must be done would not want to see the Minister of Finance without this power of regulation. Yet we realize it is inconsistent with the old, out worn concept of genuine competition at all levels.

Why cannot we recognize both the right and the necessity of establishing guidelines under which union power and market power could operate in the public interest? People are getting sick of strikes. People are getting sick of slowdowns and of working to rule. People are getting sick of students who are not being taught. People are getting sick of having their travel arrangements disrupted by strikes or any other device. No one wins; everyone loses. It is almost as if we were considering the human body, Mr. Speaker. How could we say to any one of the systems in the human body, "We can do without you for some period of time"? We cannot say to the heart, "You do not need to work"; nor to the respiratory system, "You can have the weekend off". It is impossible to operate any interdependent complex system in this way and similarly it is impossible to operate a complex interrelated system like our modern economy in this way.

People are getting sick of rising prices. They are getting sick of dramatically increased profits with their inflationary increments. People are getting sick of the status quo. People are sick of the confrontation between business, labour and government and it is obvious that something new must be tried. A policy of reconciliation must be tried and given a chance.

The Prime Minister has chided my leader for suggesting a new approach. Surely, anyone as wedded to policies which have been proven as disastrous as present policy, should not pour scorn or ridicule on new approaches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: The government's policy is set in the concrete of the 1930's and the 1940's.

Mr. Bell: With the NDP.

Mr. Hellyer: They are all part of the same bunch. Neither has had a new idea since 1935. The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) on the other hand, welcomes new ideas. He is willing to innovate; he is willing to accept the risk involved in blazing a new trail. He is willing to set Canada on a new course of conciliation under which all Canadians can work together but work as partners to build a new Canada.

Competition Bill

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, despite the closing comments of the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), rather than launch into a tirade in response to the very superficial and traditional remarks at the conclusion of each address by hon. members opposite, anxious and lusting for power but a long distance from it, I should like to begin by saying simply that this bill before the House today is a plateful of nutritious justice for Canadian consumers. It has been a long time in the kitchen. It is action to achieve a major cleanup of the marketplace, and it is of great significance to all consumers, urban and rural alike. The various measures in this one bill are enough to make any parliament proud of it as the work of an entire session, were that all that was accomplished. It is a most significant choice as the first piece of legislation to be debated in this second session of parliament following the throne speech debate. I hope the bills that follow from this government will each be half as significant, in protecting and assisting Canadians, as this bill is to Canadian consumers.

During the leadoff address by the minister yesterday, when he urged quick, thoughtful, but prompt judgment of this legislation so that it could pass into law and at last correct these injustices in our system, some members opposite heckled "If that is the case, why did you not do something last December? Why did you bring it in last November? Why have you not done anything about it until now?" Of course, a few minutes later when the minister had finished, the first spokesman for the official opposition rose and said, "One of the things that is really bad about this is that you gave it to us on Monday and you spring debate on us two days later." That is the kind of hypocrisy that the official opposition suggests is honest debate and criticism of the actions of government. I really doubt very much whether they are carrying out their full responsibility. I always thought that progressive conservatism meant that there was at least some progress within conservatism. I am beginning to think that it means becoming progressively more conservative.

Mr. Baker: Tell us about the glories of the new world.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I am always pleased to have the attention of hon. members opposite. That is a rare compliment, when they listen and consider someone else's view.

If I may continue, Mr. Speaker, back in 1966 the Economic Council of Canada was called on by government to study this situation. The first competition bill was brought down in June of 1971, and we are all familiar with the strong reaction to it. It has been eight years in total since work was begun on a study of this matter. As I said a few moments ago, this bill was first presented late last year; now we have it, and now it is time to act. I hope that members on both sides of this House who are concerned about consumers and their protection will responsibly act together to take action, make amendments where necessary in committee, and bring forward the bill to have it passed into law as soon as possible.

I want to put into the record, if I may, Mr. Speaker, the reaction of some small business leaders and some of our media people in Canada who are often critical of the government. There is for instance the statement given at six o'clock on November 5 of last year on CBC radio by Ruben Bromstein of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, which has some 9,000 members across Canada. Mr. Bromstein said, of this legislation:

Clearly, we are most pleased that the bill has been introduced ... basically it is giving small business an opportunity to be protected by the law. And even after a decision has been made that somebody is violating the law, a small businessman will have the opportunity to sue in court to collect damages that have occurred because he has been hit by the people who are trying to drive him out of business, or are in some way affecting his business unfairly.

What we are concerned with here is that the government seems to have made a genuine attempt to catch the errors (at least that's the impression I'm getting from reading these provisions) and to try and, in a staging process, get at the problems that affect him.

That is a small business leader of probably the largest association of businessmen in Canada. I have another quote here from Gail Scott of CTV News on November 5, 1973 when the bill was first brought in during the last session. She said:

... the new act does go a long way to regulate continual consumer problems and if implemented, will bring with it many of the changes that consumers have been asking for.

Biographer and columnist Geoff Stevens of the Globe and Mail said:

Many of the bill's provisions make simple good sense.

Two encouraging aspects of the new bill are that it would bring a broad range of services (as well as goods and products) under regulation and it would give the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission the power to order a halt to illegal business practices.

And finally, one of Canada's leading experts in competition and consumer law, as quoted in the Globe and Mail for November 17, 1973, Professor Donald N. Thompson, Professor of Administrative Studies at York University, said:

One of the rare abilities in this world is that of taking a good but controversial idea a lot of people find objectionable, and revising, rewording and re-introducing it so that it says exactly what it said before but is now embraced as being both desirable and different from what it was.

This is precisely what has happened with the new competition bill, introduced by Herb Gray, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, as an amendment to the Combines Investigation Act.

So, from a broad section of the media, from business leaders, from experts in our universities, comes acclaim for this bill. Mr. Speaker, if I were still in the news business, as once I was, and I were faced with deciding how I could handle this bill, I think my first reaction would be, "If only you could bring in something like this piece by piece over a number of days". Each of the many actions within it is major front page news of very real significance.

I should like now to talk about some of the particular aspects that relate directly to consumers, some of the principles involved in this bill. In the area of misleading advertising, particularly significant is the proposed new clause that would apply to prices shown on the article itself or, as set out in clause 36(2)(b):

—expressed on anything attached to, inserted in or accompanying an article offered ... for sale,—

—on point of purchase displays or in any advertisement. In fact, statements made by salesmen in the store, by telephone or in door to door selling—any presentation, can be judged. If it is not correct, then under the new provision the general impression created by representation, as well as the literal meaning, would have to be taken into account by a court in determining whether or not that advertising was misleading. There is real discipline provided by this measure and Canadian consumers can expect to get the straight and honest facts when they are considering a piece of material, goods, or now, services.

[Mr. Fleming.]

As well, it often happens that people are worried about the merchandise they are about to purchase; that it will not stand up or there is something about it that makes them uncertain. The assurance given by the salesman is that there is a guarantee or warranty. It is a very official, ceremonial looking piece of paper with a lot of small print that they do not understand. That is their reassurance and, even though there is something about the object they are about to buy that they are not sure about, they go away and find out later that the piece of paper means nothing. However, it helped the salesman get rid of the object. The buyer is stuck and must take the loss. I think the principle underlying this legislation is tremendously important. I am referring to that part of the bill which says that warranties, guarantees or promises to replace or repair an article offered for sale are misrepresentations contrary to the act if there is no reasonable prospect that they will be carried out.

● (1600)

May I continue talking about the misleading advertising section of the act. Clause 36(1) contains a principle of great importance. We all know the tremendous impact of the advertising on television which shows the lovely lady next door, so to speak, with two kids; she is a model housewife—and says something like this. "I know that you just came across me, Mr. Announcer, but the wonderful, glorious truth is that I love this product. I use it all the time and what I have just said is completely spontaneous." That kind of nonsense will not wash anymore. If there is to be such advertising, the statements must be made by somebody who makes them honestly. There must be proof of this. This kind of testimonial cannot be used without the permission of that person.

I also hope there will be discipline, so that if somebody wants to put an appropriate plug on the air he will not be able to go out and conduct 500 interviews, then use the one interview that is suitable. I am not sure whether the bill, in its present form, will clamp down on such abuse. I hope the restrictions will be in the law, so that we may rely on the truth of what is said in this way by an alleged consumer who may advertise on the media.

Double tagging comes within the purview of the act. This crops up quite often and is of major significance. I believe last fall, as a result of investigations carried out under the direction of the Prices Review Board, we discovered that many stores, because people had been talking of inflation and so fanned the fires of inflation, had put on more than one tag. Retailers had put new prices over the old ones, and the new prices were charged even though the commodities had been on hand when the old price had been charged. These commodities had not been bought at increased prices. The sale must be at the lowest price of any tag put on the article. I would be pleased if we could even go further and say that the commodity in stock must be sold at the going price, and that its price cannot be jacked up when more expensive stock arrives later.

Bait and switch is an old trick which people without a good product to sell or people trying to lure customers into the store frequently use. It is used on the unaware consumer and has brought great profits to certain people who have no conscience about using the technique. It has brought great hardship and unhappiness to the consumer. Bait and switch is a technique which takes advantage of less consumer educated people. Often they are lower income Canadians, and I am pleased to see that this bill deals with this situation. The old practice of saying, "We are going to have television sets at $89 each; you must come and get these beautiful 27 inch television sets," and then, after 500 people have rushed in, saying, "We are sorry but we only had three sets at that price; now that you are here, come and buy this 21 inch set for $500," is to be forbidden. This practise will not be tolerated. You must have an adequate supply of whatever you are advertising in stock. You must prove that you really mean to do what your advertising says, and that you are not just luring in people who hope to buy something at bargain rates, when the truth is that there are no bargains. In fact, the advertiser knows darn well he can't afford to give such bargains.

Clause 37(1) of the bill, Mr. Speaker, carries the merchant's responsibility a step further. It would be an offence for anyone who advertises a product for sale at a specified price to sell that product at a higher price during the period and in the market to which the advertisement related. Again that is a significant move. You cannot put an advertisement in the paper on Monday, an then when people go shopping on Thursday, having read your advertisement, say to them that that price was only good for Monday and Tuesday. You will not be able to do that; you will not be able to highjack people in that sense anymore.

The other part of clause 37 is intended to provide new ground rules governing the practice of employing lotteries or other types of contest to promote sales of products. This is something that is all too often used on the consumer. The advertisement will say, "Win a bicycle for your child," or "Win a trip to Nassau," or something like that. All you have to do is fill in the form, read the ground rules and answer that easy test question at the end, then you will win. Often even more glorious prizes are offered. The advertisement will say that you can win $100,000, that there are many prizes. Under this legislation you will have to show what the odds are. No longer can everybody be given this false hope and so be induced to buy a product which they may not want or cannot afford. No longer will they buy a product that is more expensive than it ought to be because by buying it they can indulge in a dream which will never come true. After many disappointments, consumers become very disillusioned. They have wasted their money and they become bitter about the product involved.

If I may now leave the misleading advertising part of the bill which deals with the direct approach to the public, I should like to deal with two other areas of great importance in this bill, namely action to control referral selling and pyramid selling. Pyramid selling, as you know, operates much as a chain letter operates. The people at the beginning make tremendous gains, if it works. The idea is that you must keep on "suckering" more and more people into the scheme and broadening the base. The regular Joe who has been sucked into the scheme loses his money, has nothing to gain, and the people at the top walk away with the windfall gains. These schemes will be closely restricted under this act.

The second area is that of referral selling. I am talking about the sort of situation in which the vacuum cleaner salesman comes to the door and says, "I have a vacuum cleaner for you; it is only $800." The housewife gasps, says it is a beautiful vacuum cleaner, but how can I possibly afford $800? Within one hour and a half that salesman may have that woman selling 80 vacuum cleaners to her friends, neighbours and relatives so she can afford to buy the $800 one. That type of selling will end. That is one of the most significant parts of this bill.

I am pleased also to see that this bill, when passed, will give the restrictive Trade Practices Commission power to act against abusive practices such as refusal to deal, consignment selling, exclusive dealing, tide sales and market restrictions. These may be terms unfamiliar to many Canadian consumers. So, if I may, I will touch on them briefly.

Let me talk about refusal to deal. The supplier of a commodity may be angry with a retailer because the retailer has not been maintaining the price, or there may be some other reason for his anger. The supplier may, therefore, refuse to supply that retailer and thus affects his position unfairly. That will not be allowed to happen. The Restrictive Trade Practices Commission can investigate practices like that and, if needed, action will be taken. The people responsible for the abuse will be punished.

Consignment selling has sometimes been used to get around the prohibitions of resale price maintenance and price discrimination among a seller's customers. If appropriate the commission may order, in any given situation, that the practice be stopped or modified. Let me interpret that. For instance, if you are a large supplier you can go to a number of the major chains and say, "We will give you a price advantage because you are dealing in large volume." If you are selling 80 per cent of your volume to large retailers and selling only 20 per cent to smaller retailers I do not understand how you can sell 80 per cent at a low price and leave 20 per cent of your market at a price disadvantage because the small retailers handling the 20 per cent are not selling as much as the large chains which sell 80 per cent. I hope that this bill will be effective in stopping that kind of price discrimination.

I very much support the principle used by the bill for dealing with exclusive selling. It will prevent the supplier from making exclusive contracts with retailers in which there will be certain boundaries within which that product will be sold exclusively by one retailer. Under that practice there are no overlapping boundaries and there is no competition between retailers with regard to that product. This situation is prevalent in the automotive field. It is not fair and must be stopped, especially as large scale advertising creates a special demand for the product in the minds of the public. Therefore, I think what the bill does in this regard is very important.

I should like to see amendments dealing with certain abuses to which I shall refer. Perhaps this could be done in committee. I am talking of a practice that is very similar to exclusive dealing. For instance, in Ontario you might be selling cocktail mixes. The large food chains might say to you, "We will only handle one brand; if you want us to handle your brand you must pay us $12,000 for a one-year contract, and we will handle it exclusively. You will also need to take advantage of our advertising deals, and so on." That is how they treat suppliers. It means that the consumer has no choice in product. Meanwhile, the price of that product must surely be affected because of the front end cash payment for one chain to handle it exclusively. I hope this practise will be considered later in committee.

Let me refer to something which is foremost in people's minds, especially in view of the difficulties we have been witnessing in connection with the sale of locomotives to Cuba by Montreal Locomotives Worthington. There have been difficulties with United States laws. I think it is excellent that the bill provides that where, foreign judgments, laws or directives are found to be contrary to the Canadian public interest, the commission may make orders that forbid their implementation in Canada. At last, we will clear up that inequity.

One of the major principles of this bill, one which, as I understand it, will not come into effect at the same time as the other measures, has to do with the whole area of competition and consumer protection in relation to services. The inclusion of services in the bill reflects the growing importance of this sector of the Canadian economy. Formerly, though some services related to goods were included, services of any description are now covered. The minister has explained that the proclamation of the law, to the extent that it relates to agreement in restraint of trade in the service sector, may be brought into force at a later date in order to afford an opportunity to discuss any problems which might arise and find an equitable way of setting out the regulations. Even so this vast area will at last be included in competition and consumer legislation.

I turn, now, to the section which says that in the field of professional and amateur sports it shall be an offence to combine or arrange with another person to limit reasonable opportunities for a person to participate in a sport or to negotiate with a team of his choice. This will not mean there will be no contractual rights. It will not mean that the richest franchise in a particular sport can buy out all the best players in other teams. But there is some muscle here to be sure there is not the kind of human horse-trading which often takes place in our sport today, particularly in junior or amateur sports where young people are involved. For the first time, provision is made within this bill for civil action to be taken in the courts by anyone adversely affected by violations of this legislation. At last the consumer will have the right to fight for the return of his money and for justice to be done. It is a significant addition to the bill, and, I think, a rounding out of the measures taken to ensure fairness to consumers.

Another new provision would allow the director of investigation and research to make representations and call evidence before any federal board or commission with respect to the maintenance of competition whenever it would be relative to the matter being considered by the board. I believe this to be of particular significance. I see no reason why this provision would not apply to the work of the Food Prices Review Board. In cases where the board wishes to conduct its investigations, it will now be empowered to work directly with the investigations branch. I hope this provision will be of major assistance in making the work of the Food Prices Review Board even more effective.

As I said when I began, Mr. Speaker, this is a list of important measures to put the Canadian market place into much better order. It means an end to the hustlers and the hucksters. There will always be some, of course, who will try to find a new way of deceiving the public but we are closing many of the doors which have been left open, and which have allowed their imaginative minds to devise various ways of duping consumers and avoiding existing laws. The bill has been the subject of lengthy discussion over a number of years, beginning back in 1966. It was before the last parliament, where it was considered at length. All groups affected were given the opportunity to consider the extent of its impact, and I believe the time has now come to act. I have spent almost half an hour describing the specific principles which will deal directly with the action of those who would take advantage of consumers in Canada. The passage of this bill will stop this exploitation. It has gone on for years. Schemes such as bait and switch, pyramid selling and referral selling have taken advantage of consumers for years. Surely, this is the point at which we should all co-operate in seeing that the bill is considered quickly and passed into law. All of us think of elections from time to time. After this measure is passed, members from any party represented here can stand on the hustings and say: I, as one member of parliament, have done this for you, the Canadian consumer.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, the philosophy of this bill demonstrates the radically different approach to prices, and the problem of consumers, between our party and the government. The government and its allies to my left look at the economy of Canada in the light of a past century. This is the light of the 19th century, when there was a free economy, when there were innumerable buyers and innumerable sellers, when there was genuine competition between many manufacturers and many distributors of goods. They say that this bill, and the tinkering it provides, will make sure that there will be real competition and that competition in itself will make prices fall, will provide the justice that consumers demand.

The reality of the 1970's is that we are in an age of oligarchy, big corporations, big business, big labour, where there is really no competition, an age in which, as the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) said, prices are determined by price leadership, by administrative policy, by administered terms of competition. We do not live in an open barter economy any longer. We do not live in an era where there are many steel companies, where there are many cement companies, where there are many automobile manufacturers and where these companies compete with one another individually in every sense.

We only have to consider the automobile industry to realize the misunderstanding of the nature of our society that this government and its allies in the New Democratic Party have. The automobile industry, for example, amounts to one company which basically controls the whole industry. I refer, of course, to General Motors. Let's not kid the troops; there is no competition in terms of price. It is a question of price leadership. The only competition, and it is certainly minor competition, exists in the registered outlets of each of the large manufacturing corporations. When you say you will lower tariffs and allow in foreign goods to increase competition you are talking balderdash and nonsense. We cannot dismantle our industrial enterprises just because the prices don't fall low enough. We must make sure that our large manufacturers are protected in a sense. So, prices will never be lowered by reduction in tariffs or removal of customs barriers. It is nonsense to suggest that they will. These large organizations set prices and set the terms, and they are never really prosecuted because they combine. If they are threatened they find a way out. They have always avoided prosecution in the past and they will in the future. The bill before us does not solve anything with respect to prices.

The measure before us deals with the banking industry. What an industry! Does anybody honestly suggest that there is real competition in the banking industry, other, perhaps, than in the advertizing campaigns they run on television, or over the radio or, perhaps, in terms of their fancy buildings, claiming that one tower is a little higher than another, or in terms of the personality of one manager as compared with the personality of another? Is there any competition in the interest rates charged by banks? We all know that the prime rate of interest is 9½ per cent and we know that credit risks are adjudged by all bankers in basically the same fashion.

Every small businessman knows that when he goes to one bank and is refused he will probably be refused at another bank. This bill does not get at this situation at all. So far as the banks are concerned, all the bill does is to levy a fine of $10,000 as an alternative to the possibility of two years in jail, and whoever heard of a banker going to jail under the last act? Is a banker going to jail or is he going to pay a fine under this act? So, let us not kid ourselves: the provisions of this bill with respect to banks are meaningless in terms of competition, and why they are in the bill I do not know. This bill is not a bill that is going to improve competition in banking in any way.

So far as the oil industry is concerned, just last fall we had what was supposed to be an oil crisis. The price of gasoline increased by an almost identical amount at the same time at the pump of every oil company. There is no question of combine here; it is a question of an oligarchy when that type of activity occurs. The approach of the government is the wrong approach. The government is not doing anything about increased prices or about these oligarchies.

What we really need is an incomes and prices review board. What we really need is an incomes policy based on the long term that will put public input into our price and wage structure. In a country like Canada, with 22 million people, we must maintain the economy of scale that the large corporations provide. But recognizing that, we must also recognize that competition is not going to control prices, that public input must be made.

For a long time we have recognized that to control telephone rates and transportation rates, the rate that is charged must be reviewed by a public board or commission. This is what this party has been saying all along in regard to inflation and price control. Essentially, we have been saying that what we need is an incomes policy that is absolute. We need to attack inflation in a different fashion. Simply tinkering around with provisions dealing with refusal to sell and other little things in this bill will not do very much to benefit the consumer. The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) was right when he asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) today: Where in this bill is there anything to reduce prices? This is the issue today, yet there is nothing in the bill whatsoever to reduce prices. The bill may have some good points, but really it is a bankrupt bill.

As I say, there are some good things in the bill which we would be most pleased to support and are very happy about, but with regard to the over-all concept of reducing prices and controlling the economy so that the big and powerful do not, to use the words of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), rip-off the people of Canada, we must have an incomes policy that will control prices and wages in the public interest. Then the large fixers of society will not be able each and every year to take a larger and larger share of the total pot. This is what has been happening in the 1970's, and it will continue to happen since this bill is not going to do anything to stop it. It might do something to control arrangements made between two automobile dealers, but it really is not going to do anything to control the fixes in society. It is about time the government and their allies started to realize that this is the 1970's, the last half of the 20th century. The economic philosophy of the 18th or 19th century does not apply today. This is not 1930.

I should like to say a few things about what the bill does. It has some accomplishments that are valid and for which we have been calling from time to time. The bill creates offences for certain shady business practices, and certainly these shady business practices must be controlled. The bill restricts bid rigging, where one contractor combines with another contractor to put in a fixed, high priced bid. It controls that sort of thing, and that is important.

The bill controls misleading advertising. It controls phony warranties, and I think we are all in favour of that. It controls some aspects of double ticketing. It has provisions in regard to advertising and in regard to some of this alleged bargain advertising. This is the situation where someone advertises what is said to be a bargain, but unfortunately he does not have enough goods in stock to meet his anticipated orders and he is really using his advertisement of a bargain as a method of switch selling. The bill does control this type of activity. The bill controls pyramid selling. It controls some of the phony contests that are carried out by some firms through advertising of merchandise.

All of these are items of consumer protection, and if they were included together within one bill and put before the House as one proposition, then we would have a worth-while piece of legislation, a piece of legislation that members on this side would, I am sure, accept almost immediately. The bill would go to committee for some touching up of the drafting, and it would be through the House and passed into law in no time at all. However, this bill is an omnibus bill. This government is used to omnibus bills. It is a government that always wants to put a whole lot of things under one umbrella.

I should like to say a few words about some of the provisions that I am not sure have any validity, matters that will probably not help business conditions or encourage more competition. I suspect they will only add to the costs that are inherent in our economy and they will certainly increase bureaucracy in our economic and business system. The government continually receives complaints from citizens about certain problems. One of the concerns that I have, and which I know other hon. members have, is that all of a sudden, having received a complaint, the government does something about it but often uses a cannon to shoot a mouse. It passes a law or sets up a board or commission with far greater powers than required to deal with the situation.

That, to a large extent, is the case with this bill. For example, let me address myself to competition in sport. Some serious complaints have been made about young athletes being enslaved—I suppose enslaved is not too strong a word for it—by contracts that were made on their behalf by their parents when the athletes were young and which, in effect, prevent them as they move forward from going from one league to another league as they wish. In other words, their employment is restricted and their freedom destroyed. However, these contracts may have offered some advantages. They have perhaps enabled leagues to develop. It may be that those contracts have enabled junior players to be brought along. When we get worked up about these contracts we ought to remember that they were voluntarily signed by people who knew other people who had signed such contracts. Often those contracts were signed when a person did not realize his income potential. Then, suddenly, he does realize it and he begins to scream because he made a bad deal. The whole question of sports contracts should be a matter for a separate bill and a separate review by a committee of this House which could look into the contracts and the terms of the league organization.

This government has really done nothing about sports until now, other than I suppose put the NFL on CBC television and decide that it is going to ban the WFL from coming to Toronto. Really it has done very little in respect of professional sport, but all of a sudden it comes into the picture with a bill amending the Combines Investigation Act, the Bank Act and the Criminal Code, and decides to make provisions in respect of sports contracts and the direction of sports. Really this is a different issue from the price of goods or selling something in a store. This is a different issue from distributing goods among franchise holders in a commercial business sense. The particular provisions of this bill which relate to sports should be set aside and referred to a special committee. One of the problems with an omnibus bill, is that when you put a lot of things under one cover, you find many things you are happy with but a number of other things that cause you concern. I have some concern about the sports provisions in this bill. These provisions are not the essence of the bill at all but the essence of a new approach to organized sports, and they should be in a different bill.

The next thing I want to talk about is this refusal to sell problem. There have been a number of outlets which have become worked up about the fact that they would like to buy certain manufactured goods for resale but, generally speaking, in the distribution of manufactured goods across Canada the manufacturers have set out exclusive territories or have exclusive arrangements with certain distributors. In a country as diverse as Canada this business of exclusive territories or areas of distribution has proved to be quite valuable. Indeed, I suggest that in many ways the distribution of many goods could not be effected without some exclusive territorial or distributor franchise system. It is only with a franchise system that goods can in fact be distributed.

The difficulty with this bill is that it may or may not be proper to interfere with such arrangements. Anyone can complain. Then, the commission will investigate and may declare an arrangement to be improper. If that declaration is made the person involved in setting up a distributorship or a franchise arrangement is forced to justify his marketing techniques. It seems to me there is no reason for this kind of provision in the bill. Is it really necessary at this point? I suggest it requires a lot more examination. I have grave doubts as to whether a person should not be entitled to refuse to sell to someone unless he agrees to buy the entire line, or to stock all the parts and the ancillary things required. The manufacturer of the goods has a pretty good idea of his potential market, and he knows how best to distribute those goods. Is it really essential that a bureaucratic arrangement be made empowering a commission to interfere with the details of such a business, just for the sake of suggesting it will increase competition? Indeed, it may have exactly the reverse effect. The increased competition may destroy the business or the possibility of marketing the goods at a low price. These provisions in respect of refusal to sell or tied lines, and this interference in a legitimate business organization or a company's dealings across Canada, will have to be examined in great detail, and a great deal of evidence will have to be placed before a committee.

The hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) is perhaps right in suggesting that the part of the bill which really affects the consumer could be passed right away, but when we come to this complex question of franchise arrangements, exclusive territories and the demand that one person be entitled to buy goods directly from a source, then we have problems which will take some time to solve it. We must be sure we are not creating a law that is going to do more harm than good in Canada. Unfortunately, the minister has used this grab-bag approach again by putting provisions in the same bill in relation to business, sports, banks and the legitimate concerns of which I spoke earlier.

One thing that has bothered many of us is the way the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission is to operate. It appears that the commission will have three real functions; one is administrative, one will be investigative and one will be judicial. The problem is that there is no separation of these functions, so the commission is the judge and the jury, as well as the policeman. We have a situation in which the commission will investigate and then charge a businessman or some concern with an offence. That man or concern will come before the very people who did the investigation and laid the charge. There is no provision in the bill for a fair hearing or trial of the issue, no provision for the calling of evidence, for cross-examination of witnesses by counsel, and no provision that the commission, when adjudicating on a matter, must give written reasons for its decision.

That would not be so bad, I suppose, if all the commission could do was levy a fine, or make an order, but the difficulty arises in respect of a civil suit which can be brought as a result of the order of the commission. All the person complaining must do is prove that the commission made an order. Then, if he can show any loss at all he gets back not only that loss but also any costs he may have incurred in investigating the matter. We do not have any provision for written reasons, yet an order of the commission is all that is necessary to collect civil damages. This is an amazing change in the concept of law.

Let me go into the matter of criminal law, or highway traffic law, if you like, which applies to the offence of careless driving. Let us take the case of a person who is charged by a policeman with careless driving. He attends court and may plead guilty. He may feel that really he is not guilty because the person with whom he had the accident was also careless. In many cases both parties have been charged with careless driving and, because of the cost involved in defending the charge, plead guilty and pay the fine. If a lawsuit should result, then the whole issue is tried all over again and evidence produced. When a person pleads guilty he may not know what damages are involved.

If a person is charged under this particular provision of the bill, he would not dare plead guilty. He had better fight it right down to the wire because he does not know when he may be sued for damages and the order made by the commission is sufficient to nail him for damages. Such people must defend an action brought by the commission to the very utmost. Ordinarily when a person is involved in a civil lawsuit arising from a criminal charge, a new trial is held and the plea to the criminal charge is not taken into account. This is not the case in this situation, so what we have here is a step away from the normal jurisprudence of this country.

Should this bill pass second reading, I feel the committee must carefully examine this provision because it is a new step. It is a totally new proceeding, a new way of handling the question of civil responsibility for actions that are now declared to be of a criminal nature. Nowhere else in law does this situation exist. One may commit rape and be placed in jail. However, one also can be sued civilly for that offence and may have to pay damages. But in such a case there are two separate trials of the whole issue. Under the provisions of this bill there are not two separate trials. There is one trial by the commission. This is a kangaroo court conviction. The person concerned is stuck for civil damages. Any damages that are proved he must pay. This situation must be looked at in every detail.

One concern that has been expressed by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) and others is that the bill exempts the labour organizations from being subject to the restraint of competition or combines legislation. Certainly, over the history of the 19th century, and the first part of this century, the labour unions, with the development of collective bargaining, have managed to obtain for the men a fair recognition of their labour in the development of the country.

Unfortunately, however, there have developed on the labour scene conditions that are far from marketplace conditions and which go a long way beyond what is normally the proper sphere of collective bargaining. For example, the collective agreement of the electrician's union in Toronto contains a provision which places a serious limit on the number of persons who can become apprentices. If I or my son wished to become apprenticed as electricians we could not do so. The number of apprentices is limited and the number of people allowed in the trade is limited. That is a combine every bit as much as any other combine.

An hon. Member: What about law?

Mr. Blenkarn: Yes, the legal profession, the engineering profession and these other professions should be included because they are combines in restraint of trade. The same situation applies in respect of the construction industry. I will tell you a story, Mr. Speaker. I was acting for a construction company which wished to bid on some work. That company was told it could not bid on the work unless it was unionized. So, a patsy agreement was made with the union. The employees did not have anything to do with it. The company paid the dues and the company obtained the contract because it was a union company. The men were not organized. The contract price was increased by the amount of the union dues paid. If this is an example of collective bargaining, then I am pretty shocked.

This is the type of thing the minister should direct himself to as well. There is no reason this bill should exclude from the provisions of restraint of trade legislation labour unions which operate in that fashion. If there is a monopoly in respect of the people entitled to be plumbers in a city, is that not an example of restraint of trade just as it would be in the case of real estate brokers or doctors. While these people may be excluded from this legislation because of provincial legislation, I suggest the labour unions should be placed in the same position as professionals. I am a member of a classy labour union, the Law Society of Upper Canada. I am a member of the society and I cannot practice law without such membership. I am at least subject to provincial jurisdiction and I am subject to this legislation where it is not in conflict with provincial legislation.

Surely, this bill should include all forms of people involved in professions. If you drive a truck or locomotive you are a professional. There is no reason that type of activity should not be treated as professional. Because these people are professionals they should come under the provisions of this act and should be subject to the same disciplines as any other professional. The reason they are exempt from these provisions is pretty evident in this parliament. It is because the government relies on the New Democratic Party in order to stay in office. It is not a question of principle. It is the only thing the government can do. It must keep the NDP happy.

The major complaint I have is that this bill takes the wrong view in respect of the kind of economy we have in the 1970's. The bill contains some provisions that will help in the trade of goods. It does ban certain obnoxious retail practices. However, it is not a bill that would do anything to reduce prices in Canada. It takes a totally wrong approach. The approach taken in this bill will not reduce prices in Canada. We live in an economy where the major price structure is controlled by large corporations and large unions. These corporations set prices on an administrative basis, on what they think they can get for their product. If they decide they want to pay more for labour or for management's salaries, they pass that on. They could continue to do that. There is nothing to prevent them from doing so in this bill. They can stay well within the framework of the bill, and there will be no improvement in the price structure or in the competition among them.

What we need is a new approach, a new industrial and commercial policy for Canada in terms of the pricing of goods, the pricing of labour, and the pricing of incomes in the public interest. That can only be done with a rounded incomes policy, and that is not being done in this bill. This bill sets up more bureaucracy and more rules for people to watch out for but it does not get at the real issue of 1974, and that is inflation which is as high as we have ever had it and going higher. When the cost of everything we buy goes up by at least one per cent a month, when people are buying and buying because they have no faith in paper money, that is inflation.

We have a government which introduces some fiddly bureaucratic rules and controls. It hopes to accomplish something with those rules, but it really accomplishes nothing. Other than the provisions in this bill that clean up some dishonest business practices which I have mentioned earlier, this bill will need a great deal of review and reconsideration. The government should withdraw the bill immediately as it is now presented and produce a new bill covering those parts of competition that eliminate the bad practices of some businesses. It should present such a bill to the House, which would then be passed. The government should then, if it wants to go further, bring to the House committee a separate bill dealing with refusal to sell, franchise agreements, territorial agreements and that type of thing which seems to concern them so that the House committee could have the time to hear witnesses, to understand these, problems and to determine whether or not they are worth solving.

The same applies to the field of sports. If the government approached this bill with the real intention of doing something for Canadians; those parts of the bill that are valid would be passed very quickly. But the government does not do that. It put all these matters under one roof and said: "Aren't we wonderful". If they understood the economics of this nation and the problems of the 1970's they would not have presented the bill the way it is and they would have banned some of the distasteful practices.

[Mr. Blenkarn.]

Before concluding I want to mention one other matter that has concerned a number of us, that is the provisions in the bill that allegedly look after a situation in which the rules of a foreign government affect the trade practices of Canadians. Under the provisions of this bill, the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission is supposed to review that type of contract. These provisions in the bill are a complete abandonment of this government's responsibility to ensure that foreign laws do not control the business ethics and attitudes of Canadian businessmen. It is the government's obligation to act as they should have acted long ago in this matter before it was taken up by the public press. It should have stepped in and said: "This is Canada and if you are going to do business in Canada then you should follow Canadian rules and laws".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He can conclude his speech if there is unanimity. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blenkarn: I was just about to finish in any event, Mr. Speaker. I say that the provisions in connection with the control of foreigners doing business in Canada are not satisfactory and do not come to grips with the problem. This matter should be dealt with in another two section bill which should provide, as the hon. member for St. Paul's indicated, that foreigners or foreign controlled corporations doing business in Canada should obey the rules of trade in Canada and not be subject to the rules of trade that may emanate from their home country which may make their activity in this country illegal. That is an easy matter. It could be introduced by this government and would, I am sure, be passed by the House without even having to go to committee.

This omnibus bill leaves a great deal to be desired because of the way it is put together and because of the nature of the bill. I say to the minister—and I wish he were here—that if he wants this bill passed he should break it up into two parts. Some parts would be put through instantly and others would have to be closely examined. A great number of witnesses must be heard and it may take a long time before this bill returns to the House for third reading.

PRIVATE BILLS

EASTERN CANADA SYNOD OF THE LUTHERAN CHURCH

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland) moved that Bill C-264, respecting the Eastern Canada Synod of the Lutheran Church of America, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this will not take long, I am sure. It is a request to bring Bill C-264 before the House and obtain consent for this bill to be sent to committee. The request is made by the Eastern Synod of the Lutheran Church of Canada. The statute of 1885 which incorporated the synod restricted their investments. Recently, a large sum of money was given them which they think would be used better if they obtained a little more interest. In this way they could do more work for the church and for their foreign missions. I believe this is so, and I think that the investment should be carried out in the same manner as investments made by any institution such as, for example, an insurance company. However, this can all be discussed in committee, and I would simply ask the House to give the bill second reading so that it may proceed in the usual way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there are no further statements, I will put the motion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will now proceed to public bills.

Mr. Foster: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I believe there is general agreement to proceed with Bill C-104 standing in the name of the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

CANADA LABOUR CODE

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE PROTECTION AGAINST COMPULSORY UNION MEMBERSHIPS AND DUES DEDUCTIONS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River) moved that Bill C-104, to amend the Canada Labour Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on the subject of Bill C-104, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code. May I say that I do so against the advice of my friends and supporters, against the advice of my business colleagues, against the advice of my solicitor, and I have not even checked it out with my colleagues in the House of Commons. However, Mr. Speaker, I will put those who are timid and afraid at ease at once by saying my comments are not directed against labour unions in Canada. They are directed against businessmen and politicians who, in the interests of political expediency, in the interests of profits, have sold our Canadian labour force down the drain. They have done so, first of all, by allowing giant unions from outside our country to gain a stranglehold on our Canadian work force, but only in the most lucrative sectors of employment and only in the industries that can support the demands made by these giant international unions.

I would like to state that my argument is not based on one-sided experience. I have been a member of the International Woodworkers of America, and for a great number of years I have been a member of that other great union, the Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. Of late, however, I have gathered experience on the other side of the fence, and it is about this fence that I wish to talk.

It is this fence which keeps people of good will, of common goals and common interests, divided here in Canada. It is this artificial barrier that makes people on both sides set off on a course of confrontation and open warfare. It is this fence that prevents us from sitting together as intelligent people in an attempt to solve some of the great problems facing our nation, problems not at all related to everyday business-labour relations, but problems directly resulting from this warfare and confrontation raging within our country. I blame these barricades directly for part of the inflation which has become a serious threat to the survival of our monetary system, and for their effect on our cost of living which has such devastating effects on Canadians who do not have access to membership in a union or business and, as a result, cannot use the tool of lobbying or political pressure to further their aims.

The lack of a national identity is a direct result of this barrier, because we have nothing to offer our society to identify with as long as the smartest people in our land live on two sides of a fence, in open conflict with each other, and using every means at their disposal, but most of all politics. Political philosophies have become distorted by this confrontation, as we have resorted to identifying one side or the other with capitalism or communism.

We are confronted with strikes and picket lines because, as a government, we have not insisted on effective tools to settle disputes. We allow the tolerance of both sides to be tested to the breaking point. As a government, we are in a hopeless position because 55 per cent of the country's labour force works for the government in one way or another. We are the worst offenders because of the unfair and discriminatory practices we apply in dealing with the thousands upon thousands of Canadians who work for us in the civil service or in our Crown corporations. Surely, it should be our first responsibility to set an example by which modern labour legislation could be worked out.

Surely, there must be ways by which the government could earn the respect of its employees, so that the threat of strikes and open war is eliminated, at least in essential public services. And it should not be too difficult for us to identify essential public services. Simply, they are the services which the people of Canada have requested their government to operate, because they could not trust private enterprises to supply these services without interruption. We have stepped in and, in some cases, confiscated private business ventures because it was in the interests of our country to ensure control. But then, Mr. Speaker, we have turned control over to someone else, someone who, over the years, has equipped himself with more power to manipulate the welfare of our nation than the private businessman ever dreamed of possessing or ever wanted to possess.

May I use the rail strike of last year as an example. I was one of those members of parliament who were honest with their constituents. I said openly that, in my opinion, strikes in essential public services should be illegal. I said that we could not afford to put in jeopardy the safety, health and comfort of our people, and the very survival of our nation, by indulging in conflicts which are costly not only to government and to unions but also to wives and children, to the sick, the poor and the old—in other words, to all those who are in the least involved.

One of those wives wrote to me recently, and I quote from her letter—incidentally she is from British Columbia, from which I also hail:

> How many roles are being reversed in this, our glorious B.C., when the wives and mothers are forced, by the atrocious situations in their husbands' union, to go out to work and bring home the bacon, while husbands babysit and roam the streets? I believe in the right for women to work, if they want to, and when their families are grown. But, when I see strong, healthy men doing nothing to fight for their place in society and letting their union executives rule their lives like kings and the members just following along like little lambs, never complaining, just wondering why they are more and more out of work, it makes me boil.

And, Mr. Speaker, it makes me boil too, but I did not have to be afraid to state my views to my constituents who were on strike against the CNR, because I explained to them how I would protect them from having to take a seat on this vicious merry-go-round and from that competition through which everyone loses. I told them that employment conditions in essential public services, at the beginning, should be tied to factors established by private industries and their unions, but that eventually and more ideally the public service, through meaningful, consultative negotiation with the government, should be setting the standard by which those in the private sector would settle their differences.

[Mr. Oberle.]

But really we have gone too far for all that, Mr. Speaker. The same woman to whom I referred previously also wrote:

> Some unions and their executives have eaten away at the very souls of our men and husbands. They have taken away their self-respect and have corrupted them by encouraging situations where men must lie, cheat, or pay to get jobs to feed their families.
> By allowing this to continue what kind of example are we showing our young men who are ready to go out into the labour force without skills and ambition and the pride necessary to do an honest day's work?

> As a wife of a construction worker for six years now, I have watched the power a man's union has over him. It can be for good or for evil. But in our case it is the latter. The only good that has come out of it, is that it has opened my eyes to the real problem in our society. A society is only as good as the people who make the politicians make it. And a union is only as good as the members who make the labour leaders make it.

We have spent a hundred years correcting the sins of unscrupulous and irresponsible business tycoons who certainly were responsible for acts of slavery and worse. But, we have been so preoccupied doing that, that we have overlooked the power the unions and their leaders have accumulated in the process. Human nature, Mr. Speaker, not only applies to business people, it is something which is applicable to others with too much power as well. Unions are still a very vital part of the business of labour relations but, not in the role they have assumed today. They are controlling the only resource a nation has, its responsibility to its labour force and the productivity of that labour force.

Unions are not weak and helpless any more. They not only have developed political muscle unmatched by any other sector of our society, but they also have accumulated almost unlimited financial wealth through pension funds dues and payoffs. But that is not even the real problem, Mr. Speaker. The most frightening aspect of all is that this wealth and power is, to a great extent, controlled from a foreign land. I am quoting from a Canadian press story, making reference to the annual report of the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act. The article which appeared in the Albertan of November 5, 1973, reads:

> United States-centred unions in Canada collected nearly twice as much money in 1971 as they spent in this country in certain key financial categories, the latest issue of a controversial annual government report says.
> The Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act (CALURA) report for 1971, released Friday, shows that international unions paid out $25.6 million in salaries, strike, pension and welfare benefits to Canadian residents while collecting $50.6 million in dues and assessments.

Why, Mr. Speaker, do we not have the guts to speak out and issue warnings to our citizens about that? We have no hesitation about condemning and confiscating business controlled by foreigners in order to protect our sovereignty. Just how much more of a threat to our sovereignty today, Mr. Speaker, is foreign control of our labour force? We have had practical demonstrations of what happens to a country, or I should say our country. When the picket signs go up, there is no mercy. The survival of the business is not debated any more. But remember, Mr. Speaker, my conflict is not with the union, my conflict is with government and business. It is business and government that have established the climate in Canada which allowed unions to assume such powers and abuse them, because, remember, Mr. Speaker, that is only human nature and human nature makes people do those things.

Let me give you some examples of what my bill is supposed to eliminate. As you know, Mr. Speaker, several of the major unions in Canada, and mostly the ones controlling the construction industry, operate with complete control. That means they hire and fire and set their own remuneration for the service. If you do not belong to the union you do not get hired, no matter how hard you have looked for a job, how competent you are or how much you need a job. If you fall out with one of the union leaders, you not only get fired but you also get blacklisted and you will have to change your vocation if you ever want to work again in this country. Is there a tribunal, a hearing, a court action, a right to appeal—why, of course not. Is there any protection under such a thing as a Canadian Bill of Rights or a minister of labour—well, of course not.

One such unfortunate fellow writes to me saying:

> Mr. Oberle, I will never be able to work in my trade again. My wife and kids will be starving before I get another job. I have written to the minister of labour in Victoria and Ottawa (letters enclosed). They have turned me down. For God's sake, do something.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I also have the letters the ministers wrote and I will indulge by submitting them to the record as well. On November 14, 1972, the British Columbia minister of labour replied:

> Thank you for your letter of November 1 having reference to problems you have encountered with the Tunnel and Rock Workers' Union, Local 168.
> It would appear that the problems which you outline are essentially internal union ones, and not a matter for involvement of the Department of Labour.
> I am, however, taking the liberty of referring your letter and attachment to the appropriate officer of the department, for study. If there proves to be a basis for any further action, I shall contact you accordingly.
> Thanking you again for taking the time to write to me in this regard, I am,

Obviously, there was no basis for any further action because this letter was written in 1972 and there has been no correspondence since.

The other letter is from the Canada Department of Labour under the minister's signature and reads:

> This is further to my letter of April 24 concerning the complaints of Messrs. Nescar and Gervais.
> I have had a report from my Vancouver officers and I am told that the complaints have been previously taken up with the provinical authorities and that as recently as February 19, the Honourable W. S. King, provincial minister of labour, has taken the position that these matters fall within the internal administration of the union and that his department has no basis for intervention.
> In the circumstances, you will appreciate that there is nothing that I can do as federal Minister of Labour, to assist the complainants.

Well, Mr. Speaker, would you have expected a different answer from the two labour ministers—of course not. Under what law would they act, unfair labour practices? That only applies to unscrupulous businessmen.

Let me relate to you a personal experience which involved a government appointed mediator appointed to settle a dispute not between my company and the union, but the work force of my company and the union. The dispute, Mr. Speaker, resulted over the fact that not a single employee in our plant had the privilege of being asked whether or not he wanted to join the union. That was settled between the B.C. government—and may I say that it was the former B.C. government that made the settlement— and a union, not after the plant was built and in operation but before it was built and in operation. The decision was made to sign a union agreement with people who were not part of the labour force of my company. My colleagues, my lawyer and myself were meeting with this person who posed the questions to us about whether our intention was merely to build up the business to sell or whether we intended to make a career of it. His advice was that if the former was the case, we could become quite the heroes if we held out, but if it was the latter we should sign up because if we did not the union would break us.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I had more faith in the integrity of that union than the British Columbia government had at that time. I had to have because my neck was stretched into the front door of the bank 36 inches. The manager's office was right beside the door and I could visualize a big long knife under his desk. I have little to offer to that industry but some principles and I intend to stick with them. We have still not been able to sign an agreement with the union and our men are denied the benefits of union affiliation. The only thing the certified union ever did for them was to hold repeated strike votes which the work force always turned down because they simply did not have a choice whether to sign or not.

Meanwhile, the union keeps negotiating and the only contract it will sign has a union, not a man or business security clause, which prescribes that we may do the hiring all right but that, if the man has not joined the union after 30 days of his employment with us, we must fire him. Now, Mr. Speaker, how do you fit that into the Canadian Bill of Rights? I am compelled, as a businessman, to make it a condition of employment, at a time when six per cent of our labour force is looking for work, that a man must become a member of an organization which is controlled from the United States.

You know, Mr. Speaker, interestingly enough, I have argued the justification of such a clause with some of the union bosses. I even remember arguing on the other side when I was a member of a bargaining committee with the mine, mill and smelter workers. One fellow told me the other day that if only a portion of the men would sign up and pay, the others would get a free ride and all the benefits of the bargaining process. He compared his union with the institution in which I am now speaking, Mr. Speaker. He said—and it almost made sense, because it would be fair to say that the unions are second in this country, in power and control, only to this place—"If I voted NDP and the Liberals got into power, I should not have to pay taxes." I am just about prepared to go along with him on that, if what he said would hold true for the Conservatives as well. Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is how far it has gone. So powerful are some of these unions today that they confuse themselves with a democratic institution.

How did they obtain this power? Well, let us look at the pension plan. I am, as an employer, compelled to deduct—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I interrupt the hon. member, to tell him that his time has expired. He may continue if he has the consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that he continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Oberle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank my colleagues. As I was saying I am, as an employer, compelled to make deductions for the union in connection with the pension plan, even though less than 30 per cent of the membership will ever benefit. Why? Because you must be in the industry for at least eight years. In most northern areas of Canada people only work in the construction or wood industries for a certain period of the year to supplement a farming venture or some other small business. So, such people are making a donation to a nice, neat, powerful block of wealth. They know little about the administration as, in many cases, it is carried out in the United States.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the government of the day demands speedy passage of a foreign investment bill which would stop foreign interference in the sale of eight locomotives to Cuba—imagine the Cubans wanting to play railroad! However, no one ever dares to look at the books of some of the great unions, to find out in what way the Canadian people are forced to spend their money. I wonder what happened to the $50 million which in 1971 went to the United States.

If this institution, Mr. Speaker, has been given any mandate by the Canadian people, it is a mandate to make sure that no one single person or group obtains too much power, be they business, church or, oh yes, union. It is then up to the people of Canada to keep us honest, so that human nature does not influence our deliberations, as might happen if we are allowed to become too powerful.

You see, Mr. Speaker, I grew up in a country where fat and lazy politicians and a greedy, arrogant business world allowed a third group to assume too much power. We all know that this world will never quite recover from the ensuing results. My father was a workman who protested against his union leaders. I will always hear the sobs of anguish, pain and despair which my mother tried to hide from us kids when we had to leave our home and move to another country. But I can also speak of the pride we feel for having questioned the system.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if it is not time to question the validity of some union agreements in Canada today. Since I have spoken out I have received literally hundreds of letters from various places, all lending support to my argument. The press is responding. It is not uncommon to see reports such as I have in front of me. One headline reads, "Tunnel, rock union picketed by workers". Another reads, "Union bitterness still not finished". Still another says, "Workers picket their own union". I will not read the articles. Oh, how I should like to provide some of these people with the opportunity of presenting their case before a standing committee of the House of Commons; for they, too, have a right to protection under the law. Of course, my colleagues will very likely assure themselves that this will not happen, that we are no different from the ordinary politician, so why rock the boat?

The irony is that it is only human nature—I say this because of the union security clause, the blank cheque and government protection—which affects seriously the service one would expect unions to provide to their membership. The only real services the unions offer today involve services established by the government, services like those provided by Manpower, on the job training and other similar services.

Let us consider the pension plan for a moment and talk about the 30 per cent who qualify. When that faithful member who is in that bracket retires, he might well end up with a pension of $65 per month. My hon. colleagues know, of course, what happens to that $65. Our friend will get his basic old age pension of $107 per month. In addition, he will qualify for an income supplement of $77 per month which shrinks, however, by $65. All he will have left is $12. So, he will get no more and no less than anybody who has never contributed to such a plan.

However, it gets worse. If we suppose that the pension exceeds the $77 and our friend is married, the government will combine the income of the married partners and take the rest off his wife. How many of my colleagues ever had a representation from any union protesting that kind of confiscation? Why should they have paid? The union had the benefit of the members' savings and will continue to get it. The same holds true, of course, for the guaranteed dues. Why should one fall over himself in the service of his fellow man if the cheque is guaranteed in any case?

My fight on behalf of the workman in our plant, Mr. Speaker, has earned me an action in the Supreme Court of British Columbia. I am, for this reason, reluctant to relate my own experience. All the same, I hope and pray that my tenure of office in the House of Commons will give me the opportunity, even if not today and even if my bill does not reach committee, to bring the case of thousands of unfortunate Canadians to the attention of the public, even though the government in the interest of expendiency will ignore their plight.

It is wrong, as a condition of earning a livelihood in this country, to force a person to join a union, church or other fraternity, and then to force that person to have a portion of his earnings deducted from his pay. We can only make the union movement in Canada effective if we remove this type of discrimination. My bill provides for that. It would take the first and most important step in tearing down the barriers to which I referred earlier. If passed, it would give the manager the opportunity to visit the lunch room and discuss his business with people who know much more about their jobs than he does. Conversely, the employee will have the means to communicate directly with management if he is not in his union's confidence.

I hope that my colleagues will have the intestinal fortitude to act before it is too late.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) followed a long road this afternoon before coming to the point with which his bill deals. He seems to be disturbed by something that took place in British Columbia. The example he referred to comes under provincial jurisdiction, I think, not under federal jurisdiction, and that condition would not be corrected by the bill he is proposing for consideration this afternoon. He seems to be most disturbed by the power of unions and seems to think that his bill somehow will enable us to consider the question of Canadian unionism as against international unionism.

The hon. member is asking for model legislation. He feels we have not yet found an effective tool for settling disputes. He is against business tycoons and foreign control of our labour force. On the other hand, we find that at the centre of the hon. member's bill is an extremely interesting concept, one which can be debated without raising all the other elements I have mentioned. It concerns the responsibility of an individual who chooses not to join an organization which benefits him. The hon. member apparently believes that an individual who, in his work, enjoys the advantages of wages and fringe benefits which are the result of a lengthy and elaborate process should not be obliged to contribute financially to the support of the union which represents the collectivity of employees.

This is a view which is shared by others. We have heard it put forward by organizations which base their representations on religious grounds. They argue that certain religious convictions, if sufficiently strong, should excuse an individual from the obligation to join. It so happens, however, that economic conditions have improved and that society has done very well as a result of the ability of employees to organize themselves. Unionism is not a phenomenon limited to non-professional workers. There are many well-established unions among professional people such as doctors and lawyers who have found it desirable, though in a different manner and using different techniques, to group themselves in a way which permits them to defend their interests and also to provide, I suppose, for certain standards of performance in the interests of their own reputation and, supposedly, of the public at large.

If we were to accept the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River, it would mean that certain individuals would not be obliged to contribute to the bargaining units to which they belong, and their employers would not be under an obligation to make the relevant deductions from their pay. It seems to me that if we weigh the pros and cons of this issue it will be seen there are great weaknesses arising from any decision which would permit this to take place. The union or bargaining unit representing the workers would no longer be able to come to the full support of those represented by it. Moreover, it would be reasonable to ask why a man or a woman who is deriving a benefit of some kind from the work of a union should be excused from the reasonable burden of contributing in the form of dues and fees to the maintenance of the bargaining unit which is working in the interest of the group, including the individual concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: It does not take a genius to see this side of the question. I was somewhat disturbed to hear the hon. member describe unions as though they were monsters, as though they were entities beyond control, as though they were not, in reality, the sum total of the individuals who were trying to form and run a reasonably democratic institution. In the end, a union is simply an organization of human beings; it will be as good or as bad as the people who form it.

When the behaviour of a union leaves something to be desired, it is usually because its members have failed to take an active interest in its operations, failed to attend the regular meetings of their local or to take an active part in the organization. Of course, this applies not only to unions but to all organizations of human beings. To conclude that unions are negative entities, or something to be afraid of, is to display a lack of understanding of what the union movement is all about.

As I say, the hon. member has raised an interesting point for debate. I imagine it was discussed 100 years ago and I would not be surprised if it were discussed for years and years in the future. It really comes down to the rights which an individual should enjoy in society. In my opinion, the amendment which the hon. member proposes is not acceptable.

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose Bill C-104, and I do not think that catches the House by surprise. Frankly, it is beyond my comprehension why the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) would even attempt to introduce this regressive amendment to the Canada Labour Code, except that I notice that in the Parliamentary Guide he is listed as a businessman in the town of Chetwynd, B.C. I can only assume that he is engaged in monkey business in Chetwynd, because that is what his bill smacks of to me. Frankly, it will not help one bit his petty little beef with the union in his industry.

As the previous speaker said, this amendment would only cover workers under federal jurisdiction. All the outpourings of grief on the part of the hon. member dealt with unions certified under the labour legislation in the province of British Columbia. It seems to me that what the hon. member is really after is to make an obvious and blatant attempt to weaken and destroy all trade unions falling under the jurisdiction of the Canada Labour Code, which proves to me that the hon. member is tremendously anti-labour, and consequently anti-worker, in spite of his protestations that he was not rising to make an attack on trade unions, the workers, but was going after employers and others. I did not hear any comments in his speech that were not directed against trade unions and against the workers. For the whole of his 20 minutes, that was the diatribe I listened to. This really should not surprise me because I have ascertained since coming to this House that the great majority of the members of the Tory party fall into exactly the same category—anti-worker and anti-labour.

I was active in the labour movement in the hon. member's province, namely, British Columbia, for over 30 years before being elected to this House and I feel I am more than qualified to speak on this subject. The hon. member stated that he had been a member of the IWA. I joined the IWA in British Columbia in 1939, and I am still paying my $8 a month dues into that organization, even though I could take a withdrawal, because I want to participate as much as I possibly can in one of the most democratic organizations anywhere in the world.

When the hon. member speaks of lack of democracy and shows contempt for anyone who suggests comparing the trade union movement with this House, it becomes obvious that he has never participated in the affairs of any union, or he could not possibly have made those statements. My union, the International Woodworkers of America, is an international union. He decried the fact that we had international unions, but I did not hear him mention once that the parent body of just about every employer with which the international union deals in British Columbia is located in the United States. They are all U.S. companies, and if anyone suggests to me that we should not be working together, on both sides of the border, against these monstrous employers, then I say he does not know what he is talking about.

Let me tell the hon. member, since he wants to talk about democracy, that in the IWA, as in nearly every union, officers are elected by secret referendum ballot, from the international president down to the local officers, the regional officers, the business agents, the shop stewards on the job, the committee members and safety committee members, as well as any other position in the union that you can name. They have campaigns that members in this House just could not believe as to politics, campaigns that are much more bitter at times than any federal, provincial or municipal election campaign, but nevertheless in the main they are good, honest, democratic election campaigns.

When I started work in the province of British Columbia in 1939, I went to work for the largest company in the province and one of the largest in the world. At that time there was no union, and it did not take me long to find that I was subject, as were all the other workers, to the whim not only of my foreman but my superintendent, the manager, the general manager and anybody else who took a dislike to me. There were times when I had to pay the foreman on payday either $5 or give him a bottle of whisky to keep my job in the industry. In 1939 jobs were hard to come by, so you did what you had to do. Conditions were absolutely atrocious. Wages were bad and so were living conditions. The only thing that was good in the logging camps in those days was the food, and I will say we had the best food. But as for the rest of it, it was absolutely atrocious.

The first union organizer showed up in the logging camp that I was working in and I took union cards from him and went round to sign up workers I was engaged with. I was fired four days later for union activity. This is the situation the hon. member is trying to bring back. Frankly, if he has his way with this kind of amendment, then all an employer has to do is to make darned sure that every new employee that he hires is anti-union, and under the existing legislation it would not take very long for that union to be decertified. Then we would be right back to where we were. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, this is eighteenth century legislation that the hon. member is proposing. It is not even nineteenth century legislation, leave alone twentieth century.

[Mr. Neale (Vancouver East).]

People are still telling me what the hon. member said, that maybe unions are not as necessary as they used to be, since employers are now enlightened and would not dare treat their workers as they used to treat them before the advent of the labour movement. I have had practical experience of these enlightened employers, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to cite to hon. members just one example.

There is a large forest products company in British Columbia called Canadian Forest Products. It is the only B.C.-owned company in the province, except for some small ones. We organized that company after a very difficult struggle and I assisted in that organization. Finally we got a contract. We have had some difficulties with the owners of the company over the years, but in the main they have adhered to the finest contract in the woodworking industry to be found anywhere in the world. The workers are the highest paid, the best working conditions, the best fringe benefits of any workers anywhere in the world, and these benefits were negotiated by the workers through their elected officials representing them at the bargaining table.

This company bought a sawmill that was in existence in the province of Alberta, and the IWA once again went into that province and organized the company. The same employer, who was then paying the minimum wage in the province of British Columbia, $3.25 an hour—this was some years ago—was paying $1.35 an hour base rate in the province of Alberta. The International Woodworkers contract only called for $1.85 base rate in Alberta, and this company refused to pay it. The union was forced to strike the company. The strike lasted one year and then it was broken. The same employer that we had in the province of British Columbia—this enlightened employer—destroyed the union there, and only just recently, after some four years, the union went back in there with certification and is trying to get a contract. So no one need tell me that employers have changed in any way.

What most people do not understand, Mr. Speaker, is that we live in what is called a free enterprise society. In my opinion, it is neither free nor enterprising when you consider the combines investigations and fines paid by monopolies, cartels and multinational corporations. But despite this it is called a free enterprise system. The labour movement—I have been criticized for saying this—is a necessary evil in the free enterprise system. The late President Roosevelt said that if he were a worker, the first thing he would do would be to join a union, because under the system that was absolutely necessary. John Paul Getty has said many times that he would rather deal with organized workers in a union than try to deal with them individually.

We have an adversary system. The employers, the owners of industry, invest their money for only one purpose; that is, to use our natural resources and our labour and make a profit through the production of a product at the cheapest possible rate for resale at the highest possible price. Conversely, Mr. Speaker, the labour movement's role is to get the highest wages possible for the people they were elected to represent and negotiate for, and to obtain the product at the cheapest possible price. So there will always be a conflict. If the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River thinks that conflict will disappear, without the trade union movement being totally destroyed or forced into compulsory arbitration, he does not know what he is talking about.

The trade union movement has been condemned for many years by the news media, by every chamber of commerce and by every anti-labour person in this country. We admit that in the labour movement we do not have a very good public image, and that is to be expected. The news media itself must negotiate with unions. They do not like unions and they do their damndest to paint as black a picture of us as they possibly can. The only way trade union leaders could become nice people in this country would be if they abdicated their responsibility and sat down quietly with employers and accepted anything they offered. You must bear in mind that if they did that, they might get nice press coverage but at the next election of the local, the region or the international they would be put out of office and out of a job because the workers would not stand for that kind of trade union leadership. I would not blame them and would suggest that the leaders be removed.

Let me touch upon a couple of things the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River said about unions. He said that unions were foreign-controlled. There are many unions in this country that are Canadian, and there are some in respect of which the members opted to affiliate with international unions. Had it not been for the international unions coming into this country many years ago to help organize by providing experienced organizers and by putting up the money to fight these monstrous employers, with all the money and brains they had at their disposal, we would not have in Canada the trade union movement we have today.

The hon. member said that only the wealthy industries were unionized. I suggest that he go to Winnipeg and Montreal and look at the clothing industry, where employees are organized and are paying dues to a union. They are among the most poorly paid employees in the country. He should also study the canning industry in the province of British Columbia, another of the poorer paying industries, where the Union of Fishermen and Allied Workers has worked for many years to organize and improve the lot of the workers.

The hon. member also spoke about inflation. It took us years to convince members on the other side of this House that wages were not responsible for the inflationary spiral, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) admitted that the other day. We are still dragging behind, with the Tory party using the same stupid arguments that we have heard for years. The Economic Council of Canada shot that argument down in flames. Even the public relations man from the University of British Columbia hired by a previous government to try to convince the people of Canada that wages were responsible for inflation refuted that suggestion. He admitted that wages are not the cause of inflation in Canada.

The hon. member spoke about the power of the unions. I suppose he does not know that less than one-third of the workers in Canada belong to a union; that two-thirds are still at the mercy of the beneficent employers he was talking about, and have no protection. The only way they receive any assistance in the way of wage increases is after a legitimate union has negotiated, and sometimes has gone out on strike, with the workers suffering before getting an increase. Then the employers of non-organized employees grant a relative wage increase.

The hon. member also spoke about union executives running the lives of their members. Let me tell him, through you, Mr. Speaker, that every time there is a strike in Canada there is a secret ballot conducted and every member of the union votes whether he wants to go on strike or not. I am sure they must have been anti-union employees the hon. member spoke about when he referred to those who have constantly voted against strike action in order to leave the union in a precarious position. By law in this country, every time there is a strike there must be a secret ballot and the rank and file members of the union decide whether to go on strike. The leaders cannot pull them out on strike, as was suggested by the hon. member.

I have spoken about democracy because the hon. member referred to it. Let me say that in my honest opinion the most democratic organization I have ever belonged to is the trade union movement. This bill is only an attempt to drive us back to the eighteenth century. The hon. member also referred to union shops, closed shops and the Rand formula. These conditions took a long time to come into being in this country. They were developed step by step with, first, the open shop, then the Rand formula and then the union shop, in some instances a closed shop. These conditions are absolutely necessary in this country because of the situation we face respecting employers in North America as opposed to those in European countries. Employers in Canada and the United States still feel that the trade union movement is like a plague of locusts, and if they keep on fighting them they eventually might go away. They continually try to weaken the unions, and with the assistance of people like the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River they just might be able to do that, particularly if this kind of legislation is ever allowed to pass.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time is just about up. I would urge reasonable and sensible men in a free, democratic country to allow free, democratic workers to make their own decisions. I thought the hon. member was quoting me when he spoke about paying taxes, because I have used that argument many times. If 90 per cent of the workers in a plant want to join a union, why should the other 10 per cent sit on their butts and inherit all the benefits negotiated by the representatives elected by 90 per cent of their members? No one in his right mind, as far as I am concerned, can argue against the union shop or the Rand formula.

We have a strike on right now because a U.S. company threatens to close its doors and move its operation back to the United States because in the United States the employees have no union security. The company is hoping to smash the union. This should never be allowed to happen in Canada.

I see that you are about to rise, Mr. Speaker, so I will conclude my remarks immediately. Let me just say, in closing, that I have been a member of the trade union movement for 30 years and a trade union leader for 25 of those years. I am proud to say to anyone in Canada that I have been a trade union leader, not just because trade unions have given our people many benefits and more money but because they have given them dignity, which is something we never had before the advent of the trade union movement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The time allotted for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, ADMINISTRATION AND OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray that Bill C-7, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and to repeal an act to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to congratulate the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) for his excellent speech this afternoon; I thought it was an extremely thoughtful contribution. I would also like to congratulate him for having changed the Conservative Party's position on combines. It is a very convenient approach to have the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) lead off with sort of faint praise and indicate his support, and then have the hon. member for Trinity, with the rest of them following through, condemning the whole combines legislation approach which I think a Conservative government was very instrumental in enlarging.

I agree generally with the analysis of the hon. member for Trinity, although there are some exceptions to my agreement. One of those exceptions is the attitude he took toward condemning big unions as contributors to inflation. When you talk about big unions, you talk about auto workers, steel workers, packing house workers and oil and chemical workers. If he would look at the record, he would find that in those industries price increases have been among the lowest in this country, mainly because their productivity has been rising substantially. To say that those unions have contributed to inflation is contrary to the facts.

[Mr. Neale (Vancouver East).]

There are some difficulties, and I am surprised the hon. member did not point them out and how they arise in creating an inflationary atmosphere. The real problem is not in industries where the big unions exist; it is that other sectors of our economy cannot match the productivity increase in steel, automobiles and chemicals, and therefore as they seek to obtain commensurate benefits the pressure in the service industries contributes substantially to inflation.

In looking at the combines legislation, it seems that the members who have come to the defence of the bill are using the argument of all kinds of small benefits to support the legislation. The small benefits that they trot out, no matter how you total them, are still small benefits. A whole bunch of zeros multiplied by zero still comes out as zero. Frankly, I found it very difficult to understand either the ferocious opposition to the legislation by the business community or the kind of support for the legislation by some academics who have been to my office urging me to support the bill.

So far as business is concerned, it seems to me that if this legislation does anything, it protects business because it really obscures the problems created by business in our society. If anything, it simply puts a price on their misbehaviour. It does not make it impossible for them to misbehave, nor does it allow their misbehaviour; it simply says: If you do this, we will impose a penalty on you and you will pay a price for so doing. That is not a bad deal for business and I find it very difficult to know what they became so excited about.

The one area given to business as a concession, and which I presume reduced their opposition, was the section that now says directors of a corporation will not be held liable for the actions of the corporation. This is ironical in a way, because for years the same people have been arguing that trade union leaders should be held personally liable for the actions of trade unionists. Then at the first opportunity they get, instead of really continuing the argument about holding people responsible and liable, they simply say: We want to be exempted as well. So another of their favourite arguments has gone down the drain.

I do not see how consumers will benefit in any substantial way. Many of the things the bill sets out to correct, such as bait, switch and pyramid selling, do not involve many consumers. How many consumers are really involved in pyramid selling? You must have an enormous streak of stupidity in you to go for one of these pyramid sales clubs. The only people I know who were trapped were people who were persuaded that they would make a lot of money without having to make much effort. Perhaps we should have laws protecting people from their own cupidity. It is probably just as well to have something like that, because occasionally somebody relatively innocent may be trapped in that kind of swindle. This is the kind of swindle that an ordinary person sees through very easily. Most of the people who get caught in it are looking for a fast buck themselves and I sometimes wonder how much sympathy should be extended to them.

The academics, of course, will have another field day. Some of the academics in Canada have made their living from describing the combines legislation, enlarging upon it and calling for tighter controls. Usually they argue: We need more teeth in the legislation. It is a sort of cops and robbers approach. They say: We must make it tough; we must strengthen the combines legislation. Some of them, I suspect, wrote their first essay in politics or in economics on combines legislation, then developed it into an MA thesis and then into a PhD thesis, and they have lived off it ever since.

However, this is not really important legislation and it is hard to vote against the bill because it does provide a few minor benefits, just as it is hard to vote against anything of a motherhood nature—and this is obviously a bill of that type. I listened to the defence and found that it was of a minor kind. Government speakers who told us how valuable the bill is were really making an effort to put together a valid argument in support of the present combines legislation.

I have reservations about this bill. If it were just a minor bill with minor benefits in it, there would be no great cause for complaint. We see quite a few of these bills in the House, and one might argue that any improvement is worth supporting. On that basis the bill is probably worth supporting because it provides some minor corrections in our society. But it seems to me that a very serious problem is involved in the entire concept of the combines legislation as we now know it, and just trying to correct it in a minor way does not take care of the problem. The combines legislation, in my view, stands in the way of our society facing up to the need to find serious answers to serious economic problems. It merely obscures those problems, rather than casting light on solutions to them. In that sense I agree with the hon. member for Trinity who said much the same thing.

The combines legislation has never worked. There is no evidence that it has ever been effective. Those who have been caught and prosecuted under the combines legislation, or by the restrictive trade practices group, should have been prosecuted not because they contravened the legislation, but for idiocy—because you have to be an idiot to be caught and prosecuted under the legislation in the way it is drafted. If you look at how these prosecutions arose, you will find that in some cases contractors held a meeting, and because they did not trust each other they kept minutes of the meeting or called accountants to clarify the meaning of the agreement they had reached. On one occasion when the bids were opened a record of the meeting, with the prices upon which they had agreed, fluttered out with one of the bids. With evidence like that, this group was prosecuted. There are many examples of that type. We have had prosecutions in the glass industry and the paper industry; but look at those industries today. Prices are identical right across the board. There is not one paper company, one glass company, underselling another. What has been really accomplished by the prosecutions which have taken place in the past?

We live in a society where oligopoly is the rule, rather than competition. That may be one of the reasons I reacted so favourably to the description given by the hon. member for Trinity of how oligopolies work and how business agreements are made. He was in business, Mr. Speaker, and I was in business. Both of us know that this is done without sitting down and holding formal meetings in order to get agreement. I am sure neither he nor I participated in that kind of endeavour, but we have seen it take place often enough either over lunch or on the golf course. Somebody in the group says, "We cannot go on like this; we will have to raise prices." There is always a leader who raises the price and the others follow suit.

This advantage always belongs to an oligopoly. Under those circumstances, you cannot get a conviction. In circumstances of that kind, in an area where there are relatively few sellers seeking to protect their positions, it poses a worse situation for society to deal with than a monopolistic situation. Consider what happens when an industry is a monopoly. Take the examples of the Bell telephone company and the gas transmission companies. Obviously they are in a monopoly position, and obviously the government has to step in and do some regulating.

Of course, if there were a number of telephone companies I am sure we would not have any regulation of telephone rates. I am convinced that rates in Canada would be infinitely higher and that telephone service would be infinitely poorer. In a way, this is a kind of heretical thinking, but if you ponder the century we are in, the kind of technology that exists and the size that companies have to be in order to take advantage of that technology, it is clear that we must indulge in thinking which is different from that of the past when dealing with these matters.

Sometimes people talk about competition between banks, but the minute one bank announces it is going to raise interest rates by half a percentage point, all the other banks follow suit. Then when you get representatives of the banks before a committee of this House and you say, "Here is clear evidence of collusion because you all raised your interest rates; the day bank A's rate went up in the morning, it was followed by bank B in the afternoon and then there was a long drag, maybe for one day, before the others followed suit," the response of the banks is, "That is really an example of perfect competition." What they are saying is that if competition is perfect, everybody will be charging the same rates because they are all responding to the same market forces and, as a result, must charge the same rates.

Would we not be further ahead if, instead of pretending to ourselves that it is possible to have competition in the banking industry, we legislated the spread between what banks can pay and what they can charge for money? It is pretty hard to legislate what banks will pay for funds, because that tends to respond to international economic situations. But we can legislate the spread and say they are entitled only to a certain difference between what they pay their depositors and what they charge those who borrow from them. However, we are not willing to do that. We go on pretending that in some strange way we can make the banks compete with each other.

Other examples come to mind. Just a few years ago General Motors came out with a price increase. They were followed within a day or so by the other automobile manufacturers who increased their prices by the same percentage. But for some reason or another General Motors decided that their price increase was a mistake and they reduced the amount they were going to charge for their cars. Again, everybody else in the industry followed suit. I am sure General Motors would argue, as the banks did, that that showed we have a competitive society in which everybody responds to the market forces. That is one interpretation. I think a more realistic interpretation is that in every industry, particularly industries characterized by large firms, there is a price leader, and it is not market forces which firms are responding to but the price leadership of the largest, strongest firm. Whichever way that firm goes is a signal for all the rest of them to go in the same direction. Anything else is suicidal. Who wants to pick a fight with General Motors? I do not think there is any firm in the automobile industry prepared to do that. The others don't mind nibbling around the edges to get an advantage here or there, but they know that when a firm reaches the size of General Motors, you don't fight it any more; you co-operate with it.

Sometimes it seems as though General Motors have a policy of keeping their competitors alive. I often wonder why, with their strength, they do not drive every other manufacturer out of the field. They have such a large share of the market that they could drive every other manufacturer out of the field. But if they did that they would then become a monopoly, and being the only one remaining in the field they would be subject to government regulation. It is much better for them to allow a few competitors to exist with lower profit margins, in order to enable them to take higher profits that they would not get if they were regulated by government.

I can recall one instance before the 1966 joint parliamentary committee on consumer prices when we had a clear example of companies behaving in this way in order to keep a competitor alive. As I recall the case, it had to do with a leading manufacturer of baby foods in Canada. It was a branch of a multinational corporation with its parent organization in the United States. It had 80 per cent of the market, and its only competitor was in danger of going broke. The competitor had been losing its share of the market year by year and finally was looking at a loss situation. Then came the introduction of glass jars to take the place of cans. Up to that point baby food in Canada had been marketed in cans, but when glass jars arrived consumers showed an obvious preference for them. The weak competitor went into glass jars, but it took it three years to reach the break-even point when using them. During that time its larger competitor would not touch glass jars.

We asked the larger competitor, "Didn't you know that the public was in favour of glass jars? Didn't your parent company in the United States, which has been in glass jars for year, tell you this was the direction the industry was going?" The answer was, "We really did not know. The American company did not tell us anything about its operations, about which way it was going and what was its experience." We can believe that if we wish, Mr. Speaker, but what is more believable is that this company deliberately kept its competitor alive rather than run the risk of arriving at a monopoly situation and coming under government scrutiny.

As I say, very often an oligopoly situation is desired by large corporations because the public thinks it is protected when there is a smaller competitor visible. But in truth there is no competition and the larger companies are free to raise their prices in a market largely of their own making. In the particular case I cited, the competitor did not have any market in the maritime provinces or British Columbia.

Do hon. members think that the person with 20 per cent of the market, who can hardly stay alive, is going to enter into a price war with a giant who has 80 per cent of the market, who is making tremendous profits and can hold out indefinitely? I do not think so. This is why it seems to me that a bill calling for the market to behave in a way that the market has no intention of behaving, and when you have no way of even demonstrating that there has been any collusion or conspiracy, is doomed to fail. That, I think, is a general defect of combines legislation. It takes us off guard; it pretends we are getting some protection, when in fact we are leaving the market wide open to the rapacious and the powerful to do as they please.

When we talk about competition I think we must realize that in many areas of our society competition is no longer practiced. In some cases it may no longer be possible to practice competition, and in some cases it may not even be desirable. I should explain what I mean by that. When we talk about foreign ownership, we generally take the position that the problem with foreign ownership arises from the fact that American capitalists are running a company, rather than Canadian capitalists. On very few occasions do we ever examine the real problem. We know that sometimes the problem is a question of extraterritoriality, that American directors are subject to American law. But usually the problem is that when American corporations set up branch plants in Canada, they virtually destroy our ability to be productive and competitive and enable the manufacturing industry in Canada to exist only because of tariff protection or because lower wages are paid.

The chief problem with foreign ownership is that it has virtually wrecked our manufacturing industry sector of the economy. That is not true of raw materials because these have to be sold on the world market and have to be competitive. But the domestic market is protected by tariffs. Analysis of the manufacturing industry in Canada shows that we employ 30 per cent more capital per worker and end up with 30 per cent less production because of the Dinky toy structure we inherited from the Americans. An example is the refrigerator industry. A country the size of Canada could probably tolerate two refrigerator companies, but we had 14 at one time, the same number as the United States. We had a situation, Mr. Speaker, where Americans in Canada imposed a pattern of production on this country identical to that of the United States. It might have made sense with a market 11 times the size of ours, but it made no sense in the Canadian economy. If you want to find efficient industries in Canada, sometimes you have to look at those industries which remain under Canadian ownership, like steel and cement, because they were able to adapt to our market rather than having imposed upon them an American pattern.

This is a clear example of where competition has worked to the tremendous detriment of our society and has contributed to a lower standard of living than we might have had. You may say it has given us more product variety—but how much product variety do we need? How much difference is there between one refrigerator and another, one stove and another? The hinges are different or the door may be an inch shorter or longer, but there is a limit to the kind of variety you want in a society. Beyond a certain point it becomes a useless extravagance that most people neither need nor desire. It exists only because it happens to suit the particular competitive pattern of the industry.

That is one area in which I think competition has done us a terrible disservice. One of the reasons Canada has one of the most efficient steel industries in the world is that there is a level of competition, or production, that is appropriate to that industry, that is appropriate to the available technology and to the needs of Canadian society. One of the reasons we do not have that in the rubber industry, for example, is that you have every rubber company in the United States with a branch plant in Canada making the same range of products, but on a Dinky toy, miniscule scale compared to the United States.

Of course, the Canadian government compounds the situation by inviting an additional competitor into a market that is already overserved. What is the justification for the new competition? I am talking about Michelin. In fact, there is an additional justification for Michelin that has nothing to do with competition. There is a good argument for having a tire industry in the maritime provinces because this is where the industries should be directed. The question then arises, why do we not restructure industry from central Canada into the maritimes, rather than encouraging another one into Canada with the consequences it has on the entire industrial structure of the rubber industry?

Despite the mounting evidence of these changes in our society regarding the competitive position of various companies, despite the fact that so many firms, in order to even survive, require to be almost in a monopolistic position, we still go back to Adam Smith; the government still hangs its hat on the Adam Smith model of an economy. I do not know whether they believe it or not, whether they are bringing in this legislation because they have been urged by the so-called intellectuals in the business community, or whether they are doing what they have always done, that is, imitating the United States: because the United States has competition, combines legislation, then we must have it as well.

The only two countries in the world with these antiquated, outmoded ideas are Canada and the United States. In the rest of the world every country is moving in the opposite direction. They know that competition is no longer an internal matter but is another international matter. Instead of encouraging companies within a country to compete with each other, they are asking their companies to go out and compete with others all over the world. Instead of having combines legislation, they have rationalization boards which encourage the merger or the coming together of companies of suitable performance. It is that which makes the combines legislation in Canada so harmful. I must admit that the government senses some of this, and in clause 2 of the bill they are apparently going to deal with this particular problem—hesitantly, but apparently they are going to deal with it.

What does it mean? Does it mean that we scrap the combines legislation and turn our whole society over to our competitors without any protection at all? No, Mr. Speaker, this is not what I am suggesting. What I am suggesting is that the competitors have to be held in check, that we have to do something about those who would take advantage of the weak in society. The way to do it is not through a combines policy which can be so easily evaded, or through an approach such as outlawing pyramid selling. I wonder how many weeks it will be before they come up with a new tactic that is not called pyramid selling?

It is a losing game, but there are things we can and should do. However, we will not be doing them as long as the government pretends the problem has been looked after because they have introduced combines legislation, new amendments to it and talk grandly about what a marvellous job they have done. What are the things we need to do? We need effective legislation. We have great problems with Bell telephone, arguing whether their legislation is as good as it should be. You can say one thing about the Bell company: it does not make a move in this country which is not scrutinized. It must justify its actions before the transport board. Often parliament is not satisfied with the decision of the transport board and Bell is forced to roll back its rates. The company must justify everything it does.

We should treat other industries in the same way, including banks. Banks should come under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada in the same way as the telephone company comes under its jurisdiction. Parliament removed the 6 per cent ceiling on the bank rate because the banks declared that the rate was unworkable. They made a good case for removing the 6 per cent ceiling, and parliament agreed but failed to introduce safeguards which would make sure the banks would not take advantage of the situation then existing, in which money was in great demand, thus putting them in a position to reap tremendous profits. There was no attempt to regulate the spread between what the banks paid for money and what they lent it for. That is the kind of thing I am talking about.

We ought to bring in selective price controls. We could still bring them in to affect particularly, the resource industry. The hon. member for Trinity and some of his colleagues talk about the terrible trade unions, how they are raising prices and the extent to which they are contributing to inflation. How does the hon. member equate his remarks with what is going on in the mining industry? Contracts were signed a few years ago, but there is no relationship between wages and the price being charged for zinc, nickel or iron ore. Why? Because it is demand, and not the cost of production, which determines the price on the world market. There is no attempt to control industry in that way. We made an attempt to control the oil and gas industry, which is fortunate. We should be introducing export taxes for all the natural resources we export. If windfall profits are to be made, they should accrue to the people of Canada, the owners of the resources and should be treated as a sort of depletion allowance. The people should get them instead of the companies which temporarily are working these resources.

We should move in the direction of greater public ownership, as it is almost impossible to know whether these companies are acting in the best interests of Canada. This has been done in the case of electric power. If a company abuses its privileges, then instead of imposing a fine which it may laugh at and pass on in the form of higher prices, we should expropriate it. Once we have expropriated, not many companies will feel like doing the same type of thing. We should let it be known that defrauding the Canadian public is a serious business, that taking advantage of a situation to the detriment of the Canadian public may lead, in certain circumstances, to expropriation, to a jail sentence and not to a gentle fine which the company can laugh at and shrug off.

We should consider taking away the tariff protection of companies which run afoul of the law. One of the key recommendations of the Macquarrie commission report on the combines legislation of 20 or 30 years ago was that companies guilty of collusion should have their tariff protection removed. That recommendation was never acted upon. It was recommended that this course be followed with a certain glass company and a certain paper company. When you ask why this was not done, you are told that we must save tariffs as bargaining counters in multilateral trade negotiations, that it would be wrong to take away tariff protection now because we could not bargain with another country when we want it to remove its tariff protection.

One of the most effective instruments for preventing collusion among companies has never been used. In some cases the tariff protection is justified. But those companies must live up to their responsibilities and must remember that the Canadian people are willing to pay higher prices in order to protect them. There is no justification for continuing tariff protection for a company that abuses its privileges by increasing prices unjustifiably.

The government could become a competitor with industry. Lately there has been much talk of the national petroleum corporation. Such an instrument can be used to compete with oil companies. Sweden has done this sort of thing effectively with its co-op movement. You need not take a large share of the market in order to be effective. If your share is 5 or 6 per cent and you work aggressively, you can force prices down. In theory, Crown corporations in Canada are supposed to compete with industry. Yet too often the people who work for Crown corporations play golf with the guys they are supposed to be competing against. They soon develop an understanding, instead of pursuing the path of defender of the public interest.

We should break up vertically integrated companies. To my knowledge, nothing like this has been done. What justification is there for oil companies to control the finding, refining and selling of gasoline? That is the sort of problem we face. If an independent organization appears on the scene, the big companies try to force it out of business. Once it has gone, they go back to their cozy arrangement involving vertical integration under which the only service stations serving you are the ones tied in with the big oil companies. There is little competition in that situation. Various commissions have made recommendations regarding the oil industry. They have said that service stations should be separated from the big oil companies. Instead of action to carry out such recommendations, we have been presented with combines legislation.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Brand names should be looked into. Often brand names are abused and it is claimed that the product sold under a brand name possesses a quality which it does not really have. Also, we should if necessary remove patent protection. I see that those who drafted this legislation are concerned about misleading advertising. This, I think, is little but puffery. I agree that much advertising is idiotic. Nothing is more idiotic than pretending that men and women go about looking through closets, with their arms up in the air, revealing their underarms and spraying some substance on themselves. If you watch television you will be given the impression that that is how people behave. I think advertisers very much underrate the intelligence and sophistication of our public. I do not think we need to protect viewers against this kind of lunacy, because sooner or later the product itself suffers.

What is required, in my view, is a different treatment of advertising expenses. Our advertising system is designed to encourage this kind of idiocy. An advertising expense is deductible from income for income tax purposes. This means that every dollar a company spends on this kind of lunacy is deductible. It can deduct at least 50 per cent if it is in the 50 per cent tax bracket. It should be remembered that it is not only the consumer who pays for the advertising expense incurred by the company: every taxpayer in Canada pays. If somebody wants to push something that is of psychic benefit, is perfumed or is an underarm deodorant, that is one thing. On the other hand, I should not be required to pay extra taxes to bring some psychic benefit to somebody else. We need changes in this area.

In dealing with advertising, I am not dealing with it from the standpoint of whether advertising for underarm deodorants, is intelligent or not intelligent; I am dealing with it from the standpoint of the tax system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must remind him that his allotted time has expired. He may carry on if he has unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Do hon. members agree to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (2050)

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank hon. members. I shall be brief. What I am really saying is that this combines legislation obscures the issue. It takes things which are really not problems and says they are terrible problems we have to deal with. The things which are problems and really do have to be dealt with are set aside and are not even looked at. The danger is that the public will think that something is being done, when in fact little is being done.

If we talk about standards, about making sure there is no shoddy workmanship, then certainly we can set standards. We do this in connection with weights and measures. There is very little of the type of heavy thumb on the butcher's scale activity left in this country. We can force standards to be adopted. We have done so in the electrical industry. Standards should be enforced. We should have a better Canada Corporations Act. Now the government gives us this pièce de résistance to really show this is a wonderful piece of legislation, right up to the minute, and shows how this piece of extraterritoriality came in with the Worthington company. They say, "We are going to put that into the combines legislation package to show you what a well-rounded, beautifully developed thing it is." Except for one thing—it doesn't belong here: it belongs in the Canada Corporations Act, where you can clearly say that no director of a Canadian company shall act against the laws of Canada. And, if he does, he cannot be a director of a company. Why fool around with this matter in the combines legislation?

Also, we should go further with the corporations act. Those of my party who have had a chance to look at the corporations act have argued time and time again not only for this kind of a measure but for full disclosure. How are you going to know anything if you do not in fact have full disclosure? It is true we are getting more disclosure in our society, but we are not getting as much as is required in order for us to make decisions. Rather than give us a good corporations act, something which would really protect the public, we get a little bit of it thrown into the combines legislation and the corporations act goes on in its unrepentant way.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, if the government wants to say to this House that this is all they can do at this time, make a few minor changes and adjustments, as long as they are sufficiently humble about it and bring the legislation before the House in an attitude of humility and admit it is an insignificant measure which makes a couple of minor corrections, I will go along with it. I will respond to the bill in kindness and say to the minister that he has not come up with much, but that it is something. But I hope the government has no illusions that by bringing in this piece of legislation it has accomplished anything worth while for the Canadian people or has made any significant correction in what is essentially a bad market situation.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended speaking on this bill, primarily because I think the minister did justice to the bill in his speech, as did his parliamentary secretary. The measure was introduced in the last parliament and is being repeated at this time. I think the Canadian public, and certainly small businessmen and the press, have had an opportunity to digest what is covered in the measure before us.

We just heard from the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman). He uses about eight different approaches when making speeches, and I think the one we heard tonight was what he calls his "pooh-pooh" speech. When he finds a bill as good as this one which is difficult to attack, one which has won wide acceptance in Canada in all segments of the business community and from consumers, it ill behooves him to attack the bill and cut it to pieces, so what we have is the hon. member delivering to us his "pooh-pooh" speech. His approach is: It is not a bad bill. It does a few good things, but it is really not all that significant.

Mr. Speaker, I did not hear or see the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) jump up and down, or pound his desk and scream that this was the greatest piece of legislation the government had ever introduced. I think it speaks well for the bill when it indicates this and nothing more. It is not a new bill; it is an amendment to a piece of legislation, and the amendments it contains bring important benefits to consumers, to small businessmen and to Canadians in general. The government had earlier announced its intention to bring in a new competition policy, to bring it forward in stages, and this bill represents the first of these stages.

The principal features of the bill before us include additional measures to deal with undesirable trade and advertising practices, the creation of a new, civil function for the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission which will enable it to issue orders to modify or prohibit trade practices brought before it, and provisions which will bring services in general under the legislation. That is what the bill attempts to do. To hear some members opposite comment on the bill, particularly hon. gentlemen in the far left corner of the House, one would get the impression that illegalities are rampant across the country, that Canadian businessmen are engaging in the kind of practices this bill is introduced to prevent.

Only a very small segment of Canadian businessmen and markets would be affected by this legislation in any event, because its provisions will apply only to very few of them. I took issue the other day with some hon. members who have a tendency to give Canadian business a black eye. I think the marketplace in Canada is probably as honest as any in the world. Mr. Speaker, you cannot legislate honesty, but I think you have an obligation, when someone does something which is contrary to what is fair in the marketplace, to bring in legislation to catch that particular irregularity.

Opposition members would be jumping to their feet, no matter what provisions the bill contained, if no machinery was provided to restrict unfair practices in the marketplace. They would be criticizing the government for failing to bring in measures to control pyramid selling, and so on. When corporations engage in illegalities, means should be provided for dealing with them; and in cases where the consumer is hurt, some redress should be forthcoming, as is provided in this bill.

As one who practised law for a few years, I remember dealing on all too many occasions with people who had signed promissory notes at the end of long contracts. They found the note had been assigned, usually to a finance company. The finance company sued for payment. The answer was, for example, that the cutlery had not been delivered, or it was not aluminum, it was tin, or whatever it was. There was no particular defence. No legislation existed to cover such a situation. There was no protection for the consumer. It is the obligation of provincial legislatures to afford protection in instances of this kind.

This party, this government, brought forward legislation to protect those who were on the short end of a bill of exchange where they really had no defence. We have an obligation to keep businessmen on their toes and to let them know there is some law that will prohibit illegal activity. But for the most part, as I said earlier, most businessmen are honest. Any of them who get together to act in a dishonest fashion are probably a minority. Considering the billions of business transactions that take place in Canada annually, very few of our businessmen break the law.

● (2100)

The next aspect that I like about this legislation is its approach. The minister has followed an approach that I think is consistent with what the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices said in our first report. I quote from that report:

> Certain provisions of the proposed competition act dealing with consumer protection (e.g. misleading advertising, bait and switch selling) be split off into a separate bill and enacted immediately, and not be tied in with the provisions relating to monopolies, mergers, etc., requiring reconciliation with broader policy directions relating to industrial strategy and foreign investment.

Mr. McGrath: That is not what this bill does.

Mr. Atkey: Why did not the minister follow that recommendation?

Mr. McGrath: Yes, you are chairman of the committee. Why not?

Mr. Cullen: As a result of that intervention, we know that the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) is here this evening. I hope he will have something constructive to say, instead of destructive. It certainly would be revolutionary to hear him speak in a positive way for a change. I see the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) smiling. I know he likes this bill, and a little later I am going to quote a statement made by the hon. member for St. John's East, something he said about this bill last November. Hon. members opposite have now had a caucus and probably think they cannot praise the Liberals too much since we have done a great job in the first year. If they had to be careful about praising us in November, 1973, today they might have to be even more careful.

Mr. McGrath: What about the other recommendations?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I have only 40 minutes so I cannot deal with all these interjections. I agree with the approach adopted by the minister. I feel that the Progressive Conservative Party would adopt a carte blanche approach if, heaven forbid, they were in power. These provisions would be cut to pieces by those who want to break the legislation. We need a careful approach that aims at particular targets. Where illegalities creep into the marketplace, we must deal with them we as we should.

One of the criticisms that is levelled at this bill is that it has taken a long time to bring it in, I believe something like three years from its inception. The regulations themselves will not have to be fully implemented until approximately two years after the bill becomes law. I agree with this particular procedure in this instance, and for this reason. Most of the people affected, in fact the very large majority of the people affected, by this legislation are honest businessmen. As honest businessmen, they should be given the opportunity of meeting the requirements of the bill and not have to gear up and overnight make significant changes which might be to the detriment of their particular business. They have done nothing wrong and they are quite prepared to comply with the regulations; all they are asking for is a little time.

I heard the criticism earlier today that two years was not long enough. I would say to the honest businessman of this country that if he needs a little longer period in order to implement these regulations, I think he will find a sympathetic ear with this government. Some would rush with haste into these things, such as hon. members opposite. I would be a little wary if they were in power because then we would have something to worry about. We are not trying to do anything that is going to be to the detriment of the small businessman. If he does need a little time to implement the provisions of this act, then my view is that the government is right in giving them that time.

What does the small businessman think of this legislation? I should like to quote some of our critics in the press. It is of interest to note that we have received commendations from almost all sources in the press. I note, going outside the press, that Mr. Ruben Bromstein, who at the time was president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen, a body with some 9,000 members had this to say on November 5, 1973, speaking on CBC radio:

> Clearly we are most pleased that the bill has been introduced . . . basically it is giving small business an opportunity to be protected by the law. And even after a decision has been made that somebody is violating the law, a small businessman will have the opportunity to sue in court to collect damages that have occurred because he has been hit by the people who are trying to drive him out of business, or are in some way affecting his business unfairly.
> What we are concerned with here is that the government seems to have made a genuine attempt to catch the errors (at least that's the impression I'm getting from reading these provisions) and to try and, in a staging process, get at the problems that affect him.

Gail Scott, a CTV news correspondent, had this to say:

> —the new act does go a long way to regulate continual consumer problems and, if implemented, will bring with it many of the changes that consumers have been asking for.

Mr. Bill Wilson, a columnist for the Montreal Star, writing in Ottawa on November 5 last had this to say:

> There is some consensus in Canada that the consumer deserves decent protection from unfair practices and this is the biggest field where Mr. Gray has moved.

The Montreal Gazette for November 6, 1973, carried this headline:

> Gray bill arms shopper against unfair pricing ads. Bill allows action by consumers. Athletes may get a break on binding contract terms.

Then I was interested to note that Mr. Geoff Stevens, writing in the Globe and Mail on November 6, 1973, said this:

> Many of the bill's provisions make simple good sense.
> Two encouraging aspects of the new bill are that it would bring a broad range of services (as well as goods and products) under regulation and it would give the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission the power to order a halt to illegal business practices.

We always save the dessert till the last, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Henry Heald, writing in the Ottawa Journal on November 6, had this to say:

Both Grace MacInnis (NDP Vancouver Kingsway) and James McGrath (PC St. John's East)—

Mr. McGrath: Order.

Mr. Cullen: I continue:

—said the bill proposed worth while measures in the field of consumer protection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, if I may turn away from this Ottawa Journal column for a moment, the hon. member for Sarnia has a great deal to say about this, but it is very seldom that a Liberal is quoted favourably in the Ottawa Journal. At least, that has been my experience. If I may continue with Mr. Heald's comment, the article goes on to say:

Mr. McGrath said: "The bill offered a lot more than I expected". He called it: "an important piece of legislation . . . "

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I do not think we have a more severe critic, and when we get praise from such a source I am almost tempted to sit down and rest my case. However, since this is such an excellent bill I do have a few more comments to make. As I have indicated, this bill is not the greatest bill that has ever come down the pipe, nor are we suggesting that it is. It is an amendment to a particular piece of legislation that is presently on the books. But it does make provision for Canadian corporations and for subsidiaries of United States corporations, or for that matter any foreign corporation, to act in Canada as good Canadian citizens.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge has indicated one approach that he would like to see adopted. We have adopted the approach of making these amendments to the combines act. I am not concerned so much with the means as I am with the result, and the result is that subsidiaries operating in Canada have got to be told plainly that they have an opportunity to do business anywhere in the world and that they are going to conduct their business pursuant to Canadian foreign policy, not United States, British, French or the foreign policy of any other country. That is why these provisions are contained in this piece of legislation. If we dolled it up a little by putting it in another piece of legislation, then that would not bother me at all. I am not interested in the form; I am interested in the result.

Mr. Speaker, I know there are many others who want to speak in praise of this bill.

Mr. McGrath: Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Does the hon. member agree?

Mr. Cullen: Any time.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, so far we have heard the hon. member tell us what other people have said about the bill so far as the business community is concerned. As the learned and distinguished former chairman of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices, I should like to hear him say what this bill means to consumers. He has not yet enlightened us on that score.

● (2110)

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, now I know the hon. member has not read the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: I hope he does read it before he gets up to read his speech, as there are others more knowledgeable than me who will follow him and point out the error of his ways, particularly if he thinks the bill does nothing for the consumers.

An hon. Member: Let's hear what it does.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, when you have a court case you do not belabour the obvious. There are certain circumstances and situations in respect of which we say the judge can take judicial notice. It is not necessary to comment on or put something in evidence in court when it is self-evident. I do not intend to stand here and read the bill when I know the hon. member can read it for himself. The bill speaks for itself, but apparently not loud enough for the two consumer critics of the opposition.

Mr. Baker: Tell us about double-ticketing and how you are going to enforce that provision.

An hon. Member: What are you going to do about the price of meat?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I am not sure whether the hon. member has answered the question, if he has decided to make another speech or to continue with this speech. However, I understand that the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) wishes to ask another question. Whatever the situation, the hon. member has lots of time left.

Mr. McGrath: I should like to ask the hon. member, who has had a wealth of experience as chairman of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices, another question. I suggest that all the recommendations of that committee have been ignored. I should like to hear the hon. member address himself to the provisions of the bill dealing with double-ticketing and explain how the government intends to enforce that provision. Perhaps he would also direct himself to the misleading advertising part of the bill about which the committee had so much to say.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Perhaps the matter was not put in the form of a question, but it was explicit enough that the hon. member might answer.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, after listening to that rather wide ranging discourse, let me say that one of the difficulties in respect of the double-ticketing system, which the hon. member may be as well aware of as I am—

Mr. Baker: Let's have no double-talk on double-ticketing.

Mr. Cullen: I am trying to give a straight answer, which it seems to me might be difficult as the questions are so crooked I have to go around corners to get at them. Prohibition of double-ticketing might be extremely difficult to enforce.

An hon. Member: Well, isn't that great.

Mr. Cullen: You had better let me finish before you fall into another trap. The hon. member has probably read as many, if not more, newspapers as I have. After all, members in the opposition have more time to read than we do, because we are busy working. In any event, I read the newspaper article which pointed out one of the difficulties of the double-ticketing system. When a price is put on an item it is extremely easy to get a dark red, black or blue ink pen, strike out that price and put on another one. There will be some difficulty in enforcing that particular provision, but I think businessmen in the marketplace across Canada are on their guard and know that we will be looking at this matter.

I might point out that there are scientific ways of determining whether one, two or three prices have been put on a particular item. I am not suggesting it is not going to be difficult to enforce, just as many provisions of the Criminal Code are difficult to enforce, or even to lay a charge under, to say nothing of proving it. No one is suggesting that this bill is a panacea, and I hope there will be some amendments forthcoming. The hon. member, who is well respected—we are complimenting each other tonight—contributed a great deal to the deliberations of the committee, but sometimes when he gets before the cameras he has a tendency to suggest that the government has not followed all the committee's recommendations. I suggest he is confusing the issue by doing that. The government may not have followed all the recommendations of the Conservative Party, but it certainly followed the recommendations of the committee.

The committee recommended the establishment of a Food Prices Review Board. Such a board has been established and significant action has been taken. Only this afternoon we heard about some of the splendid actions taken by this board. The committee also recommended that money be made available to consumer associations so they could go into various areas they could not go into before and conduct more efficient examinations. I understand the minister is increasing that amount this year by something like $100,000.

I should point out that all the recommendations of the committee were not directed to the federal government. Some of its recommendations were directed to the media, and I think the media have fulfilled what we asked them to do. For instance, we now have the program The Market Place in prime time and we have a tremendous amount of newspaper advertising. Everyone has the responsibility to follow these recommendations. We have heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) indicate that if any province wants to embark on a private program in this respect, funds from the Canada Assistance Plan will be made available. Initiatives have to be taken at every level of government. Carte blanche, sweeping criticism does not really tell the whole story.

In any event, I do not like to labour the obvious by referring to a bill that really speaks for itself. I suggest that a careful reading of it will indicate exactly what it does to protect the small businessman and the consumer.

Mr. McGrath: Would the hon. member permit another question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the hon. member agreeable to accepting another question?

Mr. Cullen: Yes.

Mr. McGrath: Since the hon. member did not use up all his time, I should like to ask him what happened to the amendments to the Weights and Measures Act passed by this House almost three years ago. Where is the consumer protection, based on that bill? Why did it take over three years to implement the packaging and labelling legislation, which I suggest will not become law in most cases for two years?

Mr. Cullen: When I am called upon to justify the weights and measures legislation, I will be only too happy to do so. It has been my experience around here that when something takes a little longer than the layman might think it should take, it is because of careful examination and discussion between industry, the department and the minister. An investigation would soon reveal that there are very good reasons for taking time in most cases. The government does not want to hurt the businessman who is to be affected by the legislation. Businessmen have done nothing wrong and want to comply with the law. I think the Canadian businessman should be given sufficient time to effect a change in practice in order to live up to the new legislation. We should try to avoid anything that would cause hardship to a particular businessman. Usually changes involve some expenditure on the part of businesses because they must replace their present packaging systems with another. These people should be allowed to continue their normal business unless they are violating the provisions of an act or its regulations.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest, as I always do, to the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) who caused me some consternation when he said the legislation had been widely welcomed by various hon. members and communities. I wondered for a moment whether I was listening to the right debate. However, when he said that when the minister introduced the bill he did not exactly jump up and down with enthusiasm, I knew I was in the right place at the right time. He indicated, as well, a slow, careful and cautious approach. I did not understand whether he meant to the legislation or in the legislation. If he meant a slow, careful, cautious approach to the legislation, I welcome his words and hasten to agree with him.

I had intended during this debate to deal with only one small aspect of the bill which is of considerable concern to me and others, but I am forced by the words of the minister who urged speedy passage of the bill to answer to some degree. Speaking personally, I would be quite content to expedite passage of this bill if I could find some justification for the rush. For that reason I searched today for justification. One might like to justify urgency on the ground that this government understands or sympathizes with the consumer or the small businessman, but I can find no justification in that regard.

This government, in my opinion, has not only had a history of but a propensity for callous disregard for the consumer. On the one hand it crawls and cowers under the protection of the Food Prices Review Board; on the other it struts and prances like a proud capon when discussing its attempts to put ceilings on the price of such things as milk and bread at the consumer level, while conveniently and simultaneously ignoring the input costs and transportation problems of the farmer-producer of these items.

With regard to small business, I suggest that the record of the government is dismal. It consists mainly of pious utterances in a succession of throne speeches, followed by a remarkable lack of activity between the speeches. The government has increased remarkably the problems of the small businessman. The small businessman in my riding, and in every riding in this country, deals with more and more government inspectors, he has more and more government forms to fill out, more and more government statistics to compute, and more and more reports to complete.

This government, in summary, has said to small business—I think this is the crux of it all—"If you want to expand, borrow money at prohibitive rates of interest." The government's action and concern for the consumer and small businessman gives me no justification for this rush on the part of the minister. I looked at the record of the minister and that of his predecessors in respect of competition legislation. Of course, I had to look for further back than 1971 and the competition act, the infamous Bill C-256 which was conceived in ignorance, drafted without understanding and which could have been implemented in chaos.

Fortunately for both consumer and businessman alike, it died the death it so richly deserved. Therefore, the government's track record in this field of legislation provides remarkable lack of justification for proceeding so hastily. Then I looked at the minister's speech—I believe it is at page 482 of Hansard—where he refers to the problems of foreign judgments, laws and directives and says:

> I think that recent events have demonstrated the importance of this proposal and have provided a strong argument for the House to make a favourable decision on this bill at the earliest possible date.

No doubt the minister was referring to the MLW-Worthington Limited case. Then at page 483 the minister says:

> At the same time, by asking the House to deal now with Bill C-7 I am taking action on behalf of the government to enable parliament to take decisions earlier than would otherwise be the case in some important areas particularly relevant to present public concerns linked with current inflationary pressures.

Speaking for myself, I recognize these two problems as being extremely urgent. I sympathize with the problems, of the minister, and indeed with the government. However, I am more in sympathy with the problems of the consumer and the businessman. With respect, I submit the minister knows very well there are other more efficient and expeditious means of dealing with these problems. I am sure the minister has been well aware of them for some time.

I am sure these matters will be discussed in this debate. Indeed, this question was mentioned by the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton earlier today and by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer). Yesterday, my colleague the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) suggested a minimum of four to six weeks before commencement of the committee hearings. I hasten to say that I agree completely with that request. In doing so, may I make an attempt to justify our position. I and every member of this House received an information kit from the minister and the department. It contained Bill C-227, the press release and a number of papers called background documents. I contacted the minister's office and he was good enough to send me 50 more of these kits which I distributed to 50 businessmen in my riding.

I do not pretend to be a spokesman for big business, because in my riding we do not have big business. I suppose the biggest business in my riding would employ about 250 people: the average would be between 100 and 125 people. These businesses are at all levels, retail, wholesale, manufacturing and service. I submitted this material along with what I call the blue book, entitled "Proposals for a new competition policy for Canada, 1973". Again I thank the minister for providing me with sufficient copies. I sent these out for the purpose of obtaining a reaction, and solicited inquiries.

I did not receive any wild-eyed, outraged condemnation. I did receive, in profusion, questions such as, "What does this mean? Does this mean strict liability? What are the procedural rules of the commission?" And so on. In summary, I received answers indicating a good deal of confusion in respect of the bill. Although some of the provisions are short, they involve extremely complex matters. Now that some 3½ or four months have passed since I distributed the material —as I am sure many other members have—the tremendous business and economic complexities of the bill at this point have been only partially digested.

These representatives of the small business community want to play their part, the part they deserve to play, in informing us of their opinion regarding this legislation. I am sure various consumer groups are adopting the same position. Again, they have an obligation, as have their business counterparts, to advise us and give us their opinion. I, for one—and I do not believe I am alone—want the best possible input when this matter is discussed in committee. My friends to the left, the NDP, will probably disagree. The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) yesterday, as recorded at page 488 of the official record, said:

> From my point of view, this legislation has appeared none too soon. I hope the bill will proceed to committee without lengthy debate and, in view of the fact that much discussion has already taken place on the general principles and philosophy of competition policy, that we can avoid the bill's being bogged down in committee as it is lobbied by one group or another over a lengthy period of time.

I say to my hon. friend, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, that there is a lot more to this bill than what he calls general principle and philosophy of competition policy. He is naive indeed if he does not think, for example, that the entire distribution system of goods in this country is at stake here. He went on to say:

> Of course, this is not to deny the right of interested parties to appear before the committee. But I am not anxious to be party to a procedure which sees the effective implementation of this bill delayed for a long period of time while many of those groups which have already had a substantial say in the formulation of the government's basic, philosophic approach come back to have another crack at it.

The hon. member says that many of these groups have already had a substantial say in the formulation of the government's approach. I have no doubt that members of the NDP are much closer to the government than I am or my colleagues. He may have been privy to all this input; others of us have not had this advantage. He may have been talking about the 1971 competition bill. I hope he does not rely solely on the evidence presented at that time to justify rushing this bill in and out of the committee. He and the minister and their respective colleagues may ignore some of the warning lights in the bill. I think of federal-provincial jurisdiction. I think also of the possibility of strict liability. I think of a commission that may be judge, jury and prosecutor rolled into one. I give just these few examples of the dangers one might find in this legislation. The minister said yesterday, as reported at page 480 of Hansard:

> —I look forward to the committee study of the bill where there would be an even greater opportunity for me to deal with hon. members questions, ideas and suggestions and to discuss these with them, as well as the various proposals of the bill, in full detail.

I assure the minister that I, too, look forward to the committee study, but I say most frankly that there are others in whom I have more confidence than the minister whom I wish to hear questioned—persons and associations representing business and consumer interests and I hope, also, provincial governments will be given a chance to express their opinions. I think this claim of necessity for haste is partially, if not totally, answered by an editorial in the Financial Times of November 12, 1973, headed, "No Paper Tiger". This editorial, which is short, reads as follows:

> Anyone who has been misled into regarding the new amendments to the combines act as a paper tiger should take a second look. The detailed report on the following two pages shows that the new minister and new staff of the Department of Consumer Affairs have learnt a lot from the demolition of Ron Basford's doctrinaire 1971 bill. But they have still adopted considerable chunks of it, and their bill demands equally searching examination.
> Mr. Basford's 1971 competition act was the supreme example of the academic and theoretical approach to government which was the hallmark of Mr. Trudeau's first ministry. Herb Gray's more modest bill is just as typical of the strictly political approach Mr. Trudeau has adopted in the last year.
>
> The amendments to the combines act are presented, blatantly and officially, as a response to the wave of consumer complaints about inflation. They are designed to ease Beryl Plumptre's lonely position as the government's lightning-rod—or, if you will pardon the expression, whipping-boy. At the same time, an attempt is made to placate business by withdrawing Mr. Basford's outrageous plan for a tribunal with authoritarian power over business dealings.
> But Mr. Gray's bill would also give a resurrected Restrictive Trade Practices Commission the power to make orders enforceable in the courts, over an important range of established business practices. Oil companies and service stations are only one of the most obvious cases in which the prohibition of tied sales and exclusive dealing might compel new arrangements to be made.
> The new rules on price maintenance and price discrimination are, mercifully, an immense improvement on Mr. Basford's bill. But they are not soft. Nor, let it be noted, has Mr. Gray given up the wider aims of the Basford bureaucrats. He has merely postponed them to a future "Stage Two" of uncertain date.
> His policy proposals anticipate an eventual need for "a more flexible, quicker and thoroughly expert investigation and enforcement machinery;" reform of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to make it "more efficient" and development of an "efficiency test" for business agreements and acquisitions.
> It would be wise to look behind the arras before starting to pet the tiger.

I urge the minister to agree that a four to six weeks period before the committee study is not only reasonable but advisable. The one area of the bill with which I wish to deal tonight is the refusal to deal, refusal to supply or refusal to sell, whichever we want to call it. This part of the bill is dealt with in what I call the blue book, "Proposals for a new competition policy for Canada", at page 44, the first paragraph of which reads as follows:

> Businessmen who have been unable to get supplies needed for their operations on ordinary trade terms have submitted many complaints to the director in recent years. In some cases, these are comparatively new entrants to a market and in others they are established firms whose supply lines have been disrupted after developing the market for the product involved.
> In the majority of cases the firms adversely affected are relatively small although their credit may be good and they are willing to take delivery in acceptable quantity . . . Alternatively, the refusal to supply may reflect the supplier's decision to undertake or increase its own distribution and eliminate competition in the resale of its product.

It goes on for approximately half a page to speak about illegal retail price maintenance and the fact that current legislation cannot deal adequately with the problem. The final paragraph deals generally with the commission and the powers it has to meet this problem.

Last year, in the Toronto Globe and Mail of December 6, there appeared an article by Professor Donald N. Thompson of York University. As some hon. members know, he is a member of the advisory committee to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs on competition policy and has served as consultant to the U.S. federal trade commission and the U.S. department of justice on anti-trust and trade regulations. The first paragraph of this article reads as follows:

> Buried in the middle of the new competition bill introduced recently by Consumer and Corporate Affairs Minister Herb Gray is a short section on refusal to sell, which could have a tremendous impact on the way products are marketed in Canada, on the prices paid by consumers, and the shopping alternatives open to them.

This provision was also buried in the middle of the minister's address yesterday and in the speech by the NDP spokesman, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore. In the minister's statement yesterday there are two short paragraphs at page 482 of Hansard. The first deals with the practices dealt with in the bill which are: refusal to deal, consignment selling, exclusive dealing, tied sales, and market restrictions. The minister indicated that such practices could be used to prevent the free operation of market forces and limit the consumer's choice. The second short paragraph indicated the minister's opinion of the RTPC's power to handle this problem.

The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore dismissed this provision in about ten or eleven lines most of which dealt with his experience on the food prices committee. In my opinion, this is cavalier treatment of a provision which could have profound effect on businesses and consumers alike. What I shall seek to find out in the committee is where this and other provisions of the bill relate to the bill's purpose. The bill's purpose, as set forth on page 1 of the book, "Proposals for a new competition policy for Canada", reads as follows:

> The purpose of the Combines Investigation Act is to assist in maintaining effective competition as a prime stimulus to the achievement of maximum production, distribution and employment in a mixed system of public and private enterprise. To this end, the legislation seeks to eliminate certain practices in restraint of trade, and to overcome the bad effects of concentration, that tend to prevent the economic resources of Canada from being used most effectively to the advantage of all. The Act also contains provisions against misleading advertising, which were introduced in 1960 and 1969, to utilize the investigative capacity of the act for the protection of the consumer.

What I and my colleagues wish to determine in committee, and possibly in this debate, is the relationship between this stated purpose and the effect of the failure to supply provisions. For example, there are those who seem knowledgeable in this field who suggest that refusal to sell may result in more vertical integration, and I was interested by what the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) had to say about it. I should like to quote again from Professor Thompson's article in the Globe and Mail as follows:

> From the manufacturers point of view, taking away the right to refuse to sell would have a huge impact on existing marketing systems of distribution. There would be pressure for manufacturers and retailers to expand into "non-resold" private brands, those distributed through vertical ownership systems. This might even serve to increase vertical ownership integration in marketing channels.

● (2140)

This refusal to supply provision, ostensibly for the protection of small business, may therefore have the very opposite effect. I invite hon. friends to my left in the NDP, who from time to time are inclined to indicate some concern for small business, to consider this in committee. Remember, Mr. Speaker, the small businessman is totally dependent on brand name merchandise. If there is evidence that this legislation encourages non-branded products, let us hear that evidence. If there is evidence that this bill will encourage vertical integration, let us all be aware of it, because small business has no greater enemy or more serious threat than the vertical integrator, unless it be the government itself from time to time.

It is said that the refusal to supply provision will encourage potential discounters. Professor Thompson is of this opinion. He says in his article in the Globe and Mail:

> One result of this tacit resale price maintenance is that many potential discounters, who depend on brand name hard goods for their customer attracting power, are unable to obtain goods from suppliers who refuse to deal. Thus no city in Canada has develop discount retailing to anything like the extent it is practiced in a number of large U.S. cities. Toronto comes closest to having widespread discounting, followed by Montreal and Vancouver. But Halifax, Quebec City, Winnipeg and Edmonton have little or no brand name hard goods discounting, largely because of the refusal of manufacturers to sell to discounters in these centres.

Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that Professor Thompson is right. What I do not know, and what I hope to find out, is the value of these discounters, and whether the consumer does get a better deal for his dollar. I have seen some of these so-called discount operations in the United States, and I tend to agree that many of these operators do discount with respect to 5 per cent of their goods, but the other 95 per cent is sure no bargain and certainly no discount. Their success in the United States is not so much attributable to legislation comparable to Bill C-7, because refusal to deal is not part of U.S. anti-trust laws so far as I am aware. The success of discounters in the U.S. occurred in the marketplace because many old-established retailers got out of date and did not keep pace with modern merchandising methods. Therefore, I want to know more about these operations of discounters and whether they improve the lot of the consumer or not. The refusal to deal prohibition may have tremendous impact on the distribution business in Canada. What has been ignored is the simple fact that the distribution business is composed of small business, not big business.

The minister claims to be concerned about small business and holds this legislation forth as protection to and encouragement for small business. What I do not understand is whether the minister suggests that the refusal to supply provision will assist those in, or those wishing to enter, the distribution business. It seems to me that the very opposite could be true. It seems very possible that big businesses, many of whom to date have used distributors, may be encouraged by this legislation to perform this function themselves. I suggest to the minister another side effect. If the distribution industry is threatened and reduced in any substantial number, what effect will this have on the small manufacturer who is totally reliant on independent distributors for the marketing of his products? These, then, are to me serious questions, and bland assurances from the minister do not answer them.

The minister seems to be saying, in the refusal to supply provisions in this legislation, "Trust us. Big Brother won't mess things up." I say to him in reply, "Don't tell us what you won't do; tell us what you will do. give us some examples of refusal to supply problems and what you would do to correct them." The minister says that the refusal to supply provision was included because of complaints received mainly from small business. I would like to hear some of these complaints and I would like to hear what Bill C-7 will do to correct the situation.

What also concerns me about the bill's refusal to supply provisions is that the minister, although he claims this to be for the protection of small business and resulting from the complaints of small business, wants in the bill to take two bites at the apple. Refusal to deal is dealt with first in part IV under the heading "Matters reviewable by the commission." These are the amendments in proposed section 31.2. Therefore, alleged infractions are subject to review by the RTPC. But later in the bill, under the heading "Offences in relation to competition", the minister takes another bite. I refer to proposed section 38(6) which reads as follows:

> No person shall, by threat, promise or any like means, attempt to induce a supplier, whether within or without Canada, as a condition of his doing business with the supplier, to refuse to supply a product to a particular person or class of persons.

Proposed subsection (8) reads:

Every person who violates subsection (1) or (6) is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable on conviction to imprisonment for two years.

This total or partial overlapping in sanctions is in itself rather remarkable, but what is even more astonishing to me is that neither the minister nor any other Liberal spokesman has made any attempt whatsoever to justify or explain this. Therefore, in committee we want some explanation of the thinking that led to this double-barrelled approach. I would like to be convinced that the minister understands the marketplace. I would like to be convinced that this legislation has not confused provincial responsibility for fair business practices with federal responsibility for combines legislation. I would like to be convinced that there is compelling reason to infringe on the seller's fundamental right to deal with whom he pleases.

I hasten to say to the minister through you, sir, that much of Bill C-7 is welcomed by all members of all parties, but as a word of caution I say that parts of the bill require extremely careful scrutiny including, in my opinion, the refusal to supply section. Therefore, I urge the minister to proceed cautiously on such matters in the interests of both consumer and businessman alike.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to join in the second reading debate on Bill C-7 as I feel it is rather remarkable that the minister who introduced the bill is so anxious not only to get it through second reading but also through committee. I noticed, when he introduced the bill on March 13, that he concluded his remarks by saying:

I therefore urge the House to give second reading to this bill as quickly as possible so that it can go at the earliest possible stage to committee for detailed but, I hope, speedy consideration and decision.

There are three words there of a nature to indicate the minister's anxiety to get this bill through the House. He says "quickly," "earliest" and "speedy," and this in a speech made by the minister only two days after the bill was introduced in the House. Why is there such a desire to pass it speedily through the House without giving it due consideration at the second reading stage? In the same speech the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) raised an alarm in my mind by a comment he made a little earlier when he said:

Let me now take a moment to pay tribute to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) and to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) for their efforts which helped lead to the bill now before the House.

If there we needed any reference to undermine our confidence in this bill, that is it—his referring to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration as if that in some way was a recommendation for the speedy passage of the bill. I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is conducting the Unemployment Insurance Commission affair, which is a colossal calamity for this country. At the present time it is costing the taxpayers of Canada something over $1 billion. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs is attempting to cope with his portfolio, but as was witnessed yesterday by his pitiful little speech concerning what he hoped to do with respect to rising housing prices, I think the House would agree that it is certainly a department that needs a new minister.

I make these general comments because, like the hon. member who preceded me, I have serious doubts, not only whether the minister who has introduced this bill understands the marketplace but, more important, whether the civil servants who prepared the bill and told him to get it through the House understand the marketplace. I say that because while there is reference in the bill to the Bank Act and certain amendments are proposed to it, the minister leaves the supervision of competition or lack of competition among bankers to the Inspector General of Banks. That may sound quite innocent, but many members of the House realize that the Inspector General of Banks has a staff of two; that is, the Inspector General himself and two assistants, including his secretary. Is it to be taken seriously that a competition act is going to be administered tightly, in the usual sense, by a staff of one man, an assistant and a secretary, bearing in mind that the banks that he is required to supervise have gross assets of $80 billion?

Why are the banks put into a sacred position? Why has the government chosen to be so gentle with the banking community? For example, if we are speaking about competition, surely it is relevant to point out that in the last 12 months the banks earned $358 million, which is more than triple what they earned a decade or so ago. I mention this figure because I think it is relevant to point out that while the banks earned that money, based on the Toronto stock exchange indices we find that the general manufacturing field earned $47 million; the food processing industry earned $49 million; the construction and materials industry, $26 million. Various other sectors of the business community had relatively low earnings compared to the banking community, whose earnings have grown probably more quickly in the last decade—certainly since 1967, the year of the great sell-out by the present government to the chartered banks—than practically any other sector of the business community. In fact, Mr. Speaker, based on the Toronto stock exchange indices listing of January of this year, I was surprised to find that the banking community had the second highest earnings of any sector in the nation. The only sector that had higher earnings was industrial mines.

Instead of giving hasty second reading to this bill, surely we should ask why, exactly, the minister gave favoured treatment to the banking community. And not only why did the minister give such favoured treatment to the banking community, but do the minister and his civil servants really understand how the marketplace operates in Canada? It is very nice to come in with a competition act, it is very nice to speak about competition—it is a motherhood thing—but we must be on our guard because we have a minister who at the behest of his civil servants is trading on the motherhood issue of competition to create more bureaucracy in this country.

Speaking of bureaucracy, surely it is time that people became alarmed, and in particular members of this House, at the fantastic growth of our civil service. In a current issue of the Canadian Tax Journal there is a very enlightening article by David B. Perry who points out that now one in eight people are employed by government in Canada. One person in eight is now somehow employed in government at either the provincial, municipal or federal level! As we know, the number one employer is the federal government, and here we have them lunging ahead to employ more civil servants, in more bureaucracy, so they can bring in what they say is a more competitive marketplace.

I would suggest that they do not accurately understand the marketplace at the present time. Let them look at the entire economic fabric of Canada; let them have another royal commission on banking, such as that which was commissioned by the Conservative government in 1961, to get the facts on what is competition in Canada and how it can be freed.

I would say that any chartered bank in Canada can restrict or open up competition more than any other force that we might consider. Not only do I feel that the government does not fully comprehend the problems they are attempting to deal with but, most unfortunately, I think they perhaps inadvertently do not realize that the more they submerge business with bureaucracy, the more they lessen competition. How often have members of this House been told by small businessmen that they cannot carry on, and the final straw that breaks their backs is mounting governmental supervision and paperwork that they have to keep filing with some bureaucracy, mainly at the federal level. I have a client in my law office who is also a constituent and he has written to me in desperation.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is almost ten o'clock, but perhaps I could continue because I should like hon. members to know the plight of this relatively small businessman who feels that bureaucracy is essentially forcing him out of business in spite of the fact that he is earning only, on average, $20,000 a year.

However, may I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENERGY—PRICE OF HOME-HEATING OIL IN OTTAWA AREA

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on March 5, 1974, at page 167 of Hansard, I asked a question of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) which was answered in the usual fashion of passing the question to another minister, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). That question dealt with the differential in home-heating oil that is charged to consumers in the Ottawa area notwithstanding the fact that one-half of the supply of oil was carried, before the pipeline was closed, by the pipeline which brought frozen-priced, western-oriented heating oil into the Ottawa area. As a result of this act of what I would respectfully call malfeasance, consumers in the Ottawa area are being charged eastern offshore prices for domestically frozen-priced oil. The minister's answer was tentative. He suggested that the extra costs were incurred in part as a result of the refurbishing of the pipeline which was used for carrying the product.

Subsequently the matter was again raised in the House. I received a letter from the minister which indicates that his officials had conducted a study with regard to the price of home-heating oil in the Ottawa market. This the minister kindly sent to me. Having seen the document which purports to be the study undertaken by the officials of his department, I can only say, with the greatest respect to those officials, that this document ought not to be dignified by being called a study.

I am informed that 12 million gallons of heating oil were pumped into the Ottawa area through this pipeline during the first quarter of 1974. But the differential with regard to those 12 million gallons was 7 cents a gallon, which means that the total differential consumers in this area paid would amount to $840,000. If the differential were 5 cents per gallon, Ottawa consumers would have paid an extra $600,000 during that period. That being so, why has the minister suggested that it would appear the oil companies did not make a windfall profit?

Let me now deal with the reasons given for the differential. First, there is the refurbishing of the pipeline. I suggest that it is wrong in principle to charge consumers the cost of refurbishing the pipeline. Surely it is not up to Gulf or Imperial Oil or any other oil company to bear the cost of refurbishing the pipeline. This matter, obviously, should be included within the rates of the Interprovincial Pipeline company. So that reason is without foundation. Second, with respect to the cost of the product itself, there is a table attached to the minister's letter which shows the price of western Canadian crude oil and of crude oil entering eastern Canada. Those prices are $4.50 per barrel on the one hand and $6.50 per barrel on the other.

The table deals with transportation costs. If the minister relied on such an incomplete study as this one, and if the department was prepared to rely on such incomplete information, I suggest that the minister and the department virtually misled consumers in this area.

Another reason for the differential is listed under the heading, "Additional supply costs". Under that heading the table lists an item which reads, "Rail freight to Regina from Edmonton verus lake tanker from Clarkson to free supply for eastern Canada". Think about that for a moment, Mr. Speaker. Consumers in the Ottawa area are being asked to pay higher prices because, in effect, they are asked to subsidize the oil used by the rest of Canada.

The next item in the table reads, "Extra processing on Edmonton product transmitted with IPPL crude". The figure given is without foundation. It is not based on any report prepared by officials or the deputy minister. This indicates that this study was not undertaken with sufficient care. Actually, the government relied on information supplied by the companies and not on data it had gathered itself.

The pipeline is now closed. In my respectful submission, consumers of the area have been ripped-off and this government, which is really the friend of the major oil companies, the banks, the large corporations and other industries has once again demonstrated that frienship. In conclusion, I suggest the government should reconsider its decision to allow the pipeline to close. It could be used to bring in other petroleum products from the west such as gasoline and so help this area, assuming that gasoline is more expensive here than in parts west of here to the detriment of consumers.

Mr. Speaker, I am not satisfied with the answer given to me by the minister.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, never have I heard such demagoguery so late at night. The hon. member made an unsubstantiated charge on March 5 and he has twisted his words tonight to justify what he said which was not substantiated.

As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, the supply outlook for the Montreal area and the whole of eastern Canada east of the Ottawa Valley line looked rather serious late last year as a result of the Arab oil embargo. The government then considered a number of emergency measures to ensure minimum disruption of supply. Because the threatened shortage would centre on the large Montreal refinery complex, and because the Ottawa area is normally supplied from Montreal refineries, one of the emergency measures adopted was arranging an alternate supply for Ottawa. This was accomplished by opening up an unused link in the Trans-Northern pipeline to enable the delivery of petroleum products to Ottawa from Toronto refineries.

By this means an equivalent amount of oil was freed for use in the Montreal area where the supply shortage appeared most imminent. The pipeline was restored to use for this purpose in December and used in January, February and March. Because the overseas supply situation improved early in the year, Trans-Northern pipeline deliveries never had to exceed 12 per cent of the Ottawa area demand in those three months. In fact, they constituted only 8.5 per cent and 5.4 per cent in January and March. Supply conditions now appear to be returning to normal and there are no plans to use this pipeline for delivery into Ottawa in April.

Analysis of the cost experience of the two principal oil companies using this pipeline shows that for one of the companies the cost of supply by this route was more than the product delivered from Montreal on which the Ottawa price structure is based. For the other company, there was a saving of less than one-half a cent per gallon on the volume moved by the Trans-Northern pipe line. When this saving is weighted into the company's total heating oil trade in the Ottawa area, the supply cost saving amounts to one-tenth of a cent per gallon, an insignificant fraction of the Ottawa price of 33.5 cents per gallon.

The department has concluded, therefore, that there is no substance to the suggestion that low cost western oil is being sold in Ottawa at an excessive profit. In closing, I would add this: for the hon. member to say the Ottawa consumer should not pay the cost of refurbishing the pipeline is something I cannot understand. I wonder who he wants to pay for it.

[Mr. Baker.]

MANPOWER—OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—LEVEL OF BUDGET IN SUDBURY AREA

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to pursue a question I put to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) on March 11 concerning the Opportunities for Youth program and the projected cutback for northern Ontario as compared with the rest of the province. I might say that the program has worked very well in my constituency and it has won the respect of the community. Sault Ste. Marie is one of the areas which pioneered the community advisory group.

With reference to the cutback in grants to northern Ontario I would draw the attention of the parliamentary secretary to the brochure prepared for applicants in 1974. On page four, this booklet states:

> Preference will be given to projects submitted by young people who need assistance in financing their education, who are members of low income groups, ethnic or racial minorities, native people, handicapped or who are from isolated communities or areas offering few employment possibilities.

Despite this stated policy, Opportunities for Youth, under the Department of Manpower and Immigration program for 1974, is planning to cut the Ontario budget by some 14 per cent. Funds available to northern Ontario will be cut by some 33 per cent. My question is this: how can the minister justify such a disparity since northern Ontario meets all the criteria to which I have just referred to a greater extent than does the rest of the province? Regarding the financing of post-secondary education, I would point out that 70 per cent of the graduates from the north central Ontario high schools go on to post-secondary education and need summer employment; they need assistance in financing their further education.

With regard to members of low income groups, the per capita income in northern Ontario is the lowest in the province. With regard to the ethnic, racial minorities and native peoples, the percentage of the population composing these groups ranges from 25 per cent in the district of Algoma to 45 per cent in the Sudbury district. With regard to the criteria for those living in isolated communities, 50 per cent of the population in northern Ontario live in towns of under 20,000 population, with vast distances between them. With regard to few employment possibilities, the minister's own department in a job market report for northern Ontario predicts that there will be high unemployment for youth in the north this summer.

Despite northern Ontario exceeding the criteria, the greater budget cut for OFY will hit the north rather than the south. I ask, Mr. Speaker, where is the justice, where is the concern, for the young people of northern Ontario under this projected budgetary allotment? I suspect that the new formula for funding is to blame for this situation. This new formula, as I understand it, is based on two criteria: firstly, the number of young people in an area, which has a one-third weighting factor; and secondly, the job availability index, which has a two-thirds weighting factor. But, Mr. Speaker, the Manpower statistics for northern Ontario are not accurate as far as young people are concerned because there are few Manpower centres in the north and there are great distances between these Manpower centres. The result is that not as many young people are registered with Manpower centres in northern Ontario compared with the south. Therefore, there is a bias toward large urban areas in southern Ontario where young people are registered with CMC. It is projected that the penetration rate of CMC for youth applications for jobs is about 30 per cent in the north.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I put two questions to the minister tonight. Firstly, how does the minister justify such budgetary discrimination against northern Ontario in projected OFY funding? Secondly, will the minister give a commitment here and now to restructure the OFY grant formula so that the disadvantaged north will receive its fair and just share of Opportunities for Youth grants?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, while it is true that most regions of Canada will receive less funds for the OFY program in the summer of 1974 than they did for the OFY program in the summer of 1973, I should like to reiterate the reply which my minister gave to the hon. member when he put his question on Monday, March 11, as reported in Hansard at page 353:

> The final sub-provincial allocations have not yet been struck.

In fact, although the share for the province of Ontario has been increased—that is, the proportion—the allocation will still be smaller than last year's. Last summer the Department of the Secretary of State funded 1,211 projects in Ontario at a cost of $8,929,843. However, hon. members on both sides of this House will be aware that the total budget for the OFY program of 1974 has been reduced from that of last summer. As my minister indicated in his letter to members of February 28, the budget for the summer of 1973 totalled $35,315,159, while $25,625,000 has been set aside, after costs of administration, for allocation under the 1974 summer OFY program. Members will recall that the letter also provided a table of the allocation of funds by province.

As far as the allocation for each labour market area is concerned, the answer of March 11 stands. I do not know where the hon. member got his information, but I do know that the preliminary figures that he provided are wrong and bear no relationship to fact even as preliminary figures. In fact, his figures are made up out of whole cloth. When the final allocation is made, it will take into account the freshest data on this year's employment opportunities available to students in each labour market area. At that time my minister will be happy to give hon. members the correct allocations for each labour market area.

I might add that the preferences which the hon. member quoted obviously refer to the distribution of grants within a particular labour market area and not to allocation within a province. They are not the criteria for sub-provincial allocation.

Adjournment Debate

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—GARRISON WATER DIVERSION PROJECT—FEDERAL REPRESENTATION AT MEETING BETWEEN NORTH DAKOTA AND MANITOBA GOVERNMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to speak on a matter which is of much concern both to me and to the people of Manitoba. I am referring to the infamous Garrison diversion unit, a huge United States irrigation project currently under construction in North Dakota. This project has immense environmental implications for Canada as it will seriously degrade the water quality of Lake Winnipeg and two Manitoba rivers, the Souris and the Red. According to wildlife ecologists with the Manitoba department of mines, resources and environmental management, Manitoba will be the sewer of the project. It is thus imperative that the federal government continue to convey in a forceful manner Canadian opposition to the scheme.

To date, $60 million has been spent on the first phase of the project which is designed to channel great quantities of water from the Missouri River to irrigate some 250,000 acres of U.S. farmland. It is estimated that a further $500 million to $1 billion may be spent before the project becomes a reality. Incredible as it may seem, this money is being spent to irrigate 250,000 acres of semi-arid land that already supports workable dry land agriculture. Even more astounding is the fact that the dam and diversion project, with an awesome network of reservoirs, canals, roads and bridges, will consume nearly as much land, 248,000 acres, as will eventually be irrigated.

As was mentioned, the deleterious environmental effects this mammoth scheme will have on Canada are many. Run-off water from the project will be diverted into the Souris River and the Red River flowing from North Dakota into Manitoba. The salt content of the Souris will be doubled or even tripled, seriously polluting a river which currently serves as the water supply for the town of Souris and indirectly, through the Assiniboine River, Portage La Prairie. In addition, it is impossible for towns and cities to attract industry when the water supply is polluted.

Even more serious are the fish, bacteria, parasites, fungi and other junk that will flow into the Manitoba when the Garrison project joins the watersheds of the Missouri River and the Red River for the first time since the glacial age. As well, ecologists fear that the Garrison diversion will destroy 26,000 to 39,000 acres of North Dakota wetlands and threaten an additional 34,000 acres, which could seriously affect migration of Canadian waterfowl. The project could also alter the immigration patterns of the birds and interrupt their mating cycles. On top of this, the increased water flow could increase incidents of waterfowl poisoning. Scientists have also pointed out that nutrients flushed from irrigated soil in North Dakota will reach Manitoba, accelerating the growth of algae, and possibly turn Lake Winnipeg into another Lake Erie, thus destroying the fishing industry and recreational areas on the lake.

These are but a few of the potential environmental repercussions of the Garrison diversion unit. Even though the Garrison project was conceived by the United States government in 1965, it was not until April, 1969, that Canada formally acknowledged the existence of the scheme with a message to the U.S. State Department. Nonetheless, it is to the government's credit that this message, like others sent in October, 1971, January, 1973, and October, 1973 asked the United States to stop work on the project, calling for a moratorium on construction. The government must now press for some definite answers from Washington. For while the latest reply from the Unites States stated that they would "comply with their obligations" under the boundary waters treaty of 1909, formulated by the International Joint Commission, construction continues at the Garrison site.

The possible pollution of the waters of the Souris River and the Red River resulting from the Garrison scheme would violate article IV of the boundary waters treaty and principle 21 of the 1972 Stockholm declaration on the human environment. Article IV of the treaty provides:

● (2220)

> The waters herein defined as boundary waters and waters flowing across the boundary shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other.

Does this mean that the United States intends to halt construction? If so, when? When are we to get some final answers? When is this United States-Canada meeting regarding the diversion to occur? As yet the government has refrained from involving the International Joint Commission in the problem. Instead, negotiations are supposedly being conducted at the intergovernmental level.

In lieu of the apparent inertia characteristic of these intergovernmental negotiations, perhaps it might be wise to involve the commission in the discussions. After all, Manitobans need all the assistance they can get in fighting the Garrison diversion unit. This is because Premier Schreyer and the provincial NDP government have adopted a "wait and see" attitude, waiting to see what damage the inflowing waters cause before acting to correct the situation. Hon. members were probably as surprised as I was to hear Mr. Schreyer's comments regarding the scheme. After a meeting with North Dakota Governor Arthur Link and other American and Canadian officials concerning the project, Mr. Schreyer stated that his government intends merely to monitor the situation until it can be "proved conclusively that the project is having a harmful effect on Canadian waters". One has to wonder how much more proof the premier needs. Mr. Schreyer went on to say that in the meantime—

> There is no point agonizing and speculating and attempting to cause something to stop.

Thus, it appears that it is up to the federal government to defend the interests of the people of Manitoba and protect our province from becoming the sewer for another American dream.

In conclusion, I implore the federal government, specifically the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), to continue to pursue the matter forcefully with the United States so as to achieve a halt in construction of the Garrison diversion unit pending a full investigation of all possible environmental effects on the waters of Manitoba.

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member has supported the position we have taken in this matter. I assure him that we have been pursuing the matter fully, and intend to do just that.

It might assist the hon. member if I outlined the recent sequence of events relating to the Garrison project in North Dakota. Last October, Canada sent another in a series of notes to the United States state department outlining Canada's opposition to the Garrison diversion project insofar as it adversely affected the Canadian environment. It was our estimate at that time that the irrigation project in the Souris loop planned as part of the Garrison scheme would at least double and perhaps triple the average total dissolved solid content of the Souris River entering Manitoba.

Our diplomatic note contended that such degradation of the waters would violate article IV of the boundary waters treaty which prohibits trans-boundary pollution to the injury of health or property. This note was sent with the full knowledge and support of the Manitoba government. On February 5, the United States replied that no work currently under way under the Garrison project would affect Canada, and that no work would be undertaken that might affect Canada unless it was clear that the United States obligations under the treaty were met.

The United States note, which has been made public, concluded by suggesting a Canada-United States meeting on this matter when some further special United States studies have been completed. It is probable that this meeting will take place next month. On February 25, the governor of North Dakota, at his request, led a United States and North Dakotan delegation to Winnipeg to meet with Premier Schreyer. As the Minister of the Environment has already informed the House, federal Canadian observers were present and participated in the discussions. A communiqué was issued following the meeting, specifically stating that Manitoba welcomed the assurances of the United States state department that the United States would meet its treaty obligations not to pollute Canadian waters to the injury of health or property.

I can state categorically that the Canadian and Manitoba governments have worked closely together throughout the history of this matter. Indeed, Premier Schreyer at the press conference following the meeting with the governor of North Dakota specifically stated that Manitoba had been well served by the federal government's efforts to stop or modify the Garrison project. Any suggestion that there is a difference in view between Winnipeg and Ottawa on this issue does not accord with the facts. We have been pursuing the matter forcefully and we will continue to do that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House is adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. STANFIELD—ENERGY EXPORT TAX PROCEEDS AND EQUALIZATION—POSITION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from a report in today's Globe and Mail which states, among other things:

> Mr. Stanfield said Mr. Turner had promised the House and him privately that equalization would be paid on the export tax revenues in order to obtain Conservative support for the export tax bill passed in early January.

There was never any question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) making me or the House a promise to pay equalization. That is not the point. The point is that the minister said in the House on January 4 that equalization had to be paid. He referred to the transfer of the money, that is, 50 per cent of the proceeds from the export tax to be received by the producing provinces for October, November, December and January, and said:

> —As a result of the transfer of that money, those revenues will qualify under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act as shared revenues and the bill to the Canadian taxpayer under the heading of equalization will be in the nature of $25 million.

This is not a question of the Minister of Finance making any promise to me; it is a question of a statement made in the House and to me regarding the basis on which, in respect of the bill before the House, we should consider whether or not to give the unanimous consent that he required in order that it could be considered and passed.

The minister emphasized to me in those early days of January, as he did in the House, the importance of the federal government going to the then upcoming federal-provincial energy conference with a free hand to negotiate at that conference, and that if the federal government were to continue the commitment it had made in respect of the export tax for the first four months, with all that money going either directly or indirectly to the producing provinces, the federal government would be faced with very large equalization payments for the months of February and March because of the very large jump in the size of the export tax. Under existing law very large sums would have to be paid out of the federal treasury and, therefore, financed by the federal taxpayers unless some agreement to the contrary could be negotiated at the then forthcoming conference.

The Minister of Finance took the position with me that he could not put the federal government in the position of having to make large equalization payments in respect of the months of February and March and therefore could not commit himself to earmarking the entire 100 per cent of the proceeds from the export tax for February and March for the oil producing provinces. The minister emphasized that he must have half the proceeds from the tax for the months of February and March in the federal treasury without strings because of these equalization requirements and also because of the money that might be required in terms of price cushioning in the eastern provinces. I thought the minister's position and his request, in terms of the equalization provisions and price cushioning, were reasonable and that he should be given unanimous consent on the basis of 50 per cent of the proceeds from the export tax for February and March going into the federal treasury without strings. We gave that consent.

Since then the federal government has changed its position with regard to the receipts by the producing provinces from the export tax being subject to equalization. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated in the House last week that the government's position is that these receipts by the oil producing provinces are not subject to equalization. Recently the Minister of Finance denied in the House that he ever said they were subject to equalization.

In view of the change in the position of the government, I believe that both the House and myself are entitled to some explanation in view of the fact that the House and myself were invited to take a position on the basis of certain statements in this regard by the Minister of Finance which has since been completely reversed. The newspaper this morning mentions a document, supposedly a confidential document, from the Deputy Minister of Finance which, if it is genuine, seems to confirm that the position of the Minister of Finance and of the government in January was that these portions of the receipts from the export tax received by the producing provinces were subject to equalization.

I want to say two things, in fairness to the Minister of Finance. The first is that he now seems to admit, on the basis of what I also read in the press, that he did say what he said in fact in the House on January 4 of this year, that is, that the payments received by the provinces for the months of October, November, December and January were subject to equalization and that this would cost the federal government $25 million. The minister now seems to admit that he did say that and that it was not a conditional statement on his part. I want also to say that the minister, since our exchange the other day, indicated to me that he wanted to see me personally and discuss this matter. He tried to see me yesterday without success because of my own commitments. However, I believe that not only am I but the House is also entitled to an explanation, in view of the representations made in the House in the course of a debate on a bill and the representations made to me in the course of negotiations leading to unanimous consent, of why the position stated by the government in January has been abandoned without the slightest explanation in the House.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It is not a question of the government having promised anything to the House with regard to the equalization matter or having promised anything to me. It is a matter of statements made.

I must say I am disappointed in the Minister of Finance. I am disappointed in the government. I hope the government and the Minister of Finance will make a full statement to the House at the earliest possible opportunity explaining why the government changed its position and at least offer the House some apology for making representations to the House which were asserted early in January and in respect of which the position has since been completely changed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Chair will allow the Prime Minister to reply to the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition on a question of privilege. I am sure that the Leader of the Opposition does not want me to rule whether there is privilege in the sense that the matter might be referred to a committee. I would be inclined, of course, not to make a ruling because there is no motion suggested or remedy proposed. Normally in such circumstances the minister or member whose conduct is referred to in a statement based on privilege is allowed to reply. The minister is not here at this time. I am not sure whether it might not be better to allow the minister to reply on some other occasion. The right hon. Prime Minister indicated he wanted to reply on behalf of the government. I take it that it is not only the minister but the government that is impugned or referred to in the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition. Perhaps it might be better to allow the matter to rest for the time being.

PERFORMING ARTS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROGRAM OF CAPITAL ASSISTANCE GRANTS

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the federal government's programs to encourage the arts during the past few years have had a profound effect on the cultural life of the country. This has manifested itself through the burgeoning demand of Canadians for access to the work and performances of our artists in all sectors of our cultural life. Nowhere has this demand been more acutely felt than in the area of the performing arts. As a result, many of our performing arts organizations are faced with the problem of expanding their facilities to meet this demand.

I am pleased, therefore, to announce that a program of capital assistance has been established to enable the government to act on some of the more pressing applications for capital grants. The first grants will go to the Centaur Theatre in Montreal, which will receive $350,000; the Shaw Festival at Niagara-on-the-Lake, which will receive $300,000; and the Orpheum Theatre in Vancouver, which will receive $1 million.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: The federal contribution to the cost of renovating the Orpheum Theatre, the new home of the Vancouver Symphony Orchestra, will be paid over three years beginning in 1975. At the same time, I would like to announce a grant of $1 million toward building a new home for the Citadel Theatre in Edmonton. These funds will be paid in 1975-1976 and 1976-1977.

The basic criteria for this new capital assistance program will be as follows: first, the grants will be available for well established organizations whose artistic and managerial competence has been proven. Second, there will have to be evidence of the organization's ability to meet the operational costs connected with a new or improved facility. Third, careful consideration will be given to the impact that any expansion program is likely to have on the situation of other artistic groups and facilities, to its over-all usefulness and to its relevance to the performing arts in Canada. Fourth, there will have to be adequate financial partnership among federal, provincial, municipal and private sources.

Over the years, the government's investment in the development of the arts in Canada has paid excellent returns. The benefits to the people of Canada far outweigh the dollars spent. I am confident that these measures I have announced today will result in further development of our national artistic life, as well as in greater access to the performing arts for all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, we members of the Official Opposition support in principle the statement made by the minister. I am also sure that the minister will understand our satisfaction that this statement was made today in the House of Commons. I sincerely hope that the minister made this announcement today about these grants only after close consultation and co-operation with the associations and people concerned.

[English]

With regard to the grant to the Orpheum Theatre in Vancouver, I certainly know how much members of the Official Opposition from British Columbia have worked toward this end, as did the hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: Just look at their mail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1120)

Mr. Grafftey: There is one thing I would like to mention in terms of the criteria outlined to the House by the minister this morning, and I am not saying it too critically.

The minister mentioned that this kind of subvention—I am not confusing it with the Canada Council per se—is going only to theatre groups, performing arts groups that have already established their viability and ability to carry on. I understand it in this context, but in terms of cultural assistance in general, which does include the Canada Council, I think that too often we pay attention to groups already under way. I think the minister and his officials could do a better job in discovering struggling artists who are excellent and need help. This has been a problem over the years in regard to government assistance to the arts, and I would like to emphasize it again today.

I would also like to draw the attention of the House to the Speech from the Throne in which the government announced its intention to make many changes in council assistance to science, the humanities and the arts. I am sure this will affect the minister's department and the Canada Council. We are very concerned, whether it be artistic or cultural assistance or assistance to the humanities, that this be done in close consultation with all members of the House. Apart from that, we certainly welcome this announcement by the minister today and congratulate him on it.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), on behalf of my party I would like to welcome the announcement of the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) today on the new capital assistance program. I know that this is going to be welcome news to the many members of the House from British Columbia who belong to my party, and who have also worked diligently on this matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rose: Announcements such as this are always welcome, because no one shoots Santa Claus. However, in passing, may I say that I feel that possibly the Vancouver civic administration made a little error. They asked for $2 million and got $1 million. I think they might have been wiser to ask for $3 million and receive $2 million, because all of us should be reminded that actually the total expenditure required to save this theatre in Vancouver Centre—

Mr. Basford: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: —has a price tag of some $6 million, meaning that probably $4 million must still be collected from other sources, probably civic and provincial.

As I say, I am pleased with the announcement of this new capital assistance program. However, we really do not know anything about the nature of the program, its parameters, how long it is intended to be in force, what is the total funding required over the years, and other interesting little details that I am sure we will all be anticipating.

I think it should also be said that while we appreciate assistance to the arts in the major centres of the country we should keep in mind that there are many smaller communities that desperately need facilities. Without adequate facilities it is very difficult for artistic organizations to develop anywhere except in the major centres. Artistic enterprises seldom can stand on their own. Historically they have not done so, but that does not mean they are any the less necessary. I agree with the minister when he says that the money has been well spent over the years and has contributed positively to our cultural identity and development.

May I say one final thing, Mr. Speaker. It is no secret, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Brome-Mississquoi (Mr. Grafftey), that we have tended to direct the largest part of our artistic funds to well-established names in Canada. As a result, I think we have tended to overlook the grass roots in the arts. I mean by that amateur community theatres, ballet and folk arts, band and orchestral groups which urgently require a national secretariat to be located in Ottawa to act as a clearing house for organizational and administrative purposes. A request for such a secretariat, tentatively called Marius Barbeau House, has been before the Secretary of State's department for nearly three years, but there has been no action taken.

I say again that I am pleased with the minister's announcement today, although it may smack a bit of ad hockery without an adequate assessment of the long-term plan. However, we welcome the announcement that the government is embarking on long-term capital assistance to artistic enterprises.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I can only agree with the initiative that the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) has just announced. In a civilization which aims at more and more leisure, it is obviously very important that the government assume its responsibilities in order to allow all the citizens of the country to have access to the arts.

In view of the increasing interest in the arts and the higher unemployment rate, for instance, more and more people have the time to go to the theatre.

The government must democratize the arts, that is to say enable the people to participate in them.

However, there is one problem that is not solved either by building or renovating a building, and I mean the cost people often have to pay to go to the theatre.

The government is making an effort to enable the whole population to cultivate itself.

When speaking of art, one often gets the impression that its centre is found in Europe and elsewhere, and that there are few things of international artistic character in Canada.

The government must encourage artists in every way so that Canada can prove to the whole world that it has as many artistic opportunities as any other country.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

T4 SLIPS ISSUED TO WILLIAM CAMPBELL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Realizing that Canada is working toward the metric system I am unaware that there was any intention of altering the Gregorian calendar, which in effect is what the Cape Breton Development Corporation and the Sydney Steel Corporation have done. Apparently they now have a 13-month year. Added to that, Devco has accepted financial responsibility for payments to Mr. William Campbell from the Sydney Steel Corporation. In view of this particular financial arrangement I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir):

● (1130)

That this House instructs the Auditor General to inquire into and report upon to this House the circumstances under which Cape Breton Development Corporation and the Sydney Steel Corporation issued 1973 T-4 slips to Mr. William Campbell, as both claim to be the employer, although Mr. Campbell was never employed by Sydney Steel Corporation and the total income amount recorded on these T-4 slips exceeded the amount of Mr. Campbell's 1973 income.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the hon. member's motion cannot be put.

Mr. Bell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who said no was not sitting in his seat.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as two committees of the House have given me 100 per cent support on this issue involving the Cape Breton Development Corporation and as the member who declined the motion was not in his seat when he said no I think that in all fairness the motion should now carry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member will recognize that not only one member said no. I heard quite a number of nays. To satisfy the hon. member and the House, and because the hon. member seems to think he has a good point, I will inquire again. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

OIL EXPORT TAX REVENUES AND EQUALIZATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to make use of this extraordinary remedy under Standing Order 43. The pressing and urgent circumstances of the matter and the reason why this procedure is being used instead of the ordinary procedure to obtain what I seek will be evident from the motion itself, the facts indicated in the statement made by my leader today, and the report in the press. If the House will allow me to pursue this search for truth, I would move:

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond).]

That this House orders the government and the Minister of Finance to immediately produce and table all documents, letters and memoranda or copies of the same which are now or were in the possession of the minister or any member of the government or any government official dealing with the question of revenues from the oil export tax bill qualifying as equalization payments under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

LABOUR RELATIONS

STRIKE AT UNITED AIRCRAFT PLANT, LONGUEUIL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of pressing and urgent necessity. In view of the protracted and bitter strike now in effect at United Aircraft at Longueuil, Quebec, and in view of the fact that this large American conglomerate is threatening to move most of the production of the PT-6 engine to its plants in the United States, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Nelson):

That the House urge the Minister of Labour to meet with his counterpart in the province of Quebec in an attempt to obtain an immediate and just settlement of this dispute, to ensure that the production of the engines necessary for our STOL aircraft is continued in Canada and not removed to the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

BEAUTY PAGEANT

REPLACEMENT OF MISS CANADA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, as the Miss Dominion of Canada Pageant has replaced the reigning Miss Canada with the fifth runner-up of the 1971 contest instead of with last year's first runner-up, Miss J. Olson, from Delta, British Columbia, I would move under the provisions of Standing Order 43:

That this House ask the Prime Minister to intervene and correct this injustice to Miss Olson and save the integrity and respect of future Miss Dominion of Canada contests.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO DEAL WITH PROBLEM

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the government House leader. As the Prime Minister yesterday was unable to tell the House what effect the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act would have on inflation, can the government House leader now tell us if the government is going to introduce bills to deal with inflation and other problems mentioned in the Speech from the Throne within two weeks?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would help the hon. member by referring him to the exchange between the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the hon. member for Saint John's West with respect to the relationship between the competition bill and the question of inflation. I think the connection is clear from that exchange. We have only two days before March 26 for government legislation. Following the first supply period, it will be possible to bring forward a number of bills affecting food production in Canada. I am sure my hon. friend would agree that food production has a direct relationship to the general question of price levels.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has he prepared legislation and does he have legislation ready to introduce immediately to do something about the escalating cost of living?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is a bill before the House which I think will make an important contribution to dealing with this matter. The government, as has been said on other occasions by the Prime Minister and other ministers, will be prepared to take the necessary steps that are required by the circumstances.

Mr. Gillies: Is the legislation ready, and can the minister tell us today when it will be presented?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think this is something for the leader of the House to comment on because the matter of legislation pertains to the government generally.

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO RESERVE COASTING TRADE FOR CANADIAN SHIPS—WITHDRAWAL BY CANADA FROM BRITISH COMMONWEALTH SHIPPING AGREEMENT

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport may I direct my question to the parliamentary secretary. In light of the minister's public statement of September 28, 1973, that legislation would be forthcoming to ensure that the Canadian coasting trade would be reserved for Canadian registered bottoms, and as no reference was made to this legislation in the recent Speech from the Throne, would the minister tell the House whether he has changed his position in this regard and, if not, when the legislation will be introduced?

Mr. Joseph-Phillippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Soon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Neale: In keeping with the assurances the minister gave the House on November 20, on December 17 and again on March 7 of this year, can the minister confirm that notice has been served on the government of the United Kingdom of Canada's intention to withdraw from the British Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement and, if not, will the minister tell the House when that notice will at last be served?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the minister is away on government business today. He will be back in the House on Monday and I am sure he will be pleased to answer the hon. member's question.

PREDICTED FIFTY PER CENT LOSS IN BUYING POWER OF CANADIANS—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Finance is not present, I direct my question to the Prime Minister.

The economists of the Royal Bank of Canada declared recently that ten years hence, the Canadian dollar would be devaluated by 50 per cent, thus causing a similar drop in the buying power of Canadians. Has the Prime Minister read this report and, if so, what action does he intend to take to limit this expected loss of buying power?

MANPOWER

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—ASSISTANCE TO APPLICANTS BY PROJECT STAFF—CONSULTATION WITH LOCAL PEOPLE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It relates to the Opportunities for Youth Program for this year which comes under his jurisdiction. In view of the fact today is the final date for the submission of applications for Opportunities for Youth projects and in a number of provinces there have been no program or project staffs since the beginning of the year, in what way have young people in these various provinces been assisted either with regard to clarification or formulation of submissions which must be in by midnight tonight?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable publicity about the Opportunities for Youth Program for this summer and the availability of funding. Staff has been available to assist those people who wish to submit or design projects. I do not think it has been handled any differently than in the past. We anticipate a number of good project applications.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I know the minister would not want to mislead the House. He must be aware of the fact that in Prince Edward Island and I believe in New Brunswick and other provinces there have been no project staffs since the first of the year. It has been virtually impossible for young people to be informed of the nature and details of this year's Opportunities for Youth Program. What assistance will now be given, even at this late date, and in what way will the young people be assisted so that this year's program will operate at the level of previous years?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not anticipate any undersubscription to the funding of OFY. I will re-examine the exact location of our staff, as indicated by the hon. member, and if in any way I have been incorrect in my assumption I will communicate with him and alleviate the situation. At the moment, I do not consider this to have been an inhibition.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): When I asked the minister earlier about constituency advisory groups, he advised there would be no groups and that local people would be consulted. Will the minister indicate which local people will be consulted, the basis on which they will be selected and why in fact such constituency groups were not organized in view of the strong recommendation to this effect by OFY staff as early as last fall?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, representatives of social agencies, community organizations, citizens groups, municipal and township officials, federal and provincial government field staff, groups of individuals with specific competence or expertise in the area of project submissions, and members of parliament who indicate their willingness, desire and availability to be consulted, will be contacted.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): By whom and when?

Mr. Andras: By our OFY staff.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): You have no staff. How can you contact anybody?

Mr. Andras: On the second part of the question with regard to constituency advisory groups, I think I indicated in my letter to all hon. members that the allocation was based on the breakdown of 33 market labour-management areas rather than precisely the constituencies. In some cases these market areas will cover as many as eight or ten constituencies. Because of the difficulties that arise from that distribution in terms of a constituency advisory group, plus the lower amount of funding, plus the time element and because of administrative expenses involved in advisory groups, we decided that it was not practical this year to have constituency advisory groups.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—VALIDITY OF FORMULA FOR ALLOCATION OF FUNDS AMONG PROVINCES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Will the minister examine the validity of the formula by which the allocation of funds between provinces was made this year? Surely a formula that produces a sharp relative cut resulting in a smaller allocation to the four Atlantic provinces, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories must be faulty, considering the fact that unemployment is higher in those areas than anywhere else in Canada.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that the formula and the statistics behind the formula are more precise and accurate than we have ever used in the past. I will be glad to go into more detail as to how it operates, although it might be necessary to do that on another occasion when dealing with estimates or, if hon. members wish, individually.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF PROGRAM EVALUATIONS

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In order that the whole House may be in a position to evaluate the program, and in light of the minister's letter to me earlier this week indicating an intention to hide from public view the official evaluation of last year's OFY program, will the minister give a commitment now to publish any evaluations that are undertaken regarding this program, and, will he tell the House what possible justification he can offer for keeping secret from parliament the results of that expensive assessment last year?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have not departed from any established practice with regard to the release of documents. These are internal documents. I believe there was a thorough discussion of this in the last session of parliament. I believe our views were aired before parliament.

ROTATING STRIKES BY MEMBERS OF AIRLINE EMPLOYEES ASSOCIATION—INTERVENTION BY MINISTER TO SETTLE DISPUTE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour relating to the rotating strikes taking place today in Halifax, Montreal, Sept-Iles, Vancouver, Victoria, Toronto and Hamilton. Can the minister bring us up to date as to what form the rotating strikes are taking? Mediation does not seem to be bringing about the desired result. Is the minister now prepared to personally look into this matter? Also, will he advise what special initiatives he is taking with regard to the problems that now exist at Charles de Gaulle airport in France where there seems to be some friction at the present time?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the hon. member that, as he is no doubt aware, mediation efforts were going on yesterday and are again going on this morning. The report I received roughly one hour or so ago seemed quite optimistic that this dispute may be settled and the implications involved that the hon. member identified will no longer be with us.

DISPUTE BETWEEN SEAFARERS UNION AND LAKE CARRIERS ASSOCIATION—INITIATIVES BY MINISTER TO ACHIEVE SETTLEMENT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Can the Minister of Labour advise the House about another industrial dispute of some importance? If negotiations between the Seafarers Union and the Lake Carriers Association break down, the opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway on April 1 will be affected. What special initiatives has the minister taken with regard to this matter in order that amicable settlement may be reached?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I am an eternal optimist. I also had discussions with various people concerned in this dispute. I am also hopeful that any type of breakdown at a crucial time such as April 1 will be avoided by a settlement.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Fraser Valley West. Is it a supplementary?

Mr. Rose: It is not a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Chair might allow the hon. member for Winnipeg North a supplementary.

ROTATING STRIKES BY MEMBERS OF AIRLINE EMPLOYEES ASSOCIATION—SUGGESTED REORGANIZATION OF AIR CANADA LABOUR RELATIONS DEPARTMENT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Labour whether he and the Minister of Transport have discussed or are considering discussing with senior officials of Air Canada the fact that this is not the first dispute with a group of Air Canada employees, there having been disputes with the machinists and airline pilots, and whether there needs to be a thorough look at and reorganization of the whole labour relations department of Air Canada so that the public will not be faced with recurring stoppages, rotating strikes, slowdowns, work to rule and so on?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with the Minister of Transport of the general nature that the hon. member has described. I would also advise the hon. member that extensive changes are going on within the industrial relations department of Air Canada. We are hopeful these will have beneficial results in the future.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSALS TO CABINET FOR NEW TRANSPORTATION POLICY

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday all members, especially those from western Canada, were intrigued by the statement of the Minister of Transport that he had failed to win the cabinet over to his side or had not yet presented his proposals to cabinet regarding the improvement of Canada's transportation system. Can the Prime Minister tell the House when these proposals are likely to be before cabinet and how soon a decision will be reached on this very important matter?

● (1150)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must be referring to a series of measures which the minister and, indeed, the Speech from the Throne indicated would be necessary and would be taken. Some have already been before cabinet and have been announced; for instance, the increase in rail cars to the tune of some 2,400 through repairs. Others are yet to come and will be announced in due course.

RAILWAY FREIGHT RATE INCREASE ON STEEL—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): In view of the fact that certain gardes or classes of steel in the Vancouver market are double the price at which they sell in Montreal, and in view of the Minister of Transport's pledge to western premiers concerning a rollback of steel freight rate increases and his revelation last week of his lack of control over the railways, can the Prime Minister tell the House how we are going to effect such a rollback or exert more control over the railroads and when legislation, if legislation is indeed necessary—I think it is—will be introduced in the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there have been various occasions in the past when the minister has obtained from the railway companies changes of position or new positions, which he obtained from them merely by talking to them in a nice, amiable way. In other cases legislation may perhaps be required, and if this happens we will introduce that legislation.

GRAIN

POSSIBILITY OF REDUCTION IN NUMBER OF ELEVATOR DELIVERY POINTS FOR FARMERS IF ENCOURAGED TO TRUCK THEIR GRAIN LONGER DISTANCES

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, my question is along the same lines and concerns the transportation of grain in western Canada. It is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Yesterday, in reply to the hon. member for Vegreville on the matter of the boxcar shortage in the movement of grain in western Canada, the minister stated, as reported on page 503 of Hansard:

> We are looking at other means including the possibility of encouraging farmers to haul grain longer distances in their own trucks—

Did the minister mean by his reply that he is going to continue to pursue a policy of fewer grain elevator delivery points for farmers in western Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker. The issue at the moment is to try to find any means which will allow for the fast turnaround of available rail power and cars. It is true that certain rail lines allow for a much faster pickup, and therefore turnaround, or cars. In this kind of emergency situation, therefore, it might make sense—I stress the word "might"—to invite farmers, I assume with compensation, to move grain farther distances themselves in order to get this faster turnaround. This would be, of course, quite apart from any question of making this kind of program permanent.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will be recognized for one supplementary and then the Chair will see the hon. member for Victoria.

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF LONG-TERM POLICY FOR MOVEMENT OF GRAIN

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): As the government has put a freeze on the closure of all branch lines until January 1, 1975, and as the CNR and CPR will not announce their plans for these branch lines until the government announces its long-term policy for the movement of western grain, when will the government be announcing its plans so that the farmers and the elevator companies will know what their future is on these branch lines?

[Mr. Rose.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have been undertaking a very important program of consultation with the producers and the various parts of the industry involved. The Canada Grains Council has a committee at work attempting to assist in this effort, all of which is designed to lead toward the goal of a policy that meets the needs and real interests of farmers and communities in western Canada. That is the objective. While I am as impatient as the hon. member to see the results of that consultation, the consultation is by no means complete and I am not able to forecast at this point when a decision can be made on the basis of complete consultation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO COST OF NEW DDH-280 DESTROYERS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence my question will be directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact the government stated that the total cost of the four DDH-280 destroyers, including all components, would be $170 million and the minister now states that the cost thus far, without all components, is $287 million—and the end is not yet in sight—would the Prime Minister consider instituting an inquiry to determine why these ships will have a cost overrun in excess of $30 million per ship?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will gladly look into the matter and raise it with the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kootenay West on a supplementary.

GRAIN

USE OF PORT OF PRINCE RUPERT FOR EXPORT SHIPMENT

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the previous question and is directed to the Minister of Justice in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that little grain has been directed to the port of Prince Rupert, with only 320 cars being unloaded in February of this year compared with 1,660 cars in February of last year, would the minister advise whether more grain will now be directed to that port in order to offset some of the grain shortage and relieve shipping congestion at Vancouver harbour?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the port of Prince Rupert is used whenever that does add to over-all handling capacity. Last year, as a result of the tremendous movement of grain, it was used very effectively indeed. The directing of grain is very often in the hands of the elevator companies that have received it and are moving it for cleaning purposes and is not controlled by anybody else. The Wheat Board can, of course, bring pressure to bear on them whenever they can show that some additional movement is possible, but it is true that, under this arrangement, when a smaller amount of grain is moving Prince Rupert tends to suffer first.

HEALTH

PRESENCE OF DES IN UNITED STATES CATTLE IMPORTED INTO CANADA

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare which is related to the present illogical situation with respect to the use of DES—diethylstilbestrol. In view of the fact that DES has been banned from use for finishing cattle in Canada, and in view of the fact cattle finished with DES are in fact entering Canada, will the minister immediately recommend that an embargo be placed on all livestock and livestock products from countries where DES is allowed?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I submit that my hon. friend is misinformed. To the best of my knowledge, no United States meat treated with DES is entering Canada now.

Mr. Holmes: That answer is really not very reassuring, because cattle are now entering Canada finished with DES. Can the minister assure the House and the Canadian people that he has in fact established a program to inspect all imports of livestock and livestock products from those countries permitting the use of DES, and can he assure the House and the Canadian people that such a program will prevent the entry of DES contaminated livestock and livestock products into Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I already told this House we are consulting with American government representatives and with the Minister of Agriculture so as to establish regulations that will prevent the importation of DES meat products.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—NEGOTIATIONS WITH WESTON BAKERIES

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

As a result of his differences with the bread industry, can he report how his campaign for the boycott of Weston bread is going on?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I made a suggestion to that effect when it was possible that Weston Bakeries Limited would increase their bread by 4 cents, but at my request they did not do so. It was then unnecessary to follow that suggestion.

MULTICULTURALISM

ALLEGED GIVING OF ADVERTISING CONTRACT TO NEW CANADIAN PUBLICATIONS OF MONTREAL WITHOUT TENDER

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for multiculturalism. Can the minister tell the House whether New Canadian Publications of Montreal was given without tender an advertising contract to place government advertisements in the ethnic press, and whether the minister's acquaintance, Stan Martin, who I believe is now executive assistant to the minister has now or has had in the past any financial or familial connection with this firm?

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Martin is no longer an acting executive assistant in my office as of February 28 last, and the advertising program for multiculturalism was given to another firm.

INDUSTRY

COPPER—PRICE INCREASE BY NORANDA—REPRESENTATIONS TO SECURE ROLL-BACK IN VIEW OF PROFIT POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the announcement yesterday by Noranda Mines that it has increased the price of copper both for use in Canada and for export, and bearing in mind that Noranda Mines has had a 75 per cent increase in profits already this year, will the minister say whether it is the intention of his department to contact this company and demand that it immediately roll back the price increase on copper in this country?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think this question would come more properly under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but I will be pleased to discuss this with the minister.

COPPER—SUGGESTED IMPOSITION OF PRICE CONTROLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the minister is not here I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Keeping in mind the increase in the price of copper and the 75 per cent increase in profits by Noranda, I should like to ask whether it is the intention of the government to impose selective price controls on copper used in this country, particularly in view of the fact that 54 per cent of the production is used here domestically, and this would be of great help to the consumer?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to look into the matter before giving a reply. I missed the previous exchange, but the hon. member is no doubt aware that there have been cases in the past where the federal government, through the then Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, did obtain a price in Canada for copper from the Canadian refineries which was lower than the world price or the London Exchange price. This may be a situation which could be looked at again.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

ALLEGED ERRONEOUS ISSUANCE OF T4 SLIPS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the House leader has a copy of my earlier motion and I have the T4 slips available to show the errors, why would the government deny to Mr. William Campbell, and others in similar circumstances, the services of an officer of this House in order to investigate these injustices?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the connection between the premise to the question and the question itself is a bit esoteric, but I will look into it and try to understand the sense of the question.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the Prime Minister continues to make the same promise in respect of Devco legislation and as the Minister of Justice has gone far afield, will he give the Minister of Justice a sabbatical leave in order that he may catch up on the law?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the hon. member is back from his sabbatical leave.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to assure the Prime Minister that I am back on him, too.

PERFORMING ARTS

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF APPLICATIONS FOR GRANTS MADE PRIOR TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF GUIDELINES

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State, and I should like to compliment him on the introduction of a new performing arts policy. In view of the fact that the policy he announced today has a retroactive effect on those who applied prior to and during the preparation of the policy, not knowing the ground rules, and as hundreds of thousands of dollars have been raised and in some cases spent, will he undertake to give serious consideration to reviewing each of these earlier applications with a view to judging them on their merits, notwithstanding the new guidelines?

An hon. Member: Especially the Sarnia Ballet.

Mr. Cullen: Especially the Sarnia Arts.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I think in fairness to those groups, and I know how strongly the hon. member feels about the Sarnia application, it is important that we stick to the guidelines as that is precisely why we introduced a policy of having guidelines under which groups can respond, rather than carrying on in the ad hoc fashion we had been following in the past.

SPORTS

SUGGESTED PROHIBITION OF TELEVISING OF NATIONAL FOOTBALL LEAGUE GAMES IN CANADA TO PROTECT REVENUES OF CANADIAN FOOTBALL LEAGUE TEAMS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Since the government has indicated that, if necessary, it is prepared to introduce legislation to prevent the World Football League from operating in Canada as a means of protecting the revenues of Canadian Football League teams, in the interests of consistency does the government now intend to advise the CBC not to use its national network to broadcast NFL games on Sunday afternoons at the same time that CFL games are played, in order to maximize the television revenues of the CFL?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as a representation by the hon. member and will look into it. It may be a helpful suggestion.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, in view of that non-answer, as usual, by the Prime Minister, will he advise the House why it is that the government is prepared to engage in measures to set up a monopoly aimed at preserving the earnings of the business organizations that control and operate CFL teams? Would you give me an answer to that?

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO CATTLE TREATED WITH DES IMPORTED INTO CANADA

Mr. Norval Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can he confirm that there are no cattle to his knowledge coming into this country that have been treated with DES?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should think that any feeder who is using DES under the laws of the United States following the lifting of their ban would be foolish, because there would be no efficiency in doing that in respect of cattle shipped into Canada. However, I do not think anyone can guarantee that there are or are not such cattle coming in.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FRANCE—FORCED ABANDONMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES BASE AT MARVILLE—INQUIRY AS TO COMPENSATION

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Canada ever received compensation from France in respect of our being kicked out of Marville and, if not, why not?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have not received compensation and we are still pressing for payment.

FRANCE—SUGGESTED EFFORT TO OBTAIN COMPENSATION IN CONNECTION WITH "GREENPEACE III" INCIDENT

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, does the Secretary of State for External Affairs intend to seek reimbursement of $12,000 from France to recoup the fee for bringing the Greenpeace back to Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, not specifically, but we are seeking compensation from France for the damage done to Mr. McTaggart's eye.

PERFORMING ARTS

FREEZING OF GRANTS TO ARTISTIC ORGANIZATIONS—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION—SUGGESTED TRANSFER OF OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH GRANTS

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Is the minister in a position to confirm the announced intention of the Canada Council to freeze grants for established artistic organizations such as the National Ballet and, if so, will he agree to ask the council to reconsider this potentially disastrous decision?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, that issue is now before the standing committee. I think it is very important to recognize the point made by the Canada Council, that there is a limit to the extent to which the Canada Council can be viewed as the sole funding agency for established and existing arts organizations. What the director said to the committee is, I think, an important point, that the private sector's contribution to the performing arts in recent years has dropped. I am suggesting that performing arts organizations and others who support them should start looking to other places for funding as well.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that private donations are dropping off due to excessive government taxation, and in view of the fact—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: And the high cost of living.

Mr. Hellyer: —that capital grants for the construction of new buildings are useless and such buildings could become mausoleums if at the same time the government chokes off those living, breathing organizations for whose use they are intended, will the minister make representations to his colleagues to the effect that some of the Opportunities for Youth grants or other funds be made available to the Canada Council in order that it may adequately support the existing recognized institutions of greatness and new entrants and individuals as well?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I think it should be clear that we are continuing to support both for the very reasons the hon. member has mentioned. The question at issue is how fast or how rapid the rate of escalation of Canada Council funding should be in respect of established organizations as opposed to trying to respond to very new and exciting developments in the theatre such as the hon. members for Fraser Valley West and Sarnia-Lambton mentioned. What the Canada Council has said is that it wants to respond to these new organizations and will continue to fund established organizations to an extent more generous than any other level of government or the private sector, because it is aware of their importance, but that the rate of increase will not be as great.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I have one final supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked two questions and I will certainly recognize him again, but I wonder how long this very interesting cultural debate should be continued when so many members are still seeking the opportunity to ask questions. The hon. member for Trinity will be recognized for a last, living, breathing supplementary.

Mr. Hellyer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that no artistic or other organization can continue with frozen grants in current dollars with the 10 per cent inflation rate, could the minister explain what it is about the Canadian mentality which, all too often, at the very moment when Canadian organization reaches the threshold of greatness, the bureaucratic hatchet is applied in a sadisticly destructive way?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member asks a supplementary that invites the minister to make a statement which I am afraid could not be made before we reach the end of the question period.

Mr. Hellyer: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, this is absolutely fundamental. We build in Canada over a period of 25 years an organization from the grassroots that reaches the point where Canadians can be very proud of it. It can travel anywhere in the world and is recognized as being on the threshold of greatness. Why is it that someone always comes along with a hatchet?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

SUPPORT FOR BEEF PRODUCERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the continued uncertainty as to prices and returns to beef producers and the bad effect this may have on consumers and housewives in Canada, can the minister tell the House whether he has arrived at any decision or conclusion on whether he will give support to the beef producers of Canada and the form it will take? Can he tell us how soon he will make a statement.

FERTILIZER—POSSIBLE SHORTAGE OF DI-CALCIUM PHOSPHATE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In light of the fact that fertilizer ingredient suppliers can find a more financially lucrative market in the United States for the product Di-calcium phosphate and our own fertilizer industry will also be pressuring and demanding its supply, can the minister assure the fertilizer manufacturers that their important industry will not necessarily suffer from the anticipated shortage that now appears to be shaping up, which if allowed to materialize will have an immediate impact on the cost of food?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are investigating this bit of information to find out just what we can do and where we can find the product to make sure that it is made available to the producers. I cannot say any more at this time because we are still in the throes of the investigation. We only received this information last week.

COMBINES

REASON FOR FAILURE TO CHARGE DIRECTORS OF CEMENT COMPANIES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice regarding the pleas of guilty by seven cement companies in British Columbia. In view of the fact the fines were the largest ever levied under the Combines Investigation Act can the minister advise why none of the directors of the seven companies were charged?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in each case when a combines matter is looked at the question of the charging of the companies or the directors has to be considered very carefully. I will be glad to refresh my memory as to the exact analysis in this particular case and comment further to the hon. member.

ALLEGED ANNOUNCEMENT OF LIVESTOCK INSURANCE PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact the minister has just returned from my riding where the papers carried the headline, "The Undaunted Minister of Agriculture"—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hurlburt: —and in view of the fact Webster's Dictionary interprets "undaunted" as "fearless, undismayed and bold"—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Hurlburt: —I would ask the Minister of Agriculture if he would now be bold enough to inform the House about his announcement in Lethbridge of a new national livestock insurance program whereby the consumers will pay part of the risk taken by the cattlemen?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, whether or not the hon. member knows it, we pay 50 per cent of the crop insurance premiums and that includes everybody in Canada and everybody is a consumer.

Mr. Hurlburt: I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture about his new policy because I was not referring to crop insurance. I was referring to the losses taken by cattlemen in our area.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, earlier in the program today I said I would be making—

An hon. Member: What program?

An hon. Member: Early show.

Mr. Whelan: Call it program, early show or whatever you want to call it. I just recently said I hoped later today to get permission—I did not say I would get permission but was going to ask permission—to make an announcement about what we intend to do about aid to the beef producers of Canada.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—CRITERIA FOR ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration relating to earlier questions concerning Opportunities for Youth. With regard to the funding formula for manpower subregions is the number of youth registrations at Canada Manpower centres a criterion for allocation of funds for OFY and, if so, what is the weighted factor of this criterion?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I believe I set forth the formula in my letter to members. One-third of those funds are being distributed across the country through the 33 labour-management areas strictly on the basis of the population of young people between 15 and 25 years of age. The other two-thirds is to be distributed on a youth job availability index which reflects the population of youth in that age group and the availability of jobs for which they are qualified.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are reaching the end of the question period. Perhaps the Chair might recognize the hon. member for Central Nova for one question and then call orders of the day.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REGIONAL PAY DIFFERENTIALS—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO CORRECT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I will make it a very brief question to the head of the Treasury Board. Can the President of the Treasury Board say if he has any concrete action pending to reduce regional pay disparities for employees under Treasury Board jurisdiction in this country in view of the present inequitable situation?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the question appears to be based rather on a misunderstanding—

Mr. MacKay: Not misunderstanding.

Mr. Drury: I correct that. I should have said lack of knowledge. As I indicated in the House the other day, it is the policy of the government to try to achieve local parity in wages and salaries rather than parity on a national standard.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Muir: On a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will appreciate that I refused a supplementary a moment ago to the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie so that I would have a chance to allow one question by the hon. member for Central Nova. I wonder whether we might allow, rather, a point of order to be raised by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, after which I will call orders of the day.

Mr. Hargrave: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My point of order relates to the remarks made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare about DES. I would like him to know that the implant form of DES is not only available in the United States but is in active use there and that in last week's 10,000 to 11,000 head of imports from that country and in this week's probable imports of 9,000 to 10,000 it is highly probable that some implanted cattle are coming into Canada right now.

● (1220)

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I do not want to leave this statement on the record unchallenged. I want to stress that I am informed that we do not anticipate that meat or live cattle that has received DES treatment in the United States would be available for export to Canada before at least the 1st of May this year. So if the hon. member has some cases in mind, perhaps he could bring them to my attention.

Mr. Speaker: This was not a point of order but a point of debate. I am sure the hon. member appreciates this and so does the minister.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to take up the time of the House on this matter, but I rise on a question of privilege to express my displeasure at not being allowed to pursue a line of questioning which I wanted to develop. I feel that my right to speak in this House on behalf of the constituents of Athabasca has been denied. The line of questioning was one of some significance since it dealt with the matter of conflict of interest which I think is important not only to Athabasca but to the whole country, and I simply wanted to let you know that I was unhappy about it.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—SUGGESTED IMPOSITION OF SELECTIVE PRICE CONTROLS AND ROLLBACK OF UNJUSTIFIED PRICE INCREASES

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore) moved:

That this House calls on the government to consider the immediate introduction of legislation designed to control selectively the prices of essential commodities and to give either to the government or to a prices review board the power to roll back unjustifiable price increases.

He said: The purpose of this motion is to focus on two principal missing components in the government's anti-inflation policy. The first missing component is the power to rollback or prohibit unjustified price increases, and the second is to enable the selective control of prices of essential commodities. I emphasize that these are not the only components of an anti-inflation program and that there is in fact no single magic answer. But in our judgment these are the major missing components. Of course one might have dealt with such other features of an anti-inflation policy as programs leading to the extension of supply of commodities, to an exchange rate policy and to measures to protect the unsheltered in our society, those on low and fixed incomes, the unemployed, and so on.

The Canadian people recognize that some prices and costs are justifiable and reasonable and that there are other prices and costs, principally those of imports, which we cannot easily affect. But there are many prices which it is within our power to deal with, such as those of essential commodities produced or grown in Canada the price of which can be controlled without hardship to Canadians; for example, oil. Canadians will recognize as well that there are other types of price increases which are merely rip-offs, prices that are based upon the theory of charging what the traffic will bear.

Our motion this morning meets both of these problems head on and challenges this parliament seriously to deal with the fundamental problems of inflation. Has the need for rollback powers ever been more obvious than it is today? I think, for example, of the proceedings we have gone through in the last two or three weeks with respect to proposed bread price increases. We have a situation whereby the Food Prices Review Board established by this parliament asserted that only a two cent increase was justified. When the bakers said they were going to go ahead with their increase, we asked the minister what he was going to do. He waffled, he wobbled, he evaded. Of course, he had to do that because he did not have the power of rollback. I ask the government what its reaction will be if after next Wednesday's meetings of the Food Prices Review Board the bakers proceed with their previously announced intention to raise their prices to four cents, against the recommendations of that board and the better judgment of the Canadian people.

We have seen the price of beef at the retail level unresponsive to dropping prices at the farm gate. We have seen the price of steel rise and the price of sugar rise astronomically. We have seen the price of lumber and of other commodities increase because of what can be gained from seling the products abroad. I cannot say in all frankness at this moment to what extent price increases in all these commodities, and others which I might have named, are or are not justified, but I do know that in some cases the lack of justification seems clear. At a time when world demand-supply imbalances are creating substantial upward pressure on prices the temptation here in Canada to take advantage of that situation and to charge what the traffic will bear will be a great one. So will be the temptation to cash in some extra profits, to stretch margins a little further, to tack on a few cents and another few cents.

[Mr. Grier.]

We can see these few cent increases adding up over a period of time to a substantial sum of money.

Parliament's problem, the question that this House must face, is how we make sure that this temptation is resisted. I suggest we do so by empowering the government or some agency of the government to hold in reserve the explicit, unmistakable power to rollback prices and by being prepared to see that power is exercised as often and as forcefully as is necessary. We meet that problem by being ready to intervene, not indiscriminately but justly, and when increases cannot be justified, to roll them back if they have taken place, to prohibit them if they have not.

I suggest that there is among the Canadian people a mood of deep suspicion that something is wrong and that its cause is being covered up and not dealt with. Why else, they ask, would the government refuse to give itself this obvious, this commonsense power to intervene? What creates this suspicion? It is that at a time when consumer prices are going up and consumers themselves, especially the great majority who are on middle low or fixed incomes are really feeling the pinch, the business community, those from whom people buy the products and services they use, are doing very well indeed.

I want to direct the attention of the House to some profit figures. Corporate profits in 1973 were 40 per cent to 50 per cent higher than in 1972, according to a Globe and Mail study published last month, and may I mention in passing that 1972 was a very good year as well. As a percentage of the gross national product, profits rose to 12.4 per cent—their highest level since 1952. At the same time, wages and salaries as a proportion of the gross national product were down appreciably from their 1971 peak.

The same Globe and Mail study last month gave an informative breakdown of corporate profit increases in various sectors of the economy. Here are some of its findings, based on a representative sample of industry: profits in base metals went up almost 400 per cent in 1973 over 1972. Chemical companies enjoyed a profit increase in 1973 of 35 per cent. The construction and building materials sector enjoyed a profit hoist of 56 per cent, and the food processing sector a percentage increase over the last year of 50 per cent. Industrial mines showed an almost unbelievable increase of 569 per cent. Oil refining showed an increase of 42 per cent. The paper and forest products industry enjoyed a profit increase of 344 per cent. Real estate profits were up almost 100 per cent over last year. In the steel industry profits were up an average of 36 per cent, and western oils up 28 per cent. The total percentage profit increase of all companies sampled was 42 per cent in the year 1973 over 1972.

The Globe and Mail's analysis of these figures included the point that:

The strength in corporate profits continues a trend that began in the second quarter of 1971, but the pace accelerated considerably in 1973.

If we look at individual companies at random we find the following kinds of profit increase: Imperial Oil, 45 per cent; Shell Oil, 42 per cent; Gulf Oil, 58 per cent; Dome Petroleum, 83 per cent; Falconbridge Nickel, 770 per cent; International Nickel, 107 per cent; Noranda Mines, 75 per cent; Crown Zellerbach, 136 per cent; Consolidated Bathurst, 221 per cent; Domtar, 133 per cent; Great Lakes Paper Company, 375 per cent; George Weston Limited, 86 per cent; Canada Packers, 36 per cent; Dominion Dairies, 31 per cent; Dominion Stores, 30 per cent; M. Loeb, 73 per cent, and Toronto-Dominion Bank 25 per cent. The story is the same in sector after sector—for the corporations very substantial profit increases, for the Canadian people very substantial price increases. The conclusion is inevitable. Canadians must be prepared to see effective government intervention to ensure that the consumer is protected.

As well, Mr. Speaker, there have been a number of other circumstances, perhaps coincidental, although I do not think so, in recent months to deepen the suspicion of the Canadian people that there is something seriously wrong in the economy, and that it is to be found in the decision making capacity of the corporate sector.

For example, there was the Alberta Supreme Court ruling last September ordering Canada Safeway to restrict its operations and reduce its market domination in Calgary and Edmonton. There was the Prices Review Board report of last September referring to a worrying lack of competition in some sectors of the food industry. There was the fining of Browning Arms Company in Toronto last September for resale price maintenance, the fining of Dominion Stores for misleading advertising, the Food Prices Review Board's criticism of the pricing and selling practices of the bakery industry, the Globe and Mail's report of a fine of $432,000 levied by the British Columbia Supreme Court against seven cement companies in that province, including the country's largest ones, for price fixing and other violations of the Combines Investigation Act. Four cement firms are now being prosecuted in Ontario for similar offences. Price fixing charges have been laid against 74 of the best known general insurance companies operating in Canada, relating to the sale of fire insurance in Nova Scotia. Canada's three largest sugar refiners, convicted of price fixing only a few years ago, are once again before the courts on similar charges.

Is it any wonder that the Canadian people feel sceptical about this parliament's determination to deal with the problem of pricing policy and profit policy? I ask that, because against this background what has been the government's response? The government set up a Food Prices Review Board upon the recommendation of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices. But its own spokesmen on that committee would not agree to recommend that the board be given the powers of rollback, and neither would the Conservatives on the same committee. We must ask ourselves whose side are they really on?

An hon. Member: George Weston's!

Mr. Grier: So, Mr. Speaker, the Food Prices Review Board has no powers of rollback. It has no powers to enforce its recommendations. But it can, and it has recommended. And when it does recommend, as it did two weeks ago in the matter of bread price increases, the government threshes about, with the minister evading, playing for time, ducking and doing nothing, and doing nothing very unclearly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grier: Why doesn't the government act to give itself the power of rollback? Why doesn't it tell the bakers, "That is it." It is because it has not asked parliament to give it the power of rollback. And if it did, Mr. Speaker, if the government came before this House I venture to suggest it might get that power. And if it did not, then we would truly find out whose side the members of this House, in their separate parties, are really on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grier: We have repeatedly asked the government, the minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau): when are you bringing in these powers? Are you considering bringing in these powers? As I said the other day, the evasiveness of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) on this matter is a by-word in parliament. And the Prime Minister, who surely must be the chief spokesman for the government on this matter, ever since last May has also evaded the crunch. He suggested, as he did on May 8 last, that it would be the intention of the government "to take action on any reasonable proposition put forward" by the Food Prices Review Board, and "if legislation is needed in order to act as recommended," then of course the government would present it to the House. That was on May 8. We have had nothing since.

On August 13 he said to this House:

> In the event that the Board reports that significant instances of profiteering have occurred which the parties concerned are unwilling to correct voluntarily, the government will seek parliamentary authority to undertake corrective action.

On September 4, he reinforced that quasi-commitment.

On November 2, in answer to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), he said that if these people "refused to take the action that we thought was necessary for the welfare of Canadians, then we would intervene."

On February 27 the Speech from the Throne referred to the government's intention "to prevent any group or groups from taking undue advantage of the current situation at the expense of others," which is unmistakably a reference to the subject matter to which I am addressing myself this morning.

Then, on March 12, in answer to a question I posed to him, the Prime Minister again indicated his intention to come soon before parliament with a request for some kind of power. How soon, I asked him, and he again replied soon. Well, Mr. Speaker, today, Friday, is soon, surely soon enough for the Prime Minister to bring in the kind of legislation which he himself has admitted the government is considering.

It is not just a matter of the Prime Minister coming into the House some afternoon, faced with the defiance of a company refusing to roll back prices, and saying, "O.K. fellows, lets do something about it." Before the government can act it must request from parliament the power to so act. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the government has repeatedly refused to accept the logic of that position. It has refused to ask parliament to give it contingent power so that, when a case arises, it may intervene.

I remind the House that the government took precisely the kind of step I am referring to, in dealing with the energy crisis last December and in January of this year. It asked parliament to empower it through a stated mechanism to act in defence of the Canadian consumer in respect of oil prices should the case arise. And parliament gave it that power. Why not ask parliament now for similar powers?

● (1240)

Mr. Speaker, last fall I introduced in the Committee on Trends in Food Prices a motion which called upon that committee to recommend to parliament that the powers of the Food Prices Review Board be strengthened by giving it the ability to require the rollback of unwarranted price increases. I had hoped that if government members would not lend their support to this motion, at least my hon. friends in the Conservative Party would. I remind the House, Mr. Speaker, particularly in view of reports on events that took place yesterday afternoon in the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, that on that and previous occasions neither Liberals nor Conservatives on the committee would agree to recommend to the House that the government give this power to the Food Prices Review Board. Why? Notwithstanding all their spurious objections, I suggest the reason is that the Conservatives are no more anxious than members of the government to challenge the traditional right of the business community to set prices as it sees fit and to call the shots in the marketplace.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grier: All the twittering in committee and in this House will not disguise that fundamental fact.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Why don't you talk about last night in the committee?

Mr. Grier: I listened to the speeches made by members of the Conservative Party in this House to see whether they had something to offer Canadians in respect of the problem of inflation and I came to this conclusion: in the last year the principal and indeed only recommendation which distinguishes them from any other party in this House is their adherence to the notion of wages and prices control. As recently as two or three nights ago, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) was interviewed on the CBC television network about the recent increase in the Consumer Price Index, particularly with respect to food. He said "Our approach is a prices and incomes policy", which is another way of saying wage and price controls. I will be very interested, when the hon. member speaks this afternoon, to hear how such a policy is going to change the price of potatoes in Canada, the price of sugar being imported, and the price of beef, and how it is going to affect the price of food in Canada, how that policy is going to affect the well-being of the Canadian people. I am tired of listening to the empty promises of the Leader of the Opposition who says that he has the will. He may have the will but he has not got the means or the policies. All he can offer Canadians is the most discredited economic strategy now alive in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Grier.]

Mr. Grier: A strategy, I remind him, which brought the British economy to its knees, which defeated the Conservative government in that country and which has been disproven in the United States as well.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, since the proposals of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) and his party make no sense economically, I ask myself why they are so hung up on wage control. I began to get the answer this week as I listened to the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) speak on the competition bill and urge the government to apply the principles of anticombines legislation against the labour movement. I heard the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) in a private members' bill attack the principle of organized labour in Canada. I began to sense that the matter is quite simple: the Conservative Party does not like labour and is not interested in seeing the collective bargaining process take place.

An hon. Member: We don't like the abuses.

Mr. Grier: The Conservative Party is trying to persuade the Canadian people that the working man of Canada is not important. They want to control his wages and are pretending to Canadians that their discredited and misbegotten strategy is going to solve the problem of inflation. Mr. Speaker, at whatever political risk is entailed, I intend to say to Canadians—that is a bunch of nonsense.

An hon. Member: Yours is pure hypocrisy.

Mr. Grier: My hon. friends cry that I am being hypocritical. No one could know better than Conservatives the meaning of hypocrisy.

The hon. member for Don Valley has talked on a number of occasions about breaking inflationary expectations. He might better have said blunt bludgeoning of inflationary expectations. How does wage control break inflationary expectations? It would break the legitimate expectations of the Canadian people and wreck the economy.

Mr. Speaker, if you want to break inflationary expectations in this country I suggest you empower the government to intervene selectively to roll back those price increases which cannot be justified. You indicate to the business community in this country that you are serious about stepping in and protecting the consumer and at the same time you say, "Where your costs can be justified then we will not impose some unreasonable and artificial control". If the Conservative Party cannot see how that makes common sense, I beg to inform them that increasingly the Canadian people can see that it makes sense.

An hon. Member: How much more time have you got? We can only stand so much of this.

Mr. Grier: The motion before the House today does not deliberately insist that this power of rollback be necessarily invested in a Prices Review Board, although that would be our preference. Our concern is that this government or some agency of this government be empowered to act in the matter of rollback.

My hon. friends are so obsessed with titles and the names of agencies that they miss the main point. What we need is the power to intervene. The agency or mechanism which carries out the intervention is surely a secondary consideration. We want the power to intervene to roll back prices; we want the power to prohibit price increases which cannot be justified and we want those powers invested either in a department of the government or in an agency established by the government.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the government must now ask parliament for that power and not wait until the clear evidence of unjustifiability is upon us, as it may be by the middle of next week. Let us get that power now for action when necessary. I expect there is a lot of room for action.

Surely the kind of proposal I have made here today and which our party has made consistently in the last 18 months makes sense. You control selectively by stepping in and stopping those increases which cannot be justified. You use the power granted by parliament to protect consumers and the public interest. You do it fairly, not indiscriminately; you do it selectively, not across the board, but with judgment and justice. You challenge the traditional right of the business community so ably represented by my hon. friends in the Conservative and the Liberal Parties. You challenge their traditional right to call the tune; you end the markup rip-off, the profiteering; you build some fair play into the marketplace.

I wonder if my hon. friends understand the meaning of the term fair play. You say to consumers, "the government is on your side". You stop the evasive shuffling to and fro on the government benches; you end the twittering game playing in the official opposition and you get on with the job of fighting inflation in a realistic and tough way. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is the only way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) did not ask for additional time, because we would have been favourably disposed to granting it. He put forward such a favourable argument in support of our position that we would have allowed him to go on for quite a while longer.

● (1250)

It must have occurred to the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore as he spoke in support of his motion that the government holds the hon. member and his colleagues in contempt. He need only look at the government benches. Where is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray)? Should he not be here when this most important motion is being debated? Where is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner)? Where is the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)? Where is the minister's parliamentary secretary? Which government supporters are present? I see the Minister of State (Mr. Haidasz) who is responsible for multiculturalism, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) and several other government supporters. That is a clear indication of the contempt in which the government holds members of the NDP, and rightly so. They have been prostituting themselves since the beginning of this Parliament. I cannot help but think—

An hon. Member: And where do the Tories stand?

Mr. McGrath: I cannot help but think of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore as being like a first-class passenger on the Titanic.

An hon. Member: Where are the Tories?

Mr. McGrath: He is going down, but going down in style.

An hon. Member: Feeling lonely? Who supports your party?

Mr. McGrath: I can assure the hon. member that we are not lonely. We have the majority of the people of Canada supporting us.

An hon. Member: Not according to the Gallup Poll.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore talked about the motion he moved in committee; he talked about the motion moved in the Committee on Food Prices. He wondered why we did not support his motion for giving the board power to roll back prices. Mr. Speaker, he read only part of his motion. He forgot to mention, for example, that the chairman of the board was to be replaced by a new chairman. That was part of the motion.

I will tell the hon. member that we did not support his motion then, nor will we support it now, because we have no confidence in the Food Prices Review Board and no confidence in this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: If we are to give any agency the kind of delegated authority the hon. member advocates in his motion, we will only give it to an agency, to a body, in which the members of the House have confidence. I submit to you that, like the people of Canada, the majority of members in this House, including the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore if he were honest with himself, do not have confidence in the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board or in the board itself.

Not only did the NDP move a motion in committee in November calling for the head of Mrs. Plumptre; the leader of that party last week, in a speech in Toronto, again called for Mrs. Plumptre's resignation. In addition, he called for the resignation of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray).

Mr. Hellyer: The party is totally inconsistent.

Mr. McGrath: In order to accommodate the leader of the NDP and the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, my colleagues and I in the opposition yesterday put forward a motion in the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee whereby we would reduce the salary of the Chairman of the Food Prices Review Board to $1. Where was the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore and where were his colleagues when that motion was put forward? They were where they always are, supporting this government. So, they come into this House and speak with forked tongues, and then wonder why we cannot support their motion.

Mr. Hellyer: They are hiding in the closet with the skeletons.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore rising on a point of order.

Mr. Grier: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member, through you, if he will permit a question at this time.

Mr. Speaker: That is hardly a point of order. Perhaps the hon. member for St. John's East might be allowed to continue his speech.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I will gladly permit the hon. member's question, if he will permit me to call it one o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: This procedure is unusual. I do not see how the hon. member can ask his question if we call it one o'clock. I shall inquire if hon. members wish to call it one o'clock.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At 12.58 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to be able to give up the floor to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who, I understand, will be making a statement later today.

Mr. Baldwin: He has to check it out with the NDP first.

Mr. McGrath: We look forward to that statement. Obviously, as my colleague said, he has to have it checked out first with the junior member of the coalition.

When the House rose for the luncheon recess, I was replying to the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore pointing out to him the weaknesses in his motion and why we feel we cannot support that motion in its present form. That is not to say we are not prepared to support any reasonable motion the New Democratic Party has to bring before this House. We realize the situation is urgent. We also realize this government has to be prodded into action before it will take steps to provide the kind of remedy necessary to cope with the very serious crisis facing this country today.

Let us take a look at the record. In the last session, the government opened parliament with this reference in the Speech from the Throne. This was in 1973. I quote:

> While food prices in Canada have steadied slightly in the last month or so, the Government is concerned about possible future effects of the world-wide trend toward higher food prices and will propose the setting up of a Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to make a special study of this problem.

A year has passed. That special study was undertaken by the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen). Time will not permit me to repeat the recommendations made by that committee in its three reports, but I think it should be pointed out that, in the main, the recommendations of that committee stand ignored. For example, the first recommendation in the first report called for special legislation setting up a Food Prices Review Board. Special legislation, given the make-up of this parliament, would have meant the House would have had some input into the terms of reference of the Food Prices Review Board. I submit we would have had today a meaningful review board with adequate terms of reference and adequate powers to deal with the problem facing the country today. Instead, the government ignored that part of the report, circumvented parliament and set up the board we now have under the authority of the Inquiries Act. The result is that the board, with all its imperfections, has no minister to whom to report. It does not report to this House; its reports are made public. Consequently, this House has no opportunity to comment on the reports, to study the reports or to call upon the board to explain its reports unless, of course, the government brings in a reference to the appropriate committee.

I should add that to cope with that situation we recommended in our last report, the third and final report of the food prices committee, realizing that as a special committee we would die with the end of the session, that the government immediately set up a standing committee on consumer affairs. We made that recommendation in order to ensure that there would be a standing committee of this House set up for the purpose of dealing with the subject matter of the hon. member's motion. More particularly we would have a standing committee of the House to which the reports of the Food Prices Review Board could be referred.

It is rather interesting that just a few days ago I asked the government House leader when he proposed implementing that final recommendation of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices, but the response that I received, Mr. Speaker, was anything but encouraging. As a matter of fact, the minister made it very clear that, in his opinion, there are already too many standing committees of the House, and he implied that for this reason he did not see how it could be practical to set up another standing committee. So now we have to carry on by having matters relating to the Food Prices Review Board either referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates or to one of the omnibus standing committees, such as the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. I submit that this is just not good enough.

As for the other recommendations of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices, as I say, time will not permit me to list them all. However, we did recommend, for example, a school lunch program, a two-price system, and that the government get on with a special study of a food policy for Canada. All of the recommendations of the committee, with one or two minor exceptions—and these are mainly recommendations dealing with consumer education—stand ignored.

Since that committee was set up, commencing with the reference in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of this 29th parliament, I believe the committee held 35 sittings, heard a vast number of witnesses from all segments of the industry, and was one of the hardest working committees I have ever been associated with in my experience in this House. All members of that committee from all parties took their duties seriously and worked very hard. Whilst we did not always agree, we always tried to arrive at a consensus, especially so far as our reports were concerned.

The only time we differed from that point of view and were not part of a consensus was in the presentation of the first report and the recommendation dealing with the Food Prices Review Board. We felt that that recommendation was not adequate. We felt then, and subsequent events have confirmed us in our view, that you cannot examine food prices in isolation. Let me tell my hon. friends that you cannot examine food prices and ignore the cost of labour. You cannot examine food prices and ignore the cost of shelter. You cannot examine food prices and ignore the cost of transportation. We know what happened in the area of transportation as a result of the so-called energy crisis and the increase in the price of diesel oil. So we differed with the committee in that one instance; but all of the other recommendations, and I think there were six in the first report, were unanimously approved by the committee.

So far as the second report was concerned, the second recommendation of the committee in that report—and this is unprecedented in my recollection—asked the government to get on with implementing the recommendations made in the first report. As I say, that has to be unprecedented. That should have been the last recommendation of our third and final report, namely that because of the seriousness of the situation we ask the government to get on with implementing all of the recommendations of the committee.

Since that time, Mr. Speaker, let us just see what has happened. Bread has increased by 22.5 per cent, meat by 21.7 per cent, beef by 25.2 per cent, poultry by 34.5 per cent, fish by 33.7 per cent, eggs by 26.2 per cent, and sugar by 71.6 per cent. That is what has happened since the government expressed its concern a year ago and announced that it was setting up a Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices.

The food prices committee is now gone: enter the Food Prices Review Board and the studies made by that board. Notwithstanding the limitations of the board, and notwithstanding all of its weaknesses and imperfections, the board has made somc very worth-while recommendations. We saw, for example, the report dealing with egg prices. That report made some very serious charges, especially in light of the fact that the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency and the egg marketing boards under its jurisdiction operate under federal government licence. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) has washed his hands of it and has passed the buck to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), who in turn passed it to another agency, a farm products agency, and asked that agency to examine the charges made by the Food Prices Review Board. As I said in committee yesterday, that is like asking Henry Ford to examine automobile prices.

So far as the recommendation dealing with bread is concerned, last summer and in September the government brought in its subsidies on milk and bread. We were told at that time that there would be no further increases, that this would hold the line. We are now told that in addition to the three cents increase in the price of a loaf of bread just recently announced, milk is going to increase further in price. What happens to the government's subsidy program? Does it react with another ad hoc subsidy? Is the Minister of Agriculture going to get his feet wet today when he makes his statement and provides the House with another band-aid approach, another form of ad hoc subsidy, while the main problem goes ignored? I suspect that is precisely what he is going to do.

Let us now take a look at the Speech from the Throne in which the government announced that it would bring in a new food policy based upon three objectives: An adequate and dependable supply; reasonable prices for consumers and producers; and a continuous supply of export foodstuffs. All of those were recommended within a year by the food prices committee. What I want to know is when the government is going to be seized of the urgency of this situation. When is it going to be conscious of the hardship this imposes on the majority of the wage earners of this country who see their savings being eroded, daily, weekly and monthly by an annual rate of inflation which is now in excess of 10 per cent? The people of this country will not tolerate that kind of situation. This government, if it persists in ignoring the warning signals which are there, will do so at its peril.

I say to the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, and his friends in the labour movement who are very much aware about what I am talking about, all one has to do is look at what is happening to average weekly earnings. The latest figures released by Statistics Canada indicate a progressively deteriorating situation. The average Canadian worker was earning a wage in the month of December that was approximately $5 less than the month before and only 5.9 per cent higher than in December 1972. When that is compared to the cost of living increase over the same period of 9.1 per cent, it is indeed obvious that whatever the workingman had managed in salary increases has been more than eroded by inflation. Is there any wonder there is labour unrest in this country today? The blame for a great deal of that labour unrest has to fall on the shoulders of not only this government but its junior partner in coalition, the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr) to ask a question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Price Control

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the hon. member whether he knows that the fishermen in the Atlantic provinces were receiving 5 cents a pound for cod last spring and that they were receiving 15 cents a pound at the end of November, 1973? In view of that, is the hon. member favourable to a price freeze of 10 cents per pound to the fishermen for cod in the Atlantic area this year?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has asked me that question as it gives me the opportunity of saying that I agree with him that the price of fish to fishermen has gone up to 15 cents a pound, but the hon. member knows full well that the price to the processor has gone from 29 cents a pound to 70 cents a pound on the United States market. Who is getting a rakeoff in the fishing industry? Obviously, it is not the fishermen off the Gaspé coast and in the four Atlantic provinces who are receiving that increase, yet they are suffering as a result of the highest cost of living in the whole country.

Mr. Baldwin: Aren't you sorry you asked the question?

Mr. Alexander: Ask another one.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit me a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I would also point out to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. De Bané) that the time allotted to the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has expired. If he wishes to ask a question, he too will have to get the unanimous consent of the House.

[English]

The hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) wishes to ask a question. He can only do so with unanimous consent. Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) how he reconciles his last statement that the processors are making great profit with the statement last week by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, Senator Flynn, who said that the government should endeavour to make sure that companies make still more profit? Just who is speaking on behalf of the opposition party?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member did not read closely the remarks of Senator Flynn, as he was talking about companies in general. Even Senator Flynn and the hon. gentleman would concede that corporations involved in food processing in this country have enjoyed considerable increases in profits, and this applies particularly to the fish processors in the Atlantic provinces which have been making a lot of money on the U.S. market. All I can say to the hon. member, as I said to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr), is that this money is not going to the fishermen.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUBSIDY PROGRAM FOR BEEF PRODUCERS

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated this morning, I should now like to request the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions for the purpose of making an announcement regarding assistance to beef producers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The House has heard the request of the hon. minister. Does it give unanimous consent to revert to motions for the purpose of making a statement.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, as hon. members are aware, Canadian cattlemen are facing a very difficult situation at the present time. Very simply, the problem is this: They have bought feeder cattle at very high prices, paid high prices for grain and other necessary inputs, and then have seen in the last few weeks a flood of United States cattle coming in, depressing the market and lowering their returns.

At current prices, cattle feeders are losing from $50 to $100 a head on each animal marketed. Canadian cattlemen need to be assisted in this difficult period if we are to have a viable beef industry in this country.

This government recognizes the importance of a viable agricultural industry to the country as a whole. In the throne speech it was made clear that a strong agriculture industry will assure consumers of a continuous supply of high quality food at reasonable prices. To maintain a strong agriculture industry, farmers must be assured of fair returns, returns which equate to the cost of production, plus a reasonable margin for labour and invested capital.

I am therefore announcing a program to assist Canadian beef producers. The federal government will pay a premium of 7 cents per pound live weight on all Canadian cattle for Canadian consumption, grading A1 or A2, retroactive to March 4. The 7-cent premium will also be paid on all A3 cattle slaughtered between March 18 and April 13 inclusive, and on all A4 cattle slaughtered between March 18 and April 6 inclusive.

Premium payments will be made to producers by processors who will then be reimbursed by the federal government. Retroactive payments will be made directly to producers by the Agricultural Stabilization Board on receipt of claims from producers.

This premium program is being instituted to meet four objectives: One, to assure top quality beef for the consumer; two, to prevent the price of beef to the consumer from rising; three, to tide cattlemen over a disastrous period where many would be bankrupted in the squeeze between higher cost of production and lower returns from the market; and four, to ensure a continuing supply of beef to the Canadian consumer, both now and in the future.

It should be emphasized that consumer prices will not be adversely affected as a result of the government's premium program. The premium program will be terminated when there is a return to a better and more stable market for cattle.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the fact that a copy of the announcement by the minister has just been delivered to me, in view of the remarks and comments I have made over the last two weeks about the cattle situation I think it most appropriate that I respond at this time.

The 7-cent subsidy, and I think that is a much more realistic term than "premium", is the main thrust of the minister's announcement. Cattle feeders have suffered tremendous losses, beginning early last fall and continuing over the year end; they are still losing money. I should like to point out that the Canadian Cattlemen's Association did not suggest or ask last week for this subsidy approach in its presentation to the government. They did not make this suggestion because it would do nothing to stop or even slow down the massive flow of United States feed cattle into Canada. Last week there were some 10,000 to 11,000 head imported into Canada. The indications this week are that there will be about 1,000 less, somewhere between 9,000 and 10,000.

I suggest very sincerely that the announcement of this subsidy will be greeted with mixed feelings in the cattle industry across Canada this afternoon. Those who have sustained substantial losses, and are still sustaining them, will feel one way about it. That is pretty obvious. Those involved in the cattle-calf grass side of the operation, which is really the major or total, if you like, operation, are more inclined to take the longer view and want no part of this kind of subsidy approach. This announcement will do nothing to restore confidence in the total Canadian cattle industry which is so necessary at this time. I suggest even with this week's market upturn of about $2. to $3. in western Canada, and a little less in eastern Canada, the producers of beef cattle who are finishing them in the feedlots today are still $10 per hundredweight or 10 cents a pound below their minimum costs of gain. I know the minister is aware of this.

I think it is regrettable that the cattlemen's proposal for the longer term was not at least commented upon in a meaningful way in the minister's statement. I think it was a very reasonable and workable proposal. The cattlemen themselves had a tremendous amount of input from all over Canada in respect of this aspect of it. Admittedly, there is a longer term, but that is what we need in the industry. I wish to read a telegram delivered to my desk minutes before I came into the House this afternoon. It is from the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities. I believe the minister spoke at their meeting the day before yesterday. It reads as follows:

At a convention of the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities in Regina this week the following resolution was passed:

Whereas the cattle industry is recognized as a very important part of our agriculture economy and whereas the livestock feeders of Canada are in a very grave financial position and whereas the large importation of US fat cattle at this time is very depressing to our Canadian prices therefore be it resolved that as a means of alleviating the present situation that we support the Canadian Cattlemens Association, the United Grain Growers, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and other provincial organizations in their efforts to attain an immediate escalating tariff on beef cattle based upon reciprocal quotas with the United States.

This is signed by Mr. C. F. Mitchell, President of the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities. I am told that there were some 1,600 people in attendance at that meeting. This telegram was addressed to me, personally.

I suggest it is long-term policy for beef and cattle that will determine if retail beef prices are to be relatively cheap. I stress the word "relatively". The days of cheap food are long gone. The answer to relatively cheap food, and especially beef, is increased world production. But that increased production must recognize that farmers, including cattlemen, are entitled to reasonable profits. The alternative is decreased production combined with increasing imports and resulting higher beef prices. Once again we have the situation of a serious producer price drop and very little if any corresponding drop at the retail-consumer level. This is an old situation I know, but it is a most frustrating situation and is difficult for producers and cattlemen to understand when they are selling at the time of a downward trend in the market and do not see that price trend transferred reasonably quickly to the retail level. Surely this situation merits appropriate government action. This announcement is a stop-gap measure that will cost millions, I am sure, but really does not deal with the long-term cattle situation.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, whether or not the minister's announcement will stop the phone calls from Saskatchewan to Ottawa, we will know in a day or so. His announcement, in effect, is a short-term policy obviously designed as a bail-out policy to deal with the situation. It is the government's method of dealing with the situation as it sees it, but I believe its application will be limited. There is no floor. The seven cents will be in addition to whatever the market price may be the day the cattle are taken to market. I would judge by the fact that the minister is encouraging the A3 and A4 type of cattle that they will come to market and get the premium while it is still there, and that he hopes to get an increased amount of cattle from the feedlots to slaughter. The minister agrees. Whether or not this plan will work in the interest of the consumers remains to be seen.

I believe we need a stable industry. I think farmers who are in the business of raising feed cattle want to know what the return will be. They would like to know how long the program announced in this statement is to last. If they do not know how long it is to last, they may very well bring unfinished cattle to the market. They do not know whether or not there is a floor price. Obviously—and I repeat this because I think it should be repeated—this is a short-term program. I cannot particularly call into question, and do not wish to call into question the fact that the minister is using a deficiency payment or subsidy approach instead of a tariff approach. In the area I represent there are a great many ranchers and farmers who have to sell their feeder cattle across the border in the United States. We have a very large hog operation and the United States is a very considerable part of the market for that finished pork as well as live cattle. Unless there are negotiations with the United States and they agree to a tariff, I would not be in favour of imposing one. I say this frankly in the House. I am not prepared to say, however, in respect of the long-term.

The North American exchange of cattle and hogs is endangered. Even in the past few weeks an objection has been raised against the surcharge which the government put into effect for a period of time. I want to say again, and this disturbs me, that an impromptu and ad hoc approach, particularly to the cattle end of the farming business, has characterized this government in the last few months. First, they imposed a surcharge and then an embargo. The surcharge was removed and a temporary program set up. I agree that under these circumstances the government might need breathing space or time, but I really urge the Minister of Agriculture and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to say what is the program for support prices for cattle and hogs. I urge them to cease jockeying about with the feed grain policy because the farmers out there want to know what it is and if it is going to affect their production. If they do now know, it will also affect consumer prices.

● (1440)

I do not believe the consumer thinks he is getting cheap food. It may be the opinion of some other people, but the answers to the questionnaires which I sent out last week have revealed that people in Saskatoon do not think they are getting cheap food and the farmers know they are in a bind. They want a policy with some continuity, and this is the point to which I think the government should address themselves forthwith.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I have first returned from a tour of my constituency during which I visited 22 of the 27 rural parishes. Farmers are now deeply distressed. They are exchanging a dollar for four quarters and sometimes they only get three. They have to tackle the exorbitant cost of feed grain while consumers must face the exorbitant cost of food for their family.

The minister is proposing a subsidy of 7 cents a pound to beef producers. It is quite obvious that this action will not control the cost of living increase and that the consumers will still be paying increasingly higher prices for their food.

The minister is even taking the precaution of saying: I emphasize the fact that prices to the consumers will not be adversely affected. What he means is that even if he gives a subsidy of 7 cents to producers, prices will not increase proportionately. It would be paradoxical if producers were subsidized while consumers would have to pay more for their supplies.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, we will have to begin very soon to think about the consumers. We think about the producers and prices keep rising. We will soon have to subsidize the consumers because they will no longer be able to supply themselves.

We Social Crediters often say: We must think about people before thinking about animals. One of these days, the government will have to consider that and come to the conclusion that for the well-being of the people, we must call on the people.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF BRIEF ON SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY SUBMITTED TO UNITED STATES FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, while we are on motions, may I have the permission of the House to table in both official languages, a copy of a government brief on the Skagit River Valley submitted to the U.S. federal power commission through the U.S. state department on March 14. It had been my intention to table this on Monday, but since the United States has already released the text I thought I should table it now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Since the House has given unanimous consent to reverting to motions for one specific purpose, namely, to allow the Minister of Agriculture to make a statement, I am sure hon. members would agree to extending that unanimous consent to the Secretary of State for External Affairs to allow him to table the document to which he referred. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It is so tabled. The House will now revert to the consideration of supply.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—SUGGESTED IMPOSITION OF SELECTED PRICE CONTROLS AND ROLLBACK OF UNJUSTIFIED PRICE INCREASES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Grier:

That this House calls on the government to consider the immediate introduction of legislation dessigned to control selectively the prices of essential commodities and to give either to the government or to a prices review board the power to roll back unjustifiable price increases.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate rather unexpectedly. I am sure it is unexpected to the House and it is unexpected to me, but because of the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) I have been asked in my capacity as Acting Minister of Finance, to respond to the motion put forward by the spokesman for the NDP. I also speak as a former minister of finance and, if I may add, as the reincarnation of a civil servant which I was and at which time I was intimately involved in wartime price and wage controls. That experience taught me some things about price and wage controls that I would like to speak about.

It taught me certain unforgettable lessons about the kind of conditions that are necessary for the successful application of any form of wage and price controls. The two criteria that are of the utmost importance, if there is to be a successful price and wage control, are simplicity and a high degree of approval from the public generally. During wartime when we had an over-all system of wage and price controls every housewife was an enforcement officer. The reason for this was that all that she had to report was whether any price had gone up because by definition under the system of wartime price and wage controls any increase in price was illegal, so that all that a housewife had to do was to report to the local officer of the wartime trade board that someone had broken the price ceiling.

The second factor was strong public support, in other words, the whole of the country was behind the government in its war effort and therefore supported without any qualification the efforts that were made to take any inflationary element out of the wartime situation. Any other efforts that have been made in peacetime to apply over-all price and wage controls on any other basis than that of imposing a ceiling have more or less failed, some of them dismally, some of them comparatively. Indeed, the world is littered with the debris of wage and price controls that did not work.

There are many things in the world that have not worked, and it is not surprising that wage and price controls should not have worked in some cases, indeed in all cases. Perhaps you might say the effort was worth making, but regrettably the efforts made to apply wage and price controls in peacetime have more than failed. Invariably they have been counterproductive. They have not only failed to stem the increases in costs and prices but they have been counterproductive in the sense that they have reduced production.

We have had two recent examples of efforts to apply over-all price and wage controls, one in the United States and one in the United Kingdom. We in Canada have experienced the results of the efforts to apply price controls on farm produce in the United States. We have not yet quite overcome the damage caused by these abortive attempts which resulted in the liquidation of cattle. Only today we listened to my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), announcing one of the measures we have had to take, which traces its origin back to the abortive attempts made to try to control artificially the prices of cattle and meat.

If we look at the United Kingdom we see a different phenomenon there. We see an attempt to apply controls to wages that resulted in a tremendous over-all reduction in production. Indeed, a government collapsed over an effort to put into effect a system of wage controls that did not have the universal kind of acceptance that is necessary if these kinds of controls are to work. To my friends in the Progressive Conservative party I hope this is a lesson about what happens when efforts are made to try to apply this kind of system in peacetime.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said previously when talking about this matter, and I quote from page 36 of Hansard for February 28:

> It is less than honest to dwell expansively on the pleasant prospect of fixed consumer prices, while at the same time diverting attention from the not so pleasant prospect of fixed incomes. It is less than honest not to tell the public that wage controls have their own set of injustices, that they apply most inflexibly to blue-collar workers whose pay can be easily monitored, and most flexibly to white-collar workers who can be given a salary increase under the guise of an artificial job reclassification.

Surely, the lesson we can learn from Britain is what happens when there are groups of people who believe this, whether it is true or not, and it underlines the point I have made that only a system that has widespread, indeed virtually universal support, has any chance of being successful. Yet the Official Opposition continue to advocate a system of over-all controls.

Of course, they put in qualifications. When difficulties are pointed out to them they then begin to make their qualifications. So that one is not quite certain what the views of the Official Opposition really are on this question.

It reminds me of an onion. You keep peeling away at the onion. You take off skin after skin, and finally there is nothing there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: Like in the next election.

Mr. Sharp: Except, Mr. Speaker, that if you sit on the other side you have tears in your eyes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Who writes your stuff, Mitch?

Mr. Sharp: I regret to say I did not have a speech prepared for me, and so I have to make one of my own today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: You are much better at pianos than jokes.

Mr. Sharp: The resolution before the House comes from a party that, like the government, has rejected the concept of over-all wage and price controls. It calls on the government:

> —to consider the immediate introduction of legislation designed to control selectively the prices of essential commodities and to give either to the Government or to a Prices Review Board the power to roll back unjustifiable price increases.

This is a different proposition and one that is more difficult to deal with in the way in which I have dealt with over-all wage and price controls because its terms are not very well defined. This is a system that is not defined in any way. It refers to selective controls. We are told what those are to be. We are not told what the essential commodities are, but somebody is to be given power to deal with them. I would like to address myself to this particular proposition.

As I say, this proposition is different from an over-all system of wage and price controls. However, it does have some weaknesses that I would like to point out to my hon. friends on the other side of the House, to those on the far right so far as I am concerned. The first point I would make is that selective controls of this kind are bound to be arbitrary. They are bound to have a selective effect which may not be acceptable.

Selective controls are likely to single out particular groups for government action, and to leave others untouched. That is fine in theory, but the trouble is that it leads the government into a general program because every group in the community wants someone else to be the target of government action. Therefore it is very difficult to keep selective controls really selective. In due course one is drawn into a general program, and into exactly the weaknesses I have outlined in connection with over-all wage and price controls.

The second point is one of general application which relates not only to selective controls but also to over-all controls. It is the problem of anticipation. To bring forward measures of a general character, and they would have to be general to give the government power to impose price controls on anything, would cause anticipation. The same would apply to any measure brought in to impose over-all wage and price controls. All of the people selling goods in the country would be inclined to say, "Let us get our increases put into effect before the government takes these measures."

It could be argued that it would be necessary to give power to roll prices back, but if there was a general anticipation it would be impossible to roll everything back. Rolling back is possible only in selective cases.

Then we have another problem in selective price controls arising out of the nature of Canadian industry, namely, our tremendous dependence upon trade. Suppose the government or the Prices Review Board were to decide to impose selective controls on a particular kind of product, where it was alleged there was gouging, rip-off, or what-have-you, what would one do if a high proportion of such goods were moving in international trade? One would be forced, from putting on selective price controls, into selective export controls. In other words, in order to keep Canadians supplied with goods at any price, one would have to put on export controls to prevent all goods from leaving the country to get the higher prices available abroad. This is in the nature of selective controls; indeed, it is in the nature of over-all wage and price controls. In a country like Canada, with such a high proportion of income coming from trade, one is bound to follow price and wage controls by export controls, subsidies on imports, taxes on exports—the whole structure.

● (1500)

I say to my friends on the other side of the chamber that what appears to be a very simple selective plan, but would lead us, in my judgment, very rapidly into the kind of widespread controls that should be avoided if we are going to be able to deal with the inflationary situation that now faces the world. I should like to revert to that subject for a moment, Mr. Speaker. This is one of the few times in the world's history when we have had universal inflation.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Most of the great inflations in the past have been in particular countries. We think about German inflation, Brazilian inflation, Peruvian or Chilean inflation, but this is one of the few times in the history of the world when we have had universal inflation.

Mr. Hellyer: You don't understand it.

Mr. Sharp: We understand it very well and that is why we do not have pat answers like price control. We must deal with what is the underlying cause of our problem today. I will not go into the details of it as I think they are well known. Let us look at the food situation in the world. It is not going to be overcome or controlled in Canada. This is a problem of worldwide dimensions. Indeed, we may be on the verge of the most serious food problem the world has ever seen. I say this, not to justify the fact that we are not going in for price and wage controls or selective controls of the kind advocated by the other side but because there is only one answer to this problem: that is to increase production. This is what is needed in the world, whether in food, fuel, clothing or what-have-you.

The whole emphasis of government policy throughout the world must be upon increasing supply. Therefore, I say to my hon. friends opposite, not that their ideas do not have some merit but that those ideas are counterproductive in terms of what needs to be done in the world today. That is why the government does not accept the resolution before us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What will you say when you do it?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, the NDP motion once more throws the light on the whole problem of the high cost of living and aims at making a suggestion to find a solution.

The motion states and I quote:

> That this House calls on the Government to consider the immediate introduction of legislation designed to control selectively the prices of essential commodities and to give either to the Government or to a Prices Review Board the power to roll back unjustifiable price increases.

By moving such a motion, we are taking the well-being of the people into consideration. Anyone who comes in contact with the population, with reality, readily notices that inflation is beginning to hurt many Canadians.

Talk about shortages here and there if you want, but people do not believe a word of it. For instance, it is getting to be a joke to say there is an oil shortage in Canada. People are scoffed at but they do not fall into the trap as easily as the government would hope.

There are enough oil reserves in Canada not only for Canadian consumption but for that of a great part of the world. We are told that oil production reaches not more than a third of its capacity and that was true even before the discovery of the oil sands in northern Alberta and northern Saskatchewan. Surely price hikes are not due to shortages.

In that regard, without having to freeze prices, the government should at least review or rather incentively control prices. I say incentively, Mr. Speaker, because I find it a less socialistic and more realistic term.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why not!

Mr. Boisvert: Through the implementation of incentives, we neither force private enterprise to act, nor do we choke it. I know an individual in my riding who wanted to erect a two-story building which required a steel structure. So his architect and his contractor took the necessary steps to find the steel and materials required for the structure. That was estimated at $37,000. But he was told that there was no steel left, as if the Iron Ore Company had shut down. He was therefore told that there was no steel left. He had to find another source and change his plan to build a one-story building. Instead of paying $37,000 for a two-story building, he now has to pay $57,000 for one story. This is one of the reasons why a price control system should be based on incentives.

It is like in some other areas. We know that the price of paint has risen by 30 per cent most recently. Those who wanted to buy paint in large quantity before Christmas and New Year's had to use all their pull to get it. That is understandable enough. If an individual has one million gallons of paint in his warehouse and he increases his price by $3 a gallon, he makes a profit of $3 million. That is exactly what is happening. When one sees in supermarkets bags of potatoes selling at $6 a bag one realizes that there is a monopoly involved, that the government is unconcerned and indifferent about it.

An individual manufacturing aluminum posts as we see along highways told me recently that he is now forced to refuse contracts not because his customers do not have money to pay for them but because he is short of aluminum. Just imagine, Canada is one of the major producers of aluminum and there is a shortage of aluminum.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) just suggested that inflation is a world-wide phenomenon. In a certain way he is washing his hands of the whole mess; it is not our fault, we are not guilty of anything, we are not there to administer, we have nothing to say in that matter, things would be the same without us.

That somewhat reminds me of the fellow whose house catches fire and who says, I am no fireman, I do not touch anything. I will wait for the fire department to get here.

What would you say about a fellow like that? One would be somewhat justified in saying that this government is somewhat acting in the same way when it says, we cannot grapple with inflation, that is none of our business. That is the business of African countries and probably those countries to which we make interest-free loans of hundreds of millions of dollars for 50-year periods.

So this government must open its eyes, stop thinking about its election funds, its fund raisers, and it must find solutions interesting not for the party but for those it is supposed to govern. When I say "those it is supposed to govern," I mean the people of this country, not fund raisers. This government will have to come up with a system to help consumers. I harp on this and I will time and time again, the consumers are first and foremost the taxpayers, and they are the ones faced with that plight that is inflation. We will have to stop subsidizing producers, middlemen, etc., and think about the people of this country. In a country such as Canada with so much wealth and so few inhabitants, it is not normal for our people to be as struck as they are now. With a population of nearly 20 million people, Canada may be one of the richest countries in the world, but its population is also one of the most heavily indebted in the world and its standard of living one of the most difficult to catch up with. Then, there must be something wrong with that. The government must act to prevent monopolies from replacing democracy. What I am suggesting is that this is exactly what is taking place in Canada today. Monopolies and high finance are replacing democracy in Canada.

When the government's financial and economic policy no longer reflects special interests, but the production and wealth of Canada, no longer will there be problems of such magnitude for us to face. Concerning the motion introduced by the New Democratic Party, I feel that it is good up to a point, but I do not like the word "selectively" which smacks too much of socialism.

The motion states, and I quote:

> ... give ... to a Prices Review Board the power to roll back unjustifiable price increases.

I am also in agreement with that part of the motion.

An hon. Member: I am not.

Mr. Boisvert: There is a member of the New Democratic Party who does not agree. I do not understand this.

I agree with that part of the motion because the board is now a very bad joke.

An hon. Member: What you are saying is also very bad!

Mr. Boisvert: It must be interesting since you are listening.

This is a board created to serve as a front, to stop the people from complaining too much. Its purpose is to give an excuse when it is difficult to find something to say. This is the type of board that this government is giving us: a board created simply to allow the government to stay in the background, to wash its hands of problems as the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) said in his speech a few moments ago.

● (1510)

[English]

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have this opportunity to participate in this debate and I congratulate the members of the NDP for bringing forward this matter at this time. I am particularly pleased that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) spoke on behalf of the government, because we now have an idea why the government is doing nothing about inflation in Canada. Anyone who says, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, that an incomes policy today would have the same effect as the wartime prices and trade board had previously has misunderstood completely what has happened in the last 25 years and what a contemporary incomes policy is all about.

We have been amazed that last year the government permitted an 8 per cent inflation rate to grip this country and has permitted an inflation of 10 per cent to continue for this year and done nothing about it. Now we know why. The government is still looking at the situation of 25 years ago and has learned nothing. The government still believes that the proper economic policy for Canada involves the old continentalist approach it has followed for years. The fact of the matter is that since the days of C. D. Howe and Robert Winters, the economic policy of the government party has been determined by the way it perceived the interests of the Canadian business community and a continentalist philosophy.

It was made clear today that the Liberal Party has had no new ideas in terms of resource policy, ownership policy, competition policy and industrial structure. The government is rejecting any new approach to the fight against inflation because it is still looking back at what happened 30 years ago during the war.

The minister said that the answer to inflation will be found by increasing supplies around the world. He was quite correct. No one disputes that, but it is not the issue. We know that you must increase supply in order to solve the inflation problem and bring supply and demand back into equilibrium. The question is, what do you do during the next one, two or three years to ameliorate some of the inflationary effects which will be felt by people while supply and demand are brought back into balance? I do not for a moment accept the proposition that we must continue with a 10 per cent or 12 per cent inflation rate during this period. There must be policies which are utilized in the short run as well as in the long run because, as Lord Keynes said, in the long run we are all dead. But the question is: How are we to help Canadians who are suffering under the impact of a 10 per cent inflation rate now?

The Secretary of State for External Affairs quoted the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—I forget the exact words used—and said it would be less than honest to support a policy which locks people into the low income brackets, as an incomes policy might do. Let me say that it is even more dishonest for a government to permit inflation to continue at the present scale and destroy the savings and incomes of people in the middle and low income groups. I ask my friends in the NDP: How can you support the government when statistics show so clearly that last year the rise in average hourly earnings was substantially less than the increase in the cost of living? Arguing that you should not adopt an incomes policy because it would hurt low income groups is to fly in the face of reality and to ignore what is happening.

I cannot understand why the NDP has been able to support the government when it has seen that the government will do nothing to fight inflation in this country and when everybody in the country knows that inflation is our number one problem. However, I am pleased that the party has come at least halfway. By introducing the motion we are debating, it has made clear to the people of Canada that at long last it is interested in the problem of inflation and in doing something about the increase in the cost of living. I am particularly pleased to hear that party now say that it does not agree with the analysis of the government, namely, that we cannot do anything about inflation in Canada because it all comes from abroad. One year ago we hoped for the support of the NDP on a policy not totally removed from half the policy they are recommending today. They would not support us then.

● (1520)

If the New Democratic Party had supported us a year ago last February when we came forward with our policy, it might now be in effect. If this had happened, what would be the inflationary rate in the nation today? It would certainly be less. No one can say with certainty how much less, but we would not be in the situation where we are at the present time, with 10 per cent inflation. I cannot understand why it has taken them so long to come around. All I can think is that the NDP must have believed the analysis put forward by the government that we cannot do anything about inflation in Canada. I do not know what changed their minds. I hope we do not hear any more speeches from the NDP indicating we cannot do anything about inflation in Canada because it all comes from abroad.

An hon. Member: You have not heard one yet.

Mr. Gillies: The fact is we now know that our friends in the NDP accept our analysis that you can do something about inflation in Canada if you have the will. I hope they will support us in programs that will be effective. If they had had the courage to do so a year ago, we might have a different situation in Canada today. Why did they have to wait for a year? Do we have to wait for another year before they really care enough to do something about inflation in this country?

The statistics are very clear. Two-thirds of the increase in the cost of living is in housing and food products. These are areas we can do something about. To argue that all inflation comes from abroad, and you cannot do anything about it in Canada, is ridiculous. You can do something about it if you have the will and really want to help the Canadian people. My own view is that inflation could get worse in this country. Actually, we in Canada have not felt all the pressure of the increase in oil prices as has been felt in Japan, Britain and other places around the world. As soon as that comes into the economy, prices will go up again. The wholesale price index went up 24 per cent last year—2.5 per cent in January. Inflation will get worse in this country. And are the NDP still going to say there is nothing we can do about it?

The fundamental point is that we have to recognize that monetary, fiscal and exchange rate policies, in the traditional sense, something we have always relied on in the past, will no longer check inflation. Such policies are designed to operate in economies that are perfectly competitive and with normal expectation rates. However, these two conditions are not present at the moment in Canada. I am sure hon. members will agree that no one thinks expectations in the economy are now normal. The price of gold is moving toward $200 an ounce. Why? Because of inflationary expectations and speculation. The price of housing in Toronto increased by 22 per cent last year, most of it because of inflationary expectations and speculation. Everybody expects prices will rise. Something must be done to break such expectations.

My second point is that it is folly to think we have a perfectly competitive economy. We do not. I have argued many times that we have a large portion of administered prices in our society today. You have to do something about this situation, particularly in periods of inflationary expectations. The government must also believe this, because otherwise they would not go after the bread industry, the milk or the oil industry in the way they have.

I was astonished to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs say that the government is opposed to selective price controls. That is precisely the policy the government is following. The minister made a very good argument on why selective price controls will not work. I agree they will not work. They are an ineffective way of tackling the problem. The fact remains that when you have an economy which has high levels of inflationary expectations and some administered prices, there is only one solution: you must have some type of incomes policy. It is folly to think you are going to reduce inflation without it.

Historically, the reason we did not have to have such a policy is that in the past governments were prepared to eliminate excess demand by creating unemployment. No government will or should do that today. We are in a new situation. Throughout the forties, fifties and sixties, when the economy was heated government slowed it down in order to keep inflation under control. Throughout the fifties and sixties that policy worked reasonably well in checking inflation, but at a terrible cost. There was 2½ per cent to 3 per cent inflation. Today, governments all over the world are not prepared to slow down the economy and they are wrong if they try to do so. Obviously, with the great need for goods and services it would be absurd to slow down production. However, if you are not prepared to check demand, you need another policy tool to deal with inflation, otherwise it will escalate and get out of control.

In the fifties and sixties we talked about inflation of 2½ per cent and 3 per cent in Canada. People said that was all right to live with in terms of a price to pay for full employment. However, we are now talking about 10 per cent inflation and we do not have the necessary instrument in economic policy-making today to get it under control. The policy instrument we must have is some sort of an incomes policy. I would be the first to agree that there have been problems with an incomes policy everywhere, but I also agree totally with Sir Alec Cairncross, for a number of years adviser to the British treasury, that we cannot give up the effort of finding the proper answer—the proper way of making it work—otherwise we will never solve this unending problem of continuous inflation.

Just as we had to find a tool in the thirties to deal with unemployment which was a worldwide problem at that time, we must find an instrument today to deal with worldwide inflation and domestic inflation. It is clear the general monetary and fiscal policy applied in the broad-brush way will not work. It is argued that income policies have not worked well. That is true. However, can anyone name a country where monetary and fiscal policies have worked? That is the real question. Can anyone name a place where the use of broad fiscal, monetary and exchange rate policies alone have stopped inflation? That is the real question.

We must find a way of putting a new policy instrument, an incomes policy, into effect. We have argued for a broad-gauge incomes policy. That operates through the profit mechanism. We have said that profits should be limited in periods of high levels of inflationary expectation. Basically, profit margins could be set, for example, at the average of a preceding three-year period. Prices would still vary depending upon the product mix of the particular industry, but we do believe that in a period of inflationary expectations there should not be excessive profits over and above those needed to assure new investment in an industry. We believe that this is a proper and an understandable policy, a very workable policy.

When the Secretary of State for External Affairs speaks about the wartime price and trade board he has no perception of how a contemporary incomes policy would operate. There has not been a policy such as the prices and trade board proposed for years. Now you control profit margins. This is the kind of policy that we have advocated and in which we believe. It can easily be designed to make allowance for import costs and other defensible costs.

The other side of the coin is that you cannot have a prices policy without a cost policy. You cannot ask one segment of the economy to pay all the price of fighting inflation. This is a problem that must be tackled by the nation as a whole; everyone is involved. If you are to have an equitable incomes policy, you must have a price policy and a cost policy. That is why we have said that you must set general standards for the rate of increase in incomes.

I do not believe it is either possible or appropriate in our society for particularly strong, powerful groups on the labour, as well as business, side to take enormous amounts out of the economy and let the weaker groups get an insufficient income. It is the weaker groups that are suffering from inflation. If you have your pricing policy on the one side and your wage and income policy on the other, both designed to set standards, then although the great majority of people in the economy and the great majority of the transactions that take place in the economy are not directly affected by such policies, at the same time you do prevent any group from taking out of the economy more than they are putting into it.

I cannot emphasize too strongly that in this day and age, when governments are not prepared to use demand management policies, you must have a collateral policy instrument—an incomes policy. The fact that we do not have such a program in this country is causing all kinds of problems. I agree totally with the NDP when they say to us today that we should read the profit figures. There are areas where we do not need profits like this to ensure investment in new activity. We must not have excessive profit margins. But we must have reduced prices. No one particularly likes an income policy. Obviously, it would be preferable if inflation would go away by itself and we did not have to do anything about it. But there is no evidence that this is going to happen; indeed, inflation may get worse.

Are we, as members of parliament representing people who are suffering every day, people who are seeing the purchasing power of their dollar drop by 10 per cent and are being sold government bonds at interest rates lower than the increase in the cost of living, and seeing labour—I draw this particularly to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro)—earning incomes that are below the increase in the cost of living, going to sit here and let these things continue? That is an abdication of responsibility. The single most important problem in this country is inflation, and surely that is what we have to deal with; and we cannot deal with the problem in this country without some sort of effective incomes policy.

The members of the NDP are now saying, and I agree with them, that you can do a lot of things domestically to fight inflation. All we need is the will and the energy to do so. Hopefully, supply will increase. We must follow all kinds of supply policies to increase output. But in the transition, until we get more output on the market, surely we have an enormous responsibility to try to protect the Canadian people from the ravages of inflation. I do not believe that our society can stand 10, 12, 14 and 15 per cent inflation. The institutional structures that we have are not designed for this type of erosion in values. A democratic society cannot stand that sort of inflationary cycle. We can do something about it, but only if we accept the realities of the situation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret that the time of the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Gillies: May I have just two more minutes?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I really hope that I can persuade my hon. friends opposite—I do not know whether I can or not—that selective controls will not work. They are unjust and inequitable. I recommend that they read the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on this question. It is also clear that the broad fiscal, monetary and exchange rate policies as now used will not work either to stop inflation under the economic structure that we have at the present time. We must choose new directions. I urge the government to have the courage to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member commences his remarks, would the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) permit a futher question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Since the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) was granted extra time, I think this would have to be with the consent of the House. Is it agreed that the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) shall have the right to ask a question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Gillies.]

Mr. Grier: I ask the hon. member this question. He said that profit levels this year are too high. Would he say that wage levels this year are too high?

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to answer that question. I said that there have been some profits reported which I think are way over and beyond those necessary to attract investment in those industries. That is my definition of a profit margin that is too high. In the area of labour negotiations and wage rates, one can say with total accuracy that the demands of labour on the economy have been very moderate, given the enormous inflationary pressures they have had to face, and I would not argue that they have been too high at all. However, if you embark upon an incomes policy of any type—and I endorse the argument for some action that my hon. friend used this morning—you must set a policy that people perceive to be fair, one that crosses the whole economy and involves everyone, because in the national interest all groups must work together to get this problem solved.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy following the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) because I find many of his arguments very interesting. He seems to be moving more in our direction nowadays, but he always fails to give precise details regarding what he really means by an incomes policy. He said it was easy to control salaries of blue collar workers because they are negotiating in a fishbowl; they do not have any collective agreement, so you can easily control their salaries. But how do you control, the salary of a guy clipping coupons, a lawyer, a doctor, a dentist or a person working in a managerial capacity? What about the guy who is not organized and does not belong to any trade union? Do you put the same ceiling on his salary?

Mr. Gillies: He is the guy who is being destroyed by inflation today.

Mr. Nystrom: Yes, and he is also being destroyed if you set no rigid ceiling on his salary, whether 6 per cent, as the Heath government tried in Britain, or some other figure such as that used by Nixon in the United States. This is one of the questions that the Conservative Party has not answered in this House, despite the fact they have made an analysis which sounds to me very interesting.

I was also interested to hear the hon. member for Don Valley agree with us by saying that profits this year are too high. I wonder whether the members of his party agree with the analysis which he presented to the House this afternoon. Traditionally, his party has not done so. They talk of high corporate profits being necessary to stimulate investment, which in turn will stimulate the expansion of industry in this country, create jobs, and so on. The hon. member for Don Valley seems to be flying in the face of that traditional Conservative argument which has been put forth in this country for so many years. I suspect, as the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) said, that the hon. member for Don Valley may be standing alone trying to articulate a policy that is perhaps more popular to the Canadian people than it is to the Conservative Party.

I will not say I was disappointed in the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). It was a short speech of perhaps 10 or 15 minutes, one that I thought was very hastily prepared, based on one of the old arguments from those old textbooks that are going out of date very rapidly and one that I submit did not look very closely or deeply at the problem of inflation in this country or anywhere else in the world.

I say at the outset that I agree with the hon. member for Don Valley who suggested that we can do something in this country about inflation. Inflation is not the sole result of external factors. We do not import all our inflation from other countries. We can do something about inflation here, because Canada is very fortunate in having so many natural resources. We produce our own food, our own energy, our own hydroelectric power; we have our own lumber, nickel, copper, iron ore, steel resources and things of that sort. Because of this, we in Canada can control to a large degree some of the inputs to the inflationary psychology in this country by adopting certain changes in governmental policy. I think this must be done.

The inflation rate this February over February of last year was 9.1 per cent, which is very high for a country such as Canada with all our wonderful opportunities. The price of food in this country increased by 17.2 per cent last year. One can look across the board and see the various inputs that are creating increasing inflation and an increasing cost of living in Canada. Profits went up, for example, by 37 per cent last year. Again, I was very happy to hear the hon. member for Don Valley refer to that fact. The profit increase over 1972 is actually more severe than it appears at first glance, because in 1972 corporate profits went up by 20.6 per cent over 1971, and in 1971 they were up 16.2 per cent over 1970.

You can see that each year corporate profits in this country are continuing to snowball, increasing in a cyclical fashion. I suggest that they are now quite out of control. The corporate share of the GNP, as the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore said this morning, is running at 12.5 per cent, which is the highest it has been since 1952. But the share the working people of this country are receiving has dropped in the past year; it has dropped to the point where increases in the average weekly income are less than increases in the cost of living.

This is where I differ very sharply with the Conservative Party which talks about wage and price controls across the board being comprehensive enough to cover all inputs in the price of basic commodities. That is why this party moved the motion we are dealing with today in which we say that because of a sophisticated economy, the government or an agency of government—be it a price control board or something else—should have the power and authority to control or roll back unjustified price increases. I think this can be done and it is a practical solution. This is the direction in which the government has very timidly and very slowly started to move. It has done this with two or three different commodities, but I think we should be adopting it as a permanent policy in Canada, rather than something that is not responsive and is developed on an ad hoc basis only after tremendous pressure from across the country. I do not want to sound too simplistic, but when you do this you must combine it with a full series of economic policies.

In answer to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, you must have export controls on certain commodities if you are to have domestic price controls or roll-backs. I think what we are doing in respect of commodities such as lumber, we must also do in respect of commodities such as copper, asbestos, and so on. We must also have subsidies in certain areas, because if you have domestic price controls or roll-backs you might have a danger of creating shortages, and you must cover that possibility in certain areas by subsidies on some basic commodities. This has been done in two or three areas already and I am suggesting it should be expanded and broadened as you consider the whole spectrum of commodities in this country.

What we are talking about in this party is a policy of controlling prices that corporations are able to charge the consumer; we are tackling the real nerve centre of the problem. I am sure this is one thing the government and the Conservative opposition will hesitate to do. The policy they have advocated until now, as far as I can gather, is one of comprehensive price and wage controls. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, outside of a wartime situation this has not really worked anywhere in the world, no matter where you might look, over the last 20 or 25 years. We can look at the experience in the United States under different schemes brought about by President Nixon, and we find that their rate of inflation last year was higher than ours—ours being 9.1 per cent and theirs 9.4 per cent.

The same thing is true of Great Britain. Prime Minister Heath tried to introduce a program of comprehensive wage and price controls, yet the cost of living went up by some 12 per cent. That is why I argue, and will continue to argue, that an across the board approach which is rigid and indiscriminatory will not work because of the many factors such a program does not take into consideration. Let me give a few reasons why that type of approach will not work. First, you create many shortages if you put price control on the wrong commodity. This is shown by the United States situation today where, when the Nixon government put controls on certain agricultural goods and food products, it created shortages. Because of these price controls we are having problems in this country with commodities such as beef. If you have a program of total controls, you cannot touch imports from other countries; and Canada is a great trading nation. We import more manufactured goods per capita than any other industrialized country. How can you put controls on a commodity such as bananas which we import from the Caribbean? How do you put controls on television sets, or cars that we might be importing from Japan, when we are trying to sell the Japanese some of our commodities such as wheat and other resources including timber?

As I have said, one of the dangers of a comprehensive program such as the one talked about by the Conservative Party is that it is very easy to impose controls on working people and farmers because their incomes are out in the open. The price the farmer gets for his commodity is in the open and everybody knows about it. The same is true of the income of blue collared workers, pensioners and other people living on fixed incomes.

There are many dangers in the approach suggested by the Official Opposition. I think the approach they are suggesting is, in general, more dangerous than the one taken so far by the government. That is why we must look at the position we are considering now, which is one of selective controls and roll backs where we find unwarranted profiteering or gouging or where we find there is no necessity for price increases. We can do this in many areas in which we have control in this country, such as lumber, steel, iron, copper, energy, hydro power, agricultural goods, and so on, especially if we combine this with a program of subsidies in certain areas.

As I have said, this is by no means a very simple problem, because if you control some of the commodities in a free enterprise system you will be driving the investment dollar out of the country. Let us look at nickel production. If you put price controls on nickel, the nickel producers will say, "To 'h . . .' with you. We are going to invest our money in another country." If we are to follow the type of program this party is suggesting, it might mean greater public ownership in many areas, particularly in respect of natural gas, oil, nickel, copper, iron ore, steel, and so on. I think that is a necessary part of any policy that is really designed to fight inflation and hold down prices. If you do not do that, the private investment dollar will go elsewhere because of the strength of the multinational corporations. These are some of the things we must take into consideration when we are discussing the rate of inflation in this country.

I now want to suggest two or three reasons why inflation is so high in the world. As we all know, we import some inflation from abroad. I think the first reason is that many of the underdeveloped countries are becoming wealthier and more able to afford some of our commodities. This, as a result, creates shortages and drives up the price of some essential commodities. As a result, particularly of the Japanese market but also of the European Common Market and others, the U.S. dollar has dropped and our dollar, which is presently floating with it, has dropped as well. This is making imports into Canada more expensive than they were two or three years ago. Certainly there is some inflation coming from abroad because we are a large trading nation.

The second reason there is such high inflation in the world, I suggest, is that the traditional western capitalist system is being challenged all around us. The hon. member for Don Valley alluded to this and said that the old standards of reality no longer exist. We see evidence of this no matter where we look. Inflation is now a phenomenon which is spreading throughout the western world. We see problems in respect of the monetary system, balance of trade and many other things right across the western world. There are not very many solutions for this type of price increase and inflation.

There are two or three things we could do as a country, but I suggest they are probably limited. First, we could enter into an international agreement regarding basic commodities in the world. We could set prices, and we could subsidize some of the basic commodities we import which are important to the average citizen. We could perhaps take action against some of the huge multinational corporations which are responsible for importing some of these commodities. Here I look, for example, at the sugar industry. We might be prosecuting some of the large sugar companies which I suspect are getting together and arriving at prices which are artificial and far too high at the present time.

These are some of the things we can do about external factors which increase the cost of living in this country. But as I have said, if we did that probably we still would not do much about the inflation rate in general because we must look at our own country and do what we can internally. I think we can do a certain amount because we produce much of the basic commodities we need. We are not like Japan, the United Kingdom or many other countries in the world which depend on the importation of energy and many of their raw materials and food products.

In Canada we produce basic commodities and therefore have some say about the price they are sold at. We must do this on a selective basis, otherwise we will run into all kinds of problems because every commodity is different. The food industry is different to any other. If we placed controls on the price of our food at the top, this would be passed on to the farmers at the bottom. There would be a freeze on what they get at the farm gate. They would hold off on production and would be driven out of business. This is happening in the United States and in many parts of the world where an attempt has been made to place controls on basic food items. If you tinker around with food, then you have to bring in subsidies in respect of items such as milk and bread.

If you want to do something basic about food prices, you must look at the whole food industry, the wholesaler, the retailer, the packing house, the transportation system and all levels of the food industry. Perhaps there is something that can be done to prohibit excessive profiteering, double-ticketing, and so on, in respect of food at the various levels. I think this could be done in the beef industry where the price to the consumer is up and the price to the producer is down. We could have a tough prices review board or a government agency which could investigate and roll back prices on a selective basis especially where there is evidence of gouging of the Canadian public. This is not being done. This is the policy which our party thinks should be followed and one which we think is quite reasonable and would be successful if it were pursued in respect of commodities which are important to our people.

We have mentioned profits in this debate. One way to control profits is by selective control of prices of commodities such as nickel and copper—in respect of which there was an announcement yesterday of another price increase—and pulp and paper. Perhaps there could be a general approach to many other commodities as well. We could also implement an excess profits tax that would take off the top all the excess profits which are considered unjust and should not be perpetrated on the people of this country. We could tax wealth, which I am sure would dissuade some corporations and some people who have money from speculating in land, in the stock market, in housing, in apartment buildings, and so on.

If we had a tax on wealth, which is what the Labour government is now looking at in Great Britain, I am sure it would cool down some of the inflationary psychology and some of the expectations the hon. member for Don Valley so often talks about. If we had tax reforms to plug the loopholes in some of the extractive industries, in particular, in this country we might also cool down some of our inflationary expectations. We have one of the lowest tax rates in the world in respect of the resource industries. We have depletion allowances and fast write-offs. We have all kinds of tax holidays. If we plugged these gaps we might cool down some of the inflationary psychology we now have.

There are many things we could do. We could control interest rates. Because we have higher interest rates than in the United States, we see the snowballing once again of a new input in the cost of living and in inflation. Someone may say that if you drop interest rates you stimulate the economy and create more inflation, and so on. I do not buy that argument. I think that if we controlled interest rates at a much lower level we would decrease one of the inputs of inflation. This would decrease the price of houses, of commercial buildings, of farmland and other properties. It would also decrease the profits of many of the banks and financial institutions. I think this should be done. Here I am not merely talking about tinkering with our free enterprise system. I am talking about getting at the very root of the system and controlling it on behalf of the people of this country so that the system works for the people, does not take advantage of them and does not try to profit at the expense of the ordinary citizen.

The last point I want to make, because my time is quickly running out, is in answer at least in part to the question the Conservative Party asks about wages. They say, "Well, what about wages?" First of all, the hon. member for Don Valley said that wages have fallen behind other inputs into the gross national product. If that is the case, I for one am not too excited about putting any clamp on wages. I represent a party and a riding that is interested in promoting the welfare and general good of farmers, workers and the average guy in our society. We do not wish to put a ceiling or a clamp on this. I suggest that if we had a program of selective price controls, the result of that program would be to dampen some of the more excessive wage demands we might have in our system.

If the price of basic commodities was to come down or was controlled to a certain degree so that the increases would go up less quickly, then the need for higher wages would diminish and there would be a cooling of the inflationary psychology in that sector of the economy. I suggest that perhaps all we can do in this country is through a program of selective controls on some of our basic commodities, and selective roll-backs on some of prices and commodities that are really hurting the Canadian people. I urge the government to consider this motion very seriously and to contemplate it as one of the solutions to the cost of living and the inflation problem that is rampant not only in this country but in the whole world.

● (1600)

Mr. Reynolds: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Could I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time having expired, there would have to be unanimous consent to enable the question to be asked. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Reynolds: I ask the hon. member what he considers to be excess profits.

Mr. Nystrom: I do not know whether I can put my hand into a hat and draw out a figure. I do not consider profits which increased by 37 per cent last year over the previous year to be right and just. I think they are much too high; they are excessive. I do not consider profits in the mining industry, which have gone up by several hundred per cent, to be moderate. I think that a profit rate in the neighbourhood of 7 per cent or 8 per cent might be justified.

I am not saying this as the spokesman for my party; I drew the figure out of the air. When you have profit rates of 50 per cent or 60 per cent, such as is the case in many industries, I consider them to be totally unjust and unfair. Profits should be just high enough to keep the economy going; they should not be excessive. That is precisely why we need a prices review board or some agency that has the power to investigate such matters and to take action to correct them.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I hope you and the members of the House will forgive this impromptu address. I am taking part in the debate because I am very interested in this subject and this morning I saw on television the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) debating this very question with a York University professor. Far be it from me to say who had the better of the argument, although I would have voted for the professor. What is certain is that the hon. member for St. John's East took a great deal more time, and sometimes volume against quality does win.

Anyway, the hon. member said nothing new: he used the arguments that have been presented by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), the recurring refrain calling for a 90-day freeze on wages and prices, and following this a discussion on ways and means of trying to battle inflation. It seems to me this is a very odd way to go about it. In other words, you must have a three-month freeze before you can start on a solution. The opposition has had almost a year and a half to come up with ideas which might help in reaching a solution but never have they mentioned any new proposals or policy. If they were in power, they think they would be able to start right away and conquer inflation within two weeks—unless they spent all their time talking.

This morning in the television program the question arose whether inflation was entirely intramural or was somewhat extramural. No one on the opposition side ever puts any blame on world conditions; they blame the government entirely for the inflation which exists in Canada. This simply betokens a myopic approach to the subject of inflation and world conditions generally. There is no doubt that Canada is a big country which stands alone and, we hope, stands well; but we cannot get along in the world without comparisons with other countries. I should like to know just where in the world inflation is under control. No one has ever told us this. I wish opposition members would pick out one democratic country where economic conditions are better than they are in Canada. That is an important point.

I next ask whether any opposition member has honestly compared conditions in Canada with what is going on in other countries. Will any hon. member not admit that a good trial of a freeze on prices and wages was given both in the United States and in the United Kingdom? Even President Nixon admitted that if the freeze was not a failure it was at least unwise or unfortunate, and Mr. Shultz did the same. He criticized the freeze and what it caused. Shortages and increased prices were caused when the freeze was over. That is what such a freeze does. This is so simple that I do not think we need to emphasize it. What can you expect from a freeze but prices rising subsequent to it? In Great Britain it was a failure; everyone knows that. In fact, it could not really be brought into full operation because the government was afraid to do that after the first attempt. I think those facts are so fundamental that pretty soon the opposition will have to stop talking about silly price and wage controls and a 90-day freeze. It is becoming a ridiculous notion. When I go home, even Conservatives in my riding ask me why, since it does not work, the Conservatives keep proposing it.

So far as the immediate effects of this motion are concerned, it seems to me that what is proposed is in effect right now. As a matter of fact, last fall the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) brought forward the idea of selective controls. This has been emphasized in the throne speech and to a certain extent it is in effect now. There is no doubt that we have some controls already on milk and on wheat, and in our export and import regulations we have had controls on vegetables and imports of various kinds. As announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), there will also be a control on the price of meat.

So far as concerns the idea of rolling back unjustifiable price increases by a prices review board, this is in operation now. The Food Prices Review Board has brought to court some firms that were found to be profiting unjustifiably. The question a Conservative member put to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) as to what is excess profit was a very good question. I think everybody realizes that to do business you have to make a profit. It is only having business in a healthy position and making a decent profit which keeps the country healthy, which keeps wages up and keeps the economy rolling along.

Excess profits are fairly simple to define. We know that with respect to simple mortgages and things like that, there has to be a certain level of interest. We know that companies cannot compete and have a decent profit unless they make between 15 per cent and 20 per cent. We know they have to make enough at least to cover their expenses and give some return to their shareholders. And we know they are taxed very heavily on profits. Excess profits are not the cause of inflation.

It has been well established by the Prices Review Board that there is no one nigger in the woodpile. We have had a very open review of food prices and costs. We know there are many factors involved. Here and there, there may be attempts made by certain wholesalers to collar a commodity market through selling to large chains, but this is being exposed and discouraged. There is no real, serious inequity in the whole price structure except that people want more and more processed types of food. That is about the long and the short of it.

I think the same could be said about government costs. We always have the opposition saying that the costs of government are going up and that our civil service is increasing by leaps and bounds. Do they know of any civil service in any other country that has the expertise and know-how of our Canadian civil service? Do they think we can get that for peanuts? The people of this country do not want a civil service which is not going to assist them in every way possible.

Through our Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce we help small businesses to get started, to set up their plants, and in other ways. We provide them with expertise on exports. In the Department of Agriculture we have a great many civil servants engaged solely in assisting farmers to find better methods of making better farm income and increasing productivity. In practically every other domain it is a case of service to the people of Canada who are constantly demanding more and more service.

We have the opposition saying that one of the big factors in inflation is the ridiculous spiralling of government costs and that a lot of this is due to an inflated civil service. But, Mr. Speaker, do not think for one minute that no matter which party forms the government the civil service will be reduced. The public like it this way. They deserve to have it this way. It is going to cost money, but it is a small part of the total cause of inflation.

I think it is time we publicly admitted that the biggest cause of inflation is world conditions. With two of my colleagues from the other side of the House, I had the opportunity to visit various countries during January. Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that Canada is much better off than Japan. The total industrial effort of Japan is huge and Japan has huge stacks of money put away in various areas, but the people of Japan are not getting it. The workingman is living on $1,000 a year and food costs there in proportion are about double what they are here.

So far as India is concerned, it will not have enough money to buy high-priced oil during the next year. It is not that any embargo was placed on India; it is just that with the huge increase in oil prices India will not have enough money to buy it. She will not even be able to cultivate her agricultural lands. People will not be able to light and heat their homes with kerosene, which is the only fuel they use. They do not have the huge electricity grid to supply power that we enjoy in Canada. They do not have self-sufficiency in oil and a good income for everybody, and by everybody I mean those above the poverty line. Out of a population of 560 million in India, only a few thousand people are not poor. Canada just cannot begin to compare herself with India.

The other country we visited was Iran. Their economy is a little better off than Japan's; people there live on about $1,200 a year. They expect to raise that yearly by several hundred dollars and in about five years they hope to have people living as well in Iran as we do in Canada. This is because Iran is wealthy. Part of this is due to the fact that they have no strikes and no real democracy. They have democratic institutions which are very impressive to visit, but alongside every level of government is the shah's government. This goes all the way down to the bottom, and it is this government which tells the people what to do and when to do it, with no argument allowed.

So, Mr. Speaker, do we want democracy? Do we want people to have what they wish in this country? Or do we want a controlled economy? There is no way to have controls without having policemen or police types enforcing them. Human beings are human beings. Everybody takes a little crack at evasion once in a while. If there are people who do not, then you really do not like them because they will not take a chance. And they do not get on as entrepreneurs. But if you have everybody watching everybody else, you wind up with a controlled, semi-police state. We don't want that, do we?

It is time we stopped talking about controls since we can control nobody but the poorest workingman. It is not the labourer in this country who has caused inflation. Inflation started outside Canada, and everybody ought to realize that. It arrived with a big jolt when the U.S. devalued her currency. We have never caught up since. Our currency is just following along luckily at about the same level, with the result that we are not very different from the United States. But we are more fortunate in certain things.

Some of the comments of opposition members with respect to inflation have been rather amusing. The Conservative leader says the fundamental need is to pursue a judicious fiscal and monetary policy. What does that mean? It doesn't really mean anything. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) keeps reiterating the same thing. Neither one of them is saying anything. They are not committing themselves to a policy. Anybody could say what they are saying. I should remind the hon. member for Don Valley that before he came into this House he was against controls—and now, of course, he is for controls. This might indicate some political bias.

Mr. Paproski: He has been the light.

Mr. Railton: The question as I see it cannot be settled by any simplistic solution such as wage and price controls. We have done a great deal to help the poverty section with our social security system and its escalation. We do worry about the people who are not in the poverty section but are in the fixed income section, the retired people who will see the erosion of their savings because of the depreciation of our currency. At the present time this really cannot be helped; let us say that honestly.

I think it is time we realized that good times are coming—in about a year. I think the price of oil will come down and there will be a reduction in many prices because the world is becoming more stable. I believe the settlement of the big strike in Britain was one of the factors. It is too bad the Tory government there was not smart enough to realize that by paying the miners a fair rate they would keep the wheels of industry turning, and although it might cost a little more, they would be tides over for about five years until the oil wells in the North Sea started producing. It rather demonstrates to me that Conservatives throughout the world are shortsighted.

Mr. Ed Nelson (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, when I go home tomorrow I will be able to report to my family that there was a hush in the House as I rose to speak. I will not tell them how many people were here. For many of the members of this House and for millions of people in Canada there is a feeling of helplessness and frustration as they watch the cost of living rise day by day and month by month. The price of food has been rising steadily over the months and the people of my area in particular have been hit hard. According to a regular survey carried out by food price editors across the country on February 1, Vancouver still had the doubtful distinction of being the city where people pay the highest price for food.

The price of food went up more in the last two months than it did in the last 25 years. During the past year food prices have shot up by 13 per cent. Potatoes have gone up, according to Statistics Canada, 94.9 per cent; eggs, 46.3 per cent; chicken, 40.1 per cent; turkey, 35.9 per cent; and so the list goes on. But the winner was sugar. It went up by more than double in less than a year, and of course when the price of sugar goes up so do the items for which sugar is an essential component.

We know why sugar went up so drastically, do we not? The answer is in Statistics Canada, but it is also in the courts of our land. The three largest sugar importers, Atlantic Sugar Refineries, Redpath Sugar and St. Lawrence Sugar, were convicted of price-fixing in 1963. What happened? They were told they were bad little companies and they had to pay a fine. More than that, they suffered the full impact of the majesty of the law and were served with a restraining order not to do it again. But they went on dipping into the Canadian consumer's pocket for eight more years. Now they are back in front of the courts again, charged with the same offence of price-fixing; and not only with conspiring to boost the price of sugar over the years to the tune of millions of dollars—$125 million to be precise—but also with keeping other companies from going into the sugar business. What is going to happen to them this time? Another fine amounting virtually to a licence to go on stealing? Another slap on the wrist?

It is not only the sugar companies, Mr. Speaker; there is a long list of companies that have been convicted of similar offences or are in the process of being convicted. There is concrete evidence that the cement companies, if you will pardon a lousy pun, both in Vancouver and Toronto are involved. And here is a dandy! Price fixing charges have been laid against 74 of the best known general insurance companies operating in Canada relating to the sale of fire insurance in Nova Scotia. There is a list of similar incidents.

I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the question period last Thursday if it would be possible to implement legislation to provide for lifting or suspending the business licence of any company convicted more than once of deliberate price-fixing. A naive question. I know that licences are issued provincially and that the federal jurisdiction relates only to the actual commission of crimes. Hon. members will remember that the Prime Minister suggested I write to the provinces concerned—me, the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour, sitting against the velvet curtain on the very back bench over in the corner in his first term of office, should do what the government should have done long ago!

Mr. Reynolds: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nelson: Well, Mr. Speaker, I did write to the provinces. I wrote to every premier in this country. My letters might reach the desk of an assistant down the hall. I do not think the Prime Minister should have told me to write to the provinces. I think he should have written. If this government had any kind of guts, it would be writing, it would be conferring and it would be taking the lead in making it clear that corporations engage in this sort of outright banditry at the risk of losing their right to do business in this country. If they cannot do anything else, they can at least try to stamp out deliberate dishonesty in business. I wish every Canadian consumer would write to the Prime Minister and tell him so.

No wonder the people of this country feel a sense of helplessness and frustration. Frustration because they know that, despite the fact that there is a worldwide inflation problem, that there is in many cases a shortage of supply and there is a rapidly growing world population, in their heart of hearts in a country with our natural resources much of the inflationary spiral in the cost of living is avoidable.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) made a fine speech in which he dwelt on wage and price control—I cannot call it "policy"—statements of the Tory party. They have so many euphemisms for wage and price controls that I cannot keep track of them. But he rejected them in any case, turned to the idea of selective price controls and pointed out that these would not work, and rejected them. That, in effect, is an admission that the government feels it must follow a policy of laissez-faire in the marketplace.

The people feel helpless because they know that neither this Liberal government nor any Conservative government is going to place any kind of restraint on business profits even if they make profits 1,000 per cent over last year's. Look at Falconbridge whose profits showed a 760 per cent increase over last year. Profit is holy, profit is good and there appears to be no point at which it becomes immoral to cause suffering and hardship through excessive profits. That, of course, is why they will not entertain the idea of an excess profits tax, because to them there is no such thing as an excess profit. The question was asked in the House today, what constitutes an excess profit? No one can say. Is it 7½ per cent? Is it 10½ per cent? There is such a thing as fair dealing in business, and a fair profit might vary from one segment of industry to another. But there must be a point, surely, at which it becomes immoral to reap the kind of profits that have been published in the newspapers almost every day over the past year.

The government knows that the Food Prices Review Board could be given powers beyond mere investigation. They could impose selective price controls, they could roll back unjustifiably high prices, they could adopt the terms of our motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier), namely:

● (1630)

That this House calls on the government to consider the immediate introduction of legislation designed to control selectively the prices of essential commodities and to give either to the government or to a prices review board the power to roll back unjustifiable price increases.

[Mr. Reynolds.]

The facts are there for all to see. The consumer is getting fleeced right and left, and the government refuses to take action. The evidence is published daily. Dominion Stores, B.C. Packers, Loeb's, Weston's—all are reaping profits as never before. Dominion Stores increased profits by 92.6 per cent over the same period in 1972. Silverwood Industries chalked up a 107 per cent increase in 1973 over the same period in 1972. B.C. Packers, for 24 weeks ending June 17, 1973, chalked up a 125 per cent increase over the same period in 1972. Why go on? The list is endless. It seems that in our society it is morally justifiable for one to charge all that the traffic will bear and for companies to publish triumphant statements of ever bigger gains at the expense of the Canadian public.

Well, not every company publishes such figures. One of the largest octopuses on this continent does not publish profit figures. That one, of course, is the Kraft company whose tentacles stretch out into every food outlet in the country, even to the serving trays of our national airline which seems to have some sort of understanding with the crafty Kraft company. I do not buy Kraft cheese, Mr. Speaker. No, I will correct that: I do not buy cheese with the Kraft label on it, although I have no way of knowing whether the cheese I buy is marketed by Kraft under another label. I do know that I have gone into many stores which sell no cheese but Kraft. Why is that company not being investigated?

The increase in average hourly earnings for 139,600 wage earners employed in the food and beverage industry from March, 1972, to March, 1973, was 7.8 per cent, while the cost of living went up by 13 per cent. Over-all, wage increases in the last half of 1973 were down by almost 1 per cent. Even the Prime Minister admitted that. I wish people would stop talking about wage controls. Mr. Speaker, I know of very few working people who do not have to bargain, conciliate or arbitrate for every nickel they earn. If that is not a form of wage control, what is? Wages are effectively controlled in our society.

How is the farmer making out? According to the research director of the Ontario Federation of Labour, a Saskatchewan farmer receives 3 cents for the wheat contained in a loaf of bread which is selling for 37 cents. A market gardener in Bradford got 3 cents a pound for carrots requiring hardly any processing and selling for 13 cents a pound. So it goes. Somebody is making money at the intervening level, but nobody can find out who it is. Certainly Mrs. Plumptre cannot find out. If anyone suggests that the packagers, advertisers, food chains, processors or any of the middlemen are making excessive profits, the defences go up immediately, as they did when these groups were called before the trends in food prices committee.

One of our researchers pointed out:

The conglomerate nature of the corporations and the fact that they present their yearly earnings in a consolidated statement makes it extremely difficult to get at the actual profit figures solely attributable to the sale of foods. The conglomerate nature of these corporations also enables them to easily hide profits from food retailing and in the case of price freezes to take their profits from another source within the corporate structure.

Whom can the hard-pressed consumer turn to? Not to the government, evidently, because it seems content to turn a blind eye to the problem instead of taking forceful action to control prices in a selective manner as called for in the motion before the House. Over 56 per cent of the average family's budget goes on food and housing. The housing shortage is so acute that the average family can no longer afford to buy a home. Those who do are saddled with astronomical interest rates on their mortgages.

According to the Speech from the Throne, the government is going to solve our problems by concentrating on increasing supply. I suppose that approach could help; but, Mr. Speaker, what is the use of increasing supply if you have a government which cannot, or will not, come to grips with the problems of distribution and cost?

We have never really been short of oil in this country. There is a great deal of oil. The trouble is that the oil companies have it and governments of the past, as well as this one, have allowed them free rein in playing around with the distribution, pricing and control of supply of that natural resource instead of moving into true public control and ownership of this vital commodity. The problem, in my opinion, largely involves distribution and control. The government must exercise greater control over essential commodities as the motion suggests.

If this government will not take steps to do that, what are the alternatives? A Conservative government, with its built-in oil lobby and labour-hating backbenchers? A discredited wage and price control or freeze policy is no answer because policies like that will take us back to the nineteenth century. Such government would be another big business-oriented government and would be like the government of the social creditors under whom we suffered in B.C. for so many years. Notice, I referred to social "creditors," Mr. Speaker.

The Canadian people will surely grow impatient with continuous inaction and will resort to the only recourse left to them which involves, aside from eventually electing a government which cares about people first, action to organize themselves into collective action groups. I hope sincerely that they do this soon. Mr. Speaker, I urge the government to give immediate effect to the motion before us.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I last spoke in the House on food prices about one year ago, on the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) calling for the first report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices to be concurred in. What has happened since then, Mr. Speaker? That committee has published 35 minute books covering 44 meetings and examined 100 witnesses.

Now we have the Food Prices Review Board, which is also good at producing books. It has produced its first report. There have been two quarterly reports, and another is due soon. We have seen the wage and price control study to do with Britain. Retail food stores have been surveyed, and we have seen the report on egg prices and, recently, the report on bread prices. Yes, now there is the Food Prices Review Board with a permanent staff of 45 and a very expensive chairman who carries the rank of deputy minister. The board spent about $1 million in the current fiscal year about to end and will nearly double that expenditure, to about $1.9 million, in the coming fiscal year. And where are food prices now? After all these reports, food prices are up. Beef is up by 25 per cent, poultry by 34 per cent, and eggs have risen by 26 per cent, all in one year.

I should like to examine the motion for a moment, Mr. Speaker. The NDP says, "Give the government more power so that it can do something." It is fine for them to say that, now that they are part of the government and feel they deserve power. But let us look at the exact wording of the motion. Its very language reveals the socialists' ignorance of economics. The socialists want "to control selectively the prices of essential commodities." The government has boasted that it has imposed selective controls. Look at the chaos we now face. The NDP motion goes on to say that the government or board should "roll back unjustifiable price increases."

When will those people learn that the government has no power to do anything of the sort? The socialists do not understand the nature and function of prices. They believe that prices somehow are determined by costs of production, whereas in reality the price of a product at any given time has nothing to do with the cost of production.

Before I came to this place I had been involved in producing businesses, particularly in the real estate field. I know of many instances of property selling well below the cost of production, and many a bankrupt manufacturer can testify to the correctness of what I have said. The purchaser is not interested in the cost of production. He is interested in paying the lowest possible price. He is interested in what any particular item is worth to him. The Marxist idea that prices are determined by the cost of production is nonsensical. In reality, the opposite is true.

Market prices of consumer goods and services today determine the amount of production tomorrow. When a person sees that the price of a particular product is high enough to enable him to produce and sell it at a profit, he will produce that product unless he sees that other producers are already moving toward increasing that supply to meet the consumer need. That is why we have market surveys. If other producers have already scheduled enough additional production to increase the supply of a product so that the price will fall to a level making the price unattractive, i.e. unprofitable, then our producer will pass that product.

This marketing system is really marvellous. It spontaneously directs, by means of the profit motive, producers to increase or decrease production. That is how prices determine production. However, they perform another very valuable function as well. They clear markets. If consumer demand for chickens falls, grocers will reduce their prices in order to move them, otherwise they will be stuck with old chickens on their shelves. If consumer demand for chicken rises, grocers will find that chickens are being cleared off their shelves faster than they can be replenished. If they do not mark up their posted prices, early shoppers will clear out the supply and later shoppers will find none available in the store at any price.

Suppose politicians decide that prices should not rise in accordance with demand. The early shoppers would clear out the available supply. If the late shoppers wanted any chickens at all, they would have to go into the free market, sometimes called the black market. There they would find some of the early shoppers willing to resell at the higher or market price. The politicians will claim they have saved consumers from high food prices, but consumers will know that at the fixed legal price few chickens are available, except perhaps to the early risers who stand in line outside grocery stores. The rest of us pay the market price which the politicians were unable to lower. That is the situation with consumer goods in general in Russia and with the gasoline market today in the United States.

In the next step in this process the politicians embark on a legal rationing program, which means that they increase our taxes in order to hire bureaucrats to print and distribute ration books. This means that the free market behind the grocery store becomes less a market in good, fresh chickens and more a market in good, fresh ration coupons, and the politicians have made us worse off again. When politicians try to impair the delicate and marvellous workings of the free market, they harm us all.

The socialist resolution mentions "unjustifiable" price increases. It should be clear that no free market price is ever unjustifiable. It is determined by supply and demand. This talk about unjustifiable price increases is typical NDP pap. What may be an unjustifiable price to one member of society may be totally justified to another. It is not for the politicians to make that decision. They would tell an inefficient operator with high costs and low profits that it would be all right to increase his price because his profits are not too high. They would tell the efficient operator who is making a good profit that he cannot increase because it would not be justified. We would have two different companies selling the same product at different prices because the government has said so. Any attempt by politicians to compel people to trade at a legal price which is not the market price would certainly be unjustifiable.

The NDP always want a villain. They rant, rave, shout and confuse the issue. They are trying to fool the people. They say they are interested in people, but they are not. They are just interested in power. All we have to do is look at their votes in recent days. The NDP are devoid of principles, unlike my party which demonstrates in its votes and actions that it is a party of principle and a party of the people.

The leader of the NDP whips the corporations. He forgets that corporations are made up of people. Corporations have no giant pools of money to pay taxes or anything else. All corporation money comes from people; it comes from their customers, suppliers, employees or shareholders. There are no other sources of funds for corporations. The Progressive Conservative Party recognizes that corporations are made up of people.

We have seen the NDP flip-flop on other votes in the House in recent months. Just yesterday in committee the NDP voted against showing displeasure of the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board, completely reversing their position of four months ago when they put a motion which included a provision to fire poor old Plumptre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): She's not that old.

[Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra).]

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): How does the government look in this situation? We have all heard of the two-bit politician. Now we have two-cent government. The government is worrying about a few pennies increase in prices here and there, while ignoring the main problems and causes. They have said as much in the House. They have said there is no problem. They have also said they do not know what the problem is, but they will put in some selective controls anyway. They like to blame inflation on the rest of the world. I wish to quote from an editorial that appeared in the Vancouver Sun:

> If smallpox were pandemic among all the nations of the world, the Canadian government would still be expected to try to stamp it out here.
> Yet the economic disease of inflation, now raging internationally, is regarded by Ottawa as being quite endurable so long as it isn't worse here than elsewhere.

The government cannot blame this on the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) because he has not any power. What do they do? They just criticize his proposals and say they will not work, even though they do not have any proposals of their own. They do nothing except bend their policies to keep the NDP happy so they can all stay in office together.

What are the basic causes of inflation and high food prices? The basic causes are the policies of the government of Canada. First we have the government's monetary and fiscal policies and, second, the government's interference in business and personal lives of Canadians. We have had a greatly expanding supply of money. It is elementary that if the supply of any commodity is vastly increased, its value will fall. I do not want to get into detail on that because my colleague, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), explained it very well earlier.

Mr. Grier: Do you agree with him?

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): It is interesting to note that in a debate last year on this same topic—

Mr. Grier: Do you agree with him?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is hard of hearing.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): —I remarked, and I quote:

> Both parties of the coalition government say that they want to force manufacturers to disclose more information about their products. Perhaps the government should print a disclosure on its own paper money which would warn the holder that its future value is questionable.

Another factor in the monetary policy is government expenditure. We have just recently seen the budget. I wish to read another quote from a recent edition of the Globe and Mail. This is by the president of the Institute of Chartered Accountants:

> Canadians ought to be able to look to government for a lead in the anti-inflation battle.

I do not have time to quote the editorial fully. He goes on to make reference to the wild extravagances of the government and senior civil service. In the same editorial there is reference to another view presented by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce as follows:

> It was warning that governments must check the massive growth of taxes in recent years to avoid "serious social problems in the attitudes of working Canadians toward the disadvantaged.

● (1650)

Then they go on to talk about the middle-class we hear so much about. Back in Ottawa Arthur Blakely says in his opening paragraph in the Citizen:

Any Canadian family which tried to do its budgeting federal-government style would go bankrupt in short order.

What about these taxes that the government is collecting? Their expenditures have increased to $22 billion, up nearly 20 per cent from last year. I should like to give the House another quote from a statement made over 100 years ago about governments that do this sort of thing. More than a century ago the French philosopher Bastiat wrote:

The state, too, is subject to the Malthusian Law. It tends to expand in proportion to its means of existence and to live beyond its means, and these are, in the last analysis, nothing but the substance of the people. Woe to the people that cannot limit the sphere of action of the state: freedom, private enterprise, wealth, happiness, independence, personal dignity, all vanish.

Let me say something about the government's interference in business and in the personal lives of all Canadians. Take, for example, the CNR with its 30 subsidiary companies. What business has the government to be in the hotel business, the airlines business and the radio and television business which has cost us $300 million in this current fiscal year? The government is also in real estate. I am sure the deputy minister of public works does a good job and is proud of the fact that he is head of the biggest landlord in the country. That is not what governments are for.

What else has the government done in this regard? They have established a whole host of what are called marketing boards which are supposed to be helping the people. The Food Prices Review Board does not agree with that, because the board says that it cannot accept any group action which artificially inflates consumer prices. That is what marketing boards do.

The former auditor general has stated that governments should never go into business because they do not have competent people to place at the helm, and the results are inevitably disastrous. The Polymer Corporation was sold to the Canada Development Corporation and then the government fired the auditor general. We all know the problems Mr. Henderson had when he was auditor general of Canada, and he had this to say: "It's just that the government was plain embarrassed by what I was digging up".

In British Columbia an economic consultant described the effect of government policies on feed grains for cattle which caused the majority of British Columbia-raised beef cattle being grain fed in the prairie province to be slaughtered in the prairie provinces and reshipped to British Columbia. All of this unnecessary movement not only raised British Columbia beef prices but eliminated a considerable meat packing industry.

Let me now say something about the small businessman and how he suffers from government interference. Many of them are forced out of business because they just cannot cope with government rules and regulations. It is all right for the big boys, but the little fellow just cannot hack it. Individuals are being forced more and more to call upon people like their MPs, who are practically acting as ombudsmen now.

Today we see our MPs in Ottawa with two secretaries, and the government has just authorized an additional one for the riding. In the old days—which are not so old, only 20 years ago—when some of the members of this House first came here, two MPs shared one secretary and one telephone in one office. Now that the government has become so involved in all our lives, each member has three offices, three secretaries and three telephones. In Denmark the people have just thrown out the old government and elected a fellow who promises to abolish taxes and to fire half of the nation's civil servants.

The government has its own version of socialist theories vis-à-vis the corporations. Just as the NDP views the corporations having a bottomless pit of money, governments forget that governments do not have bottomless pits of money. All their money comes from the taxpayers, in this case the people of Canada.

We have looked at the causes, Mr. Speaker, and now let us look at the solutions. What can the government do? The general inflation, the general decline in the value of money, is caused by the rapid increase in the supply of paper money. The government should stop increasing the money supply so rapidly. The substantial increases in food prices in particular are caused by the government's policy of preventing free markets from working normally.

Consumers are served best when they are free to buy from the most efficient suppliers, domestic or foreign. Tariffs are harmful to consumers and should be repealed. The government sometimes lifts tariffs, but is quick to replace them when producers complain. The government's tariffs restrict foreign competition. The government-granted monopolies restrict domestic competition. By protecting inefficient producers from the competition of efficient ones, the government harms consumers by preventing them from obtaining the best products at the lowest price, and the government harms efficient producers by preventing them from growing and prospering.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, over the last two days and continuing next week we are debating the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. These amendments, if passed, will force competition in some areas where there has hardly been any need. If ever we needed an example of a government devoid of any real basic policy, we now have it. We have one set of laws to prevent competition in many fields, and another set of laws to order competition in other fields. Clearly the government has gone round the bend and has met the NDP coming round the other way.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the proceedings under section (11) of Standing Order 58 are deemed to have terminated. I do now leave the chair. The House stands adjourned until two o'clock on Monday afternoon.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. STANFIELD—ENERGY EXPORT TAX PROCEEDS AND EQUALIZATION—POSITION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to reply to the question of privilege raised by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) on Friday and to clear up a misunderstanding that has arisen with respect to the equalization of provincial receipts from the export tax on oil. Since last Tuesday when I responded to a question from the hon. Leader of the Opposition I have reviewed the various exchanges that have taken place on this subject and I can now understand why there is some ambiguity about my position.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): When I made my statement on this subject on January 4, I was under the impression that provincial receipts from the sharing of the oil export tax for the period October, 1973, to January, 1974, would be included in the provincial revenues subject to equalization. Under the circumstances, I calculated that the cost to the Canadian taxpayer of the additional equalization payments involved would be about $25 million.

Although I was disturbed about the long-term consequences, because I had not yet verified the legal situation, I simply assumed that they would be subject to equalization. At the same time I was very concerned that the inclusion of rapidly rising oil royalties in the equalization formula and the resulting sudden jump in equalization payments would have grave consequences for Canadian taxpayers and, indeed, for the continuing viability of the equalization program itself. Hon. members will be aware of my concern from the remarks I made to the House on January 3, the day immediately preceding my reference to the potential $25 million equalization payment. During those remarks I said that if oil prices reached international levels, and were reflected in provincial revenues subject to equalization, I could foresee an increase in costs to Canadian taxpayers of over $800 million. As I later stated outside the House, the costs could be considerably more than this. Under such circumstances we would be forced into considering appropriate amendments to the equalization formula. It was these dangers I foresaw that formed the context in which I asked the Leader of the Opposition to view increased equalization payments, when I answered his question on Tuesday March 12.

In the ordinary course of pursuing this matter, I sought legal advice as to whether, under the present statute and regulations, the provincial share of receipts from the oil export tax was to be included in the provincial revenues that are equalized. The opinion I received, some time after January 4, was that these provincial receipts are not subject to equalization. Having received this advice I then attempted to clarify the situation to the first ministers at their conference on energy in January, to my colleagues the provincial treasurers and ministers of finance and subsequently to members of this House. My explanations, however, may not have been adequate, Mr. Speaker, and I am sorry if I have caused any confusion.

The one feature of this whole problem which disturbs me in the statements of the hon. Leader of the Opposition is the implication that I had misled him in our discussions prior to the passage of the export tax bill. I tried to see him last week but he was heavily committed in a way which I quite understand. It is my impression that he feels that I misled him in my argument that I needed freedom with respect to the federal share of revenues from the oil export tax after January 31 in order to pay for equalization, yet it now appears that equalization may not be due on provincial revenues charged from that tax.

First, may I say to him that when we had those discussions in early January, I, myself, was under the impression that equalization was payable against those revenues. Second, the reason for my saying that I needed freedom with the federal share of oil tax revenues was that they were required to cover the cost of any price shelter in eastern Canada if we were to achieve uniform prices across Canada and the cost of equalization. That is still the fact. The price shelter will require almost the total proceeds of the export tax. I still do not know the full amount of the total increase in equalization payments that will be due, if not on the proceeds of the provincial share of the export tax, then upon the normal flow of provincial revenues which would be eligible for equalization.

The concern I expressed to the hon. Leader of the Opposition in our private discussions, which he generously accepted, is very much alive and valid. I do not want to see the basic principles underlying the equalization program destroyed. This program has served Canadian federalism well. It has been generous to the "have-not" provinces which, this year, will get an additional $400 million to bring the total payment to cover $1.4 billion. The program enjoys an enviable international reputation and is one all Canadians can be proud of. I shall continue to protect its basic principles against the dangers I see emerging from the current energy crisis. However, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Leader of the Opposition still feels he is owed an apology because of my failure to explain it to him and the House before now, he shall have it freely.

MR. JELINEK—COMMENTS BY POSTMASTER GENERAL ON REMARKS BY MEMBER ON 1976 OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from the remarks made by the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) on March 8, when he attempted to twist remarks I made in the House the week previous, March 1, regarding some of the circumstances surrounding the 1976 Olympic games.

I was most surprised, after the government's admitted lack of interest and their recent statements pertaining to the fact that the Montreal olympics were not a federal matter, that the Postmaster General saw fit to waste his entire speech in the throne speech debate on just that matter. From his statements of that date, it is inconceivable that a minister of the Crown—even this minister—could pursue a course of such bigotry.

● (1410)

The minister is entitled to voice any opinion regarding his thoughts and feelings toward my competence to act as the spokesman for this party on Olympic matters. His suggestion to the leader of this party as to a possible replacement will, I am sure, receive the consideration it deserves. But, Mr. Speaker, the minister goes beyond the point of parliamentary etiquette and, in fact, contradicts himself outright when he says that I and my party are anti-Quebec and anti-Olympics.

If the minister would take the time to check the record, he would find that on numerous occasions, inside as well as outside the House, I have stated, on behalf of myself as well as on behalf of our party, our support for the Olympics in general and the site of Montreal as host city in particular.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: On March 11 my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, rose on a similar question of privilege on behalf of the party. I now rise on this same matter in defence of my convictions not only regarding the Olympics but in the very important matter of the unity of this country. Therefore I request as a matter of privilege that the Postmaster General retract his statements which are totally untrue and completely unfounded.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member claims that he has a question of privilege. I have serious doubts about that. In any event, his notice and the speech he has just made do not include a motion. I have some qualms also in that this matter is being raised by the hon. member on March 18 and he is referring to a statement made on March 8, ten days ago. I doubt very much that there would be a question of privilege in such circumstances. The minister has indicated that he wants to reply. I wonder whether anything would be gained by pursuing the matter further at this time.

The hon. member claims to be replying to a statement made by the minister during the throne speech debate. That was ten days ago. The hon. member asks that I invite the minister to retract his statement. He knows that the Chair has no power to do this unless the statements made are clearly unparliamentary. I have heard similar statements, perhaps worse, made from time to time, and I would not think that the Speaker should be invited to intervene when a statement of this kind is made in the House in the course of debate, sometimes heated debate. Hon. members are aware of the well known precedent that matters which relate to a dispute as to facts should not be the basis for privilege, and I would think that in the circumstances the matter should not be pursued further.

[Translation]

I hope that the minister will agree with me that it is really of little avail to keep on discussing this point. I do not want to deprive the minister of the opportunity to reply since generally it has always been customary to allow an hon. member involved in a statement to reply to it. Should the minister insist, I will have to hear him but I must say that I doubt very much that this is really a question of privilege.

AGRICULTURE

SUBSIDY TO BEEF PRODUCERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Norval Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As a result of the beef subsidy announced by the Minister of Agriculture last Friday, cattle markets are in a state of confusion. They are in effect closed today. The terminal markets are convinced that the subsidy will ruin them, the small packers will then be unable to operate and the large meat packing houses will be able to set the price free of competition. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Hollands):

That the government rescind the subsidy announced last Friday and that they instead institute a subsidy on grain fed to cattle for finishing.

Mr. Speaker: This motion requires unanimous consent under Standing Order 43. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

TRADE

DEFICIT UNDER CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 concerning the massive turnaround in Canada-U.S. automotive trade, according to figures released today by Statistics Canada which reveal that we have moved from a surplus position to a more than $350 million deficit position, a turnaround of more than $400 million in one year. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House instruct the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to make a statement on motions within 24 hours explaining the reason for the $356 million deficit in Canada-U.S. automotive trade for 1973, and outlining the course of action, particularly concerning future investment, the government plans to take to remedy this situation.

Mr. Speaker: Again, this is the type of motion which requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

AIR TRANSPORT

BANKRUPTCY OF CARDINAL TRAVEL LIMITED—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity brought on by the bankruptcy of Cardinal Travel Limited whereby at least 700 secondary school students lost, on average, in excess of $400 each and were deprived of travel arrangements to Europe and elsewhere made by school groups. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Beattie):

That this House direct the government to inquire into the international travel business and prepare statutory regulations for the industry, including the regulation of foreign airlines operating to and from Canada, requiring airlines to be responsible for travel arrangements organized by booking agents to the effect that in the event of the defalcation of the booking agent the airline benefiting from arrangements is responsible to the travelling public making the arrangements, whether privately or in a group, including responsibility for ground arrangements.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not.

JURISDICTION RESPECTING COLLECTIVE BARGAINING FOR FISHERMEN—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 I ask for unanimous consent to move a motion on an urgent matter. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Coast-Chilcotin (Mr. Olaussen):

That the subject matter of collective bargaining rights for fishermen, and the appropriate allocation of jurisdiction as between the federal and provincial levels of government in labour relations legislation pertaining thereto, be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration for investigation and report, and that the labour ministers of interested provinces be invited to appear before the committee to present their views in connection therewith.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 it requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. Therefore, the motion cannot be put.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 concerning the exclusion from the DREE program of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That the question of the exclusion of the Yukon and Northwest Territories from the opportunity of its residents to qualify for assistance under the provisions of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion be referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development for study and report.

AGRICULTURE

ACTION TO STOP RISING COST OF FEED GRAIN—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the present situation of eastern Canada farmers, and in view of the expected increase in milk subsidies in the new milk policy which the government is about to announce, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That this House consider the possibility of directing the Plumptre commission to do the utmost to prevent a price increase on feed grain which would equal the subsidy increase and leave farmers in the same precarious situation.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion introduced by the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent, except negatively; the motion therefore cannot be put.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT TO WIDEN CATEGORY OF PERSONS ENTITLED TO LOANS

On the order: Introduction of Bills:

March 14, 1974—Mr. Reynolds—Bill entituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Student Loans Act."

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta has given notice of his intention to move first reading of a bill to amend the Canada Student Loans Act. The Chair has had a preliminary look at the proposed bill and, even with a preliminary look, has very serious doubts whether it is acceptable from a procedural standpoint. The hon. member in his proposal seeks to extend the provisions of the act so as to widen the category of persons who may become the beneficiaries of loans under the act. It seems to the Chair that this provision would create an additional charge upon the treasury. I do not want to be unfair to the hon. member. It may be that he has some argument to submit in support of his bill from a procedural standpoint and perhaps the matter could be allowed to stand today and the hon. member could look at the procedural aspect. As he knows, the difficulty is that he does not have the royal recommendation. If, in the meantime, he could go to His Excellency and receive from him a recommendation, that would assist the Chair considerably and the hon. member also.

NEWSPRINT DISTRIBUTION RESEARCH

Question No. 39—Mr. Hellyer:

1. Has the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce undertaken a study entitled "Newsprint Distribution Research"?

2. Does the planned research include all newsprint origins in Eastern Canada or just some and, if the latter, which ones?

3. What is the estimated cost of the study?

What are the names and qualifications of the principal personnel engaged in the study?

5. Has any computer time been purchased and, if so, from what companies or institutions?

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. As part of the government's strategy to improve the international competitiveness of Canada's pulp and paper industry, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is contributing to the cost of an investigation of possible methods of reducing distribution costs for the movement of newsprint from Eastern Canada to customers in the United States. Marketing is not included. Under the Trade/Industrial Program, contributions are being made to the Canadian National Railways and to Newsprint Distribution Research, which are conducting separate parts of the investigation at arms length. Newsprint Distribution Research is a non-profit association established on May 1, 1973, to carry out the investigation. Principals are a group of five newsprint companies operating mills in Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba and Newfoundland: Anglo-Canadian Pulp and Paper Mills Limited, The Price Company Limited, Domtar Limited, Abitibi Paper Company Limited, Consolidated-Bathurst Limited.

2. The study covers newsprint originating in mills of the principals. Subsequently, if results indicate significant economies, all newsprint producers in Eastern Canada will be invited to participate in the formation of a co-operative distribution organization.

3. Estimated cost of the project is expected to total about $1 million of which the Crown is contributing approximately $500 thousand. The government portion is repayable if the project results lead to the formation of a distribution organization.

4. The Chairman of Newsprint Distribution Research is Mr. J. P. Lunderville, Vice-President, Engineering, Purchasing and Transportation, Domtar Limited. Mr. S. French, seconded from Domtar Limited where he was Director of Transportation, is full time Project Director. Both have many years experience in the manufacture and distribution of forest products. The Project Director of the Canadian National section of the project is Mr. Walter Wynne, a senior rail systems planning specialist with the railroad.

5. No computer time has been purchased to date.

Question No. 105—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What are the names and addresses of all advertising agencies used by the Department of Veterans Affairs since the present Minister assumed his portfolio?

2. (a) What are the amounts of all advertising contracts given such agencies during this period of time, what are the dates such contracts were awarded and in each case, were tenders or competitive presentations of any kind requested and, if not, who authorized in each case the expenditure of public funds without such tenders or competitive presentations (b) in each case, what was the general subject matter of the advertising contract?

3. What are the names and addresses of all advertising agencies used by the Department of Veterans Affairs during the term of the Minister's immediate predecessor and if any of these agencies have not been used since then, for what reason and on whose decision were changes made?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. Hulme Advertising, 4 Lansing Square, Willowdale, Ontario. M2J 1T1

2. There is no formal contract awarded. The agency is used on an as required basis. The expenditure from November 1972 amounts to $92,833.

3. Petersen Hulme Limited, 130 Bloor Street West, Toronto, Ontario. M5S 1N5 (This is the same agency which has undergone a change of ownership.)

IN-FLIGHT ENTERTAINMENT COSTS

Question No. 118—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Disregarding the revenue from renting or selling earpieces, what is the annual cost of renting films for presentation in flight on Air Canada flights?

2. How often are the films changed?

3. How much extra would it cost to change films (a) weekly (b) each fortnight?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. Air Canada's annual cost of renting films and equipment for in-flight presentation is approximately $340,000.

2. Films are changed approximately every six weeks.

3. (a) A change of films every week would cost Air Canada $874,000 and $1,197,000 more per annum. (b) A change of films every two weeks would cost Air Canada between $494,000 and $539,000 more per annum.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS IN EARLY 1973

Question No. 121—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Concerning the diplomatic reprisals by the United States against Canada in January and February, 1973, is the Secretary of State for External Affairs aware that Canadian Diplomats were advised at the State Department that no one above the level of the Canada Desk Officer would receive them?

2. Is the Minister aware that United States businessmen were specifically warned by White House Aides to avoid Canadian Diplomats?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Presumably the question is related to various press reports at the time and later to the effect that the embassies of a number of countries were having difficulty maintaining normal contact at different levels of the U.S. Government. The Canadian Embassy was not advised by the U.S. State Department that there would be any restriction of access by Canadian diplomats.

2. No information was received of any warning to American businessmen to avoid Canadian diplomats.

CHARGES FOR SAR IN ARCTIC WATERS

Question No. 187—Mr. Forrestall:

Has any decision been taken by the government with respect to whether or not charges should be levied against the rescued owners of a vessel beset in Arctic waters and (a) if so, what is it (b) if not, on what date might such a policy be forthcoming?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No decision has yet been taken by the government. (b) No date has been set for the issuance of such a policy.

POLAR ICEBREAKER

Question No. 188—Mr. Forrestall:

1. With reference to Question No. 750 of the First Session of the 29th Parliament, has the government revised the estimate of the late seventies in terms of the date at which natural resources are likely to be exploited in the Canadian Arctic Achipelago?

2. What length of time would be required from date of approval of funding to the bringing about into fully operational capability of a polar icebreaker capable of 10 to 12 month operation in the Canadian Arctic Archipelago?

3. On what date will a decision be required to construct such a vessel in order to meet the government's stated deadline as indicated in answer to Question No. 750, namely, the date that natural resources are likely to be exploited in the north?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The estimate has not been revised at this time.

2. Approximately five years.

3. No date can be given upon which a decision will be required to construct a polar icebreaker, capable of 10 to 12 months' operation in the Canadian Arctic Archipelago, in so far as this date relates to an estimated date that natural resources are likely to be exploited in the north. The reply to part 3 of Question No. 750 indicated only that there was some degree of relationship between the two dates.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT OF AN ICE-BREAKING MACHINE

Question No. 189—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Does the government anticipate receiving from the Federal Republic of Germany or firms based therein proposals for co-operation with Canada in the research and development of an ice-breaking cargo ship in (a) 1974 (b) 1975 (c) 1976?

2. What is the nature and status of present negotiations in this regard?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Canadian and West German officials have held exploratory talks to examine the possibility and desirability of some form of co-operation between the two countries in the development of cargo ships capable of icebreaking. The German government has been working for over two years with a German shipbuilder on studies of icebreaking cargo vessels—the so-called EOS class. During this time the Canadian government has been invited to discuss ways of joint co-operation on ice research and on the design and development of icebreaking cargo vessels. The results of the German work are expected to be made available to the Canadian government some time in early 1974. The Germans have stressed that this offer carries no obligation to any joint endeavour; in turn, the Canadian government has stated that agreement to study the German report implies no commitment to joint endeavour. At this stage, it is therefore not possible to state whether these talks will lead to co-operation between the Canadian and West German governments since we have, at the moment, neither sufficient information about the FGR capacity nor comparative data about the capacities of other countries and systems of transportation in ice-covered waters to take decisions regarding co-operative ventures on this field. A wide variety of approaches to the subject of transport in ice conditions will be examined as part of the policy announced last July by the Ministry of State for Science and Technology that Canada would achieve excellence within five years in transportation on and below ice covered waters. No formal proposals for co-operation with Canada have been received from the government of the Federal Republic or firms based therein; it is not possible to state at present whether such proposals should be anticipated in any of the years specified in the question.

2. There are no formal negotiations going on in this regard; the discussions taking place on this question are described above.

TONNAGE MOVED IN CANADIAN ARCTIC ARCHIPELAGO

Question No. 190—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What was the level in terms of tonnage moved in the Canadian Arctic Archipelago in each year since 1963?

2. For each year, what was the percentage of this tonnage moved in (a) Canadian (b) Commonwealth (c) other vessels?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Tonnage figures for the total cargo which was moved in the Canadian Arctic Archipelago (Arctic Islands only) during 1963/73 are not available. However, the tonnages shipped/handled to sites in the eastern Arctic during the annual Department of Transport resupply operation in the years 1963-73 inclusive, are shown in the statement attached hereto.

2. The percentages of the tonnages lifted in Canadian, Commonwealth and other vessels, during the same period, is included in the statement.

Year	Tonnage Shipped/Handled	Vessels Canadian	Commonwealth	Other
		per cent	per cent	per cent
1963	112,509 s/tons	89	Nil	11

1973	92,700 s/tons (Estimate)	100	Nil	Nil

TEAM COMMISSIONED BY GOVERNMENT TO GATHER DATA RELATING TO ICEBREAKER DESIGN

Question No. 191—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What are the names of the members of the team commissioned by the government to gather all the pertinent data to bring about a polar icebreaker design, cost estimate and anticipated Arctic traffic that it may be required to support?

2. What progress has been made to date by this group and what is (a) the present cost estimate (b) the anticipated traffic for the next ten years?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Persons from several government departments, MOT, DSS, NRC, AECL and DRB have been involved to date in the studies related to the design of a polar icebreaker. Numerous other individuals including outside consultants will be contributing to a greater or lesser degree as the studies and design progress and it is consequently not possible at this time to list the names of all the persons who have had, or will have, involvement in this group.

2. Model and full scale preliminary tests have been conducted, discussions have been held with consultants both in Canada and abroad and the undertaking of a further major study and design contract is now being considered. (a) No realistic cost estimate can be given at this time nor will be available until major ship parameters, such as dimensions and type and power level of propulsion machinery, have been determined. (b) Not known at this time.

OFFICERS DESIGNATED TO CARRY OUT INSPECTIONS UNDER ARCTIC SHIPPING POLLUTION PREVENTION REGULATIONS

Question No. 192—Mr. Forrestall:

1. How many officers of the Marine Administration of the Department of Transport have been designated as pollution officers?

2. How many selected officers of the Canadian Coast Guard have been provided with the necessary authority to carrying out inspections under the Arctic Shipping Pollution Prevention Regulations?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Three hundred and ninety.

2. One hundred and forty three.

PERMITS ISSUED UNDER THE ARCTIC SHIPPING POLLUTION PREVENTION REGULATIONS

Question No. 193—Mr. Forrestall:

1. How many vessels have been (a) inspected and issued permits under the Arctic Shipping Pollution Prevention Requirements (b) inspected and refused permits under the ASPPR?

2. Did any vessels operate in the territories under the jurisdictional purview of the ASPPR without the permits required and, if so, how many and what company owned each?

3. How many ships operated by the government were so inspected and issued such permits in the 1973 shipping season?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. (a) During the 1973 navigation season, 12 vessels were inspected and issued with Arctic Pollution Prevention certificates by the Ministry of Transport. (b) No vessels were refused Arctic Pollution Prevention Certificates for which application was made.

2. All of the vessels known to have operated in territories, to which the requirement applied, carried an Arctic Pollution Prevention Certificate issued by the Ministry of Transport or by the relevant classification society, as required by the Arctic Shipping Pollution Prevention Regulations.

3. None of the vessels operated by the government were inspected and issued with Arctic Pollution Prevention Certificates.

JOINT AIR/SEA STAGING CENTRE IN THE CANADIAN ARCTIC

Question No. 197—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What departments or agencies of government are currently involved in discussions relating to the establishment of a joint air/sea staging centre in the Canadian Arctic, particularly the High Arctic, with multi-departmental purpose including defence and transport?

2. What level of funding has been provided for such consideration?

3. What progress has been made to date with such discussions in terms of the establishment of a date at which such a centre would become essential for Canada's claim to Arctic sovereignty particularly over the Canadian Arctic Archipelago?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. The Department of National Defence and the Ministry of Transport are not discussing, with other government departments or agencies, the establishment of new air/sea staging areas in the Canadian Arctic. An air/sea staging area in the Canadian High Arctic, at Resolute Bay, is operated by the Ministry of Transport. It serves the interest of several government departments and meets transportation requirements of the resource exploration industry.

2. No funding has been provided.

3. Not applicable.

ARCTIC OPERATIONS OF "R" CLASS ICEBREAKER

Question No. 198—Mr. Forrestall:

Within what zones of the Canadian Arctic Archipelago will the R-class icebreaker be able to operate and, in each instance, for what period of time?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The R-class icebreaker will be able to operate in all the zones of the Canadian Arctic Archipelago. The period of time the ship will be operating in any particular zone will depend upon operational requirements at that particular time.

FACILITIES FOR ICE-MODEL TESTING TANKS

Question No. 199—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What are the facilities of the Department of Transport or other agencies of the government in terms of ice-model testing tanks for research and design experimentation into the construction and development of Canadian icebreaker capability?

2. Does the government assess this capability as adequate to accommodate the indicated development of a polar icebreaker and, if not, on what date can such capability be upgraded to accommodate such requirements?

3. Has the government any arrangement at the present time to share or make use of such facilities located in the United States and, if so, with what frequency have such facilities located outside Canada been employed in the past year?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. There are no ice-model testing facilities operated by the Ministry of Transport but there is one operated by the National Research Council.

2. The existing government facility is not totally adequate. The National Research Council advise us it would take about three years, $1.5 million and 12 extra staff to accommodate such requirements.

3. No arrangement for sharing or making use of any facilities exists except on a contract basis. These facilities were employed once in February of last year.

OPERATIONS OF UNITED STATES COAST GUARD ICEBREAKER "POLAR STAR"

Question No. 200—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What significance does the launching of the United States Coast Guard 60,000 shp icebreaker Polar Star by Lockheed Shipbuilding Co. Ltd. have for Canada's claim to sovereignty in the Arctic Archipelago?

2. On what date does the government envisage the use of this vessel in Arctic waters in fully operational capability?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The waters around the Alaskan coast and in the Antarctic, where the United States maintains research facilities, are ice covered for much of the year and the government does not therefore consider the launching of the United States Coast Guard icebreaker "Polar Star" has any significance with respect to Canada's claim to sovereignty in the Arctic Archipelago.

2. The government has no knowledge as to the date of use of this ship in Arctic waters in a fully operational state, however, it is understood that the Polar Star will be commissioned in late 1974.

ATTENDANCE OF TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT OFFICIALS AT LAUNCHING OF U.S. COAST GUARD ICEBREAKER

Question No. 201—Mr. Forrestall:

Were any officials of the government present at the launching of the 60,000 shp icebreaker for the US Coast Guard by Lockheed Shipbuilding Co. Ltd., of Seattle, Washington on the week-end of November 17, 1973 and, if so, what were their names and what positions do they hold?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): There were no officials of the Ministry of Transport present at the launching of the U.S. Coast Guard icebreaker on the week-end of November 11, 1973.

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON FOREIGN ICEBREAKERS

Question No. 202—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What is the policy of the government towards the granting of permission to icebreakers owned and operated by the Coast Guard of a foreign nation to operate continuously within Canada's territorial waters for purposes other than search and rescue?

2. Does this policy apply to the Canadian Arctic Archipelago and, if not, what policy in these terms does apply there?

Mr. Joseph-Phillippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. It is government policy that all requirements for the services of icebreakers within Canadian territorial waters be met by Canadian Coast Guard icebreakers.

2. Yes.

TRANSPORT—FLEET SUPPORT SHIP

Question No. 204—Mr. Forrestall:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 2,335 of the First Session of the 29th Parliament, what is the nature of the Fleet Support Ship indicated by number 166 in the Ministry of Transport's Marine Transportation Program Capital Budget Update of December 31, 1972, in terms of demands to be made of it by the government?

2. When does the government expect to see this vessel put into operational capability?

3. What class hull will such ship have and what rate of speed will it be able to maintain through six foot ice in the continuous progress mode?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The answer to question No. 2,335 indicated, under item 166, a projected requirement for a Fleet Support Ship or alternative. The matter is still under review.

2. Not applicable at this time.

3. Not applicable at this time.

CONSTRUCTION OF POLAR ICEBREAKER

Question No. 205—Mr. Forrestall:

With reference to the answer to Question No, 2,335 of the First Session of the 29th Parliament, respecting item R12 of the Ministry of Transport's Marine Transportation Program Capital Budget Update of December 31, 1972 entitled "Construction of Polar Icebreaker—$100,-000,000", when does the government now anticipate to see initial construction contracts let for this icebreaker with full polar capability?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No firm decision has been taken by the government to construct an icebreaker with full polar capability.

PORTABILITY OF PENSIONS AND RETIREMENT BENEFITS

Question No. 210—Mr. Forrestall:

1. With how many provincial governments has the government entered into arrangements to provide portability of pensions and retirement benefits of their respective public servants (a) from provincial realm to federal realm (b) from federal realm into provincial realm?

2. In each case, what groups of federal public servants are not provided for under these agreements?

3. In each case, what was the date of the agreement?

4. In each case, where no agreement exists, when is such anticipated?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): 1. (a) nine; (b) 9.

2. The only Public Service employees who are not eligible to take advantage of these agreements are those who are not contributors under the Public Service Superannuation Act.

3. British Columbia, June 24, 1955; Quebec, February 13, 1962; Alberta, May 30, 1962; Saskatchewan, April 29, 1964; New Brunswick, August 31, 1965; Ontario, May 16, 1966; Newfoundland, February 19, 1970; Prince Edward Island, June 15, 1972; Nova Scotia, August 8, 1972. Employees of the governments of both the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories are considered employees of the Public Service for purposes of the Public Service Superannuation Act.

4. Since negotiations with the province of Manitoba are currently in progress, it is not possible to anticipate the date upon which an agreement will be completed.

CIDA—PURCHASE OF GOODS AND SERVICES

Question No. 214—Mr. Forrestall:

What estimate do officials of the Canadian International Development Agency have of the percentage of funds expended by CIDA, since its inception, outside of Canada that have been returned to Canada either in the purchase of goods or services by the particular interests and countries to whom Canadian funds were initially granted?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It is virtually impossible to make an educated estimate of the percentage of funds expended by CIDA, outside of Canada, that have been returned to Canada either in the purchase of goods or services by the particular interests and countries to whom Canadian funds were initially granted. This question makes reference to untied aid for which CIDA is not provided with any procurement statistics by the recipient countries receiving this type of aid. Untied aid up to now has represented a very small portion of CIDA's over-all aid program and certainly does not exceed 15 per cent of all CIDA's expenditures. It is estimated, however, that up to 90 per cent of all CIDA's expenditures since its inception have been spent in Canada mainly in the form of purchase of food and commodities, engineering and consulting contracts, payments of various other types of service contracts, contracts with advisers and teachers and payment of scholarships to trainees.

CANADIANS IMPRISONED IN OTHER COUNTRIES

Question No. 234—Mr. Carter:

1. What are the names and addresses of all Canadian citizens imprisoned in other countries?

2. What are the dates of imprisonment and the reasons for such imprisonment?

3. What is the present legal status of each person imprisoned?

4. What action is the Department of External Affairs taking to secure the safety of such citizens being held in foreign countries?

5. What action is the Department of External Affairs taking to secure the immediate release of such citizens held in foreign countries not charged with any crime?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Foreign states are under no legal obligation to inform other governments that they have arrested or detained their nationals unless the persons concerned so request or unless the local representatives of the governments concerned should inquire. It can be the case that Canadian representatives abroad are not informed of the arrest or detention of Canadians because the particular persons concerned do not wish this to be known. Where such information is known to the Canadian authorities, its release would not be in the public interest. It would involve unnecessary humiliation to the individuals concerned, their families and their friends.

2. In view of the answer to part 1 above, the first part of part 2 cannot be answered. Canadians are imprisoned abroad for a variety of reasons including possession, use and trafficking of narcotics of all kinds, fraud, indebtedness, theft, traffic accidents and murder or attempted murder.

3. A number of Canadians held in prisons abroad have been tried and sentenced. Others are awaiting trial in accordance with the legal and judicial systems of the countries in which they are detained.

4. Canadians imprisoned in other countries are subject to the jurisdiction of local authorities who are responsible for the maintenance of law and order in their territories and their penal institutions. Legally and officially the most that Canadian representatives abroad can and usually do in such circumstances is to ensure that a Canadian citizen is treated no less fairly than other foreign nationals, or perhaps than the citizens of that country would be treated in similar circumstances, and to ensure that appropriate legal counsel is obtained.

5. Every effort is made to secure without delay the release of Canadian citizens held without charge in foreign countries.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS PUBLICITY EXPENDITURES, 1972-74

Question No. 246—Mr. Nystrom:

1. What were the amounts of money spent by the Department of External Affairs on publicity and/or information in each of the fiscal years 1972-73 and 1973-74 to date?

2. What were the names and addresses of firms and individuals who received these contracts, what amounts of money were spent in each case and what was the purpose of each contract?

3. In the case of expenditures for publicity and/or information made within the department by its publicity or information division, what was the amount in each case and the purpose of the expenditure?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Expenditures of the Department of External Affairs were as follows: 1972-73, $2,663,000; 1973-74, $1,344,-226 (to January 31, 1974).

2. The above amounts include program expenditures of an informational nature for the purchase of materials and supplies, relating to library services, microfilming, printing of publications and promotional and cultural activities. In addition contract expenditures were incurred on advertising in connection with a nation-wide publicity campaign to inform the public on requirements relative to the procurement of passports. The amounts were paid to John Doherty and Company, Ottawa, as set out below: 1972-73, $32,320; 1973-74, $312.

[Mr. Sharp.]

3. Direct program costs under the Department's Information Division were as follows:

1972-73	Expenditure	Purpose of Expenditure

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—USE OF ADVERTISING AGENCIES

Question No. 304—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What are the names and addresses of all advertising agencies used by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources since the present Minister assumed his portfolio?

2. (a) What are the amounts of all advertising contracts given such agencies during this period of time, what are the dates such contracts were awarded and in each case, were tenders or competitive presentations of any kind requested and, if not, who authorized in each case the expenditure of public funds without such tenders or competitive presentations (b) in each case, what was the general subject matter of the advertising contract?

3. What are the names and addresses of all advertising agencies used by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources during the term of the Minister's immediate predecessor and if any of these agencies has not been used since then, for what reason and on whose decision were changes made?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. None.

2. Nil.

3. None.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN AIR CANADA AND AVIS TRANSPORT OF CANADA

Question No. 325—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Has Air Canada given an exclusive two year agreement to be the primary supplier of car rentals to Air Canada to the Avis car rental firm and, if so, was this exclusive right tendered to all other car rental firms by Air Canada?

2. On what date did Avis Canada and Air Canada enter into such agreement?

3. On what date was the controlling interest of Avis Canada sold to Avis U.S.A.?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. Each year more and more passengers come to Air Canada for all elements of what is termed the "total travel experience"—an airline seat combined with a place to stay, a sight-seeing trip, a rental car, etc. As part of the activities being developed to satisfy this demand, the company has initiated a program whereby a passenger can, at the same time as making his flight arrangements, also reserve a rental car. Each of the three major rent-a-car firms in Canada (Tilden, Avis and Hertz) was approached regarding participation in this program. Proposals were reviewed and a complete plan selected which best satisfied Air Canada's commercial and service interests. The plan involves certain arrangements with Avis. However, these are non-exclusive; if the customer asks for a Tilden car or one from any other particular agency, an attempt is made to satisfy his request.

2. February 1973.

3. This is not known by the government.

BELL CANADA SURVEY ON AIR CANADA FLIGHTS

Question No. 326—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Did Bell Canada hand out questionnaires to passengers boarding Air Canada flights in Toronto on October 15, 1973 and, if so, who authorized it?

2. What fee did Bell Canada pay for this privilege?

3. To whom did Bell Canada pay this fee?

4. What is the procedure that one would use who would like to use the facilities of the government and Air Canada to do a survey?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. Yes, with the Corporation's authorization.

2 and 3. No fee was paid. The Corporation will be compensated in the form of useful marketing data and information resulting from the survey.

4. There is no set procedure. The Corporation co-operates with the federal government (The Office of Tourism, the Canadian Transport Commission, the Ministry of Transport), provincial governments and tourist boards and other airlines and industries in the conduct of such surveys; each one is handled on its own merits and generally in a different way.

TRANSFER OF INMATES FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY

Question No. 327—Mr. Reynolds:

What are the names and sentences of the eight most difficult inmates transferred from the British Columbia Penitentiary to other institutions in Canada and to what institutions were they transferred?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): It is not considered in the public interest to divulge the names of eight inmates who were transferred from British Columbia Penitentiary in the latter part of October 1973 nor to divulge the names of the institutions to which these inmates have been transferred. The publication of this information would only provide these inmates with an opportunity to gain status among other inmates and to confirm them as leaders, a consequence which is most undesirable in any institution and definitely not in the interest of the maintenance of good order and discipline in the Federal Penal Institutions. In addition, it is necessary to preserve the anonymity of these inmates so as to avoid unnecessary humiliation to them, their families and friends.

CANADIAN PENITENTIARY SERVICE—EMPLOYMENT OF MR. AND MRS. BRIAN MURPHY

Question No. 333—Mr. Reynolds:

Were Mr. Brian Murphy and his wife Jeanette of Surrey, British Columbia committed to stand trial on a charge of cultivating marijuana following the completion of a preliminary hearing and, if so, will the Solicitor General (a) suspend their operations as researchers for the Canadian Penitentiary Service (b) comply with the wishes of the penitentiary staff and make sure they have no further admittance to the British Columbia penitentiary until after their trial is completed?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Yes. (a) and (b) Mrs. J. Murphy who had been employed on a contractual basis terminated her employment with the Canadian Penitentiary Service at the end of May, 1973. It is not intended to suspend the operations of Mr. Brian Murphy as a researcher nor to deny him admission to the British Columbia Penitentiary when necessary in the performance of his duties. Mr. Murphy is employed on a study of inmates' profiles and his work, unlike that of correctional officers, does not require him to be in daily, continual contact with inmates in a supervisory teaching or counselling relationship. His continued employment, pending disposition of the charges now before the courts, does not in any way jeopardize the security of the institution.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—COMMUNICATION OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Question No. 351—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

On what occasion and for what reasons has the Department of External Affairs assumed responsibility for communicating statements of government policy to any or all provinces?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The white paper of 1968 entitled "Federalism and International Relations" (Catalogue No. E2-6368) outlined the nature and extent of the co-operative relationship to be developed between the federal and provincial levels of government in the implementation of Canada's foreign policy. In accordance with the policies outlined in the white paper, the department conducts active and on-going discussions with the provinces on questions of foreign policy involving provincial interests. The department's Federal-Provincial co-ordinating division assures the necessary liaison on a day-to-day basis. On occasion, other departments have requested, and have been granted, the use of the department's telex communication facilities to communicate government policy, other than foreign policy, to the provinces. On these occasions the department's role was technical rather than substantive.

AGRICULTURE

SUBSIDY TO BEEF PRODUCERS—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, whose announcement of a subsidy on certain grades of beef seems to have created a degree of confusion unusual even following announcements by this government. I would ask him whether the subsidy is to be included in the price the processor pays on buying beef or whether it is to be added to the price the processor pays for beef?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, when the right hon. Leader of the Opposition asks—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I am so used to answering questions about beef and farming put by the right hon. member for Prince Albert that I got a little confused.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I apologize to the Leader of the Opposition. Later this day I hope to have in the possession of every opposition member all the details of how this program is to work, so that it can be readily understood. We realize there is some confusion about a plan like this, especially in the minds of opposition members. We want it to be in plain language so they can readily understand it and explain it to their constituents in order that the whole country can understand the plan as it should operate.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to overtax the mind of the Minister of Agriculture, but I wonder whether he can answer the very simple question I asked him. Is the subsidy to be included in the price the processor pays, and therefore kept by the processor, or is it to be added to the price paid by the processor? It is not a question of confusion in the minds of the opposition; it is a question of confusion in the minds of the people in the trade.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the whole formula that must be followed, if this is to be a success, is not that easy to recount in one answer to one little question. I can say this, Mr. Speaker: It will be a fair policy.

Mr. Fairweather: What is it? We do not know whether it is fair until we hear it.

Mr. Whelan: It will be in line with what some members of the opposition have been asking, that consumers should not have to pay more for beef, etc., and that the government should be participating in this kind of program. What it does mean is that the packers and the processors will be paying the price and they will be reimbursed for it.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask another supplementary question which is necessary in order to try to get rid of the existing confusion. I understand from the answer the minister gave me that the subsidy will in fact be paid to the processor and will not be added to the price paid to the producer by the processor. I wish to ask the minister a question about this subsidy which is to be paid to the processor, who may very well be buying cattle from jobbers, that is, cattle imported from the United States. Why is the minister subsidizing the possible importation of United States cattle with the Canadian taxpayers' money in this way?

● (1430)

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the initial announcement clearly stated this is a subsidy on Canadian cattle for Canadian consumers. That means the meat must be consumed in Canada. Accurate records must be kept of all accounts, bills of sale and so on, so these can be checked by both their auditors and our auditors to ensure this is carried out in a proper manner.

Mr. Stanfield: What assurance can the minister give that all cattle bought by processors and on which a subsidy is paid will in fact be produced in Canada and not imported from the United States?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we know all the cattle—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker: Have you got them on the voters' list?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The steers are conservative.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, it may sound strange to say that you can tell an American animal from a Canadian one, but you can tell. Any good feeder or buyer can tell by looking at them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: All cattle brought in from the United States on consignment are directed right to the packing firm. There would be no doubt as to the proper identification of American cattle or Canadian cattle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SUBSIDY TO BEEF PRODUCERS—REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE TO ENSURE THAT PRODUCERS AND CONSUMERS BENEFIT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. As the new policy is designed to benefit the consumer and the producer, will the minister consider setting up an advisory committee in the early stages of this plan, possibly with representatives from the National Farmers Union or other representative groups in agriculture, to ensure that the money goes to the producer and that the consumer gets the benefit?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think that is a worthy suggestion. It will be considered. But I can tell the hon. member that we have had meetings as late as 15 minutes ago with people who represent the farmers and beef producers of this nation. I understand my officials have been in consultation with the Consumers Association because of their concern that the benefit be passed on to consumers. This is a worthy suggestion and it will be considered.

SUBSIDY TO BEEF PRODUCERS—ISSUANCE OF INSTRUCTIONS TO TRADE ON ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to my leader's question to the Minister of Agriculture and further to the minister's announcement last Friday of the seven cent subsidy. In view of the extreme confusion and nearly disastrous conditions presently existing on the Toronto cattle market where very heavy deliveries have already been made today although the market had not opened up to 15 minutes ago, and in view of the same confusion in cattle markets all across Canada together with the very real prospect of an immediate beef cattle market drop, will the minister now clearly indicate whether his department has issued working instructions to the trade on how the subsidy is actually to be administered so that markets all across Canada can open for business today?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if it has not been done at this time, it will be done shortly. They were certainly forewarned on Friday that this plan was going into effect. That is why it was announced on Friday. With the consent of the House, we made the announcement so that the trade would be prepared for it today. There may be some nitty-gritties to try to work out, difficulties in regard to technicalities, but I am sure that once the program is understood by all concerned it will work to the benefit of the beef industry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see at least three or four members seeking supplementaries on this subject. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Medicine Hat and then try to complete the first round of questions. I will then return to all hon. members who have supplementaries on this very important matter. The hon. member for Medicine Hat will be recognized for one supplementary for the moment.

Mr. Hargrave: Further to the minister's comment on the possibility of American cattle coming into Canada, will he indicate the procedure of payment? Will the minister explain how he intends to prevent heavy feeder cattle imports from the United States benefiting from this subsidy? I ask this very practical question notwithstanding your comment on this on Friday and just now.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked a question. I do not think it is in order to explain why he asked the question. Perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply.

Mr. Whelan: All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that we know American and Canadian prices did not vary very much on Friday. There was not that much difference. It would not have paid anyone to bring in any kind of cattle from the United States at that time. The cattle in the Toronto yards today are cattle bought last Thursday and Friday and shipped in. We are hoping the market will be taken over by Canadian cattle and there will be no need to buy cattle from the United States. If there is an influx of cattle from the United States other than the normal good grade cattle we want from Canadian yards, we will have to take further action.

Mr. Speaker: I will return to the hon. member for Medicine Hat in a moment. I suggest to hon. members that in fairness we should try to complete the first round of questioning and then return to this matter.

TRADE

DEFICIT UNDER CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—ACTION BY MINISTER TO OBTAIN GREATER INVESTMENT IN CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Considering that the $356 million deficit in Canada-United States automotive trade for last year, the first since 1969, is undoubtedly related to the fact that 95 per cent of the investment in the industry was on the United States side of the border in each of the past two years, will the minister inform the House what he has done to obtain assurance that investment in the industry this year will ensure that Canada gets its fair share?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we do not regard these figures with any enthusiasm at all when they go into a deficit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: It should be equally clear that the United States does not regard the reverse with any enthusiasm. I would hope that with the operation of the agreement in the future, as in the past, we can expect swings around a neutral point. With regard to the specific question as to the effect of investment, he is correct that approximately 95 per cent or slightly more of the investment on a pro rata basis took place in the United States in the past few years. However, I do not think that was the reason for the heavy swing this past year. Based on the advice I have received, the reason was the unprecedented demand in Canada for North American made vehicles.

Mr. Broadbent: Since the demand for vehicles in itself cannot explain it, because one has to consider the components of the vehicles, whether they are Canadian or United States produced parts, and considering that there was a deficit in Canada in terms of automotive parts amounting to over $1 billion last year, would the minister assure the House that with reference to the parts sector the government intends to make representations at least to the automotive manufacturers, if not to the United States government itself, in an effort to ensure that a greater percentage of the parts that go into vehicles assembled in Canada are produced in this country?

● (1440)

Mr. Gillespie: If the hon. member would look at the report from Statistics Canada from which he quoted earlier he would see that parts production in Canada rose very substantially. Indeed, so did automobile production. Production and export from Canada last year were unprecedented.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: As to the point the hon. member made with respect to investment, may I say I have made representations to the automobile manufacturers, both in the United States and in Canada, representations addressed to the senior officers of those corporations, with respect to the level of investment in this country and what we would expect in future in terms of automobile investment.

HOUSING

SUBSIDIES FOR CONSTRUCTION OF SOCIAL CENTRES—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Last November, the minister announced in a speech that the government intended to help the provinces and municipalities under the terms of the Housing Act and contribute up to 50 per cent of the construction costs of community centres such as sports centres. Could the minister say whether the government policy is definite or when it will be?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure my announcement indicated we would assist solely in the building of sports centres. The announcement related to the provisions of the neighbourhood improvement program. This is essentially a housing program although it is designed to enhance the whole of the neighbourhood affected, and certain essential neighbourhood facilities would be available. We have entered into agreements with most of the provinces with regard to the application of neighbourhood improvement schemes. Only last week I discussed the application of the program in the province of Quebec. I anticipate reaching agreement with the provincial minister very shortly.

AGRICULTURE

SUBSIDY TO BEEF PRODUCERS—POSITION OF FEEDERS—PREVENTION OF RUSHING OF CATTLE TO MARKET

Mr. Norval Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture arising from the subsidy announcement made last Friday. There will be excessive runs of cattle to market as a result of which prices will undoubtedly be depressed to the point at which neither the producer nor the consumer will benefit from the subsidy. Would the minister consider assuring those who buy short-keep feeders that this plan will still be in operation when they return them to the market? Will the minister also extend the periods from April 6 and April 13 in respect of A-3 and A-4 steers so that the glut on the market in the next few weeks will not be so great?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The dates April 13 and April 6 were chosen so that people would not be inclined to rush to the market, but we want enough cattle to supply the Canadian market. We have announced that this program will be kept in force until the beef market returns to normal. We are also working on a long-term program covering not only beef products but other red meat products. If we have a long-term agreement ready to put into force, and if agreement has been reached with the provinces in this regard, we shall put it into force; it will take over from this other plan, one which we realize is an emergency plan to meet the present situation.

Mr. Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): Surely the minister realizes there will be a tremendous run of cattle in the next short while and that it will far exceed the capacity of the market to accept. Those dates are far too early. It is rumoured this morning that the packer-buyers are going to ask $4 less per pound, which will take away the 7-cent—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary is more debate than a question. I am sure hon. members would not wish to prolong this subject too long, although I see a number of members are still seeking to be recognized for supplementaries. It might be we could spend the whole 40 minutes on this one subject, but I am not sure that is what hon. members want. Perhaps I might recognize the hon. member for Medicine Hat who asked the first supplementary, I believe, and then I will recognize the hon. member for Halton.

SUBSIDY TO BEEF PRODUCERS—POSSIBLE APPLICATION TO IMPORTED FEEDER CATTLE

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should like to return to the subject of my first supplementary on the possible importation of heavy feeder cattle, not killing cattle sent to the packing plants. Surely the minister is aware that it is possible for these cattle to enter the country, be held here for three or four weeks and then slaughtered, and their owners would be eligible for the subsidy. How will it be possible for the minister physically to identify these cattle?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): A lot of the cattle being fed and put on the market right now in southwestern Ontario did come from the United States as feeder cattle. I am sure the hon. member is aware of this. It is a custom which has been followed for years; feeder cattle imported from the United States are finished in Canada and are sold as Canadian cattle. I do not know how we would overcome this situation. At the present time there is no movement of feeder cattle into southwestern Ontario although such a movement could easily develop. I am not prepared to say what we would do in those circumstances, because I believe the hon. member for Medicine Hat has stated many times that he wants the North American market for cattle—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRADE

DEFICIT UNDER CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—STEPS TO RENEGOTIATE SAFEGUARDS

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): I have a supplementary for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce relative to previous questions. In view of the significant deficit recorded in trade figures already announced and in view of the increasing price gap evident from figures announced last week, would the minister tell us what specific steps he is prepared to take with his counterparts in the United States—not within the industry, which we recognize as being almost wholly owned in the United States—to renegotiate the safeguards in the auto pact, perhaps in the direction of establishing mutual safeguards which would protect both countries?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I should like to make it quite clear that I do not accept the figures the hon. member put on the record last week. I think I should make it quite clear to him, as he did not make clear to us, that he was using 1972 figures for the calendar year 1972 before we took our action. Second, he was using figures for a typical vehicle, not for a weighted average of all vehicles. If he looked at it from that point of view I think he would find that the statement I made and the statement he made do not bear any relationship with one another. Mine was correct. His was not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope we shall not become involved in a debate or argument between the hon. member and the minister.

Mr. O'Connor: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would point out that the figures I used in connection with the price gap widening were 1973 model figures, not 1972. They were clearly indicated in the report of the President of the United States to Congress, and I do not know how the minister justifies his interpretation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would say that both the minister and the hon. member are out of order when they debate who is right and who is not. We should return to questions and answers. The hon. member may ask his supplementary.

Mr. O'Connor: Mr. Speaker, the minister effectively raised a smokescreen by debating the figures I gave last week. I ask him now to answer the question I put to him a few moments ago.

Mr. Gillespie: I hope the hon. member will take a look at the difference between a 1973 model and the 1972 year. I should like to make it clear to him and to the House, as I have in the past—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rose on a point of order, and after making that point of order he asked the same question he had earlier. He was not satisfied with the minister's first reply—

An hon. Member: There was no reply.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest we go on to the next question.

Oral Questions

LABOUR RELATIONS

STRIKE BY SEAFARERS' UNION—ACTION TO SETTLE—REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. It has to do with a very serious situation in that a couple of hundred dock workers, members of the Seafarers' International Union, are already on strike. The threat has been made that the rest of the 3,750 members will not show up on fitting day which, as it happens, is April 1. I ask the minister what is being done to settle this strike, because, if it goes ahead, it will be a knock-out for the western producer of wheat and other grain for export.

● (1450)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I fully realize, as does the government, how serious this situation could become, especially if the strike carried on after April 1, the normal opening of the shipping season. Experienced and knowledgeable mediators with the Department of Labour have been meeting with the parties, union and management. The last report we have is that the positions are quite clear. They are still apart, but the mediators and all the facilities of my department, including any efforts that I can make, are available to the parties in the hope that this dispute can be resolved. I feel there is still sufficient time to permit a settlement before serious damage can be done.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the right hon. gentleman—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Perhaps hon. members would let me mention—I am sure the House will be happy to know this—that the strike involving Air Canada was settled over the weekend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: We read that in the newspapers.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister would want to revert to motions for the purpose of making a statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I asked about one thing and the answer is about another. I now ask the minister whether the government, in view of the fact that negotiations under the federal negotiator or mediator have virtually broken down, will bring this matter before parliament before April 1, unless a settlement is arrived at, in order that action may be taken so that this strike will not continue, or will the government follow the alternative of getting in touch with that Liberal protegé, Banks, who was always able to settle strikes?

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Diefenbaker: He was the best mediator of all until he became a refugee from justice.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I think it has been the history of labour negotiations at the national level that it has never paid to deny the right to strike to employees to whom parliament has given the right to strike.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Regardless of the national interest?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I would also indicate that the right hon. gentleman must be well aware of the position of his own party, as I understand it, which is not to deny the right to strike to employees.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that was not an answer and I rise to ask a supplementary question.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the right hon. gentleman but he should give me the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will now ask the question once more, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's loud protestations all over the country recently in respect of his new ideas on labour relations, will he assure the people of Canada and in particular the farmers that this strike is not going to go on, thus avoiding a further knock-out blow to the western farmers?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it is my belief that the farmers fully realize how oversimplified the hon. gentleman's remarks can be.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): They realize that a denial of the right to strike to workers does not ensure a resumption of work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is an asinine attempt at an answer.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REASON FOR EXCLUSION OF YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES FROM GRANTS AND LOANS

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in his capacity as the minister for northern development. Will he explain to this House why residents of the Yukon and Northwest Territories have been excluded from the right to apply for DREE grants and loans?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the problem is now under study by my department and that of Regional Economic Expansion. As soon as we have an announcement to make, I shall be pleased to make it to the House.

[English]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Get a load of the new image.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I see the Minister of National Health and Welfare smiling, at least I have some hair on top.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You have some on top, but nothing inside.

Mr. Nielsen: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Was his special assistant, Paul White, expressing government policy when he announced in Whitehorse—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member can ask the question directly. I would hope the hon. member knows what the practice is—I am not sure about the rules—in respect of questions respecting statements made outside the House. If questions are asked about statements made outside the House by officials, including special assistants, we will get into difficulty. I am sure the hon. member can ask the question directly.

Mr. Nielsen: Forgetting the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, which is already on the record, was the statement made an expression of government policy to the effect that DREE was going to apply and did apply to the two northern territories?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think it is well known that the government is studying the problem, but it is good to have the views of Yukoners representing both parties.

Mr. Stanfield: What about the third party?

Mr. Nielsen: That does not answer the question.

SPORTS

POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER CANADA-RUSSIA HOCKEY GAMES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the great interest generated by the Canada-USSR hockey series and the honour which fell upon us, may I ask the minister if he can tell the House whether he is willing to recommend another event of this kind, and if so, whether he will soon make a statement to that effect?

Mr. Speaker: I am under the impression that the first part of the hon. member's question could easily be placed on the order paper. If the hon. member simply asks the minister if he intends to make a statement on motions, the minister could answer that part of the question, after which we will move on to the next question.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have been approached by Soviet representatives. If it is in the interest of Canada to hold such a series, I am sure that the members of the House will share my enthusiasm for such a project, provided all Canadian players, no matter which league they belong to, can take part. I have therefore instructed Hockey Canada to invite Canadian interested parties to consider the situation.

INCOME TAX

OFFERING BY WINNIPEG FIRM OF IMMEDIATE REBATES BUT IN LOWER AMOUNTS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Is he aware of the practice in Winnipeg where a firm offers immediate rebates on income tax returns but at an amount lower than what the Department of National Revenue would return as a particular rebate? If so, what steps will the minister take to ensure that Canadians will receive tax refunds as quickly as possible to avoid having to turn to these practitioners of usury?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I deplore the practice the hon. member mentions. I think both the provincial and federal governments should be examining ways to avoid people being victimized by such operators. On the other hand, people are free in this country to raise money on the expectation of funds or assets coming to them. It is a difficult question. The government of Manitoba could take some steps, as hon. members know, and I have some ideas as to what the federal government might do. The province of Quebec has taken a step which has been quite effective in that province. It is not only federal action which might be effective in this regard.

● (1500)

Mr. McKenzie: It is alleged that they keep between 40 per cent and 70 per cent of the rebate as a charge for providing ready cash. I believe the government should be preparing measures in co-operation with the provinces to eliminate or control this practice.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might comment.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member was implying, and if so I agree with him completely, that one thing we can do is try to speed up as much as possible the process of getting refunds out to the taxpayers. This year those refunds are going out three times as fast as they did last year. I think that is a way in which we can help to discourage that kind of activity.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I remind hon. members that we are running short of time. I see some 25 or 30 members rising. There are less than five minutes before the end of the question period. I would hope we could limit the number of supplementaries. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond has a supplementary and will be recognized.

ALLEGED ERRONEOUS ISSUANCE OF T4 SLIP BY SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief supplementary for the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister undertake to investigate how the Sydney Steel Corporation can send out a T4 slip to somebody who was never employed by the steel company and call themselves the employer?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—REQUEST FOR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION OF COMPULSORY PILOTAGE PROPOSAL

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is he in a position to give a favourable reply to the request of the government of Prince Edward Island that the proposal to impose compulsory pilotage at the four main ports of that province will not be done at least until such time as the representations of the government of Prince Edward Island have been sympathetically considered?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am in the very unenviable position of having to state that the four regulations concerning the Atlantic, the Laurentians, the Great Lakes and the Pacific are still on my desk. I have not yet been able to approve them because of the objections which were made on this subject. Among those who have objected is the Prince Edward Island premier.

INCOME TAX

SUPPLYING OF NAMES AND ADDRESSES ON TAX RETURNS FOR COMMERCIAL PURPOSES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. When names and addresses from income tax returns are supplied to government agencies for the purposes of those agencies are there restrictions, undertakings or agreements that those mailing lists are not to be re-released for private commercial purposes?

Oral Questions

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Revenue exchanges information with other departments in accordance with a particular section of the Income Tax Act. I believe there is a section in the Statistics Act and sections in the Canada Pension Plan and other legislation. I would have to know the particular case the hon. member has in mind, but if he will look at those sections of the acts he will see the limitations that are placed on the use of that information.

STATISTICS CANADA

SUPPLYING OF MAILING LISTS FOR COMMERCIAL PURPOSES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister confirm whether it is government policy that enables Statistics Canada, for instance, to release confidential mailing lists, which were supplied originally by the Income Tax Department, to private business which then uses those lists to send out advertising and junk mail circulars?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the agency, Statistics Canada, operates under the Statistics Act. It does not receive direction from me or the government concerning its policies. It is governed by the act itself. As to the particular practice the hon. member has raised, I believe the agency has in the past engaged in such commercial services. I have made inquiries and have found out that this is a perfectly legal practice under the act. I have reviewed the situation with them have asked them to reconsider the practice, and they have undertaken to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period. If the hon. member asks a second supplementary that will have to be the end of the question period.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, obviously other people share the minister's doubts. Will the minister, therefore, if he has conducted an inquiry into this matter through his department, please table the results of that investigation for us or, if he has not conducted an inquiry, will he please do so?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased at some later date to indicate to the House, after the matter is fully considered, what the decision of Statistics Canada is.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I brought to the attention of hon. members a moment ago that we have gone beyond the time allotted for the question period. The hon. member for Hastings has a supplementary and will be recognized, after which I will have to call orders of the day.

[Mr. Lawrence.]

ALLEGED ERROR IN REPORTING UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE DEFICIT

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who reports for Statistics Canada. In one of their bulletins they report that the annual deficit for unemployment insurance last year was slightly over $2 million. I want to know whether there is a mistake there or whether the government does not know the difference between $1 million and $1 billion?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to discuss this question with the hon. member and draw it to the attention of the agency.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

YUKON, NORTHWEST TERRITORIES AND CANADA ELECTIONS ACTS

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING COUNCILS AND ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-9, to amend the Yukon Act, the Northwest Territories Act and the Canada Elections Act be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development:

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the second time I have had the pleasure of bringing a proposal before this House to amend the Yukon and Northwest Territories Acts and to give the people of the Yukon and Northwest Territories more control of government there. In 1970, you will recall, this House approved measures to increase the lifespan of territorial councils to four years, to enable the councils to prescribe the qualifications of voters and candidates in the territorial elections and establish their own indemnities, and to give the territorial governments authority over the administration of justice. This House also increased the size of the Northwest Territories Council to 14, and reduced the number of appointed members from five to four.

These measures represented an important advance in the constitutional growth of the territorial governments. Only four years have passed since we approved these changes—a very short time when you consider the historical evolution of government in Canada. But these have been years of unprecedented development in the north, of economic growth and social advance. Let me take a moment to give you some examples: the rate of population growth in the territories is about twice the national average; the Yukon population is estimated at 21,000 and the Northwest Territories at 39,000. The gross product for both territories, an indication roughly equivalent to the national gross national product, stands at approximately $275 million, close to 50 per cent more than the corresponding figure for 1970. The value of loans to northern businesses under the Small Business Loan Funds has increased from $375,000 in 1970-71 to over $800,000 in 1972-73.

Mineral production in the territories rose from $211 million in 1970 to an estimated $316 million last year. The number of tourists visiting both territories has increased from 80,000 to 300,000 in the past ten years. Oil and gas exploration expenditures rose from $122 million in 1970 to an estimated $250 million last year. The wholesale value of eskimo arts and crafts is estimated at over $3 million for 1973.

This record of economic growth is impressive, but so are the advances that have been made in regard to social improvements in the territories. One measure of this is the growth in the provision of government services. For example in 1970-71 the government of the Northwest Territories had a budget of about $72 million. In 1973-74, the budget had increased to more than $120 million. In the Yukon, a similar comparison shows a budget of about $25 million in 1970-71, which increased to more than $49 million in 1973-74.

These figures reflect real progress in social development over the last four years. For example, a northern rental housing program for Indians and Eskimos of the NWT expanded by 350 housing units, and low income housing in both territories increased by 875 units; significant growth in the number of employment opportunities for native people in the government service on such projects as the Higher North Program for clearing the right of way for the Mackenzie highway, in private industry, in mining and oil and gas exploration activities, and in training programs for teacher's aids, dental assistants, and interpreters in native languages; construction of some 300 miles of new roads at a cost of $63 million since 1970; the construction of four remote airstrips, 14 resource airstrips, and numerous emergency airstrips; the creation of 11 new municipalities, including one city, two towns and eight hamlets in the Northwest Territories, and the expansion of the city of Whitehorse to a community of more than 11,000 people. These figures on government expenditures of course also relate to the provision of basic services, such as municipal infra structure, to the growth and expansion of educational services, and to social assistance and community development.

All of this gives you some idea of the scope of change that has taken place in the territories in the past four years. It strongly reinforces the case for the introduction of further steps toward the assumption of greater responsibilities by the people of both territories. The case for giving the people of the territories more control over their affairs is also strengthened by our experience with operation of the changes which this House approved four years ago and with the arrangement we introduced then to give the elected representatives a voice on the executive side of government.

As you know, I undertook to have elected councillors in the Yukon participate directly in the administration of the territorial government. I arranged with the commissioner of the Yukon to establish an executive committee to advise him in his duties and, on the recommendation of the whole legislative council, to appoint two elected councillors to serve full time and for each to assume responsibility for the direction of one or more departments of territorial government.

In my view, this joining of the executive and legislative sides of territorial government has worked well. The legislative council has responded positively to this initiative and the elected executive committee members have done an admirable job of discharging their important responsibilities. The commissioner has routinely sought the advice of the executive committee on all major matters under his administration.

The changes I am proposing today to the Yukon and Northwest Territories Act are intended to build upon this tradition; to fulfill my government's commitment to provide for the further evolution of self-government in the territories and to meet the needs of the people of the territories for more control over their affairs, to have more say in the decisions that affect them. I should mention that I have discussed these proposals in the past two months in Yellowknife and Whitehorse with members of both territorial councils. We have had a free exchange of views, and their ideas have been a great help to me in formulating these proposals.

Let me deal with the changes that affect the Yukon Act first. This bill proposes a substantial expansion in the membership of the Yukon Council from the present seven to a total of 12 elected members. This measure is designed to reflect the increased population of the Yukon and its geographical diversity. This expansion of council is strongly recommended by both the commissioner and the present Yukon Council. The most recent council asked for a substantial increase in council membership and the appointment of a third councillor to the executive committee.

It is my intention to complement the larger council by increasing the number of elected councillors on the executive committee from two to three. Under such an arrangement the commissioner would remain chairman, but during the life of the next council it may be desirable to reduce the number of appointed members of the executive committee, and I will consult the council about this. Any reduction in the number of appointed members on the executive committee would leave the elected members in a majority position.

The bill also provides for increases or decreases in the size of the council in line with future changes in the Yukon's population. This is a new approach and I believe an important provision, especially since significant population fluctuations may occur as a result of changes in the largely resource based territorial economy.

The other proposed amendments to the Yukon Act are designed to clarify existing provisions or practices. They have no policy implications and are adequately described in the bill.

The changes I am proposing to the Northwest Territories Act are necessarily different from those to the Yukon Act. As you know, the Yukon Territory has had a fully elected legislative council since the turn of the century. The most important change to the Northwest Territories Act is to establish a fully elected territorial council by replacing the four appointed members with four elected members. It is also proposed to increase the size of the council to 15 members, all elected. The council has advised me that this will ensure balanced representation in the territories. The appointed members of the Northwest Territories Council have, over the years, contributed greatly of their time and experience to the work of the council, and we are grateful to them. However, the course of northern development which I have already described persuades me that there are capable northern residents now who can and should represent the people of the north in the operation of their government.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the institution of a fully elective board, I suggest that one of the members act as chairman and that he sit in the chair instead of the commissioner during the sittings of the council.

The present provisions have met a practical need, but it now seems more appropriate to adopt the practice used in other legislative bodies which follow the British parliamentary tradition.

For similar reasons, we must redefine the quorum of the Council for voting purposes. Moreover, I intend increasing further the authority of the Territorial Council by agreeing with the Northwest Territories Commissioner that two elected members of the council be appointed to the Territorial Executive Council.

Each member of the executive council will be responsible for managing one or more departments of the territorial government. Hon. members will note that we do not plan to interfere with the freedom of that important executive committee through rigid legislative measures. On the contrary, we want it to grow and mature within the unwritten constitution of the Territories much as the cabinet and political parties developed in England, and the legislative bodies, federal and provincial, did in Canada. The BNA Act does not allude to the cabinet; similarly, the executive committees of the two Territories are not mentioned in the Yukon Act or the Northwest Territories Act.

As we know, Mr. Speaker, tradition and usage are as important as written law in the formulation of efficient government practices.

Mr. Speaker, the other amendments proposed are the logical result of the institution of a council that is elected exclusively; they are necessary to clarify some present provisions of the act, but they do not alter its purpose. Those amendments are explained in the bill.

I want to underline the fact that basically those amendments are an important step in the progress of the evolution of the governments of the Territories, and that this new step corresponds to the wishes of the councillors. To my mind, those amendments go much further than most would think in the process of handing to the peoples of the Territories control of their administration.

For instance, the councils have as much power and latitude in the study of their estimates as any legislative body in Canada, and its members have similar power to those of the provincial members to influence the orientation of the planned expenditures or to change them. Indeed the two constituent statutes of the Territories provide that the Commissioner must administer the Territories according to the instructions given if necessary by the Governor in Council or myself which is, in my opinion, advisable at that stage of the constitutional development of the Territories; however, that discretionary power is very seldom used.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, during my last visit in the Yukon, some advisers took me to task for not intervening often enough in the administration of the affairs of the Yukon and I answered that I would rather follow the present system than interfering as I saw fit, unless a serious situation would require an intervention of the federal government.

In Yukon, the two advisers who are members of the executive committee play a very important role, not only in reviewing estimates but also in explaining them to their council colleagues. As I already stated, it is understood that the Northwest Territories will have a similar system which will provide the elected members and through them, the people of the Territories, a greater control over their administration and a more realistic participation in their financial affairs.

Some advisers questioned the relevance of the provisions concerning the appropriation of public funds contained both in the Yukon Act and the Northwest Territories Act. Here is this provision:

> It is not lawful for the Council to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue of the Territories, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the Council by message of the Commissioner in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

Mr. Speaker, hon. members are aware that this principle is expressed in almost identical terms in the British North America Act. This principle applies to both Parliament and provincial legislative assemblies.

[English]

I have consistently tried to ensure that the Territorial Councils have as much authority and autonomy as possible. I believe both councils have considerably more power than they are given credit for, and I believe that these amendments significantly increase their responsibilities.

In conclusion, I want to say I am hopeful that the increases in the number of elected members will encourage more native people to seek to participate in the government of the territories. The evolution of territorial government is taking place in the context of important developments in the affairs of native northerners. We have seen remarkable growth in the native associations, and in the capabilities of their leaders. Currently, we are dealing with the difficult problems of native land claims. I hope these amendments will encourage the native people and all northerners to take an active role in territorial affairs. In this connection I should mention Bill C-11, which my colleague, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), introduced. It proposes to amend the British North America Act to provide for one senator for each territory.

These are exciting times in Canada's north, with great potential for both economic development and social improvement. Canadians across the land are increasingly aware of this potential, of the north's importance for Canada's future energy supplies, of the need to protect the northern environment, and of the cultural aspirations of the native people. This national interest in the north is healthy and encouraging. But more important yet is the interest of all northerners in their own affairs.

The bill which is now before the House, Mr. Speaker, is introduced in recognition of the aspirations of the populations of both northern territories for further steps in the evolution of self-government. We are building on the progress which this House legislated a short four years ago. As the population of each territory grows, and as the economy of each territory strengthens, I am confident that further steps will be necessary. I hope that the members of the House will agree that the substantial constitutional advances proposed in this bill are necessary and are worthy of the support of the House.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, while listening to the minister's opening remarks I thought he was going to treat us to a reading of the annual report. His recital of the recent growth in the industrial and social sectors of the north mystified me because, in spite of his recognition, that development surely merits a much more substantial bill than the one which we have before us today.

We in this party are glad to see the measures in Bill C-9 finally brought before the House, even though it took the government a long time to get around to these few faltering steps toward more autonomy for the northern territories. Within a month after this 29th parliament first sat, now well over a year ago, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) pointed out to the minister the necessity for a prompt revision of the Yukon Act and the Northwest Territories Act if the changes which are envisaged in Bill C-9 were to be in effect for the territorial council elections scheduled for 1974. That plea fell on unreceptive ears for well over a year, and now we approach the election deadline, making allowance for the six months which the Chief Electoral Officer must have to make the necessary boundary changes and other revisions.

With this deadline upon us we belatedly have Bill C-9 introduced. Because of these limitations in time we will be supporting the amendments in principle. We know they must be enacted speedily, if they are to take effect for the forthcoming elections, and we want to see them implemented as far in advance of that event as is possible. That is not to say, however, that we will not endeavour to have Bill C-9 amended and strengthened at committee stage, but we are cognizant of the deadline situation in which the minister has placed this House and the people of the north by his procrastination which leaves us no choice but to accept the major provisions of this bill.

I hope the minister is equally ardent in his wish for speedy passage of Bill C-6 regarding the national parks and that he will work with the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) to have that bill reintroduced at report stage at the earliest possible date. We have given our assurance on a number of occasions that we would welcome the speedy completion of deliberation on the parks bill. We want to see the new parks formally established, and I would encourage the minister to have that bill brought forward immediately and passed. Certainly, that is the wish of members in this party.

Having said that we will support the provisions of Bill C-9, an act to amend the Yukon Act, the Northwest Territories Act and the Canada Elections Act, in principle, I wish to make it very clear to the minister that we are in no way satisfied with this simplistic piece of legislation which he has laboured so long and hard to produce. Speaking in the throne speech debate, I emphasized that this party would look for something more than mere thinkering with the political structures in the Territories when the amendments to the Yukon Act and the Northwest Territories Act were introduced.

The concession before us to allow for a fully elected council in the Northwest Territories is important. The addition of five members to the Yukon Council will provide more adequate representation, but surely the minister is not trying to make us believe that by merely playing a numbers game he is removing the stigma of colonialism which permeates the north. Numbers of elected representatives can fluctuate, appointed councillors can come and go, but until real authority, fiscal authority, is handed over to the elected councils, parliamentary democracy in the north remains a sham and a facade.

Mr. Nielsen: Hear, hear! Amen!

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, basic to parliamentary democracy is the right of elected representatives to influence decisions regarding expenditure of public moneys. Where that right does not exist, democracy does not exist. Our parliamentary traditions are based upon British democratic practice going back for hundreds of years to Magna Carta. These practices and rights were demanded by the 13 colonies which later formed the United States. We still deny these practices and rights to our northern territories. The minister skirted around this situation this afternoon. He has toyed with it, but he has not committed himself to the objective of fiscal responsibility for the Northwest Territories. He has in no way dealt with section 24 of the Yukon Act or section 21 of the Northwest Territories Act, sections which deny rights, privileges and fiscal responsibility to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. These sections state in part that it is not lawful for the council to adopt, pass or vote upon a resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenues to the territories that has not been first recommended to the council by message of the commissioner—in other words, of the government of Canada. The budgets of the territorial councils are determined by an interdepartmental committee in Ottawa, not by the people of the north through their elected council representatives.

Mr. Speaker, I would advise the minister that at committee stage it will be our intention to present amendments which would have the effect of eliminating these sections from the Yukon and Northwest Territories Acts. I state that intention, Mr. Speaker, not knowing at this point whether such a motion will be considered in order. But if these sections were to be removed, the elected representatives on the territorial councils could then be given the fiscal authority to legislate in those areas which are already administered by the territorial civil services, local government, social development, economic development, education, administration and so on.

The minister has described the amendments in this bill as important steps along the road to greater responsibility for both councils.

Mr. Nielsen: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): But really meaningful responsibility, Mr. Speaker? Not without fiscal responsibility. Can we really expect Canadian citizens north of 60 to be satisfied with anything else, that is anything less than fiscal responsibility? The minister said this afternoon that he consulted with both councils and, obviously, the bill we have before us today is his interpretation of what the councils want. But I cannot believe his interpretation of the wishes of the councils, if this bill is an indication of it; I cannot believe his interpretation is correct, or legitimate or perceptive.

Recently the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development was in the Yukon and heard a very eloquent and convincing presentation on this very subject made by a member of the council on behalf of the entire council. He said:

> We are, quite simply, Mr. Chairman, sick and tired of living under a stultifying and suffocating colonial blanket. We demand the right to live and raise our families under laws that Yukoners make for Yukoners.
> We demand the right to say how the tax dollar, which we contribute to on a greater level per capita than any other Canadian, will be spent in the Yukon. We refuse to let the government of Canada, through its bureaucracy, make those decisions that the people of the Yukon must suffer under. We demand the right of Yukoners to make our own mistakes.

The councillor was not asking for full provincial status, Mr. Speaker, and he made that point quite clear, but he was asking for the right of the councils to more responsibility so that they could prove to the rest of Canada their capability to handle provincial status when that time arrives. He went on to say:

> So what we are saying is that in essence we would have all the legislative and administrative prerogatives, if those resolutions were followed—

And he was referring to certain resolutions passed by the Yukon Council.

> —that would make us in essence the same, analogous to a provincial legislature, without the immediate control of natural resources, the reason being that we think we have to prove to the people of Canada and to the government of Canada that we are as capable of dealing with the resources of the province as any other area in Canada.

Not only did the committee accept the presentation of the council, but individual members in the committee spoke strongly in favour of it. Approval for that territorial view, one which is held by members of the Yukon Council and the Northwest Territories Council alike, approval was very succinctly expressed by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier), who said:

> Well you can be sure that you have at least one person in Quebec who would subscribe to your idea.

I know we in this party will look forward to the support of the member for Sherbrooke when we move amendments which will make his expressed support possible.

[Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands).]

In this bill the minister has repealed section 46 of both acts dealing with lands for the purpose of deleting the word "territory or territories" as the entity to which administration and financial use of lands were formerly transferred and substituting, therefore, the word "commissioner". In other words the minister has taken away certain powers from what, under this section, had been an inoperative entity and handed them over to the commission, that is, to the minister's representative in the territories. I find this most difficult to comprehend. If the minister is really serious about providing, as he states, "important steps along the road to greater responsibility to both councils," why did he not delegate this responsibility to the commissioner in council, that is, to the elected representatives of the people. He has delegated more ultimate authority to himself, rather than to the people of the north. I hope that at committee stage this section can be amended so that the intent of the minister's statement for greater responsibility can be given effect, for we want to see action rather than empty rhetoric.

● (1540)

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated today that he will take measures to strengthen the executive committee of the Yukon and to establish an executive committee in the Northwest Territories. The hon. member for Yukon pointed out to the minister well in advance of the setting up of the executive committee in the Yukon that such a committee would be an unworkable vehicle. Unfortunately, his predictions proved to be only too true. I know the hon. member for Yukon will wish to comment on this himself. Let me say this to the minister: The people of the Northwest Territories, having been exposed to the track record of the executive committee in the Yukon, want no part of any such political structure. They see it as divisive and ineffective, and I urge the minister to reconsider whatever action he proposes to take in this regard.

All the people north of 60 degrees are Canadian citizens, Mr. Speaker, not colonials. It is time Ottawa recognized that fact. The minister is fond of saying that he does not wish to be paternalistic. He has said so many times in this House. Let him prove his words by cutting out Ottawa's paternal attitude to our northern territories. The government in Ottawa stands accused by northerners of impeding progress rather than encouraging it. There are indicators of political progress in the north, such as the building up of a head of steam which can lead the people concerned to gain control over their own affairs, if this government will but recognize the fact and search for means as to how best to implement it. I hope that in committee the minister will be receptive to such innovative and progressive measures as we shall propose, measures which, I am sure, more adequately reflect the tone, temper and times of the north.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House, the bill to amend the Yukon Act, the Northwest Territories Act and the Canada Elections Act, is an important bill and one in which I, certainly, as well as the people of the Northwest Territories are most interested. I am referring, of course, to Bill C-9. This bill I support. I support this bit of legislation, although it is only a small step forward to the political development of the Northwest Territories, the largest federal constituency in Canada stretching from James Bay in the south to the North Pole, and from the Richardson Mountains in the west to Cape Chidley in the east, near Port Burwell. It encompasses 1,350,000 square miles.

While the election of the territorial council and the provision whereby the council will select a Speaker can be considered as a small gain, the fact that the commissioner of the Northwest Territories is still all-powerful and that this bill does nothing to change that remains one of the major problems in this area. The provision for the formation of an executive committee is a step forward; having these elected members responsible for various government departments is basically a good and sound idea.

Although this measure will make for pretty good reading and will look good on paper, is it really a positive step forward? Is it not true that the real stress lies not with the fully elected council, but with the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien)? That situation should be changed, and changed soon.

Where else in Canada does an appointed civil servant decide which departments elected representatives will control? Does an Ottawa civil servant, in particular a deputy minister, decide who shall become the minister of a department? I should hope not. Although the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories said that no departments have officially been declared as having been set aside for elected members to run, he did say, "To begin with they will probably get a couple of easy ones." Who is this appointed civil servant to make such condescending statements to the people of my constituency? Perhaps the Commissioner is afraid that the elected people may, just may, show up some of the shortcomings of his administration. So, they must be put in charge of less important departments.

In a statement to CBC Radio News two weeks ago, the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories said, in referring to the executive committee idea, "The whole objective here is to give them responsibility and give them the feeling that they are, in fact, running it." That shows a very, very bad attitude, I must say. One would assume from such a statement that although the elected representatives of the people of the Northwest Territories are given the feeling that they are running their government, they are still, in fact, not running it. That government will still be under the thumb of the Commissioner and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I suggest that there is a big difference between feeling that you are running a government and actually running it. Treat adults like children, and they will act like children. It becomes very obvious that the colonial status of the Northwest Territories is to continue. That, as I have said publicly many times before, is not a healthy situation to be in, politically.

If we look at the idea of the executive committee, with department heads to be chosen from elected representatives, it would appear that all these department heads will be in a dangerous position. The elected people will be responsible to those who elected them, but the Commissioner and his staff will be in the position to undermine the elected representative, if they should so choose. For example, if the Commissioner and his staff decide they do not like a certain person in charge of a department, they could have that person removed by seeing to it that the department concerned does not produce to its full capability. That is not to say that this happens now. On the other hand, if that were to happen, the government could turn round and say, "We told you so," or, "This person cannot run the department." Then, what would happen? In the next election the representative would be out on his ear. This kind of situation simply is not good enough for the people of the Northwest Territories.

Where else in a democracy, Mr. Speaker, does a middle level appointed civil servant have absolute power over elected representatives of the people? Where else in the free world does the civil servant have the right to say to another group of people, "Thou shalt not drink; thou shalt not even buy liquor or beer." That is what the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories told the people of Pond Inlet just a few weeks ago. Where else in Canada does an appointed civil servant have his own private "Air Force One" standing by, ready to fly on short notice? Mr. Speaker, I often wonder how much that aircraft is costing the taxpayer. I also wonder if this is a legal operation. Where else in a democracy does a civil servant have the power to prorogue a parliamentary session, as happened last year at a territorial council sitting at Yellowknife? Mr. Speaker, there is simply too much power invested in one man when he is not a representative of the people; I repeat, not a representative of the people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Firth: He is responsible for the people of the Northwest Territories in the worst possible paternalistic sense, but not responsible to the people. There is really no such thing, in the true sense of the word, as government of the Northwest Territories, with or without elected representatives, with or without a Speaker and with or without the executive. It is simply a colonial administration. I truly hope, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the Northwest Territories elected in the future will try to do something to change this situation, and change it soon. Also, I hope that hon. members of this House will do something to help make this change possible.

One solution to this problem that should be considered, and considered seriously, is to have an elected person replace the commissioner, something like the mayor and town council system. The head of the administration would then be answerable to the fully-elected body. This council would be answerable to the people and have the power to fire, if need be, the head of the administration. In this way, at least, the man at the top would be responsible to the people of the Northwest Territories.

Until the present position of commissioner comes under the influence of the electorate, the stigma of colonialism will continue. This does not mean that we are asking for, or are ready for, full provincial status, but it would be a big step forward in the development of self-government for the Northwest Territories. It would mean that the entire administration of the north would be responsible to the people they are supposed to serve. Through the elected body they could finally get rid of the title "commissioner" with its connotations of paternalism, colonialism and a civil servant running our affairs for us. I think that situation has been going on for much too long.

I wish to point out that I believe these suggested changes would improve the situation. I hope that the new, fully elected council will act to implement some of these suggestions to help us move toward a more responsible and provincial type of government for the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth). I did not hear him say he had the support of his party for the views he expressed concerning the development of government reforms in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Lewis: He has.

Mr. Nielsen: I am glad to hear the leader of the New Democratic Party say that the member has that support. I am delighted to hear that.

Mr. Barnett: What about you?

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) does not have to ask about me. He has been sitting in this House long enough to hear me make appeal after appeal for governmental reform to be brought about. A motion for non-confidence was moved in this House three years ago, a time when the government had a majority. There was no problem about voting to keep the government in office in those days. The leader of this party, seconded by myself, moved a motion of non-confidence because the government had failed to take meaningful steps toward achieving responsible government for the area. The leader of the New Democratic Party and his followers, including the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, voted against that motion.

The hon. member for Northwest Territories was not here at that time. I am sorry he was not here. Had he been, I am sure he could have educated his colleagues and we would have moved somewhat faster toward the day when governmental reform is going to be completed in the north. I could not agree more with the remarks of the hon. member for Northwest Territories with regard to the executive committee, save in one respect. He, his constituents in the Northwest Territories and anyone who is eager to achieve meaningful reform there, are taking on a device that simply will not work. The experiment, the tinkering of the minister in the Yukon over the past three and a half years, has proved that in spades.

I think the hon. member for Northwest Territories has been in the Yukon often enough and steadily enough to know that that tinkering of the minister has caused strife and difficulty, not only with regard to the administration of our affairs in the Yukon, but in the setting back of the day when full responsible government will be accorded to the two northern territories.

At the time the minister introduced that concept in the Commons in 1970, I said it was unconstitutional. I still maintain that stand. The hon. member for Northwest Territories pointed out one or two details which go to the constitutionality of the course that is being followed by the government. One of those is the absolutely unacceptable and repugnant idea that there is anything responsible about a government where there is a bureaucratic majority sitting on what has been called in the past a mini-cabinet.

I say it is unconstitutional for more fundamental reasons than that. A proposal is being put forward by a minister for expansion of the executive committee in the Yukon and for the establishment of an executive committee in the Northwest Territories. The members of that committee are first going to be allowed what the minister is pleased to call certain responsibilities, but which really are not. Second, there must be monies paid to those members of the executive committee in that capacity from the public treasury. When any such changes are made, the legislation must be accompanied by a message from His Excellency. The minister again is going to smuggle into the governmental structure in both territories, not only an unacceptable concept, but an unconstitutional one. If the concept is valid at all, it can only be valid when it is comprised of wholly elected members in its entirety without civil servants sitting on the executive committee participating in the law making process.

The minister and the government have distorted the whole concept of the separation of the legislative and executive functions of government. The minister seems to be blind to the effect of what he is doing. He is either stubborn or blind because he thinks it is proper to join the executive and legislation functions. Surely, that is farthest from the basis upon which the concept was evolved. The whole idea, and I have thought this to be legitimate over the years, is that the legislative will be separate from the executive functions of government, as will be the judiciary. For the minister to not only endorse, but to present the idea that the legislative and executive functions should be joined is simply a distortion of the principle as it should be. Until this separation is brought about there will be no meaningful responsibility.

● (1600)

In the Yukon, up to the present the executive committee has consisted of the Commissioner and his two assistants, one of them a federal civil servant and one a territorial civil servant, sitting on the executive committee with two elected members, a total of five. At the time this odd concept was proposed, I said all the minister was doing was dividing the Council. Perhaps, because the heat was on, asking for reform. Perhaps that is what he intended to do—I am not saying he did. I could say that but I won't. He may have welcomed the idea because it certainly took the heat off. In any event, what he succeeded in doing was dividing a Council, which had been united during the previous successive nine years. Members of the Council of all political views were united on the one question of reform. So, two of the councillors were extracted; they were smuggled on to what became a bureaucratic executive-controlled committee, and the spirit of unity was broken. Immediately, there was that division of two-five.

Then, of course, there was a further divisive factor and that was the decision by the Yukon Liberal Party to run a partisan slate. No other party did that. This gave rise to a political difference on the question of government reform in addition to the difference which the minister had artificially created. Again, unity was destroyed. The minister has told us he has spoken to the members of council in both the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon. So have I, and I believe I am expressing their view when I say that what we have before us is certainly not what the Council in the Yukon asked the minister to produce. They certainly welcome, as I do, the increase in numbers, but no amount of increase in numbers can solve the problem. If the minister, in his legislation today, were to introduce a measure to increase the number on the Council, not from seven to 12, but from seven to 100, or, indeed, to the whole of the population of the two territories, it would still not solve the problem.

As the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) has said, the heart of the whole matter lies in the inability of the elected members of the councils, the representatives of the people, to have any effective say whatsoever in the decision-making process or in the spending of their money. I am sure the minister would understand the situation if I put it in simple terms by saying that a town council or a municipal council has more power than that which resides in the councils of the two northern territories. Municipal councils are free to impose taxes upon property situated within municipal boundaries. Once this revenue has been raised they have full authority to spend that money.

What is the situation in the two northern territories? The minister says to them: This is the amount of money I want you to raise this year in order to meet budget commitments prepared by my officials. You are to impose these taxes upon yourselves, but you will not have anything to say as to the direction in which the funds will be spent, except to deny supply. This is the situation as it exists today.

Mr. Chrétien: Just as it does here.

Mr. Nielsen: We tried that, as did the council which was led by Frederick Haultain in Manitoba in 1879 when that District of Assiniboia became a part of the now greatly extended Province of Manitoba. They refused supply, with the result that government employees had to go out and chop wood in order to earn enough to survive. We tried to use this weapon, the only weapon we had in the Yukon, by denying supply on a vote concerning the administration of justice. We were told by the minister's predecessor—a Liberal government was in office—that if this vote was not passed the Council would get no other moneys, even if it wished to vote them. What kind of attitude is that, in terms of responsible government? The council in the Yukon and in the Northwest Territories is a rubber stamp, and this measure represents what the minister is pleased to called progress toward responsible government, to use the terms of the press release put out under his authority. The title was "Greater self-government for the Yukon and N.W.T.". The Minister knows that this is grossly misleading. All he has done has been to increase the numbers and play around in the territories with an experiment which has already failed in the Yukon.

It is true there have been significant changes in the Northwest Territories Act, changes which should have been made long ago. I refer, for instance, to the Commissioner sitting as Speaker of the Council. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Northwest Territories, this same Commissioner decided only last year that the elected representatives should be dismissed. He said: The Council is dissolved, and that's that. In other words, a government employee directly responsible to the minister possesses this exorbitant power over what is described by the minister as a representative form of government.

There is another reason why this creature, this executive committee, is unconstitutional. I would draw the attention of the minister to the sections of the Yukon Act which stipulate that the Governor-in-Council, in effect, the minister may appoint a Chief Executive Officer who shall administer the government of the territory under instructions given to him from time to time by the Governor in Council or the Minister. It is the same for the Northwest Territories. This is a mandatory obligation.

The minister is the person responsible for administering the government of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories. The legislation gives him no power to delegate this authority, no power other than to appoint a Commissioner who will take instructions from him. It gives the minister no power to set up an executive committee for the purpose of further delegating this authority. This is a third constitutional argument in support of the proposition I advanced almost four years ago. If the minister thinks the concept of an executive council is a valid one, it should be built into the act.

Mr. Chrétien: There is no mention of the cabinet in any act.

Mr. Nielsen: All right, I was coming to that. What the minister has just said is precisely the manner in which the responsible form of government exists and functions in every province as well as at the federal level. It is the majority of elected representatives and their supporters who form the government. It is the leader of that majority who selects the cabinet. What is so wrong with extending the same kind of principle to the northern territories? That was impossible with five on the council as it was impossible with seven on the council, but when this legislation passes, there will be 12 on that council and the selection of wholly elected members to the executive council in the Northwest Territories could easily be made. What could be so wrong with carrying over the principle that now exists at the provincial and federal level, so that from these two councils a majority emerges. The leader of that majority then would be selected and would form the cabinet or executive committee of five wholly elected representatives? That is the way a democratic form of responsible government is supposed to operate as we know it, certainly in the free world.

• (1610)

Not only is the minister perpetuating a colonial system of government in the two territories by not going to the extent he should, but he is flying in the teeth of world policy, particularly in respect of all the emerging countries of the world. What he is saying to us in the Yukon, and what he is saying to our neighbours in the Northwest Territories is that we do not have the intelligence to look after our own affairs. He is saying that there are not men of ability, capacity and intelligence to govern themselves.

An hon. Member: How about women?

Mr. Nielsen: And women, yes. We have one woman on the council of the Yukon territory now, and I believe there is also one on the council of the Northwest Territories.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Yes, there is.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, there is one now I am informed by my colleague. My point is that there are people there who are capable of exercising the same kind of legislative function we exercise in this chamber. Indeed, there may be some who are better able to perform that function who live in the north. The minister is saying that he and the government of Canada know best; they are the great white fathers and therefore they are going to tell the people what is best for them because they really do not know themselves. He is saying, we have only lived there for a quarter of a century or so, so we cannot be expected to know what is best, but the people some 4,000 miles away are better able to decide what is best for the north. That is what the minister is saying.

I am glad to see that the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) is in the chamber because I had the distinct pleasure of serving with him on the standing committee when that committee visited the Yukon territory last December. To my amazement, the hon. member for Sherbrooke was one of the most vociferous proponents for the immediate granting of fully responsible government to the Yukon, and he was applauded for taking that view. This bill will certainly face no difficulty on second reading, as I will be the last speaker from this side and the same restriction is being imposed through self-discipline in the New Democratic Party. We might even get second reading of this legislation by five o'clock. In any event, I do not expect to have any difficulty in listing that hon. member's support at this stage, but when it comes to amendments in the committee I will look forward to the same kind of vigorous support, and I hope that hon. member will try to get on the committee again.

Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke): I am.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member says he is a member of that committee, and I think we had better quickly record that fact. I am glad to know that and hope we can count on his support when we are discussing these amendments again.

Let me read from page 29:6 of the proceedings of that committee on December 12. At that time a motion had been put which adopted in detail all of the proposals put forward by the council of the Yukon territory, and I say in detail because they cover most of pages 29:5 and 29:6. Toward the end of the page we find these words:

> After debate on the said motion, the question being put, it was agreed to unanimously.

Apart from the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand), who was called away on urgent parliamentary business, all the members of the committee were present, including seven members of the Liberal party supporting the government. I, therefore, look forward to that same kind of support. Incidentally, this proceeding was reported to the House before we rose for the recess last session, so it was a recommendation to the government. I know the minister has a very high regard for committee reports and listens to their suggestions very carefully.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member for York West is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I, too, was away for personal reasons for about 25 minutes during which time that vote was taken. Just to clear the record, I wanted to indicate I was not there when unanimous approval was given. To the best of my knowledge, that was a vote taken on a Friday night.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for York West for that explanation. I am sure had he been there he would have gone along with his colleagues. I am sure he is just as strong a proponent of the democratic form of government in our country as are all of us, and I am sure it is just as difficult for him to understand why the government does not go the whole way in this process. He heard the very appealing briefs by Yukoners for governmental reform when he was there, although the minister continues to disregard this, and he heard also those same people say they did not want provincial status now but want the changes to stop short of that, since surely in the fulness of time that will come about.

Let me quote for a moment from the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), because he, too, believes in this concept, or at least I am told that he does. I sometimes have my doubts, but his words certainly suggest this. Let me quote this excerpt from the opening speech of the Prime Minister at the constitutional conference held in Ottawa, the second meeting, on February 10, 1969, as follows:

> The federal government insists that a charter of human rights should be an integral part of the Constitution, because it believes that those rights are equally important for all Canadians.

He did not say all Canadians south of the 60th parallel, he said "all Canadians". He went on to state:

> Whether he be from Churchill, Trois Rivieres, Kamloops, Medicine Hat, Richibucto, or Port aux Basques, the Canadian citizen must be assured everywhere of the free exercise of his basic rights.

We call upon all Canadians south of the 60th parallel to recognize that, as a basic right, we have the right to govern ourselves. We are not being given that right by this legislation. When the Prime Minister was speaking about the same basic rights for all Canadians he went on to say:

> And why should this not be so? Are those not values common to all, and in which we all believe? Of course. And so, I ask you, gentlemen, why do we hesitate? Why are we reluctant to joint together in guaranteeing to the citizen, whom we all serve and represent, his most essential rights?

That is a very noble sentiment, but I wonder how many members realize that the two northern territories were not only not represented at that conference but not represented at any federal-provincial conference, so that the only input to these conferences from the north comes from the minister or from persons sitting in this chamber on the treasury benches, or from observers whose lips are sealed because they are prevented from giving the northern point of view. That is what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) referred to as basic rights. I shall not be much longer.

I hoped that the minister would have acceded to the wishes of the Yukon Council to increase the number to 15. He says he consults. He knows that is the number they want. Since he says he consults, he knows they do not want that complicated formula which imposes a ceiling of two increments every 5,000 increase in population. He knows the population does not want that at all. They feel they are responsible and can decide when their council should be increased. What is the matter with that? We follow that procedure here and in our provincial legislatures. There is nothing wrong with it. The minister did go so far as to include some input in respect of setting indemnities by council, but before that 1970 amendment they had to come to Ottawa with cap in hand and say that they could not get along on the indemnity of $1,500 a year. That was conceded and the change was made. Now, they have some input. Why cannot there be the same kind of input in respect of numbers? That is what they requested.

We have the recommendations of the Yukon Liberal Association. I do not know if the minister has been closely informed by one of those closest to him now. I note that he has. That is nice. I shall read the operative part of the Yukon Liberal Association resolution which was passed in 1967 because I read it into Hansard in 1970 when this legislation was before the House. It reads:

NOW THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED THAT:

1. The membership of the Council of the Yukon Territory be increased to 15.

If the minister is so effective in getting so many things corrected in such a short time, then surely this should have been brought to the attention of the minister and we would have seen it in the bill. We do not want anything to be a little dubious about this political party representation the minister speaks of in Ottawa.

The second portion of that resolution reads:

2. That the Governor in Council appoint on the recommendation of a majority of the members of the Territorial Council of the Yukon Territory, a member of the said Council to be Chief Executive of the Territory and who will hold and discharge all the present responsibilities and duties of the Commissioner of the Yukon Territory.

In addition, what that resolution was calling for was the dismissal of the Commissioner as being an appointee of the minister and instead that the elected representatives be empowered to select from one of their own number a representative to hold office. I might say I do not agree with that assertion because all this would do would be to take away one elected member from the council and have him appointed as a bureaucratic representative. The third recommendation reads:

3. That four members of the Territorial Council of the Yukon Territory be elected by a majority of the said Council to assist the Chief Executive and to be responsible for the administration of the various departments of Government of the Yukon Territory.

I must assume they were serious when they advanced these resolutions. In other words, what the Yukon Liberal Association wanted—and they had a little difficulty appreciating the fact that they were not getting it if these resolutions were adopted—was an executive committee of five members, and also all portfolio responsibility to reside in that executive committee. Instead, we got from the minister three years after that legislation was passed an executive committee dominated by three civil servants. Now, he is pretending to induct more input by making it three elected and three appointed, but still with the Commissioner and the minister's over-all veto.

The fouth resolution reads:

4. That the necessary amendments to the Yukon Act and all other affected legislation be introduced forthwith to accomplish these aims.

Where is the effectiveness of this input by the Yukon Liberals? Obviously, they are thinking the same way, albeit ten years late. They are now enlightened and realize that what we are proposing is reasonable change. It would not create a province. It would create a recognized form of responsible government, stopping short of provincial status. The minister knows we look to the very near future when we will achieve provincial status.

I want to take a moment or two to place on the record, because everybody thinks these reforms started in 1970 with the Liberal Government, the words of the head of the government in 1958, the first Prime Minister to visit the Yukon Territory, the first Prime Minister to set foot above the 60th Parallel. He repeated that visit two years later. In September, 1958, he said it was his hope that, by the time of Canada's centennial in 1967, the Yukon and Mackenzie will have gone a long way, if not all the way, toward self-government. That hope was expressed on the basis of a policy which I and other delegates from the Yukon had succeeded, during our annual meeting and conventions, in convincing the government of that day to adopt. It was that which brought about the first meaningful changes to the Yukon Act, amendments which established the advisory committee on finance and amendments which increased the size of the council to seven, as the first step in a gradual increase by two's to 21 at which time we will be calling for provincial status.

We were the ones who developed that formula. The formula at that time—and it is outdated now I might add—was that there be an increase of one additional member for every 2,000 increase in population. Had that procedure been based on a population of 21,000, as the minister stated—he has a great way with population statistics. Whenever it pleases him to describe the tremendous value there may be in the Yukon, he uses inflated population statistics and inflated monetary statistics. However, whenever we come to him and make representations, he says that there really are not enough people in the Yukon, that he does not think there will be enough revenue from the Yukon to justify any remedies in respect of reform. So, he uses these statistics as he sees fit when he plays with the destiny of the people. He does not endear himself to the hearts of most northerners.

My colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), said that in the committee stage it will be our intention to move amendments in respect of both sides of the Richardson Mountains, the Yukon Territory Act and the Northwest Territories Act. It is hoped it will be possible to move amendments to increase the number in keeping with the wishes not only of myself and this party, but also the wishes of the minister's followers in the Yukon. I hope they will be acceptable to him. The minister smiles. Perhaps there may be a doubt about that in the sense that he will not even have to speak about it because of the procedural difficulty with which he will be confronted in making that attempt.

One thing we will be doing is we will be making every effort to wipe out the formula that is imposed upon the council by the legislation. I think the minister will agree with me, after having stated he spoke with members of the Council of the Yukon, that they do not want it. They want to be free to make that increase or decrease on their own. They feel that they are responsible enough to make those decisions, and I agree with them. They feel that they are intelligent enough to make those decisions, and I agree with them. I am sure that my friend, the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) would agree with them, and I am sure the Yukon Liberal Association would agree with them. I point out to the minister, in case he has forgotten, that while there may be some lack of admission in this regard on the part of the council, there are four Liberals on a council consisting of seven members so that there is a majority of the minister's followers on that council. They have said to him: "We believe we are responsible enough to set our own numbers" and that is what they have asked the minister to do. That is precisely what the minister has not done. So we will vote those amendments again in committee and perhaps even before that stage the minister might make it known to his members on that committee that he intends to accept that kind of amendment.

● (1630)

The minister has said nothing with respect to two other important amendments in the bill. My colleague, the hon. member for Kingston-and-The Islands (Miss MacDonald) has mentioned one of them so I will not waste the time of the House dwelling on that, but I do call his attention to the other one dealing with the increase in the legislative jurisdiction under section 16 (j) of the Yukon Act where certain greatly enlarged powers are given to the council with respect to legislation concerning prisons, reformatories, jails, lockups and the like. I draw his attention to the fact that no mention is made of institutions for the confinement of young offenders. It may well be that some thought should be given either to making absolutely certain that this jurisdiction is given to the council under the Juvenile Delinquents Act, as it stands now or under this legislation. I do not think we can continue to rely on the provisions of the Interpretation Act for our legislative jurisdiction in this matter.

Now, I wish to complete my remarks by saying the following. I was glad to see the NDP, at their annual meeting in Vancouver last September, adopt a resolution in favour of provincial status for the Yukon. That resolution said nothing more than that, so that there was no time limit placed on it. It is completely open ended. It is like being in favour of motherhood. I urge them to agree—and the hon. member for Northwest Territories will probably see to it that his colleagues understand—that there be a time limit on that resolution. The time to start toward provincial status by meaningful reform is now, but let them not leave it open ended. Let them say that the NDP is in favour of a resolution passed by the elected representatives of the people of the Yukon territory over nine years and three successive councils. It is all spelled out there, and there is nothing repugnant in it at all. When we reach that common ground, we will all be in agreement because the Yukon Liberal Association—even if its minister is reluctant to follow its resolutions—and recommendations and even if its government is loth to do so—is in accord with the feeling in the Yukon on this question and at least two political parties are almost in accord on this now.

As my last word I want to say that the national Progressive Conservative Party is the only national political party on record as including this principle of democracy in its national policy expressed by the leader of the party, and adopting verbatim the expression of the legitimate desires of the people of the Yukon as contained in their resolution 40, which is so familiar to the minister, wholeheartedly and 100 per cent. When our leader becomes prime minister this principle will not be adopted in the halfhearted way in which the minister has tried to do but will be done at once.

Mr. Lewis: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, arising out of something that the hon. member for Yukon said. He informed the House that about three years ago a non-confidence motion was moved by, I think he said, the leader of his party with respect to the north and that we voted against it. I have before me the Hansard issues of May 11 and May 12, 1971. Unless the hon. member was speaking about two non-confidence motions on the same subject in that session, which seems to be very unlikely, there was a motion moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) I led off on behalf of my party and moved an amendment to it. If the hon. member would refer to pages 5761 and 5762 of Hansard of May 12, 1971, he would find that all NDP members voted of course for our amendment, which the Tories supported, and voted for the Tory motion.

I am sure the hon. member for Yukon would not want to mislead the House deliberately or otherwise. I am merely drawing it to his attention. He is always such a merciful fellow, and so anxious to be correct and accurate, that I hope this correction will make him feel somewhat ashamed of his allegation which is so totally inaccurate.

Mr. Nielsen: It is one of the rare occasions when I have come to a debate without having the verbatim record before me. I am not ashamed of what I said. That was my recollection, which was obviously inaccurate, and for that the leader of the NDP and his colleagues have my full, unqualified and unequivocal apology.

Mr. Lewis: I knew it would come.

Mr. Nielsen: But my recollection was obviously based on something, and I am not so inaccurate in that, may I say with respect. I am not questioning the vote that he cited as recorded at the pages in Hansard to which he referred, but it must have arisen because of the manner in which his colleagues dealt with the subject matter in the debate and the reluctance with which they spoke on the matter. In any event, I am glad that the hon. member has pointed it out to me because this session still affords an opportunity to bring in a similar motion on another opposition day, and I wonder if he will be so eager then to vote for it.

Mr. Lewis: Just wait and see. The hon. member's apology is so qualified that he never ceases to astound me by his generosity, as he did again today. If he is unaware of the source of his statement earlier, I have no difficulty with it. I have known the hon. gentleman to have been a very imaginative fiction writer on other occasions.

Mr. Chrétien: I rise on the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. If I were to rise each time I felt that the hon. member is inaccurate, I would be on my feet all the time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If generosity is to be attributed to anyone it should be attributed to the Chair. I now recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow).

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) already indicated, it is our intention to vote in support of this bill. Having said that, I want to say to the minister that we do not consider this bill to be nearly as important as he does. I look on it as being no more than minor cosmetic surgery. It will make the situation north of the 60th parallel look a little better but it will not really change the very difficult and serious situation which exists up there. What is the situation?

I do not intend to deal in any detail with the social and economic problems of the northern half of this country today, but the situation is a depressing one. Of the 35,000 people who live in the NWT more than half are of Indian, Eskimo and Metis origin. Studies done in the Mackenzie district recently show that the per capita family income of the white people living in the NWT is almost $10,000 a year, while the per capita income of the Eskimos is less than half of that and of the Indians is not much more than a quarter of that. That is the situation to which we must address ourselves.

One of the ways in which it can be changed is to give the people of the Northwest Territories and of the Yukon more authority in decision making than they have had up until now, and even more than they will have after we pass this bill which the minister commends to us today. I can only assume from the actions of the minister, of his office, and of the Commissioners that not only do they not believe in provincial status for the two territories—incidentally I myself do not believe that the time for that kind of status has arrived yet—but they really do not believe in democracy or responsible government at all. Let me begin with the minister's office.

I am sure there has been a great deal of discussion in the cabinet, and between the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson), and the Commissioners of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories about whether the benefits of DREE programs should be made available to the two territories. I am sure I can make the statement without being contradicted that the minister must have received representations from both Commissioners urging that their territories be included in those areas which can avail themselves of DREE grants. If the Commissioners did not make that kind of proposal, then I submit they would be derelict in the discharge of their duties.

I point out that in the Whitehorse Star of March 1 there was a report of an announcement by the special assistant to the minister that Department of Regional Economic Expansion funds will soon be available in the Yukon. I am sure the special assistant has some faults, just as we all have, but I doubt that he would lie so brazenly, and therefore he must have been telling the truth. I suggest to the minister that if he believes in the rights of northerners, and in the administrations that he has set up to give them some input into what goes on in their areas, it would not be his special assistant, speaking at a political meeting, who would make that kind of announcement.

That kind of carry-on is a downgrading of the member of parliament for the Yukon, of the member of parliament for the Northwest Territories, and of the Commissioners and councils of both those areas. If the minister does not see that, then he does not have the slightest idea about participatory democracy. My colleague from Assiniboia calls it 19th century politics. It is Tammany Hall politics of the worst kind. Mr. Speaker, I did not think that in Canada in 1974 we would see that, under a supposedly progressive minister such as the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The minister tells us that this bill will increase the number of elected councillors in both territories, and will eliminate the hitherto appointed councillors in the Northwest Territories. That is a step in the right direction, but he went on to imply that elected members of both councils would have more authority to direct the expenditures and the operations of the territorial governments. Where is that spelled out in the bill? Where is the legislative authority for that kind of statement?

As I understand the present situation, what happens is that the individual commissioner brings down a budget. I presume he has discussed it with the minister. I say I presume, because I really wonder if the minister has approved everything that the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories does. Not today, but some time when we are dealing with expenditures for the Northwest Territories, I would like to ascertain—and I am sure I am not the only one—the arrangements under which the Commissioner operates what my colleague from the Northwest Territories calls "Airforce I". Does that aircraft belong to the government of Canada, or is it leased? Is there an amount in the estimates for the rental of the plane, if it is rented? Is there a limit on what the Commissioner can spend? Does anybody but the Commissioner decide when, where, and how often he will fly?

Did the minister ever approve the large amount of money which is spent each year on the Commissioner's Ball, a very lavish affair? It may not be very much money in terms of the total expenditures of the Northwest Territories, but I think it would be sufficient to build a dozen or more homes for native people who now live under pretty awful conditions.

What about the executive suites in Yellowknife and Frobisher Bay, which I have not seen but which I have heard about from many sources? How much do they cost a year? Who authorized the rents for them? How often are they occupied, and by whom? These are the kinds of questions which any responsible government representative should be asked, and yet these are questions that are decided by one person, the Commissioner. Mr. Speaker, I should amend that and say they are decided probably by two people, because I assume the minister has the final say on that kind of expenditure.

Mr. Chrétien: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member would want to mislead the House. All the questions he is putting to the House today concerning Northern Affairs can be asked in a committee of the House when dealing with the estimates of the department. The same questions could be asked by all elected members of the council when they are studying the estimates of the different departments in the Northwest Territories. The elected representatives of the Northwest Territories, both in the Council and in the House of Commons, have plenty of opportunities to ask the same questions. I know the hon. member does not want to create the impression that nobody knows about these things, or that there is some mystery about those expenditures.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Obviously, this is a question that could be dealt with by the minister if he wishes to speak when concluding second reading. It is not really a question on which to interrupt another hon. member's speech.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, of course they can ask questions, and I presume they will get information. The important thing to me is not whether they can ask questions about it, but whether they can do anything about it. For example, can they say to the Commissioner, "You cannot spend $100,000, or whatever it is, for the Commissioner's Ball. We think it should be spent somewhere else." The minister shakes his head, but to my knowledge they have never done that, and have never attempted to do it. The minister says that we can get the answers to questions. I am glad he said that, because he anticipated a question I am now going to raise. I talked about the difference between the standard of living of the white people in the Northwest Territories and the standard of living of the native population. I gave a few figures. One of the largest employers, in fact the largest in the Northwest Territories, is government, both the government of Canada through its various departments, and the territorial government. I am told that in the past ten years the number of public servants working in the Northwest Territories has almost tripled.

My colleague, the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth), put some questions on the order paper last session. The hon. member put the questions on the order paper when this session began. He wanted to know then, and still wants to know, how many people work for the territorial government and for the federal government in the Northwest Territories in each of a number of categories, and of that number how many are native people? The minister's department has that information but has not answered the questions. Why? Probably it is because the minister would be embarrassed to tell this House and the country how small the number of native people is who work for the government of Canada and for the territorial council, and how poor the jobs are in terms of status and salary.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

• (1650)

Mr. Chrétien: This information has been given in committees.

Mr. Orlikow: That may be true, but not to my knowledge. I wonder why there should be a delay of almost five months in getting answers to questions put on the order paper by the hon. member for the Northwest Territories? If the minister has the information why does he not give it in the regular way?

Mr. Speaker, the best jobs have been reserved for white people, most of whom come from southern Canada. That is equally true or even more so, of housing. It is difficult to get people to work in the high Arctic, so the government of Canada has provided a special program of housing for federal civil servants who work in the north. People who come from southern Canada are provided with rental housing, with electric power, with running water and so on, where it is possible, at a subsidized rate. All housing in the high Arctic, of course, is subsidized. There are practically no native people, even those working for the government of Canada or the territorial government, living in that kind of housing. Why is that? It is because the regulation only provides for that kind of housing for people not living in their home community.

An hon. Member: Where is the hon. member for the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Orlikow: He is right here. If you get a job with the federal government in your own community, you do not qualify for housing. I cannot think of anything, either by accident or by deliberate policy, which would discourage the native people from working for the federal government more than that kind of provision. Native people are simply not permitted to work for the government.

I want to deal for a few moments with the basic issue as I see it. That is, despite the complete election of the territorial councils by the people who are eligible to vote, the real power will still rest with two people, the commissioner of each territory and the minister. The commissioner, I presume with the approval of the minister, makes every decision that is important. Speaking for myself, I do not believe that the two territories are ready for provincial status at this time in any case. Certainly, not in their ability to finance their own necessary government operations.

Mr. Nielsen: What government does?

Mr. Orlikow: Very few, that is true. I do not believe that the time has yet come when either territory is ready for provincial status. That may be true—

Mr. Nielsen: Why not?

Mr. Orlikow: —and it may be true that the final authority on budget and expenditures must still be this parliament on the recommendation of the minister. It may still be true that this parliament and the government, through the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development must decide how much money will be allocated for housing, for the building of roads, for education and so on. I want to say to the Minister that in my time in public life I have seen nothing as depressing as the Innuit Monthly which I get almost every month. This is not the only document that I read—

Mr. Nielsen: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Orlikow: Certainly.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member has said that he does not believe the two territories are ready for provincial status now. As the leader of his party properly pointed out to me a moment ago, there was a non-confidence motion on that very issue on May 12, 1970 when his party voted in support of what he says now he is not supporting. I wonder if he has changed his mind in the meantime?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, that motion did not call for provincial status immediately. I do not think it did but I have not got it in front of me. I do not say, and I did not say, that I do not believe in eventual provincial status for the territory I have not said that, and I will not say it today. I have said, and I will content myself with that, that I do not believe either territory is ready for provincial status yet. Let me say, however, that I do not believe in feudalism. It did not work in Europe centuries ago and will not work in the Northwest Territories or the Yukon today.

When a commissioner visits a community in the Northwest Territories and meets with the residents—I will give the minister an illustration and I can document this—who say to him they need 25 or 35 new houses to look after the unfilled needs for housing in the community, and when the Commissioner can say to them right then and there that they cannot have 25 or 35 houses but can have five or ten, then I say that no person, a commissioner or any other, should have that kind of power. It could be, in any kind of system, that the number of houses needed in any year would be much greater than would be possible under the allocation for housing. It seems to me wrong that a commissioner, by himself, should be able to say to any community, this is what you can have. Surely, in any community in which the needs of the residents are taken into account, the commissioner should have to consult—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it was agreed that the hon. member was to be the last speaker. Perhaps, with unanimous consent, we could pass second reading right now.

Mr. Barnett: On the point raised by the hon. minister, I understand from the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) that he could conclude his remarks in about four or five minutes. If there is a disposition of the House to allow him to finish, I believe he would be the last speaker from this corner of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the hon. minister and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett). Perhaps we might hear another suggestion.

• (1700)

Mr. Stackhouse: Mr. Speaker, a private member's motion is to be dealt with at five o'clock and I know that several hon. members want to speak on it. I do not think the private member's hour should be shortened more than necessary. I think we would all agree to taking the vote now. However, on behalf of those who want to debate the private member's motion, I suggest that we should reach private members' business as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, perhaps we should not see the clock and, at six o'clock, extend private members' hour, to make up for the time taken by the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Am I to understand that it is agreed that private members' hour is to be extended after six o'clock by an amount equivalent to that taken by the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it also agreed that we shall not see the clock at this time, in order to allow the hon. member for Winnipeg North to complete his remarks, and that we shall then proceed to private members' business?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I will not take very much longer. The point I am trying to make, which I could illustrate with many examples if I had the time, is that the present system, under which the commissioner makes unilateral decisions in the field of education, the environment, the use of resources and any other field, is wrong. That is the system under which the people of the Northwest Territories and of the Yukon live with at present. That system I consider to be wrong in principle, as under it we do not utilize the knowledge and experience of the people living in the Territories. It is a system from which we should move as quickly as possible.

I said a few moments ago that I am not convinced that the time has come for giving provincial status to the Territories. I am not at all convinced that they should make their own decisions, as the provinces now do. On the other hand, they will never reach that point if we do not allow some movement in that direction. We must allow them at some time to make meaningful decisions on matters which affect them. I suggest to the minister that he is proposing such a small step forward as will have little if any effect.

Although we support this bill, I urge the minister to give serious consideration to further clarifying the question of governmental decision making in the territories. He can do that either by further legislation or order in council. He can decide which is required and which is necessary, so that territorial councils will be more than figure heads. Such action will enable the councils to make decisions, and will mean that they have more than the patina of authority for democratic decision making. Although they would not have the right to say to the commissioners of each of the territories that they want to spend more money than is proposed for spending, or to increase or decrease taxes, they would have the right, within the limits of proposed expenditures, to say to the commissioner and the rest of the bureaucracy that they want certain things done.

For instance, they could say they do not agree with the way in which money is being spent, that they want it spent in other ways, to meet other desires and other, more important needs. For instance, they could say that they want to spend more money on education and less on road building; more on housing and less on the Commissioner's Ball; more on health, and less for travel on the part of some high ranking civil servant working for the territorial council. If the minister were to make that kind of decision and bring in that kind of proposal, he would have the support of my party and not hear the kinds of criticisms which we have had to make today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED REPOSSESSION OF ROCHDALE COLLEGE

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should act, by legislative or other means, to take over immediate and direct control of the so-called Rochdale College building in Toronto, and thereupon evict the present occupants and arrange for a socially-constructive use of the building.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this particular motion may I point out that, often, this House follows the adversary system, which works well. Often a matter is well resolved after being condemned from one side and defended from the other. May I point out, however, that with respect to this motion we all have something to gain. It gives all members of the House, regardless of party, an opportunity to declare themselves about an issue of deep concern to the people of this country, particularly in the Toronto area. As well, it will provide the government with an opportunity to gain support for action that it may find is needed. So, I hope we can all take part in the discussion on this motion with that in mind, remembering that this is not primarily a subject of party concern so much as of social concern, a subject on which we can unite and, by debating this motion, declare ourselves and support the government on action which may be required.

We must remember that our primary concern is not so much to attribute responsibility or guilt as to seek a solution. We must consider, together, how we are to arrive at that solution. Certainly, the government made a mistake when it agreed to finance the building of Rochdale College with a CMHC mortgage. The record of Rochdale shows this to have been a mistake. Mistakes can be corrected; that is the point. Rochdale has come; but Rochdale must go. In view of its major involvement originally, the government ought to be determined to see Rochdale College go. If one method fails, the government must try another.

Recently it has been trying one method, the judicial method. News reports of the past weekend say that the receivers in charge of the building, who represent various creditors, are seeking authority to evict the tenants. That action, if successful, would certainly meet one of the objectives of the motion. That application which is to be heard on Wednesday, according to news reports, may fail. In that case I hope that the various authorities concerned, with the government behind them, will try another method. I hope they will keep trying until the ultimate objective of cleansing this building and turning it over for a legitimate social purpose has been achieved.

The need for this determination should be clear to us all. One reason is the contemptible condition of Rochdale itself. It has sickened people across this country. The government must show the people that it is determined to act and achieve the objectives referred to. The second reason is the amazing survival power that Rochdale seems to have had. From its beginning until now, it has demonstrated an incredible capacity for withstanding governments, courts, police, the media and public opinion. This motion offers an opportunity to parliament to see that Rochdale is not going to go on thumbing its nose at the people of Canada.

● (1710)

Rochdale has become more than a building, more than an institution. It has become a symbol. It symbolizes the failure of permissiveness. What began as a visible defiance of an established organized society has become itself an ironic vindication of that society. Rochdale shows what happens when people renounce the basic values that hold society together. Rochdale shows the social necessity for the much despised so-called middle class principles of going to work, meeting your mortgage, paying your taxes, paying your rent, staying off drugs and living with your family. For that reason, we have found in recent times a growing recognition by the media just what this place represents.

Time magazine called it "a highrise symbol of a noble experiment that went horribly awry". The Toronto Star called it "a degeneration of an educational experiment into a community menace." The Globe and Mail has said, "its name has been linked with suicide, perversion of the young, defiance of the law and destruction of property." Since this so-called college opened as an experiment in co-operative student housing and more unstructured education, it has been continuously at the centre of controversy. One reason has been its failure to pay either mortgage or taxes. Rents have been collected, but where has the money gone? One news report claims that according to the receivers, perhaps $150,000 in rent money is missing. Where has the money gone? It certainly has not gone to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and certainly not to the city of Toronto.

Since 1968, Rochdale has accumulated arrears in mortgage and tax payments in excess of $1,800,000. That is serious enough. It is serious enough for government action. However, the real reason for people's abhorrence has been the way this place has become a centre for drugs and depravity. It has been condemned by the metro Toronto police as a supermarket for drugs. Chief Harold Adamson claims it is the only centre for an organized drug traffic in Ontario. In the first three months of 1973, police seized almost $250,000 worth of drugs. Fraser Kelly, a respected commentator, referred to it "as the largest soft-drug distributing centre in North America." In one three month period, police made 795 drug charges.

As Richard J. Needham said in the Globe and Mail:

> It is a hotbed of drug use, drug traffic, of general filth and disorder.

A year ago the then coroner of Peel county, Dr. Martin Dobkin, was quoted by the Toronto Sun as saying Rochdale is "a festering abscess". A police report of the metro Toronto police commissioners showed that this had been the character of Rochdale from 1969. This report described offence after offence. I will take the time of the House to cite only one, a typical one.

> On August 12, 1970, when police officers were executing an order for search of an apartment at Rochdale College, they were hindered by the actions of a security guard. The fire alarm sounded and about 75 persons gathered calling the police "pigs" and spitting at them. Upon reaching the elevator with the security guard the lights went out. After some difficulty the officers reached the apartment and found it empty.
> Rochdale College
> A piece of paper stating the price and weights of hashish was found. The apartment smelled highly of unsanitary conditions.

The report describes other incidents of the seduction of minors, rape of women, theft, assault, possession of weapons and homicide. Since Rochdale opened, there have been several meet their death by falling from windows of the building. One was a young man from my own constituency.

Some news reports have claimed that Rochdale is having a change of heart. We have been impressed by the prospect that under pressure, persuasion or whatever reason, there may be a new outlook developing in that institution. However, we have been fooled in the past. For example, if we go back a year to May 1973, we find a news report in the Globe and Mail headed "Rochdale and receiver say struggle is over". That was a year ago. They were both saying then that there was a new spirit of co-operation. They had a new policy and a new willingness to make the thing work. We hear these reports again. We hear that the college is ridding itself of the drug pushers. I notice these claims are more often made by spokesmen for Rochdale than authorities fighting the drug traffic.

If we think Rochdale is no longer what it used to be back in the bad old days of 1973, let us see how a coroner's jury in January, 1974, after another 18 year old fell to his death, recommended that all Rochdale tenants be evicted as the only way of getting rid of drug users. Coroner K. R. Baxter said it was "a festering cancer—dirty, disreputable, intolerable." Listen to what the grand jury of the country of York said as recently as last month:

> Rochdale still carries on as an armed fortress of wholesale drug and narcotic receiving and distribution, the "Ontario food terminal" of the illicit drug business. There could be no real improvement and control of drug abuse in Ontario until this promotional centre is put out of business. What process of law or intestinal fortitude have been lacking in the past, must surely be evoked without further delay.

When Rochdale was opened, it was made possible largely through taxpayers money being loaned to them at a low interest rate. Maybe the objective of the authorities was understandable. Maybe it was acceptable. However, we have to recognize what has transpired since the time that decision was made.

The sponsors of this institution who came to the representatives of this so-called square, straight society to get their loan went away with the money in their pockets, all the while sneering at the society with a truly supercilious arrogance. They boasted they would give a new experience in education. All they have given Canada is an old experience in degradation. It is for that reason citizens throughout metro Toronto want Rochdale to go. You can see that any night by reading the letters to the editors of the newspapers.

● (1720)

One writes:

> If any other operation owed Rochdale's back money, it would have been closed long ago.

Another writes:

> I wonder how many young people must die before something is done about this incredible situation.

A third writes:

Every level of government has deplored and condemned this festering blot on the landscape—Cannot some authority evacuate and fumigate this nest and put it to a useful purpose?

Prominent leaders have joined these ordinary citizens in expressing largely the same convictions. Ontario opposition leader Robert Nixon, Alderman George Ben and former executive Alderman Tony O'Donahue are three leading Toronto Liberals who have called for a change. This is not a party issue, it is one which challenges the conscience of every decent citizen.

An even greater challenge, of course, lay in doing something about the situation. Since 1969, when it was first reported that the mortgage on Rochdale College was in arrears, spokesmen for the government have been promising that something would be done. I recognize that since 1971 these spokesmen have been claiming, and with some justification, that they have been trying to get that certain something accomplished. They have, on more than one occasion, been halted by court action in efforts they have been attempting to make. That is one reason for the concern I feel this afternoon. Will the government be stopped again in following its judicial route? Will it run into a roadblock? The strange thing is that Rochdale College has greater survival power than has a cat with nine lives.

In 1970, the then minister in charge of housing, in the midst of the kind of criticism and comment with which we have become familiar with respect to Rochdale, made an announcement in the press that he would very soon be deciding the fate of Rochdale. So many allusions to the fate of Rochdale being decided and so many announcements respecting its pending demise went out from Ottawa that the Toronto Telegram actually believed something would happen.

In 1971, that newspaper published an editorial entitled "Farewell Rochdale". Since that occasion, the Toronto Telegram has gone, but Rochdale is still here. It is one thing to say that Rochdale is going, but quite another to report it has gone. There have been all kinds of promises, announcements and assurances, but what we would say to the government is this: if you have the willingness and the determination to carry out these threats, we shall be behind you. We want action. We are willing to support you in whatever action it is necessary to take, through legislation or any other means, to accomplish the objective we all desire. But let's have the action rather than the assurances. We have had enough promises, let's have some performance.

Just a few years ago a receivership was appointed on behalf of all creditors involved with Rochdale College. It has recently been said that some control is being gained. For example, Rochdale security guards have been replaced by a private protective agency and we understand why this was necessary. For some time the appointed receiver could not collect the rents. He could not deliver an eviction notice. He had to send such a notice through the mail, so afraid he was of being harassed as he went through the buildings. Now, it is understandable that when there has been so much resistance to normal authority many suspect that the objectives of CMHC, the objectives of the government, may somehow be thwarted again. It is possible, for example, that the appeal being launched on behalf of the College may be upheld, and that the attempt by CMHC to foreclose may fail.

We should be concerned, therefore, by the possibility of such a failure occurring, or, perhaps, by the possibility of the government being talked into some new arrangement with the people who have sponsored Rochdale in the past—and they seem to have gained from it throughout the years. Hence the value of the motion before us. It gives the House the opportunity to say to the government that it must act through legislation or by some other available means. It gives the government the opportunity to gain the support of the House in taking action if it should prove necessary.

The government may say it has no option if its action of foreclosure does not succeed. What we are urging the minister to do, with his colleagues in the government, is to seek through legislation or other available means another route. The minister has from time to time insisted that he has done everything the law permits, and within certain terms of reference I agree with that. But that is not good enough when compared with the efforts made by the government in other circumstances in which it has been determined.

In 1963, for example, the government was challenged by the Seafarers' International Union. As a result of that situation the government passed legislation to put the maritime unions under trusteeship. When that bill was introduced, some members of the House suggested that parliament had no constitutional authority to pass it. But parliament did pass it. Some people claimed that there was no authority given to parliament under the British North America Act to place union property under trusteeship, since property rights were a matter for the provinces. Nevertheless, the authority of the trustees was upheld. So we see, from these proceedings and others, that where there is a will on the part of the government there is always a legislative way. This was true then, and it is true today. It is demonstrated by the government's determination to keep the WFL out of Canada, even if it means passing legislation under the terms of the British North America Act. Somehow or other, the government is willing to tell parliament that action of this kind is necessary to peace, order and good government of Canada. Maybe it is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I regret having to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. Would the House allow him a few more minutes in which to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stackhouse: I thank the House for its courtesy and I shall not trespass on its good will. The point I was making was this: if the government feels very strongly about the need to take a certain kind of action it can find the means of doing so. It claims that action in respect of the WFL is necessary for the peace, order and good government of Canada. If it can be taken seriously in this regard, how can one believe statements that it does not have the authority to deal with the situation at Rochdale?

An hon. Member: They are bluffing on the other, too.

Mr. Stackhouse: Is there one law for Toronto and another for Rochdale? What the hon. member says may be true in the instance of football. We shall see whether it is true with respect to Rochdale. Anyway, we can understand why the Globe and Mail writer asked this question: "What is there about Rochdale that makes politicians impotent?" That is not a word I would have used myself, but it is used in that editorial. It does raise a question with which we should all concern ourselves. We should seek to support the government in whatever action it may find necessary. We ought to say to the government: This responsibility is yours and we are looking to you to correct the mistake which was made.

● (1730)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to intervene in private members' hour, but I do so in this debate as the minister responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation simply to demonstrate the very deep concern and interest of the government and myself on this issue. I am under something of a handicap in that this matter, as the hon. member who has just spoken made clear, is the subject of foreclosure and is before the courts. I am under some impediment as to precisely what I can say, but I will endeavour to manage with that impediment.

I was amused during the speech of the hon. member, who has made several speeches on the subject of Rochdale College, when he suggested that it must not be made into a partisan matter but should be dealt with as a non-partisan, non-political issue and then spent some time in his speech, as he has on previous occasions, using every possible means to turn it into a partisan political matter. I have made it clear on the record of this House before, and I do so again today, that the government is taking every possible legal means—I underline "legal" means—to gain possession of Rochdale College.

Mr. Hellyer: Nonsense.

Mr. Basford: It is my view that we are doing that simply because present conditions at Rochdale are intolerable and unacceptable. Unfortunately, it is not a simple matter to rectify the situation through the legal process. We shall hear from a learned law professor in a moment. Unfortunately, foreclosure is not a simple matter. But the proposals made by the hon. member would not get around the difficulties with which we are faced.

Let me outline the legal situation and describe what this government has done in an attempt to expedite the process. I shall not go into the history of this matter except to say that I was not the minister at the time. It seems to me, looking over the records, that at the time the Rochdale proposal was put forward, everyone in all parties in this House, in the city of Toronto and in the provincial government, including people from all walks of life, thought the idea as presented—I underline the word "presented"—was a good one. It was an attempt to meet the particular housing situation at the time. It was thought to be such a good idea that the loan was approved, and this is no reflection on him, by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), who was then the minister responsible for housing.

Rochdale College

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It is not that I wish to interrupt the minister in presenting this apologia for the government's inaction, but I should like to set the record straight. I was not the minister at the time the loan was approved.

Mr. Basford: I stand corrected and I accept the hon. member's word on that.

Mr. Hellyer: I hope the rest of what you say is more accurate.

Mr. Basford: I will have to check the records, and I may have been confused, but I understand that in fact the hon. member approved the loans in respect of some of these co-operative colleges. My concern about what has happened at Rochdale is that it may unfortunately reflect upon the whole co-operative housing movement. Last session this House passed very good amendments to the National Housing Act relating to co-operative and non-profit housing. These amendments are beginning to work in some parts of the country, and I should hope that the experience of Rochdale, which in fact is not a co-operative in any sense of the word, will not adversely affect the operation of the amendments approved by the House in the last session.

Mr. Hellyer: The co-operatives will get you into trouble, too.

Mr. Basford: Going back to the legal situation, after the loan was made, default on the mortgage occurred on August 17, 1971. As a result of that substantial default in payments, CMHC proceeded on behalf of the government with a foreclosure action by writ of summons. That suit attempted to take possession of the building and to give CMHC, as the agency foreclosing, possession and management of the building. After several unsuccessful attempts in the court, CMHC attempted through the legal process to gain interim possession, interim receivership and interim management of the building but was refused by the court. In fact, the order of the court specifically excluded CMHC from taking over possession and management of the building.

At that point we instructed our solicitors to endeavour to commence an action, on behalf of all the creditors, for the appointment of a receiver or manager. Fortunately, that application was successful and by order of the court a receiver was put in possession of the building. The trial of that action commenced October 1, 1973. Our solicitors again took special action, and I wrote the attorney general of Ontario and asked that he use his good offices in this regard and the matter was referred to the court registrar to set an early trial date for the action. It was heard on October 1, 1973, and arguments were completed on October 4.

On the foreclosure action in the Ontario court judgment was reserved by Madame Justice Van Camp, who gave judgment on February 4, 1974. That judgment was totally in favour of the foreclosure action of CMHC. Everything that CMHC had asked for was granted. That decision was completely in our favour. I will not detail the precise nature of the order, as foreclosure actions are extremely complicated, but there was an order for a reference before a master for the taking of accounts, the taxation of costs, and redemption and possession, which was what we sought from the court.

The defendants in this case, Revenue Properties Central Developments Limited, and Rochdale College, filed a notice of appeal on February 4, 1974. We are still living with a judicial system in which parties to a lawsuit have the right to appeal, and these parties have exercised that right. By reason of the filing of the notice of appeal, CMHC is in exactly the same position it was in prior to the judgment of the Supreme Court of Ontario. The receiver, Clarkson Gordon, therefore remains in possession of the land and premises to use and operate them, to receive rents and profits and to make all necessary expenditures until the trial or other disposition of the said action.

The motion before the House suggests that we should take further action. I think we have tried and I have documented that effort. We prosecuted a foreclosure action as expeditiously as the court rules allow. Following the judgment and the notice of appeal, which could for some years put off a final decision, I wrote the following letter to the receiver, who is acting not for CMHC but as a court appointed receiver on behalf of all creditors, in the following terms; it is addressed to J. L. Biddell and is dated March 1, 1974:

> As the minister responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation I have, since the foreclosure action was commenced, instructed that the proceedings on Rochdale College be proceeded with as quickly as the rules of court allow. This had been done and resulted in a judgment of the Ontario Supreme Court on February 4, 1974, in favour of CMHC. I am now advised by our solicitors that this decision has been appealed to the Ontario Court of Appeal and that in spite of my instructions, and an application to the Chief Justice for an early hearing date on the appeal, that the disposition of this appeal and a possible subsequent appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada could be a matter of years. To me it is intolerable and inexplicable that the present conditions in Rochdale should be permitted to continue throughout this further period of lengthy legal proceedings.
> It is clear even from an economic point of view that the present type of operation is wasteful and will continue to be non-viable.
> ● (1740)
> Every effort must be made at this time to change the type and character of the occupants of the said building.
>
> I therefore formally request, and for CMHC concur, that you take forthwith all steps that are necessary to gain vacant possession of all of the residential accommodation at Rochdale College and when this has been accomplished, thought could be given to the making of needful repairs and improvement so as to attract a more conventional type of occupant thereby reducing to a minimum the high cost of maintenance and security.
> In taking these necessary steps forthwith I trust that you will have the complete co-operation of the Attorney General of Ontario and the Chief of Police of the city of Toronto.

Mr. Speaker, I mentioned that last paragraph simply because I feel, acting on behalf of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, that I am the only one interested in prosecuting any action in respect of Rochdale. While we have the rights of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, those are the limits of our rights. Much has been said in this House and elsewhere about criminal conduct, alcoholism, drug activity, and so on. Those are activities clearly under the jurisdiction of the chief of police of the city of Toronto who, of course, would have our complete co-operation. We are simply involved as a mortgage company.

[Mr. Basford.]

Mr. Hellyer: Do you take that attitude toward slum lands?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, as a result of the action I have just documented, on March 8 this year the receiver filed an application by way of notice of motion in the Supreme Court of Ontario for leave to terminate all existing residential tenancies in Rochdale College. The said notice of motion is returnable at Osgoode Hall, Toronto, on March 20, 1974. The day after tomorrow, therefore, I would hope to report—and I must be very careful in terms of parliamentary proceedings, as must other hon. members—that the court will adjudicate on the motion as expeditiously as possible. I have clearly stated my view that the tenancies should be terminated as soon as reasonably possible without prejudice to the parties in the action. I certainly will indicate, through the solicitors, that that is our view and that the general conditions in Rochdale College are intolerable and inexplicable and they should not be permitted to continue until the foreclosure action has been finally determined by the court.

The hon. member speaking for the motion said that we should take, in the terms of the motion, some other action. Within the laws of the land, we are taking the action which is appropriate and which we were advised is the best action. This was the advice by the law officers of the Crown and our retained solicitor. The hon. member, for example, as I understood him, suggested we could take expropriation proceedings in respect of Rochdale College. I am sure he makes that suggestion with the best of motives, wanting to be helpful in this suggestion.

I suggest—I think the lawyer-professor who will speak in a moment will support me in this—there is probably only one legal process that is more complicated than foreclosure, and that is expropriation. If one thinks foreclosure proceedings are complicated, expropriation proceedings are even more complicated. Under expropriation proceedings it takes even longer to get possession of a building and take action. Furthermore, it involves the real risk that in an expropriation proceeding we would have to spend additional moneys either to subsequent encumbrancers of revenue property or even, conceivably, to Rochdale College, the owners of the building.

As I say, I am sure the hon. member put forward his idea in good faith. I give him that credit, but I say that we have examined every possible legal avenue that we should follow. If we were to take expropriation proceedings, we would run the risk of having a court order and paying additional money to the very people we want to foreclose. From the beginning I have instructed everybody involved that although we could move very quickly by the payment of extra money by way of settlement or expropriation, and probably very quickly by the payment of extra money, surely enough of the taxpayers' money is already involved in this matter. The foreclosure action will protect the taxpayer. Surely we should not be taking legal proceedings which run the risk of our having to pay additional money. I have suggested that we should not pay one red cent by way—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Stackhouse: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The minister has been very concerned about rebutting a point which actually I did not make. I was interested to hear his representation in respect of this point to which I did not refer. He is correct in saying it was part of a speech I circulated, and I know he read a copy of it; but I did not make it in this debate. I stand by the representations and take seriously what he said about them, but it was not part of this debate. In respect of the remarks which I did circulate and which the minister has read, I suggest he should acknowledge that in those remarks I said that the money that would be spent on expropriation would return to the public purse, going from one agency to another.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member is becoming involved in debate. He can correct a statement made, but he should not go into the detail of the document to which he refers.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I draw the point simply to show we have considered, and do consider, all possible legal means in respect of Rochdale College by which the government can obtain vacant possession, as the lawyers would say. We are proceeding in a way in which we can do that pursuant to the law and as quickly as possible. We have examined it and are ready to examine all other suggestions concerning how that could be done more quickly. However, we are proceeding in accordance with the law as fast as we can. I very much resent implications from the opposition that somehow we are not doing that.

We live in a society which believes in the rule of law, and that is as binding on the minister and on Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as it is on anyone else in this society. We can only foreclose and gain vacant possession in accordance with the rule of law. That we are doing. The conditions at Rochdale College are intolerable and, to me, inexplicable. Vacant possession of the building should be granted as soon as the law allows. I hope that will be the result of our legal proceedings.

Mr. Ian Arrol (York East): Mr. Speaker, one of the most popular statements that Charles Dickens had one of his characters make, a statement which has echoed down through the years since it was made as a response to the slow way in which the law may work in aid of justice, was "the law is a ass". This might be a response to statements such as "all that can be done is being done", "the situation is complex" and, as the minister just said, "the government is taking every legal means to obtain possession of Rochdale College" and also "foreclosure is not a simple matter". We also know that in the case of a clever lawyer who has a client who may be guilty of no matter what—absconding with funds, or committing murder—there may be a time when that lawyer would find a way in the interest of his client.

In the case of Rochdale College, the crime is not one committed by the public but against the public, and surely a way can be found to obtain redress for the innocent victim, in this case the people of Toronto. In response to the possible question, "What would you have us do; break the law to enforce the will of the people?" the answer must surely be that the government is not now serving the people of Toronto well until some way is found of serving the general will. "Close Rochdale" is the call of the people of Toronto.

It is with a great degree of satisfaction that we recognize that the letter which the minister wrote on March 8 resulted in the report in the Globe and Mail of March 16 headed "Receiver will attempt eviction of Rochdale". But if this fails, the government should not say, "We have tried everything possible and are not able to close down Rochdale," not until the federal government takes the initiative of saying, "This problem is big; this problem must be solved; this problem may be larger than the powers of the federal government to cure it." I suggest, then, the federal government should meet the minicipal and the provincial authorities and should not say, "It was your fault," or, "In the year such and such you said it was O.K."

Let us all admit, municipally, provincially and federally, that we now have a situation which must be cured, and where there is a will there must be found a way. It could involve the co-operation of the police department, the health department, the attorney general of the province, the Minister of Justice of Canada—but whatever is needed to close this mansion of ill-repute must be done before the people of Toronto feel and fear that the government cannot act on their behalf. The federal government cannot solve our national problems, we cannot solve all world problems; yet when in our midst there is a cancer, and when in our midst there are people who want action and when the federal government has the fundamental responsibility, let us act to say jointly to the municipality and to the province, "Let us find some way to close Rochdale".

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, I see that other members from Toronto ridings wish to say something, so I shall try to be brief. I think this is a matter which concerns all of us who represent Toronto ridings and come from the Toronto region. I believe it is a silly argument to compare this matter with other legislative priorities. I do not think we gain any marks by comparing it with the World Football League.

This reminds me of a letter which I received from a friend and constituent today about the World Football League. He said that we have our priorities all wrong. I replied that it was him who had his priorities all wrong. He did not write to me about unemployment insurance, about capital punishment, about old age pensions or about veterans' allowances. I cannot buy those sorts of arguments any more than I can the argument that this is a great national issue and that the law should be pushed aside. It is a matter of intense concern to those responsible to the people of Toronto, but you do not push aside laws, which hon. members opposite have helped us to write, to cure situations such as this.

The most important interjection in the debate today was that of the minister when he quoted from the letter he sent to Mr. Biddell, the receiver. He wrote:

> To me it is intolerable and inexplicable that the present conditions in Rochdale should be permitted to continue throughout this further period of lengthy legal proceedings.

Obviously, the minister is doing all in his power. As a matter of fact, he did not say that Toronto government members met with him a long time ago on this issue and he is co-operating in every way to try to clear up this matter.

Mr. Paproski: That is not true.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I have been accused of not telling the truth. I would like the hon. member to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Paproski: I did not say you didn't say the truth. I said it was not true.

Mr. Danson: Fine. The hon. member is withdrawing his statement and I accept his withdrawal.

Mr. Paproski: I do not withdraw anything.

Mr. Danson: Let us not take up any more time with these silly interjections.

This was an experiment that failed. It resulted in a cesspool, a morass of drugs and slothfulness which none of us can accept and which we want to see cleaned up. It is a black mark on the legitimate co-operative housing projects which we all support, and it is a black mark on the legitimate students who are trying to further their education in imaginative ways. It really sets their case back. I am very impressed by a similar project in Toronto about which we have not heard anything, namely, the Neil Wysick College at Ryerson. They have their problems, but the students have anticipated them and have approached many members with a reasonable solution for curing them. They are trying their best. I believe these people are paying $100,000 in municipal taxes a year, something which Rochdale is not doing at all.

An hon. Member: What about the finance report on that one?

Mr. Danson: I think these people at Neil Wysick should be treated with sympathy and we should ensure that they can carry out the job which they are determined to do.

I suggest that we back up the minister in his efforts to get Rochdale cleaned up as quickly as possible under the law, and we should back up the efforts of the receiver. I should like to see an alternate use made of this building. It is a well constructed building which has been damaged badly, but it can be refurbished as the minister said when he was quoting from his own letter. I would like to see us carry on another type of experiment that has been highly successful, namely, the setting up of senior citizens' housing such as has been done in the central part of Toronto. We have excellent senior citizens' housing on Yonge Street downtown in the core of the city. The other day I met an old army friend who is living in one of these homes and he told me how delightful it was to be able to walk to the shops across the street, or down to the military institute to see his friends, and to be able to live in dignity at a nominal rent.

I should like to see Rochdale converted to housing for senior citizens. I know it can be refurbished. This would be a constructive use for it. Our experimentation in this area has paid off. I have not heard of any drug or sex scandals in senior citizens' homes to date, and I think we should take our chances on that. We are deeply concerned and I know the minister is concerned. I hope we find a technique within the law to get this place cleaned out. It is a cancer on the whole student movement in Canada, and certainly in Toronto.

We will not eliminate all the problems. The drug problem will still exist; the slothfulness will still exist. It will not be institutionalized, and we will not be subsidizing it. Society will pay for it in other ways, but that is not the object of Rochdale College. It should not provide low-cost housing. I read a report in the newspaper that a woman said, "You cannot move us out, and I cannot afford to live anywhere else." That is a tragedy, I admit, but that is not the object of Rochdale College. I do not think there is a simple and easy way to solve this problem. It must be done forcefully and within the law. We must make proper, constructive use of this facility to which a large amount of federal funds has gone, and other funds as well.

In a sense, the city of Toronto has been forced to forgo taxation. I think the place should be put back on the road and put into constructive social use such as we have seen in the case of other senior citizens' homes of which we do not have nearly enough. I think we have an opportunity here to support the minister and the actions he takes to see that this place is cleaned up and is put to constructive use. The minister refers in his letter to "alternate use". I suggest that the best alternate use would be senior citizens' housing, for example of the type on Yonge Street opposite Eaton's College Street which is run almost like a private hotel for senior citizens at nominal rents, which gives them a new lease on life and allows them to live as complete human beings.

I believe this is what government encouragement and government loans are for. I do not think we should get out of co-operative housing for students when it is run responsibly. We have learnt a lesson, and if we experiment again in this area we should not leave ourselves open to the sort of abuse which has taken place in Rochdale College. It is a place that all the people I know in Toronto have condemned, and I think all the people of Toronto would support this clean-up and changeover.

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I think the theme of today's debate should be, "Oh what a difference a private member's motion can make." The minister's letter of March 1 is an excellent one: it sets forth the points very clearly; it demonstrates the ability of the minister at long last to take some action. The tragedy of it all is that that letter could have been written in exactly the same terms a year and a half ago.

The parliamentary secretary to the minister, who is in the House at present, wrote a letter in which he said the interim receiver was appointed on September 14, 1972. At that time the Clarkson company was appointed interim receiver and manager. Notwithstanding the fact that the action was still proceeding and no foreclosure order had been made, it would have been entirely in order for the first mortgagee, in this case CMHC, to indicate its views to the interim receiver—those views which were indicated very clearly in the letter of March 1, 1974. I point out that the original default by Rochdale College on the mortgage took place as of March 1, 1969. Again I ask, why was there the delay in the appointment of the interim receiver, which did not take place until 1972?

I wish to place on the record some comments by other members of the government about conditions at Rochdale College. I think we have had some candid comments today, not only by the minister but also by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson). What I think we should have listened to, and what I intend to read into the record, are comments of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) in response to a question I put to him in the House last July. I quote as follows from a letter which he wrote to me on July 17 last:

> Since its inception in 1968, Rochdale has been a continual haven for drug traffickers and a source of concern to law enforcement agencies in the area. The RCMP has, among its major interests, the enforcement of drug laws. It has found that since Rochdale's very beginning drug trafficking has been prevalent within the college.
> Initially, the RCMP conducted many investigations in Rochdale. However, because of the obstructionist tactics carried out by the residents, these investigations became costly in terms of time and manpower. Tactics such as clearing the building by pulling the fire alarms as the police enter the building, which prevents police from connecting the drugs found with the occupants, are designed to frustrate any police investigations aimed at the residents of the college. It became apparent that these searches were exercises in futility as the amount of energy expended did not justify the results.

In a following paragraph he wrote:

> The Metropolitan Toronto Police Department established an eight-man section in January, 1973, to conduct investigations concerning Rochdale and in the first four months 700 persons were arrested regarding drug offences. Many of these arrests were for samll possession amounts. However, a considerable number involved large quantities. The continuing appearance of weapons and arms occurs more often when dealing with persons from Rochdale College than in any other investigations.

As the representative for the riding of St. Paul's, Which is just across Bloor Street from Rochdale College, I want to speak out on behalf of the residents living in the south end of St. Paul's who on a daily basis must put up with conditions described in this letter form the Solicitor General. This is a very real concern for residents whose neighbourhood has been infiltrated by people not only possessing and using drugs but trafficking in them in large amounts. It is a serious concern.

I appreciate that I do not have much time available, Mr. Speaker, but I do want to ask the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford), or in his absence his parliamentary secretary, to tell us where is the report of the financial investigation into co-op housing, namely, Rochdale College and Neil Wysick College. The parliamentary secretary will remember his comment on behalf of the government on July 23 last wherein, in response to a question from the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), he indicated that the report by CMHC, which had been in the making for four or five months, would be made available to members of the House. He went on to say that it was his understanding that when the inquiry, which was started in February, 1973, was completed, its report would be available to members of the House. Again I ask, where are those reports?

Again the minister has said today that they have done all within their power. I suggest that that is not true, because until we have seen the financial investigation reports we do not know what charges could possibly be laid under the appropriate criminal legislation. We do not know what disciplinary action could be taken against architects and engineers involved in collusion, in rigging of tenders and in fraudulent practices. We, representing the public of the Toronto area, have a right to see that information and we have a right to see it at this very time.

I want to say that I was disappointed—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' buisness having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At 6.08 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS 1867 TO 1965

PROVISION OF REPRESENTATION IN THE SENATE FOR THE NORTHWEST TERRITORIES AND THE YUKON

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council) moved that Bill C-11, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is easily stated: it is to increase the size of the Senate to permit the appointment of one senator for each of the territories which requires, as indicated, an amendment to the British North America Act. This increase in the representation of the territories in the Parliament of Canada will, hopefully, provide additional opportunities for the expression of a northern viewpoint in the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Nielsen: Hah!

Mr. MacEachen: This will add to the northern viewpoint.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the minister keeping a straight face while he says that?

Mr. MacEachen: While the two territories have a relatively small population—they comprise almost 40 per cent of the geographical area of Canada—the ratio of Indian and Eskimo people to the total population of the two territories is much greater than that of any of the provinces.

I would mention to members of the House that the appointment of territorial senators is not unprecedented. Senators were appointed to represent the Northwest Territories during the earlier years of settlement and they continued to sit for the territories until the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were created. The question of territorial representation in the other place has been raised from time to time in this chamber. Private members' bills were introduced in the House of Commons in 1960 and in 1962, in 1972 Bill C-126, and in 1973 Bill C-12, to provide one senator from each territory. So the matter is not before the House for the first time; it has been brought to the attention of the House in the form of private members' bills.

Mr. Nielsen: Many times.

Mr. MacEachen: The issue is clearcut and straightforward. It does not require any further explanation from me in speaking on second reading of the bill.

In conclusion, I might mention that the motion for second reading refers consideration of the bill to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I think, on reflection, that it might be better to refer the bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. It is a constitutional amendment and it might be more appropriate for that standing committee to deal with this bill. However, the motion that was put down does refer to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and for that reason I am suggesting that the House might agree, with consent, to refer the bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (2010)

Mr. MacEachen: I conclude by saying that the question of representation of the territories in the House of Commons is not touched on in this bill. That question can be, and will be, dealt with in the general consideration of the whole question of representation in the House of Commons which will be continued in the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. So I remind hon. members of the House that there is a separate opportunity for dealing with the question of the representation of the territories in this chamber. This bill deals with the Senate.

Mr. Nielsen: What other business is listed for consideration, if we should finish this bill?

Mr. MacEachen: I respond to that question by saying that if we deal with this bill, we will call the competition bill tonight.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. May I ask hon. members whether they agree to referring this bill to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, this must be a night of great satisfaction for the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). He is a veteran member of the House of Commons and throughout much of his tenure here he has had a private member's bill standing on the order paper in his name entitled "An act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965". That is an amendment to provide for representation in the Senate of Canada for the Yukon and Northwest Territories. Tonight we are dealing with a government measure bearing exactly the same title and designed to accomplish exactly the same thing. It just goes to show that if you have tenacity, endurance, stamina and perseverance you can eventually persuade even Liberals to see the light.

We in this party welcome Bill C-11 and hope that it will have quick passage through all stages of debate. Just over a year ago, on February 20, to be exact, we debated this very matter when the private member's bill of the hon. member for Yukon was before the House. Although there was the customary tendency on the part of government members to talk the bill out at that time rather than referring it to committee, there was some indication even then on the part of hon. members opposite that they supported the measure in a limited way. For instance, the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) spoke in favour of it but made his support of it conditional upon there being over-all Senate reform. As he put it at that time, "I do not feel it gets to the root of the problem of Senate reform." So he hesitated in supporting it. Further, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) said, when speaking about Senate representation from the northern territories, "This matter cannot be considered in isolation from other changes which should be made in respect of Senate representation."

There may be some justification for those views, Mr. Speaker, but better one small step at a time than no step at all. That is why I welcome the government's measure tonight. I know that this time the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo and the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville will give the bill their wholehearted support. If the government would only take the same approach to other problems, such as the high cost of living, it might be able to arrive at solutions step by step instead of remaining immobile. I am sure the government will appreciate that we in this party, as in the case of this bill and that of the hon. member for Yukon, will continue to suggest the route the government should take until such time as our party forms the government.

I hope this bill receives the unanimous support of all parties in the House of Commons so that we can indicate to Canadians living north of the sixtieth parallel that the Canadian parliament does not discriminate against northerners. It is fundamentally important for us to remember that the Parliament of Canada is composed of two chambers. In this House the Yukon and Northwest Territories have been accorded representation since 1903 and 1949 respectively. In the other place the territories have been denied representation. That has been a long-standing denial of justice and equality.

Some in this House advocate the abolition of the other place.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Certainly, no one questions their right to put forward that proposition with whatever vigour they can muster. However, I would say to them that so long as there is another chamber which is part of the Canadian parliamentary system, the northern territories should not be denied access to it.

I hope that members of the party to my left, particularly the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth), will see fit to endorse this particular measure despite their long-term goals, otherwise they will be grossly discriminatory against and unfair to Canadians who reside in the two-fifths of Canada north of 60. The north deserves additional representation in the Parliament of Canada.

Hopefully, when redistribution of the make-up of this House takes place some arrangement will be made to compensate for the tremendous geographical distances which must be covered. One way in which the northern territories can be assured wider representation in the near future is by way of appointment to the Parliament of Canada.

Many northerners could bring to parliament additional expertise in the social, economic and cultural problems of the north. It would be beneficial to us all if we were exposed more frequently and fully to the views of northerners. Someone like the late Knut Lang would have made a singular contribution. There are many others who could contribute. There is always some debate as to the population figures north of 60. We know that many northern residents are native, that is, Indian, Metis and Innuit. Last year, when speaking to a similar bill in the House, I stated that I felt it would be particularly fitting if a representative of the native peoples could sit in the other place as a representative of one or both of the territories. The problems of these people of the north are many, and they deserve our attention and concern.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will receive early implementation and that the appointment of two northerners to the other place will be carried out without delay.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on this bill, but was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) give credit to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) for its underlying idea. It seems to me that it was considered in the joint Senate and House of Commons committee which looked at recommendations for constitutional change. I have spoken out in the House about the situation in the Senate and I will continue speaking out until such time as the situation changes.

I was happy to hear the remarks of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) regarding representation for the Northwest Territories. That, I think, is most important. In the last session I introduced bills which would have provided for more representation but certainly not for appointees. This afternoon we debated the bill which would abolish appointees to the Council of the Northwest Territories. This bill seems to be a step backward in that it provides for appointments to the Senate. I have very serious doubts whether any self-respecting northerner would accept the appointment of senator.

● (2020)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Firth: As a matter of fact, should this bill pass through the House and a northerner is appointed, it may be necessary to bring him here at gunpoint.

The message I get from this bill with regard to further appointees seems to point to the fact that the Liberals have had some difficulty in electing members from the north. The situation seems to be: If we can't elect them, let's appoint them. We appoint members from the Northwest Territories administration to the information and liaison office in Ottawa. This costs more money than having another member. He does not have to do very much, but at least the government has him here. They want to appoint a chap from the Yukon who is not even able to win the nomination for the Liberal candidacy in the last election. They want to make another position and appoint him as a senator.

I repeat, I doubt very much whether any self-respecting northerner would accept that position. The fact is the Northwest Territories deserve more representation in this House. This bill is somewhat like a joke that is being played on the people of the Northwest Territories—and we do not think it is a very funny joke.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the fact that I caught you in the act of rising tells me that you are an incurable optimist. I welcome this bill. The hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) referred to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) giving me credit for this idea, I think he called it. He left the inference with the House that the idea originated with the Joint Senate and House of Commons Committee on the Constitution which traveiled to other parts of the country as well as the Yukon and Northwest Territories. They held hearings in Dawson City, Whitehorse and Watson Lake. Let me say to him through you, Mr. Speaker, that many years before the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons started sitting on the question of the constitution of Canada, this bill of mine had been introduced and debated. Perhaps it is because the hon. member for Northwest Territories did not read Hansard, or was not here at the time, that he fails to recognize the fact that I have on an almost annual basis introduced a bill which would make the two northern territories truly representative in the Parliament of Canada.

As I understand it, the Parliament of Canada consists of two Houses. In each of those Houses, this place and the other place, every part of Canada has representation. Until the minister's very worth while bill was introduced this evening, the only exception has been Canadians living above the sixthieth parallel. Canadians of white origin, Canadians of Indian origin and Canadians of Inuit origin are all Canadians. I quote the remarks made earlier today by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in another debate espousing the principle that all Canadians should be treated equally. It is not equality of treatment to have lack of representation in both Houses of parliament for all Canadians. It is that simple and that logical. My only regret is that the matter had to wait so long and we had to be in a minority situation before the government was brought to the realization that the proper approach would be representation in both Houses.

As the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands said, at one time the north was represented by one member of parliament. I ask members here this evening to consider the fact that one member represented some 1,700,000 square miles of Canada from 1903—one member was charged with that responsibility—until 1949. One member represented the Yukon and Northwest Territories. In 1949 the electoral boundaries were readjusted and the Yukon and Northwest Territories had one member each.

To put a fair connotation on history, the Liberal Party had no difficulty electing a member for the Northwest Territories and the Yukon prior to 1949. Certainly my predecessor had that party affiliation until 1953. When the Northwest Territories subsequently became entitled to a member, it too was represented by a Liberal member. Indeed, until the advent of the election of the present hon. member for Northwest Territories it had been represented solidly by a member of the Liberal Party save and except for one intervention by a member of this party from 1963 to 1968.

Now that those matters are set straight, with regard to the argument that the party in power has difficulty electing people and must therefore appoint someone, I do not think that is a fair observation. It certainly is not accurate. The minister introducing the bill—

Mr. Barnett: May I ask the hon. member whether the Liberals will try to do better in the Yukon next time around?

Mr. Nielsen: As they say, Mr. Speaker, hope springs eternal. As another matter of historical observation, since 1903, some 71 years, we have had a representative in parliament. On the Yukon side, at any rate, the Liberal Party can claim possession to 13 of those 71 years. Therefore, they may have a little more difficulty because of the inbred spirit of independence, free enterprise and initiative that we in the Yukon give as our principal reason for being there.

Mr. Knight: The Senate represents initiative?

Mr. Nielsen: I know the hon. member to my left is expressing the views of the grey eminence of his party, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), when he puts down the Senate. This is where I think the hon. member for Northwest Territories has really been snowed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others who share his views. For the representative of Canadians in the Northwest Territories to stand in his place and tell us that his constituents do not want to be represented in the whole of parliament is beyond my comprehension.

We have a system. Some of us believe the Senate should remain as it is. Some of us believe that it should be abolished. I know the position that the NDP adopted as a party stance, but it ill behooves the hon. member for Northwest Territories to say that as long as we are saddled with the concept of two Houses in a federal system, we do not want any part of that full entitlement which all Canadians have. That is absolutely beyond comprehension. I think the chickens will come home to roost regarding that statement and the hon. member's stance, come the next election.

The minister has made a common error of lumping together the statistics of the two territories. He did not quote them separately. He lumped the economics together, too. That is the way the government treats them because it is unthinkable for those who live in ivory towers in Ottawa to accept anything less than standardization in this age to place everyone on a common, socialistic level. In other words, in spite of a history which goes back to 1896 and earlier, in spite of the growth of political institutions, in spite of independent economic growth, in spite of differing geographical considerations, the government insists on lumping together the two territories because, in its eyes, it is expedient to do so.

For example, the minister said the Indian and Innuit population of the two territories is higher, in relation to other inhabitants, than in the provinces. He might be close to being accurate had he referred only to the Northwest Territories, but his statement is far from accurate in the case of the Yukon. It would be truer to say that the ratio there is the same as it is in the provinces; or not very much higher, at the most. So I have very little sympathy with this argument which is constantly advanced by the government.

I turn now to another matter on which the minister might care to comment in his closing remarks. As I understand it the joint committee of the House and the Senate recommended that legislation be implemented to provide Senate representation for each of the territories. It is also my understanding—and this might well be inaccurate—that the BNA Act requires that representation in a province shall not fall below two members for each position in the Senate. I understand, too, that under the Interpretation Act the territories are interpreted as meaning provinces; they are included in the term "provinces". I am wondering whether constitutionally, if we pass this legislation, the government would be obliged to bring in a bill which would not only provide for increased membership in the Senate but also for increased membership in this chamber. This problem was raised during the sittings of the joint committee, but I thought the minister might cover the point in his closing remarks.

Before the present hon. member for Northwest Territories took his seat in this chamber, when that constituency was represented by Gene Rheaume, he and I vigorously asserted the need for two members in the House of Commons to represent the Northwest Territories. I am not advancing this view with respect to the Yukon, but I certainly do so with respect to the Northwest Territories where an extra seat is desperately needed. It is impossible to travel in the far north without appreciating the vastness of this land. Here is a constituency almost 1,300,000 square miles in extent. Do hon. members realize how long it would take to get around it? My own route takes me 26,000 linear miles and I estimate the hon. member for the Northwest Territories would have to travel between five and eight times that distance to visit the communities which I believe a member is obliged to visit at least once between elections.

I have heard arguments advanced in connection with possible changes to the Canada Elections Act and expense allowances made available to candidates. If anyone can tell me how in a 60-day period the hon. member can be expected to travel through that vast expanse of 1,300,000 square miles without spending a good deal of money, far beyond what the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney) would spend, my understanding would be expanded. It is simply impossible. Thus, I was glad to hear the minister's, on introducing the bill, leave the inference that the government was at least giving favourable consideration to introducing legislation which would give the Northwest Territories an additional member.

The hon. member for Northwest Territories appears to be opposed to the principle of a senator being appointed from the Northwest Territories because, he says, he is opposed to appointing people to any legislative body. I admire that assertion as far as it applies to the Council of the Northwest Territories. I would accept nothing less myself.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But you would accept a seat in the Senate.

Mr. Nielsen: I would not accept a seat in the Senate. I can tell the hon. member that immediately, unequivocally and without reservation. I am not so sure about the desires of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in that regard, because he has colleagues in the other place thanks to the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the previous one.

An hon. Member: Who are they?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I think we are now getting away from the bill. The hon. member should address himself to the Chair, and if other hon. members wish to ask him questions, he should agree to give way or not.

Mr. Nielsen: I said at the outset I would accept any or all questions—from the seat or from the feet, it makes no difference to me. We were discussing this bill and the question of Senate appointments. The question was asked, who were the colleagues of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I was about to reply when Your Honour intervened. I can recall a very vociferous member of this House during my early days here, in the form of the hon. member for Assiniboia. He was the leader of his party and he is now in the other place, thanks to the government on the benches opposite.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is no colleague of ours.

● (2040)

Mr. Nielsen: Let me put it this way: he used to be a colleague and he used to be leader of that party. Perhaps that last remark of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre explains his demise.

What I was about to deal with was the rather fallacious argument of the hon. member for Northwest Territories. I agree that there should be a wholly-elected council in both territories and I agree that there should be a wholly-elected executive committee. But members of the other place are not elected. We have this system written into our constitution, whether we like it or want to change it, and the only way we can attain any northern representation in the other place so as to make the north wholly representative in this Parliament of Canada is by means of appointment.

I, for one, applaud the opportunity to double the representation from my constituency in the Parliament of Canada, and that is what it would mean. I should think the hon. member for Northwest Territories would also welcome eagerly the opportunity to double the representation of his constituency in the Parliament of Canada by adding a member to the other place, and that is exactly what this would mean.

While the minister said it much more briefly than I have, the truth of the situation as he has pointed it out is indisputable. I am wondering about the situation, though, as I have heard a number of rumours in the Yukon, although I do not know whether similar rumours have been making the rounds of the Northwest Territories. These rumours sometimes have a habit of coming close to the truth, and I wonder whether the minister has any knowledge that consideration has already been given to possible appointees from those territories in anticipation of the support this party will give this bill. Being a government bill, it is going to pass.

For instance, there might be an appointment of a native person from the Northwest Territories, or one of Inuit origin. There are rumours in the Yukon that perhaps one who has suddenly become closely associated with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) might be considered. There is some small dissatisfaction with the commissioners in both the territories, and the rumour is abroad that perhaps the only way we can get rid of these unpopular people in the north is to shoot them off to the Senate.

Mr. Barnett: Is that why the hon. member is supporting the bill?

Mr. Nielsen: No, I support the bill because it means doubling representation from the north in this Canadian parliament and because while we have this system we should be represented in both Houses. Why in the world should Canadians living above the sixtieth parallel be left out? Other provinces are represented in the other place, so why should not the two northern territories have equal representation with other Canadians? The NDP may look at this as something less than a right, but my view is that if we are going to participate in parliament as we now have it, and participate fully—which means full representation—such full representation has been too long in coming.

I am not often known to compliment any minister, let alone a Liberal minister or anybody in the Liberal Party, but I am afraid I am weakening. I am afraid the urge is upon me to compliment the minister and his government for bringing in this measure tonight, and that is a rare thing for me to do. This is a final recognition they have come to. Perhaps they have been dragged, kicking and screaming, to the conclusion that there is something in the bill that has stood in my name for so many years in respect of full representation. That realization is upon them and they have at last placed before this House a measure which will accord true and full representation to all Canadians including those living above the sixtieth parallel.

I urge the hon. member for Northwest Territories to reconsider his position because I do not think the views expressed by him tonight are in any way shared by his constituents.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) speak in favour of the bill to establish members in the Senate representing the Northwest Territories and the Yukon territory in the Parliament of Canada, I began to feel that the hon. member was preaching for a call. I wonder what makes this member so interested in creating two appointed positions in that archaic institution which has no real justification in respect of actions, policies and responsibilities of parliament. Surely when the hon. member for Yukon preaches for a call to the other place, as he has tonight, this government made up of Grits ought to consider withdrawing its bill. Surely the Indian and Eskimo people, as well as citizens who have left my area and other parts of the country, in a sense to take part in an adventure in the north, have the right to expect elected representatives in this parliament under our democratic system, rather than some kind of paternalistic appointment to the other place. What a preposterous suggestion!

The province of Saskatchewan has known the kind of discriminatory action that has taken place in the context of national policy since it became a province, yet surely it should expect six representatives in the other place to give them the logical representation about which the hon. member for Yukon has spoken tonight. Who are these representatives? I suggest they are a bunch of doddling fools who sit in the other place and collect pay cheques. They sit there regardless of their background and never represent the interests of Saskatchewan unless they do so in respect of some select corporate interest in that province.

An hon. Member: Senator Argue will not like you.

Mr. Knight: The hon. member for Yukon can make his appeal for a call to the other place but I suggest to him that, in terms of his action in this chamber, he is a relatively active member and I would hate to see him go to heaven so early.

Mr. Nielsen: I don't think I will ever make it there.

Mr. Knight: The question of redistribution was eloquently introduced to the committee on privileges and elections by the government House leader. The principle outlined by that hon. gentleman gives us the framework within which we can assure representation of rural and geographic areas whether they be of the magnitude of the constituency of the hon. member for Northwest Territories or of the magnitude of the constituency of Assiniboia. The people in those areas have the right to representation in parliament, particularly in this House where the decisions are made. This is the kind of representation they must have in order that their views can be expressed in this place and, perhaps more importantly, in order that their representative can communicate with them.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

I suggest that if we send a man to the other place, we might as well be sending him to Florida. As a matter of fact, some of them spend three or four months a year there anyway. We might as well be sending a man to the Turks and Caicos Islands.

An hon. Member: That is an unfortunate analogy.

Mr. Knight: I make that suggestion because this in no way gives representation to the people of the north. As a young man I used to listen to speeches made by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he came to our community. I am quite prepared to admit that I used to sit in the back rows and listen to him speak about his vision of the north. Maybe in the context of that time he was ahead of us in that regard, because now as we enter the latter part of the 1970s and the early 1980s we are in a period when a vision of the north is quite applicable. The people of these areas expect to have the kind of representation that can speak out and protect their interests. They do not want representing them people who have no legislative power. They want people who are in this House of Commons.

● (2050)

Mr. Speaker, the Senate is defunct and will continue to be defunct even if the hon. member for Yukon should be in it. The people of the north, like the people of the west, the maritimes or smaller regions of this country, expect representation by voice in this House of Commons so that their representatives could be recalled should they disagree with the policies they espouse. Further, the hon. member said that there is a rumour that this Liberal government—surely he has been watching this Liberal government for a long time—might consider shooting the commissioners off to the Senate. I am sure the people of the Northwest Territories and the people of the Yukon are not interested in having a government, I do not care what kind of government or what party, with the power to pick two men who may by entirely unpopular in the hon. member's area and appoint them to the other place.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knight: If the hon. member wishes to ask a question later, I will certainly accept it. I believe there is a rumour that a certain individual has been going around parliament suggesting on behalf of the Liberal Party that the hon. member might be appointed to the other place. It is a possibility. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) espouses opinions like a Tory, but she also espouses the position of being some kind of progressive, or at least she leaves that impression, and then comes here tonight and in an utterly impossible turnabout position takes regressive action, after this afternoon supporting the idea of an elected council, and supports the idea of appointed senators from the Northwest Territories. The hon. member, in her progressiveness, suddenly found out she is not only progressive but conservative at the same time.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Indeed I am.

Mr. Knight: I ask the Conservative members in this minority parliament to stop this kind of bill. They call on us to support what they and the Liberal minority are going to support. In this position of balance of power they are going to wield the power to give two individuals authority over their people and appoint them to the other place, rather than as responsible elected representatives from the northern areas.

In my view, in this decade this northern area will become the focal point of almost all the political, economic and social controversy that there will be in this chamber. This will develop because of the potential mineral wealth and resource development in the area. With that in mind, and having in mind the interest of the people who live there, we cannot allow ourselves to be placed in the position where we appoint people who are not responsible to those who live in these areas to look after their interests. I say that in the next decade our northern area will be of such significance that in this chamber the hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for Northwest Territories, or whoever may come after them, may well hear more debate in respect of their areas of the country than we today hear about boxcars. I believe that is the kind of discussion this nation will have. What the right hon. member for Prince Albert spoke of as a vision of the north will become more and more applicable in the next decade.

The people who live there now, those who have made it their way of life, and those whose way of life it always has been, should have responsible and elected representatives in this House who can be recalled, rather than two appointees sitting in Ottawa for six months, sitting in Florida for four months and then spending two months worrying about the people of the north.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member resumes his seat, may I ask him a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Does the hon. member agree?

Mr. Knight: I agree.

Mr. Nielsen: Since, whether we like it or not, we have the other place, since other parts of Canada are represented in the other place and since it is not yet abolished and is part of the Parliament of Canada, would the hon. member deny the two northern territories representation in this part of the Parliament of Canada until such time as the other place is abolished?

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, does the hon. member know that this party is not represented in the other place? Regardless of what he may think, the other place is not representative of the people as a whole, no matter whether they are appointed from the province of Saskatchewan, the Northwest Territories or the Yukon. The best thing we can do for the ordinary people of this country is to abolish that place once and for all.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, if this little debate we are having today does nothing else, at least it will put this chamber in its proper perspective because, very obviously, while the bill we have before us is in the name of a member of the government, its only defenders appear to be sitting in what are sometimes called the official opposition benches. I think that illustrates very well the point that when it comes right down to it, in parliament the Liberal-Conservative combination sits in one part of the House and those of us who sit over here really form the opposition.

Be that as it may, the bill was introduced by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), and in the few remarks he made when introducing the bill he referred to the fact that this was not the first time in the history of Canada when it had been proposed that there should be in the other place representatives from the Northwest Territories. That brought to my mind the fact that what is sometimes referred to as the queen city of the plains was once the capital of the Northwest Territories, and that my mother went to normal school there in those days in order to learn to be a teacher in the Northwest Territories. I suppose, although I do not remember her ever mentioning it to me, that she had the benefit of the representation at that time of a senator from the Northwest Territories.

In due course, not very long before I arrived to become a Canadian, the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were born and the idea of having members from the Northwest Territories in the second chamber apparently disappeared at about that time. In my humble observation I have not noticed that either of the territories has suffered materially or spiritually in that interval through lack of an official voice in that place on the other side of this building.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was making a great deal about the idea of a wholly representative Parliament of Canada and about full representation for the people of the territories. This brought to my mind the question of just what is representation in the other place. The province from which I come has six senators, so does Alberta, so does Saskatchewan and so does Manitoba. If one wants to suggest that British Columbia has full representation in the other place, I might be inclined to say that that was a satisfactory representation, but it is certainly not full representation on any geographical or population basis.

It strikes me as rather strange that in the approximately 20 years since I first came to this chamber, to the best of my recollection I have never heard one member of any party from British Columbia, from Alberta, from Saskatchewan or from Manitoba stand in the House and complain that the western provinces were not properly represented in the other place. To me, this gives a rather hollow ring to the eloquent plea of the hon. member for Yukon about full representation for the people of the territories, because obviously—and this should not be lost upon the House—the question of representation in the Senate is a small thing to the people of the four western provinces since not one member from any of those provinces, to the best of my recollection, has ever seen fit to rise and complain about any degree of underrepresentation in the other place.

I did a quick calculation out of curiosity and, based upon the fact that New Brunswick has ten honourable senators in the other place, I asked myself what full representation in that place would be for the western provinces. On a rough calculation, based on the 1971 census and on the same population ratio as New Brunswick, I found that British Columbia would have 34 senators, Alberta 25 senators, Saskatchewan 14 senators, and Manitoba 14 senators, making a total of 87. When I hear the hon. member for Yukon and his colleagues in the Conservative Party suggesting that there should be 87 senators from the four western provinces, then I will begin to think they are doing something more than speaking tongue in cheek about full representation.

I thought I would like to take part in this debate briefly to make clear that so far as I am concerned, the hon. member who tonight has shown the soundest common sense in stating the needs and the interests of the people of the Northwest Territories and the territory represented by the would-be senator for the Yukon is my colleague, the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth). He put this whole matter into perspective when he suggested that it is not wasting more than five minutes of the time of the House to say: a plague on the whole idea.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to some of the speeches that have been made this evening concerning the provision in this bill for senate representation for the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. I think that there is a fundamental point at issue here which members of the NDP who have spoken against the legislation do not seem to understand. If you wish to have a region which is as isolated as the Northwest Territories or the Yukon brought into the full stream of public politics of your country, it seems to me you must provide adequate access to all institutions of your government.

The Senate, whether or not the NDP likes to admit it, is part of the government of Canada. Senators are members of parliament. In spite of the fact that my friends are huffing and puffing and threatening to blow the house down, the Senate is there and is likely to outlast the NDP as a political force in this country. Furthermore, even when the House of Commons and the Senate had a joint special committee to look into the constitution of Canada, one of the things that was most surprising of all was that there was very little criticism of the Senate, and indeed there was a multitude of proposals not to weaken the Senate or do away with it but to strengthen it and make it a more powerful force in Canadian politics. As a result of some of the recommendations which were made by that committee and other hon. members who have put forward bills from time to time, the government has decided to implement the recommendation to provide Senate representation for the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

The first point I started out to make was that you have to provide adequate access to the instruments of government, the Senate being one of them. Far more important, or as important to me as the question of adequate representation, is presence by the residents of the north in the civil service of Canada. One of the things that concerns me is that if any particular region is to be properly represented at all levels of the decision-making process, it must have representatives in all the facets that go to making decisions which affect the country. We just cannot have a system where the government is run by a particular group of people, where the civil service is not representative of the various groupings that make up our country—and this is only the beginning of a new thrust in government policy to bring the Northwest Territories and the Yukon more into the mainstream of Canadian life.

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who introduced the bill, made the point that the possibility of additional seats in the House of Commons for the Northwest Territories would be discussed during discussions on the redistribution of parliamentary seats, a matter which is about to be again before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I would think the representatives of those areas now in the House of Commons would attend those meetings and press their case as best they can. I am sympathetic to the idea of an additional seat for the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Nielsen: Would you vote for it?

Mr. Reid: I think I would vote for it, and I think there is a possibility of such a situation coming about. However, I think it is totally absurd that, while we are discussing improving the position of the north in the House of Commons, we do not take advantage of the same opportunity to improve its position in the other legislative institution of government, the Senate of Canada.

Whether the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) likes to admit it or not, the Senate does have equal legislative power with the House of Commons except for the power to introduce money bills. That power belongs only to the House of Commons. But under our constitution the Senate can and has turned back money legislation that was introduced in this House. I refer the hon. member for Assiniboia, who is a young man, to the customs and excise measures turned down by the Senate in the Diefenbaker years.

Mr. Nielsen: And the parks bill.

Mr. Reid: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has properly mentioned the parks bill. The problem the NDP have with this piece of legislation is that it affects one of their weak points. That weak point is their commitment to the doctrine that the Senate does not serve any useful purpose. Sometimes the NDP are reasonably flexible, able to keep in touch with what is going on in Canadian society. But this is one of those items where they have no discretion, no ability to distinguish between what is in existence and what they would like things to be. Therefore, they are against this bill, not because it is a bad bill, not because it does not do what it is supposed to do but because it sticks them where it hurts.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I was going to inquire whether by speaking at this time the minister's parliamentary secretary had closed the debate, but apparently he has opened up the debate. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I confess that I have wracked my brain to try to figure out why we are debating this bill tonight. The government House leader realized, and he told some of us, that there was a meeting he had to attend and that that would take him out of the House. He also realized that the Canadian Labour Congress is holding a reception, following the presentation of its brief to the government earlier today, and that that would take a few more members out of the House. He also probably realized that because the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada is holding its annual meeting, that would take all the good Tories out of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Why are your fellows not here?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is no secret about it. I just referred to the reception being held by the Canadian Labour Congress. A number of my colleagues are there, and I suspect that there might even be one or two Tories there as well. At any rate, I suppose the government House leader realized that this was not a night for anything heavy or serious and that we might as well take something that would at least make the evening entertaining and amusing. If we have treated this bill in this debate with some derision, Mr. Speaker, frankly that is how we feel about it.

I have enjoyed some of the things that have been said. I liked the attempt of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) to suggest that something more important should be under discussion, and she got in at least a passing reference to the high cost of living. But, Mr. Speaker, I suppose that is what this bill does—it will enable two persons to cope with the high cost of living because the two who will get these appointments will receive $18,000 salary per year, and a $4,000 tax free allowance per year until they are 75 years of age.

Mr. Nielsen: And a voice in parliament.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh come, come—a voice in parliament! My hon. friend has been mouthing that all evening, either from his feet or his seat, and I suppose he takes encouragement from some of the things said by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid).

I rather like the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. He is up there at the top of the western part of Ontario adjoining the province of Manitoba. He sits alongside my hon. friend from St. Boniface. By the process of osmosis he picks up some good ideas and a reasonable measure of decency. But I heard him say tonight that we should bring the north into the Senate so as to bring the north into the full stream of the public politics of Canada. Mr. Speaker, I know I should not call attention to the fact that you yourself are grinning, but you have no choice. The Senate—the full stream of the public politics of Canada? Come, come. Don't even try to tell the senators that; they know better. It seems the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has got streams on the brain.

An hon. Member: Streaks?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Streaming, not streaking. They don't do that in the Senate.

Mr. Ouellet: Yet.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He said that this was bringing the north into the mainstream of Canadian life. Mr. Speaker, even on a night when we are sort of filling in the time because there are not many members here, please let him not give us that line that it is bringing a section of the country into the mainstream of Canadian life by putting it in the other place. How could anyone mouth such a sentiment?

Then he said another reason for wanting to bring the north into the Senate was to give it adequate access to the instruments of government. That is not the way I read the Senate. Mind you, if it is true, if some of the gentlemen and ladies over there, with their corporate directorships and so on, have access to the instruments of government that we do not know about, maybe this should be brought out and discussed in connection with conflict of interest. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not the mainstream of Canadian life over on the other side of this building. That is not the full stream of the public politics of Canada. That is a group of retired, privileged people who enjoy a salary of $18,000 a year and $4,000 a year tax-free expenses from the time they are appointed until they are 75 years of age, and there are a few of them over there who were appointed before that 75 year age limit was established and they go on for life.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Don't get touchy about age.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am not embarrassed about my age at all; I enjoy it. Not many weeks ago I had a debate on radio with one of my personal friends over there. I call them personal friends even if I do not respect them for being senators. I made the statement that not more than 20 or 25 of them over there were really working at the job and my friend, the senator, did not challenge that at all. We know when we go over there. How many are there? Of course, some good work is done in committees. But you do not need to keep 102 and, after this bill goes through, 104 Canadians on the the payroll of this country just to get some committee work done now and then even by the excellent and hardworking 25 or 30 members of the other place who may be on the job.

• (2120)

Mr. Nielsen: Do you think they will pass this bill?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Senate? Should we have a pool on how long they will take? I will put my nickel on five minutes. Mr. Speaker, now that I have said that, they will probably make sure that they take at least ten.

The hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has been making a lot out of the fact that the Senate is there and, since it is there, should not the north be in it? Mr. Speaker, you do not correct a wrong by compounding it—by making it worse. If it is wrong in this country to have a body of individuals with authority to take part in the making of laws without any responsibility to the people of this country—if it is wrong to have 102 of them, it is all the more wrong to have 104.

Mr. Nielsen: We can at least make it representatively wrong.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am not sure what kind of representation they would get. In my view there are 25 or 30 over there who work, who are around this building at weekends and at night as I am—but only a handful. By the law of averages, two more will produce about one-third of a person so far as work is concerned.

I think my hon. friend from the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) hit the nail on the head when he said we do not want senators from the north appointed without responsibility to anybody; we would far rather have one more MP. I am glad to see there is a going notion in all parties in the House that the time has come for that cry to be heard, particularly in an area the size of that which the hon. member for Northwest Territories represents.

The hon. member for Yukon says, let us have representation. Mr. Speaker, it is an insult to the northerners to say they would be represented if they had two appointed people in the other place. He himself is not sure who they would be and, as is perfectly consistent with the course of history, he thinks these appointments may well be used to kick upstairs some individuals who are difficult and embarrassing. Many times has that been used in the provinces when somebody in the cabinet has to be dismissed. Once upon a time we had a Deputy Speaker whom Mr. King could not stand, so he put him in the Senate.

Mr. Nielsen: A few cabinet ministers, too.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It was never done to a Speaker but in my early days it was done to a Deputy Speaker. Do you call that representation, to have a place where the government of the day can put in a couple of people with whom it is having trouble up in the north?

Mr. Nielsen: It is equality of treatment of all Canadians.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This business of letting the northerners have all the things we have in southern Canada can be carried a bit far.

Mr. Nielsen: What is wrong with that? We are Canadians.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Well, down here we have all kinds of pollution; shall we give that to the north as well?

Mr. Nielsen: You can keep that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We have urban sprawl and traffic problems.

Mr. Nielsen: Keep all those.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We have all kinds of things in southern Canada that they do not have in the north. Is that any reason why they should have them? In the same vein, we have Senators. Is that any reason why they should have to bear them as well? Not at all. After all, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Yukon who has got in bed with the Liberals for the purpose of getting this bill through—

Mr. Nielsen: I might even go further.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): With the new hairdo that the hon. member has, I do not know what he might do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, to me it is an insult to the northerners to say that this means anything to them. As my hon. friend with the new hairdo has said, it will be a matter of appointments made by the government of the day and any chance of having real representation just is not in the picture. Even if they did appoint persons, who might be true northerners—and my friend the hon. member for Northwest Territories says that no self-respecting northerner would accept such an appointment—once such a person got there, like all the rest of the senators he would be responsible to no one. No senator in the other place today is responsible to any group of people in Canada. He is not even responsible to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who recommended his appointment to the Governor General. He is there on his own until age 75, yet he has his say in the political processes of this country.

I have said it is a bit of an insult. We are not unknown around this place to quote things we have said in the past. I have heard it done by some others and I am reminded of something I said in front of radio and television reporters on the question of the Senate. They were quizzing me quite thoroughly on my opposition to the Senate and I was laying down the law that I had no use for it. Finally a sharp journalist said to me, "Mr. Knowles, would you feel the same way about the Senate if M. J. Coldwell or Mr. Douglas were over there?"

Mr. Nielsen: Or Hazen Argue.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The question was put to me the way I put it, Mr. Speaker. The name the hon. member has mentioned does not figure in this story. It does not figure at all as far as I am concerned. He has a new hairdo, too. At any rate, when the reporter said to me, "Mr. Knowles, would you not feel happier about the Senate if M. J. Coldwell or Tommy Douglas were over there?" I simply said, "M. J. Coldwell and Tommy Douglas are two of my best friends and I resent the insult that they should even be thought of for the other place." I submit, therefore, that those of us who have any interest in the welfare of the northern people of this country should look upon this thing with the derision that we are giving to it tonight, that it is an insult to them of the first order.

I am interested in the fact that although there is a direct reference in the bill to a senator being named for the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, it seems to be coupled with that special power that is in the British North America Act which enables the government to pack the other place. It is not necessary any more; one side has such an overwhelming majority there is no sense in packing it. When the Tories did get control of this House, and started appointing people to the Senate, their time ran out before they got anywhere. Even when the Tories were in power they could not get back their majority. But there is a provision in the British North America Act that the government of the day may appoint four or eight extra senators at any time; it cannot be fewer than four or more than eight. It has to be one or two from each of the regions.

It is interesting that the power to appoint senators from the north is put in that part of the British North America Act that gives government power to make extra appointments over and above the normal number. That is why we are kicking around these figures. We are talking about a Senate which shall consist of 104 members but with a maximum possible membership of 112. These extra eight have never been appointed, but the authority is there.

Mr. Nielsen: That answers the question I raised with respect to membership in the Commons not falling below two for each senator.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought that was an argument like other arguments I have heard the hon. member for the Yukon make: it did not really hold any water. After all, if there is a senator for the Yukon and a senator for the Northwest Territories, I do not see how you can claim a floor any higher than one for each of those areas. I do not think this provision that would enable the government to appoint two extra senators for the west, two for Ontario, two for Quebec and two for the maritimes or the Atlantics—at the moment I am not sure whether it is restricted to the maritimes or the Atlantics—will help. Anyway, who wants it? As my friend for Northwest Territories says, certainly no self-respecting northerner wants it.

● (2130)

Mr. Speaker, one of the things that amuses me about what the government has done tonight is that—I know that my friends to the right, the good Tories who are here, will bear me out—time and again, when we ask for some important piece of legislation which would deal with the high cost of living, pensions, veterans or what-have-you, we are given the stock answer, "We will have to see if there is parliamentary time." Apparently there is not enough parliamentary time for something that is really important. Yet the government can find parliamentary time for as unimportant an operation as bringing the move into the mainstream of Canadian life, bringing the move into the mainstream of the public politics of Canada, giving the north adequate access to the instruments of government.

I know it is risky saying these things because the sarcasm in one's voice too often will not be evident in the black and white on the pages of Hansard. I suggest that the best case for showing why this whole proposition is ridiculous and should be treated with derision was made—I was going to say by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, but on looking at the hon. member for Yukon I realize that maybe it was made by him. Anyway, it is a toss up. Since those two hon. members are in bed together on this, I will let them sort it out.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question on second reading referring the bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs?

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, when the bill was introduced by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), the incumbent of the chair, yourself I believe, asked the House whether the bill should be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. According to my recollection, this afternoon there was general agreement in the House to refer both bills dealing with the north to that standing committee, rather than to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, simply because it would be more relevant to conduct consideration of the two bills in the same standing committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am advised by the table that the reference was changed by order of the House after the motion was put to the House by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). That was my understanding. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is rising, I gather, to confirm what I have said.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to confirm what Your Honour just said. The hon. member for Yukon must have been dozing when the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) proposed that the reference should be changed to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The Chair at that time said something like, "I suspect I should ask the House whether there is agreement to this." A few members said "Agreed" and it was so ordered.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the House would agree to call it ten o'clock. If it is agreeable, we will proceed with the "late show".

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the "late show" be replaced by an early show?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, those of us who are taking part agree, provided that the ministers or members who are to respond are present. I see nobody here from the Department of National Health and Welfare.

An hon. Member: Yes, somebody is coming.

Mr. Reid: May I ask Your Honour if we can proceed with the second and third questions which are scheduled to be called? We could take the first question when the minister has the opportunity to come down.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

Adjournment Debate

TRANSPORT—SHORTAGE OF RAILWAY CARS TO MOVE GRAIN AND LUMBER—RETURN OF CANADIAN CARS FROM UNITED STATES—REPAIR OF ROLLING STOCK

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on the day when we were asking questions in this House relating to the severe and critical problems affecting transportation in Canada, I directed a number of questions to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), to which I feel I was given inadequate answers. I therefore hope that tonight the parliamentary secretary will answer some of the questions relating to problems in the movement of grain in the prairie regions.

According to the president of the National Farmers Union, we stand to lose $603 million by the end of the current crop year. According to my own figuring, we stand to lose in the neighbourhood of half a billion dollars. Regardless of which figure we take, in the one year when prices for our commodities are highest on the international market we stand to lose most because of difficulties with our transportation system.

Part of our difficulty stems from the fact that as of February 22 this year there were 15,500 Canadian railway boxcars in the United States and 8,000 American boxcars in Canada. That is, there were twice as many Canadian boxcars in the United States as American boxcars in Canada. That being so, I asked the minister if he could advise the House what action would be taken to bring back those cars so they might be used for moving our commodities. Secondly, I asked the minister if the government was paying $3.43 million toward half the cost of repairing 2,400 boxcars used by the railways to move grain.

The fact was that as of February 22, 7,400 boxcars of our railway system needed to be repaired. The question I asked the minister, which was not answered, was what commitment had the railways in this country made to fix and repair the other 5,000 boxcars because at this point in time we are at least 11,000 cars short of requirements for moving our product to the international market? For example, consider what has happened at the port of Prince Rupert, where only 320 cars were unloaded this February, compared with 1,660 cars unloaded in February of last year.

The minister spoke of establishing a boxcar monitor, or a monitoring agent. He did not speak of a boxcar allocator, as proposed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and myself. Apparently he will know where in the country the boxcars are. That, of course, is a typically Liberal position. He will know where they are, but will not do anything to put them where they should be. I want the parliamentary secretary to tell us what powers will be given to this monitor or monitoring agent to make sure that these cars are in position to move our commodities.

The questions I directed to the minister about the difficult situation we face were as follows: First, what is being done to get back into our transportation system the Canadian box-cars presently being used in the United States? Second, what commitment have the railways made to repair and put in service the other 5,000 cars which need to be repaired? Third, what power will the so-called monitoring agent be given to force the railways to use these cars as he sees fit for the movement of our products? Apparently his monitoring will tell him where the boxcars are. Mr. Speaker, that is not one bit different from what CN and CP have been doing all along. They know the location of the cars. They monitor that. However, they do not do anything about ensuring they are moving basic commodities to the international market. If there is going to be any monitoring, it has to be through an agent who has power to allocate.

• (2140)

Being a westerner, and having relatives in my area, I know the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) will want to move their grain. I look forward with interest to his response.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the number of Canadian railcars in the United States is always of great concern to both the railways and the federal government. However, the particular number of cars in the U.S. per se is not of real significance. What is of more concern is the speed at which these cars are returned to Canada once unloaded. Obviously, the greater the number of cars going to the U.S., the better our trade position with that country. We are not in disagreement with the figures the hon. member has stated. We would like, however, to offer a few words of explanation.

Canadian cars have a longer haul in the U.S. than U.S. cars have in Canada. This is due to the type of products hauled and the geography of the country. We tend to ship raw materials to points deep in the United States. The U.S. ship manufactured goods to the population centres along the border. In addition, the numbers of cars in the U.S. tends to increase according to the various business cycles. For instance, there was in February a marked demand for lumber in the U.S. The number of Canadian cars in the U.S. increased as a result, and this continued until some of these cars started to come back. During the past week the number of cars in the United States has decreased. This reflects the lumber cars now returning.

It should also be pointed out that 1974 is no worse than 1973 with respect to Canadian cars in the U.S. We are taking action, nonetheless. The railways have since January taken measures to expedite the return of cars to Canada. They have, for instance, requested an order from the American Association of Railways to ensure that United States railways return Canadian cars as rapidly as possible. There is a possible penalty if U.S. railways are found in fault.

I am sure the hon. member is not listening to the answer he has requested, but he can read it in Hansard tomorrow. In addition, the Canadian railways have very recently written to the presidents of major United States railways to request their co-operation in returning cars to Canada. This has had a significant impact on the reduction of Canadian cars in the U.S.

With regard to the hon. member's last question pertaining to repairs, this is being done at the present time through the co-operation of Canadian National Railways.

TRANSPORT—RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES—PROVISION OF INFORMATION TO WESTERN PREMIERS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question was put to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) on March 1, 1974. It had to do with the failure of the minister to honour the commitment he made to the western premiers in July, 1973, almost nine months ago, with regard to their complaints about inequities those provinces suffer at the hands of the railways. The Minister of Transport promised that the four western provinces would be supplied with information on the cost of shipping freight so they could prove their case that they were being discriminated against. That promise has not yet been kept despite the months which have gone by. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the minister promised they would force the railways to supply the provinces with the information they require.

What are the provinces complaining about? Let me give a few illustrations of the kind of discrimination they face. They feel that industrial development in the west has been inhibited by a freight rate structure which fails to recognize the federal government's expressed policy of regional economic structure. They say that the rate structure encourages the export of raw materials from western Canada and the import of manufactured goods to the detriment of western industrial development. They give illustrations. They point out that the statutory grain rates encourage producers to ship their grain from western Canada to the east where the grain is processed and then shipped back to the west. Because of the special rates for shipping raw materials, in this case grain, flour mills have been built and are operating in eastern Canada although the grain is grown in western Canada.

An example of the kind of discrimination they see every day is found in shipments from Winnipeg to Lynn Lake and Thompson, Manitoba. The distances are about the same, yet the cost of shipping petroleum to Lynn Lake is 30 per cent more than to Thompson. Why? Because there is no road into Lynn Lake and, therefore, no competition. The cost of shipping steel from Calgary to Hamilton is more than the cost of shipping steel from Hamilton to Vancouver. I presume that is because it is at least theoretically possible to ship the steel by boat through the Panama Canal. This is the kind of thing that has been going on for almost 100 years.

The premiers met in July, 1973. They made their case at the western economic opportunities conference. They were promised by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport that they would see the railways supplied the necessary information to the four western provinces. On December 15, 1973, the Globe and Mail reported the Minister of Transport as saying the railways had until December 21 to comply with his request that they supply the western provinces with the necessary information. The minister said that if they would not comply, he would bring in legislation to force that disclosure.

The four western premiers met again about two weeks ago, February 28, 1974. They issued a statement in which they said:

> Despite the public commitment by the Prime Minister that railway costs would be disclosed to the provinces, some seven months have passed without any substantive response by the Canadian Transport Commission (CTC) to the specific requests made by the federal Minister of Transport and the four western provinces . . .
>
> The reply of the CTC to the federal government's request for evaluation of 22 specific freight rate anomalies affecting the west has been recognized by transport ministers as incomplete and not responsive to the basic economic questions raised by the federal Minister of Transport.

● (2150)

They point out that the delay in achieving a reasonable solution to the rapeseed freight rate case, which has been before the CTC for nearly four years, is intolerable. The Minister of Transport received tremendous coverage a few weeks ago when he regretted the absence of a government transport policy. It is not surprising that the minister, who is supposedly responsible, could not get the railways to disclose the information the Prime Minister promised to the premiers. I suggest he should not delay bringing forward legislation which would require the railways to bring forth the information promised to the western premiers, and I urge the parliamentary secretary to take that message to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow): The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) has been quite frank with the House in outlining the difficulties facing the department. I think he is doing a tremendous job and that he enjoys the confidence not only of this House but of the people of Canada.

First, may I say we are referring here to railway costs, not to railway rates. Railway rates are freely available at all times from the railways or from the CTC.

Mr. Orlikow: I am talking about costs.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am talking about costs, too. If the hon. member did not hear me, I will repeat what I said. We are referring here to costs, not to rates. Railway rates are available at any time. Railway costs for specific movements, on the other hand, were always treated as confidential until the western economic opportunities conference and are protected by the Railway Act. At the western economic opportunities conference, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised that the federal government would arrange for a confidential government-to-government exchange of railway costs. The provinces submitted to the minister early in October a test case consisting of six specific movements in respect of which they wished to ascertain costs. In reply, the CTC advised that such direct disclosure appeared not to be feasible because of legal requirements, and proposed in its place a cost committee the success of whose efforts would rest on voluntary disclosure by the companies.

On December 12, the minister wired the railway chairman asking them to state formally their positions on cost disclosure. Canadian National suggested that guidelines should be established with respect to the method, form and control of cost disclosure, such guidelines to be formulated by the CTC. The CTC established a special panel on cost disclosure, chaired by Mr. Benson. This panel set up a technical committee of CTC, ministry of transport, provincial and railway representatives. The panel and technical committee are to review requests for cost data and see that data is prepared in a form which the minister can convey to the provincial governments.

All the western provinces as well as the railways have agreed to the proposal and a meeting of the technical committee will take place in the next week or so. On March 1, the railways transmitted to the CTC actual cost data on the six specific movements mentioned in the minister's October letter to the CTC.

Although matters have not proceeded as quickly as the provinces would probably have liked, general progress has been made, and once the technical committee is functioning cost data can begin to flow. In the unfortunate event that this process breaks down—and we have no reason to believe it will—both the Minister of Transport and the Prime Minister are on record to the effect that they would resort to legislation to enforce disclosure if that were necessary.

SOCIAL SECURITY—OLD AGE SECURITY AND CANADA PENSION PLAN PAYMENTS—POSSIBILITY OF REDUCTION OF AGE OF ELIGIBILITY TO 60

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, unless something is done about it, I predict that when the next election comes, whether it is late or soon—

Mr. Orlikow: Soon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —one of the questions all parties will have to face is this: What did you do in the twenty-ninth parliament about pensions at age 60? This is the reason I am raising this issue on every possible occasion. This is the reason for the question I put to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) on Friday, March 8, as recorded in Hansard at page 313. These were the words of my question:

> In view of the deep concern and need of many Canadians between the ages of 60 and 65 and in view of the wide support in Canada for the proposition that pensions should be available at age 60, may I ask the minister whether the government is giving consideration to proposing amendments to the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to establish pensions at age 60 on a voluntary basis?

The next entry in Hansard reads as follows:

> Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I should like to assure the hon. member that there are many people below age 60 who are also in need of support. The policy of the government is to provide income supplementation and some form of guaranteed income to all people in need in this country without regard to age. Therefore, I do not plan to introduce a piecemeal amendment of the type the hon. member is proposing.

A further question and answer followed, saying much the same as was said in the first exchange. I should like to suggest to the minister that whenever any government is telling us the things it has done, it itemizes them piece by piece. That is the way most legislation in the social field as well as in other fields has grown in this country. It has been built piece by piece, stone by stone, as it were, so I am not fazed by the minister's statement that he does not want to do things on a piecemeal basis. That is what the Liberal Party has been doing in the field of social welfare since 1919.

The suggestion that there are other groups in need is one I confirm and endorse wholeheartedly. I welcome the steps the minister is taking in concert with his counterparts in the provinces to bring in something along the lines of a guaranteed income, something along the lines of providing supplementation for those who are at work but whose incomes are not sufficient to enable them to maintain a decent standard of living. But surely the minister is one Liberal in this House, even if he is the only one here tonight, who would agree that it is not good enough to talk about the needs of other groups, and then say we ought not to deal with the needs of one particular group.

[Mr. Guay (St. Boniface).]

He will have my full support in the other efforts he is making. At the same time, I urge him to give careful consideration to making pensions available at age 60, not on the same basis as old age security in the sense that everyone gets it, and now available at age 65, but certainly to all those we are out of the labour market or who are prepared to leave the labour market. I think the same should be done with respect to the Canada Pension Plan, and I see this change in these two pieces of legislation as one of the most important requirements in the field of social reform.

One of the reasons this is a matter of such concern and is so popular in this country is this: the pace of economic life has changed a great deal and there are a great many people over 50, or between 55 and 60, who find the economic rat race a little too much for them and feel they have the right to retire. There is also the problem in the many instances where one spouse is over 65 and the other is under that age. The solution to this, sometimes proposed, is that when one spouse gets the pension, no matter what the age of the other, the other should get it as well. I think that creates a problem. When one talks about a spouse under 65, then what about single persons under age 65, and so on? That problem would be largely solved in the average case of one spouse being three or four years older than the other if the person out of the labour market at age 60 could qualify for the pension.

So I put it to the minister again tonight, and I know from the answers he has made on previous occasions and from some of the comments he made today to the Canadian Labour Congress that he is ready to come up with arguments and reasons why we cannot do it. I suppose the real reason is that the Treasury Board does not agree at this time, that the Treasury Board feels the government did enough in this field during the last session. In any event, I appeal to the heart of the minister, which I believe is in the right place, and to his mind which I believe is aware of the political situation, particularly when I say to him that he should get moving, and especially that he should get the govermment moving on this urgent matter of pensions at age 60.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I always appreciate the remarks and the comments of the hon. member who is so well known across the country for his concern about senior citizens and pensions problems. I should first of all like to point out that it is not merely the Treasury Board that says we must be careful about public expenditures in this area, but also the Economic Council of Canada on which his friends and colleagues from the Canadian Labour Congress sit. Labour is well represented on this Economic Council. The six labour members on that council did sign that report. It says that we must proceed over the next few years on the basis that increases in transfer payments should not exceed 11 per cent per year.

During the next election campaign, whenever it might be, I would, quite frankly, be sorry if a debate should take place on what has been done about pensions at age 60. I should hope that members of all parties would rather debate before the Canadian people what has been done for people in need in this country of all ages and in all categories.

This is a point I have been trying to impress upon various groups across this country and upon my colleagues in this House. The hon. member referred to people age 55 who feel not enough has been done for them and that they should be entitled to retire from the work force. I suggest that dropping pensions to age 60 will not answer the problems of those people. The hon. member refers to the spouse under age 65, but then we will have to consider the spouse under 60 and what we should do for her.

Let me repeat that what we must try to do is approach this question on a broader basis through income supplementation and guaranteed income, and in that way we can solve the problems of those age 60 and 65. Whether this is done through guaranteed income, through OAS-GIS payments or in other ways is, I submit, rather irrelevant to those people provided they get what is a fair deal in terms of guaranteed income or income supplementation. I think the suggestion that we should limit our attention to the idea of making pensions eligible to those at age 60, as if this were a panacea, will only create trouble and once more will represent a piecemeal approach.

AIR TRANSPORT

AIRCRAFT HIJACKING—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Having regard to the fact that the frequency of aircraft hijackings perpetrated by the use of violence has increased dramatically over the last few months, resulting in an alarming danger to human lives and loss of property, compounded by the fact that the apprehension of the person or persons responsible for aircraft hijackings invariably leads to another hijacking for the purpose of freeing such persons, such facts having the result that the various courts of the jurisdictions where the hijackings occur have been unable to deal effectively with the persons responsible for such hijackings, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds):

That this House recommend that our government take the initiative in sponsoring a resolution in the United Nations that would provide for the establishment of a tribunal under that organization which would have exclusive jurisdiction to obtain custody of, try and sentence all persons apprehended as the result of an airline hijacking.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

RAILWAY SAFETY STANDARDS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the tragic deaths of two more men last weekend as the result of a rail accident in the Fraser Canyon, and in view of the fact that the case against both national railways, in their criminal failure to meet adequate safety and track maintenance standards, is well documented and studied but action is long overdue, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House calls upon the government to implement immediately the recommendations contained in the third report of the rail safety inquiry of the Canadian Transport Commission.

Mr. Speaker: This motion proposed for the consideration of the House under Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

SPORTS

TRAINING FOR OLYMPIC GAMES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgency in that the United States, Russia and other countries already have such a program fully operational. I move:

That this House request the Minister of National Defence to give immediate consideration to redirecting the armed forces recruiting program to encourage young athletes to join the armed forces for full-time training for the Olympics to be held in Canada in 1976.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

CONSTRUCTION—INCREASING COST OF MATERIALS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to put a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43.

In view of the rapid price escalation in the construction industry, the price of materials often rising over 15 per cent in the period between a tender being submitted and work being started, and in view of the Prime Minister's assurance that the government is attempting to stabilize prices in individual industries, I ask leave of the House to move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche):

● (1410)

That the government be urged to give priority to taking measures to stabilize prices in the construction industry.

Mr. Speaker: Again, this motion is proposed to the House under the terms of Standing Order 43. The Chair will inquire whether there is unanimous consent so that the motion can be put and debated this afternoon. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put, considered and debated this afternoon.

AGRICULTURE

SUBSIDY TO BEEF PRODUCERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of utmost urgency arising from the confusion now existing across Canada in our cattle marketing. This confusion has been brought about as a result of the government bungling the subsidy program to date.

An hon. Member: You are part of the government.

Mr. Nesdoly: Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight):

That this House calls on the government of Canada to pay a subsidy directly to producers of cattle marketed for slaughter purposes and grading A or B, and that the government should give serious consideration to setting a floor price on beef related to the cost of production.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT TO WIDEN CATEGORY OF PERSONS ENTITLED TO LOANS

On the order: Introduction of Bills:

March 14, 1974—Mr. Reynolds—Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Student Loans Act."

[Mr. Stackhouse.]

Mr. Speaker: I indicated to the hon. member yesterday that the Chair had some reservation about the procedural aspect of the bill. The hon. member indicated also that at some propitious moment he might give his views on the procedural question of whether the bill should be put to the House. I gather that the hon. member is prepared to submit argument now for consideration by the Chair in due course.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, the idea of this bill is to allow people who are now legitimately unable to attend school on a full-time basis to attend part time. In no way did I mean that the government should spend more money. Certainly they spend enough now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reynolds: The bill does not say anything about spending money. The bill clearly wants the government to allow people to apply for student loans if they wish to go to school part time. The government could leave its budget at the same amount as it is now but allow these people to apply to participate in the program.

Mr. Speaker: The argument of the hon. member is interesting and perhaps somewhat imaginative. I want to be fair to him. Perhaps I might look at the matter further. When there is the slightest doubt the Chair should give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt so that the bill can at least be put on the order paper. Before making a decision I might have a second look at the matter in light of the argument submitted by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

AGRICULTURE

SUBSIDY TO BEEF PRODUCERS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the confusion now existing across Canada in livestock and cattle markets as a result of the subsidy program for beef cattle announced by the government, which has created a situation of extreme uncertainty for cattle producers and makes it urgent that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) outline in detail to the House the method of payment of the subsidy to the producer so that the effect of this program on the consumer and the producer can be fully discussed and reviewed by this parliament.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has given the required notice and I have had an opportunity to give serious consideration to the hon. member's proposal that the business scheduled for today be set aside for the purpose of considering the subject matter of his proposed motion.

As hon. members know, there appears on today's order paper notice of a motion in the name of the hon. member for Champlain which would come up for consideration this afternoon under the terms of Standing Order 58. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar is proposing that his own motion be given priority over the supply proceedings proposed under Standing Order 58. The Chair has serious reservations about this suggested course of action.

I would be very reluctant, except perhaps in the most extreme circumstances and when there is no early opportunity for debate, to agree that an emergency debate under Standing Order 26 take precedence over a motion proposed for consideration under Standing Order 58. In this instance, the Chair must take into account that not only this day but also Thursday and Friday of this week and Monday and Tuesday of next week have been designated as supply days. In the circumstances, I must conclude that the motion of which the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has given notice should not be put at this time.

SUBSIDY TO BEEF PRODUCERS—EFFECT ON MARKETS AND PRICES

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the continued chaos and confusion in cattle markets all across Canada as a result of the seven cent subsidy announcement last Friday, and in view of a $4 to $5 drop in market prices since this announcement, leading to a loss in inventory value of an estimated half a billion dollars to Canada's 13 million head cattle industry, in spite of the minister's operational procedures issued last night, will the minister now indicate what steps the government intends to pursue to restore some confidence and stability to the Canadian cattle industry?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it may be coincidental but there is a downward trend in the United States cattle market and that has affected the cattle market here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: To say that this is not the proper time to put this program into force or to say whether it is really going to work—it is much too early to say it has caused all this confusion that some members are trying to indicate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: Come on! As far as I am concerned, they are the ones who are adding confusion by some of the statements they are making.

● (1420)

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the uncertainty that still exists in cattle markets, especially the Toronto market, in spite of the instructions in point No. 2 of his special procedural announcement last night, is the minister aware that on this morning's market in Toronto the procedure being followed does not include the seven cent subsidy in the bid or market price established by the trade?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that, while there are a few nonconformists in the Toronto market, the majority of the major buyers are purchasing on bid prices plus the seven cents. Bidding is continuing as normal but accountants add seven cents per pound to the producer.

SUBSIDY TO BEEF PRODUCERS—REIMBURSEMENT OF PROCESSORS FOR AMOUNTS PAID

Mr. Dan Hollands (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. As the regulations released yesterday regarding the beef subsidy say nothing of when the processor will be reimbursed out of the fund for payments made, will the minister inform the House and the country when he is going to make an announcement?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the processor knows very well that he will be reimbursed for the amount he pays to the producer. He will have to prove that he actually paid that amount to the producer. Our accountants will be checking his books. They will be checking vouchers with the people who sold the cattle. There will be no way that they can be compensated by the government without proving definitely that they paid the producer that amount for the product, which would include the government premium.

Mr. Hollands: Who is going to pay the interest on this amount of money? Will the processors be reimbursed before six months have passed?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, these payments will be made within one week from the time of delivery. They are going to be made that quickly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

SUBSIDY TO BEEF PRODUCERS—REQUEST FOR DIRECT PRICE SUPPORT PROGRAM—DURATION OF SUBSIDY

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the minister. As the declines in the market that have taken place since the minister's announcement last week have wiped out over half the seven cent subsidy per pound which the minister offered producers, is the minister prepared to look at a direct price support program which will assure to the producer the money which the taxpayer of Canada is going to put up under the program the minister is advocating?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday that we are watching this very closely and if this program is not doing what we want it to do we will have to change it.

Mr. Gleave: As we run a real risk of heavy runs on the market because of the very program the minister is putting into effect, which will further depress prices, will the minister include some dates in this program and at least tell farmers that it will continue into June or July so that there will not be an emptying of feedlots and, following that, a real rise in prices?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we stated when we announced this program that it will be continued until the whole beef market levels out to where we think it should be in order to give the producer a proper amount for the beef he is placing on the market. We intend to continue the program or a program that will do just that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Chair shall see the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar and the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley on supplementaries and then try to go to the next subject.

Mr. Gleave: Since price is the key to this program and the price to the producer is surely the key to the government's objective, will the minister tell us what price objective he is aiming for? What is the level of the price objective he mentioned a moment ago?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I thought I made it fairly clear when we talked about what the return ought to be to the producer. We realize that prices so far today are not giving enough return to the producer to keep him in business. That is why we are as concerned as he and all other members. If there happens to be some kind of collusion between the packing firms that are buying the cattle, I can certainly ask my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: —to have their purchasing practices investigate under the Combines Investigation Act. As far as I am concerned, it is much too early in the program even to suggest I do that at this time, unless hon. members have advice otherwise.

Mr. Speaker: In addition to the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley, there are others seeking supplementaries, including the hon. member for Wellington and the hon. member for Middlesex. Perhaps we might allow the hon. member for Richmond to ask his question and then return to the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley.

BEEF SUBSIDY—APPLICATION OF PROGRAM

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. Can he advise the House which of the A-1 and A-2 cattle categories, once the program concerning A-3 and A-4 cattle is terminated, will benefit from the seven cent subsidy?

[Mr. Gleave.]

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, all cattle used for human consumption in Canada are inspected. There should be no difficulty in determining the grades of cattle being sold in Canada for human consumption.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: The minister got my question all wrong, Mr. Speaker.

I am talking about cattle sold at public auctions where nobody knows where they come from and who the producers are. When the program concerning A-3 and A-4 cattle is terminated, can he say which of the A-1 and A-2 cattle categories will benefit from the subsidy?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the market shows the real value of cattle. It has always showed the real value. Any person trying to sell is certainly aware of what that market is that day. That is the way cattle have been sold. We do not intend to change that unless something drastic happens in the market that is different from what has been shown in past operations.

AMOUNT OF SUBSIDY TO BEEF PRODUCERS

Mr. Norval Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Minister of Agriculture. Perhaps he can clear up some of the confusion he has created. There is no confusion in the minds of the packers. They are buying meat at five cents less than before the minister made the announcement. In his statement released yesterday the minister said that the subsidy on cattle retroactive to March 4 would be seven cents. On a radio program one hour ago someone from his department said it would not be done by grade but that they would average it at five cents. Perhaps the minister can clear that up. Will it be five cents average on all cattle sold or seven cents on A-1 and A-2?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the whole idea of making it retroactive to March 4 is to compensate those people who delivered Canadian cattle when they were able to put them on the market. The over-all compensation will be seven cents for A-1 and A-2. Compensation will be paid on A-3 and A-4, and on all cattle it will average out to about five cents a pound.

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO TURKEY PRODUCERS

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): I wish to direct a supplementary to the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the fact that when Bill C-176 concerning farm product marketing came before us, hon. members of the opposition and the leaders of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association opposed any federal government intervention into the marketing—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly ask his question?

[English]

I will then recognize the hon. member for Wellington. Hon. members will appreciate that after all these minutes we are still on the first subject, the very first question. After the hon. member for Wellington I will see the hon. member for York South on the second question.

[Translation]

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, because the Canadian Cattlemen's Association was opposed to government intervention in the marketing of beef, and considering increased costs to turkeys producers as a result of the higher cost of grains in the Prairies, might the Minister of Agriculture consider the possibility of intervening with turkey producers with a view to bringing prices back in line with production costs?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the turkey producers of Canada are organized under a national marketing agency and it is much easier to assist them through an organization of that type. We have met with them and we are discussing the request they have made. To be really honest, this is one of the problems we are running into in the beef program. There is no real organization, so beef is marketed in every way one can imagine.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me we have strayed from beef to turkeys. We might get back to beef for a last supplementary, after which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South.

SUBSIDY TO BEEF PRODUCERS—CHECKING BY AUDITORS TO PREVENT IMPROPER PAYMENTS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the extreme difficulty of administering the beef subsidy and in view of the fact that speculators could conceivably get two subsidy payments, has the minister alerted the audit services and Auditor General to be on the lookout for the discrepancies that are bound to occur?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): We are well aware that what the hon. member has suggested could possibly happen. If we can devise regulations to cover such situations we shall do so, though we think such cases are not likely to be frequent. We are aware of what might happen. I am sure the same person called me as called the hon. member to point this out.

HOUSING

HALIFAX—CENTENNIAL PROPERTIES APARTMENT PROJECT—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION—AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS TO CO-OPERATIVE INSTEAD

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question on another subject for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs arising out of a proposal by Centennial Properties Limited in Halifax to build apartment housing known as the Quinpool Road project. Even though this question refers to a specific project in a particular city, it has general national application. In view of the fact that the rental price to be charged is about $340 a month on the average, and in view of the fact that this particular corporation was severely criticized in the Charney report in connection with its previous work, may I ask the minister whether he has looked into the matter? I did give his office notice about this question yesterday. May I also ask him whether Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will give the necessary loan guarantees which this not very desirable firm is seeking?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I appreciate the hon. member having given me notice of the question. Apparently the project has been given a building permit by the city of Halifax and the issuance thereof has been supported by the province of British Columbia.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: That just shows that British Columbia is constantly on my mind.

The information in the possession of CMHC with regard to the application made to it is in such a preliminary form at the moment that the corporation is not able to form any view about a recommendation to me on the matter, but I will give the hon. member further information when it is available from our Halifax office.

Mr. Lewis: I would be very happy if it were only British Columbia which was on the minister's mind. I sometimes think it is the Rocky Mountains, which would be much more serious. In view of the fact that considerable objection to this project has been raised by citizens and that some people are trying to create a co-operative housing organization for the purpose of building the same number of dwelling units as is proposed by Centennial Properties Limited, may I ask the minister whether he will look into this application seriously and inquire into this attempt by citizens to form a co-operative housing association for this purpose? I make this request particularly in view of the hon. gentleman's statement to the Canadian Labour Congress about his desire to see co-operative development—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please!

Mr. Basford: I do not see the two applications as being competing applications at all. If there is a group in Halifax—I must admit I have not yet heard of it—wishing to organize a co-operative housing group, it will have the full benefit of the National Housing Act and of the budget that supports the co-operative housing program. We are anxious to approve all applications, not just some of them.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South but I seek the co-operation of hon. members in limiting the number of supplementaries so that we may move on a little faster between now and the end of the question period.

Mr. Lewis: I do want to put this supplementary to the minister. It arises out of information I have that the co-operative organization being formed is seeking to build on precisely the same terrain as Centennial Properties Limited. In view of this, may I ask the minister whether he will assist the co-operative instead of this not very reputable corporation?

Mr. Basford: I will obtain further information on the matter. I have no information regarding the co-operative group. The group which the hon. member suggests should not receive any money would receive a normal mortgage and would not receive any particular grant or subsidy. I will examine the co-operative application to see whether they should get an application of subsidy or grant.

MANPOWER

STUDENT JOB PROGRAM FOR AGRICULTURE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, but in view of his absence I shall address it to his parliamentary secretary.

Seeing there is a shortage of qualified agricultural labour, which problem is of great concern to the farmers, can the minister or his secretary tell the House whether the details of the student employment program have been finalized and whether application forms will soon be available at the manpower centres?

[English]

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): This program is in the process of being fully developed.

GRAIN

POSSIBILITY OF FARMERS HAULING WHEAT BY TRUCK TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Is the Wheat Board considering giving farmers the right to haul wheat by truck to the United States, particularly to the Minneapolis market, to take advantage of current high prices since it now seems certain that large amounts of wheat will not be delivered this year due to transportation difficulties?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): In the ordinary course the Canadian Wheat Board itself would take advantage of any export opportunities and would share those opportunities among producers through the quota system.

FINANCE

STATEMENT OF MINISTER CONCERNING LEVEL OF CORPORATE PROFITS AND NECESSITY TO PASS ON COST INCREASES

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance based on a recent statement by the minister indicating that he felt corporate profits in certain industries had reached a point at which they were so healthy that it was not necessary for business to pass on to the consumer every increase in costs. Would the minister indicate the studies upon which this claim was based, and tell us what particular industries he had in mind?

● (1440)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I reached that conclusion just from a review of the general profit picture which is available to every hon. member of this House through the statistics that are published regularly.

Mr. Stackhouse: In view of the difficulties that firms in the construction industry are having regarding the escalation of costs between the time of tendering and the time of fulfilling contracts, would the minister indicate whether the construction industry is an industry in which he thinks the profits are so healthy that businesses can absorb increases in costs?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter of judgment upon which we may or may not act.

FISHERIES

SEALS—ALLEGED LANDING OF HELICOPTERS CARRYING AMERICAN TOURISTS IN MIDDLE OF HERDS—REQUEST FOR RESCINDING OF REGULATIONS GOVERNING HUNT

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. Is the minister aware of the fact that helicopters carrying American tourists are landing in the middle of seal herds, thereby causing panic among the herds and danger to the landsmen hunting the seals? If not, would he ask his colleague the Solicitor General to direct the RCMP to investigate this matter and to take the necessary action, since this contravenes a section of the Fisheries Act?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, allegations to that effect have been made and we are making investigations.

Mr. Carter: In view of the fact that the regulations imposed on the seal fishery by the minister were passed largely on the recommendation made to him and the government by one Brian Davies, the person now responsible for breaking the law, and in view of the fact the regulations have had a very serious effect on the economy in certain parts of eastern Canada, would the minister now undertake to have these regulations rescinded, thereby restoring the sealing industry to eastern Canada?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the regulations have been developed over a period of years by very competent people, not including Brian Davies. Brian Davies has been warned. He was warned before that helicopters cannot land within half a mile of a herd. If in fact his helicopters have been landing within half a mile, appropriate action will be taken.

SHARING BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT OF COST OF SPRAYING NEW BRUNSWICK FORESTS

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Is the government going to continue to share with the province of New Brunswick the cost of spraying New Brunswick's forests to control and eradicate insects, particularly the spruce budworm, during the spring and summer of 1974?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker, but only under a limited budget.

STATISTICS CANADA

SUPPLYING OF MAILING LISTS FOR COMMERCIAL PURPOSES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the matter of the confidentiality of income tax mailing lists which I raised in the House yesterday. Again my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact Statistics Canada has now announced that it has discontinued the sale of these lists, even though we have evidence that the lists are still being used, and as the minister responsible for the policies of Statistics Canada implied yesterday that he is not in favour of these lists being used for this purpose, my question is twofold: first, when is the government going to change the legislation and, second, what is the minister doing to stop immediately these lists continuing to be used for this purpose?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we may introduce some amendments to the Statistics Act during the course of this session. As for the second question, I do not think there is any action that I can take, even if I wanted to take action, to prevent those who have purchased these lists quite legally and in good faith from Statistics Canada using them for commercial business purposes.

TRANSPORT

ACTION TO IMPLEMENT TRANSPORT COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS FOR PREVENTION OF RAILWAY ACCIDENTS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In light of last weekend's tragic rail deaths in British Columbia, and in light of the report issued in January by the Canadian Transport Commission criticizing CNR and CPR rail safety practices which have resulted in tripling the number of derailments between 1959 and 1972 and calling upon the government to institute rail safety measures, can the minister inform the House what action he intends to take to implement the CTC recommendations and prevent the increase in rail accidents which is predicted by the commission in the absence of government action?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I very much regret this accident. As hon. members know, there was a derailment at Spences Bridge, if my memory serves me well, and two men were killed. Although this was a place where there had not been slides before, it happened that time. We are trying to take care of this situation and we are now pursuing studies with the CTC in order to improve the record.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Fraser Valley West on a supplementary, followed by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Rose: Since the report accurately predicted deaths would occur unless safety improved, can the minister inform the House whether he has established a deadline for completion of his department's study of this report, and when will he announce to the House the measures that his department will take to implement the CTC's recommendations?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated to the House, and I believe somebody also suggested this previously, that I should like to go a little further and have someone not involved in the Department of Transport empowered to inquire into this kind of accident so we can ensure that all precautions are taken. I cannot establish a time limit, but we are trying to do this as fast as we can.

OIL EXPORT TAX—COMMUNICATION TO PROVINCES OF LEGAL OPINION THAT THEIR SHARE NOT SUBJECT TO EQUALIZATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who stated in the House yesterday that he has received a legal opinion that the provincial share of receipts from the oil export tax are not subject to equalization. May I ask the minister whether he has communicated this legal opinion and the position of the federal government to the provinces, and whether any province has disputed that position?

Oral Questions

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, during the meeting that I had with the provincial treasurers and ministers of finance I took the position that there was no equalization payable as a result of division of the export tax. I have not communicated that opinion to my colleagues at the provincial level. That opinion, as other legal opinions, I take to be privileged to the federal government.

Mr. Stanfield: Has the minister communicated on behalf of the government of Canada in a formal way, or at least in a definite way, to the provinces that the provincial share of receipts from the oil export tax will not be subject to equalization as far as the federal government is concerned?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I took the position that under the present law and regulations it was not so chargeable.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for taking the time of the House, but may I ask the minister whether he has communicated this to the provinces, and has he received any protest from any provinces?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it was the subject of virtually one day's discussion at the ministerial level by the ministers of finance at the end of January, and some of the provinces, of course, were not particularly entranced with my stand.

INDUSTRY

GENERAL INSTRUMENT CORP., SYDNEY, N.S.—REDUCTION IN WORK FORCE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO FIND EMPLOYMENT FOR WORKERS AFFECTED

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and is related to the question I posed to him on Wednesday with reference to the reduction in the work force of approximately 1,000 employees at General Instrument Corporation of Sydney by some 300 employees. Since that time there has been another lay-off of 80 employees. The minister said that he would have his officials contact the principals of this corporation to ascertain what might be done. Is the minister in a position to give a further report to the House?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report that my officials have been in contact with the company, but I am not in a position to state further what particular measures might be taken.

Mr. Muir: May I ask the minister whether, during the discussions with the superiors or great leaders of this company, he would ascertain if the reason for their moving out of Sydney due to lack of demand for automobile radio tuners is a legitimate one, or is the reason because they want to go to countries like Mexico, Portugal or Taiwan where they pay starvation wages? Would the minister assure us that he will bring a report back?

● (1450)

Mr. Gillespie: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to go into that further. I might say at this time the advice I have received is that the reason for the lay-offs is the reduction in sales of automobiles in the United States. That has been the primary reason for the shortfall in sales this year.

EFFECT OF REMOVAL OF SALES TAX ON CHOCOLATE BARS IN LAST BUDGET IN LIGHT OF PRICE INCREASE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Can the minister tell the House if the purpose of his most recent budget of 13 months ago, which removed the sales tax on near-food products such as chocolate bars, is succeeding in benefiting Canadians both in the form of lower prices and more value for their money in light of the fact that the largest confectionery manufacturer in Canada will increase the price of chocolate bars and it is anticipated that related manufacturers will also follow this action?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a survey taken by a monitoring system for my colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs showed that in the period of five or six months after the sales tax was taken off those commodities there was a beneficial result. It may well have retarded an increase in price. Any increase in price may have reflected an increase in cost. As a matter of fact, it might well have kept the size of chocolate bars the way it is.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also to the Minister of Finance. The budget speech said that the price would be lower. It is now higher. Has the minister any additional steps in mind in respect of action to prevent consumers having to face yet another price increase?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Eldon M. Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the board has not yet given approval for the pipeline.

Mr. Woolliams: Is the application before the board and has the government ensured that the pipeline will be built so that we will have a security of supply and not have the panic we had this winter?

QUEBEC—DEVELOPMENT OF COMMERCIAL FISHING IN GASPÉ AND MAGDALEN ISLANDS

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Fisheries.

Can the minister tell the House whether he has received a letter from the Quebec Minister of Industry and Commerce informing him that the development of commercial fishing is compromised in the Gaspé peninsula and the Magdalen Islands as a result of cuts in the 1974-75 budget for building fishing harbours?

[English]

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have received such a letter. The budget has in fact been increased. I should like to remind the hon. member that fishing in Quebec is delegated to the province.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Gaspé wish to ask a supplementary?

Mr. Cyr: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Maybe the minister did not understand my question. He says that the fishing industry comes under the jurisdiction of Quebec, which is true, but building harbours for small boats comes under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

I therefore ask the minister whether he intends sending an encouraging reply to the province of Quebec and the fishermen saying that the commitments contained in the Canada-Quebec agreement will be met by the federal government?

RESULT OF COURT ACTION AGAINST PERSON DISCOUNTING GOVERNMENT CHEQUES—POSSIBLE AMENDMENT OF SMALL LOANS ACT

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Justice and relates to what has been referred to in the House as loan sharking operations, technically discounting of government cheques. About 18 months ago the government of Canada took one of these operators to court. Can the minister inform the House what has been the disposition of that case?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the case recently decided by the Alberta Court of Appeal in which this particular kind of operation was held not to be a loan within the definition of the act, that is the result. Of course, following that result the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who shares with me great concern in this matter, is looking at what steps we ought to take.

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance. I am not sure whether it should be directed to the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It relates to the Small Loans Act. Is the government contemplating amendments to the Small Loans Act which would bring within its ambit this kind of transaction which is essentially a lending operation?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is being examined.

CHARGE BY UNITED NATIONS SECRETARY GENERAL THAT CANADA ENGAGED IN BRAIN DRAIN OF DEVELOPING COUNTRIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. How does the government intend to respond to UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim's charge that Canada is among those developed nations engaged in a brain drain of developing countries by which we promote the migration of physicians, engineers and scientists from the countries most in need of these educated leaders?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would deny it.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would allow the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona to pursue his supplementary. We are almost at the end of the question period. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

Mr. Roche: Having in mind that this charge was carried in the New York Times Sunday edition, I should like to ask if the government intends to relax its now stringent regulations, recently announced, insisting that prospective immigrants have jobs before entering Canada, thereby tying immigration to manpower in precisely the way criticized by the UN Secretary General.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it quite clear I was not denying the fact that the statement had been made. I was denying the allegation.

ACTION TO GET UNITED STATES TO OBSERVE ICNAF FISHING REGULATIONS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the difficulties that have occurred between Canada and the United States over the implementation of the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fishery regulations, has the minister taken any steps to bring order out of the chaos that exists in fishing laws, especially as they apply between Canada and the United States and, if so, what action has he taken?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would deny there is any chaos in the relations between Canada and the United States in respect of fishing. My colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, has done an admirable job in protecting the interests of Canada and I expect he will continue to do so.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

ALLEGED USE IN COURTS OF DOCUMENTS HAVING NO LEGAL STATUS

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Based on the delay by the minister of law in providing me with an answer in that he has not told me anything, and I assume he knows nothing, I would ask the Prime Minister if he would investigate why the Cape Breton Development Corporation has used documents in the courts which have no legal status?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will investigate, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. member is bringing up any new allegation. I think he has talked about this as long as I have been around and I think the Minister of Justice and other ministers have replied to him. I will look into it to see if the allegation has any new facts to present.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister talk to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion when he returns to the House and ask the minister what is the legal status of the agreement signed by the federal and provincial governments on June 13, 1967? From there he will get his answer and he will know very well that Devco has been using documents that do not have legal status. Will he then refer this to the minister of law, not the Minister of Justice who does not know the meaning of the word?

EFFECT OF GARRISON DAM PROJECT ON MANITOBA—GOVERNMENT STUDIES—POSSIBLE REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of the Environment. Has the government done any environmental studies of the impact on Manitoba of the proposed Garrison dam project, and if the government has done independent studies on its own, will he at this time tell the House what is the outcome of these studies?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, some background work has been done. We are convinced that the effects will be unfavourable. More work is under way.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lisgar will be recognized for a supplementary. We have reached the end of the question period. Following the hon. member for Lisgar I will recognize the hon. member for York West and then the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I have just a short supplementary for the minister. If the federal government is convinced that the effects of the proposed dam which is being constructed at present will be unfavourable to Manitoba, has this fact been communicated to the United States and has the International Joint Commission been brought into this matter? Also, has the Manitoba government been informed because they seem to feel that the proposed project will not harm the province?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as you know, we can regulate the taxis at the airport very well but we cannot do so outside the area of the airport. The only solution to the problem is to have an understanding with the city of Toronto—and this is what we are working on now—so as to cover the whole field.

POSSIBLE RESTORATION OF INVESTMENT INCENTIVES IN ACT TO PROVIDE RENTAL HOUSING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the announcement last Friday that the British Columbia government has implemented rent control on residential property because of the shortage of rental units and the resulting increases in rents, will the minister consider, as a means of increasing the supply of rental units, restoring the incentives to investors in rental housing which were formerly provided in the Income Tax Act?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is a subject worth considering, and I suppose also that within the jurisdiction of the province of British Columbia more emphasis could be put on incentives to the private sector as well.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. The hon. member for Middlesex rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Frank: Mr. Speaker, I hate to delay the House with this point of privilege and I hope it is a point of privilege, but I take very strong exception to the Minister of Agriculture blaming the opposition for the confusion that exists in the cattle industry in the country as a whole. The Minister of Agriculture announced a program in the House on Friday, without guidelines being laid down, and then came in on the next working day, which was Monday, again without setting any guidelines, and tried to say that it is we who are creating the confusion in the industry.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member appreciates that he is now making a point of debate. This is not a question of privilege, and I do not see how we can have a debate on a question of privilege based on the statement which the hon. member for Middlesex has just made. It seems to me that he is arguing with the minister. He may be right or he may be wrong, but I suggest to him that this is hardly a question of privilege.

Mr. Frank: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker. The point I would like to make is that I am sure you cannot realize the importance of the situation which exists and which this government has brought about in the country. Yesterday during the question period we had three small questions regarding the industry. If the minister thinks that the people are not concerned about the matter I would like him to get in touch with his colleague in Ontario. He is concerned and he is in the gallery today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Why is he not at work at Queen's Park?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will agree that this is not a question of privilege and the matter should not be pursued.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order regarding a matter which was brought up during the question period today. The point I wish to raise is an urgent one because the Garrison dam project is threatening domestic water supplies from the Souris River and it is only appropriate at this time to point out to the Minister of the Environment that the IJC is the responsible agency—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made his point to the minister on a point of order. May I suggest again that every day we have alleged points of order and questions of privilege which do not comply with our rules, and when hon. members make such points, raise such questions and argue with ministers it is not very good for the orderly conduct of the affairs of the House.

[Translation]

The hon. member will excuse me but I think he wishes to rise on a point of order or privilege.

Guaranteed Income

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning the statement made a few moments ago in this House by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) that the opposition had objected to Bill C-176, the agricultural products marketing legislation. I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that when this bill was introduced in this House the Social Credit Party did not object to it. We asked for some amendments so as to include only beef.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF A MINIMUM ANNUAL GUARANTEED INCOME PROGRAM

Mr. René Matte (Champlain) moved:

That this House regrets that the government has taken no concrete steps to ensure the establishment of a guaranteed minimum annual income to overcome poverty in Canada and enable each Canadian citizen to cope with problems of rising prices and to fight inflation efficiently.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the gist of our motion is of such importance that I feel the government should consider it very attentively, so as to fill in the gaps which exist at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, hon. members of this party have been ridiculed over the years for advocating the establishment of a guaranteed minimum annual income system which, our adversaries claimed, would be equivalent to "throwing good money away" and inciting people to idleness. Over the past few years, however, all political parties have more or less looked into this idea of a vital minimum income. It is therefore important to conceive such a program and to examine the true fundamental principles which may bring us the best in this area.

The motion which I had the honour to move, Mr. Speaker, aims at blaming the government in a concrete way, for we all remember that it had been proposed in the Speech from the Throne for 1972—it was then a glimmer of hope for us—to have at least an embryonic program of a guaranteed minimum annual income.

Unfortunately, it seems that the government is not yet ready to go ahead with such a program, which explains our motion. Mr. Speaker, we are in favour of a program which, contrary to those administered by the provinces, would replace a ramshackle, unfair, frustrating and expensive system. We are proposing an adequate and fair system which would respect individual freedom.

Mr. Speaker, the welfare programs now in operation in all the provinces, the old age security pensions, the unemployment insurance program, all those programs concerned more or less with welfare are inadequate because they are no longer realistic, and we have to keep improving them all the time. They are unfair because some people need a much higher income than what they are receiving in welfare, for instance, but they are not getting it. Others who do not need allowances are getting them. Under the old age security system, there is a glaring discrimination against couples when one of the spouses is younger or older. It is a case of flagrant injustice when one of the spouses is 65 and the other 60 or 55. They are told to be content with one income, namely $180 a month, including the supplement.

If both spouses are 65, they get an amount of $350, as if, Mr. Speaker, the cost of living for two people aged between 60 and 65 was lower than for two people who are 65. This is unfair. Under our present welfare programs, there is a great deal of injustice. It is a defective program.

Therefore, we are proposing a real program that would prompt people to be even more energetic, more active, that would urge them to work instead of rushing for unemployment insurance as they are doing at present. And this is understandable. Faced with such dilemmas and when the alternative is to work at 30 below in the middle of winter for $90 a week, I understand that someone will hesitate and move heaven and earth to get unemployment insurance instead.

When families earn a very low income in wages while welfare recipients get as much, it is understandable that the head of family who works and earns very low wages longs to live on welfare.

Mr. Speaker, it is our present system that makes people take such an attitude. In my opinion, this is a very serious matter and I intend to prove that our party has been advocating this program for a very long time and wishes to bring it back to its true proportions.

Nowadays, there is much talk about guaranteed annual income. Many economists have endorsed the principle of guaranteed income. All federal political parties have considered at their conventions the implementation of such a policy. Many countries, and even a Canadian province, are now trying out these programs.

The Senate Special Committee on Poverty, chaired by Senator Croll, recommended this policy as the most efficient way of dealing with the problem of poverty in Canada during the seventies. Many people, including the most influential members of the present government, have not agreed yet to implement this guaranteed annual income program.

But, Mr. Speaker, nobody now is making fun of the idea of establishing such a program, that could be set up today and this I believe is a great step we have taken.

According to many books published recently on the various guaranteed income plans, it is said that such a concept has become popular only since 1966. However, we must point out that the Social Crediters called for such an income distribution program many decades ago.

The Social Credit proposals as to the best guaranteed annual income program are still much more advanced than most systems, the objective of which is to provide for a sufficient and vital income for all, so as to guarantee them a decent living.

Quoting the words of Social Credit founder Major C. H. Douglas is enough to show the truth of that assertion. Douglas called for the payment of a national dividend to all citizens to meet their essential physical needs. The object of such national dividends was to increase people's income so as to permit the maximum use of the benefits of industrialization and automation.

In 1924, Douglas specified the three basic principles that should be followed if the transition to a productive system based on machinery is to be successful rather than disastrous. The third of those principles was, and I quote:

> That the distribution of monetary credit to individuals must be progressively less, according to the worker's salary, which means that the dividend must progressively replace salaries.

Ten years later, during a radio broadcast, he described the effects of such a policy in the following way, and I quote:

> The actual effect of a national dividend would be:
> 1. to provide for individuals an income source which, although it would be desirable to increase it through work, could nevertheless ensure the purchasing power needed to maintain the individual's independence and health.

● (1520)

> By thus providing a regular demand for our production system, it would already be a major step to stabilize conditions in the business world and would assure producers a constant domestic market for their goods.

When considering those comments, we are led to realize how strange it is that throughout the discussions recently held on a system aimed at increasing personal incomes, nobody has ever admitted that Crediters have been demanding such a program for decades.

How can such a situation be explained, Mr. Speaker? Is it possible that those who denounced or ridiculed the proposals of the Social Credit are embarrassed because they are compelled by events to consider, in order to deal with our economic problems, the same solutions which they ridiculed and disdainfully rejected?

Mr. Speaker, I think that it is now essential at this stage of my remarks to show that the guaranteed minimum annual income is a right to which all Canadians are entitled.

When a guaranteed annual income is proposed, it is often believed that government has the right to accept or reject it. The Social Credit Party of Canada asserts that the guaranteed annual income is a basic question. Payment of an adequate income to each member of our society so as to look after his basic and essential needs is not a government favour to be granted or taken back according to the decisions of a few individuals who are momentarily in power.

In fact, guaranteed income is a right of the individual, and in any modern and prosperous economy, this right must be recognized. We must realize that the philosophy underlying the actual methods of income distribution is basically primitive compared to the attitudes of civilized societies of some hundred years ago, when means were much more limited than they are today.

Policies that would deprive someone of the necessities of life so as to force him to work under some other person's rule are negating a civilized society's ideal. More than 2,000 years ago, Aristotle said that any man forced to do anything to earn some money is nothing more than a slave.

Former American president and political philosopher Thomas Jefferson said essentially the same thing when he stated that every man must possess enough earthly goods to look after himself, for in other cases, he would be reduced to the level of slave who depended physically and mentally on other men.

Professor Erich Fromm wrote, and I quote:

> A guaranteed income would not only establish freedom as a reality rather than as a slogan, it would also establish a principle which is deep-rooted in the humanist and religious tradition of western civilization, namely that man has a right to live. This right to live, this right to have food, shelter, medical care, education, etc., is a basic human right which should not be restricted under any circumstances, even under the condition that man should be useful to society.

This tradition aiming at putting each individual in a position of economic independence so as to give him free moral determination was one of the achievements of our civilization in the past. The government rejected this principle in speech and in action. However, it has no right to do so. To deny its citizens the basic right to economic security is simply to deprive them of a birth right. I will indicate how this is so. We, Canadians, are fortunate to live in a rich country. However, many Canadians do not get a fair share of our affluence. They are not in a position to claim effectively a share of our common wealth. If we understood the actual basis of our wealth, we would realize that we need a new system that would enable individuals to claim and obtain the share of our riches which they need and which is their due.

The concept that a small group of individuals can monopolize practically all our wealth and keep all the profits for themselves is unacceptable. This concept results from a misunderstanding of the notion of wealth and of its sources.

In the past, it was thought that all wealth was a product of three interacting factors: land, labour and capital. This essentially materialistic concept did not take into account other factors which prevailed as production developed through increasingly sophisticated techniques.

One of these factors is what may be called the free benefits of partnership. This means quite simply that people can achieve more by co-operating than by going different ways. For instance, ten persons who work together systematically to meet their economic needs can do much more, and much more easily, if they unite instead of trying to work separately. This "surplus" that results from the common effort belongs naturally to all and should be distributed among all.

Another intangible factor of modern production is our cultural heritage. Our generation has the capacity to offer material abundance to all, but only an idiot would put down our position to our efforts alone. Without the contributions of previous generations, our civilization would not by far be as developed as it is today. Technological knowledge has been accumulating in human society for centuries, since and even before the day when a brilliant individual became aware for the first time of the potential of the wheel. Without the benefit of this tremendous heritage we received from our ancestors, we would not be any more advanced than the most primitive tribes of the world. Who would dare deny that every member of our society today has the unalienable right to participate in the profits of that heritage? Dealing with that question in his volume entitled Social Credit, Major Douglas wrote the following, and I quote:

It seems difficult to deny that society in general taken as an entity and not because of its titles to nature, work or capital would not be the natural heir to it. If ownership of the wealth produced is assigned to the proprietors of the factors which contributed to their production and if the proprietors of the heritage of industrial arts make up society in general it also becomes difficult to deny that the major proprietors and true beneficiaries of the modern system—

Mr. Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member for a moment simply to remind him that according to the note I have been handed his time is up. However, a review of the situation indicates that he still has nine minutes to go. I apologize to the hon. member for having temporarily interrupted him.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I think I started my remarks at around 3:10 and I am entitled to 30 minutes.

Mr. Speaker: That is right. I indicated to the hon. member that this information is correct. I apologize to him, he still has nine minutes to go.

Mr. Matte: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I continue:

—the true beneficiaries of the modern system of production happen to be those individuals who make up society as such. To deny the common nature of that heritage would have the effect of setting in motion the process of disintegration of society as we know it.

Major Douglas was then brought to the inevitable conclusion that the equivalent in terms of money of the contribution of those intangible factors, that is the free benefits from association and cultural heritage added to production, must belong to the members of the community in general.

Consequently, when we insist on the need for a universal guaranteed income program, the Social Credit Party of Canada is not satisfied with asking the government to be more generous than it has been up to now. This party contends that the government's current policy deprives people of the fruits of their common heritage and a guaranteed annual income would only give back to people as a whole what they were lawfully entitled to from the beginning.

Mr. Speaker, how can we establish a real guaranteed income program? I believe that we should follow these principles. For such a system to be efficient there are essential conditions to meet. This is important because several suggested programs would spell the downfall of the economy or would merely fail to meet their main object which is to overcome poverty. We consider the following criteria as necessary and essential.

First, the program must provide each individual with adequate food, clothes and housing.

Second, the benefits must be paid on a universal basis in accordance with the principle that these benefits are in fact a heritage to which each member of our society is entitled.

Third, in order to promote rather than discourage personal enterprise and the desire to work, the basic tax exemption should be higher so that the vital minimum will not be taxed.

Fourth, the guaranteed annual income program should be financed not only from taxation revenues, but with new credits according to the real wealth of the nation. This is the answer to the question asked yesterday by the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). Thus, instead of contributing to the already crushing burden of the debt, a debt we have no means of paying except by making more debts, the guaranteed annual income will really increase the total purchasing power of the community. It would be insane to finance this program since debts are a mortgage on future income and the community would derive no long term benefit.

● (1530)

Mr. Speaker, each time we put forward such solutions, we are always given the same objections: All right, but where are we going to take the money? We will take the money not only in taxes but in new credit. I see the minister imitating the "dollar machine", Mr. Speaker. That is an old joke, he could find others which are more up to date. When we know that we have all the material and human potential to produce ourselves everything we need to meet our essential needs, Mr. Speaker, absolutely nothing prevents us therefore from issuing the credits. The minister cannot make me believe that a bridge or a road is built with money, because I have always seen a bridge built with concrete, iron and materials. If these materials are there in abundance, if we have the labour needed to do it, if we have the know-how to design plans, nobody can make me believe we need money. If we need money, it is to keep the wheel going and not the "dollar machine". And to keep the wheel going, Mr. Speaker, we just have to issue the credits we need.

In conclusion I shall simply mention what the guaranteed minimum income should be. In my opinion, the tax exemption for single people should be increased to $3,000, thus to $6,000 for a married couple, with an exemption of $500 for each child.

Our system, Mr. Speaker, would be very simple. I can explain it in a minute, I think. It would be sufficient to give $300 a year to every Canadian who is 18 or less and $1500 a year every citizen from 18 to 60. At the age of 60, the person would receive $250 a month and if married, whatever the age of the spouse, the spouse would receive $200, which would make $450 per couple. The amounts are the same for disabled persons: $250 a month, and $200 for the spouse if the person is married. For a widow with children, there would be $250 a month, plus $500 a year for each child.

Mr. Speaker, regarding the figures I have mentioned, the minister may well say: You speak in terms of billions and billions! We made the calculation ourselves and realized that this program would not require much administration. The question is to know whether the individual is Canadian, still lives and how old he or she is. That is all. Only the case of disabled persons may require a more thorough investigation, but by reducing clerical work to a minimum, the cost of such a program would be only a few billions more than the cost of all the welfare programs we now have in Canada. If, in addition, we apply the basic principle that normally the minimum income should come from our national dividend, which means that we would not be relying exclusively on taxes to grant it, we will be able to establish a system that will make each and every Canadian a truly free citizen who will know that nothing prevents him from working to supplement the guaranteed minimum income. At the present time, the unemployed or the welfare recipient is under close watch and if he dares work, the benefits are cut off. Mr. Speaker, that is why there is such an unemployment insurance rush.

Such a system would encourage the instinctive ambition which is common to all men, that of having as much as the others, as well as a healthful rivalry. Who would not work, Mr. Speaker, even if only at $30 or $40 a week, in order to increase his minimum guaranteed income? Who would not do it?

We would no longer be faced with situations where we have to bring in West Indians to pick apples in Quebec, since inadequate programs established years ago have taught the people to stay unemployed. They are right to do so because the systems are false. We should therefore seriously consider establishing a minimum annual guaranteed income such as the one that we suggest.

[English]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I think this is the first time that I, on behalf of my party, have had the opportunity to respond as first speaker to a motion proposed by the Social Credit Party. I should like to say to the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) that I find myself a little ill at ease when I hear him discussing monetary policy and, sometimes, general economic policy. However, I have noticed in my years here that his party from time to time has made vigorous and consistent advocacy on behalf of the people of Canada who most need assistance. They have been good spokesmen for the poor people of Canada. I commend them for that. May I say in a personal way that I wish to extend good wishes to the hon. member's leader, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), who has struck me as one of the most interesting, effective and entertaining parliamentarians in this House. I extend to him my good wishes for his health and recovery.

The mover of the motion was profoundly right in pointing out that although we are a rich country, although Canada is always in the top bracket of the "have" countries—in any great gathering of developed countries Canada is always included—although we are rich, with great resources and a productive people, one Canadian citizen in four or five lives at or below the poverty line. God knows, those at the poverty line do not enjoy gracious living by any means. It is certainly not gracious living at a time of rampant and uncontrolled inflation. I understand that while one in five, or perhaps it is now one in four, of our citizens as a whole are living at or below the poverty line, half our people 65 and over are at that terrible level.

There must be something wrong with a system which year after year can tolerate so much poverty in a rich country. I often think of the colossal gall of the political party that can bring that about year after year, and yet somehow insist to the people of Canada that they and they alone should be given the power to govern this country. Is there no better time for the party presently holding office to have the humility to ask if it is, in fact, doing well enough for the people of Canada.

We have to find some way to improve the situation for more of our Canadian citizens. We all know there are many, many programs. There is a proliferation of programs, municipal, provincial and national, whereby the state in one of its emanations tries to assist the people who need assistance. We have our select groups. We give so much to the old people. They are not getting enough. We give the disabled so much under the aegis of the provincial government. The stories we hear from some of these people are very, very shameful. Someone once said you almost have to be dead and be able to prove it before you are regarded as wholly disabled by some authorities. We have our family allowances which give a measure of assistance to those in that group. We have much further to go.

We should look carefully at the suggestion which the hon. member has put forward. He pointed out that his party first advocated it. There are other groups who have suggested a guaranteed annual income. One must be very careful what one says about the gentlemen in the other place, but they are rarely described as starry eyed radicals. However, the Senate committee on poverty produced a very interesting document. I believed they worked sincerely when looking at the problem. They advocated the establishment of a guaranteed annual income program. I do not know how seriously their suggestion was taken by the present government, but surely such a group of competent and senior legislators lending their support to a proposal should mean something. When I first heard the expression "guaranteed annual income" used, there was a great shying away from it. People were suggesting this was some device for legislating, legitimizing and eternalizing laziness, bumming, welfare and so on.

We have to look carefully as to whether we might be at a stage where we should consider replacing a whole congeries of programs by something which is more efficiently organized and more universal in its application. The sympathetical feelings I have toward the guaranteed annual income are along the lines of its possible greater efficiency. We know that in society there are people who must be given security. We must do more for our aged people. We must do more for those between 60 and 65. Last session I referred to the amusing, if it were not so tragic, situation whereby if you are 90 years you can work all you like and get your full Canada Pension Plan, but in a more productive period, if you work you have your pension deducted.

All across the land today we are faced with people who are opting out of the work force and getting more fully involved in programs of assistance from the state. That is disturbing. I do not think we should ever have a situation in which if someone is employable, it is more to his benefit to receive state aid than to work. However, I receive hundreds of letters from people who are receiving a small pension. If they go out and find a small job, every single dollar is knocked off their pension even though quite often the two together are not sufficient to keep the man or his family going.

We have to get back that incentive. We have to stop what is far too common, the bureaucratic impinging on citizens who desire to work. I know that in every society down through the ages there are some people who are going to swing the lead, to beat the rap, but I cannot believe otherwise than that the great majority of Canadians would prefer to work than to be unemployed and receiving a miserable pittance from the state. Therefore, I think this thing should be considered.

I would like to say to the hon. member that I attended a very important national meeting yesterday and the day before. Many useful things were discussed there. I refer to the meeting of the Progressive Conservative party of Canada. One thing we did discuss. The hon. member will be pleased with this. We reiterated our view that the spouse of a 65 year old recipient of OAS and other pensions should also be given that pension. I think it is a good thing. There is nothing personal involved in this, but it would be in the interests of a young wife to look after the husband if he is getting along in years. Keep him healthy. Keep him well. Keep him there! In a more serious way, it is only right, just and proper. It is an anomaly for a wife age 61 with a husband age 67 and both be treated by the state as if they were a single individual. I agree with the minister that it might be the other way around. Sometimes the young man may get the older lady. It is a matter of taste, preference and luck.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about the 61 year old woman who is single?

Mr. Macquarrie: I do not want to conduct a whole symposium on what should be done in every individual case. However, if hon. members wish to write me a letter, I will be glad to render a decision on each one.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How about lowering the age from 65 to 60?

Mr. Macquarrie: Since the honourable and venerable member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raised the question, at our national meeting we did discuss that very question of lowering the age from 65 to 60. I do not believe we should put people out to pasture when they are 60 years of age. I think we may be at the stage of development in our country where he or she who wishes to retire at age 60 should be able to do it in decency, comfort and dignity. I think this country is able to do that for its people.

I come back to another aspect that the hon. member has mentioned, that is the important aspect of incentive to work. It is said that we Presbyterians are great believers in the work ethic. We are told that the work ethic is dead. I have often been told this. However, it is not dead in those countries that are competing with us in the market places of the world. It is not dead in Japan, Germany or Switzerland. In these countries they are concerned when there are 100 people on the unemployment list. We are supposed to become accustomed to 750,000 month after month. We find that these are countries which still believe, apparently, in the work ethic, and they are taking markets from us. Whenever I go abroad I like to go to the harbours because I was born near the sea coast in Prince Edward Island. You see the flagships of nations all over the world but you won't see Canadian flagships there because in our outrageous stupidity we took ourselves out of the merchant marine, and we are losing out in competition all across the world. Other people have asked for consideration of the guaranteed annual income. Reuben Baetz of the Canadian Council on Social Development said not long ago in one of the reports issued by that organization:

> It is my personal view that Canada both can and should provide, as a matter of right, sufficient income to support an adequate standard of physical and social well-being for all its people. This is based on a principle of social justice, now generally accepted in all advanced countries.

So I say to the hon. member that he is in good company. He is in company with Reuben Baetz and with the Senate of Canada. Other submissions have been made by the Canadian Labour Association. There is the Report on Poverty, and I suppose we can even say we have the orange paper. We have the program where now we are moving to a guaranteed income for some sectors of society.

There is a big experiment going on in Manitoba, and I assume the minister will tell us about it later this evening. I hope this experiment provides good results. I think it would be prudent to study the results most carefully. I have thought about a guaranteed annual income for a long time and I am like King Agrippa—I am almost persuaded. I am a little troubled about the effect on incentive as I implied in my earlier remarks. I hope it is an efficient method and that it will not come as just another layer on top of those we already have. In a highly bureaucratic society such as ours this might be a danger. But my own orientation is one of sympathy, and I am inclined to believe this is an idea which is coming into its own time.

When I first came to this House, the idea was way ahead of its time but I think now we may see it. I commend the hon. member for his interest and the philosophical manner in which he put forward his proposal. I liked his speech very much, especially when he referred to my favourite American of all time, perhaps one of the greatest men of all history, Thomas Jefferson. His quote from Jefferson was a very enduring one. So, we have Thomas Jefferson, the Senate of Canada and Major Douglas all on the same wave length.

It is important that we who are trying to represent our people—and we should care most for those who need care in our society—should set aside a day to deal with such matters. I have always been touched by the condition of our poor people, but in the last year or so, since I have been given special responsibilities within our caucus and have had the opportunity to hear from literally thousands of Canadians, I am all the more sensitized to the fact that far too many of our people are finding life far too hard. There is a vast area in which the government must move before we have anything even close to social justice, especially for the aged, the disadvantaged, the dispossessed. I think right now we should be able to say to the unemployable man that he will be looked after, that his problems are at an end, that he does not have to degrade himself by proving his incapacity and his poverty. That group should immediately be allotted a guaranteed income, if you like to call it that.

We must always be sure that the administrators temper their interpretation of the regulations with compassion. I had a man tell me he went in and asked how he could qualify for old age security. They said, come back in 33½ years and you will be all right. He said, I am 88 now.

Imagine telling him to come back in 33 years. He is an Irishman from Prince Edward Island and the rules do not permit a repetition of his remarks, but his language was explicit. I took up this matter with the department concerned and they got it down to eight and a half years through a new interpretation. That would make him 96½. Another woman wrote who had tried to get assistance. They said, you own a house, lady, and you own a car. Sell both, then come back and qualify. That is terrible. Far better the system suggested by the hon. member than these efforts to economize a little on the backs of the poor.

I think the greatest sin of the government, and it has many, is that its surrender to inflation has left on the field the poor, the aged, the people with little savings and the people with no savings, the people with fixed incomes, the people who thought they had provided for their own security, the people bereft of those who had earned for them. These are the victims of a cold, callous, insensitive government which says: inflation is a way of life, there is nothing we can do about it. There must be something we can do about it, and at another time I shall be able to tell the House and the country about some of the decisions we made when we decided down at a hotel the other day what we are going to do.

Suffice it to say I am interested in this well-presented motion. I commend the hon. member for Champlain and his party for their concern for the poor of this country. I will think increasingly about their suggestion, which contains a great deal of merit. There are some things which still trouble me, but I think he has made an important contribution to the discussion of a most pertinent subject.

[Translation]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the members of our party rejoice in the fact that our colleagues of the Social Credit Party of Canada have decided to move this motion in the House today.

Ensuring each citizen, man or woman, each family in Canada sufficient income to meet the needs of modern life is a formidable task. Still, giving control of the means to coexist with the big industrial and financial companies that dominate and control our whole existence is the most imperative task in our times.

[English]

I am very glad to have this motion from those over in that corner. As a matter of fact, I know that our colleagues in the Social Credit Party have pioneered along these lines. Perhaps they do not realize that for 30 years we have had a guaranteed income in our program, and we as a party have been working steadily toward the same aim ever since that time.

For all those years we have advocated a guaranteed income. When we could not get it, we did what the people have had to do—settle for this patchwork that is involved in their social security scheme. The difference now is that while many years ago a guaranteed income seemed to be an impractical dream, today it is becoming the practical next step that must be taken to provide social security to people all across the country. It is becoming something that must be done. We are finding that the social security network that we have is overlapping in many areas and is wasteful. It does not reach the people who really need help and does not do a job of protecting whole groups of people who are in a very bad way indeed.

I was glad to hear my Social Credit colleague mention two features that are essential in a guaranteed income scheme. One is that it should be universal, that it should cover all groups in our society. The second is that it should not provide a disincentive for people to work. People should be encouraged to add to their income to the extent of their ability and capacity. I think both these features are very important.

As I say, I think the guaranteed income is the very next step that has to be taken in providing social security. I should like also to point out that there are three provinces where experiments along this line are now being made in a practical way. They do not embrace the whole population yet since provincial revenues are not sufficient for that. Further, it is essential to have the necessary expertise and at the start we do not have this.

May I point out that in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia experiments are being conducted in this field, and it is no accident that these are three provinces with NDP governments. They are provinces whose governments believe that, in order to plan social security, and indeed the whole economy in an intelligent and sane way today, the needs of the people must be placed in the centre of the picture and the economy must be built around them, instead of having the great corporate interests in the steel, coal and other heavy industries looking after their interests first. This sort of thing leads us into more and more trouble every day that goes by.

In the three provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia the governments have shown the courage of their democratic socialist convictions by placing human beings in the centre of government planning and public thinking. They have had the courage to experiment along these lines. Saskatchewan has just started, and so has Manitoba. As a matter of fact, Manitoba has the backing and full co-operation of the federal government. This was the only province that the federal government could find willing to go along with such an experiment. British Columbia, of course, has its own scheme. Ontario would not experiment. If that is not true, I wish the minister would contradict me; it would be the sweetest contradiction I have had in a long time.

The big, powerful and wealthy province of Ontario considered this idea, but unfortunately the idea of every man for himself, of dog eat dog, is too strong in the Ontario government for it to try any experiment in guaranteed incomes for those really in need. Obviously, they are not ready for such a program yet in Ontario. If members like the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) ever reach a majority in that government, then I imagine that within the fullness of time they will have some influence, or at least I hope they will.

In British Columbia things are moving. They have had their guaranteed minimum income assistance plan in effect for well over a year. It is known as Mincome. At first it covered all low income people 65 years and over, and guaranteed them an income of $200 a month. These people added up their income, and Mincome brought it to $200 a month and no less. The program was well received, it paid dividends in the form of contentment to the elderly. It also removed people from a number of other expensive programs. Then, last October 1 the guaranteed income age was lowered to 60 and over. Anyone living in British Columbia 60 years of age and over, whose monthly income does not amount to the Mincome figure, has their income brought up to that figure, no matter how much the differential. Furthermore, the program now applies to the handicapped at age 18 and over, though there are some differences in application.

As I say, the Mincome experiment in British Columbia began with guaranteeing a monthly income of $200. They are now adding to that $200 the federal old age pension increases and increases in the supplement. At the present time, people over the age of 60 in British Columbia are guaranteed by the provincial government an income of not less than $213.85 per individual, or $427.70 per couple. In arriving at this figure, their income is counted but not their assets, such as house, bank account or other asset. These items are not taken into the calculation. About 127,000 people are now benefitting from this scheme in British Columbia, and the intent of the program is to bring security through a guaranteed income so the people in the province can live reasonably comfortably.

Lowering the age to 60 also did something else. A great many people between the age of 60 and 65, as all of us know, are finding their work a strain. They are breaking down in sickness or are trying to find other jobs. If they are not successful, they try to manage on their own pitiful revenue and wish to goodness that they were 65 years of age in order to qualify for Mincome. Now that they can qualify at age 60, this is a very great blessing to them indeed.

The program is intended to provide those who have reached the age of 60 with sufficient income on which to live. I think it is an excellent program and we would do well to watch progress in this area, though we should not wait too long. I am sick and tired of members in this chamber continuing to sit and watch misery, injustice and suffering in face of the ever-increasing cost of living, but not doing a darned thing about it. We do not need to sit and watch this kind of program indefinitely. I have been assured by all sources, governmental and those involved, that the program is working extremely well in British Columbia, and I think we should have the courage to implement it on a larger scale. The program has been directed toward the elderly and the handicapped but I think it should be extended throughout our society.

I am aware of the dangers outlined by the hon. member for Hillsborough, and this is why I do not think that the guaranteed income is the answer to all our woes. I do not think it is the panacea, the new heaven and new earth in itself that members across the way seem to think it is. I think other measures must supplement it. Mr. Reuben Baetz made it clear all along that guaranteed, worth-while employment, along with a guaranteed income, must be assured those who are young and able to work. This is something we do not have today. I say "guaranteed worthwhile employment".

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway).]

Many young people have copped out or opted out of jobs which they find miserably deadening and in which they have no interest. Many young people, even those with university training do not wish to be a cog in an industrial machine, a servant to computers of a handmaiden to machinery of any sort. That is not worthwhile. While there are many faults to be found with the Local Initiatives Program and the Opportunities for Youth Program, they have at least pointed the way to the truth that there are many kinds of community jobs and services to people which in many ways could be carried out by young people. The young people like to perform these functions if they can find a way to live while so engaged. There should be more of that kind of job. This relates to helping the elderly, the sick, the retarded and young people in the field of sports, athletics and so on. There are a host of such things.

Along with the guaranteed income must go guaranteed productive work. If we do not provide that we will be running into what the hon. member for Hillsborough and I are afraid of; that is, the young people will sit there in an unproductive way and later we will never get them into useful activities no matter how necessary they may be. I want to see both these things go hand in hand. In addition I think they should be accompanied by a system of fair taxation. I believe we should get the dust off the Carter Report to see what he recommended, and if there are any latter-day Carters so much the better. No matter how one receives income, taxation should be applied fairly and evenly. If we had such a system we would find that some of those corporations with broad shoulders, which are now getting away with murder in respect of not carrying a fair share of taxation, would be bearing much of the taxation which today rests on the shoulders of the poor low-income people who are opposed to progress for the simple reason that they cannot stand the burden of financing it. If we had proper productivity and productive and useful work added to a guaranteed income and added to fair taxation, we would have a good start on the way to a much better way of doing things.

Now, I should like to talk about what is happening in too many Canadian homes. I think part of the picture is given in an address by Miss Sylva M. Gelber, Director, Women's Bureau of the Canada Department of Labour. She said:

> There are today in Canada nearly three-quarters of a million (678,035) working women who have over one and one-third million (1,350,000) children under the age of fourteen. They are the wives of men whose families consist of one or more children under fourteen and who have a median income of less than six and one-half thousand dollars ($6,454) per year. Or they are women without husbands as in the case of some sixty thousand (60,083) of them.
> There are also today in Canada about one-third of a million (331,434) women who are the sole support of families; the vast majority (206,117) are widows. Consider with these, almost a million (925,000) single working women, and it may be fair to assume that the vast majority of women, particularly married women with young children who double their own burden by going out to work, are employed because of economic need.

These are women in the low-income groups. There are vast numbers of them. They must go out to work and neglect their homes because they cannot afford to hire babysitters or housekeepers. I suggest that if we had a guaranteed income this would go a long way toward allowing these people to go back to the home. They are tearing themselves into pieces between working in the daytime and coming home miserably tired and overburdened, in an attempt to cope with their family and housekeeping duties in the evening. Then, there are single women, women without husbands, women who are divorced or separated, who are trying to do the double job of working and housekeeping. Then, there is the woman whose husband's pay is so low that she must join her little pay cheque with that of her husband in order to meet their needs. Here is where a guaranteed income would be of great benefit not only to the women but to Canada. We want to keep our Canadian homes on good foundations. While women who have better incomes, better education and financial backing can carry on careers without neglecting their homes, these other women cannot do so. I think a guaranteed income would help these people.

Then, we have heard about the women whose husbands are in receipt of the old age pension but who themselves have no chance of receiving it for a few years. Such a woman might be 45 years of age. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, try to find a job for a woman 45 years of age unless she happens to be highly qualified in a technical way. She is simply out of luck.

These are some of the reasons we support the idea of a guaranteed income. I want to agree with the hon. member for Hillsborough and the hon. member who introduced this motion by indicating that this would be a mark of the degree of our civilization if we could now bring in this measure. In this last year we have seen the utter futility of increasing pensions when the people see the dollars being eaten away because of increased prices, increased rents, the increase in the cost of clothing and many other items. There is no sense in this. We must have some stabilized form of income if we are to have a secure and decent life for the Canadian people. Let us think in those terms. If a guaranteed income is to work we must think in these terms, and our party will push for this no matter where the move originates or who introduces it.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the motion we have before us today introduced by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) is really in three parts. The first is that the government has taken no concrete steps to ensure the establishment of a guaranteed minimum annual income to overcome poverty in Canada. The second element deals with Canadians coping with the problem of rising prices. The third is almost the same. I presume the hon. member means that the guaranteed annual income he has in mind would be in fact an efficient and total way to fight inflation.

Since there is not sufficient time to deal with all the elements involved in this motion, I should like first of all to try to deal with the question of a guaranteed income in order to overcome poverty. Some of us often forget that there is a guaranteed income in Canada now. Although it does not cover all people it certainly covers the senior citizens in this country. This fact is often conveniently overlooked. For instance, as of January 1, 1974 the OAS and GIS payments to single people are $183.99 per month and to a married couple $351.02. That in essence is the guaranteed income level for people over age 65. This factor cannot be ignored when talking about a guaranteed income in Canada.

The other point I should like to refer to is that made by the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) when she said that these benefits are often eaten away by inflation. I am sure the hon. member and all hon. members in this House realize that the increase in the cost of living is automatically added to the amount of the OAS and the GIS payments to our senior citizens on a quarterly basis. This means that if it is eaten up in one period, it is made up in the next period. That fact also seems to be forgotten by many people.

The other point is that we must look at the problem of a guaranteed annual income in the perspective of the over-all social priorities in Canada. On April 18, 1973, the government tabled a working paper in this House on social security. It deals with this very question and a broad series of other questions relating to the wellbeing of Canadians, particularly those on social assistance of one kind or another. In addition to the working paper there has been much action as a consequence of the proposals put forward at that time, specifically in relation to a guaranteed annual income, especially in the province of Manitoba. As a matter of fact, there the project the federal government is in the process of embarking upon is a guaranteed annual income experimental program at a cost of $17 million, 75 per cent of which is provided for out of federal funds. This program will cover approximately 2,500 families over a period of three years and its purpose is to find out the social impact of a guaranteed income program in this country.

It is important to note that such a program leaves many unanswered questions. It is not good enough to simply say that we need a guaranteed annual income in Canada. You must find out what kind of levels we are talking about, what kind of recovery rates are involved for income that is earned by people outside of the amount guaranteed by the government. There are a whole lot of unanswered questions, and it is imperative for any responsible government embarking on a program of such significance to find out what the impact is on society in general, particularly on the question which is very central to the minds of all of us, namely work incentives in our country. That program is a very important step forward in determining answers to the whole matter of guaranteed annual incomes in Canada. It is a very important project, one that the federal government has embarked upon with the province, and I am sure that it will shed very substantial light on the over-all question.

However, I think that in addition to that program one must look, as I mentioned before, at the over-all problem of social security in Canada. The review that was embarked upon on April 18 is founded on a number of essential principles. I think that one of the most important principles underlying that review was that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in conjunction with provincial ministers of health and welfare agreed upon one essential point, namely, that the problem of jurisdiction and of who is responsible for the implementation of what kind of program, should be set aside for the time being and that both levels of government should consider the real question as it affects human beings. Obviously, they are the ones whom all governments are elected to serve. That was accepted by all the ministers and the review is going forward taking into account the broad range of social policies that exist in Canada on all levels. They are being considered so as to try to sort them out and co-ordinate them in such a way that the bureaucratic jungle that exists in part in social security in Canada will be eliminated and that people will be served to the maximum.

In addition to that principle, there was a second one that I consider to be very important which relates to people as well, that is that the service that is provided by all levels of government to those in need in this country should be co-ordinated in such a way that individuals looking for assistance will not be shunted from pillar to post in their search of the right kind of institution or level of government to be of service. Personally, I describe that kind of approach as one where we will provide, in the long run I hope, what I would call a "one stop service centre" where municipal, provincial and federal government agencies will be housed under one roof so that individuals and communities will be able to go there and obtain assistance without the kind of red tape that often exists when people seek help from governments at present.

In addition to this, we feel that it is very important that we rationalize the whole question of social security in Canada. To that end, this paper has provided a whole series of suggestions to the provincial levels of government regarding what should be done. The objectives of the review are very simple: first of all, to provide an acceptable basic income to all Canadians without which they cannot adequately survive; second, to make sure that we provide universal access to the essential services required by people in this country, whether it be housing, hospital or medical care, legal aid or any other assistance; third, the objective is to provide assistance to people in emergency situations where the general over-all policies do not fit and to take their individual circumstances into account.

It is important in such a review that the various levels of government take into account the essential belief of all Canadians that in so far as possible we should be independent, that we should try to provide for ourselves and that the purpose of a social policy is to look after those who are unable to provide for themselves. The policy is a recognition of the principle of independence and its value, and a recognition of the need of interdependence so that others can look after those who are unable to look after themselves.

The elements involved in social security are pretty clear: first, the need for minimum wages in Canada at adequate levels; second, the need for insurance programs to provide a vehicle for those who try to provide for themselves so that they can look after themselves in cases of emergency requirements such as unemployment, sickness, injury, disability, hospital, medical assistance, and so forth; and third, to provide to those who are working at minimum or near minimum wages income supplementation so that they can provide for themselves without being forced to seek assistance under various welfare or social assistance programs.

[Mr. Cafik.]

I think that any real worthwhile social security system in Canada that will be developed as a consequence of this important review must be acceptable to the people of this country. That is inherent in any program that is brought forward in a democracy. That program must reflect and not distort the social values that are held by Canadians. The program must be in harmony with and not opposed to the real economic forces that exist in our country. It must be fair and humane and understand the real human needs of people. It must be fair, not only to the recipient, but to the person who pays the bill, namely, the taxpayer. It must be designed in such a way that it will effectively combat poverty in this country. It must be a system that is simple and understandable to the people who will use it. It must be capable of being effectively administered so that there is no wastage of funds in the administration of it and so that the majority of resources do not go to running the system rather than to those who are in fact in need of help. It must complement and be accessible to the people of this country and take into account the institutional services that already exist, some of which will continue to exist after the review.

● (1630)

In the social policy review the federal government, through the Department of National Health and Welfare, came forward with 14 basic propositions for consideration by the provincial governments. I would like to run through them very briefly.

The first proposition is that whatever we decide on, it must not provide a disincentive to work. It must be an effective instrument to provide a real meaningful incentive for people to work.

The second proposition is to assure that governments, on all levels, do everything possible to make sure that work is provided for those who need work.

The third proposition deals with a community employment program where both levels of government, through co-operation, should establish ways and means of taking up a shortfall in employment where the private sector cannot always achieve it, by providing some level of community employment that is socially useful and necessary.

The fourth proposition is to assure that the system provides social insurance and incentive to our people to save for themselves today, and also in the future.

In addition to this, in terms of an income supplementation strategy, which is a very important element of the review, proposition five deals with the need for family allowance increases. On that subject the paper recommended that there would be nearly a threefold increase in family allowances from an average of $7.21 a month at that time, to an average of $20 a month across Canada. Not only is that a proposition and a recommendation, but in fact it has indeed been implemented at this particular time.

Those family allowance changes themselves have increased federal expenditures from 1973-74 to 1974-75 by $1,072 million dollars. That is a lot of money to provide a higher level of income to those who are looking after children, and who have an obligation to do so. It has a tremendous impact on providing a greater incentive to work because that amount of money is automatically, obviously, added to the money that people earn when they are out working for a living. This recommendation has already been implemented.

Proposition six talks about income supplementation. Both levels of government are pursuing this actively now to decide on levels of income supplementation, and ways and means to implement it, so that people who are working for a living can find it possible economically to do so, without the kind of disincentives that exist at the present time. Those disincentives that exist now are a consequence of the relationship between what one can secure on welfare in Canada and what one can earn on minimum wages in this country.

When this working paper was brought forward, if my memory serves me correctly, I think in every province in Canada one could get more on social assistance than one could in fact by working for a living at minimum wages, or near minimum wages. In addition to that, the recovery rates were 100 per cent in most cases, which meant that if a person was drawing welfare payments on the provincial level and went out and got a part-time job to supplement that income, the government on the provincial level would recover 100 per cent of the money that that person earned. That certainly did not provide an incentive for people to get out and try to help themselves. It left them locked into the welfare cycle. That kind of problem has got to be resolved and it is dealt with quite substantively in the working paper on social security.

In addition to that, proposition 7 refers to the need for a guaranteed income for those who are unable to work, or should not be expected to work.

The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) talked about this as if it were some kind of a new idea. The fact of the matter is that it is proposed in our working paper on social security. It is a proposal that will, in due course, be implemented when the bugs are ironed out and arrangements are worked out in co-operation with the provinces themselves. This is not an exclusively federal jurisdiction, and therefore cannot be solved totally by the federal government.

Now, in addition to this, Mr. Speaker, I did refer to old age security and the guaranteed supplement earlier. That was referred to in proposition 8 of the over-all review. That proposition has largely been implemented, as well, through escalation and through incremental increases. I think that has been very important in offsetting the affects of inflation on those who were formerly on fixed incomes.

It is important to point out that, with the change in a large majority of federal programs to assist people in this country by escalating them to suit the real increase in the cost of living, such people are no longer on fixed incomes. Their incomes are increased automatically as the cost of living increases as well.

Proposition 9 refers to the need for a review of the Canada Assistance Plan, and for some adjustments in that regard. I can point out that the minister, only a few days ago, indicated that we would be broadening—and in fact have broadened—the terms under the Canada Assistance Plan to deal with day care centres, to allow those on lower incomes to be subsidized in terms of finding some institution to look after their children while they are out working. That is one of the over-all questions that is dealt with in the social policy review.

In addition to this, proposition 10 talks about the need for additional social services that are required in Canada. Here we are really referring to such things as training programs, counselling, rehabilitation, homemaker service and so on, to make sure that those who presently are unable to find employment are brought back into the mainstream of employables in this country by meaningful programs, so that they will be better able to find employment which would be beneficial to themselves and to Canada in terms of social security costs.

Proposition 11 talks about the need for institutional services such as day care centres, which I alluded to earlier, nursing homes and so on. That kind of question is very important to the over-all review of social security.

Proposition 12 refers to the need for a flexible approach between one province and another, which shows that the federal government recognizes that this is a pretty broad country, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific. What is advisable in one province, in this country, need not necessarily be advisable in another. Therefore, proposition 12 recognizes the need to allow the provinces a degree of flexibility in establishing income levels, whether it be in terms of supplementary income for the working poor, or any other social programs that may be brought forward.

Proposition 13, however, puts a caveat on that, in that it is necessary for the federal government to guarantee that the parliament of Canada is really served in the way in which it wants to be served and, therefore, it is our obligation to bring forward certain universal minimums, beyond which they will not go, in terms of the flexibility provisions.

Proposition 14 is a realistic recognition that such an over-all review, which has never before been undertaken in Canada, cannot be done in one moment or even in one year. In fact, proposition 14 proposes that this over-all review should be ironed out with the provinces, with a target date of between two or three years. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is a realistic recognition of the magnitude of the task that we have embarked upon in the social policy review.

Mr. Peters: That program is so out of date that even Ontario would not accept it.

Mr. Cafik: It is odd the hon. member says that it is out of date, when in fact the previous speaker, from his own party, was recommending that we implement a number of the proposals that I have just spoken about in relation to our social policy review. So I would suggest to the hon. member that he should look at the proposals very, very carefully and realize that it involves a decision that ultimately has to be taken by both levels of government.

● (1640)

The federal government, through the Minister of National Health and Welfare, is certainly committed to the principle that I think all of us would share, that we must provide levels of social assistance in Canada which will meet the basic criteria of all Canadians; that people who want to save and provide for themselves will be enabled and encouraged to do so and those who are unable to do so for one reason or another that is justified, will be adequately taken care of in a proper and effective way.

I should like to turn to one other area for a moment and that is to consider the kinds of things we have done as a consequence of the review in the last year. I do not believe that there has ever been a period in the parliament of this country in which any government has done so much in social security policy as has been done in the last year by the present Minister of National Health and Welfare.

One just has to look at that record to see how very impressive it is. I have talked about old age security, guaranteed income and the escalation of these. That is a very substantial program which has helped a great number of senior citizens. We can look also at family allowances which have been substantially increased and have had an enormous impact on young families bringing up children in this country. These allowances are also escalated on an annual basis to meet the cost of living. The Canada Pension Plan has also been escalated to meet the cost of living. The levels have been changed and further legislation is coming forward with respect to that in the near future.

I see the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) in the House. He has done a great job in changing the rates of veterans allowances and escalating payments to veterans in this country who served us so well in two world wars.

Pensions for civil servants and others have been escalated according to the real cost of living and the rates have been changed. That is a substantial step forward and an example to other levels of government that perhaps need an incentive.

The hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) spoke about income tax, and I agree with her that this is a very important question but look what has happened in the last year and a half. Income tax deductions for children have been escalated according to the cost of living and this year the exemptions have been increased to reflect that differential. That is an important step forward. In the budget brought forward in February of last year, everybody in this country enjoyed a substantial decrease in the amount of income tax payable through a reduction in rates. Those in the lower income level benefitted very substantially in comparison to those on higher incomes and that is important as a social principle.

I would simply say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members should look carefully at the action we have taken as a government in relation to inflation in this country. Considering the measures brought in to offset the effects of inflation which is largely international and partly domestic, it must be concluded that we have done a great deal—indeed, more than any other country in the world. The policies we have brought forward must surely demand the respect and support of all hon. members today as they did when they were brought forward in this House and supported by them.

It may be said that there is more to be done and that is what the minister has been saying since he took office and what his predecessors said. There is always a lot to be done but this government is committed to doing more than talking about it; it is committed to implementing policies and programs which will better serve the people of this country.

[Mr. Cafik.]

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, it can be said that successive Liberal cabinet ministers are not more of the same. As to the last one, because he may have gone a little too far, he was sent to the Department of Labour.

This contradictory attitude at this time bears witness to tne inconsistencies of this Liberal federal administration.

In fact, the then Minister of National Health and Welfare who is now Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) made the following statement in his 1970 White Paper, and I quote:

This section provides the main thrust of the government's proposed policy for the coming years, which include:

First, the development of the guaranteed income technique—

He was all for it. How lucky Canadians were in those days!

—as a major anti-poverty policy.

● (1650)

Considering that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has stated his opposition to a guaranteed minimum annual income, this constitutes a glaring contradiction of his predecessor's policy. Indeed, in the Ottawa newspaper Le Droit of November 21, 1973, one can read and I quote:

LALONDE AGAINST A GUARANTEED INCOME

The federal Minister of Health and Welfare, Mr. Marc Lalonde, is against the principle of a guaranteed income. In his opinion, a guaranteed income program will enable Canadians to choose between work and leisure and such a situation will not fit in with the system of values of the great majority of Canadians. Mr. Lalonde, who was talking Tuesday in Montreal to the Association canadienne d'études fiscales, has pointed out on the other hand that one of the great challenges to those responsible for the Canadian social security was the task of finding new employment opportunities for the unemployed.

This is not new. We have been hearing that song for 50 years.

It is also important, he added, to find a way to increase the incomes of those whose salary is below a decent minimum level.

Finally, we must, according to him, find the means to set up new programs without causing social, financial or economical disruption.

There is nothing to fear on that account. I think a lot of water will flow under the bridge before the Minister of National Health and Welfare causes social disruption.

In Drummondville, there are many welfare recipients and unemployed. It is true that there were always two ministers in that constituency, and you will notice that the ones we have now are not most reliable. Therefore, in my Drummondville office, I have the opportunity to meet welfare recipients and unemployed every weekend. I wish to point out here another inconsistency. This is not a criticism, but the minister represents one of the wealthiest constituencies in Canada, that of Outremont. I do not think he often sees welfare recipients. I believe there is something wrong here, I cannot see how a man who is unaware of this problem and who represents one of the wealthiest constituencies in Canada can look after underprivileged people. At all events, he must be much less sensitized to the problem. He may claim perhaps that he has already taken action as regards the Manitoba experiment.

On February 22 last, the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced that the federal government would finance 75 per cent of a guaranteed income program that will be tried in Manitoba. The project is called Mincome Manitoba. It was two years in preparation. Twenty five thousand samplings—one can imagine the number of public servants working on that—were taken in various municipalities before the program could be implemented. The experiment, that will last three years, will involve 2,500 families only. The Social Credit Party of Canada particularly regrets that those figures show that the government has no intention of setting up a guaranteed annual income scheme until the results of this experiment in Manitoba have been compiled and analyzed. This will take at least three to four years. If such is the case, the government will only use its financial involvement in Mincome Manitoba as a pretext to shirk its immediate responsibilities.

There is no need for studies or surveys to know that poverty and financial insecurity are major problems of Canada. In addition, this program which will involve only 2,500 families in a single province cannot surely alleviate the poverty problem which will require much more important measures. The government is simply throwing a smoke screen in order to conceal to the Canadian people its inability to cope with the problems of poverty. Mincome Manitoba will surely provide a wealth of information for planners and sociologists, but the program will provide no solution whatsoever to the problems of people who are really in need. There are many serious weaknesses in the program that was tried out in Manitoba, but the most important one is that this experiment is so limited as regards the number of people affected as compared to the number of people who really are in great need, that this experience as a whole is laughable.

Of course, Social Crediters are not the only ones to call for a guaranteed income. There is even a Liberal—imagine that—Senator David Croll who says, and I quote:

We have promoted unemployment . . .

The senator's comments are quite serious.

We have promoted unemployment and made it attractive.

Considering that during the past few years our country was governed mainly by the Liberal party, one may conclude that unemployment was promoted by them. I see that it is a Liberal who says so, in Le Jour of March 14, 1974, and I quote:

The former Chairman of the Senate Committee on Poverty, Senator David Croll, an Ontarian with Liberal views, . . . strongly denounced the minimum wage rates that are awfully low in several parts of this country.

We have promoted unemployment and made it attractive, Senator Croll asserted, throwing away the old story according to which an increase in minimum wage rates will signal the end of some industries. Very seldom have periodic increases in minimum wages reduced the number of jobs, he stated.

Mr. Croll called on the government to develop a guaranteed annual income program for every Canadian, a goal which is now within political and social range.

Such a program could pull the disadvantaged out of poverty and avoid prejudices suffered by families and the labour force as a result of the present welfare program.

According to Mr. Croll, minimum wage rates are inadequate and measly in many parts of this country.

Then, Mr. Speaker, Liberal members will have to come to an agreement one of these days, because we are going to think that we are right.

The report of the Senate Special Committee on Poverty says, among others things, on page 106, and I quote:

The poor are often handicapped with respect to purchasing power by lack of education, experience, information, training and opportunity as well as by lack of ready cash.

The Social Crediters are not the only ones to say so.

"Best-buy" decisions depend not only on information about quality and performance, but also on a comparison of prices in different kinds of stores in different locations. To get this information takes time, effort, and money. Because of transportation expenses or credit difficulties, the poor cannot shop around. As a result, they shop in small neighbourhood stores where prices are higher, and selection is limited—but where delivery service and credit are available.

● (1700)

Among the poor, one typical example is that of senior citizens who cannot afford motor transportation. walk very far or carry heavy things. They really have no choice. Here is how a representative of the Conseil des œuvres catholiques described their terrible situation:

When I speak of very poor people, I mean those living in an apartment building where, for instance, they share their soup with an immediate neighbour. They are the ones who try to meet their needs with a very limited income, who are not entitled to social welfare but only have a very low income or pension. They live on toasts and tea and find it most difficult to provide for their own needs.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to poverty, Canada also has an ever increasing public debt. In 1955, it amounted to $17,951 millions and in 1973 to $51,717 millions, having trebled in less than 20 years.

Provinces and municipalities are also overburdened with debts. For 1973, their debts amounted to $8 billion approximately with yearly interests of $452 million. Provincial debts amounted to $17 billion, with yearly interests of approximately $566,185,000. The Federal debt, to give the example, as usual, amounted to $51,717,700,000 and interests to be paid within the next fiscal year will be approximately $3 billion.

The increasing public debt shows beyond all doubt that our governments at all levels: municipal, provincial and federal, are unable to meet their obligations and must go into debt.

A guaranteed income paid out of taxes would not in any way help to improve the national and individual financial position. The guaranteed annual income must be paid out through new credits in order to increase the buying power. That is the only possible solution to the permanent shortage of buying power. What about the consumer debt. We know that for lack of purchasing power, Canadians have to go steadily into debt, and they are given all the facilities. There are credit cards in all consumer sectors and they are widely advertised. Loans are granted by banks, lending institutions and finance companies, and as a result of the extensive advertising of all products in the stores, people run into debt, because they lack the necessary purchasing power to meet their commitments. But the purchasing power should in fact be compared to the power of production. Thus, in the past ten or 12 years, we have witnessed a tremendous development. In 1962, Canadians were indebted to the tune of $4,200 million.

In 1967, this amount had increased to $6.7 billion. In 1971, the debts of Canadians amounted to $11.7 billion, and as of December 31, 1973, the consumer debt had reached $17,694 million.

The enormous accumulation of the private debt shows without any doubt the chronic lack of purchasing power of the consumer who must run into debt in order to buy the food products he needs.

The Social Creditors are not the only ones to stress this fact. During a conference in 1966, a world famous economist, Professor John Kenneth Galbraith, warned that the present industrial system, and I quote:

> ... cannot ensure that the purchasing power in the economy will be equal or even approximately equal to the products that can be manufactured through present industrial methods.

A universal guaranteed annual income paid with new credits would contribute to increase the purchasing power of the people and bring it to the level of production. Instead of mortgaging their future incomes, people would be able to purchase with today's money the products that they need today, thus checking the staggering rise in the consumer debt, which has quadrupled in less than 10 years.

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58 IS SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF A MINIMUM ANNUAL GUARANTEED INCOME PROGRAM

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Matte (Champlain).

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take this opportunity to discuss the motion proposed by the Social Credit Party of Canada, which reads as follows:

> That this House regrets that the government has taken no concrete steps to ensure the establishment of a guaranteed minimum annual income to overcome poverty in Canada and enable each Canadian citizen to cope with problems of rising prices and to fight inflation efficiently.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the problems facing us every day not only in the province of Quebec but throughout the country can never be overemphasized. We know it full well, right after a fantastic congress where we had the opportunity to listen to the representatives of about 2,000 delegates who came to explain those general problems—

Mr. Lefebvre: Were you there last year?

Mr. La Salle: No, Mr. Speaker, I was not there last year but I was very interested to know the views of citizens from all parts of the country.

My friends opposite understand very well what I mean. The views expressed today have convinced us that the problems set forth by the Social Credit Party of Canada affect the whole country.

For those reasons, it is obvious that the motion before us is surely worth discussing, and I hope that after hearing our repeated remarks in this House, the government will understand that those problems are serious. I think it has already been realized that they are serious and that the words will be followed by concrete action.

● (1710)

A few minutes ago, the program of welfare allowances was said to be acceptable to the government.

Mr. Speaker, I think the government has presented many measures. In view of the increase in the cost of living and the difficulties we face, we must admit that the government, even if it has made efforts and come up with some improvements, has provided for increases in some programs. Even if the increase in the cost of living has been much more rapid than the rise in benefits, I am very happy to say that, however inadequate, improvements have been made. Repeating that the government has taken no action is not fair, but it is not fair either to say it has taken concrete action.

The motion now before us allows us to remind the government that its measures are insufficient.

The unemployment insurance program was mentioned earlier. The provision of an annual guaranteed income could alleviate the difficulties we are now having with the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the frequent embarrassment of the recipients. If the guaranteed minimum income program were adopted, there could be tremendous advantages and changes for the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to take this opportunity to deal with a subject dear to me, the eligibility for old age security at 60 years of age. I think it can be discussed in the debate on the motion now before us, since it concerns a form of annual income for 65 year old people.

Yesterday, I learned that an NDP member had spoken of the importance of that measure.

With regard to the guaranteed annual income, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in reply to the responsible minister, said that all categories of citizens should be helped. I agree with the minister that all groups of citizens should be helped, but if we can give even more help to those of 60, to my mind we could also help the young people indirectly. If legislation to that effect were introduced, that is to grant the old age security pension at 60, it should first of all be voluntary.

We know full well that in the case of thousands of individuals, work becomes a hardship at 60. That measure could be passed at the same time as voluntary old age security pensions at 60. This would help thousands of people and would simultaneously open extraordinary job opportunities for the young.

At the present time, our social legislation often encourages some citizens to take advantage of them instead of trying harder to get jobs. The rate of unemployment has remained quite steady in the last five or six years, but we also know that it is difficult for the young to find a full-time job.

We would then have found a formula to allow people of 60 and over to rest, to take well deserved holidays, if they so chose, because it seems that a good number of them still wish to work.

And I feel it is our responsibility to leave them this freedom. On the other hand, we are also aware that thousands of people would benefit from such an old age security scheme. In this repect, we could consider the possibility of paying more in Old Age Security Pension than we are doing at present.

I know that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) stated yesterday, in reply to the CLC, that granting the Old Age Security pension at age 60 could cost as much as $400,000,000.

Mr. Lalonde: It would cost as much as $1.2 billion.

Mr. La Salle: $1.2 billion. This policy would cost over one billion, according to the figures quoted by the minister.

Now, I should like him to tell us just how much we are paying for everything connected with social welfare, for our 500,000 unemployed, how much Canadians are paying for all that, for they are the ones who must foot the bill.

If we decide to reduce appreciably the unemployment rate, it is clear that this money could easily be earmarked for old age security. I feel that any worker would be quite willing to have his taxes earmarked for old age security enabling him to take advantage of that policy rather than to have a large percentage of his taxes used solely to pay unemployment insurance or social welfare.

I think that it would be advisable to ask for an assessment of the costs of our social services, because we could, by paying the old age pension at 60, considerably reduce the unemployment rate.

Such a policy would surely contribute to the improvement of the social climate. We know perfectly well that 60-year old people would be quite happy if they were sure of getting an adequate income in their old age. There would surely not be revolutionists and we must understand that the young people who do not have adequate opportunities on the labour market are liable to criticize and to rebel against the State which does not seem to assume its responsibilities.

I think it would be to our advantage to study this legislation as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, we are speaking about a guaranteed annual income. As stated earlier by the member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), the State must supply a guaranteed income to its citizens. If the State has obligations towards individuals I think that from the day they are born individuals also have obligations. It is no exaggeration to say that we are at least obliged to work and do something for the country. it is our responsibility to build our country and to work to the benefit of all Canadians.

It is important that the government should have repeated meetings with associations, organizations, unions, businessmen to impress upon them that if they keep on making windfall benefits they will jeopardize their future and that of the whole society. It would be useful for the government to impress upon the investors or upon big business in general that they really ought to do much more than now for people living below the poverty live. And no matter how often we are reminded that ours is a rich country with enormous natural resources, it is quite dangerous to reach an untenable situation to the extent that individuals do not get an adequate minimum income.

And if we consider, for example, the concern of mothers and fathers or of society in general about the increase in the cost of living we find that as regards food, clothing, and essential services those increases have been extremely high. Then, how about introducing legislation? In the Speech from the Throne they led us to believe that they were going to deal with some of the increases. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) made this statement recently about the increase in food prices, and I quote: "I think we have every reason to have some hopes, to be optimistic".

I think this is not enough, Mr. Speaker, and for that very reason I urge the government to introduce positive measures which will meet very specifically the present needs and which could remove the uneasiness now being felt.

Mr. Speaker, all the hon. members are aware of the deep concern of the Canadian people. How often, in our constituencies, have we not been told this, for instance: "What is going to happen, with this increase in the cost of living, with inflation and all the big problems we are now facing? Anyone who has seen his heating oil costs doubled, anyone who has to buy gas these days, cannot help having the government in mind once in a while.

Mr. Speaker, I think that we cannot go on like this, being told on paper that we will introduce amendments or legislation which will solve these problems. The government must therefore act quickly. Some of the government proposals should not be rejected. On this side of the House, a price freeze was advocated and the government finds justification in saying that this was tried in the United States or somewhere else and that it did not bring the expected results. However, the government is providing evidence that they do not have the answers to the present problems and, therefore, if the price freeze is not an effective measure then just let them give us the solution which will be. But one thing is sure, that is for the past four or five years if opposition parties could not convince the government of the timeliness of their suggestions, the government nevertheless showed that it did not have the solution. How long will Canadians have to wait, and how long will they have to endure the malaises they now know? We have the responsibility to multiply our representations, our interventions in this House, to ask the government to act in a concrete way.

So favouring one category of people—those at age 60—would also bring about improvements in job opportunities for young people. And I think our social climate would have been corrected and improved.

There is talk about a guaranteed annual income. It is extremely important that each individual have a minimum to live on and even then I would want to make sure when we talk about implementing a guaranteed annual minimum income, for example, that we do not encourage people at the outset to be satisfied with a guaranteed income and reduce their efforts with respect to the work they nevertheless have an obligation to do for their country and fellow citizens. Of course, incentive formulas will have to be introduced to ensure that minimum annual income. There are also incentive programs for jobs and work openings, and it is up to the government in co-operation with organizations I referred to earlier, with businessmen, to create jobs for the young and adults. We have that responsibility. The first responsibility is to try as soon as possible to give a well deserved holiday to a certain category of people, which would indeed make room for younger people. Then we will have done something concrete to meet, I am convinced, the wishes of the people of this country. With regard to the motion under consideration, I am not ashamed to admit that it is with pleasure that I congratulate the Social Credit Party of Canada for having brought in a proposal to enable many hon. members to discuss this question and for reminding the government of its responsibilities. To what extent is the government going to reply positively and quickly to comments made in the House? I do not know. I do hope that it will feel compelled to do so. Once again, I hope that there will be other contributions and that similar motions will be brought in as often as the government will keep on turning a deaf ear to the needs, to the problems facing us every day.

Mr. Speaker, these few comments were made in the hope of bringing Canadians improved conditions and a satisfactory stability, and of receiving an affirmative reply from the government. We hope our interventions will not be forgotten, will not have fallen on deaf ears and that Canadians will be able to benefit from the contributions and the suggestions made. They have been waiting for a long time.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, when one examines attentively the motion presented by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), one realizes from the start that it is a non-confidence motion against the government. One realizes also that this motion blames the government for two separate reasons. First, it blames the government for having taken, according to the Social Credit, no concrete steps to ensure the establishment of a guaranteed minimum income plan, to overcome poverty in Canada. This motion also accuses the government of having done nothing to fight inflation efficiently. It is on this second point of the motion that I should like to dwell, as my colleague the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik), Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, stated a while ago, in a brilliant way, I think, the reasons why the Canadian government so far did not think it wise to establish a guaranteed minimum income plan.

As for me, I do not agree at all that the government did not do anything to fight inflation efficiently, as it is said in the motion proposed by the hon. member for Champlain, which would have us believe, if we read it attentively, that a guaranteed minimum income could be used to fight inflation. And I do not agree at all on that.

I am not sure at all that a guaranteed income program could be used to fight inflation. On the contrary, I believe that putting more money in circulation and increasing the money supply available to the Canadian people would only increase the demand for products and, should that demand come at a time when there is no mechanism to provide for an equivalent supply, inflation would be still more serious. Making millions of dollars available to the Canadian people through the establishment of a guaranteed income plan could eventually worsen inflation. And it is on that point that I disagree entirely with the hon. member for Champlain, who maintains, according to his motion, that a guaranteed minimum income could fight inflation.

Moreover, I believe it would be a false principle to give money to all Canadians through a guaranteed minimum income, while inflation does not affect everybody. And I should like to insist on that point a few minutes and repeat what was already said in this House, namely that the average Canadian benefits from the simultaneous increase in prices and incomes.

I wish to quote here the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) who, speaking in the House on March 5, said that last year the real per capita personal income of Canadians, which is the income left to each person to spend or save after paying taxes and allowing for the inflation rate, has increased by 6.8 per cent. This means that income has increased more rapidly than the cost of living. This recent rise follows the already exceptional increases of 5.9 per cent and 6.7 per cent recorded in 1971 and 1972 respectively.

The minister went on to say that last year's strong increase in personal income was the result of various factors, notably an unprecedented increase in the number of Canadians productively employed, a substantial growth in farm income, the reduction in personal income tax provided for in the budget and equal to 12 or 13 per cent, the raising of social benefits, especially of old age security pensions, of family allowances and of other social security benefits.

● (1730)

The minister continued to say that this 6.8 per cent increase in the real disposable personal income per capita last year in Canada was one and a half higher than that of the United States. Since 1970, the average real disposable income of Canadians has gone up by 21 per cent, that is almost twice more than that of the American people.

This means that inflation does not affect everybody. Inflation does affect a few citizens, particularly those on fixed incomes. So I cannot agree with the motion of the hon. member for Champlain who claims that a guaranteed minimum income might help fight inflation. On the contrary, I feel that if the government acted in this way, it would put money in the hands of those citizens who do not need it and who already benefit from simultaneous increases in prices and incomes.

Finally, I would like to answer more directly the charge in this motion, which states that the government did not do anything to fight inflation efficiently. On the contrary, in the past, that is in 1973, the government took many steps to deal with inflation. And even more important, Mr. Speaker, the government intends to take more steps this year. The Speech from the Throne that was delivered at the opening of this session showed that the government was going to make all efforts possible this year to fight inflation.

What are the government's plans for 1974 as regards inflation? First let us recall—and it is a wellknown fact—that the government is concerned by the inflation problem, and that it does not think necessary to resort to an overall control system. The government recognizes that our economy is resting for a large part on our trading relationship with other countries. That is why inflation that developed in the whole world as a result of certain phenomena is affecting us as well.

However, the government fully recognizes that there are in Canada different means to deal with inflation, and these means are much more effective than the guaranteed minimum income referred to in the motion.

The government programs designed to fight inflation are actually divided into three separate parts. First, in the speech from the throne, we mentioned projects aimed at protecting the individuals, mainly those on fixed or low income. We are also proposing measures intended to prevent price increases in specific areas. We also intend, and this is very important, to deal with shortage-creating problems by encouraging supply, that is to say by stimulating production. The government prefers such a system which, besides, has been used over the last few months, namely selective measures applied in different ways and at different times as the occasion warrants to selected goods and services.

This makes for a flexible and appropriate system in a society seeking to control change in the most effective manner. Lately, the government has applied such selective measures to which I will come later. However, we will not hesitate to resort to additional deflationary measures if required. And as previously stated in this House by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), we will not hesitate to go after the "big guys" in the market place to protect the Canadian consumer.

One of the cornerstones of the counter-inflationary program we will launch in 1974 as a follow-up to those we have initiated last year is production stimulation, particularly of foodstuffs. Since food is one of the major factors in the price index in Canada and that the food shortage in the rest of the world as in Canada is one of the major inflation factors, the government set forth recently in the speech from the throne a food policy which will urge Canadian producers to produce more so as to check rising prices. Of course, this is a medium and a long-term method, but the government also took some immediate measures.

I should like to deal in particular with some measures that the government implemented last year and which are still being applied, in order to show clearly that the blame put on the government by this motion is quite unfounded.

Last year, the government first set up a committee which was instructed to investigate food prices and which the House approved on January 23, 1973. Later on, the government created a Food Prices Review Board, which actually replaced a House committee.

I should like to emphasize the much more specific and selective measures which are included in our counter-inflationary program and which the government implemented last year in order to check the rise in prices of certain goods, particularly food products.

In the meat business, in August 1973 the government imposed export restrictions on beef and hog. That resulted in a widespread ban on Canadian meat sales on the U.S. market where prices were higher because of reduced production brought about by controlled prices and salaries. That initiative stopped meat prices in Canada from going up for a while.

With milk which is another basic commodity, the government announced last September that it would be subsidizing powdered milk at a rate of 20 cents a pound which resulted in a price drop of 14.3 per cent. It also announced a 5 cent subsidy on liquid milk which prevented or at least slowed down subsequent price increases. Of course, that plan is still in force.

With bread also in September the government set up a two-price system for flour which resulted in Canadian bakers receiving a subsidy which slowed down a price increase.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, Canadians have difficulty recognizing the result of steps to prevent prices from rising. Prices are high and people are not satisfied. If we pass a measure which would reduce the price of a commodity, people could understand right away and feel that we curbed inflation.

But people are having difficulty realizing the effectiveness of steps such as those I just mentioned and which prevented milk prices from increasing because if the price of bread does not go up for six months, people find that normal. However, people often forget that it is because of steps taken by this government that the price of commodities such as bread, milk and meat, increased in a more moderate way or did not go up at all recently.

Let us now turn to what the government did to check the increase in the cost of oil products.

At the end of last year, the government asked oil producers in Canada to freeze their prices voluntarily as of September. So, in the part of the country that lies west of the Ottawa Valley, the price remained about $4 a barrel while the price of crude oil on the world market reached more than $10 a barrel.

The government is now negotiating with the provinces to set for all of Canada a standard price that would be lower than the present world price. Besides, the government took other budgetary and economic measures, such as amendments to the Income Tax Act. The government took many other steps against inflation and I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Champlain contend that we had not done anything to fight inflation.

May I remind that among other measures, the government indexed personal income tax on the cost of living. As will be recalled, the government enacted legislation under which the income tax deductions of individuals will increase according to the rise in the cost of living index. Such a measure will result in annual tax reduction to the extent of price increases. The net result is, for this year alone, that 175,000 Canadian taxpayers will have no income tax to pay while all the others will pay less.

Still on the subject of income tax, the government announced that it will reduce the basic rate of taxation between 10 and 21 per cent, according to the taxpayer's income. For instance, a single taxpayer whose income bracket is between $5,000 and $8,000, will have a tax reduction of between 10 to 20 per cent. Therefore, every Canadian taxpayer will save at least $100 for the 1973 fiscal year. A couple whose annual income bracket is between $7,000 and $10,000 will see its income tax reduced between 11 and 21 per cent.

These measures have even been suggested to us by some members from other parties. That is why it is surprising to see that when the government adopts measures such as those I just mentioned, we are charged with doing nothing to stop the price increases.

But we have done even more, we have eliminated the sales tax on certain consumer products to counter the effects of inflation. Amongts those products are soft drinks, sweets, fruit juices, which are totally free from federal sales tax. Children's clothes are no more subjected to any tax, there will not be any excise tax on tooth paste, shaving lather and other cosmetics. Custom tarrifs have been reduced for numerous kinds of imported fruit, a measure that should bring a reduction of consumer prices for these food stuffs which are not normally produced in Canada.

To fight inflation, we have taken many other measures that are certainly more efficient than the establishment of a guaranteed minimum income. For example, the Canada Pension Plan has been changed in order to increase the maximum annual pensionable earnings and the benefits to meet the rise in the cost of living.

As you know, there has been a substantial increase in family allowances, in order to compensate the beneficiaries for the rise in the cost of living.

Changes have also been brought, for the same reason, to the veterans allowances, to the old age security pension plan and to the guaranteed income supplement.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think I have definitely proven, as I mentioned in the beginning of my speech, that this year's government programs are particularly aimed at fighting inflation. I believe I have proved as well that the government will live up to the promises it made in the Speech from the Throne.

The best way of knowing what the government will do with regard to this problem is to consider what it did in the past. The measures I have just mentioned and which were implemented by the government in 1973 to fight inflation are the best guarantee Canadian citizens could possibly have of the efficiency with which we will tackle this inflation in the year to come.

Mr. Speaker, I completely reject the claims of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) when he says we do not fight inflation. On the contrary, I say that of all the governments of industrialized countries, the Canadian government is the one that has set up the most complete the most diversified, arsenal, that has taken the wisest decisions in the fight against increasing prices, problem which concerns the government and which is doubtless one of the most severe Canadians have to face at this time. I would like to add that the measures promised by the government in the Speech from the Throne will be implemented, that others will be brought forward, and that Canadians can rest assured that even if prices rise, which is happening in every country in the world, the Canadian government intends to solve this problem which is considered to be the most important one facing our country.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the two ideas which were put together in the motion of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), and particularly in his explanation of the first portion which is related to the guaranteed minimum annual income. For many years I have listened to members of the Social Credit Party discussing their idea of a dividend. I have heard their leader explaining this matter many times on television, but I have never heard anybody come as close to Karl Marx's theory as did the hon. member for Champlain this afternoon when he said "each to his need according to his ability".

Then the hon. member added something that I found very interesting, something that in fact the Liberal government has been doing for a long time. He went on to say that we would mortgage the future if we issued money; and never mind what happens, all of this would eventually be related to our ability to increase the gross national product. Is that not exactly what the Liberal government has been doing for years? Whenever they need more money, they print it and put it down to the national debt. In fact, when we had too much money kicking around it was taken out of our debt. So the bookkeeping has been carried out pretty well in the way in which the hon. member for Champlain outlined it. However, I am not sure I am sufficiently socialistic to accept the full Karl Marx theory "to each his need according to his ability". I have always felt that was a little too generous and too cosmopolitan.

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): You should read the speech.

Mr. Peters: I agree with the hon. member who said I should read the speech, because it may not read that way; but that was the impression I had as I listened to it. I listened to it very carefully because I have been interested in this idea of a guaranteed minimum income. I think we have reached the stage in this country at which we have almost as many civil servants as we have workers. Probably we have as many people living off the backs of the workers as there are workers themselves. This is an odd situation.

It is interesting to note that we now pay a single, old age pensioner a GIS of almost $2,000 a year. When he reaches the age of 65 he is eligible for that sum of money. If he is married, in many circumstances he can almost double that amount provided his wife is the same age as him. If he is married to a younger woman, they must survive on his GIS because the Liberal government believes in the theory that two can live as cheaply as one. This sounds like an advertisement of a matrimonial bureau. However, I have found that it is not possible for two to live as cheaply as one. It is a myth that Hollywood propagated many years ago and that most people have debunked. There is obviously a necessity to take into consideration the problem of younger wives and their total dependence on their husbands for a living, particularly when they have to survive on the $2,000 that they are getting.

Over the years I have been involved in both municipal and provincial politics, not by design but by necessity. People bring to me their problems, as they do to all members of parliament, and one has to learn something about the proliferating programs, particularly at the provincial level. This afternoon we listened to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Cafik) in rare form outlining the orange document that was put out recently respecting the government's program. He said that this is the kind of program Ontario would accept. If this is so, then any member of the Liberal Party who considers himself to be a Liberal should look at himself in the mirror. The programs outlined in the orange booklet to which the parliamentary secretary referred today are typically Conservative and we find that the Conservatives are not only sitting on one side of the House. A true Conservative, according to a definition I heard many years ago, is a man who fights all his life to protect those things that his father fought all his life to prevent. How many Liberal members who are still in this House have stood up and said, "We cannot have a medicare plan; it is impossible" and "We cannot have a universal old age pension plan; it would cost too much"? I well remember the time when it was raised from $50 to $56 and then to $60.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It was $55, $65, $75.

Mr. Peters: My colleague knows all the grim details. There have been many machinations. Whenever we proposed an increase, Liberal members would say, "we must keep it at the present level because the country cannot afford any more". Then we find them doing what the Créditiste member suggested this afternoon, or we find that an election comes up and suddenly we can afford the increase.

I suggest that we must consider a guaranteed minimum annual income. I was not surprised when Ontario turned down a program to see what would be the effects of a guaranteed annual income in one of the communities in the province. I am sure that most civil servants in Ontario would be violently opposed to such a program being implemented and that it would scare the pants off many of them to even consider it. We have people looking after children's aid, the mother's and father's allowance, the dependant father's allowance, disability pensions, windows' pensions, guaranteed income supplements, compensation and family allowances. Sometimes there are five or six different people coming into one household telling the family how to make ends meet.

There is a great proliferation of such programs and if we were smart we would put them all into a guaranteed minimum annual income. I understand from the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) that under such a program a single person in British Columbia receives almost $2,600. We have people in Ontario who are working at the minimum wage and trying to keep a family on $4,000 a year. They do not have their hospital expenses paid. They do not have all the other advantages which accrue to elderly persons in British Columbia or Ontario. Out of that $4,000 they must pay income tax, they must pay their medical plan contributions, their Canada Pension Plan contributions and all the other payments that are deducted from one's income. They end up probably earning less than the $3,000 a year which has been suggested is the poverty line.

● (1750)

I have here a letter that I would like to read. It underlines some of the problems involved. It is from a man who offered to help a person who was in financial trouble. He started to look after this person's books. He discovered that the person's wife had died and a number of bills had to be paid. The individual involved has a daughter who is now 18 years of age. He was trying to figure out this man's income tax. The man earned $6,707.55 and had already paid $659.83 in income tax. The income tax people wanted an additional $359.67. That was the problem. He decided to put this man and his daughter on a budget. The budget for two people per week includes $25 for food, $10 utilities, $2 clothing, $4 miscellaneous, $3 savings account and $25 rent. In addition, there are three loans outstanding—to Household Finance, Beneficial Finance and the Imperial Bank of Commerce, and $25 a week is being paid on those three loans. This man has a car on which he pays $8 a week. His car needs substantial repairs—it is a 1964 Chev—but it is doubtful if it can be repaired. The budget allows this man $3 a week spending money. That totals $105 a week, and there is no money available to pay the $300 owed in income tax.

There is nothing extravagant in this budget. As a matter of fact, I do not know how you can feed two people on $25 a week and I do not know where you can get accommodation for $25 a week. But this man who was working every day, making $6,700 a year and paying over $1,000 in income tax, cannot make a deduction for his daughter because she made $175 over the amount she is allowed to make while working after school in an IGA store. It is not only those on disability pension and other types of pension whom we must consider. We have a large number of working poor in this country. This leads me to the second part of the motion.

Despite what the previous speaker said, we have not done anything about the high cost of living. Yesterday I heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) quote statistics to the Canada Labour Congress showing that everything looked fine and employment was increasing. He pointed out that more people were employed in Canada than ever before, that our standard of living was rising and that everything was rosy. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, it is not rosy for a very large number of people; it is not rosy for those who cannot afford the bare necessities of life at present-day prices. The hon. member mentioned a number of things that had been done with respect to such items as oil, bread, milk and beef. Surely the Liberal Party is not going to take any credit for that, because that was the price the NDP extracted for supporting the government.

Let me add that even we may have thought those programs out poorly, because they were only a bargaining position. But again let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, they were really terrible programs when put into effect by the government because it did not have any rationale for putting them into effect. Even yet the government has not started to sit down to try to rationalize rising costs and their impact upon persons who are least able to afford them.

I think it is true to say that Mrs. Plumptre should go, and I would add that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray), should also go because he is of absolutely no value. Really, we have not done anything in this House about the cost of living; we have not done anything about putting controls on food prices; we have not done anything about restrictive trade practices. It is interesting to note that recently seven cement companies in British Columbia were charged under the Combines Investigation Act. What did we do with those companies, Mr. Speaker? We fined them $500,000. But how much money did they make? They probably made $100 million from the illegal practices in which they were engaged.

I suggest that if the Nielson company raises the price of chocolate bars today, then tomorrow all other chocolate companies will raise their prices because they all operate as a combine. Really, Mr. Speaker, there is no longer anyone in the Conservative Party who favours competition. In fact we do not have competition in this country. We have made all kinds of tax concessions to corporations, so that in effect we have eliminated the possibility of competition.

When one bread company raises the price of bread, all bread companies raise their price. I can give one example of a case raised by one of my constituents who pointed out that a specific commodity was 50 cents higher in one store than in another store in the same community. What was the result? The Department of Consumer Affairs drew this to the attention of Mike's supermarket, which then reduced the price by 50 cents. But, Mr. Speaker, that price is still 30 cents higher than in many of the chain stores in Toronto. Incidentally, this information comes from the Department of Consumer Affairs.

We really have not decided to do anything about that problem. We have not decided to cut out gouging. We have not decided to put in competition. Think what would happen if we considered buying into the food industry in the way we have in other fields. Suppose we went to one of the major chains and said, "Now you are operating a chain store and a wholesale business for us and you will supply 15 basic food commodities at a price we will set which will be reasonable for all those on low, fixed incomes. You can do whatever you like with the other commodities you sell, raise their prices as high as you like, make what profit you like on them and that profit will pay for the 15 basic commodities." That might be one way to reduce prices. But it is not what we did with bread, because the consumer did not achieve any saving on bread and the producer did not get anything out of it. In fact, he was asked to subsidize bread by $1.50 a bushel. Without any direct subsidies, the price of bread has increased.

The story was different with milk because there was strict marketing legislation in effect, as a result of which the price of milk reflected the 5 cents that the federal government gave to the provincial governments. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) could not stabilize the price of beef on the same basis. In fact, I think he said quite clearly that he could do nothing more than he had done under the circumstances, because the producers will not get together and enter into an arrangement that would allow orderly marketing so that a subsidy could be provided to keep the producers in business.

Mr. Speaker, I point out that if the producers go out of business, then the price of beef will automatically go up. If such an arrangement were in effect, the minister would be able to subsidize the consumer at the same time so that the price he paid would be fair and he would not be gouged by the middleman and others out to make a profit.

I would like to see a vote on this motion. I would like to know whether the Liberal government is interested in doing something about the cost of living in a meaningful way, and at the same time maintain a guaranteed income for those at the bottom of the income scale.

An hon. Member: Then let's have a vote.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member raises a good question. We will have many opportunities to vote. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that so far as I am concerned if the government pretty soon does not start to do something fundamental about some of the problems, it will not get my support. But I hasten to add, having listened to the Conservatives and the alternatives they have put forward, that I think they are less entitled to my support than the government, considering the fiddling around they have been doing with a very serious problem.

May I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I gather that two minutes extra were allocated to the hon. member, and therefore he has finished his speech. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I heard with interest some speeches delivered this afternoon and I find it rather strange once again that some members are more interested in playing politics than in really looking for proper solutions to the problems now existing in Canada.

The Social Credit Party of Canada recognizes as the basic principle of its philosophy that the human being is the most important being in the world and that indeed no community could exist without the individual. In order to recognize effectively that importance of the individual, we must organize our society so as to respect any individual whoever he may be.

Now, in a modern society, in order to recognize the importance of the individual, we have to recognize his needs and his right to satisfy those needs.

I think that you will all agree with me that the individual is better qualified to know his own needs as he is better qualified to decide how they can be satisfied.

But if our society is to meet each individual's needs, it must be structured so as to allow the individual to make a choice while preserving his freedom; in other words, he must be assured of his security with freedom and not without it. Let me give you an example; I give security to my dog, in feeding it, in giving it care and shelter, but without freedom, for I am the one who decides when and what it will eat, and if I decide it will stay outdoors, it is my decision, not the dog's decision.

But, Mr. Speaker, I still can say the dog enjoys security, but I repeat that this is not the type of security we ought to give people.

We must give the individual security with freedom. That is what is really difficult.

This government and previous ones have certainly attempted on several occasions to guarantee some security to the individuals but, every time, they applied controls thus deciding for the individual and restricting his freedom. There is plenty of evidence to support this. With one hand, they give the individual some degree of security but with the other, they put a collar around his neck. Every government acts like a trainer with his animal: with one hand, he gives it what it likes, what it wants, and with the other, he puts a collar around its neck in order to direct it, to oblige it to do what he wants. I am sure that once more the animal has some security, but no freedom. The only way we can really be sure that the individual's needs will be met is to go back to the means of exchange between the needs and the production of goods necessary to meet these needs.

The most common means is still money. Within 50 years or even 100 years, we might have developed some other means of exchange. We might go back to the barter system, which is the exchange of one commodity for another. But in one way or another, today, the most common means is still the use of money. It is therefore necessary to provide individuals with the means to meet his needs through an existing production, that is a means of exchange, by providing him with the money he needs for this purpose.

The minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) may say that hospitals are not money. They are services designed to meet needs, and older people homes are services that are designed to satisfy needs. But the minister does not understand, and his colleagues even less, that these services are subject to some sort of freedom loss. Can the older citizen who goes to live in a home choose what services he will get inside? No, he cannot. What section he will live in? No. The older citizen is placed in a corner, and they say: society is taking care of him, it is taking care of his security. It may be so, but it also destroys or deprives him from his freedom, or part of it. And this is what happens whenever the government tries to meddle with the so-called social affairs.

We feel therefore that the solution to this problem would be to find a way for society to provide each individual with enough money to allow him a choice, enough money to satisfy his basic needs and help him make his own free choice. It remains for us to find the means whereby society can recognize the needs and fully satisfy the needs of everyone without penalizing some of them, as it is the case at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, the philosophy of this administration is based on the necessity to distribute the riches. We have heard government members mention in turn that distributing the riches meant taking away from those who have too much to give to those who have nothing. Any way, the potential of everybody is reduced so that we end up with a "gang" of "have-nots", while some of the wealth is in fewer hands. A society where wealth is shared is the just society we want. But what really goes on? Tax exemptions are granted to large companies. They are permitted to increase their price. What help for the little people! This is so in the case of sugar, iron and oil. This is probably how the government feel that lower income people should be helped. And what is more surprising still, the four most highly paid individuals in Canada do not even pay a cent of income tax a year. This is the "liberal" redistribution of wealth.

No doubt the minister of National Health and Welfare intends to talk again about higher family allowances and old age pensions, but he will not say that those alleged incomes are now taxable. Unemployment insurance benefits are taxable. Whatever they give with one hand they take it back with the other so that those who still have the strength or courage to work are penalized.

● (2010)

Last week, I asked a carpenter to come and make a few repairs in my home but after discussing with him we agreed that it was only a two-day's work. Then the guy made me easily understand that he was not interested in losing his unemployment insurance benefits to work two days at my place. He said that by working two days for me he would earn only $60 whereas he would be paid over $100 by the unemployment insurance and that in addition to that, if he made those repairs for me, he would lose his unemployment insurance benefits. He would be penalized. So he refused and rightly so. Why would he be foolish enough to lose $40 and be victimized by an incompetent Department of Manpower and Immigration? That man is right when he does not want to be penalized as is done by all the existing welfare programs.

We, in the Social Credit party, are trying to consider facts from a new angle, namely that all individuals should get help instead of penalizing some guy in order to help some other one faced with hardship.

Therefore I urge the minister to stop being so blind and to have a little more nerve and energy with regard to his approach to a review of the government administration of social programs. I take advantage of this opportunity to give the minister a few technical explanations about the philosophy behind the rights of the individuals.

In the third edition of his work entitled Warning Democracy published in 1935, Major C. H. Douglas wrote in connection with finance and industry, and I quote:

> If we consider the fact that the production of goods of all kinds, by unit of mechanized work employed, and if we also consider that this energy over the last 100 years increased from 3,000 to 4,000 per cent . . .

And I would say more than that today. I quote further:

> . . . three things can happen: either each and everyone must consume 30 or 40 times more than before and consume still more as energy makes possible increases in production; either we have to dispose, through export or otherwise, of our production surpluses; either we must admit that the so-called unemployment problem results from progress in applied research in industry and that we have to make drastic changes in the system of distribution.

We have precisely come to that point today, but in his analysis Major Douglas was lead to propose that distribution of income should be separate from employment, in other words, that income does not necessarily arise from a job, so as to provide each and everyone with a vital minimum.

In Quebec especially, this opinion of the Scottish engineer was really recognized only after sociologists and theologians made the population understand that nothing in this statement was contrary to the social doctrine of the Church.

Daniel-Rops and Jacques Maritain, two eminent Roman Catholic sociologists and philosophers, have set forth in convincing terms the philosophy of the minimum living wage, and this idea has gained a lot of followers.

Daniel-Rops wrote in Par delà notre nuit:

> The solution lies in the establishment of a minimum living wage to which every man would be entitled simply because he was born.

Moreover, Jacques Maritain says in Humanisme intégral: "The law of usus communis leads us to conclude that, at least as concerns man's primary, material and spiritual needs, it is fitting that we should get for nothing the greatest possible number of things."

The Social Crediters were the first to realize the new economic and social conditions brought about by new techniques and automation. And I should like to take this opportunity to say to the New Democratic member who spoke before me that this is the very essence of the difference between Marx and Douglas. Karl Marx did not recognize automation and could not in his time foresee the advent of production machinery.

That is why the Social Crediters were the first to demand a minimum living wage based on production. The first measure to that end was to come into force in Canada through the passage of the family allowance legislation.

In 1947, the International Labour Review defined the implied objectives of this Canadian legislation as follows, and I quote:

> The desire to keep at a satisfactory level the family purchasing power, especially of low income families.

The Review stated further:

> Family allowances were not considered as a salary supplement—and still less as a relief—but as a social measure designed to protect the incomes to which, according to some sovereign states, and for economical and social reasons, families, including children, are entitled.

The documents make it clear that the idea was gaining ground and that no less than 30 economists, sociologists and prominent Americans urged the U.S. President, Mr. L. B. Johnson, in 1964, to have a piece of legislation passed "so as to provide every individual and every family with an adequate income".

According to the authors of the brief addressed to President Johnson, such a minimum income should be high enough to make it possible to do away with all the social measures in force: unemployment insurance, social welfare, old age security pensions, medicare and others.

Later on, Robert Theobald, who had signed the previous document, set forth his philosophy on a guaranteed minimum income in his book Free Men and Free Markets. He explains that this minimum income should be guaranteed by the American Constitution and that it represents a basic right that no law, no court or no individual could abolish.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a sound attitude which is surprisingly like what we have been advocating for more than 35 years.

In a so-called free and developed society, greater individual freedom is thus desirable. The guaranteed annual income is a giant step in that direction, since if such a program were implemented and administered in an effective manner, it would be possible to decentralize the decision making power for the benefit of the individual who could be master of his own destiny.

Whenever the government is criticized for having failed to eliminate poverty and to provide the Canadian people with the means to further themselves, its spokesmen are ready with an answer. The minister will certainly prove it in a few minutes, because he will give a list of recent measures providing for the expenditure of public funds for the benefit of individuals. We can always say that those measures are inadequate, which is true in most cases. There is, however, a more serious objection to the government administration as regards financial credit in terms of present needs and aspirations. Such a policy means that the government decides in an increasing number of sectors what type of service could be provided, what type of activity people should undertake, as well as how people should get money to live on.

In other words, more and more power over the lives of the people is concentrated in the hands of politicians, of bureaucrats. Such being the case, public services of better or lesser quality can be given the people, but the areas of development, where the individual's wishes and needs find expression, are reduced, because what he will receive or what he will have to give is being determined more and more rigorously.

● (2020)

The citizen who is unable to exercise an effective control over the process becomes passive, frustrated or rebellious. We have seen cases of it in the province of Quebec and elsewhere. Obviously, the process through which power is removed from the individual and concentrated in the hands of the government has reached a very advanced stage in Canada, and it is still in action.

Yet, this is the exact opposite of what should prevail. Society exists to serve the individual and not to dominate or manipulate him. The Créditistes see in the institution of a guaranteed annual income program one of the means through which this deplorable tendency in our society could be checked.

If we admit that all citizens have the right to dispose of enough money to meet their basic needs, they will then be in a position to choose their own priorities and make their own choices.

There will then be no need for them to accept the mere pittance of the government which too often reaches them in the wrong way or at the wrong time. They will be able to control the economic policy of the country to a greater degree and one dollar spent will up to a certain extent constitute a vote indicating industry that the consumer, not the government or the bank manager is satisfied with a particular product.

The industries which will not be able to meet the expectations and the yearnings of the individual consumers will not be able to stay in business. Some will object, saying that some individuals would be unable to meet their basic needs, even if they had enough money.

This could be true but the circumstances in which such a situation applies are very rare. Moreover, people can really become masters of their own life and learn how to control their needs only through the practice of free choice and decision making.

However, they cannot become free citizens if they cannot express their claims efficiently and if they do not have the means to express their demands.

The Créditiste guaranteed annual income scheme would favour the development of serious and responsible citizens. In my opinion, almost everyone in our society, struggles for freedom and economic security. But one does not want to deal with the problem, to accept plausible solutions.

The establishment of a guaranteed annual income scheme such as the one proposed by the Social Credit Party of Canada would be a giant step towards freedom and economic security for all Canadians.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I will say that the Canadians who are at grips with the present social assistance plans are fed up with the mere pittance they get and which only contributes to discourage them and to maintain them in misery and that the other Canadians who foot the bill are also fed up with seeing the government penalizing them to maintain needy people in misery.

[English]

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I enter this debate on a Créditiste motion for a guaranteed annual income. I compliment the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) on bringing forward this important subject for debate today. The two important words in the motion are "guaranteed" and "inflation". I wish to inform hon. members of the way I was taught to approach life. I was taught that Canada was not built on guarantees but with blood, sweat and tears.

We have entered into a period of great change. We are in the scientific age. Most scientific discoveries have been made within the lifetime of those living today. This is true of at least 80 per cent of discoveries. Machines, automation and other things that were never dreamed of are coming upon us very quickly. The automation of companies is designed to make the maximum use of machines. Machines cannot be justified unless they can put people out of work and this causes a great problem.

We have had, and are having, a migration of population from rural to urban areas. This is causing many problems. In addition, we are faced with a very high rate of inflation. This has helped add to poverty in this country and it has worsened the position in which people find themselves. In one year the dollar has eroded by almost 10 per cent because of inflation. I receive many letters from people who are concerned about how they are going to make out in today's world.

We have come a long way. Whether we like it or not, we have a great many guarantees. This afternoon the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) did his best to justify many programs. They are, of course, in the form of guarantees. I do not think I could justify them in the same manner, after reading the many letters I have received from people in my constituency, people for whom these programs just are not working: I do not know whether it is because of the high rate of inflation, but I suspect that may be the answer. This is my first year in this House so I cannot compare the reasons now given by constituents with those of previous years. But without doubt this is the highest rate of inflation we have ever experienced.

We have many types of pension programs as well as an unemployment insurance program. These cause people in the work force many concerns. I receive a good deal of mail from people who retired a few years ago. Their pension is based on the salary they received at that time. Because of the erosion of the dollar and the high cost of living, they cannot maintain the standard of living they were used to in the past. People retiring today are in a much better position. Ten years ago people were retired at $200 a month; today they are being retired at $500 a month. People who retired ten years ago want to know why the pension plan cannot be changed so that they too can be brought up to the standard of living of those who retire today. It is not a cost of living escalation they want. This is the sort of question people are asking.

● (2030)

The unemployment insurance scheme is coming under fire because, it is said, the scheme is being abused. Those who level this criticism are the people who are paying into the scheme. All the security measures in force today, such as welfare, unemployment insurance, pensions, even the baby bonus, must be paid for by someone. It would not be so bad if these programs were doing the job they ought to be doing. Young people coming out of school with an education are told: Now you have an education you can do anything you wish to do, take any kind of job and do it successfully. They get a job. The rate of pay is low. They see large deductions coming off their pay checks in the form of income tax and unemployment insurance.

Government spokesmen talk about having lowered the income tax. Unemployment insurance payments are another form of tax these people have to pay. They look at their pay checks and ask: What are we working for? We are barely getting enough to live on. We shall never get enough to be able to buy a home. We are in what appears to be a much poorer position today than our parents and grandparents were years ago, because they were able to purchase houses in which to live. What chance have we of getting a home today, with the high cost of land and the high cost of building?

It makes them do things we do not like to see done about the work ethic. They say to themselves: Why should I work? Why should I not take advantage of all the programs which will keep me going? I do not really need to work. So, viewed as a whole, the system is not doing what it is designed to do. We talk about a guaranteed annual income. I do not believe we should talk about a guaranteed annual income in isolation. I think we should be talking about guaranteed employment at the same time. We certainly do not want to bring in any type of program that teaches people not to work.

We have established a welfare program administered by many levels of government. It is not palatable to many people, although I should like to think there is no one in Canada today who would not be looked after. In many instances people in need would have to go on welfare. With the pride people have, they do not want to do that kind of thing. If we brought in guaranteed employment and a guaranteed annual wage, we could do away with welfare. Let's do away with welfare. Let's think of guarantees for the old, the infirm and those who just cannot work—not people who will not work, but those who cannot work. Those who are paying the cost of these programs, particularly the young people entering the work force today, are not fooled. They can see what is going on. They can see the bureaucracies which are built up. They realize the high cost of administering all these programs, and they can see they are not really working. Many people have not received what they ought to have received under these programs.

If we can do something about the high cost of maintaining these bureaucracies, if we can streamline the administration, I believe something useful might come from programs of this type. As it is, one department often appears not to know what the other is doing. Sometimes it does not even care. Look at the Canada Pension Plan. I receive many letters from housewives who are not able to take advantage of this plan, from people who have less than somebody else is receiving, from people who have not earned enough to get anything really useful from the scheme. We should look at all these programs, starting with welfare and unemployment insurance, and try to produce a system which is better suited to our needs. I close by saying we should in no circumstances do anything to destroy the work ethic in Canada.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, when parliamentarians debate poverty and social assistance plans they inevitably become engaged in a search for improvements and better methods. It would be surprising if it were otherwise, since regardless of what the cynics may say, men and women who go into politics do so with a desire to improve the shape of society. This is what the debate today is all about.

Much has been said about poverty on this continent. Volumes of reports have been written about the subject. A Senate committee investigated it recently. Obviously there are other forms of poverty beside economic poverty. There is poverty determined by isolation, by lack of qualities in life which may have little to do with economic well-being. If we limit ourselves to the narrow issue of poverty in economic terms, we can find it in many regions of Canada both rural and urban. It can be found in the most unexpected quarters. Consider the men or women who have worked all their lives in construction, in a factory or in a place not conducive to good health, and who toward the end of their working lives, say in their fifties, find they can no longer remain gainfully employed due to their difficult conditions and proudly refuse any form of public assistance.

Poverty can also be found among the victims of an accident or of a progressive disease, persons who can no longer continue to be the breadwinner for their families. It can also be found among injured workmen, victims of accidents at work who are suddenly pensioned off at rates set under provincial laws, people who may have lost a limb at work while making a productive contribution to society, or people who have broken their backs and who as a result may also have to go on welfare and whose income as determined under provincial laws is inadequate. We see many examples in large urban areas of people on pensions that are not tied to the cost of living index, such as workmen's compensation pensions, or whose pensions are not adjusted over the years.

Poverty can be found among those who work for wages at minimal levels, people with large families struggling to make ends meet and to give their children an adequate education. Sometimes there may even be temporary difficulties which perhaps lead to situations that cannot be termed poverty but near poverty, such as when a family has to face unexpected dental bills for one of its members. In this respect it is very reassuring to see what is being done presently by the province of Saskatchewan through its program of dental care. As well, we had the announcement today by the province of Quebec.

It is against this background of poverty, which others have defined much better than I have, that in designing a system in society that leads to a guaranteed annual income one would inevitably create legislation of the kind that we have today in Canada. Allow me to expand on that for a moment. It is really a legislative framework that seems to me to consist of six basic pieces of legislation: the Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Assistance Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act, income tax, the guaranteed income supplement and family allowance.

Time does not permit me to discuss in depth these various tools which over the decades successive governments—and here I must stress successive Liberal governments—have developed for the benefit of Canadians. These tools are available and they are working, but as changes in society take place over the years they need to be adjusted and sharpened to meet more adequately the demands and shortcomings of society. For instance, in the Canada Pension Plan we have a fine measure that protects the income of widows, orphans and retired persons.

Other hon. members have already spoken about mail coming in quite frequently from people urging the government to reduce the age of retirement. In the Canada Pension Plan there are certain provisions which perhaps could be improved; for example, the disability pension that can only be obtained if a person has contributed to the plan for five years. This leads to a very sad state of affairs for people who have contributed to the plan for only four years or 4½ years and who find themselves deprived by a few months of an income that would compensate them for their unexpected disability.

Another aspect of the Canada Pension Plan which could be improved is in providing a means of integrating it with other pension plans for the benefit of immigrants who before coming to Canada contributed to pension plans in other countries. Immigrants may have worked in many other countries and contributed to social security schemes elsewhere. It would be desirable, and would not be to the cost of Canadian society, if contributions made to these social security systems in other parts of the world were somehow pooled and added together so that the beneficiary would get a pension from one administration and in one sum, rather than having to apply to several different administrations, an enormously complicated process. Then there is the situation of the woman who has no job with an employer but who does work at home. Many members have made representations to the government regarding the desirability of permitting women to benefit from the Canada Pension Plan by contributing to it even though they are at home.

The Canada Assistance Plan is another of the tools we have. I wish to refer to the role of the provincial governments under that plan. The provincial governments could implement a number of measures for senior citizens, for the disabled, or to provide services in the community for those in need. We have had some exceptional examples of certain provinces in Canada, as well as some miserable performances from others, like the province of Ontario, where use of the Canada Assistance Plan has been limited up until now.

Not much has been said during this debate about unemployment insurance, yet it is an important tool in the maintenance of the income of Canadians, particularly those in the poorer regions. This is a very substantial piece of legislation which was passed by this parliament. It was even recognized as such by hon. members opposite, who are now asking for inquiries and investigations into the operation of unemployment insurance. One year ago, five or six members of the Tory party broke ranks with their own colleagues and supported the provision of funds for unemployment insurance. If I remember correctly, all of these members came from the maritime provinces, and obviously they did this because they well knew how desirable it was and how important a part unemployment insurance has to play in income maintenance for the people in their area.

The Income Tax Act is a very powerful piece of legislation that endeavours to redistribute income, which in a democratic society is perhaps one of the most remarkable ways of achieving social justice. We have recently completed an exercise in income tax reform. It is perhaps a pity that we were not able to introduce full rates for capital gains and we settled for one half, but this is something to look forward to in years to come and would produce additional revenue that would improve schemes of support for people in need in Canada.

This motion also deals with the question of inflation. Here it is important to keep in mind certain developments which have taken place on the world scene which demonstrate how the situation was precipitated in the last year. One might look at the basic commodities we use in Canada and ask what has happened in respect of the price of these commodities. If you take sugar and coffee, the increase in price over a 12-month period has been 5½ per cent. In rubber, cocoa and tin, the price has doubled in a 12-month period. The price of rice has increased for times over the period of one year.

One can realize how difficult it is for any economy to provide a satisfactory answer to people when they go shopping and find increases in the price of commodities on the shelves. The measures which have been taken by the government and which, according to the mover of the motion, are missing were quite eloquently put forward this afternoon by the hon. member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault). All I shall do, therefore, is place on the record the projected subsidies for 1974-75 for two basic consumer goods, namely, milk and bread.

In the case of milk we have a continuing indirect milk program and milk subsidy. The estimated amount of the subsidy on milk which the government of Canada is injecting into the economy is $257 million. In the case of bread there is a continuing subsidy of $120 million. These subsidies are accompanied by a host of other measures, such as in the case of meat which was recently announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). These measures have the very clear purpose of stimulating production and making it more and more desirable for farmers to increase production of certain commodities in the hope that the increase in quantity will be matched by larger volume sales.

It seems to me that this is the kind of substantial, tangible action that the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) was asking for this afternoon. Having asked for action, he continued speaking for 20 minutes. In what he said it was very difficult for us to perceive any tangible proposals or recommendations in respect of these crucial questions. These actions which have been brought forward by the government of Canada during this very difficult time have been in contrast with the 90-day period of meditation proposed by the Tory party which they call euphemistically the period of freeze. During this period—some people would call it a period of yoga—the Tory party would meditate on the measures that would follow the 90 days. After the 90-day freeze, no one knows exactly what would happen. The income policies that would follow this 90-day period of meditation are such that they have not been defined in this House in any of the debates on inflation. It seems to me that Canadians will not be easily fooled by promises of income policies which we all know would hit hardest the people with whom this motion is so concerned. However, that could be the subject of another debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to second the motion moved by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), a motion that invites the government to turn aside from the beaten track and implement a measure to recognize the right of the people to live by way of a guaranteed annual income.

It is obviously an advanced measure and I would go so far as to say that it could be considered as a first. I believe that rather than innocently witnessing the collapse of the capitalist system, it is important to hurry up and bring about significant changes.

In every country of the world, people are complaining about inflation. All governments are seeking solutions and are trying to apply various measures to cure their economy of inflation, but such measures are not working properly. Unfortunately, our governments' advisers disagree on the definition of the word inflation. I believe that this is because the advisers often base their opinions on what they have seen in dictionaries, where inflation is defined as "the excessive issue of paper currency", which means that in order to fight inflation, the amount of money in circulation should be reduced, less money should be printed and more should be taken out of circulation through taxes or otherwise.

As financial credit is gradually replacing paper money in business transactions, inflation is therefore imputed to the overly free issue of financial credits by means of bank loans, and a restriction of credit is recommended.

Our governments even order an interest rate increase to discourage borrowers. When these measures prove insufficient to fight inflation, the government calls on the people to practise voluntary restrictions and austerity. The population is asked to hold back spending. In spite of repeated invitations during the past five or six years, nothing is changed by this, while inflation goes on as if our rulers had lost control.

Another definition of inflation, more recent and imaginative than that of the dictionary, has been used lately in magazine articles on economic matters. I quote:

Inflation is too much money running after too few goods.

However, Mr. Speaker, between this definition and the real problems, the link is easily made, but no one can maintain that the inflation prevailing in developed countries results from a shortage of products in the face of excessive buying power. Nonetheless, 90 per cent of Canadians are aware that such is not the case in this country. Most wage earners, as well as all retired people, needy mothers and unemployed know too well that inflation, the high cost of living, is not due to the fact that they have too much money in their wallets.

Inflation is due to the current financial system which is not attuned to the reality of production and consumption. The accounts of the system are false. Honest accounts are the only means to counter inflation without prejudice to anybody's legitimate interests. Honest monetary accounts and accounts corresponding to real facts are objectives we would reach through the application of the financial data given by engineer and economist C. H. Douglas half a century ago.

The one and only fact of price increases proves the inefficiency of the system. If it were attuned to the real facts, there would be no inflationary prices but, to the contrary, a gradual reduction of prices as technology would increase and facilitate production.

And, Mr. Speaker, the guaranteed annual income plan suggested by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) today is a step that should be taken as soon as possible.

It is true that people who object to this plan believe that increasing the spending power of the public would succeed only in aggravating inflation.

They claim that producers and distributors would bump their prices, knowing that people have the means to pay more. Facts prove, however, that this argument is not realistic. In fact, we tend to believe that the opposite would be true. More purchasing power in the hands of consumers is not necessarily the same thing as excessive purchasing power. Some economists now admit that inflation can as well be induced by increased pressure from the industrial costs as it can be when there is too much money to buy too few products.

It is generally recognized today that the problem of increasingly rising costs generated the rampant inflation we are now experiencing.

There can be no doubt that some industries are pocketing inordinate profits, but numerous surveys on the causes of mounting prices could not show convincingly that all producers had taken advantage of the situation.

The findings of the Food Prices Review Board are but one example among many others. Even if this board has once in a while drawn attention to certain abusive practices in the field of prices, it has failed to prove up to now that consumers are in general fleeced by producers and dealers.

On the contrary, what emerges from business conditions in Canada is that distributors and producers themselves are squeezed between costs and prices; they are desperately trying to hold out in face of inflation. In other words, the present inflation problem is not solely due to market conditions at the dealer level.

The pressure of costs in industry is also a determining factor in the rise of prices. The Social Credit proposal regarding a guaranteed annual income would really make it possible to reduce the pressure of costs which increases every day.

So, far from contributing to inflation our program is really offering guarantees that such a situation caused by increases in the production costs may be improved and even controlled.

Our reasons for believing in such a solution are as follows: First, the revenue is now distributed among the people, provided they work. This procedure for the distribution of revenue is at least followed as strictly as possible.

However, it is obvious that the practice entails expenses which are not really necessary for the production of goods required by the people.

This is because most people work in the first place to earn their living and also because the efficient production by machinery reduces the number of jobs. There is unfortunately in our economy at the present time an extremely strong tendency to bungle production, to stretch the work as much as possible rather than to complete it in the shortest possible time. All the mechanisms designed to extend employment increase costs which must finally be recovered by the company. In the long run, it is the consumer who pays and prices also increase each time production costs are passed on to the consumer.

An effective guaranteed annual income scheme under which the consumer would obtain a direct income would change the situation completely, because this income would not come from the production system and would not be considered as a production cost. Therefore, it would not have to be added to the prices charged to the consumer.

The problem of distributing an adequate income to the people to enable them to buy all the products they want would be solved. Production efficiency could develop faster than it does presently because instead of trying to maintain jobs at all costs, businessmen would try above all to increase productivity by using machines able to produce much faster than by hand. The result of such a policy would be to reduce production costs and the producers would be able to pass on this saving of labour and material to the consumer through lower prices.

So, the Social Credit Party of Canada urges the government to adopt a modern and simple guaranteed annual income system in order to enable the country to cope with inflation caused by increased production costs. It means that if we distribute a guaranteed annual income to all citizens, we should automatically be creating a very effective means of coping with inflation.

Mr. Speaker, the Social Crediters are not the only ones to stress this fact. During a conferance, a world famous economist, Professor John Kenneth Galbraith, warned that the present industrial system "cannot insure that the purchasing power in the economy will be equal or even approximately equal to the products that can be manufactured through present industrial methods".

A universal guaranteed annual income system paid out of new credit would contribute to increase the purchasing power of the people so as to raise it to the level of production. Instead of mortgaging their future incomes, people could buy with today's money the products they need today, which would put an end to the staggering increase in the consumer debt which has quadrupled in less than 10 years.

Mr. Speaker, another economist, an English one this time, Robert Theobald, in his book published in 1967, wrote, and I quote:

> The principle of a guaranteed income is based on the basic American belief in the right and capability of the individual to decide what he wants and must do. That is undoubtedly the meaning of the words "private enterprise", that the individual must have the right to obtain enough resources to do what he believes to be important. In the past, the individual could go into business and obtain resources through it. Today, the facts shaw that the small businessman and the small company cannot compete with giant corporations. So the ideal on which private enterprise is based can only be preserved through a guaranteed income. In fact, a guaranteed income would bring about the revival of private enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, a guaranteed annual income would also help enormously from another point of view. Let me mention the public debt. We have nothing to hide, we just have to look into the financial statements of our municipalities, of our provinces and of the federal government to see that this debt is increasing every year in a dramatic way. The public debt service also increases every year. The public debt increase undoubtedly proves that our municipal, provincial and federal governments are incapable of fulfilling their obligations and have to go into debts. A guaranteed income, derived from taxes, would certainly not improve the financial status of the country or of the Canadians.

This is why today the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) has submitted a motion to the effect that this guaranteed annual income be taken from new votes, in order to increase the available purchasing power. Mr. Speaker, I think that this is the only solution that should now be applied by Parliament and I was very happy to associate myself with the preceeding speakers on this subject.

[English]

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be participating in this debate on the question of a guaranteed annual income, as it affords the House an opportunity to raise fundamental questions about the whole system of social welfare in this country. Let us not be mistaken about it, the very nature of the guaranteed annual income demands that it be comprehensive and that it not be just another partial or stopgap measure to be added to the existing labyrinthian maze of social welfare programs.

To examine the guaranteed annual income, therefore, we must examine it in the context of the aspirations of Canadians for social justice and in the context of the chaotic, inadequate and, yes, even perverse jungle into which our social welfare system has been turned by ten years of Liberal mismanagement. This, of course, is related to the state of our economy and it is the state of our economy that draws attention to the very low incomes, compared with ever escalating costs, that the poor in this country must face. The latest figures released by Statistics Canada indicate a progressively deteriorating situation for the Canadian worker. Average weekly earnings in December, 1973, were only 5.9 per cent higher than those for December, 1972. When compared with a cost of living increase over the same period of time of 9.1 per cent, it is indeed obvious that whatever the working man has managed to get in salary increases has more than been eroded by inflation.

It is interesting to look at the charts for the past year. Average weekly earnings generally increased over the previous year by 7 per cent or 8 per cent. The consumer price index started off in October, 1972, at a rate of 5.3 per cent. The following month it was 5.1 per cent and in December it was also 5.1 per cent. These figures give the increase over the previous year. Then last June there came a time when the two graph lines crossed. Average weekly earnings were then 7.8 per cent higher than the previous year and the cost of living was 8.1 per cent higher. It is of interest that every month since then, when this unfortunate statistic has been facing the government, average weekly earnings increases have been less than the large weekly increase in the consumer price index.

What happens to people who are poor in this wealthy country? What are the effects of poverty on the poor? I would like to quote a few words from the Economic Council of Canada's sixth annual report:

> One of the most important consequences of poverty is that it affects the ability of the poor to invest in themselves and thereby to lead more productive lives within the economy. This is illustrated by the lower relative expenditures on categories of goods and services which are particularly important as a basis for skilled and effective labour force participation, such as expenditures on education and reading.

We live in a country that prides itself on granting equal opportunity to young people. Our educational system attempts to do this. However, Mr. Speaker, the people who live in a poor section must have the best schools in a city in order to have equal educational opportunities—but they do not have them. Generally, schools are on a par over an entire community. Unfortunately, the best teachers are able to choose the schools in which they wish to teach and they tend to gravitate toward the people who are more success-oriented in the wealthier parts of town, and consequently the poor are left even further behind. I quote further from the report of the Economic Council of Canada:

> A family's inability to invest in itself is likely to have particularly serious consequences on young children whose potential abilities are largely shaped in the years of early childhood. There is accumulating evidence to suggest that children of low income families in Canada are most unlikely to have adequate access to needed resources in their early years. Even the possibility of significant child nutrition problems, seemingly so improbable in this country, must be taken seriously. A provincial minister of welfare recently stated publicly that some of the children in his province were too ill-clothed and ill-nourished to attend school.

It is interesting to examine the expenditures of poor families compared with the average expenditures of non-poor families. The poor families' food expenditure is only 70 per cent of the food expenditures of non-poor families. But when you get to such things as education and the ancillaries connected with education, the poor can only spend less than 40 per cent of what the wealthy can spend. Again to quote the Economic Council's report:

> —a very substantial proportion of the adult poor in Canada consists of those who either have, or could be provided with, income earning potentials . . . there is a resulting high economic cost to our society in having failed to discover and implement more effective policies and programs to permit them to utilize these potentials. In other words, when we have such large numbers of poor in the working force age groups, our economy is simply not producing as much as it could or should.

When you look at the guaranteed annual income there are certain things which are obvious. There must be incentives but there must be different types of incentives. You must have incentives for those who cannot work, who are unemployable. These are the aged, the incapacitated, people who suffer severe illness and are sick and unable to work. Then there has to be a different kind of incentive for people who are employable. I believe in a guaranteed annual income, but it should not be upon the same scale for a healthy young person who simply chooses to opt out of the working force as it is for an elderly citizen or an incapacitated person. I believe that those who are employable should be required to accept employment or else exist on the barest subsistence level.

A few weeks ago the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) brought forward some statistics. They showed that the administration of one part of our comprehensive social coverage was being so badly managed that it was expected there would be a 50 per cent rise in costs this year. I am speaking about unemployment insurance. One of the unfortunate things about unemployment insurance is that the government is using it to do something for which it was never intended. Unemployment insurance was originally intended to look after the person who was employable and who through no fault of his own had become unemployed. It was thought only right and proper that he should be able to maintain his lifestyle until he was able to find further employment. But the present government changed that.

I was astonished to hear the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) refer to this matter a few moments ago when he said the unemployment insurance program was really an income maintenance plan which apparently fits in with the government's welfare scheme. This is partly what is wrong. Members of the government have taken a good concept and have operated it in such a loose fashion that it is no longer an unemployment insurance scheme; it is a loose set-up that just invites rip-off. Members of the government do not know what to do when things go wrong, with the result that they tighten up the scheme arbitrarily, through regulations, instead of coming back to this House and trying to redraft the legislation.

Sometimes I am puzzled at the way backbenchers on the government side make odd remarks during their speeches. Perhaps they are as restless as the rest of the country about the cabinet's handling of the economy. This afternoon the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik), who is Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, listed 16 propositions that the government had in its latest plan. Outside of being basically concerned or a little skeptical of anybody who has that many propositions to offer, I was astonished to hear him mention the Department of Veterans Affairs as being something to boast about. That baffles me. At this stage in its existence that department probably has its worst reputation since it was set up. It is trying to squeeze out the veterans hospitals or get them transferred to other jurisdictions. It is at the last moment considering stopping the Veterans Land Act, yet the hon. member brought it forward as one of the shining lights of this government. Perhaps he was forced into it by our friends to the left.

I should like to speak about the institution of a guaranteed annual income. If this is to come about, it must be done carefully and by stages. It does not have to be a magnum opus that will all be put in one bill. A guaranteed annual income is possible and I think it is realistic to look at it. At the start, it should be clearly defined who needs it most. We could begin with the aged and then work down. We have a guaranteed annual income in British Columbia for those aged 60 and over and I think it should be considered ahead of the Manitoba scheme. British Columbia is a rich province and its finances were carefully managed in the past 20 years. When the old master left the political scene, he left half a billion dollars for his profligate heir. As a result, this plan is not costing as much out of current income as some prophets of doom had forecast. It means a great deal to those aged 60 and 65, particularly widows. I have had letters from widows who were honestly unable to see how they could manage until they reached 65, so I am pleased that they now have somewhere to turn.

I suggest that the federal government might talk to provinces such as British Columbia who have taken the first steps toward a guaranteed annual income for those aged 60 and over. The Premier of British Columbia uses the same languages the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I see by the press that they use the same four-letter words, so they should have no difficulty in communicating.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer again to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare who spoke this afternoon. Toward the end of his remarks I could only think that he has been working around the bureaucrats too long. Some of his suggestions were loaded with the bureaucratic nonsense we become used to hearing. Perhaps he will be brought back to reality by a letter which I received from a constituent of mine on January 18 which reads:

Dear Mr. McKinnon:

We are constantly told to write our members if we have a complaint. This is why I am writing you. My beef is with the pension department.

I am a widow and work as a seamstress in... Ladieswear, a part-time worker I should add. At the end of 1972 when I became 78 years old, I decided that at that age I surely should not be ashamed to apply for the supplementary pension. My normal income is $65 per month, and at that time I was receiving the $88 from Ottawa. Accordingly, I went to the local department and got a form to fill out. I was told that I had to resign outright from my place of employment—

Talk about disincentive! She had to resign from her place of employment.

—before making my application. I did this on December 18 of that year, then in the beginning of January I mailed my application to Ottawa. It was accepted, and at the end of April I got $35 per month in addition to the $100, which had been increased during the sitting. I had hoped the B.C. government would add a bit to that, but not a dollar did I get. Now, all this four months I could not earn a dollar, and had the above to live on. I agree that two pensioners sharing can do nicely on the slightly over $400 per month, but one person paying $95 rent can't possibly live on $200.

I had decided to go off this small supplement and go back to work in the fall when I was sure to be needed again, but by mid-June Miss F. phoned me to see if I would come in and work for a few days while one woman was off sick. I agreed but knew that I would have to report it.

Hon. gentlemen opposite think this is funny, but it is not funny to me.

However, when this woman came back, holiday time was here and there were others wanting off so I was asked if I would stay on another week and another, till I was there about six weeks altogether. The first of August I wrote to the department in Ottawa, which is where I thought I should write, telling them as plainly and as honestly as I have told you why I went back to work and asked them to take me off the supplementary pension. At the end of August I went east on a holiday with relatives— they paying my expenses, I might add. When I returned early in October I found a small note from Mr. M. in the pension department here, saying he had unsuccessfully tried to get me by phone, would I please contact him soon.

I phoned and found that he would be in that day, so I went down, not dreaming that I was going to be up on the carpet; in fact, I didn't tie this in at all with my letter to Ottawa. Mr. M. didn't see me, he sent his man Friday to do the unpleasant chore. They had sentence passed upon me before I arrived. Friday stressed the enormity of my crime, and said the pension department would have to have its pound of flesh, in my case $175, being five months of the supplement of $35 per month that I had received.
