Debates of the Senate

OFFICIAL REPORT

THE SENATE

Monday, May 8, 1967

OPENING OF SECOND SESSION TWENTY-SEVENTH PARLIAMENT

Parliament having been summoned by Proclamation to meet this day for the dispatch of business:

The Senate met at 4 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

COMMUNICATION FROM GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
Ottawa

8th May 1967

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General will arrive at the main entrance of the Parliament Buildings at 4 p.m. on this day, Monday, the 8th May, 1967, and when it has been signified that all is in readiness, will proceed to the Chamber of the Senate to open formally the Second Session of the Twenty-seventh Parliament of Canada.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler
Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

At 4 p.m. His Excellency the Governor General proceeded to the Senate chamber and took his seat upon the Throne. His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and, that House being come, with their Speaker, His Excellency was pleased to open the Second Session of the Twenty-Seventh Parliament of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

As my words are being broadcast throughout Canada I should like to begin on a personal note. I want to say that I am deeply conscious of the possibilities for good for Canada of my new office and duty that which brings me here today to open the Centennial Session of Parliament. May I renew my pledge at the ceremony of Installation: that my sole purpose and effort will be to merit the confidence which had been reposed in me by Her Majesty our Queen on the advice of her Canadian Ministers and by the countless Canadians from every region who have so freely offered their good wishes. My wife and I are deeply grateful for such messages and greatly encouraged by them.

On this occasion we feel again the sadness of our loss in the recent death of His Excellency General Georges Vanier, my much beloved predecessor. His courageous and lifelong devotion to all that is good and honourable sets an example to inspire all Canadians.

The careers of my two distinguished Canadian predecessors have added to the traditional and constitutional functions of the Governor General as the representative of Her Majesty the Queen of Canada, that of representing the Canadian people in a broad range of their activities and attitudes. In this role I shall try to encourage the best features of our national life, in all its diversity, and to symbolize the unity and continuity of the Canadian people as expressed in their federal institutions.

With you, I look forward this summer to the visit of Her Majesty the Queen and other members of the Royal Family. The presence of our Sovereign and the Heads of State of other countries will bring added joy and festivity to our land as it celebrates the centennial of its Confederation.

This Centennial Session of Parliament provides an opportunity to begin to give effect to our aspirations for the second century of Confederation.

The weak colonies joined together in 1867 have grown today into a prosperous and dynamic country. That so much could have been accomplished in the face of great difficulties is a tribute to the courage, determination and faith in human progress of countless Canadian men and women of all origins. It is also a tribute to the wisdom and foresight of the Fathers of Confederation who created the constitutional framework without which much of this progress would have been impossible.

Our country was not founded in 1867. It is far more deeply rooted in time than that. But, one hundred years ago, our predecessors —men of many races, creeds and tongues —embarked upon a great exercise in statecraft of which we, today, are the trustees. They laid the foundations. They anchored them in a fundamental sense of unity that generations of conflict had taught was vital to the common weal. With this realization they erected a structure of government for the freedom, welfare, and prosperity of all who might come in time to inhabit this land. They built according to a federal plan because they knew that unity, with cultural and regional diversity could be harnessed to a positive and enriching role in no other way.

The concept of Confederation was a call to Canadians to occupy and develop half a continent. In terms of physical effort, it demanded constructive work of a magnitude and in the face of obstacles never before tackled anywhere in the world. In terms of intellectual endeavour, it required the revolutionary application of federal arrangements to a parliamentary system in a sparsely populated country of enormous area.

The path of Confederation has been beset with great difficulties—some natural, some inevitable and some of our own making. Succeeding generations of men and women, however, had the courage to overcome these difficulties and make possible the material and social progress we today enjoy. They had the conviction of their forefathers that a sense of basic unity alone would secure the preservation of both the individuality and the diversity which they cherished. They knew that, while Confederation could never be perfect, it was in the last analysis the mainstay of their various interests and that, while there would inevitably be occasional failures in the tolerance and understanding essential to our political system, a fundamental friendship between our people remained and could be relied upon. They knew, above all, that there was no difference of opinion so great, no misunderstanding so deep, that could prevent men of good will from repairing the particular in order to preserve the whole.

During the past one hundred years the world has changed beyond the recognition of anything within the experience of those who laid the foundations of Confederation. That our constitutional structure has endured and served so well the progress of our country is a measure of the basic soundness of its principles as well as the willingness of those concerned to adapt their application to changing needs and changing conditions.

It is in this spirit that the government has in recent years actively promoted the reform of detailed federal-provincial arrangements which, with the fundamental law, compose the constitutional structure of our country. Such reform includes improving procedures for federal-provincial consultation and coordination that are increasingly vital to the effective operation of modern government.

The government is aware of its unique responsibility to ensure that our fundamental law is readily adaptable to our changing social needs. It is also conscious that the advantages and disadvantages of the present constitutional structure are deeply intertwined. While orderly reform may well be the best way of preserving and strengthening our heritage, the most careful consideration must be given to what we do. Studies to obtain the best advice on this important matter are now underway with a view to subsequent consideration of the whole problem by Parliament.

It was possible to think, in 1867, of the public responsibility primarily in terms of state responsibility. The new challenges, which we must and will meet, require the involvement of the whole society and the efforts of all our people. In this time of fast-changing dimensions, the central concern of Canadian society must be the well-being of each individual, so that, regardless of his place or station at birth, he will have an equal chance to realize his full potential in the economic, social, political and cultural sense. A country is a home; it must be built and furnished for the good life of its people.

With our forefathers, the fight was against the immense odds of nature on our half of this continent. Today the main struggle is against social injustice, against cultural mediocrity, against spiritual stagnation and against all forms of intolerance.

During the first one hundred years of our Confederation we have been evolving, out of our bilingual and bicultural beginnings, an ideal of statehood that promises a new dimension of democracy: the dimension of social and cultural diversity within a political unity. Out of the two great cultural streams of our beginnings, we have evolved in Canada an independent statehood which has welcomed and been enriched by people of many other cultures. As we enter our second century of Confederation, we can take pride in a sense of purpose that, while taking account of our own national needs, also includes a unique capacity to contribute to the whole world community of man.

Today relations among industry, labour and governments at all levels are taking on a new significance. To maintain and improve Canada's economic strength it is necessary to exercise wisdom and restraint in our demands upon one another; to show a high degree of co-operation and a sense of responsibility in dealing with each other and with our respective institutions, including all levels of government.

The government is conducting a fundamental review of the many significant factors involved in the relationship between industry, labour and government. From this review, it will secure the best advice available in shaping new policies and determining the most effective day-to-day role for the federal government.

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

As our Centennial Session opens, more Canadians are employed than ever before in our history. To ensure that jobs keep pace with the labour force, the capacity, quality and productivity of Canadian manufacturing industries must be increased. The Government will take further appropriate measures to promote an environment in which industries can develop in the broad interests of the country, and promote increasing employment opportunities.

The Government will also take special measures in particular designated areas where human resources are not adequately utilized. While efforts by the government in this regard during recent years have met with a large measure of success, they are to be made even more effective. Parliament, therefore, will be invited to broaden the scope of the Area Development Incentive program and to provide increased funds for it. Continuing encouragement will be given to the work of the Atlantic Development Board in promoting industrial development in the Atlantic Region.

Our strong and dynamic economy has made possible a broad program of social security which is available to all Canadians. Social legislation in Canada has been advanced to a remarkable degree in recent years. This does not mean to imply that all our programs are complete. Improvements will be required, such as the amendment of the Unemployment Insurance Act, which Parliament will be invited to consider.

Parliament will also be asked to enact a measure further to assist Canadians when moving from their homes in order to obtain employment. This will be accompanied by administrative action to increase the effectiveness of Canadian manpower centres. A full service will be developed for counselling individuals looking for work and for helping all workers to take advantage of employment opportunities. At the same time the adult retraining program will be strengthened and, in consultation with the provinces, a number of pilot training projects will lay concrete plans for new approaches in manpower development.

While the government is conscious of the desirability of a greater degree of domestic control of our resources and our key industries it is also aware of the continuing importance of inflows of foreign investment in order to ensure an optimum development of the economy. To enable Canadians to gain a clearer understanding of these issues, a White Paper on this subject will be laid before Parliament.

The government attaches great importance to opening up new ways for the participation of our people in the ownership of our industrial institutions. You will therefore be asked to consider a bill to establish a Canada Development Corporation in order to further the industrial development and trade of this country by reinforcing the supply of Canadian equity capital ready to share the risks as well as the rewards of investment in Canadian business.

Federal-provincial co-operation through the Fund for Rural Economic Development will permit a major effort for regional planning for particular areas in Canada. Implementation of development projects in northeastern New Brunswick, at Mactaquac in New Brunswick and the interlake area of Manitoba will provide the federal Government with tools of knowledge and experience for the benefit of other regions throughout the country. You will also be invited to approve the establishment, with the Government of Nova Scotia, of a Crown Corporation to phase out the uneconomic coal mining operations in Cape Breton, while creating alternative industrial employment.

Greater emphasis and encouragement, consistent with federal responsibilities, will be given to community development programs throughout Canada. In no case is the need for these more fully demonstrated than in the case of the Indians and Eskimos of Canada who face grave problems in their attempts to share the benefits and opportunities of our society. The Government will therefore put before the Centennial Session amendments to the Indian Act and it will take other administrative measures to encourage the process of community development, for the benefit of the Indian and Eskimo people.

In foreign affairs Canada has put its major effort into the pursuit of peace. Our diplomacy aims at strengthening Canada's position in the councils of nations so as to work towards that world peace and stability that is the agreed objective of all sectors of public opinion in this country.

The most serious situation in the world today remains that in Vietnam. The Government continues to attach the highest priority to initiatives designed to bring about a peaceful settlement of this conflict and we will continue to exert every effort to this end through diplomatic and other peaceful means. The Government is prepared to co-operate in the establishment of an international presence in Vietnam to provide the assurances and guarantees which may have to form part of any settlement. We are also prepared to assist in the economic reconstruction and rehabilitation in that area once peace has been restored.

The government will also continue to press vigorously for effective international action in the field of disarmament. It regards curbing the nuclear arms race as a first and essential step on the road to general disarmament.

With these objectives in mind, Canada is joining with its NATO partners in a review of the future tasks of the alliance. Besides the changing requirements of collective defence, we will have in mind the progressively important political role which NATO has undertaken in the pursuit of a peaceful settlement in Europe.

The United Nations remains for Canada a major consideration in foreign policy. Until the end of 1968 Canada will have the responsibility of membership on the Security Council, and in that role the government will strive to strengthen the capacity of the United Nations fully to discharge its proper functions.

It is also expected that the "Kennedy Round" of International Trade and Tariff Negotiations will soon be completed in Geneva. In the light of its conclusions, you will be asked to approve changes in tariffs and related laws necessary to implement the undertakings Canada will give in order to gain improved access for Canadian products in export markets.

The Government also intends to play an active part in the forthcoming meeting of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, as it attaches great importance to the trade problems of less-developed countries.

Unless there is a concerted international endeavour to promote economic, technical and social advances in the developing countries, the world will soon face a major crisis. The advances painfully won by the nations of Asia, Africa and the Americas must not be lost through the lack of aid or through impediments to trade. Steps will be taken further to develop Canada's special relations with the Commonwealth countries of the Caribbean.

The Government also intends to seek approval for a substantial increase in the external aid program, as a further step towards the aid target of one per cent of national income.

External aid, trade and the activities of a host of international agencies today bind the peoples of the world more closely together than ever before in human history. There is an international flavour to modern life that was unknown to all but a select few in years past, but which will become commonplace for people generally in the years ahead.

All this is dramatically demonstrated by Expo 67 which recently opened in Montreal and by the Pan American Games to take place in Winnipeg this summer. These are features of our Centennial party, to which the whole world has been invited. Expo provides an extraordinary opportunity to extend hospitality to those who join with us in celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of Confederation. It is attracting visitors to Canada in greater numbers than ever before, and provides us with an unprecedented opportunity to display our achievements to the rest of mankind. Our country will also be receiving an increasing flow of people who will remain with us, to add to the variety and strength of our country. You will be asked to consider a complete revision of our immigration legislation.

If the century that has passed can be characterized by the development of the resources of our land, it is likely that the century to come must be marked by an increasing concentration upon the development of the resources of the mind and the spirit.

The Government has already embarked upon a number of programs to increase substantially the level of scientific innovation, but much information of potential use in upgrading the technological capability of our country is not being fully utilized. The Government has therefore initiated a study which will lead to a program to provide for the efficient dissemination of the latest scientific and technological information throughout Canada. The Government also intends to recommend substantial expansion in its assistance to science and technology in their broadest senses and to develop a climate conducive to more expenditure in this area by Canadian industry. Particular attention will be given to developing a climate of cooperation among governments, universities, and industries, that will provide effective solutions for the great problems associated with our environment: with health, transportation, energy, communications, housing and urban renewal, food production and many others that have particular relevance to this country.

The arts, humanities and social sciences also have an importance to our future that needs no elaboration. In recent years the Government has taken vigorous action to ensure unprecedented support for those branches of learning essential to the enrichment of the spirit and to the government of men. More remains to be done so that there will be provided a host of challenging opportunities to Canadians of all ages: opportunities of the kind that will excite the interests of our best minds; opportunities that, accepted with spirit and vigour, can lead to progress of exceptional significance in the social and economic life of Canada.

Recognizing that broadcasting is an important cultural instrument the Government supports a comprehensive and balanced national broadcasting service for Canadians of all ages, interests and tastes. Toward these ends a measure will be put before this session for better regulation and use of broadcasting privileges and responsibilities. Legislation will also be placed before Parliament concerning the provision of broadcasting facilities for educational purposes.

The Government is profoundly aware of the economic, social and cultural issues concerned in the development of satellite communications. Studies of this important matter are now underway and will be pressed to completion so that you may be thoroughly informed on all aspects when grave decisions as to use, ownership, regulation and control must be reached. A committee of Parliament will be invited to study the issues involved in this new means of communication.

In one form or another science is already reaching into the very heart of the community to transform the lives of each of us. It is essential that the control and development of our environment keeps apace. We have built towns and cities, canals and railroads, highways and other great works of construction at an unprecedented pace. But we have too often in the past made beauty the poor sister of material gain and careless workmanship the price of easy profit. We must lose no more time in making ugliness in our environment as unwelcome as financial losses in our balance sheets.

One of the great challenges of the century will be our capacity to plan our urban development so that Canadians in the future will continue to enjoy the benefits of living in health and harmony with their surroundings. To this end, the Government intends to propose to the provinces that a special study of urban development be undertaken in close consultation with all the authorities concerned, which would be available to the federal, provincial and municipal governments and to the public generally; so that all Canadians will be aware of the problems which lie ahead and so that governments at all levels, will have the best possible advice to assist them in their own planning and in their respective contributions to this great problem.

You will be invited to consider new housing programs which, while recognizing the primary responsibility of the individual and the other levels of government in the provision of housing, will help to fill requirements that clearly lie ahead.

The impact of science, industrialization and urbanization and the changing conditions in Canada and abroad also demand that our agricultural goals and policies should be kept under continuous examination. The Government, confident that Canada can look forward in its second century to continuing as one of the great agricultural countries of the world, proposes to establish a Special Task Force under the Minister of Agriculture. It will be charged with projecting agricultural goals for the future and recommending policies to meet these goals. A firm basis should thus be provided for the development, in full co-operation with the provinces, of a national agricultural policy. This national policy will be designed to bring greater returns to the efficient farmers of this country consistent with those of other segments of our economy and consistent with the contribution to our well-being that is made by the agricultural segment. At the same time plans will be developed that will permit the retraining of those who wish to leave the agricultural field.

The changing needs of rural communities also deserve special attention. During the present Session, you will be asked to approve legislation to provide long-term loans to agricultural and fisheries associations and corporations to permit them to develop facilities commensurate with the needs of such communities. The pattern of agriculture is changing and with the change there is increased need for capital to permit the development and maintenance of a competitive agricultural structure. Therefore you will also be asked to broaden the scope of the Farm Credit Act, in particular to enable young men and farmers' sons to develop or acquire efficient and viable production units.

The great natural resources that we take into our second century will be vital to us in meeting our needs and in maintaining our position as a major world trader. Measures will be introduced by the Government at the present Session arising out of the need to conserve and preserve the great wealth with which Canada has been so richly endowed. Water itself is becoming a more and more valuable resource. Efforts to combat pollution are taking on an economic as well as a social significance and the federal Government intends to press forward in co-operation with the provinces. In keeping with this objective, you will be asked to approve a new Canada Water Act which will provide a framework for the improvement and implementation of Canadian water policy.

At the same time, the search for new resources hastens the opening of the North. Substantial progress has been made in recent years in the government of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, and the Government intends to undertake new incentives for industry and regional economic planning intended to strengthen the economy of the North.

The encouragement of scientific and intellectual endeavour, and the development of natural resources, will be of no great benefit to Canadian society in its second century of Confederation unless a concerted effort is made to bring about a better relationship between the individual and his government. The Government therefore attaches great importance to administrative and law reform so as to assure the citizen an understanding and sense of identification with what is going on, the better to assure his support of and participation in the social institutions of our country. You will be asked to examine legal procedures and administration, not only with a view to their efficiency, but also as regards their simplicity and efficacy in so far as the individual citizen is concerned. Canada must set itself the task of developing a society in which every citizen can become an informed and real participant and plan a rôle to the measure of his wishes and abilities.

The Standing Committee of the House on Privileges and Elections will be asked to continue its study of the Report from the Committee on Election Expenses. When this study has been completed, the Government will put forward proposals for your consideration.

You will be asked to consider reforms in our laws governing divorce. The Government will also put forward a proposal concerning capital punishment. In all of these matters where decisions depend so much on personal judgment and belief, careful consideration will be given to procedures for handling them in Parliament. Early action will also be taken to seek other amendments to the Criminal Code.

In the highly complex society of today, the interests of the consumer must be taken fully into account in the formulation of government policy. It is abundantly clear that in the whole area of matters affecting the investor and the consumer, the federal Government has special obligations arising out of its general responsibility for the economic well-being of the nation as a whole.

The rights of the consumer can be advanced through corporate and individual responsibility but they also impose an obligation on governments at all levels. At this session government measures recommended for the promotion of consumer interests will include the designation of a department of corporate and consumer affairs. Within this department there will be created an organization responsible for developing new policies and co-ordinating programs undertaken within the federal Government to assist the consumer and protect the small investor. It will also maintain liaison with the provinces in these fields.

The Government also attaches great importance to the encouragement of more efficient allocation of capital resources and to the creation of a situation in which any Canadian can invest in companies operating in Canada on the basis of comprehensive and accurate information. To this end, you will be asked to approve amendments to the Canada Corporations Act. They will ensure that federally incorporated companies are obliged to respect modern and high standards of financial disclosure and that their affairs are conducted in a way which will encourage a favourable investment climate.

Related to this is the improvement of the efficiency and stability of financial markets and institutions. Important changes were brought about in the last session of Parliament with respect to banking legislation and the control of other financial institutions. The objective of the Government is to encourage development of efficient financial institutions, with full regard for the public interest including the provision of adequate safeguards for depositors and investors. The Government is prepared to exercise its responsibility in fields where it has jurisdiction. In these fields as well as in areas where jurisdiction is divided, it will seek to co-operate with all provincial governments.

Another matter of fundamental importance in our highly industrialized society is safety. The government proposes to review the whole area of its jurisdiction with respect to the setting and enforcement of safety standards in all the areas where they are required if the day-to-day life of the average citizen is to be adequately safeguarded.

As we observe this year the beginning of a new century of Confederation, we who find ourselves in positions of authority must always remember that it is our responsibility and our opportunity to serve the needs and aspirations of the Canadian people. Ours is a proud past. Together we in Canada have a future as promising as that of any other country in the world. But, above all, we are a people of the present. It is well that in giving thought to the goals of the second century of Confederation, we be aware that, as our success and promise of today rest on the actions of the past, so what we have tomorrow will depend on what we do today.

The legislative program that the Government proposes is large, and many of the issues it contains are complex. This has consistently been the case in recent years. It is a natural result of the growth and development of our country, the involvement of government in many matters, and the increasing technicality of modern society and the methods of its regulation. Parliament today requires virtually the full-time attention of its members, and this has been appropriately recognized. Likewise, you have recognized that the rules and methods of parliamentary government must be revised. In the last session you established a Committee on the Rules of the House which made valuable progress in this regard. In this session you will be asked to continue and expand that committee's work. Canada in embarking upon its second century of federal government, must provide its Parliament with every facility to ensure that efficiency and thoroughness of deliberation which, in the consideration of every item of public business, is alone the sure protection of the liberty and well-being of our people.

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required for the services and payments authorized by Parliament.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

It is our honour and privilege to be responsible for the Government of our country in this one hundredth year of Confederation. It is our duty to govern well.

In addition to the measures already specified, you will be asked to consider a number of other legislative proposals.

In conclusion, I would end today, as the first Governor General of our country did one hundred years ago:

> "Within our borders peace, security and prosperity prevail, and I fervently pray that your aspirations may be directed to such high and patriotic objects, and that you may be endowed with such a spirit of moderation and wisdom as will cause you to render the great work of union which has been achieved, a blessing to yourselves and your posterity, and a fresh starting point in the moral, political and material advancement of the people of Canada."

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

The House of Commons withdrew.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

THE LATE SENATOR JOHN HNATYSHYN

TRIBUTES

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, in the absence of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West), who is abroad taking part in an important Commonwealth Parliamentary conference, it is my sad task to pay tribute to an honourable senator who has passed away. We were all shocked a few days ago by the news of the sudden death of one of our most able and popular friends and colleagues, Senator John Hnatyshyn from Saskatchewan.

The Parliamentary Guide gives only an indication of the numerous fruitful activities of Senator Hnatyshyn. It is unfortunate that his community, his province and Canada will be deprived, and at such an early age, of the brilliant services of a man who desired to serve. His training and experience as a lawyer, his understanding of people, and the ease with which he fitted into the work of the Senate immediately after being summoned here, made him one of our most valued colleagues.

The honourable Senator Hnatyshyn was Chairman of the Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour, and the recollection of his willingness to serve and to be helpful surely adds to the distress that his death brings to all of us.

May I say one thing more about the personality of this man, and it is not the least important—the sociability of his character.

[Translation]

This man smiled easily. In fact, whenever one spoke to him, his gaiety, which made him one of the most popular members of the Senate, made one trust him instinctively. We are all deeply distressed over his death and, on behalf of the Government, the Senate Leader and all his colleagues who join with me on this occasion, I ask his wife and family to accept our heartfelt sympathy.

[English]

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I wish to join with the Acting Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Deschatelets) in paying tribute to our very dear departed friend, Senator John Hnatyshyn.

I put it midly when I say we were deeply shocked and saddened to learn of his death. As the acting leader has told us, Senator Hnatyshyn led a most active life and should have had many more years of activity, as he was but 60 years of age when he passed away.

The late Senator Hnatyshyn's life could be taken as an example to young Canadians of every race and of every creed in this country. Born in the Ukraine, he came here as an infant with his parents, grew up on a farm in western Canada, became a teacher, graduated from the University of Saskatchewan, received a Bachelor of Arts degree and a degree in law. He soon rose high in his profession and became President of the Bar of Saskatchewan.

He was director of many companies and organizations. He entered politics and became president of his party organization in the Province of Saskatchewan. In whatever he attempted, Senator Hnatyshyn rose to the top.

Honourable senators, as I have said, Senator Hnatyshyn was born in the Ukraine. He was one of the distinguished representatives of a great people, the Ukrainians, a people who have made many notable and outstanding contributions to the development of Canada. We are indeed fortunate to have had such men as Senator Hnatyshyn and people of his ethnic group come to Canada in such large numbers and help us to build up our country.

Honourable senators, may I add a personal note. I found John Hnatyshyn's death a deep personal loss. Anyone who has to lead, whether in the Senate or in some other place, realizes what a valuable help it is to have someone behind him whom he can always trust, someone who is faithful. That was John Hnatyshyn's character. Whether he was asked to take part in debate, to look after matters in committee or to perform some other task, I could always rely on him to do it and to do it well.

Senator Hnatyshyn was always loyal to his party leader and to his party; but he was also always on friendly and kindly terms with those with whom he did not agree politically or otherwise. He liked all his colleagues, no matter which side of the house they may have sat on, and I know that all his colleagues liked him and shall miss him very much.

I take the opportunity of extending to his widow and family our very sincere sympathy.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, this is another of those sad occasions that confront us all too frequently. This time it is Senator Hnatyshyn to whom we pay tribute. Having known him intimately for the past 35 years, right up to the time of his death, I was deeply shocked to learn of his sudden passing last Thursday. Up to that time he had been in reasonably good health, and his death was totally unexpected.

As Senator Brooks has said, Senator Hnatyshyn was raised on a farm, was educated in a farming community, grew up more or less with a farmer complex, so to speak, and when he graduated from the university, obtained his degree in law and hung out his shingle in the city of Saskatoon, he continued to be the friend of the farmer. He built up a very successful legal practice having to do largely with the business affairs of an agricultural community.

A sound lawyer who will certainly be missed by his many friends and clients, Senator Hnatyshyn leaves to mourn him his charming, talented wife Helen and a very clever family of three sons and one daughter.

In 1958, when I became Leader of the Government in the Senate, I looked around everywhere for an executive assistant. I heard of a young man in Saskatoon, Ramon Hnatyshyn—we called him Ray. At that time his father John Hnatyshyn was not yet a senator; he became a senator only a year or so later. Ray Hnatyshyn agreed to accept the position, and he stayed with me for over two years. He had a fine personality. He was a good mixer and was a clever young lawyer. He filled the position capably and made very many friends on Parliament Hill.

The second son, Victor, has recently graduated in law from the University of Saskatchewan. Victor articled in Regina and then joined the father's firm in Saskatoon. The third son, David, is also studying law at university. When he graduates he intends also to join the legal firm. I now come to the daughter, Elizabeth, a fine young woman. It is her intention also to graduate in law and join the Hnatyshyn firm.

I cannot boast of anything like that, honourable senators—only three Aseltines ever became lawyers. The name of the senator's legal firm at the time of his death was Hnatyshyn, Hnatyshyn & Hnatyshyn. When David and Elizabeth graduate and join the firm I hope it will still be Hnatyshyn, Hnatyshyn & Hnatyshyn.

John Hnatyshyn was a devoted public-minded Canadian citizen. He loved his adopted country very much indeed, especially the Province of Saskatchewan. He always found time to take a prominent part in the social and political life of the province, and particularly of his own City of Saskatoon. He was a candidate in three federal elections and in one provincial election. Very few of us can boast of such a record. It is unfortunate that the elections in which he was a candidate took place during the drought years of the political party to which he gave faithful allegiance from the time he was old enough to vote. In addition to his other activities, he always found time to take an active part in the raising of money for the Community Chest and other local projects.

As the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) has said, our late colleague was president of the Bar Association and was also prominent in university life and activities. At all times he was ably assisted by his loyal wife and family who stood bravely behind him, particularly in adversity.

He was called to the Senate in 1959 and took a prominent part in the activities of this house right up to the time of his death. I do not intend to deal with that aspect of his career because Senator Brooks has already dealt with it briefly and I understand that other speakers will also deal with it.

I join with other speakers in expressing our deep regrets and sincere sympathy to Mrs. Hnatyshyn, the family and other relatives. I am sure that they will have many happy memories of the senator to sustain them in the difficult days which lie ahead.

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, in the death of John Hnatyshyn Canada has lost an outstanding citizen, the Senate has lost a conscientious and capable member, and each one of us has lost a warm personal friend.

The senator deeply loved his adopted country, and he regarded his appointment to this chamber as the greatest honour that came to him in his lifetime. He had great enthusiasm for and appreciation of the opportunities that his adopted country offered, and he was very conscious of the personal liberty which exists in Canada.

The late Senator Hnatyshyn and I had been roommates for some time. He often told me stories of the early struggles of his family in the West, of his efforts to obtain an education, and his early days in starting a law practice. And then in his native province he rose to the very peak in his chosen profession. In his home City of Saskatoon, where he was best known, he had the respect and good will of everyone.

The senator was very proud of his family. His was a closely-knit family, and he told me many times how happy and fortunate he and his wife were that their children were born in Canada and grew up in this great land of freedom.

In the days ahead in this chamber we will miss his shy smile, his good humour and his sound, common sense judgment. I join with others in extending to his wife, his daughter and his sons my sympathy in their great loss of a devoted husband and a very loving father.

Hon. Fred M. Blois: Honourable senators, I should like to join with the Acting Leader of the Government, the Leader of the Opposition and the other speakers in paying tribute to the late Senator John Hnatyshyn.

As honourable senators know, he and I were seatmates here for several years, and now the seat on my right is vacant. During the time I had the pleasure of knowing Senator Hnatyshyn we became close friends, not only in this chamber but outside, and there I came to know the real worth of this honourable gentleman. He was a great Canadian—moreover, he was very proud that he was a Canadian. On more than one occasion he told me that he was not one of those who expected Canada to give him a living; he felt that as a Canadian he should play his part to make Canada a great nation and to make a place for himself. I think you will all agree with me that he did just that. He also told me that he was proud that he was able to serve Canada in his political life and in the work that he did in helping the underprivileged people of this country, our native Canadians and those who emigrated from other regions.

He was a man of integrity, a man of high honour, and during the years that I was closely associated with him I never heard him speak an unkind word about anyone. He was a man who believed that every person, both within this chamber and outside, had a perfect right to his own views, that he had the right and duty to express those views and that they should be listened to with respect. He believed that, and he lived that kind of life.

He was chairman of a committee of the Senate, and he was a regular attendant at the meetings of the other committees upon which he served. He participated at all times and his views were listened to with respect.

As has already been said, John Hnatyshyn will be missed in this chamber and by his many friends elsewhere. I should like to join with those others who have spoken in expressing our deepest sympathy to Mrs. Hnatyshyn and the family.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I would like to join with other senators in honouring the memory of our deceased colleague.

I regret that I could not attend the funeral of Senator John Hnatyshyn in Saskatoon last Saturday, due to the fact that I had a speaking engagement in the United States.

For a long time we shall miss our colleague in the Senate, and the impact of his personality—his warm friendship, his pleasant smile, his willingness to co-operate in the performance of the work of this chamber, his courageous outlook upon life and his devotion to Canada and the needs of her diverse population.

Senator Hnatyshyn is a notable example of the contribution that the Ukrainians are constantly making to the building, the many-sided progress, and the greatness of Canada. His parents, who came from the Canora district of Saskatchewan, were among the many thousands of pioneer Ukrainian farmers who came to this country almost empty-handed before and after the turn of the century, and with great courage and unswerving faith in God and their newly-adopted land, opened up millions of acres of virgin soil on the Prairies, thus bringing civilization and prosperity to vast hitherto unsettled regions.

These humble, hard-working parents sent John to school until he graduated as a lawyer from the university in Saskatoon in 1932, and became a highly respected member of his profession.

It was in his university years that I became acquainted with the late Senator Hnatyshyn, and I realized then that he was of leadership calibre. His many activities and achievements have already been outlined by previous speakers, but honourable senators will allow me to add that Ukrainian Canadians were most happy when the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker, then Prime Minister of Canada, appointed him to the Upper Chamber in 1959. This was in recognition of the increasing role Canadians of that origin are playing in the political life of the country.

Senator Hnatyshyn was the second of three Ukrainian Canadian senators, having been appointed four years after the late Senator William Wall who, as many here will recall, passed away in the prime of life in 1962. Senator Hnatyshyn was one of the 79 Ukrainian-Canadian parliamentarians who have served or who are still serving Canada at the federal and provincial levels. Consequently, he is mourned most profoundly by probably a half-million people of his origin throughout Canada, which fact was made manifest by the large funeral procession.

During the Requiem Mass in the Ukrainian Greek Orthodox Church the congregation sang the majestic, soul-stirring refrain Vichnaya Pamyat, which in translation means "Eternal Memory," and which also embraces my sentiments.

On behalf of my family, and on my own behalf, I extend heartfelt sympathy to our bereaved friend, Helen Hnatyshyn, widow of the late senator, to his three sons and daughter, his old and dear mother who is still living, and his two sisters and their families.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I can add very little to the eloquent and sincere tributes that have been paid to the late Senator Hnatyshyn, but I should like to say just a few words.

The honourable Acting Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Deschatelets) has spoken about the late senator's willingness to serve. Senator Brooks has also pointed out that he had only to ask Senator Hnatyshyn to make some contribution, and he could always depend upon him to do what was asked of him and to do it well.

When Senator Hnatyshyn was appointed to the Senate some 10 years ago I was Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce. In those days the committee heard evidence at great length in the rooms just below this chamber. I called upon Senator Hnatyshyn and asked him if he would join us in that useful work. I told him it was not a plum I was offering him, but a rather trying and arduous job. That was the best appeal I could have made to him. He agreed to become a member of the committee, and did so. I told him that there was a certain esprit de corps among the members of that committee because of the type of work we were doing at that time and our association in the responsibilities that we carried.

He became a member of the Standing Committee on Divorce, and remained a member during the whole period of his sojourn among us. I can certify to the truth of what Senator Deschatelets said. The late Senator Hnatyshyn was always willing to do and to serve. Frequently he was the chairman of one of the subcommittees which heard the evidence, and on these occasions his skill as a lawyer, his knowledge of the rules of evidence and his understanding were always assets, and the work he did was always reliable, sound, and faithful.

I speak on behalf of the members of the Standing Committee on Divorce in expressing our sincere sympathy with his family, with his wife and his brilliant children. We have feelings of deep sorrow at his passing. This chamber has lost a very useful member, and an educated and cultured gentleman.

NATIONAL MUSEUMS BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets presented Bill S-2, to establish a corporation for the administration of the National Museums of Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I realize, of course, that bills are not debatable upon first reading in the Senate, but perhaps I may be forgiven for making a few observations at this time in the interests of orderly procedure.

It is known that bills not passed by both Houses of Parliament at the prorogation of a session die on the Order Paper. The bill that has just been read the first time, together with four other bills which are to be read the first time this day, passed three readings in the Senate during the last session, after having been considered by the appropriate committees. They were not passed by the other place prior to prorogation, and thus they died on the Order Paper of the other place.

My leader (Hon. Mr. Brooks) has indicated already that they should have been dealt with to completion before prorogation. However, this was not done, and hence they are now being re-introduced. As was indicated by the honourable Acting Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Deschatelets) yesterday, in these circumstances the second readings of these five bills will be proceeded with tomorrow afternoon and, if I am correct, this will be followed by their being read the third time on Thursday afternoon or perhaps tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, may I say to Senator Choquette that the plans are being changed. We are adjourning tomorrow afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes. I do not suppose much has happened in the brief interval between the prorogation of the last session and the beginning of this Centennial Session to necessitate a full-scale examination of these pieces of legislation. I do hope, however, that the motions for second reading in respect of all these bills will be accompanied by clear and concise résumés by the movers. I believe that this would adequately meet the situation, and expedite the passage of the bills, having regard particularly to the rather tight timetable indicated by Senator Deschatelets.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I have listened very carefully to the remarks of my honourable friend, Senator Choquette, concerning the re-introduction of certain bills which died on the Order Paper. I think this is an appropriate occasion on which to mention the outstanding work done by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) because most of these bills were introduced in the Senate. Although not much publicity has been given to this fact, I do not think we should wait for the press; we can say at least among ourselves that so far as these bills were concerned the Senate has done a remarkable job.

These bills must now be re-introduced. I think the remarks of Senator Choquette are fair, and that the sponsor for each bill should sum up or give a résumé pointing out that debate has taken place on each of them and that so far as the Senate is concerned we have done our job. I think these remarks will be well taken. It is my understanding with each sponsor that this will be done.

Motion agreed to.

VISITING FORCES BILL

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE (HATE PROPAGANDA)

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets presented Bill S-5, to amend the Criminal Code.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

INTERPRETATION ACT

BILL TO REVISE—FIRST READING

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets presented Bill S-6, to revise and consolidate the Interpretation Act and amendments thereto, and to effect certain consequential amendments to the Canada Evidence Act and the Bills of Exchange Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

TELEFERRY BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets presented Bill S-7, respecting interprovincial and international teleferries.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

MOTION TO PRINT NINTH REPORT AS APPENDIX

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that the report of the Ninth Meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, tabled today, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, before the motion is adopted, may I ask if this is a report of the meeting a year ago?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I am sorry, I cannot give the honourable Senator McCutcheon an answer because I have not seen the report. This report was among the documents that were brought to my attention just a few minutes before the opening and I just tabled them.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: There is a meeting of this organization starting tomorrow, honourable senators, and I was curious as to what report was being tabled—whether we are tabling reports in advance or in arrears. If they are in arrears, they are a year in arrears.

Hon. Mr. Croll: They are always in arrears.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as a member of this group may I say that the report which has been tabled is that of a meeting held last May.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: That is what I thought. I see it started on my birthday.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford): May I ask if there is a meeting of this same group commencing tomorrow? I thought Senator McCutcheon referred to a meeting of this group tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I understand there will be a meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group starting tomorrow. I believe there will be some changes of faces, but it is the same organization.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, there will be a meeting tomorrow. I understand that the committee will meet here in Ottawa from May 10 to 12 and in Montreal from May 12 to 14. So far as the Opposition side of this house is concerned, Senator O'Leary (Carleton) and Senator Beaubien (Bedford) will be delegates. I do not know about the other side.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: They are away preparing for the meeting now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux moved, seconded by Hon. John Nichol:

> That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General to offer the humble thanks of this house to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament, namely:
> To His Excellency the Right Honourable Roland Michener, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.
> May it please Your Excellency:
> We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

Honourable senators, I shall not try to stress here, on this occasion, the distress and regret we all felt on the death of the late lamented General Vanier, of the beloved wife of our distinguished Speaker, and of some of our most worthy senators, since these sentiments have been so well expressed by so many, including the Government and Opposition Leaders in the Senate.

However, I think it would be fitting for me to express today once more, on behalf of all the honourable senators and on the motion for the adoption of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, our satisfaction and pleasure at the appointment of His Excellency the Right Honourable Roland Michener as Governor General, a man who is a friend of all those who have the privilege of knowing him and a loyal servant of Canada.

On behalf of all of us, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate you most sincerely on the perfect way in which you accomplish your functions, your willingness in serving the Senate well, and your unfailing understanding.

We were very happy, honourable senators, to see the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate fully assume once again his functions and his responsibilities, after an unfortunate illness. We sincerely hope that he will stay in good health.

We are delighted at the choice of the honourable Senator Jean-Paul Deschatelets as acting leader, and we express to him our best wishes for a brilliant career. He can count right away on the co-operation of all senators.

I am happy to note on behalf of everyone that the courtesy and understanding of the honourable Leader of the Opposition in the Senate and of his assistant have won them our respect and our high regard.

May I repeat how personally grateful I am for the kind welcome and friendship of all the honourable senators since my arrival among you a few months ago.

I have highly appreciated the invitation extended to me by the Leader of the Government to move the motion on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne in this hundredth year of our Confederation.

This honour reflects on my native city of Sherbrooke and on the Eastern Townships which I have the privilege to represent in the electoral division of Wellington. This is an excellent opportunity, I believe, to voice some constructive views and comments on Canada, especially with regard to our centennial.

[English]

Our centennial session, the second of the 27th Parliament, had a strong send-off yesterday. The Speech from the Throne, shortly after the closing of the first session, the longest in Canadian history, gave, I believe, much promise and much hope to our Canadians. I am sure we particularly noted this general remark in the speech:

> ...we who find ourselves in positions of authority must always remember that it is our responsibility and our opportunity to serve the needs and aspirations of the Canadian people.

We, as always, will remember this responsibility and opportunity to serve.

The Speech from the Throne has made an important reference to the centennial year. Indeed, the 100th year of Confederation has for us Canadians a number of basic and important meanings. It means that we have reached our full maturity. We have become a recognized major nation, esteemed and respected everywhere and by all. We have passed the 20 million mark in population. We have attained economic and political recognition among the most important nations of this world. We have become able as a nation to tackle some of the greatest projects in this day and age.

Yet, small in population and spread quite thinly over an immense territory 3,000 miles long, we have nevertheless found a way to grow well and healthy together, and this in every sense of the word. We have been capable of establishing, not only over our country, great and efficient communications, in the air, on land, and on the sea, but we have extended these far beyond the horizon to distant countries all over the globe. We have acted as a purveyor of grains and minerals for people in want. We have marketed our manufactured products in almost every country. We have provided, generously, foreign aid to many of the poorer nations for their individual welfare, advancement and development, without incurring their reproach or adverse criticism.

We have managed to advance among us our culture, our arts, our education, our science and we have contributed to our physical betterment and our health. We have been adopting each of us another culture and more and more at least one other language besides our own. We have learned to respect one another's customs, religion, philosophy and language of origin.

If we have not always shared the same policies and the same ideas, we nevertheless have respected here the wish of the majority and learned to do justice to the rights of the individuals.

We have lived, I feel, here and everywhere in Canada quite happily together and we have never hesitated to welcome one and all from all parts of our world to join us and become permanent Canadians, sharing at our table our good fortunes. We have, in spite of a few spotlighted incidents, shown each other the true brotherhood so necessary to advance and progress together. For the first hundred years we have done all this.

We have had problems, injustice, and economic inequalities and those who have thought their rights affected have fought well and are still doing so with the zeal and spirit characteristic of Canadians.

This is a good omen, and we can look forward with hope, never contented with what has been achieved, ever rising in the greatness of the future and ever aiming at the great objectives of justice, equality and perfection such as are obtainable on this earth. The application of the golden rule has been most rewarding to all of us.

The men and women whose memory is recalled in this Centennial have paid dearly through their personal efforts and suffering to make us into what we are, for we are looking forward to a future which our most prophetic forebears could never imagine and we are duty-bound to laud the progressive ideas, the tolerance and the political talents of men and to become conscious of the rules which made all these accomplishments possible.

The better to understand them, let us recall the very factors which brought on Confederation and which too few know, unfortunately, but which undoubtedly have had an important influence on our thinking and which will help us determine why Canada undertook, among other things, the unprecedented task of uniting two peoples into a single nation and to invite all peoples to a common table.

Canada before 1867 would seem to us a very strange world. It had none of the things we consider normal today: large plants, major metropolitan centres, large cities, national highways, automobiles, airplanes, television, electricity. At that time, there were only a few miles of railroads along the St. Lawrence river.

The population was approximately 3½ millions of which 80 per cent were concentrated in the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada—Quebec and Ontario. Four-fifths of the population lived in rural areas. Quebec and Montreal, with some 100,000 inhabitants, were by far the most important Canadian centres.

A small number of industrial undertakings, crafts and services throughout the inhabited regions depended on agriculture and the primary products of the forest and of the sea.

In those days, on each family had to shift for itself, as the economy was still in its embryonic stage. Income was spent mostly on basic needs: food, clothes and lodging. A worker could always go back to the farm to gain independence. Still, the growth of population and the aspiration for a broader scope of life were gradually becoming obvious.

Between 1848 and 1854, Canadian affairs reached such a low ebb that people started to wonder about the very survival of Canada. The introduction of free trade in Great Britain and the accompanying removal of the preference enjoyed by Canada on British markets gave even more weight to the argument of supporters of the union with the United States. Domestically, Canada was facing several frustrating matters with no apparent solutions within the framework of the existing political institutions.

In 1864, the country was mature for a federation. The American War of Secession, which had begun in 1861, had created difficulties with the northern states and even the Canadian boundary came under fire. Fear of invasion was more than an invention of the mind.

Confederation, in turn, was the rejection of political and economical annexation by the United States. Left to itself, even within a huge empire, each province was too weak to ensure its own economic stability or resist armed pressures from its powerful neighbour to the south.

What remained to be done except to try to bring about an agreement which would enable not a group of isolated provinces with a limited population but a unified community to face the danger?

How else could Canada keep on living and preserve her identity in America? That is how our nation was born.

In 1867, the Fathers of Confederation created something which did not yet exist: a new nationality. They recognized the need for compromise, for tolerance and the very simple and useful art of disagreeing in a friendly way. The rest of the story is undoubtedly better known.

After a hundred years, it is realistic to think that this Confederation agreement or pact may require some amending as far as some of its clauses are concerned to meet all the needs of the space age, but I am not one of those who think that many important points need to be revised.

Nevertheless, it would be quite unreasonable to take the Fathers of Confederation to task for their failure to foresee all we were to accomplish and the future developments in our country. In spite of all the deficiencies found in it by some people, it must be said to its great credit that it has ensured us one hundred years of continued and tremendous progress as a country made up of two cultures, each with its own particular spirit and way of life.

For the millions of men and women who have left foreign countries to settle in Canada since 1867, our country has really proved to be a new land, because of its freedom, its opportunities and its promises.

Confederation succeeded in uniting three of four racial and political groups, some of which had been unrelenting enemies until then. They came to the conclusion that they had to live together and that they needed a framework, in which they would find their proper place. Being aware that we were part of a whole, they realized that no individual, no municipality, no county, no province could usefully contribute to the well-being of Canada as a whole, through seeking by sheer force, as individuals, the solution to local problems. That was the good side of it: the magnitude and the vision of its future.

It was sound judgment, I believe, on the part of Sir Wilfrid Laurier who, like the Right Honourable Louis St-Laurent, was from the Eastern Townships and the Wellington division, which I have the honour to represent here today, to say the following in 1889, as regards Confederation:

> When Confederation was established, it was not meant to be founded upon the humiliation of any race whatsoever. It was not contended that any race whatsoever had to sacrifice its own character, but it was hoped that while maintaining its individuality, each nationality would contribute with all others to the formation of one nation. It is in that same spirit and in accordance with the principle laid down at the time of Confederation, that there should be many provinces, that there should be a division, but at the same time a union of all.

We, Canadians of today, in the light of the achievements of the past, will be in a better position to foresee what to do in the years to come in order that the second centennial of our country, which will be celebrated by our descendants, will see a stronger and more united Canada, made greater through daring accomplishments and composed of prosperous and developed provinces eager to ensure the welfare of each and every one of their citizens.

They say the population will double approximately every 33 years. It will have reached 40 million around the year 2000, 80 million around the year 2034 and more than 150 million for the celebration of our second centenary in 2067. The stimulus to our economy will enable our nation and our provinces to envisage undreamed of achievements.

The Speech from the Throne mentioned that achievement which Expo 67 is. I should now like to say a few words on the subject. At the opening of Expo, last April 27, the right honourable Prime Minister said:

> Our country can only exist inasmuch as unity of thought and action in the diversity of linguistic, cultural and social origins can be achieved.

As for His Excellency Mr. Pierre Dupuy, General Commissioner of Expo, this is how he ended his speech on the same occasion:

> We have tried to reassure man, to make him understand his role, however small it may be, by showing him that the things which divide his fellowmen are less important than those which unite them.

His Worship the Mayor of Montreal, Mr. Jean Drapeau, said:

> Great nations are formed in continuity.

Honourable Daniel Johnson, Premier of the Province of Quebec, expressed the wish that young people may emerge from this experience better prepared to play their part as citizens of the world.

A young nation of some 20 million was offering to the whole world a unique example of what can be accomplished through collective work and effort, of what had just been achieved through unity of action and purpose. I have never been so proud, as a Canadian, to see the flags of the most important nations in the world raised one after the other, at the call of the name of the nation, and to see at last our Canadian flag flying with dignity beside those of the great nations of the world.

I have been, as all of you I am sure, deeply moved when the band buoyantly and with feeling, broke into our national anthem officially recognized at last. Before this magnificent and significant spectacle, we, from all the corners of the earth, rejoiced together at the sight, it must now be admitted, of this marvel of our century.

Like many others, I felt it was a stirring appeal for a renewal of our Canadian patriotism. How happy we would be to see that Canadian patriotism recover its former strength, under our new flag and to the strains of our moving national anthem.

That, honourable senators, was the message conveyed by Expo 67 on the first centennial of our nation. Its high cost, shared among our governments in order to celebrate this first centennial, has naturally worried a large number of people; but the history of our young nation is filled with such sacrifices and worries. It cannot be otherwise from now on if we wish to continue to progress. Let us only hope that our other ventures will always come to such successful conclusions.

It is fitting to mention particularly all those who have carried out such a tremendous undertaking. Their devotion, patience and steadfastness will serve as an example for all Canadians. Their reward will be the satisfaction of an outstanding and superb achievement and the attainment of the symbol which derives from it and remains engraved in our minds: "work done through unity of action and purpose."

This unprecedented event will be, for Canada, the consecration of its maturity as a nation, acknowledged by both its own people and the rest of the world. It will constitute a national awakening as well as a contribution to the unity of mankind.

One of the most important pieces of legislation mentioned in the throne speech seems to be the one for a better regulation and "use of broadcasting privileges and responsibilities". It was also particularly important, I think, to introduce now a bill concerning the provision of television facilities for educational purposes, such a bill is very timely and will be a piece of legislation that will be of great significance for everyone of us.

Let me repeat a remark you may have heard often.

Our knowledge is developing at a geometrically growing pace in all dimensions. From the beginning of the Christian era to 1750, knowledge doubled. It doubled again from 1750 to 1900, that is during the 150 years that followed. It doubled again during the next fifty years, between 1900 and 1950. It is generally agreed that it doubled once more within ten years, between 1950 and 1960 and again within five years, between 1960 and 1965. Progressing at such a giddying speed, it seems that the teaching and spreading of all the acquired knowledge can keep pace with these developments only if it is recorded, not only in books but also on tapes and computers for national and even international dissemination.

Therefore, educational television and broadcasting control are becoming important. We will have to scrutinize this area very closely.

The Prime Minister also stated that the Government is aware of the economic, social and cultural consequences arising from the development of communications by satellite.

Mindful of what is being developed, I think that we have here the opportunity of studying, in due course, a legislation of the utmost importance, in its principles as well as in its implications, for the future of Canadians.

The establishment of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the building of a railway system were vital phases in the development of our country. Today, while we are coming closer to the 21st century, we must contemplate seriously playing a rôle in space communications and connecting every part of our country through technological advances.

It is as if all great world events were always happening before our eyes. We are also at an important period in our history when our decisions in the communications field indicate whether or not we accept the challenge of modern science. Canada has an essential part to play in outer space, not only because we have in Canada the men and institutions required to assure us of an important place, but also because we will have to compete with communications from other countries coming by satellites. The whole world will have access to all our homes and we will find it impossible to check that presence. We must therefore give ourselves the institutions which will enable us to present our vision of the world while serving the Canadian people according to priority powers required in our country. For purposes of education, information and recreation, and as a factor of unity, we have the heavy responsibility to secure immediately a station in space and launch a communications satellite for the benefit of the Canadian population.

This represents a complete revolution in the field of picture and thought transmission, the immediate result of which will be to bring together all Canadians and stir up the Canadian conscience on a world scale.

The Science Secretariat of the responsible branches of private enterprise as well as our Government, which voiced its feelings through the Prime Minister two weeks ago, have understood the importance devolved upon Canada in space. All branches will be reconsidered, and it would be desirable that private and public enterprise should unite their efforts and create together the institution which will guarantee our country an important rôle in the field of space communications.

It appears to me opportune to comment here, marginally to the Speech from the Throne, on our economic situation. Perhaps never since its existence as a nation has Canada known such a desirable economy as in 1966. Providence was particularly favourable to all of us, even if we had to undergo a mild form of inflation. Peaks were reached in numerous sectors, and generally it is not an exaggeration to say we had our best economic year. These results coming after so many good years have given us a feeling of continued stable security.

Our economy had been progressing at so fast a pace that it became necessary many months ago to apply the brakes. Actually, our progress was more rapid than that of all the great industrial countries except one. This is a great testimonial to the efforts made freely by free people who work in a competitive economy.

But, as always, the price of a rapid increase brought again the surging danger of inflation and its hideous results. The occurring situation was and is being dealt with quite effectively by the Government in order to avoid a feared unbalanced economy.

Now, however, our situation has somewhat changed. It is good to know that the Government intends to table measures to broaden the scope of the Area Development Incentive program, and to promote industrial development in the Atlantic region. Effectively, this will help regulate some of the slow-ups in our industries, prevent further increases in unemployment, and better cope with the economic problems of certain areas.

In my appreciation, honourable senators, there is also now an urgent need to encourage new modernizations in our industries, and to call again on the practical intelligence of capital and labour to adapt themselves now to these unavoidable technical changes.

There are presently other challenges. As it was said yesterday, we must work to obtain a higher Canadian level of employment, and we must continue to increase our Canadian production potential. This will require not only the combined efforts of Canadian labour and Canadian capital, but of our Government. The review of relationship between industry, labour, and government is, I believe, a step in the right direction.

May I say that I am glad to find that there was no substantiation of a rumour of discontinuance of depletion allowances because there are great uncertainties involved in natural resources developments. There are very high costs and, what are not often mentioned aloud but which are of major importance, the attractiveness of the rewards and the reliefs from taxation offered in certain promising countries for the development of mining and oil industries. The removal of depletion allowances in Canada would, I venture to say, cause material reallocation of exploration efforts.

The Canadian economy is potentially capable of a more rapid advance than that of most other industrial nations. We have abundant natural resources. We need new houses, and new legislative facilities to provide them are being proposed. We have a rapidly growing labour force which can be further easily increased through our immigration policies. It will be helped by constructive legislation.

We have easy access to the technology of the great industrialized countries. There are the possibilities that large amounts of capital could, with proper government policies, yield a long-term rate of growth in the volume of Gross National Product of more than 7 per cent per annum, and again these possibilities will come before us for our study and consideration.

We noted with satisfaction in the speech these words:

> While the Government is conscious of the desirability of a greater degree of domestic control of our resources and our key industries, it is also aware of the continuing importance of inflows of foreign investment in order to ensure an optimum development of the economy.

In my opinion, in the foreseeable future any earmarking of capital for the purpose of buying back American investments would have disastrous effects. It would take off billions of dollars greatly needed for the normal expansion of our young nation and the assurance of its short and long-term progress. We are a young nation. We need capital for our expansion. By ourselves we have been unable to assure our economic expansion with the proper monentum.

I feel Canada should lead the way in promoting internationalism as the best rewarding Canadian policy. Two-thirds of Canada's net liabilities to foreigners take the form of direct investments. Recently one of this continent's ablest economists affirmed that to do away with foreign investments would retard Canada's growth by reducing capital inflow, and cause the using of Canadian resources to buy back established enterprises rather than start new ones. It would also cause a corresponding reduction in the importation of technology and know-how which goes with direct investment, rather than bonded debt. It would result in an increased debt investment, and it would dislocate international capital markets.

I am sure that the White Paper on this subject will fully recognize these basic economic laws and will take into full consideration our great financial needs.

Honourable senators, we must be pleased to note that the Government plans to create, under the direction of the Department of Agriculture, a special team entrusted with defining the goals in the field of agriculture and with making recommendations on how to implement them.

It is generally believed that, with the exception of grain-growing out West, our whole approach to agriculture, to its techniques, the marketing of products as well here as abroad, is in urgent need of revision. The economic drain caused by the spending of an important part of our budget on food imports, holds all the basic elements of serious difficulties which might plague the economy of Canada.

In eastern Canada, the number of our farmers is decreasing because of poverty, destitution and lack of facilities and comfort on the farms, while our imports of foodstuffs are increasing considerably, in spite of the so-called off-season high prices.

It was said that our climate caused all our agricultural difficulties. Personally, I think that this does not account for the actual situation. In eastern Canada, agricultural economy, marketing and research concerning markets and the sale of agricultural products must be reconsidered; scientific research or an investigation could be undertaken in this field, to enable us to regain some ground and to meet our needs by our own means.

According to projections, our population will reach 150 million at the time of our next centennial. It seems to me, honourable senators, that this group will have to reconsider many notions which prevail at present in agriculture.

Let me recall the recent statements of Dr. Grindley, one of the best known agricultural economists and, for many years, the chief of the agricultural division of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics:

> As we enter our second centennial as a nation, the future of Canadian agriculture cannot be adequately considered without some reflection on the past and without observing the trends already noticeable. The farm movement has not yet been truly accepted and there are more dark clouds than rainbows awaiting us. The whole farm movement continues to show considerable uncertainty, discontent and division. There will be no obviously apparent direction due to a lack of a common philosophy. The whole concept of soil cultivation will have to be reconsidered from its very basis and compared to large scale cultivation in far-off areas under a benevolent sun.

We have witnessed a decrease of our rural population from 70 per cent to 7 per cent since Confederation.

Even though everybody realizes it is now a much more productive force than before, we depend at present to a great extent on foreign countries for our foodstuffs. Canadian agriculture, especially in eastern Canada, could contribute more to our economic development, by deriving new values from our soil without draining our resources for all that. Unfortunately, it has become one of our country's problems.

The Speech from the Throne mentions new Canadian legislation concerning water resources which will serve as a basis for the improvement and implementation of a national water policy, thereby helping to do away with much of the present confusion in this field. We welcome the fact that constructive measures will be taken in Canada to eliminate as much as possible this great evil of water pollution.

We now witness the tragedy of Lake Erie and the pollution of many lakes and rivers that have become actual public hazards. It would also be to our advantage to include in our considerations all other types of pollution which cause large scale problems.

In some areas, the air is fouled by harmful acids and carbons declared prejudicial to public health and, as a consequence, water is dangerous in many places. Of course, it may be difficult to demand strict water control to prevent this pollution which, in some cases, is caused by industries. However, there are excellent economic means which may permit an adequate control.

A few moments ago I mentioned our rapid progress in all fields of knowledge. During this session we will be called upon to study government measures to put Canada's technological and scientific capacity in the very first rank among the nations of the world.

The study announced by the Government will give the brightest hopes for the future of all Canadians. It is a historical project of the greatest importance since the Government is proposing to recommend a much considerable aid to science and technology, in the widest sense of the word, and to encourage more investment in that field by our Canadian companies. The Canadian citizen has never had so much support in his efforts to increase his scientific and technological knowledge.

We are pleased to note the efforts of the Canadian Government to bring about a settlement of the conflict which has already been going on for too long in Vietnam.

The Canadian proposal to co-operate in the establishment of an international presence in Vietnam is perhaps the key to an impending agreement that would put an end to that disturbing conflict.

In my opinion, Canada has also gained the consideration, the confidence and respect of nations for its present international policy on disarmament. Its desire not only to see peace restored throughout the world but to help to attain it by all available means should comfort all our fellow-citizens.

Honourable senators, I shall stop here and refrain from commenting on the important bills relating to urban renewal, changes to our Immigration Act, and to Government statutes on arts, letters and science, as well as legislation proposed with respect to manpower, which are all important pieces of legislation and will all stress the Canadian development in this centennial year.

It does not seem right to pass lightly over these. Moreover, they will not escape the attention of this house.

We give thanks to Providence for the achievements of the first hundred years of our young nation. They are not negligible.

We remain proud to proclaim ourselves Canadians, free Canadians, free to speak, to think, to express ourselves, to act, to practise the religion of our choice, to stand up for what we believe is right and to object to what we consider wrong.

It is this heritage of freedom that we want to preserve here, with you, during this second session of our 27th Parliament.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Nichol, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

REPORT OF THE NINTH MEETING OF THE CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

The Ninth Annual Meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group was held from May 18th to 22nd, 1966.

A series of briefing sessions on the meeting's agenda and on travel arrangements for the delegation took place during the two weeks preceding our departure for Washington. These briefings were conducted by members of the U.S. Division of the Department of External Affairs and by the Co-ordinating Secretary for Parliamentary Associations.

The Canadian Delegation, jointly led by the Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable Sydney J. Smith, and the Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Herman M. Batten, M.P., left for the American Capital on Wednesday, May 18th, at 1.00 P.M., aboard an R.C.A.F. Yukon aircraft. The Delegation also included the following members of the Senate and of the House of Commons:

Senators: Hon. Sarto Fournier (Quebec); Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary (Ontario); Hon. Orville H. Phillips, D.D.S. (Prince Edward Island); Hon. Nelson Rattenbury (New Brunswick); Hon. John B. Aird (Ontario).

Members of the House of Commons: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Saskatchewan); Hon. Théogène Ricard (Quebec); Mr. Donald S. Macdonald (Ontario); Mr. Wallace B. Nesbitt (Ontario); Mr. Robert C. Coates (Nova Scotia); Mr. Robert Simpson (Manitoba); Mr. Alexander Patterson (British Columbia); Mr. Andrew Brewin (Ontario); Mr. Viateur Ethier (Ontario); Dr. Allan M. A. McLean (New Brunswick); Mr. Reid Scott (Ontario); Mr. David W. Groos (British Columbia); Mr. Paul Langlois (Quebec); Mr. David S. MacDonald (Prince Edward Island); Mr. R. J. (Bud) Orange (Northwest Territories); Mr. Gérard Pelletier (Quebec); Mr. Alcide J. Simard (Quebec).

Senator, the Honourable George Aiken (Vermont) and Representative, the Honourable Cornelius E. Gallagher (New Jersey) were Co-Chairmen of the United States Delegation. Other delegates from the United States Congress were:

Senators: Hon. Mike Mansfield (Montana); Hon. Eugene J. McCarthy (Minnesota); Hon. Edmund S. Muskie (Maine); Hon. Lee Metcalf (Montana); Hon. Daniel K. Inouye (Hawaii); Hon. Ross Bass (Tennessee); Hon. Bourke B. Hickenlooper (Iowa); Hon. Everett Saltonstall (Massachussetts); Hon. Margaret Chase Smith (Maine); Hon. Norris Cotton (New Hampshire); Hon. Robert P. Griffin (Michigan).

Representatives: Hon. Edna F. Kelly (New York); Hon. William T. Murphy (Illinois); Hon. Harold T. Johnson (California; Hon. Fernand J. St. Germain (Rhode Island); Hon. James Kee (West Virginia); Hon. Otis G. Pike (Long Island); Hon. Mark Andrews (North Dakota); Hon. Robert T. Stafford (Vermont); Hon. Vernon W. Thomson (Wisconsin); Hon. James G. Fulton (Pennsylvania); Hon. John J. Duncan (Tennessee).

Agenda and Proceedings

The meetings got underway Thursday morning, May 19th, in the Old Supreme Court Chamber of the United States Capitol, when Secretary of State Dean Rusk officially welcomed the Canadian Parliamentarians to Washington. In his inaugural address, Mr. Rusk remarked that while 98% of the matters between our two countries did not require discussion, it was a good thing that the 2% that might require discussion be examined in an informal and friendly atmosphere by a body such as the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group.

Immediately following this opening plenary session, the delegates were formed, as in the past, into two committees—one on Trade and Economic Affairs and the other on Defence and Security—and were led off into their separate meetings by their respective Co-Chairmen. Each Committee met three times.

The Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs was under the joint chairmanship of Senator Aiken and Senator Sydney Smith. Representing the United States Congress were: Senators McCarthy, Muskie, Metcalf, Bass, Cotton and Griffin; and Representatives Johnson, St. Germain, Kee, Andrews and Duncan. Representing the Canadian Parliament were: Hon. John B. Aird, Hon. Grattan O'Leary, and the Hon. Sarto Fournier, from the Senate; and Hon. Alvin Hamilton, P.C., Hon. Théogène Ricard, P.C., Messrs. Robert Coates, Viateur Ethier, Paul Langlois, Dr. Allan McLean, Bud Orange, Reid Scott and Robert Simpson, from the House of Commons.

The discussions centered on the Kennedy Round of Tariff Negotiations, the Balance of Payment Problem, Aid to Developing Countries, Water Pollution and the Improvement of the Richelieu-Champlain Waterway. The question of paving the Alaska Highway was also raised, to which the Canadian Delegation expressed the view that while this was not of prime importance to this country, Canada might consider underwriting the cost of the entire project herself in exchange for access rights to tidewater through the Alaska Panhandle.

The Committee on Defence and Security was co-chaired by Congressman Gallagher and Mr. Batten. Its composition was as follows: from the United States Congress—Senators Mansfield, Inouye, Hickenlooper, Saltonstall and Smith; and Representatives Murphy, Pike, Stafford and Thomson.

The Canadian Parliament was represented by the Honourable Orville Phillips, and the Honourable Nelson Rattenbury, of the Senate; and Messrs. Andrew Brewin, David Groos, David MacDonald, Donald Macdonald, Wallace Nesbitt, Alexander Patterson, Gérard Pelletier and Alcide Simard, of the House of Commons.

The main topics on the Agenda were* NATO, Military Assistance to Developing Countries, U.N. Peacekeeping Operations and U.N. Finances, and Problems of Southeast Asia. The first and the third are most certainly atmosphere, many questions of continuing sent two areas in which Canada's international personality has come to light in no small way in recent years. Southeast Asia is, of course, a major concern of every peace-seeking nation in the world today.

In the course of the discussion, views were also exchanged on the questions of closer economic ties with Eastern Europe and of mainland China's admission to the U.N., and the possibility of her official recognition by Canada.

Thus were reviewed, in a frank and friendly atmosphere, many questions of continuing mutual interest to Canada and the United States.

Social Program

Good relations were further cemented in the course of a round of most enjoyable and successful social functions. On the day of arrival in Washington, both delegations were entertained by Mr. Charles Ritchie, then Canadian Ambassador to the United States. The United States Delegation hosted the Canadian parliamentarians at both luncheon and dinner on the nineteenth of May. Prior to the luncheon, our Canadian delegates met and talked with Speaker McCormack of the House of Representatives and other members of the House.

Ladies' Program

While their husbands were attending the meetings, the wives of the Canadian delegates were escorted on sightseeing and shopping tours of Washington by the wives of the American delegates. Mrs. Cornelius Gallagher also entertained visiting ladies at a special luncheon held in the Smithsonian Institute on May 19th.

*Attached, as Appendices I and II are the full joint reports issued immediately following the last meetings of the two committees.

Introduction from the floor of the Senate

After the morning session on May 19th, the Canadian Delegates were introduced to the Members of the United States Senate from the floor of the Chamber. The text of the Congessional Record reporting the event is reproduced here as Appendix III.

Meeting with the President

President Johnson graciously received the Canadian Delegates and their wives in the White House in the afternoon of the nineteenth. In a short address, he stated that our two countries each have an important role to play on the international scene. Our respective roles are different, he explained, but we all have one goal: peace, and must not get discouraged in these difficult times, but rather keep hard at our tasks and entertain mutual respect for each other's positions.

Following this, to the delight of all of our Delegates, the President took time out of his busy schedule to chat with them and escort them on a tour of the grounds and public rooms of the White House.

Tour of AEC Facilities, Oak Ridge, Tenn.

Friday, both delegations left Washington for Oak Ridge, Tennessee, and where an informational tour of the U.S. Energy Commission installations took place on Saturday.

There, we were told of the wide range of applications of nuclear energy, from the manufacturing of weapons to sophisticated experiments in genetics.

Many Canadian scientists and technicians are now working in Oak Ridge. We had a chance to meet them at a reception held the evening before at the Oak Ridge Country Club, and at which AEC Commissioner Gerald Pate praised their contribution to American nuclear research. Mr. Pate also stated that the ties between Oak Ridge and other American nuclear centres and Chalk River in Canada were very close. Indeed, in an editorial, the daily Oak Ridger welcomed the Canadian Delegation to the "Chalk River of the South".

Before reaching Oak Ridge, we also had an opoprtunity to see Melton Hill Dam, part of the vast power and water conservation complex of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Gatlinburg

The last day was spent in the resort town of Gatlinburg in the Great Smoky Mountains. It will be well remembered for the magnificent scenery and weather, and a most enjoyable cookout, complete with folk music.

On Sunday, May 22nd, the Canadian Delegation flew back directly from Knoxville, Tennessee, to Ottawa, aboard an RCAF Yukon aircraft.

U.S. Parliamentary Hospitality

We feel, after this very brief description of the events that took place between May 18th and 22nd, that a warm word of praise should be said about the impeccable, yet seemingly effortless precision and order in which the program was carried out. The staffs of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the House Commitee on Foreign Affairs were ably assisted by military liaison personnel under Col. Donald Rattan and Lt.-Col. William Rice. We were treated with the utmost consideration and understanding by civilian and military staff alike; each of them was in perfect control of the situation at all times and they were more than ready to meet the particular wishes of any of their Canadian visitors.

Next Year's Meetings

Next year's meetings will be held in Ottawa; thus Canada's turn to host the United States Delegation falls most appropriately during her Centennial Year. The formal meetings here will be followed by a visit to Expo 67 in Montreal. We do indeed look forward to the next one in this series of annual meetings which provide such an ideal forum for parliamentarians on both sides of the border.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE I

TRADE AND ECONOMIC MATTERS—KENNEDY ROUND OF TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS

Initial discussion of the Committee on Trade and Economic Matters centered on the Kennedy Round of tariff negotiations. Both delegations agreed that the United States and Canada share a fundamental interest in the ultimate success of the negotiations since substantial liberalization of world trade would benefit all participating countries. The delegates exchanged views on the problems posed for the two countries by current policies of the European Economic Community, particularly by the attempts of the Common Market countries to reach a common price for agricultural products.

The United States delegation expressed the hope that barriers to the successful completion of the Kennedy Round could be surmounted and that highest priority could then be given to the timely completion of these negotiations. The Canadian delegation expressed its hope that the United States will continue to provide the strong support for trade liberalization that it has provided in the past. The American delegation noted that as efforts at liberalization of trade proceed, the United States will continue to seek adequate adjustments for American industries and agricultural sectors that could be injured by the process. The Canadians urged that both countries explore the problems posed by the relationship between developing nations and the industrialized nations.

The Committee discussed current problems of trade between the United States and Canada. The Canadian delegation pointed out its concern with restrictions on the entry of certain Canadian products into the United States. The United States pointed to the recent increase in the quota on Cheddar cheese as an example of its recognition of that concern. Both delegations noted the need for the two countries to continue to work closely in all aspects of trade, including the negotiation of a world cereals agreement in which the two North American exporting countries have a strong interest.

Balance of Payments

The Committee on Trade and Economic Matters discussed the continuing balance of payments deficit in both the United States and Canada. The two delegations exchanged views on the advantages and disadvantages of the present international monetary system. The Canadian delegation pointed out the problem of gold reserves, discussed the difficulties that might arise from arbitrarily changing the value of gold, and discussed the possibility of moving to a new international unit. Both agreed that this is a problem that only government-to-government consultations can resolve.

The Canadian delegation pointed out that the balance of payments deficit of the U.S. and Canada arise from different causes in each country. While the United States exports large amounts of liquid capital, Canada runs both a trade and an interest and dividend payment deficit.

The U.S. delegation pointed out that the huge investment by American citizens in Canada is a factor in aiding the Canadian balance of payments and has played an important part in the economic development of Canada. The Canadians noted the importance of the United States' continuing to allow the free movement of funds across the common border.

The United States delegation expressed its confidence that no head tax will be placed on American tourists going to Canada. The Canadians emphasized their interest in this question, especially with the planned World's Fair, Expo 67, in Montreal next year. The Canadian delegation also expressed the hope that the United States would increase the limit on the goods that tourists can bring back from Canada duty free. The Canadians stressed that Canada may pursue an economic policy combining elements of self-interest as well as those of an international outlook. Each delegation asked that careful consideration be given to its balance of payments problems.

Aid to Developing Countries

The Committee discussed the trade and development problems of the developing nations. The Canadian delegation pointed out the widening gap between the economies of the developed and developing countries and urged consideration of means of enabling the "third world" to attain a higher living standard. Among suggested alternatives to direct grants and gifts of food were international commodity agreements on the price and production of primary products. The Canadian delegation pointed out that such an agreement might also be expanded to include certain classes of manufactured goods. Another method discussed was the possible establishment of international trading companies, either government or private, which would allow developing nations to market more efficiently their primary products. The delegations further recognized the need for self-help measures by developing countries and increased aid efforts by private organizations and international bodies.

Both delegations acknowledged the problems involved in foreign aid. The U.S. delegation remarked that in many cases United States aid funds have been misused or misapplied in the recipient countries. The United States representatives pointed out the necessity of choosing carefully the recipients of foreign aid and the techniques to be used in each situation. The Canadians expressed the view that more low-interest long-term loans should be granted to developing countries. The U.S. delegation suggested that more emphasis should be placed on the development of co-operatives, improvement of local banking institutions, and other such means of financing development. Both delegations agreed that the problem of foreign aid merits increased study and review by both countries.

Water Pollution and Water Development

The Canadian delegation presented an opening statement on water pollution. Though North America has been blessed with enormous fresh water resources, carelessness and a lack of interest have made little more than cesspools of many of our great rivers and lakes. While the cost will be heavy, measures must now be commenced throughout North America to rectify past and present courses of pollution. In Canada, however, there is an additional problem in that jurisdiction over water is divided between the Federal and provincial governments, and the Canadian delegation expressed the hope that suitable legislation could be passed in Canada to place the development of water resources under the Federal Government. Such a policy would allow constructive measures to be started and could lead to a North American resource development program for water.

The U.S. delegation concurred in the importance of a fresh water supply and in the need for increased action to solve the common problem of water pollution. U.S. representatives detailed some of the measures the United States is taking or considering to deal with water pollution, for example, through joint efforts by the State and Federal governments, through desalinization of sea water, and through transport of clean water to needy areas.

The Americans, however, acknowledged the great need for more careful use and preservation of water resources and stressed the importance of additional government emphasis on solving this problem. The Canadian delegation called for the establishment of more effective intergovernmental machinery between the United States and Canada to stimulate increased common cooperation and action to preserve water resources. They suggested that the International Joint Commission might be utilized to advise on the initiation of such a joint effort. The U.S. delegation concurred in this recommendation. The Canadian delegation posed the question of whether or not an amendment to the Boundary Waters Treaty to specifically include water pollution under the Treaty might overcome some constitutional difficulties.

The two delegations exchanged views on the proposed North American water and power alliance between the United States and Canada. The U.S. representatives drew the attention of the committee to the growing U.S. need for increased supplies of clean water and suggested the possibility of using water from Canada and Alaska. The U.S. delegation pointed out that the possibility of a five-year study of this problem is under consideration. The Canadian delegates pointed out that their government has initiated a study of this problem and it is not in a position to take any action until the final report is received.

Improvement of Richelieu-Champlain Waterway

The U.S. delegation initiated the discussion of the Richelieu-Champlain Waterway by outlining the past consideration given to the problem of improving this waterway. U.S. representatives reminded the Committee of the recent report of the International Champlain Waterway Board, set up under the auspices of the International Joint Commission, which stated that the Board had found no evidence that an improved waterway would contribute significantly to the economies of Canada and the United States. Both delegations pointed out, however, that in their view an improved waterway would encourage increased use of the canal for recreational purposes and would lead to stimulation of commercial activities in the area. The Canadian delegation noted that strong local support for improvement of the waterway and recognition of the need for providing entries to the canal system at both Montreal and Sorel, exists along the canal.

The delegations were in agreement that in addition to waterways, the two countries also have common transportation interests because of interconnecting highways, railroads, pipelines, and airlines. The U.S. representatives expressed the hope that the two countries would devote increased attention to this common interest and, specifically, that the 1967 meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group would study the transportation policies in detail.

Alaska Highway Improvements

The Canadian delegation opened the discussion by making reference to the need for Canada to have access to tidewater through the Alaska panhandle. The Canadian delegates regarded the Alaska panhandle boundary as an impediment to the development of that region of Canada and urged the U.S. delegation to inquire of the U.S. State Department whether or not adjustments could be made in the boundary to provide for Canadian access to tidewater. The problem was considered so grave that while Canada was not really interested in paving the Alaska Highway, it would seriously consider doing so for access rights. It was urged that the U.S. Department of State consider this problem within the context of a solution to the highway improvement problem which concerns the United States.

The U.S. delegation replied that a bill was pending in the Senate to provide for 50 per cent of the cost of paving the Alaska Highway and that many studies had shown that the paving of the Alaska Highway was economically feasible. There was a need in the Pacific Northwest for more north-south transportation links and that steps should be taken on both sides to speed up the very slow progress in achieving a satisfactory solution to this problem.

Other Items

The Canadian delegation requested the U.S. delegation to study possible revision of two laws considered inequitable to Canada. The U.S. delegation was requested to examine the U.S. requirements concerning the import to the U.S. of scientific, cultural and educational films as well as the U.S. requirements concerning the loss of U.S. copyright for works published outside the U.S. for import into the U.S. market.

APPENDIX II

REPORT OF COMMITTEE II—DEFENCE AND SECURITY MATTERS

During the first session of the Committee on Defence and Security Matters, the delegates gave most of their attention to the current crisis in NATO. Several Canadian and American delegates noted that the United States and Canada faced some common problems as a result of General de Gaulle's recent initiatives, since both countries at present have military installations and troops in France which must be moved in the near future.

It was recognized that negotiations with the French Government on many matters would be necessary nad that it would be important to ensure an equitable settlement of the costs involved.

While recognizing that the 14 allies of France face difficult and complex decisions in the coming months, several Canadian delegates expressed the hope that NATO members would continue to exercise restraint in their dealing with the French Government. These delegates thought that recriminations should be avoided and that every effort should be made to reach practical arrangements for continuing cooperation between NATO and France. In this connection, it was noted that a number of urgent questions were pending: The future status of French forces stationed in West Germany, NATO overflights of French Territory and access by NATO members to NATO infrastructure facilities in France in case of an emergency.

A number of Canadian delegates expressed the opinion that General de Gaulle had not closed the door to negotiations on these subjects and that these negotiations should be undertaken promptly. In response, several American delegates expressed the belief that great damage had already been done to the organization and ventured doubts that negotiations could remedy that damage. They suggested that it would be difficult to maintain NATO as a viable military organization without active French participation. They also expressed concern that the conventional defence capabilities of NATO would be affected by French withdrawal.

The future structure and purpose of NATO were examined. A number of delegates expressed the view that careful thought should be given to the possibility of adjusting the organization to better achieve the objective of a settlement in Europe rather than allow it to become simply a means of maintaining the status quo. In this connection the possibility of a nuclear free zone was discussed but several delegates commented on the difficulty of de-emphasizing nuclear defence in Europe during a period when the territory of France would not be available for the deployment of forces capable of defensive action with conventional weapons. This did not, however, mean that there should not be a change in emphasis within NATO from an essentially defensive organization to one in which there would be greater scope for diplomacy and the working out of initiatives vis-a-vis members of the Warsaw Pact should it appear that Eastern Europe gave promise of their being productive.

The future location of the NATO Council, the NATO military headquarters and the NATO military committee was discussed. A number of delegates considered that there would be important disadvantages in having the Council and the military headquarters widely separated. The view was expressed, however, that there would be equally important advantages in retaining the council in Paris in the interest of maintaining as many ties as possible between France and other members of the Alliance. A number of delegates regarded it as important that both the council and the military headquarters should remain on the European Continent. As regards the removal of the military committee from Washington, several United States delegates observed that, given the extent of United States military involvement, it would not be in the interest of efficiency to modify the practical working arrangements now in effect between the Committee and the United States Department of Defense.

The Commtitee turned its attention briefly to the unsolved problem of nuclear-sharing in the Alliance. It was generally agreed that the proposed MLF and ANF projects had made little headway. There was some feeling that the McNamara strategy committee might represent a more feasible approach to the problem of greater participation by non-nuclear allies in setting guidelines for the control and use of nuclear weapons. A number of delegates agreed that renewed consideration of "hardware solutions" to the nuclear sharing problem ought to be postponed until the Alliance had adjusted to the changes made necessary by French withdrawal from NATO and had re-evaluated the general political situation in Europe.

The Committee discussed briefly the prospects for closer economic relations between members of the Alliance and Eastern Europe. It was observed that Canada had a somewhat more liberal trading policy towards these countries and the question was posed whether there were any prospects for a move in this direction by the United States. In response, members of the United States delegation drew attention to recent proposals by the President of the United States in that regard. Serious reservations regarding the desirability of facilitating this trade had been expressed in Congress, however, and it seemed unlikely that these proposals would receive the support of Congress this year. It was also pointed out that there could be no support for the relaxation of restrictions agreed among NATO countries on the export of strategic goods to countries which might divert them to China or North Vietnam.

The Committee received from the Canadian delegation an account of the problems that have arisen in connection with peacekeeping operations in which Canada and other countries have been engaged. These problems, it was pointed out, are related to important questions that confront the United Nations itself such as the question of whether the United Nations should be a forum for negotiations or should have executive authority of its own and that of the extent to which the United Nations can properly become involved in the domestic affairs of its members. To these problems of a conceptual nature was added the problem of financing peacekeeping caused by the refusal of certain countries to pay their assessed shares of the costs of some of these operations. Reference was made to Canada's extensive experience in United Nations peacekeeping operations which had prompted the Canadian Government to convene a conference last year on the technical aspects of peacekeeping operations. This conference, attended by representatives of governments which had provided forces for peacekeeping under United Nations auspices resulted in useful exchanges of views and information on such matters as training and arms and equipment most appropriate for various types of operation. An account was also given of the manner in which the Secretary General of the United Nations sought the co-operation of members to provide forces which were earmarked by governments for United Nations service. It was observed that the current reorganization of Canadian defense forces would enable Canada to improve the effectiveness of its contributions.

In the discussion which followed, several United States delegates drew attention to the disproportionate share of the financial burden of the United Nations peacekeeping operations which was borne by the United States. It was agreed that subject to each operation being considered individually, it was desirable to limit, so far as possible, the share of the cost borne by all countries to their normal percentage share of United Nations programs. At the same time the Committee recognized that although serious financial burdens were created by the absence of agreement on a formula for allocating the costs of United Nations peacekeeping, both past and future, these burdens were infinitesimal in comparison to the costs of war. This fact taken together with the prospect that there will be a substantial increase in the number of countries possessing a capacity to manufacture nuclear weapons in the next few years made it evident, in the view of some delegates, that there will be an increasing need for a corresponding United Nations peacekeeping capacity. The hope was expressed that negotiations leading to the adoption of a generally acceptable formula for allocating United Nations peacekeeping costs would be concluded successfully in the coming months.

The Committee also discussed the practical political limits of United Nations peacekeeping operations. Reference was made to the difficulty of having United Nations forces operating on the territory of a state which is not a member of the United Nations. Some members of the Canadian delegation saw this as an insuperable obstacle to the employment of such forces in such areas as Vietnam or on the borders of China.

This led directly to a lively discussion of Communist China. Two related problems particularly concerned the delegates. First, is the possible admission of Communist China to the U.N. desirable and what difficulties would admission of Communist China create for the organization? Second, should policies tending to isolate Communist China in the world community be modified and especially what might be the advantages and disadvantages of Canadian recognition of the Chinese Communist government at some future time?

There was general agreement among the delegates that if Communist China were to be admitted to the U.N., some kind of two China solution might be necessary, a solution to which both Nationalist China and the Communist Chinese remain, however, firmly opposed. There was also general agreement that if and when the admission of Communist China was approved by the General Assembly of the U.N., the problem of which Chinese government would occupy China's permanent seat on the Security Council would be a particularly difficult one to resolve. It was noted, however, that while many advocate the admission of Red China to the U.N., no evidence has yet surfaced that China is associating itself with joining the United Nations.

Several American delegates expressed the view that Communist China should not be admitted to the U.N. until that country showed a definite inclination to abandon its aggressive declarations and pattern of behaviour. They remarked that admission of Communist China would mean abandoning the standards for admission set out in the U.N. Charter, and would in effect be giving a stamp of approval to Communist China's generally aggressive stance. They added that the U.S. Government maintained regular contacts with the Communist Chinese government through talks in Warsaw and that these talks had revealed no new disposition on the part of the Communist Chinese to modify their own unacceptable conditions for U.N. membership. Concern was expressed by several Canadian and American delegates over the possibility that Communist China, if admitted to the U.N., might seek to thwart the work of the organization in various areas.

A number of Canadian delegates agreed with their American counterparts that Communist China had not yet shown any disposition to compromise in order to gain U.N. membership, while it seemed at times that China preferred to remain outside the United Nations. They thought, however, that too much emphasis should not be given to the problem of standards for admission. It was their belief that a number of present members of the organization had clearly violated the U.N. Charter at various times since the establishment of the organization, and that several members of the organization had at times shown a tendency toward abusive language and aggressive behaviour on the international scene. They attached more importance to bringing Communist China into the community of the U.N. which might lead to some gradual changes in Communist Chinese attitudes than to a rigid adherence to standards for admission that would inevitably exclude Communist China. A number of Canadian delegates expressed considerable interest in a recent statement by U.S. officials in which they saw evidence that some evolution was taking place in U.S. thinking on the problem of Communist Chinese membership in the U.N.

Consideration of the problem of United Nation membership for Communist China led to a brief discussion of the advantages and disadvantages of following policies tending to isolate Communist China. Several Canadian delegates expressed the opinion that a policy of isolation carried increasing dangers, especially with Communist Chinese development of a nuclear capability well advanced. They thought that increased contacts between Western nations and Communist China could help to eliminate misconceptions about the West in China and could lead to more moderate behavior on the part of the Communist Chinese.

In this connection they noted that there was some evidence that a majority of Canadians favored Canadian recognition of Communist China. There is sentiment in Canada to recognize a nation with which Canada has important trade ties and there is interest in furthering the long-term objective of a reconciliation between Communist China and the West.

Some American delegates expressed their disagreement with the idea that increased contacts with Communist China would encourage the growth of moderation in that country. They suggested that there was some justification for a continued policy of isolation, and thought that only a firm unrelenting Western stance could lead China to change its ways. In response to a Canadian inquiry as to how Americans would receive Canadian recognition of Communist China, several American delegates frankly said that the move would be unpopular in the United States, especially given the current situation in Vietnam. However, some American delegates felt this was a problem for Canada to decide as viewed through its own national interest. In fact, it may serve a useful purpose to the West. They urged that careful consideration be given to proper timing if Canada should be led to consider such a step. There was some disagreement among the delegates as to whether American attitudes toward China were softening. There was general agreement, however, that close relations of mutual confidence between the United States and Canada would not be adversely affected by differences in Canadian and American viewpoints concerning Communist China.

During the third session, the Committee received an account of the current situation in Vietnam from a member of the United States delegation who had recently visited Southeast Asia as a member of a Congressional subcommittee. It was noted that the subcommittee had concluded that from the military standpoint the war in South Vietnam was going well. South Vietnamese troops and forces aiding them were taking the initiative in all major military areas, and there were no significant shortages of equipment. There was some confidence that the initiative could be maintained during the rainy season. The subcommittee had been impressed by the intensified efforts being made in the civic action field. They had visited a number of recently liberated villages and had received the definite impression that the villagers welcomed the United States and South Vietnamese military presence. This presence meant that villages could receive long-needed medical attention, could harvest their rice free from Viet Cong levies, and could make a start on re-establishing schools and local self-government. Medical assistance to the civilian population and agricultural extension work were two areas in which there was room for greater efforts and where aid from countries such as Canada was greatly appreciated. The Subcommittee had been able to observe that the great bulk of military equipment captured from Vietcong and North Vietnamese forces was modern equipment clearly marked as of Chinese Communist origin. Several United States delegates remarked that the present political situation in South Vietnam was very disquieting. They did not see any feasible alternatives for the time being, however, to the present course of action being followed by the United States Government.

Members of the Canadian delegation described the wide differences of opinion that exist among the Canadian public regarding Vietnam ranging from advocacy of Canadian military involvement to strong criticism of U.S. policy. Canada's position as a member of the International Committee for Supervision and Control precludes Canada from becoming involved militarily in Vietnam. A number of Canadian delegates expressed the view that the International Commission was an extremely important agency by which it may be possible to make a significant contribution to the achievement of a negotiated solution. There was, however, a desire on the part of the Canadian public to make a more immediate and tangible contribution to the Vietnamese people and this has been reflected by the action of the Canadian Government in sending medical assistance teams to South Vietnam. Several Canadian delegates spoke of expanding and increasing this type of assistance.

Members of the United States delegation expressed understanding and respect for the Canadian position and commended the provision of medical and other forms of assistance to alleviate the sufferings of the Vietnamese people. They referred to the repeated efforts of the United States Government to enter into negotiations without any evidence being provided by the other side of a willingness to enter into negotiations. They continued to hope that circumstances would develop which would make negotiations possible and thought the integrity of the international commission should be maintained to assist in this regard.

There was discussion of the implications for the whole of Southeast Asia and international relations generally of what is taking place in Vietnam. Some Canadian delegates commented on the inhibiting effect on efforts to achieve agreement in such fields as non-proliferation of nuclear weapons of the Vietnam war. It seemed that so long as that war continued progress in many areas of international concern would be slow or non-existent. Members of the United States Delegation pointed out that the pattern of subversion and terror which had started in Vietnam was now appearing in other areas such as the northern part of Thailand. It was therefore vital that communist tactics in Vietnam should not be allowed to succeed or the whole area would be lost to communism.

Members of the Canadian and U.S. Delegations recognized that there would be differences of opinion both in Canada and the United States on the best means of achieving the objective of a restoration of peace and stability in Southeast Asia. They were, however, united in the view that the United States Government had been striving earnestly to this end, and expressed their sympathy for and support of the United States President.

APPENDIX III

EXCERPT FROM THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD OF THE
SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

May 19th, 1966

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY MEMBERS OF THE CANADIAN PARLIAMENT

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, we are most fortunate to have with us today some of the outstanding Members of the Parliament of Canada, our good neighbor to the north.

While I have never had the opportunity to be the guest of those who are visiting the U.S. Senate, I have long recognized that Canada is one of our best friends, and I so regard that great nation and great and wonderful neighbor with whom we share a common border.

I now ask the Chair to call upon the Senator from Vermont to present the Canadian delegation.

THE ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Vermont (Mr. Aiken).

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, lest there be undue alarm on the other side of the aisle, I may say that the appearance in the Chamber this morning is not intended as a preview of the 90th Congress—although, one can never tell. But we are glad to have our Canadian friends sitting on the Republican side of the aisle.

Mr. President, the Senate is honored to have in the Chamber a distinguished delegation of Members of the Canadian Parliament who are attending the Ninth Canada-United States Interparliamentary Conference. We are also pleased to have as guests the lovely wives of many members of the delegation.

This morning the two delegations participated in an exchange of views on matters of common interest to our countries. We will hold additional meetings this afternoon and tomorrow.

I have no doubt that this ninth regular meeting of Members from our respective legislative bodies will bind even closer the strong ties between the United States and our good friend, ally, and neighbor to the north.

It is my pleasure to present to the Senate the Members of Parliament from Canada:

From the Senate: The Honorable Sydney J. Smith, Speaker of the Senate and co-chairman of the delegation. He has attended every parliamentary session between Canada and the United States.

The Honorable Sarto Fournier.
The Honorable M. Grattan O'Leary.
The Honorable Nelson Rattenbury.
The Honorable Dr. Orville Howard Phillips.
The Honorable John B. Aird.

Now we come to the House of Commons, which in Canada, unlike as in the United States, is not referred to as the lower House. It is a very important House up there. It has perhaps more power than our House of Representatives.

First, Mr. Herman M. Batten, Deputy Speaker of the House, and co-chairman of the delegation.

The Honorable Francis Alvin George Hamilton.
The Honorable J. H. Theogene Ricard.
Mr. Donald S. Macdonald.
Mr. Wallace B. Nesbitt.
Mr. Robert C. Coates.
Mr. Robert Simpson.
Mr. Alexander Bell Patterson.
Mr. F. Andrew Brewin.
Mr. Viateur Ethier.
Mr. Allan M. A. McLean.
Mr. Reid Scott.
Mr. David Walter Groos.
Mr. Paul Langlois.
Rev. David S. H. MacDonald.
Mr. Robert John Orange.
Mr. Gerard Pelletier.
Mr. Alcide Simard.
(Applause, Senators rising)

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess for 5 minutes so that Senators may greet the Canadian parliamentarians.

RECESS

Thereupon, at 12:23 o'clock p.m., the Senate took a recess until 12:28 o'clock p.m.

During the recess, Members of the Canadian Parliament were greeted by Members of the Senate.

On expiration of the recess, the Senate reassembled and was called to order by the Acting President pro tempore (Mr. Byrd of Virginia).

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 10, 1967

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

JOHN F. MACNEILL, Q.C.

FELICITATIONS ON HONORARY DEGREE

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I am sure that the Senate will be pleased indeed to know that its highly distinguished Clerk, Mr. John F. MacNeill, Q.C., has been honoured by his alma mater Acadia University with the degree of Doctor of Civil Law. This is a great honour indeed, not only for Dr. MacNeill but for the Senate as well, because Dr. MacNeill's reputation as one of the outstanding constitutional experts in Canada is well established; moreover, he is a distinguished expert in the practical workings of Parliament and parliamentary proceedings.

Dr. MacNeill is the third of his family to be honoured by Acadia University, and I think today is a unique occasion to thank him for having been all along the years such a dedicated servant of the Senate and of senators.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I know that the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Deschatelets) has spoken for all of us, but I would just like to say a few words myself. I join wholeheartedly in his tribute of congratulations to our distinguished Clerk on the occasion of his having been honoured with the degree of Doctor of Laws from Acadia University.

I might say that I have known Dr. MacNeill and his family for many years. He was born in my constituency; his father and mother both came from my constituency, and some of his brothers and sisters are still living there. They have all been educated at Acadia University, it seems to me, even to the third and fourth generations, because there has been a MacNeill at Acadia University as long as I can remember.

His father, also Dr. MacNeill, was a very distinguished theologian in eastern Canada, and, as our acting leader has said, a few others of his family have been distinguished by receiving honorary degrees at that university.

The granting of this degree is a recognition of the outstanding contribution made by Dr. John F. MacNeill to the public life of Canada. It is a great honour to him, and the university has also honoured itself in this recognition.

I might say that Dr. MacNeill will probably be very pleased that he was not here today to hear these tributes paid to him, because like all people from the constituency of Royal he is a very modest person. I am sure he would be embarrassed if he were here.

Hon. Norman A. MacKenzie: Honourable senators, I had not intended to speak today, but I cannot refrain from doing so in the circumstances. John MacNeill is a very old friend of mine. He and I and the present Minister of Labour, Honourable Mr. Nicholson, were classmates in Law at Dalhousie many years ago. John MacNeill and I came back from service in World War I at the same time, and throughout the years he has been a warm and loyal friend. I am more delighted than I can say about this honour which has been conferred upon him, and about the words of praise and appreciation spoken about him by my colleagues in the Senate today.

STAFF OF THE SENATE

REMARKS OF APPRECIATION

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I think that it is an appropriate occasion, two days after the opening of this new session of Parliament, to give to all officers and staff of the Senate a word of appreciation for their loyalty and dedication to duty.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets tabled:

Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, of Wednesday, April 26, 1967, pursuant to section 7 of the Regulations Act, chapter 235, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

Exchange of letters, dated May 5, 1967, between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Socialist Republic of Rumania concerning Canadian Claims against Rumania and Rumanian Claims against Canada. (English and French texts).

Exchange of letters, dated May 5, 1967, between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Socialist Republic of Rumania concerning certain consular matters. (English and French texts).

Report of the Department of Labour for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1966, (English and French texts).

STANDING COMMITTEES

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION PRESENTED

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien presented the first report of the Committee of Selection:

> The Committee of Selection, appointed to nominate senators to serve on the several standing committees for the present session, makes its first report as follows—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

(For text of report see Appendix pp. 45-47.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien (Provencher) moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DOORMATS FOR MEMBERS—INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, the Senate has always been very considerate of the House of Commons. Some years ago—in fact, in April of 1959—the rug in the chamber of House of Commons was all worn out, but the members of the Commons were too shy to ask for a new one. Therefore, a request came from the Senate that they be given a new rug, which request was promptly granted, and this was done for the benefit of the members of the Commons. The Senate was acting like the protector of the House of Commons on that occasion, so that the Commons would not be misjudged by visitors in its galleries.

There should be no discrimination between both houses, but I notice that there are red doormats at the doors of the senators, and I do not see why there should not be green doormats at the doors of the members of the Commons. They may be too shy again to ask for them, but they should not complain of the fact that the senators have things they do not themselves have, so it is only fair to ask that they be furnished with green doormats, green being the colour of the House of Commons.

NOTICES OF INQUIRIES

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I would like to ask three questions, but before doing so I wish to congratulate two of our colleagues whose birthdays are being celebrated today. I refer to my good friend Gordon Isnor, and to Senator Walker across the floor. Both look young and well, and they are an asset to this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The first question is:

1. What orders in council have been adopted concerning protocol and precedence since that which reversed the order of precedence of the members of the Senate of Canada over the judges?

2. What is the text and the date of that order in council?

3. Has the Government of Canada adopted an order in council to the effect that the names of the Privy Councillors not residing in Canada should not be inserted in the "Guide to Relative Precedence at Ottawa", and if so, what is the text and the date of that order in council?

4. Is the order in council mentioned in the previous question still in effect or has it been abrogated, and in this last alternative, on what date was it abrogated?

The second question is:

1. On what date was the latest revision of the Statutes of Canada commenced and what are the names of the persons who are carrying out the revision?

2. Are the persons mentioned in the previous question working full time or part time, and in the latter case, what is their main occupation?

3. What work have the above mentioned persons accomplished to date and what work remains in order to complete the revision of the Statutes?

4. What is the regular salary of each one of these persons and how much are they paid for overtime?

The third question is:

In what clauses and in what lines of the pages of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952 and the subsequent Statutes of Canada have the words "Dominion of Canada" and "Dominion" (referring to the Dominion of Canada) been mentioned?

Honourable senators, before resuming my seat I wish to thank the honourable Leader of the Government in this house (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) and the Secretary of State on their diligence in making the appropriate decision in the case of Lord Alexander. It took six years to obtain the proper place on the Table of Precedence for Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Diefenbaker, former Prime Ministers of Canada, but in 24 hours the case of Lord Alexander was decided and his place on the Table of Precedence is immediately before that of his successor, Mr. Vincent Massey. I congratulate all those concerned on their diligence and good understanding.

If it took such a long time to correct this situation it was because I thought the case of the former Prime Ministers should be settled at the same time as that of the former Governors General.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I might say just a few words on these questions. The first request concerning the rugs in the other place is a rather unusual one. When such a request comes before this house it is usually for something that the other place has and we do not have. However, I will get in touch with the Minister of Public Works about this.

With respect to the other questions, I will say to Senator Pouliot that I will take them as notice and will obtain answers for him as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you very much.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, May 15, at 8 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux, seconded by Hon. Mr. Nichol, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. John Nichol: Honourable senators, may I begin by saying that it is my privilege to follow Senator Desruisseaux, to offer my congratulations to him on his excellent and thorough speech, and to support the motion that he has placed before us.

There are many noble traditions in this chamber, one of the most valuable of which is the tradition of courtesy and co-operation between its members. As a relatively new member of the Senate, I am most grateful for this tradition and for the many kindnesses that have been shown me by honourable senators from both sides of this house.

Further, as a member of the Senate and as a British Columbian, may I salute His Honour the Speaker. He has served his province and his country through the honourable institutions of politics, and he brings to the office of Speaker a rare combination of dignity and warmth.

I would also like to express my respect and admiration for the Leader of the Government in this house, Senator John J. Connolly, to our Acting Leader, Senator Jean-Paul Deschatelets, and to Senator A. J. Brooks, the Leader of the Opposition. No one who sits in this house can fail to be impressed, as I have been, by the efficiency and dignity with which these honourable gentlemen go about their tasks.

May I also speak for a moment about Senator Hnatyshyn. Although I have been here a short time and did not know him well, I know of the dedication with which he approached his work here. He had the ability to speak fluently in Ukrainian and English—a bilingualism which reminds us of the richness and diversity of our Canadian people. This house has lost a dedicated, hard-working member, the members of this house have lost a friend. I feel and want to express my deepest sympathy to all his family.

As honourable senators know, the first Speech from the Throne in our country was read on the afternoon of November 7, 1867, by the then Governor General His Excellency Lord Monck. The Ottawa newspaper of that day described the event at length. A few excerpts will give us the picture:

> Early yesterday morning flags floated from the towers of the public buildings, and also from private houses in various parts of the capital, and officers and soldiers, both of the regular and volunteer branches of the service, were seen hurrying to and fro, preparing for the auspicious event. Long before three o'clock, the galleries of the Senate Chamber were crowded with anxious spectators, and even the space set apart for the sole use of the knights of the quill, was ruthlessly invaded by the fair visitors and denizens of Ottawa.

On the Commons appearing at the Bar of the Senate, by command, His Excellency read the Speech in clear, distinct and measured voice, which seemed to impress upon those present the importance of the subjects recommended for consideration, and promised to be brought forward.

The last descriptive sentence would certainly apply to the ceremony in this chamber on Monday. It was read then as it is read now to an assembly of members of the Senate and of the other place, and it dealt with the hard problems of the birth of Canada, the problems of amendment and assimilation of laws existing in the several provinces regarding currency, customs and excise, postal system, public works, militia and defence, patents, fisheries, marine interests, electoral law, and of course revenues and the consideration of estimates.

There was a report on the efficiency and organization of volunteers and militia, with the information that the whole volunteer force of Ontario and Quebec was already armed with the breech-loading rifle. These, and many other things were discussed, and the structure of law and government that was built by the men who sat in that chamber on that day in November so long ago has served us well. Would they believe it if they could see what has happened; would they believe their eyes? Could they really have foreseen this colourful and complicated and fantastic country of ours? I think not. Our Canada of today has grown far beyond the limit of their dreams.

And so one hundred years have gone—an instant in the sweep of history perhaps, but one hundred long years of work by the men and women who wrought these great changes. Since that day, 36,000 days of work and dedication bring us to 1967. Now there are 20 million of us, facing some of the old problems and a host of new ones.

Since it took office in 1963 the Government of Lester B. Pearson has had an astonishing record of accomplishment in truly progressive legislation. This Speech from the Throne is another page in this agenda for a new generation of Candians.

Over the years we have developed a solid base of social welfare legislation. Although we have real and grinding poverty in our midst, we are now among the few rich nations of the world. We are dealing now with the problems of a well-to-do people, and we will be turning to the solution of problems which concern the quality of our national life, the usefulness of our national life, and the degree of civilization—in the true sense of the word—which we can obtain.

We are now concerning ourselves with housing, divorce reform, penal reform, laws governing abortion and birth control; the control of pollution of our water and air; genuine help for our native peoples; the elimination of that barbarous hangover from the past—the death penalty, and many others.

This is an age of explosive scientific progress. We must match it with truly enlightened social progress. And this Speech from the Throne points the way. It deals, for instance, with the need for progressive changes within the institutions of government. We cannot afford to accept the old idea that democracy and efficiency are mutually exclusive. Self-criticism and self-analysis are psychologically difficult for individuals or institutions, but the other place is pointing the way to progressive change through its committee studies of its methods, rules and procedures.

Involved in this question is the fact that in the other place the members are hamstrung by their lack of adequate research staff. It is ridiculous to pay a man $18,000 a year to serve his constituency, his province and his country and then not give him the staff to do the job properly. The people of Canada quite rightly expect their representatives to be informed and alert on all the complex issues that face the nation. This can not be done as it should be done without adequate staff. The present set-up is even now ridiculously out of date and will become more so if the present trend to increased responsibilities of committees is continued.

The Speech from the Throne mentions the Report of the Committee on Election Expenses. This is a massive document, as thorough an analysis of the problem as we have had. I believe that politics is an honourable profession and that political parties are legitimate and essential parts of our democratic structure. Many people think of politics as an art practised in the shadows. There is need for light, and legislation along the lines of this report will provide it. I am thinking particularly of the measures aimed at reducing the cost of elections and of the clauses dealing with tax concessions for individual donations. The contribution of money by a Canadian to the party of his choice should be seen as a constructive and responsible act of citizenship.

A problem which has been with us since the beginning has been the problem of division of powers between the federal, provincial and municipal governments. I am not a lawyer—much less a constitutional lawyer—so I have no pat solutions to offer, but I do know that the man who pays the bill, the average taxpayer, pays the money to his city, to his province, to the federal Government and he wants action on many fronts: housing, urban renewal, pollution, and so on, where this constitutional maze is blocking the way. The Speech from the Throne indicates that the Government is meeting this constitutional problem aggressively, recognizing that many of our problems cannot be solved without breaking through these barriers.

Every generation of human beings has said to itself, "This is an era of change." We say the same. But our kind of change is something new, not the normal kind of progressive growth that we human beings think of as change, but a violent, dramatic, explosion of change, and the job of the human race is to find the means of self-control to prevent the whole thing from blowing up in our faces.

What sorts of change? In the field of science, for instance, listen to these figures from a speech made by our Prime Minister in Santa Barbara last month: the sum total of human knowledge now doubles every four years; an average of 1,000,000 scientific articles are published every year; 90 per cent of all research scientists who have ever lived are alive today. These figures speak for themselves.

What we used to call the issue of peace or war can now more accurately be called the issue of peace or oblivion. We have reached the point of sophistication in our ability to kill where thermonuclear war can obliterate all life on this earth—overnight. All can be gone at the touch of a button. How nice it is to forget this from one day to another, but how terribly dangerous it is to do so.

The winning of such a war is impossible; the prevention of its breaking out is essential. And this is where Canada, with her particular niche in the international power structure, can be of real and practical help.

The removal through disarmament of this black threat of thermonuclear war is surely the greatest challenge of all. This is the one essential change without which all else is nonsense.

We are face to face with another incredibly difficult problem—the population explosion. Let me give you some figures. In 1966 there were 3.3 billion people on this planet. Thirty-three years from now, at present rates of growth, the world population will have doubled to 6.6 billion. Think of 33 years, 1934 to 1967, perhaps enough time to take us from Amos and Andy to Bonanza, but not very long. In the last 24 hours there has been a net increase of 178,000 people on earth. There are now 8,000 people dying each day because they cannot get enough food. Eight thousand people!—that is roughly the population of Summerside, Prince Edward Island, or Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, or Chatham, New Brunswick, or Buckingham, Quebec, or Kapuskasing or Goderich, or Dauphin, Manitoba, or Estevan, Saskatchewan, Camrose, Alberta, or Kimberley, British Columbia.

I have named 10 towns. Between now and Saturday, May 20, 10 days from now, the equivalent of the populations of these 10 cities will be dead from hunger. That is today. So I ask you to consider the problem 15 years from now. Food production is increasing at 1 per cent a year, and population at 2.5 per cent a year. As someone has said, the stork is outrunning the plough. And even today, I am told, out of all the world's countries only nine produce enough food for their own use. Canada is one.

We sometimes talk for instance, about India's food problem. Honourable senators, it is man's problem; it is our problem. And we have a choice: either we solve it together with our fellow human beings around this globe—by massive international programs of technical and agricultural assistance and by massive education in birth control programs to which Canada must contribute in ever-increasing amounts—or this population explosion with its parallel political explosion will be as deadly and as final as the bomb.

The proposals which are put forward in the Speech from the Throne are important and practical ones, and the path shown us here is one of reform and progress in the truest sense. These are things which will make life better and more sensible for our people. The fight against poverty and its co-worker ignorance must never stop. We must continually refine and change our institutions to make sure that they make sense and do a job today.

We must be careful to differentiate between those traditions which remind us of our past, and which have great value and which must be cultivated and retained, and, on the other hand, those traditions which merely hold us back. We must get rid of our persistent tendency to be overly self-critical, and we must put a stop to our continuing and boring self-analysis. We are capable of a positive and constructive nationalism within the international brotherhood of man, and we must not settle for any narrow-minded substitute.

We Canadians pride ourselves on not being given to boasting, but surely as we look at our nation today and look at what we have done in the last one hundred years, surely now we must as a people be convinced that we are capable of anything if we set ourselves hard to the task.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton) for Hon. Mr. Brooks, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL MUSEUMS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Douglas D. Everett moved the second reading of Bill S-2, to establish a corporation for the administration of the National Museums of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-2 reintroduces Bill S-57 which received its first reading on March 9, was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce and received third reading on March 20. This is one of five bills that were not dealt with in the other place and, as you have had the opportunity to examine this bill previously, I shall content myself with a very brief explanation of its terms.

This bill sets up a corporation to be known as the National Museums of Canada. That corporation will be based on the structure of the Smithsonian Institution of the United States. The corporation will be composed of the human history museum, which includes the war museum, the natural history museum, the science and technology museum, which includes the air museum, and the national gallery. One of the effects of this bill is to repeal the National Gallery Act. Other museums may be added to the corporation from time to time by order in council.

The corporation will be controlled by a citizens' board of directors composed of twelve members, including a chairman and vice-chairman. The board will also include the Director of the Canada Council, and the President of the National Research Council. The board may form and appoint consultative committees to advise the board on technical matters, and there will be four directors of the four museums that initially comprise the corporation. These directors shall have the sole control of professional matters pertaining to their particular museum. The bill also provides for a secretary-general who will be responsible to the board for the financial administration of the matters under this act.

The purpose of this corporation is to demonstrate the products of nature and the works of man. Accordingly the corporation is empowered to purchase and sell objects of display for the various museums, upon the recommendation of the particular director of the particular museum concerned. The corporation may accept gifts and trusts, and it may disseminate materials such as reproductions and catalogues. It can indulge in research and it can mount travelling exhibitions. It can train museum personnel and it can provide professional and technical help for other museums throughout the country.

Honourable senators, that completes my discussion of the bill. But there is one other issue that I feel has been raised by this bill. We are here today considering five pieces of legislation that received third reading in this house but were not dealt with by the other place before the last session ended. By contrast, so far as I know, all legislation passed by the other place was passed by this house and received Royal Assent. Now, I am in my novitiate in this house so you will excuse me if it makes me wonder how important our legislative function is. I am impressed by the assiduous manner in which senators undertake their duties. If you read the Order Paper you see that generally not fewer than 70 to 80 senators are recorded as attending each sitting day—and this is out of a membership of 96. Twenty-five per cent of all legislation that goes through this Parliament originates in the Senate. There is important work done by our committees, and I need only mention the Divorce Committee as an example. This house has created new legislative directions in the area of manpower, for example, and in the problems of aging and in consumer affairs.

It seems to me that Canadians expect much of the Senate; they want it to perform and they will support the Senate when it does perform. But the Senate must perform a function that the public understands. Again speaking as one who is in his novitiate, this suggests to me a tentative direction. I feel that this house should make far greater use of its power of inquiry; that this house should make far more use of the powers of its committees to inquire into such matters as: What sort of cities will we live in? What is the future course of agriculture? How are we going to develop the north? What are we going to do with increasing leisure? Is there a better system of social justice?

In short, honourable senators, it suggests to me that we use the power of inquiry in this house to enter into a dialogue with the Canadian people as to what sort of nation they want, and what sort of legislation will create that nation. It seems to me that the Senate is admirably equipped to provide such a forum. We can inquire into the various subjects without fear or favour, and we possess a geographical representation that would be the envy of any royal commission.

Honourable senators, four of my children sit in the gallery of this house. They represent the first generation that has been born with complete confidence in the future of this country. As that generation matures they will have ideas for changing this country, ideas that you and I never thought of. For that reason I say: let this body use its powers to enter into a partnership now with the Canadian people to determine the future of this nation.

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Honourable senators, first I want to congratulate Senator Everett for the explanation which he has given of this bill, and to thank him for the kind words he has said about the Senate. I do not object to this bill, and I do not rise to be critical of it. I would just like to complete an unfinished statement which I made on April 28, when dealing with an item which related to the National Gallery of Canada. I was speaking about the purchase of a Rembrandt—and again I was not critical of the purchase. At this time I would like to invite all honourable senators who have not seen that particular painting to do so. The more you see of such paintings the more you appreciate them. They cannot be reproduced; they cannot even be imitated. They are certainly worthy of their place in any gallery, and we should be proud to have such paintings here in Ottawa.

At this stage, I would like to quote from the remarks I made on April 28, which are to be found in Hansard at page 1917:

> I do not want to make any extended remarks at this time—perhaps at some stage we will have the time to go into it. I visit the National Gallery quite often, and sometimes I see things that are exposed in this million-dollar marble building that are not fit to display anywhere—old pieces of scrap metal, the weldings on which are so poor they would never pass Grade I in the schools, and yet some have tried to make me believe this is a piece of art. Someone is nuts; maybe it is me. Perhaps sometime that could be explained.

As an average Canadian, when I visit an art gallery or museum I want to see something of history, something that tells a story, something of great value that cannot be replaced, that you can stand in front of and admire. I want to be able to admire the work, the creator and even the building which houses these objects, and the care that is given to the displays. When you walk into an art gallery you are impressed by the gallery first and then by the discipline and cleanliness, the security and the layout of the building. To me a gallery is a building of dignity, and it is a privilege to be able to visit one. The paintings or sculptures on display represent artistic talent and sometimes a lifetime creation. Many are priceless objects, and when you stand in front of them your mood becomes one of admiration and you are transported into another world. This does something to me that I cannot explain. And here in Canada we are privileged to have the opportunity of witnessing such creation, and we should be proud of it.

Honourable senators, I have great difficulty in accepting this so-called modern art and these abstract paintings. To me they do not represent any special ability or talent. But we are told, of course, that they represent only the viewpoint of the creator. I was in an art gallery some two weeks ago. One room was being used to display sheets of metal that were poorly cut and hinged together like a folder. One end was on the floor and the other stretched to the ceiling, and each sheet was of a different colour. The workmanship was so poor that one would think it had been done by a first-month trainee in a vocational school.

In the same marble room there was a display of six or seven sheets of paper. The first had two round dots on it; the second had two dots and a spot; and to the third had been added more spots. The variations were carried through until the last one, which had several dots and spots. And these meaningless things were housed in glass cases. Why, I do not know—probably to protect them from the sweepers! I understand this display is going to be shown in Paris. Surely, Canada has something better to exhibit around the world?

Honourable senators, if I cannot appreciate this kind of work, this is where the "nuts" comes in and I must be the nut. It is difficult for me to accept as works of art those pieces of scrap metal junk that are tacked together—out of respect for the welding trade I cannot say "welded"—along with old beer cans that are joined together at odd angles and spread over a large area, with nails driven into old rotten planks, and soft drink bottle caps nailed to pieces of plywood, and paint splashed over a piece of masonite, old car parts piled one over the other, or old worn-out shoes glued together.

Two years ago the dining room on the sixth floor was decorated with some of these abstract paintings, and I remember certain senators being critical of some of them. Even just looking at certain ones made me lose my appetite. Thank God they have been removed —but it took a long time. Many of the federal buildings across Canada have become the victims of such monsters, and, believe me, they were bought at a very high price.

To me, this sort of modern art is useless; it tells nothing and is worth nothing. I hope that as a result of this legislation we do not encourage our museums and art galleries to become warehouses for junk. Someone might ask, "Who are you to criticize art?" Well, I am just another of the taxpayers who have to pick up the tab when these things are purchased and displayed.

Honourable senators, I am sure that all of you do not agree with me, but I thank you for the privilege and the opportunity of expressing my humble opinion and, in line with these modern creators, of expressing myself as I see fit.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I wish to add just a few words pursuant to the remarks of the honourable Senator Fournier.

After the debate on interim supply we arranged—and it is hoped that the arrangement still stands—for a meeting on Wednesday morning next of the Standing Committee on Finance at which the topic will be precisely this—the National Gallery of Canada. I hope that many senators will be able to attend. The officials of the National Gallery will appear as witnesses, and I hope that among the senators who attend will be some who like or understand modern and abstract art.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: At the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton): Honourable senators, if it is wished to give it third reading now, there will be no objection from this side.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Very well. With leave, I move third reading now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Keith Davey moved the second reading of Bill S-4, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

He said: Honourable senators, once again it is my privilege to sponsor this legislation which was introduced as Bill S-59 last session. It is now Bill S-4, an act to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

The 15 clauses represent further amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act first passed in 1947 and amended several times since. Their general effect is two-fold: firstly, to introduce a degree of flexibility into the act, especially as it relates to new applicants for citizenship; and, secondly, to remove certain discriminatory features from the existing act, particularly as it relates to Canadians other than natural born.

I propose to outline briefly the amendments, mindful of the fact that the legislation was discussed thoroughly last session, and also mindful of the comments made yesterday by the honourable Senator Choquette.

Perhaps I should trace briefly the history of this bill through the last session, and some honourable senators may wish to refer to the appropriate issues of Hansard. The bill was introduced on Tuesday, April 18. On that occasion the sponsor was under considerable strain, competing as he was with the third game of the Stanley Cup semi-finals. Perhaps I should mention in passing, for the benefit of some senators and for most members of the Senate staff, that the Maple Leafs not only won that particular series, but went on to win the Stanley Cup! My introductory remarks of April 18 were followed by useful contributions from Senator Willis and Senator Hollett.

Then, on April 19 there were speeches by Senator Pearson, Senator Hayden, and the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West), and the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, which reported back to the Senate on April 20. The chairman of that committee, Senator Hayden, directed the attention of the house to one amendment recommended by the committee, which was accepted by the Senate and to which I shall refer in a moment. Following speeches by Senator Hayden, Senator Brooks, and Senator Pouliot on April 20, the bill received third reading.

Let me deal very briefly with the bill itself. The amendments contained in the 15 clauses of Bill S-4 affect four of the seven parts of the Citizenship Act. Part II of the act relates to Canadian citizens other than natural born, and the amendment contained in this bill simply adds to the flexibility of the method of obtaining citizenship, and more specifically by relaxing the residence and language requirements for older applicants. The amendment recommended by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce simply clarified a particular aspect of domicile as it relates to the residential requirements. Part II was also amended in a way to clarify certain procedures.

Part III of the act, which is entitled "Loss of Canadian Citizenship", is amended by this bill by removing certain discriminatory sections against Canadians who are not natural born. The net result of these amendments is to place natural-born Canadians and Canadians other than natural born on an equal footing in respect of loss of citizenship.

The bill amends Part VI, which is entitled "Procedure and Evidence," by the setting up of a Citizenship Appeal Court, the procedures of which are also described. It is now proposed that the minister must inform applicants who have been rejected that they have a right of appeal to this new Citizenship Appeal Court.

The remaining sections of the bill relate to Part VII of the act, and comprise what may be described as housekeeping provisions which describe ministerial powers under the act. They make the act more operative in Newfoundland, and expand offences under the act and extend the time limit in respect of such offences.

Finally, there is a clause which corrects minor discrepancies as between the French and English versions of the act.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to commend this bill for your consideration.

Hon. Harry A. Willis: Honourable senators, I find having to rise and repeat the remarks I made in March rather strange, so I intend to be very brief.

I congratulate the honourable sponsor of this bill (Hon. Mr. Davey) on his second explanatory speech, and I say, on behalf of those senators on this side of the house, that we support the bill. We consider it a step forward in the tremendous task of removing defects and ambiguities in the act.

As Senator Davey said, this bill provides for the establishment of a Citizenship Appeal Court, which will be an excellent thing. I concluded my former remarks by saying something of what I thought about the judges and other officials who hear citizenship applications. I said that I had seen some applicants treated terribly by judges who did not seem to realize that the poor people who were making applications before them had never been in a court before, and were scared out of their wits. They were asked various questions about the geography of Canada, the Prime Ministers of Canada, and the provinces, and were not, in fact, encouraged. No regard was paid to their calling or their jobs. This clause, in my opinion, is one of the most important aspects of the bill.

The honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West), very kindly rose the next day and said that he was forwarding copies of my remarks to the people concerned. I hope that that is still the policy of the Government in this new session.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Yes, indeed.

Hon. Norman A. MacKenzie: Honourable senators, unfortunately I was not present in the chamber when this bill was under consideration on the previous occasion, but I hasten to say that it is not my purpose at this time to propose changes in it, or to object to it. However, for the sake of the record, I should like to raise one question that has to do with the procedure in respect of children of Canadian citizens born abroad.

I raise this question because there are now considerable numbers of Canadians who spend years of their lives abroad, who have their families with them and whose children are born abroad, and in the years ahead there will be many more.

Under the act it is necessary for such children to be registered in due course. This presents no problem to those Canadians who are familiar with this provision, but it is something that might easily be overlooked or which might not be known by certain individuals. Possibly the officers of the Crown are aware of this question and have given it consideration. I believe that the old rule was that the first generation automatically remained Canadian citizens unless, upon attaining the age of 21, they decided to adopt another nationality, but the second generation were required to follow the procedures set out in this bill. All I am suggesting is that those responsible should take another look at this procedure having regard to the present number of Canadians who are living abroad, and the increased number that are likely to live abroad with their families in the future.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. F. W. Gershaw): Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time

Hon. Mr. Davey: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill real third time and passed.

INTERPRETATION ACT

BILL TO REVISE—SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill S-6, to revise and consolidate the Interpretation Act and amendments thereto, and to effect certain consequential amendments to the Canada Evidence Act and the Bills of Exchange Act.

He said: Honourable senators, although this is a rather lengthy and important bill I shall not detain the house long in its discussion this afternoon.

As I pointed out previously, this is essentially a committee bill. Honourable senators will be interested to know, and I am sure realize, that the Interpretation Act was the first act which was passed by Parliament in 1867. The bill now before us proposes the first general revision of the Interpretation Act since Confederation. Over the years the act has been amended from time to time, and the amendments have been consolidated in the general revisions of the statutes which have taken place. However, the act itself, as it was passed in 1867, is still basically the same as the Interpretation Act which is being revised by us now.

The importance of the statute over the years has not diminished and, if anything, the extent and scope of today's statutes make a measure of this nature even more necessary now than in 1867.

The purpose of the Interpretation Act is to facilitate an understanding of the drafting of the statutes and other enactments. Honourable senators will realize that by establishing uniform definitions and expressions, and thereby eliminating the need for their repetition in the law, the drafting of statutes is simplified and their interpretation facilitated. An Interpretation Act also serves the purpose of consolidating in one place rules of interpretation that have been developed over the years by the courts and by Parliament.

Honourable senators, this is the third time that I have introduced this legislation in the Senate. The first time I had the privilege of doing so was on June 23, 1965, when after discussion it received second reading and was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. However, in 1965 there was an early summer adjournment and we never did come back, Parliament being dissolved on September 8, so that the other place had no opportunity to consider this legislation.

On February 7, 1966, I again moved the second reading of this bill. It was discussed at some considerable length in this house, the debate covering three days. If I recall correctly, the honourable Senators Brooks, Roebuck, and Grosart participated in the debate. The bill was then referred to committee.

As I said in my opening remarks, this is essentially a committee bill, and when the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce met it set up a subcommittee which sat from time to time under the chairmanship of Senator Hayden, the chairman of the main committee. The subcommittee spent considerable time with representatives from the Department of Justice in going over this bill, not only clause by clause, but word by word. The bill was amended in committee, was reported back to this house, and received third reading on June 30. The bill as amended was then sent to the House of Commons. However, because of the great amount of work that that house had to deal with, which apparently was considered more important, this bill was not considered in that house.

Now, honourable senators, we have considered the bill once again in the Senate. It is the commencement of a session, and I think that if we can get the bill over to the other place fairly soon there is a good chance of its receiving third reading there.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am satisfied that the sponsor of this bill, Senator Macdonald, has put on the record all the information that is required in connection with this bill which, as he pointed out, has been introduced in this house three times. Senator Macdonald said that this is a committee bill. I would say that it is a highly technical bill, and that was the reason that the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce appointed a subcommittee, which studied the bill thoroughly and brought in some amendments.

I am satisfied that we need not discuss the bill in detail, especially because in the one year which has passed since the previous bill was introduced and given third reading by the Senate, no problems or questions have been raised in connection with it. I suggest that this silence indicates approval of the legislation, and that therefore there is no need to discuss it further. I suggest that the bill could receive second reading now, and even third reading if this is the wish of the Senate.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

TELEFERRY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets moved second reading of Bill S-7, respecting interprovincial and international teleferries.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is identical to the bill we passed in the previous session. It was known under the name of the Teleferry Bill, and I understand that it was discussed on Thursday, March 16, by the sponsor, the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West), and on March 20 by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks). It received third reading on March 21.

The bill intends to regulate teleferry systems. Now, what is a teleferry? It is not easy to define, but let us say that it is a system for the operation of aerial cable cars. It can be considered a new method of transportation. In fact, I think there is one in Vancouver, but in Canada up to now cable cars have been used mainly for skiing purposes, whereas, I am informed, in Europe they are being used for transportation in many places.

I would say that the main reason for this legislation is that there is under construction now, over the Detroit River, a teleferry system which will transport persons between Detroit and Windsor.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask whether this legislation will cover the minirail at Expo in Montreal?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I would say it would not cover the minirail because this legislation is designed to cover only interprovincial transportation by teleferry and transportation by teleferry between Canada to the United States, as is the case here between Detroit and Windsor.

The provisions of this bill deal with licensing, tolls, safety provisions, and regulations for carrying out the purposes of the legislation. The act will come into force upon proclamation.

I do not think there is anything else I can add. It is a very simple bill. This legislation was introduced and then debated on second reading in the last session but was not sent to a committee. This bill is identical to the one which was debated at that time. Unless anyone has any questions concerning this bill, I think those are all the remarks I need to make now.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask who issues these licences?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: This would be the new Canadian Transportation Commission.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): May I ask a question? If there is an international cable system with the parent company in the United States—in other words, if an American cable company runs a line into Canada—what authority will have jurisdiction?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I would say there is no doubt that the Canadian Government would have jurisdiction over the part operating in Canada. In a matter of this kind, as is the case here between Windsor and Detroit, I imagine that the two federal boards would deal with each other. The Canadian board, which will be the Canadian Transportation Commission, will have jurisdiction over the Canadian part and will deal with a similar board on the United States side.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): It will be treated somewhat like an international bridge.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I imagine so, yes.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Thank you.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that this bill be given third reading now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, May 15, at 8 p.m.

Monday, May 15, 1967

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE SENATOR VINCENT DUPUIS

TRIBUTES

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, for the second time within the last couple of weeks we have been deeply grieved by the loss of one of our colleagues. I am sure all honourable senators heard with great regret the sad news of the death of the Honourable Vincent Dupuis, Q.C., whose funeral was held this morning in Montreal.

Senator Dupuis served his country at the three levels of government: In 1928 he became a councillor for the Town of Laprairie; in 1929 he was first elected to the House of Commons and he was re-elected on each occasion until 1945, when he was summoned to the Senate. This means that for nearly 40 years Senator Dupuis devoted much of his time and energy to public affairs.

He will be missed, not only by those he served so well, but also by his colleagues and friends on the Hill where he was so well known and liked.

[Translation]

Senator Vincent Dupuis was of those who are called sons of the land in the Province of Quebec. In spite of extended university studies and a distinguished career at the bar, he always took great pride in his rural origins.

He represented in the Commons a rural riding, at a time when the Member of Parliament was looked upon as a counsellor in his area.

I knew him well for over twenty years and I had the opportunity of noticing that on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, where I lived for some time the Honourable Vincent Dupuis was a legendary figure, known and esteemed by all.

On behalf of the Government, of the Leader of the Senate who is now in Europe attending a parliamentary conference, and on behalf of all the honourable senators, I extend my deepest condolences to his family.

[English]

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, as we approach the Parliament Buildings these days, it seems that we see our flag flying at half mast most of the time, out of respect for one of our departed colleagues. On this occasion it is out of respect for our colleague Senator Dupuis. His death was a surprise to most of us, although we knew that he had been ill for some time, for we had missed seeing him here in the chamber.

The Acting Leader of the Government has told us of his many activities in private and public life. He was a quiet, friendly and active man, very devoted to his duties. I sat with him in the House of Commons for a number of years while he was still a member of that place. He always took a keen interest in looking after the affairs of his constituency. I recall that he brought the same spirit to the Senate. He loved his province and never hesitated to work for the advancement of that province and its people. Some subjects in which he was particularly interested, as I recall from reading Hansard, were the St. Lawrence Seaway, keeping the ports of Quebec, Trois Rivieres, and Montreal open for trade, icebreaking, and support for farmers.

As the honourable acting leader has said, Senator Dupuis was born on a farm. He supported all social legislation, education and whatever else could be regarded as being best for his people. His speeches on these subjects and many others make good reading in Hansard.

A short time ago I read a speech by our late colleague which greatly impressed me. In 1959, as honourable senators will recall, we celebrated the centennial of the selection of the City of Ottawa as the capital of Upper and Lower Canada. On that occasion the late Senator Dupuis made a most impressive speech. He spoke about the Constitution of this country and mentioned that it was part of the British Constitution. I am aware that the question of the Constitution is a very live one at this stage. But he approved the British Constitution which we inherited in part. I feel it would not be out of place now for me to quote a paragraph from his speech on that occasion. He said he could understand why the British people were proud of their Constitution, and he added:

> One reason, among others, is that their almost perfect Constitution, which has been developed through the centuries, is a product of the wisdom of, may I say, our common ancestors—the Britons, Normans, Anglo-Saxons, and Celts. It was these peoples who built up point by point the Constitution which today forms part of the parliamentary system that we are glad and proud to enjoy.

These were wise words and, as I say, I was very pleased to read them in Hansard of 1959.

I wish to join with the honourable Acting Leader of the Government in extending to the family, the colleagues and friends of the late Senator Dupuis, our very sincere sympathy.

[Translation]

Hon. J.-M. Dessureault: Honourable senators, even though Senator Dupuis resided in Montreal, I wish to join with the Acting Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in paying tribute to the late Senator Vincent Dupuis.

We knew each other for a long time. We had been sworn in the same day here in the Senate, in 1945, and I considered him as a personal friend.

I should like once again to join with our two leaders in extending my heartfelt sympathy to his family.

EMERGENCY SITTINGS

AUTHORITY TO CONVENE SENATE DURING ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That, for the duration of the present session of Parliament, should an emergency arise during any adjournment of the Senate, which would in the opinion of the Honourable the Speaker warrant that the Senate meet prior to the time set forth in the motion for such adjournment, the Honourable the Speaker be authorized to notify honourable senators at their addresses registered with the Clerk of the Senate, to meet at a time earlier than that set out in the motion for such adjournment, and non-receipt by any one or more honourable senators of such call shall not have any effect upon the sufficiency and validity thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, this is the customary motion moved at the begining of each session.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

LIGHTING CONDITIONS IN READING ROOM

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I should like to draw the kind attention of the Acting Leader of the Government

(Hon. Mr. Deschatelets) to the fact that the lighting in the reading room of the Senate is very poor. There are three very narrow gothic windows, and because the room faces north it receives no sunlight except for a tiny ray at the end of the afternoon. As to electrical fixtures, there are two chandeliers, each with eight small bulbs that are very weak and give a reddish light, and there are two floor lamps with worn-out shades.

Honourable senators, the lighting is really pitiful. First, I hope that the bulbs will be changed for stronger ones, and ones that give a white instead of a reddish light. I draw the attention of the Acting Leader of the Government to this matter, and I am sure that he will look into it at the earliest possible opportunity.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I shall do so.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 10, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux, seconded by Hon. Mr. Nichol for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I wish first to join in an expression of good wishes to our new Governor General and his gracious lady. We have been very fortunate during the past century in having most outstanding men represent the sovereign at Government House. We know that the Governor General will discharge his duties in a manner that will place him among the best.

We have heard already two excellent speeches in the debate on this motion, that of the mover and of the seconder. I congratulate the mover most warmly on the way he discharged his duty. His subject matter was interesting, and he gave it a most comprehensive coverage from the Government point of view and also, I might say, from other points of view as well. Naturally, I would not be expected to agree with all that he said, but it is plain from this, his first speech in the Senate, that he is a great student who has at his command a fund of information. I am sure that this will make him a most valuable member of this house. When we receive the quantity and quality of work that we should have to do, I am sure that Senator Desruisseaux will prove himself capable in debate and in other respects.

As to the speech of the seconder (Hon. Mr. Nichol), unfortunately I had to attend a meeting and was unable to hear him but I am told that his remarks were well delivered. I know his material was good, because I read his speech. He is a young man who gives promise of a very useful career, and I offer my congratulations to him. If, as I have already stated, this house is provided with work and its members are given an opportunity to serve, I am confident that he is one who will do his part.

Honourable senators, I read with pleasure the following paragraph in the Speech from the Throne:

> With you, I look forward this summer to the visit of Her Majesty the Queen and other members of the Royal Family. The presence of our sovereign and the heads of state of other countries will bring added joy and festivity to our land as it celebrates the centennial of its Confederation.

I am quite sure that that will be the happy result. The royal visit of 1967 will be the fifth by a reigning monarch to Canada. Also it will be the fifth visit here by the present Queen and her fourth visit since assuming the Throne.

The first royal visit to Canada took place in 1939, when King George VI and Queen Elizabeth, now the Queen Mother, were the first royal couple to visit the capital of one of the dominions. The present Queen came to Canada in 1951 as the Princess Elizabeth. She came again in 1957, 1959 and 1964, and she will be in Ottawa on the first of July this year. I am sure all Canadians will be delighted at that time to have their Queen and her Consort with us. Needless to say, she is a beloved Queen, a great mother, and an individual who has all the attributes which make her beloved by her people. She sets a wonderful example; she is entitled to, and I am sure will receive, a hearty welcome when she comes to Canada.

The Speech from the Throne speaks of a visit by another head of state, namely, Queen Juliana of Holland, who is in Canada at the present time. She has close connections with this country, for she spent four years here during World War II. One of her children was born in Canada. It was our Canadian troops who marched into Holland and rescued that country from her enemy at that time, and I am sure that the people of Holland are indeed grateful to our Canadian soldiers. I had the opportunity of visiting the graves of the dead in different parts of Holland, and I was pleased, as are all Canadians, with the way in which the children and the Dutch people generally help to look after the graves of the Canadian soldiers.

Queen Juliana will certainly receive a warm welcome in Canada. One could speak of the tulip festival and how she has been responsible for making Ottawa the tulip capital of the world, but such things are so well known it is not necessary for me to enlarge upon them.

Later on another outstanding head of a nation will visit Canada. I refer to General de Gaulle of France. As a representative of one of the great founding races of Canada, I am sure he will have a particularly warm welcome. He has visited Canada before. I recall accompanying him when he laid a wreath at the National War Memorial here a few years ago. We hope that General de Gaulle will visit us again and that he will see as much of the country as possible.

His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie, Emperor of Ethiopia, has been here. We have welcomed his Royal Highness Prince Albert of Belgium. We have had with us His Excellency the President of the Federal Republic of Austria. Her Royal Highness Princess Alexandra has also visited us. These distinguished people are very welcome, as will be the heads of states and distinguished visitors in later months. I understand that the Queen Mother intends to visit the Atlantic provinces. I am certain she will have a happy and pleasant visit there, and we will be most honoured to greet her.

Honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne naturally emphasizes that this is our centennial year. One hundred years ago a new nation, Canada, was born out of the toil and the hopes and the sacrifices of many generations of people. That nation is our heritage, yours and mine, that of our children and of our grandchildren; it has been our responsibility and it will be theirs.

Honourable senators, it is our responsibility most of all for the future of this nation. We will not be here to see it, of course, but we can help to lay the foundation. That responsibility is not only one to our ancestors, to carry on the work they started —though we must not forget them—it is a responsibility to the young people of Canada, to help them to make a better tomorrow.

It may seem to be a platitude, but it is also a fact that it took leadership to mould Canada into the nation she is today. It will take more and stronger leadership to continue our growth in this highly competitive world of today and of the future.

Honourable senators, besides the two great races, the French and the English, who were here at the time of the birth of our country, there are now some five million descendants of other ethnic groups whose people have done their part over the years in building up this land. Canada, we know, has grown from three and a half million people in 1867 to more than 20 million people today. We should have more people, but that is another story and we will say more about it later.

Our country grew from small beginnings. In the early days the inhabitants were fur traders; they also engaged in the pursuits of fishing, and crude farming. Little did they think then that this would be the great industrial nation it is today. At that time the people did not foresee large cities such as we have now. Some claim that our cities are becoming too large and that the rural districts are being depopulated. The best way to cure this would be to bring to Canada more people who are willing and anxious to stay on the land.

We are a strong industrial people and we are proud of it. We are also a thriving agricultural nation. We have developed our mines, our fisheries and our other natural resources. We have been most fortunate and we should be proud of what we have achieved.

Honourable senators, it would take much time to speak of the many great men, from the days of Cartier to the present time, and to tell the story of Canada and its development. Canada is by nature a peaceful nation, but there have been two world wars since we became a nation in 1867. In those two wars the Canadian youth showed courage and prowess. This was a peaceful country until 1914, when the freedom of the world was threatened. The peoples of France and of the British Commonwealth stood together to preserve freedom and liberty, and they won that cause but they did so with great sacrifice to themselves. Many Canadians who have visited our air force in France have gone also to see the cemeteries at Verdun, where thousands of young Frenchmen gave up their lives. At the other end of the line, they could see where the Battle of the Somme took place and the cemeteries where many thousands of young men of the British Commonwealth gave their lives.

What for? Not for imperialism. They gave their lives to preserve the peace of the world and to keep the Germans from entering Paris and conquering France, which would have meant the loss of our liberty.

Between 1939 and 1945 it was the British Commonwealth and the United States which preserved the freedom of the world. Again, I say it was not for imperialism, but for the sake of preserving peace for the peoples against a very aggressive foe. Again they won, but at terrible sacrifice. The world remained free. In those two wars Canada proved herself by the sacrifice of her young men, and we truly became a nation, not bent on conquest but doing our share to preserve the free world.

Carlyle has said that beside the heroic deeds and sacrifices of the people to preserve freedom, the history of the world is but the biography of great men. This statement is partly true of Canada, and I desire here to pay a tribute to some of our great men. It would take many days to pay proper tribute to all of them. I will not speak of the explorers, the builders' the statesmen, whose deeds filled the pages of history up to 1867, nor of the authors, scientists, educators and others who have made such an outstanding contribution in our last one hundred years—there are too many of them. They came from every walk of life and from every section of our country. My remarks will be designed to recall some of those who exercised the ultimate political power over the years since Confederation.

Honourable senators, it is worth remembering that without such men the course of our history would have been far different, for each in his own way left his imprint on us and on our nation.

I speak first of Sir John A. Macdonald. He must rank as one of the world's great nation builders. Though the idea of Confederation was not originally his, he seized it as a means of preventing the disintegration of the union of his day. He induced Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to join, and he embarked on the work of building Canada. He was indeed, as a distinguished historian of Canada has described, the "pilot" of Confederation, the leader of the Fathers of Confederation.

Macdonald did not stop once Confederation was achieved. Under his leadership, the great trilogy of economic development, western settlement, and French-English co-operation, became the cornerstones of the Canadian structure. Canadian Confederation could not have been accomplished had Macdonald not had at his side men like Cartier and McGee. His national policy and support for the construction of the Transcontinental railway are well known to students of Canadian history; and, if Canadian history still means anything, it will be known to future students of our schools and colleges for all time.

Of Macdonald's successors as prime ministers, there are several who stand out. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the first French-speaking Canadian to hold the nation's highest elected office was a truly distinguished statesman who, ever mindful of his own heritage, nevertheless saw that the best hope for its survival lay in the broader context of a united Canada—as indeed it does today. He stated and believed that the twentieth century would be Canada's century. For the most part, the years have borne him out. He worked untiringly in the early part of the century to help lay the foundations to achieve this result.

Canadians of the past and of the future all owe a debt to this great leader who contributed so much towards the unity of the Canadian people. In his day there was little heard of separatism. In fact, separatism has become a slogan only over the past two or three years, and is but an impractical and irrational by-product of the present times.

Sir Robert Borden presided over the destiny of Canada in the difficult days of the First World War. Through this period, as indeed through his entire life, he looked upon Canadian interests in the larger context of world affairs. At an Imperial conference in 1917 he moved the resolution which established the autonomous basis of the modern Commonwealth. Following the war, Sir Robert Borden represented Canada at the Peace Conference where he established Canada's right to sign the Treaty of Versailles as a separate nation. He fought for and secured Canada's right to sit as an independent member of the League of Nations. He can truly be said to be Canada's first international statesman.

There is much that can be said of the Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King. He was prime minister of this country longer than any other leader; in fact, I believe he held that office longer than any prime minister in the Commonwealth. His work speaks for itself.

Both Bennett and Meighen held office as prime minister during times of adversity and tension. Lord Bennett worked hard and accomplished much. He brought about the British preferences which meant so much to building up trade and assisting the economy of the country. Arthur Meighen was perhaps the ablest of any of these men, and had he been in office at a more propitious time I am sure he would have gone down in history as one of our most illustrious prime ministers.

Prime Minister St. Laurent was here when Confederation was rounded out, you might say. It was under his leadership that Newfoundland became the tenth province of Canada. Prime Minister St. Laurent was a man respected and beloved by all Canadians.

As to Prime Minister Lester Pearson and the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, these men are too near to us, too near this day, for any comment at the present time.

Honourable senators, before going on with other matters in the Speech from the Throne, I would just like to say a word about the previous session. I think it is not out of place, before discussing the business of the present session, to say a few words regarding the past, because much of the legislation proposed in the previous Speech from the Throne is actually going to be considered in this present session—or at least so we hope. In fact, we have heard most of it for the past three years and, as has already been pointed out, of the 28 items in the present speech only four are new.

In discussing the last session, may I say that in my opinion—and I think there are a great many who would agree with me—that session of Parliament was one of the most frustrating, futile and inept sessions in the history of Canada. It was also the longest and most tiresome. I am sure no one regretted seeing the end of it, and I doubt if any would hope for another like it.

It emphasizes again the need of change in the rules governing the procedures in the other place. We are delighted that this is being considered and we hope that it will have the desired result.

There has been a committee of the House of Commons, as we know, sitting on this matter for some time now, and I believe that that committee is prepared to bring forth some sound recommendations. May I say also in this connection—and I do not think it is out of place—that we might recommend a similar study in connection with the Senate. It would be appropriate to do that soon, for the information forthcoming would, I am sure, be very interesting.

I do not have to go into detail concerning how procedures have affected our operations and processes here in the Senate in past years. All honourable senators are aware of the number of times in recent years that we have been left hanging on a thread, as it were, while watching the Government in the other place continually shift the order of business in order to suit the situation.

We have had recent examples of this in the number of bills left over that had been passed by the Senate but which had to be taken up again in this chamber because they were not dealt with in the other place.

As I say, changes are needed in the rules for the Senate, and I hope that, while the subject of the Constitution is being discussed, this matter will receive all the attention it deserves. A committee of the Senate should be set up to study the place of the Senate in our Government and the reform of our rules. Perhaps the most important aspect to be considered is that more work should be given to this body, more work and more responsibility, and I say this having spent many years in the House of Commons. In my opinion, there are senators capable of doing as good work, or even far better work, than has been done or can be done in the other place.

I feel that all honourable senators will agree with me when I say that throughout the past session the honourable Leader of the Government, Senator Connolly, has done a good job in arranging Senate work and in securing business for us. There have been times when he has been just as frustrated as any of the rest of us, I am sure, while attempting to determine and interpret the moves and moods of the Government in the other place. I repeat that he has done a good job in this respect and deserves the praise and congratulations of all honourable senators in this chamber.

I would like to deal now with matters pertaining more closely to the Speech from the Throne. In my opinion, one aspect of the Speech from the Throne should be the question of priorities in government. Which priorities or actions will be of most benefit to Canada; which are the most urgent? It is a vital question, and I might add it is one that the Government should ask itself more often.

Unity has been spoken of on many occasions, and I think it is our first priority. Without unity this nation just cannot and will not last. I become more convinced of this each day. Today some people seem to be paying more attention to subversive and destructive elements than to the good, sober common sense of Canadian people which can be found in abundance in all parts of this country. I feel we may be paying too much attention to outside influences. Perhaps there is a bit of playing politics involved—I do not know. Politicians have a habit of doing this. I do know, however, that there is not the disunity in this country that some people would lead us to believe. I was reading a speech made a few days ago in the House of Commons by the honourable member for Villeneuve, a speech in which he put forward a theory that we would do well to consider. He said that if the people from one part of this great country of ours were to visit and become better acquainted with those from the other parts, there would not be as much talk about disunity as there is at present. This was the idea put forward by the honourable member for Villeneuve, and I would like to quote the following from what he said:

> For the last five years, in particular, I have had the opportunity of visiting the western provinces and the maritimes, where the majority of the population is English-speaking. For example, I met in the west workers and farmers as well as university people. I had the privilege of going to the University of Toronto for instance, in our neighbour province. I gave a conference at Trinity Hall, in Toronto, where thousands of students came to hear me. I also had the privilege of speaking to university students in Manitoba, in Regina, Saskatchewan, in Vancouver and Victoria in British Columbia, and also at the University of Alberta, in Edmonton.
> Mr. Speaker, everyone knows that I am a French-speaking Canadian and that I fight for the recognition of French Canadians throughout Canada. It is indeed a duty for me to say that I have had a friendly reception in all those provinces; I might even say that I have had a warmer welcome in the western universities than in the University of Montreal, in my own province of Quebec. And these people out west, these young students, these farmers or whoever they are, are most hospitable. We are welcomed like kings in those provinces. Even if these young people do not speak our language, they are eager to welcome us, to hear our problems, to learn to know us, to know what we want and who we are. It was most interesting to meet these people, irrespective of political affiliations, as Canadians from a province other than theirs.

Honourable senators, his experience has also been the experience of others. From the Province of New Brunswick we had groups of young students go to Saskatchewan and they came back with the highest praise for the hospitality that they had received in that province. I know of students from Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and other provinces who have come east to Quebec, Ontario, and the Maritimes. They have spoken very, very highly of the treatment they received and the understanding that was built up after such visits. I repeat that one of the greatest factors in building the unity of this nation is to have our young people, and, indeed, some of our older people, meet with those from other parts of the country.

In this regard Expo will do much for Canada. Thousands of people from all parts of the country will gather there. They will learn to understand one another. I do not think it would be out of place, since we are spending millions of dollars on education, for us to send more young people from one region of the country to other regions so that they may better get to know each other. We speak about bilingualism and biculturalism, but culture is not something that is carried in a bag from one part of the country to the other. As far as bilingualism is concerned, the schools across the country—that is in the English-speaking parts of Canada—are crying out for teachers to teach French to their children. Nowadays there are ten children learning French for every one or two who were learning it a few years ago. This too will help in building up within our country that great spirit of unity which we desire.

Honourable senators, I am taking more time on some of these questions than I had intended, but I feel it is warranted. The second priority is immigration. At the time of Confederation, as I mentioned earlier, we had approximately three and a half million people. Today we have in excess of 20 million. According to the census of 1871 we had in the four provinces which existed at that time this small number of people, but we also had only 350,000 square miles of territory. Today we have 10 provinces and 3,851,000 square miles, a ten-fold increase in 100 years.

There is tremendous room in Canada for more people, and we certainly need more people. For that reason I do not feel it to be out of place to deal with this subject for a while this evening. A committee has been studying this question of immigration, and I have read some of their reports and found them very interesting indeed. No country in the world needs new people more than does Canada. There are, however, two factors which we must take into consideration in discussing this question. The first is quantity in order to fill up the great vacant spaces in our country, and the second is quality. I personally believe that when our land is fully developed, not in 10 years, but perhaps in 50 years or more, we could have and should have a population of 150 million. We are one of the great agricultural areas of the world, producing tremendous quantities of food. Six hundred million bushels is the average crop of wheat produced in the west, and this year I understand we can anticipate 750 million bushels. Canada can feed and should be feeding far more poverty-stricken people throughout the world, but particularly we should be feeding more people here in Canada.

Speaking of quality, I feel that we have the best so far as this is concerned. Our French-speaking and English-speaking people have been greatly aided by the Scandinavians, the Danes, the Germans, the Ukrainians and all those from the northern parts of Europe. There are no finer people anywhere. These are the people who have helped the French and English to build this nation.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, in a brief submitted to the Government some time ago, proposed an annual target of 180,000 new immigrants each year. This seems to be a realistic figure and is certainly not too high when we consider that between 60,000 and 80,000 Canadians leave Canada each year. So, the net gain would be 100,000 or so people—certainly not more than this country could easily absorb. In 1966 the immigration department reported 194,743 new immigrants. This was 50,000 over 1965. It was certainly a great improvement over the previous years in the early 1960s. Our net gain was estimated in the five years from 1960 to 1965 as being only 31,000.

Canada is also experiencing a sharp decline in the national birth rate. This has fallen from 28.3 per thousand of population in 1956 to just below 20 per thousand in 1966.

I pointed out a few moments ago that we are one of the least populated countries in the world. We certainly have the smallest population of any of the major industrial powers. We need more people and we need capable people. In their brief, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, besides recommending an increase in population, pointed out that a larger domestic market would cut unit costs in industry by making possible longer production runs and large-scale output and specialization, which would help boost living standards. This would certainly be all to the good. It would also promote greater economic stability and lessen our dependence upon foreign markets.

I repeat, we must have quality, as well as quantity in immigration, and I have pointed out that there are certain countries whose citizens would make good immigrants and be well suited to settle in this country with its northern climate.

We are quite strict in the selection of immigrants. One of the qualifications is quite a high standard of education. I sometimes wonder if we are not a little too strict in that regard. Those who came here in the early days were rugged and of good stock. They brought their families with them, and they grew up and were educated here. We can still bring in people of the right quality without perhaps too high a degree of education, and educate their families after they have become Canadian citizens. There is much work to be done in Canada, and everyone need not be highly educated.

Housing is another priority. Incidentally, I am mentioning these matters as being some to which the Government should give first consideration. Right now Canada is in the grip of a serious housing crisis—and that is putting it mildly. Rents are skyrocketing; the prices of homes have hit levels beyond the reach of the average wage-earner; and public housing is almost non-existent. If we are to have sufficient accommodation for our existing population, we must build houses at a greater rate than we are at present. We live in a cold climate. In the early days, when settlers came they built log cabins, and in the west they made sod huts, but they were rugged and they were satisfied with such accommodation. In our cities now we have huge slums. Indeed, it may be said that the early settlers, living in their log cabins and sod huts, were comparatively better off than many of those living in our city slums today.

Various reasons are given for the high cost of housing. One is the 11 per cent tax on building materials, and that is being corrected. Another is the high interest rates of the last few years, and labour costs—all these matters are receiving attention. The increases in land and construction costs, together with a small increase in the average size of houses, resulted in a total estimated average cost of $19,293 for National Housing Act houses financed in 1966. This was 10.9 per cent higher than the 1965 average of $17,402. There was a particularly marked increase in the Toronto area, where the average cost of bungalows financed under the N.H.A. went up from $19,677 in 1965 to $23,056 in 1966. This included an increase in land costs from an average of $5,777 to $7,097 per lot, and an increase of 10.1 per cent in construction costs per square foot.

I am sure we are all pleased to note that the banks have now entered the mortgage market. The other day a headline in the Ottawa Citizen announced, "Banks Put $200 Million into Mortgage Market." In an interview, Mr. Hignett, the President of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, said that while the generally-accepted construction target of 170,000 housing units a year may not be met in 1967, the current upsurge guarantees that it will be met in the 12-month period between June 1, 1967 and June 1, 1968. The banks are back in mortgage financing by virtue of the new Bank Act, which went into force on May 1.

Last week Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation reported an unprecedented increase in loan applications during March to 23,458 dwelling units, more than four times the total of 5,255 units for the same month in 1966. This is very good news.

Water pollution is another problem which I feel should be given priority attention by the Government. It is not necessary for me to discuss the matter to any extent this evening. Senator MacKenzie brought this complex problem confronting Canada to the attention of the Senate some time ago. It has been estimated that it would cost $5 billion to restore our lakes and streams to anywhere near the condition in which they were a few years ago. For instance, there are hundreds of square miles of dead water in Lake Erie alone. Every day we hear of more streams, rivers and waterways all over this country becoming polluted; and the same situation exists to a greater extent in the United States. I read an article not long ago which called many of the little streams flowing through the small towns and cities of the United States "open sewers." This is also true of many parts of Canada.

Honourable senators, I am not going to occupy more of your time this evening. In passing, I might mention the problems besetting the Commonwealth. These should receive careful consideration. May I say that we should all be pleased that the Leader of the Government in the Senate is at the present time attending a conference in, I think, Malta which is studying Commonwealth problems. For instance, the trade situation is becoming more complicated day by day. With Britain's application to enter the Common Market and the Kennedy Round of tariffs we do not know where we fit into the picture.

However, one point has been made crystal clear, and that is that the smaller nations of the Commonwealth, which are not in a position to help themselves in the matter of trade, should be receiving greater assistance from the more developed Commonwealth countries. I think that is one of the problems and one of the chief propositions which is being studied by the committee which is meeting to prepare for the next Commonwealth Conference.

Honourable senators, in conclusion may I say that these, to my mind, are just a few of the many problems we have to consider. We have taken up too much time in past years considering unimportant questions, and year after year we have continued to pile up other matters that should be considered. This is an indication that Parliament is not doing the work it should. When one finds 28 subjects mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, only four of which are new—some of them have been mentioned in the last three or four Throne Speeches—it must be realized that a system of priorities has to be established. The major items must receive first consideration, and those which are not so important should be considered as and when time permits.

The Speech from the Throne also mentions divorce law reform and the abolition of capital punishment. I may say at this point that so far as divorce law is concerned, I do not know of any body that can advise the Government better than the Senate of Canada. There is no other body that is better informed on the subject and knows what is needed in our divorce laws.

The Speech from the Throne informs us that a measure will be placed before this session for the better regulation and use of broadcasting privileges and responsibilities, and that there will be legislation concerning the provision of broadcasting facilities for educational purposes. There is certainly a great opportunity for achieving something better here.

ARDA is mentioned, as is parliamentary consideration of the Constitution, another very important matter. I know that several senators intend to discuss this at a later date.

There is to be a broadening of the scope of the Area Development Incentive Program. This has already been started. Pilot areas have been established in certain provinces; there is one in the northern part of my province of New Brunswick under ARDA. I wonder whether the proper section of the province has been chosen for this purpose, because it is my feeling that if there is any part that can look after itself it is the northern part. There are large pulp mills in the city of Bathurst, and also at Dalhousie and Campbellton. That part of the province enjoys one of the finest mining areas in the country. There are also the fisheries. But there are other areas which I think could very well receive attention. For instance, the sum of $100 million would have helped the potato growers in the upper Saint John River area, and it would have helped the dairy farmers. I do not think the money is being spent to the best advantage.

I am very pleased to know that some attention is being given to the coal mines of Nova Scotia, and that there is going to be a community development program for the Indian and Eskimo people.

Honourable senators, all these situations present very difficult problems, but the task of solving them is something to which the Parliament of Canada can very well put its shoulder. All of them must be dealt with, but, as I said a few moments ago, I hope the Government will sit down and consider what are the most important and deal with them first. Let us not waste time on matters like the Munsinger case, and so on. Let Parliament get down to doing the work that the people expect of it. If that rule is followed, then I am sure that in the days to come we as a people shall be better off.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I should like, first of all, to join the Leader of the Opposition in congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the honourable Senators Desruisseaux and Nichol. In a very well thought out speech, they have dealt with a number of important questions of national interest, and have done it on a very high level. I am sure the honourable senators will be grateful to them.

We listened with great interest to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. I must say that honourable Senator Brooks, who had assumed great responsibilities in the cabinet in the other place, has the authority and the experience necessary to deal, as he is doing, with questions that are familiar to him. This makes him a speaker to whom we always listen with pleasure and above all with profit.

However, I can obviously not agree with all the views expressed by my honourable friend, especially when he deals with the last session, contending that it was futile and frustrating. I hope the Leader of the Opposition does not expect me to agree with that any more than I am expecting him to agree with me when I say that it was not only the longest session of our history, but the most fruitful one.

In any event, what is important at present I think, is to find a common ground concerning the main points he raised, especially the ones on which we are in full agreement.

For instance, on the question of the improvement of parliamentary rules and procedures, all those who have some experience of the parliamentary procedure will admit that we do not have, to govern us in both houses, rules that meet with the 1967 requirements.

I congratulate the Leader of the Opposition for having also dealt with the question of exchanges between young Canadian people from one province to another.

Honourable Senator Bourget told me a while ago about articles published in this week's newspapers, reporting that young people from the Province of Quebec returning from a trip in the Western provinces recognized that they now held different views and felt that they were better Canadians. The Government should do all they can to encourage such visits by young Canadians. Furthermore, Expo is a unique opportunity to give youths of other provinces a chance to visit, to know and to love the Province of Quebec.

Honourable senators, in his speech, the Leader of the Opposition referred to many other matters; several other senators will speak after me and comment on some of the questions raised by Senator Brooks.

As far as I am concerned, this is the first session of the centennial of Confederation and I should like to take this opportunity to express some thoughts on this event. Curiously, my line of thought follows somewhat that of the Leader of the Opposition because after having spent years in the administration of the business of this country, we are in a position to suggest what should be in 1967 the true priorities of the Government. For some years, however, I have seen and heard as you have a considerable number of experts or so-called experts, in various seminars, speak of the constitutional issue and bring in their suggestions as to the possible revision of the Constitution.

In the last two years, we have heard innumerable speeches on the proposed Fulton-Favreau formula for the amendment of the Constitution. I have sometimes wondered, after witnessing such an expenditure of energy on the part of our experts, our constitutional jurists, if we were not wasting our time in seeking a solution to problems which are not really so high in the scale of priorities.

This is 1967. It is said that we are celebrating Confederation. But are we not instead really celebrating the Canadian citizen, the individual, rather than the confederative system? If so, if 1967 is really the festival of the Canadian citizen, should we not then first of all tend to such matters as are urgent and capable of improving the lot of the Canadian citizen?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, really, I do not feel—of course, this is a personal opinion and perhaps you do not share it—that in 1967, a constitutional federal-provincial conference is the No. 1 problem in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Next year, perhaps?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I believe the reason is very simple. Here, in the federal Government, as well as the provinces, we have an appropriate instrument, according to our jurisdiction, to introduce important and urgent legislation. Quebec also has at its disposal an appropriate instrument, if not necessarily all the money it would like to have. I will say, at the end of my remarks, that it is possible in the exchanges between the federal Government and Quebec and the other provinces to improve that situation, and this has been done in the last few years.

The Leader of the Opposition spoke earlier about the problem of housing and urban development and I will add to it the extremely rapid growth of urban centres.

The federal Government, in co-operation with the provinces, has done a lot in the last few years, under the previous as well as under this Government, to allow for the construction of one-family dwellings. We all know that in spite of all that has been done, we cannot in all honesty claim that, in 1967, a worker with a very low income can own a one-family dwelling. Thus, in our big cities, in Toronto, Montreal or elsewhere, there is still a greater number of slums. Perhaps Montreal managed somewhat to hide its slums from the visitors to Expo. Nevertheless, thousands of our citizens, in Montreal as well as in other big Canadian cities, live in deplorable conditions. There is an urgent need of housing units.

Last year, before my father died, I had the experience of resorting to a subterfuge to have him admitted into a hospital, because there was no room. When a person is in an extremely critical condition, it would seem that he cannot be admitted to hospital. The authorities ask that he be kept at home.

As to the needs of the universities in the Province of Quebec, I know from personal experience that Montreal University's medical faculty last year accepted only 125 students and not one more. I know of a student who applied after 125 persons had been admitted and who was refused for lack of space. Instead of becoming a medical doctor as he wanted to be, he will become a dental surgeon. That is very well, there is nothing wrong with that, but he will not be a medical doctor.

However, I read in the Saturday issue of La Presse that Papineauville, with a population of 3,000, does not have a single medical doctor. Our needs are tremendous in that field. A good number of problems could be solved by the provinces in co-operation with the federal Government, provided that for a while we forget a little about academic matters and constitutional problems.

I sat on the penitentiary committee of both houses. You read the report tabled lately to the effect that there is a need, in Canada, for additional penitentiaries. Some are needed here, there and everywhere, because essential rehabilitation cannot be provided in existing institutions.

There are underprivileged areas in Canada. Everybody is aware of it and I congratulate the Leader of the Opposition and certain members from the Maritimes for raising the matter at every opportunity. As I said, the people in some underprivileged areas are not as well off as those in the central provinces. There are also underprivileged areas in the province of Quebec. All along the Atlantic coast, in the Gaspé peninsula and in the lower St. Lawrence area, the problems are similar to those of the Maritime provinces. I remember two years ago—I am thinking of my friend, Senator Walker, who was Minister of Public Works before me and is no doubt well aware of this problem—being in Matane where 30 per cent of the people were unemployed right in the middle of June. Why? Because there is no industry in that area on account of the lack of easy and modern communication facilities. All the Maritime provinces are faced with the same problem. It is up to a government which understands the situation to provide these regions with transportation facilities by rail, sea and road, so that industries may settle in the area and unemployment may be cut down. The Government helps this part of the country through its designated areas program and tax abatements. However, that is not enough. The economic conditions which would induce industries to settle there have not yet been created.

In addition, there is the problem of agriculture. You are undoubtedly aware, honourable senators, that the Province of Quebec, a region which I am particularly acquainted with, is faced with the same problem as the Maritime provinces where almost 20 to 25 per cent of farms are unprofitable. I understand that some plans or joint Federal-Provincial projects have been developed to assist those regions but it is not easy.

There have always been some unprofitable farms in the Province of Quebec. Steps must be taken for a rural renewal. In addition, new jobs have to be created.

We all know, for instance, that in the Province of Quebec we had a steel complex project. Financial considerations did not allow for the implementation of this project. This shows that, in spite of the invaluable help granted by the present Government and by the preceding ones, if one takes an unbiased look at the situation, the constitutional problem is not a matter of priority. No matter what changes may be made in the Constitution, I fail to see how this could alter our problems. However, I believe that if anything can be suggested to the Government in this centennial year, it is to make the legislation human, so that it may serve man first and foremost. We must put a stop to these debates on the Constitution and the constant quarrels which divert attention from the real problems. The Canadian citizen would be the first to benefit therefrom.

That is somehow the point I wanted to raise, honourable senators, for it is late and I do not want to keep you any longer. But after a few years' experience, we end up by not necessarily accepting certain projects such as a federal-provincial constitutional conference which, in itself, may seem attractive, but experience shows that the more we consider the individual problems, the more it will be possible, in co-operation with the provinces, to achieve things which will give the individual, in Quebec or elsewhere, greater confidence in the future of Confederation. I remain convinced—and I speak here especially of the Quebec citizen—that the main question for him is not the constitutional issue, but his standard of living, of his job opportunities, his ability to raise a family and give his children what they need to look to the future with the best chances of success.

These last few days, I was listening to questions put on television to Montrealers and other Quebeckers concerning their visit to Expo. They were asked: What do you think of all this? Almost all answered: Expo is a marvellous thing; we are proud to be Canadian. Of course there is nothing contradictory in saying that one is proud of being Canadian and proud of being a Quebecker; the two things are not incompatible. But this great achievement, Expo, will perhaps have a deeper impact than was thought, especially if it makes the average man think and understand that we can only accomplish great things if we have the co-operation of the various governments, of all Canadians and of all the provinces.

STANDING COMMITTEES

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the first report of the Committee of Selection which was presented on Wednesday, May 10.

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien moved the adoption of the report.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, before this report is adopted, I would like to mention to you that in my mail today I received numerous bills from the Commons. Two of them are contradictory. What is surprising is that both have been sponsored by the same member. The first is Bill C-34, "An act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965, with respect to the quorum of the House of Commons".

The second is Bill C-44, "An Act to amend the British North America Act 1867 (abolition of the Senate)."

Well, the Senate is serving a useful purpose with regard to the House of Commons by giving it a good example. To illustrate my point: the membership of the House of Commons is 265 and that of the Senate is 102. The average attendance in the Senate is between 60 and 70. At the last sitting we were 68 out of 102. On the other hand, in the House of Commons they complain that their quorum is not always respected. The quorum in the House of Commons is 20 members. In fact, the sponsor of these bills wants the quorum to be increased to 50, but even so that is less than the attendance of the Senate. For those reasons I suggest that the sponsor of those two bills should first look at his own house before advocating the abolition of the Senate.

Report adopted.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMITTEE

APPOINTMENT

Leave having been given to revert to notices of motions:

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets, with leave of the Senate moved:

> That the senators mentioned in the first report of the Committee of Selection as having been chosen to serve on the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts during the present session, be and they are hereby appointed to form part of and constitute the said committee to inquire into and report upon such matters as may be referred to them from time to time, and that the committee have power, without special reference by the Senate, to consider any matter affecting the internal economy of the Senate, and such committee shall report the result of such consideration to the Senate for action.

Motion agreed to.

That the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31 March, 1968; and that the committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records, to print its proceedings upon the said Estimates and to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

NOTICES OF INQUIRIES STAND

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I would ask that the three inquiries in my name stand, with the expectation that they will be answered on Tuesday, June 6.

Inquiries stand.

PUBLIC BILLS AND REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA

INQUIRY RE AVAILABILITY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have to rise on a question of privilege. Today I went to the Distribution Office and asked for copies of all public bills that were passed by both houses and assented to during the last session. I was told that they had none available and that all remaining copies have been thrown out to make room for the new legislation.

Honourable senators will remember that some years ago, and especially on July 22, 1964, I suggested that the example of the Province of Quebec should be followed, and that all legislation passed by both houses and assented to should be published at the earliest possible opportunity in an extra copy of the Canada Gazette, so as to make people familiar with the legislation that has been passed.

You know, honourable colleagues, that there is an axiom of law to the effect that nobody is supposed to ignore the law. There are laws in force, and yet we cannot obtain copies of the specific pieces of legislation. It is a most incredible situation. I do not know when we shall be able to obtain bound copies of the statutes—sometimes it takes several months.

I recall that Bill S-17 concerning bankruptcies had been amended many times by the House of Commons and the Senate, and it was three months before a complete copy, as assented to by the proper authority, could be obtained.

I do not press my question today, but I shall ask another question tomorrow as to when we shall get the revised Statutes of Canada for the session that started in January of last year and ended this May. At the present time we have nothing before us but the bills, and we are not sure whether they have been amended. We do not know exactly what is the law. I make this request in the name of all the taxpayers of Canada who are entitled to know what the law of the land is.

As I told honourable senators, in the Province of Quebec each piece of legislation that is passed by both houses and is assented to is published in an extra copy of the Official Gazette. When I suggested to the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) three years ago that that procedure might be followed here, I was told that some technical reasons made it difficult, but that as soon as a piece of legislation received Royal Assent copies of it would be available upon request. At the present time there is nothing in the distribution office, and I do not know whether that promise is going to the fulfilled. But, it is an anomaly. It is an abnormal situation, and I hope it will be corrected at the earliest possible opportunity.

What is the use of passing laws when we do not know what they are? I do not speak only for lawyers. I speak for laymen, who have the same right as any lawyer to be informed about legislation that is passed by this Parliament.

The other day I witnessed a TV panel program. The panelists—some of them had brilliant minds—were discussing biculturalism and like topics. One of them, a modest man and a Social Credit Member of Parliament, made the right observation when the panel was asked what was the first duty of Parliament. He answered, "Our first duty is to pass laws. It is to legislate." That bit of wisdom came from a layman, and not from one of the brilliant minds that were on the panel. It was common sense.

As members of the Senate of Canada we are entitled to have that legislation. The Members of the House of Commons are entitled to have it. All the lawyers and judges of Canada are entitled to have it, and so are all the taxpayers of Canada. I hope that the Government will use the greatest diligence in supplying us with the information that belongs to us.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I can do nothing more at the present time than to tell Senator Pouliot that I shall make an inquiry about this, and report later on.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, may I suggest that this is a problem that could be placed before the Joint Committee on Printing. I am a member of that committee, but I have never attended a meeting. Perhaps that committee would provide the proper forum for discussing a matter such as this.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Why did you not call a meeting?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I was waiting for a complaint.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Do you agree with me, or not?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have said I do. I suggested that the Joint Committee on Printing should look into it.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux, seconded by Hon. Mr. Nichol, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I feel a deep sense of honour in having the good fortune of being a member of the Parliament of Canada during this year of enormous historical significance, namely, the centennial year of the Confederation of our country. I have no doubt that every other member of the Senate of Canada and every member of Parliament has the same feeling with respect to this session, the significance of which is second only to that of the first session of Parliament which was held on Parliament Hill in Ottawa in the year 1867.

Honourable senators, this is a momentous year in the history of our country, as we all realize. Scanning back over the years, may I say this: What a vast, wealthy and powerful nation we have assembled together and built up in these one hundred years.

Speaking from the point of view of history, I think it was regrettable that the second session of the Twenty-seventh Parliament of Canada, in this significant year, was not opened with the pomp and ceremony and colour which it deserved. Indeed, from my reading of the first session of the First Parliament, the pomp and ceremony and fanfare in which the people of those days engaged was far greater than that of the opening of this session of Parliament. I really feel that we have missed a great opportunity in this regard. Perhaps it results from the lamentable lack of a sense of priority which has so consistently been shown by the present Government.

In this centennial year, I want to begin by offering my sincere congratulations to our Speaker in having the opportunity and privilege of holding that office in this chamber during so significant a year. Also, I offer my warm congratulations to the mover (Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux) and the seconder Hon. Mr. Nichol) of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. They delivered their addresses in a traditionally effective and efficient manner.

May I also express my sincere congratulations and good wishes to our new Governor General, His Excellency Roland Michener, and to Mrs. Michener. They indeed follow in a line of succession of distinguished incumbents, and it will be difficult for them to fill the place which was so ably occupied by their predecessors, the Vaniers.

From my reading of the history of this country and from personal knowledge of the last few years, I do not believe any Governor General occupying that post became as well liked by the people of this country, and was as effective in performing the duties called for by that office—particularly in regard to the unity of all our people—as was His Excellency Georges Philias Vanier and his charming wife. Their warmth, friendliness and grace were typical of them. They indeed captured the hearts of all Canadians in a manner which I am sure was unknown in Canada before them. That is why I say the present Governor General faces a tremendous challenge. I hope the Micheners, if I may call them that, can fill the great void. I am sure they can, because they have so many of the same qualities as our former Governor General and his wife.

In the same way as an individual becomes of age when he or she becomes 21 years old, so also Canada, now 100 years old, has become of age among the nations of the world.

In addition to our own celebration of this wonderful occasion, Canada will be on the lips of people the world over. I refer particularly to what is becoming such a tremendous event, Expo, away beyond our hopes and expectations. The Pan-Am Games also, to be held in western Canada, in my City of Winnipeg this summer, will attract thousands of people from all parts of the world. The games, too, will advertise the name of Canada in all parts of the world.

Honourable senators, speaking in terms of history, our country is not only 100 years old; its history goes very much further back than that. In my opinion, we must never forget that it was the people from France, the French, who occupied this country first, more than 300 years ago; and the French fact fortunately is with us, and I hope will be with us forever.

While I am on an historical note, may I refer to another fact of history, namely, the coming of the Vikings to Canada nearly a thousand years ago. I read from the little booklet called "Quick Canadian Facts," published a few years ago. On page 2, under the heading "A Quick History of Canada," the first item is:

> Year 1000: Herjulf, Norseman, sailing from a Norse colony in Iceland, to pay a Christmas visit to father in Greenland, got off course in fog and sailed on to sight some unidentified part of the Canadian coast. He did not land, but fellow-countryman Leif Ericson heard of Herjulf's experience, and later crossed Atlantic to spend a winter at a place he called Vineland.

It was probably Nova Scotia.

In this regard I refer to a very pleasant and historical event which took place in this city on Friday, April 14 last. This was a centennial project of the Icelandic people in Canada. The project was the presentation to Canada and the unveiling of a plaque to commemorate the discovery of the western hemisphere by mariners from Iceland about the year 1000. This plaque was unveiled in the new building for the National Library and Archives and was accepted on behalf of Canada by the Prime Minister.

The plaque in question is made of bronze, measures about four feet by seven feet, and weighs several hundred pounds. In its centre is an inscription in old Norse Script which, taken from early records, describes the voyages to which I alluded a moment ago. On either side of the old Norse inscription is its translation into both French and English.

May I just refer to a few sentences from a speech made by Dr. P. H. T. Thorlakson of Winnipeg, who was the chairman of the donors, and made the official presentation of the plaque? I read the introductory paragraph at the top of the plaque as quoted in his speech by Dr. Thorlakson:

> This plaque commemorates the discovery of the eastern coast of Canada by mariners from Iceland and Greenland in the late tenth century.
> The historic excerpt reproduced below is from Graenlendinga Saga (The Saga of the Greenlanders) first committed to writing in Iceland about A.D. 1200 and preserved in Flateyjarbok (The Flatey Book) a vellum manuscript compiled in Iceland about A.D. 1390.
> Part I records the sighting of new land in the west by Bjarni Herjolfsson, of Eyrar in Iceland, in A.D. 986.

Part II describes the voyage of discovery of Leifr Eiriksson some years later and his landings in Helluland (Flatstoneland), Markland (Woodland), and Vinland (Wineland). These explorations led to an attempt at colonization by Thorfinnr Karlsefni whose son, Snorri Thorfinnsson, was born on this continent.

Archaeological research in western Greenland and eastern Canada supports these ancient Icelandic records of exploration and colonization.

These discoveries surely constitute one of the earliest chapters in Canadian history.

Indeed, it is a matter of interest that in the year 1477 Columbus visited Iceland. He stayed there for some time studying the writings that were available there in regard to these early explorations. You will recall that it was only 15 years later that he sailed towards America and landed in San Salvadore. That was in the year 1492. As I am speaking of the early history of this country, I might point out that there was, of course, the later voyage of Cabot from Bristol to Newfoundland in 1497 and, most significant of all so far as Canada is concerned, those of Cartier in 1534 and 1535.

May I now make a few remarks concerning Canada's voyage during the past 100 years. Sometimes I shudder at the nearness of disaster in regard to so many important events in our past. There were occasions when, if disaster had occurred, there would be no Canada as we know it today. I realize that the story has been told and retold during the past days, weeks and months in connection with our centenary celebrations, but just let me review some of these events that are so important to our history. I do so only for the purpose of putting into perspective some of the problems that we face today in this country. I wish to put them in perspective in regard to the real, the enormous problems that were faced by our forefathers 100 years ago and thereafter. Such an illustration will, I think, underline the insignificance of what we imagine to be the insolvable problems of the present day.

One of the most significant things to me about Confederation and about the early Confederation debates which took place prior to 1867 was the tremendous determination of strong-willed men, both French and English, in the Province of Canada of that day, namely, in what was referred to as Upper and Lower Canada. When one comes to think of it, after George Brown decided that he would become part of this team, and after he brought his associates with him, so far as I can read from the stories of that day, there was never any question as to where the people of the Province of Canada intended to go. They intended to form one nation on the northern part of this continent.

On the other hand, we read the story of the happenings in the Atlantic provinces, and we all recall that, despite the seeming agreement in the Charlottetown Conference of 1864, there was tremendous bitterness over the differences which emerged in the Atlantic provinces, particularly in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick during those years from 1864 up to within a few weeks of Confederation itself.

If there was ever a near disaster in this country, that was the time. As we read on we can see that it was only by the personal courage and obstinate determination of leaders such as Tupper, Wilmot and others, that those provinces finally joined with the Province of Canada in Confederation. It is the story of the political fights in the Maritimes—read Creighton or any author who has written about that period: the story is like a movie thriller. Finally, it turned out right, but, if it had not, one wonders if we would have the Canada of today and would now be celebrating the centenary of Confederation.

Then came the task of bringing in Rupert's Land and British Columbia. What fantastic problems had to be faced! But the interesting part of bringing in the West is that it was the businessmen, the builders, the entrepreneurs, the engineers—those were the people who were of the greatest significance in doing this. It was people like Lord Mount Stephen, Lord Strathcona, Sir William Van Horne and others, who prevented the collapse of the dreams of the statesmen and the politicians. They were the ones who brought those dreams to reality. But on every occasion during those days, if one reads the story, one sees that it was greatness that prevailed; it was the men of small stature who failed to achieve their purposes of destruction.

Honourable senators, may I now mention the other two tremendous possibilities for disaster in this country, particularly in respect to the national unity of this country. One was the First World War, the other was the Second World War. Looking back one realizes that momentous decisions had to be made. Can we now do anything but agree that the decisions that were made were right? They were made by big men, not by little men, and the big men won out. One can visualize the tremendous opportunities that existed in those days for this country to break apart. So, honourable senators, I point out that in the light of those things, to refer to problems of Canada, and to talk about secession or breaking up this country which is now 100 years old, such talk is infinite nonsense. Our problems of today, as we all know, are infinitesimal in comparison with the problems that were faced on those other occasions that I have referred to.

Honourable senators, I have picked out only a few examples simply for the purpose of indicating that there have been times when we have had real difficulties and highly dangerous problems to face in this country. Surely today is not such a time.

Now, honourable senators, I want to make a few remarks regarding our Constitution—the British North America Act. I was pleased last evening that the Acting Leader of the Government (Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets) spoke briefly regarding some of the problems that I intend to talk about this afternoon.

First of all, many people say that the British North America Act is a straitjacket, that it is an outworn instrument, that it is old and should be discarded and replaced by something new. I ask the question: Is the British North America Act a problem? Is it a straitjacket? Let us examine those questions.

The first federal constitution in modern days that I know of was the Constitution of the United States. This was completed in the year 1787, exactly 80 years prior to our own Confederation. I think we all know the story of the founding fathers and how they went to France and to Great Britain and to other parts of the world, and how they sought the best advice available anywhere in drawing up a constitution for what they knew would be a great country. In my view they developed a fantastic instrument, one that has resulted in the growth and development of the greatest nation of the world. The Canadian Constitution to a large extent followed in most of its details the constitution developed by the founding fathers of the United States. It was, of course, different in principle, and it was different in time. The United States Constitution developed a republican form of government, while we on the other hand adopted the monarchial and the British system of parliamentary government. Nevertheless, despite these differences, our constitutions were similar in tenor and in effect, apart from the differences to which I have referred.

One of the great problems we talk about today is that of amending our Constitution the B.N.A. Act. But surely we are all aware that the Constitution adopted by the United States in 1787 was not final, as were the laws of the Medes and the Persians which were to stand forever without amendment. The Constitution of the United States was amended 24 times up to 1965, and if I am not mistaken there was a further amendment a few weeks ago. In other words, the Constitution of the United States has been amended 25 times during this period of 180 years. How often has the Canadian Constitution been amended? This is the document that people have described as a straitjacket. The Constitution of Canada has been amended 21 times since 1867.

The point I am trying to make, honourable senators, is that the Constitution of Canada like the Constitution of the United States is a living thing, and it has been brought up to date and modernized over the years to meet changing social and economic conditions. It is true that in the United States they developed at the very beginning a method of amendment which we all know about. It is a very simple method of amendment. A resolution is passed by the Senate and the House of Representatives; it is required to be carried by a two-thirds majority. Then this resolution requires the approval of three-quarters of the states in the United States. If the resolution achieves these majorities, the proposed amendment becomes law.

For obvious reasons no method was incorporated in the British North America Act for its amendment. I think one of the reasons is that Canada at that time was essentially a colony; it could not in those days be said to be a fully independent nation. Our shores were being protected by the British navy. In any event, the amending of the Constitution was left to the British Parliament. But over the years it became a mere formality for the Parliament of the U.K. to legislate into law any amendment whatsoever that was appropriately requested by Canada. Certainly since the enactment of the Statute of Westminster in 1931, the Government of the United Kingdom has been prepared to take any steps to repatriate our Constitution to Canada, to do with as we like. The point is that the Constitution is amendable in the United Kingdom only for the reason that we have not agreed upon a method of amendment in Canada. Therefore, is not the main problem in regard to the Constitution today its repatriation, as we term it?

Later I shall refer to some of the suggestions that have recently been made for amending it. However, for the moment there is only one problem in relation to the Constitution as far as we Canadians are concerned, and that is its repatriation. I, and I think practically all Canadians, believe that it ought to be repatriated. Of course it should be repatriated; it should come back to Canada where it could be amended by the people of Canada. As everyone knows, it is only a question of method, and as yet we have not settled upon the method.

Consequently, for the record may I just briefly examine the history of the attempts that have been made at repatriation of the Constitution, and where the situation stands at the present time?

On January 28, 1935, during the regime of the late Prime Minister Bennett, a special committee of the House of Commons was appointed to study methods of amending the Constitution. The resolution is set forth in this publication entitled, "The Amendment of the Constitution of Canada", which is signed at the bottom by the Honourable Guy Favreau, Minister of Justice, February, 1965, and which was prepared by the Department of Justice. The 1935 resolution is the first of the resolutions referred to, but it was merely concerned with the amendment of the Constitution and made no reference to repatriation.

Then in 1935 and 1936 there was a Dominion-Provincial Conference on the Constitution called by the Honourable Ernest Lapointe, the then Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, and for the first time there appeared a reference to the repatriation of the Constitution. That question is raised on page 20 of the publication to which I have just referred, and I will read a short extract from page 21:

> This Conference in the interests of the Dominion and of the provinces, is of the opinion:
> (a) That amendments to the British North America Act are now and subsequently may be necessary and imperative.
> (b) That, as in the case of all the other self-governing Dominions, Canada should have the power to amend the Canadian Constitution...

That was the first reference to the repatriation of our Constitution.

Then you will recall the amendment of 1949, under the administration of Mr. St. Laurent, with regard to which there was a significant achievement concerning the power of amendment by Canada. You will also recall that the federal Government was given all powers of amendment, excluding only five important areas. One of these referred to the powers of the provinces; another to language; another to religion; a fourth had reference to the fact that a session of the federal house must be held every year; and a fifth had reference to the fact that no Parliament may exceed in duration a term of five years. Those were and are now the only exceptions, where the federal Government has not complete power to amend our Constitution—namely, to request an act of the United Kingdom Parliament for this purpose.

Then the next step was a constitutional conference in 1950. Following that there was the conference called by the Minister of Justice of that day, Mr. Fulton, in 1960, which met once that year and again in 1961. It was at this conference that the so-called Fulton Formula was developed.

The next conference was one called by Mr. Favreau in 1964, at which there was developed what has since become known as the Fulton-Favreau formula. This formula is indeed very similar, except in slight detail, to the one developed in 1961. That is a brief historical review of the efforts directed towards the amendment and repatriation of the Constitution.

Now we are in 1967, and nothing has been done in this regard. Whose fault is it? It is certainly not the fault of the government of the United Kingdom; it is wholly and exclusively the fault of the people of Canada.

There is only one reference I would like to make to the Fulton and the Fulton-Favreau formulae. It is this. The draft acts are contained in the publication to which I have already referred. Each of the draft acts—one developed in 1961 and one in 1964—contains Part I and Part II. Part I concerns the repatriation to Canada of our Constitution. That is the part which presumes to bring the Constitution home to Canada, where it can be amended by us. Then Part II is an actual amendment of the Constitution in certain specific ways.

My point is this, that I see no reason why our next step should not be merely the enactment of Part I, to which I understand there is very little opposition in Parliament, and by that means we would bring the Constitution back to Canada, without trying to amend it, as is the case in Part II. To my mind, Part II is simply a complicating factor which makes it so much more difficult to repatriate our Constitution. I offer that as a worth while suggestion, and I believe there would be quick agreement in regard to repatriation of the Constitution if it were handled in that way.

It is true that we would still be in a straitjacket regarding the amendment of the Constitution in respect to the items to which I referred a moment ago—the powers of the provinces which must not be disturbed, the powers contained in section 92 and section 133 in regard to language, the section in regard to religion, and so on. However, the point is that I think we have for the moment adopted the view that there must be agreement among all the provinces in regard to those matters and that, consequently, we should consider amending the Constitution ourselves after it is repatriated rather than attempt to have it amended in the United Kingdom Parliament in regard to the substantive provisions in Part II, to which I have referred.

I do suggest that the logical way of going about this, and going about it quickly, is to enact one of these draft acts, either the Fulton Formula or the Fulton-Favreau Formula, in respect only, however, to Part I.

As I said a moment ago, in all our problems greatness has always survived. Surely we in Canada can find a way of bringing our Constitution back to this country. After that is done I am convinced there is enough intelligence and common sense in Canada to find a way of amendment which will suit our needs.

I come now to just one other problem in respect of the Constitution. Some people say that the so-called disunity in Canada, or the so-called desire for secession of one or more provinces, results from a Constitutional impasse. I suggest that that is just pure nonsense. It is just not correct. Has there been a single demand recently by any responsible people for a Constitutional amendment that cannot be achieved?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: There has been not one. Has anybody, for instance, seriously suggested that section 133 of the British North America Act, dealing with language and language rights, should be amended? If such a suggestion has been made I should like to know who made it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, I do.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: There is one. If anyone suggests that, then I should like to know just what amendment is proposed.

Let me ask also: Has there been any suggestion that section 93 respecting education should be amended? Has there been any such suggestion put forward by any responsible authority such as the premiers or the cabinets of any of the provinces? If there has, then I do not know of it.

Has there been any suggestion that section 132 respecting powers of making treaties should be amended? I do not know of any such suggestion.

As a matter of fact, in speaking of section 132, I defy anyone to tell me just what it means. I have read it over several times, and if ever a section of the British North America Act requires a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada I suggest it is section 132. I, for one, have always been opposed to the federal Government's assuming broad powers inside Canada just because it has certain rights to deal with foreign countries under its treaty-making power. I have a great deal of sympathy with provinces that suggest that the federal Government should not make treaties with outside countries in respect of education or cultural affairs unless requested to do so by the provinces.

After all, all provinces of Canada are sovereign powers within Canada. I do not see any serious objection at the moment, and I am not told what objection there is to provinces making treaties in regard to matters that are exclusively within their purview, such as educational and cultural matters.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: We have been doing it for the last 50 years.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Certainly, and there have been no newspaper headlines about it until now.

I recall reading in the newspapers a few days ago that the premier of Ontario had stated that his province had for many decades been making arrangements or treaties with foreign countries covering various matters within the jurisdiction of the Province of Ontario. I have no doubt that Senator Roebuck knows much more about this problem than I do, and certainly as it affects his own province.

Consequently, what do we come down to when we endeavour to ascertain the difficulties that flow from the Constitution? What is the problem? Some people have said to me that it is a financial problem; the provinces want more money or vice versa; the provinces are not satisfied with the divisions of moneys, and so on. The fact is that there is nothing in the Constitution relating to the question of whether the federal Government should collect taxes and contribute them to the provinces, or whether the provinces can collect taxes and contribute them to the federal Government. There is nothing in the Constitution in that regard. But, the Constitution is extremely clear as to the taxing powers of this country.

Section 91 sets out the powers of the Parliament, and Class 3 is:

> The raising of Money by any Mode or System of Taxation.

Section 92, which enumerates the powers of the provincial legislatures, in class 2 provides:

> Direct Taxation within the Province in order to the Raising of a Revenue for Provincial Purposes.

Surely, no problem exists here.

The great source of revenue in this country is the taxation of corporate and personal incomes and the provinces have identically the same right to that field of taxation as has the federal Government. In fact, to my mind they have a prior right. It was only in wartime that that right was assumed by the Dominion. It was in 1917 that the federal Government assumed or began to exercise its power in respect of tax incomes.

What happened afterwards is, of course, elementary history. The federal Government simply had to finance its part in the Second World War, and the result was that it occupied practically the whole field of income taxation in Canada. It pre-empted it, and left nothing for the provinces, with the result that since 1945 we have had a series of squabbles and disagreements between the provinces and the federal power as to what part of these sources of taxation should be occupied by each. The federal Government persisted in occupying the field of income taxation to such a tremendous extent that in 1945 the policy of allowing the federal Government to collect these taxes in toto and delivering a certain percentage to the provinces was adopted.

Of course, that system has been revised to a certain extent, and the provinces are gradually getting back part of the income tax field, but the point I make is that no provincial premier or anyone else can truthfully assert that there is a clash between Canada and the provinces in respect of matters occasioned by any problem arising from the Constitution. It is a problem entirely within ourselves and has been a matter of arrangement between the federal Government and the provinces. It is such today; indeed, it is a most unsatisfactory affair.

Honourable senators, my conclusion is, first, that there is no constitutional crisis in Canada; secondly, that no part of the so-called disunity nor appeals for separation from Canada by any province can properly be laid at the door of a "horse-and-buggy" constitution. Ours is not such a constitution. It has been brought right up to date, including amendments in respect of such matters as unemployment insurance, old age pensions, and the like.

Our Constitution is an extremely modern one. It is just as up to date as that of our neighbours to the south.

Thirdly, for the obvious reasons of our pride and dignity as a hundred-year-old nation we must immediately proceed to make the home of our Constitution in Canada; then we can go on from there.

Honourable senators, I had no intention of speaking so long, and I promise to detain you for only a few more minutes. I would like to say a word or two about the Senate. As you all know, there have been criticisms of late in regard to this body. Some persons—I call them wholly irresponsible and without a sense of history or constitutional relationships—have even suggested that the Senate should be abolished. I say that that, of course, is just nonsense, and anyone who advocates this is completely uninformed as to the essentials of democracy or self-government.

What is democracy? So many people think that a democratic form of government is merely a form of government where a majority rules. That is only part of the story. Democracy also provides for the rights of minorities and for the protection of those rights. It is interesting to note that all those Canadians who advocate the abolition of the Senate, particularly the two or three members in the other house, are people who are interested in only one thing—government by the majority. Such people, especially those in the other place, make it clear that they never did have any regard for minorities; they think of democracy as being merely government by majority.

I believe it is a fact that there are fewer real safeguards in Canada in regard to minorities than there are in the United States as set out in its Constitution. You will recall that the very first amendment to the United States Constitution was the Bill of Rights, which protects certain inalienable individual rights. And this is one of the basic duties of the Senate of Canada.

The fact is that the people to whom I have referred forget that there are only two or three countries in the world that do not have a second chamber. Why do all countries, with these two or three exceptions, have second chambers? The reason is obvious. It is because democracy must have, as the Americans say, checks and balances, a separation of powers. It consists of the idea that certain personal rights and freedoms are inalienable, such as the right to worship as you will, and other similar personal liberties.

What might happen to rights of minorities if in Canada we had merely a House of Commons? The majority could become immediately a dictatorship, and it would indeed become a dictatorship under certain conditions.

If some of these people were in power—and I am speaking of those who would like to see the Senate abolished—what would happen to the rights that the Senate was created to protect? People who criticize the Senate in that way have not read the Confederation debates. They do not know that seven full days, the longest period of time given to the consideration of any subject in the Confederation debates at Quebec, was devoted to the Senate of Canada, how it should be constituted and what its powers should be. The reason is that the Senate was deemed by the Fathers of Confederation to be of great importance. In fact, everybody knows that there could not have been any Confederation of Canada without the Senate, and without a Senate constituted roughly as it is today.

Honourable senators, I am not attempting to be exhaustive in this subject. I am simply pointing out two or three obvious facts in regard to this problem. The Senate was created, among other reasons, to protect personal rights, language rights, rights of religion and worship, as well as rights to personal ownership of property. I am not ashamed to say that it was intended to protect property rights, because there is no civilization in the world of much value which is not founded on the right of private property and property ownership.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Individual rights with regard to property.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: That is right, individual rights with regard to property.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And you might add public rights, too.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Yes. As I have stated, I have no intention to be exhaustive in regard to these things. I just wanted to make this brief reference to those people whose desire it is to tear down this indispensable institution. After all is said and done, there was nothing of greater importance in the development of the Constitution of the United States than the safeguarding of the rights to which I have referred, and by providing a proper division of power in the government of that country.

There are many other reasons why the Senate should be maintained. I merely wish to add that we, of course, have responsibilities. I think the basic danger to the Senate is that if it ever becomes a one-party chamber, or even nearly so, it might mean the death knell of this institution. Perhaps that could be taken as a warning. I say that because the Senate must remain a debating chamber. It must of course remain a political body, for it is part of the government of this country. It is part of Parliament. Howveer, if it ever should come close to being a one-party chamber it will no longer be a debating forum and its usefulness may deteriorate to an undue extent.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Has it not reached that stage?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: No one appreciated this more than the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent when he was Prime Minister. I shall not go into detail, but I am sure all honourable senators know exactly to what I am referring. Mr. St. Laurent had a great sense of Parliament. He came into Parliament late, but learned very quickly what it was about, its rights, privileges and responsibilities, and the part played by this chamber in the democratic process of Canada.

Honourable senators, this body must never represent one party. For instance, in two provinces, British Columbia and Alberta, there are certain governments in power, but no member of the political parties now in power in those provinces has ever been appointed to the Senate of Canada. Would it not be good common sense if some prime minister were to break with tradition and, perhaps on the advice of the premiers of those provinces, nominate representatives from those parties to sit in this chamber? This is an opportunity for the Prime Minister of Canada to show real greatness regarding the institution of Parliament, and particularly in regard to the Senate.

Honourable senators, the various committees of this house have done tremendous work over the years. There was a committee to revise the Income Tax Act, some 20 years ago, in 1947 or 1948, which did an excellent job. There was a committee which revised the Criminal Code and on which some senators worked day and night for weeks and months. There was a committee on Land Use which was tremendously useful and important. There were many other committees whose work was of great value to Canada.

A few days ago the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, suggested the establishment of a royal commission to investigate the growth of crime in Canada. As you know, royal commissions cost millions of dollars from the moment they are appointed. No royal commission could possibly equal the personnel available in this house to study such an important problem, and I suggest that consideration be given to turning this problem over to a committee of the Senate to study and report on. This would result in considerable financial saving and would provide a better report than could be made by people unversed in the science of politics and statecraft.

Another problem of importance is whether our water resources should be kept to ourselves or should be considered an international commodity. This is a continental problem of high importance. Should we give our water free to the Americans to our south? Should we find some method of dispersing to other parts of this continent, with or without financial consideration, the waters which Canada has in such abundance? This is a subject which a committee of the Senate could study and report on as effectively or more so than any royal commission.

Honourable senators, I make these suggestions in a casual way, in the hope they may be listened to elsewhere.

Reverting to our centennial year, let us be grateful for the wonderful job of nation building which has been done by our predecessors, our forefathers, and which has been ably assisted by our contemporaries and ourselves. If we continue to develop our resources and talent to the best advantage, the century ahead will undeniably see Canada become one of the greatest nations on this earth. It will do so, joined in one great nation. Separately, we would become mere fragments in a world of giants, both unsung and unrevered.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, I wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. They were both very eloquent.

Honourable senators the people of Alberta are extremely happy that one of their native sons has become Governor General of this country. We congratulate His Excellency the Honourable Roland Michener, and wish him every success in his high calling.

Honourable senators, the measures set out in the Speech from the Throne are intended to improve the conditions in the homes of our people. Extensive social welfare measures are in operation now, fighting a war against poverty, and they have brought happiness and comfort to many homes. Senior citizens, grandparents, do not have to sit by the kitchen stove now, wholly dependent on their children.

All governments are spending vast sums of money. If the day comes, as I fear it will, when the taxpayers cannot meet those demands, I hope that the last payments to be reduced will be the welfare payments, for they are bringing happiness to so many people who previously knew misery and poverty.

Some social benefits are complicated and difficult to administer. The family allowances, youth allowances and old age security payments are easily administered, for once a claim is approved the recipient gets a cheque every month. There are, however, some difficulties in making deductions for unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, and hospital or medical services. As has been said here, we have a headache every year in connection with income tax. The worst problem is working out the new pension scheme. An employee on a salary of $600 or more has to set aside 1.8 per cent of his earnings and send it to the Government. An employer has to set out 1.8 of the amount he pays to every employee. A self-employed person, earning more than $800, has to take 3.6 per cent of his earnings and send it to the Government.

The trouble is that many of these people have not got the time or the skill to deal with these problems with the result that they neglect them and do nothing. They get into trouble when they really have no intention of defrauding anybody. Large institutions, of course, can make payroll deductions. It is expensive for them, but they can do it all right. It is the small operators and farmers who have trouble doing this, and I just want to appeal to the officers of these various departments to be as easy as they can and to make the forms as simple as possible. Perhaps pension payments could be made with income tax, or something like that, and then there would be less trouble generally.

Honourable senators, this being centennial year, I am going to spend a few minutes looking into the past. In 1867 the population of Canada, although it has been given in various figures, was probably 3,000,000. Today we have 20,250,000. But a century ago 80 per cent of the people lived in rural areas and only 20 per cent in urban areas. For some years now people have been moving off the farms and into the cities. The situation has been reversed, and now 80 per cent of our people live in the cities and only 20 per cent in the country. The gross national product was less than half a million dollars then; now it is probably $61 billion. The capital debt was around $70 million then, and now it is probably $21.5 billion. It is quoted as that in some places, at any rate. At that time the Government spent about $14 million a year. Now we spend some $11 billion annually.

In those days there were no automobiles, no long hard-surfaced roadways, no diesel engines, no airplanes, and practically nothing in the way of telephones.

There was turmoil, though, then as now. The two Canadas had been united by the Union Act of 1841, but there was still constant friction. During the two years before Confederation there were five changes of government. Opposition parties would be voted into power when they did not have the equipment to carry on the government. Thus the idea came about that if there was union of all British possessions it would not only have intrinsic value but would settle the domestic differences which existed at that time.

Life was very hard in those days. They were hard times. There was loneliness and poverty. People lived in log cabins. Money was scarce and there were not the facilities that we have nowadays. People were worried about the future. What kind of life were their children going to have? Thinking people realized that more people were needed and that various industries should be established to provide employment, thus producing a more balanced economy.

Then, of course, they thought there should be more production, more land ploughed up, and better use made of the forests. The feeling began to grow gradually that, for the general welfare and in order to be more loyal to Her Gracious Majesty the Queen, there should be union. The idea of the union of the British North America possessions began generally to be accepted.

D'Arcy McGee said that the people of the British North America provinces wanted to be joined together so that if danger came they could support each other in the day of trial. He said that if they remained as fragments, they were lost. He said, "Let us unite and we will stand as the rock which throws back the waves which are dashed against it without injury to itself."

And so this feeling became general and conferences started to be held. The first one was in Charlottetown. The room where that conference was held is now a Canadian shrine. In Quebec in 1864 there was another conference held. The very first resolution which was passed there was that the best interest of the present and the future of British North America would be promoted by federal union under the Crown of Great Britain, provided that union could be effected on principles just and fair to the several provinces.

Then delegates went to London, of course, and the British Parliament passed the B.N.A. Act which was proclaimed on July 1, 1867. Of course, that was a package which had to be either accepted or rejected in its entirety. There were some doubts about it. There was some opposition to it. Debate started on February 4 and continued right through until March 14. Long and excellent speeches were made, and they were listened to carefully and analysed. It was the issue, not personalities that was discussed. There had been turmoil, but when this issue come up, narrow partisanship was set aside and great leadership emerged, leadership strong enough to carry out this very great project. It was felt then as now that monarchy was one of the finer things of life in this material world. It was the focus or centre to which the affections and devotion to the ruling monarch and mother country could be directed. It was felt, too, that by union Canada would become an important part of the empire. Canada would be a world power. It would be consulted in world affairs. It would have the respect of other nations of the world and would be a great nation. That was their vision. We might ask whether that dream has been realized.

I just want to say that to substitute an individual for a country, the question might be asked along these lines:

> Across the fields of long ago there often comes to me
> A little chap with face aglow, the lad I used to be.
> This little lad with face aglow looks up and smiles at me,
> And asks me if I really am the man I hoped to be.

We can place that in the context of the country and ask ourselves if this country is what those Fathers of Confederation had in mind. It was frequently said in debates that Canada was on an inclined plane, that it might easily the tipped one way or the other; that it might easily be tipped towards the American states. It was felt that, if a nationality was not established here, one by one the provinces would be absorbed by other countries, particularly by the United States. But the Fathers of Confederation wanted to have a new nation here so that the children who were growing up then could have a noble future.

> It may well be that some among us may live to see the day when as the result of this measure a great and powerful people will inhabit this land, and the boundless forests will have given way to smiling fields and thriving cities, and that one government will control the land from sea to sea.

Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Josie D. Quart: Honourable senators, my opening remarks are for our Speaker, to wish him continued health to preside over the deliberations of this chamber in his customary dignified and genial manner. I should also include our past Speaker, who is always willing to oblige.

With the other senators who have preceded me in the debate, I wish to voice my pleasure on the appointment as Governor General of His Excellency the Right Honourable Roland Michener, and to congratulate him upon the manner in which he read the Speech from the Throne. His perfect bilingualism is most commendable. I am sure many senators know that for many years he and his charming wife, Nora, followed summer courses in French at Laval University in Quebec City. His mastery of the French language served him well when he was Speaker of the House of Commons, and will be a valuable asset for his duties in connection with the visits of so many heads of state and other dignitaries who will be visiting Ottawa during centennial year.

[Translation]

To the Honourable Jean-Paul Deschatelets, Acting Leader, I wish all possible success in the performance of his duties in the absence of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Honourable John Connolly. I ask him to tell Senator Connolly not to work too hard and wish him a happy return among us.

[English]

You know it is said that all work and no play would make John a very dull boy.

We were told the other day by Senator Brooks that humility is one of the characteristics of citizens of Royal, N.B., so I shall not embarrass him by flowery compliments, but merely extend best wishes to him and to our Deputy Leader, Senator Choquette, to continue in their usual capable and friendly manner to lead our little P.C. band in the Senate.

In order to avoid repetition, I shall curtail my complimentary remarks about the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

[Translation]

Senator Desruisseaux fulfilled his duties very well—

[English]

—as did Senator Nichol. Both gentlemen did themselves and their party great credit.

To our genial Mr. MacNeill, congratulations are in order for the recent honour of Doctor of Civil Law bestowed upon him by his Alma Mater—Bravo! I hope he will be able to wear his hat after all the compliments he received in the Senate.

However, it is with sadness that I join with those senators who have so feelingly paid tribute to our deceased colleagues, Senator John Hnatyshyn and Senator Vincent Dupuis.

I wish to extend my heartfelt sympathy to their families.

With your permission, honourable senators, I wish to place on record a centennial project, although not as spectacular as Expo '67—Expo '67 is, of course, fabulous. I have been reading in the morning papers that the attendance at Expo has now exceeded 4,540,000. In the beginning I can remember the target was 35 million. Jean Drapeau, Mayor of Montreal, is right once more—he said 60 million, and I am sure we are going to reach that target. The centennial project to which I refer is the Canadian Interfaith Conference, which has achieved remarkable success, for no country to date has ever attempted such an ambitious project.

It was the Centennial Commission under the chairmanship of Mr. John Fisher which took the first and major step in bringing the Canadian Interfaith Conference into being in July 1965. Since that first meeting almost two years ago, there has been created a membership body composed of 73 individuals, of whom 64 were officially designated by the heads of the 34 faiths and nine were chosen by the board of directors. This board of directors is composed of 19 individuals, of whom 10 were appointed. There are Interfaith committees in the 10 provinces and the Northwest Territories. This morning when I phoned the Canadian Interfaith Conference I learned that we will probably have our 35th faith in a very short time. The Hindus, I believe, want to join with us.

Here may I state that the Canadian Interfaith Conference is in no way financed, affiliated or sponsored by the eight faiths responsible for the Christian Pavilion at Expo. The eight churches representing 95 per cent of Canada's Christians are—and I name them in alphabetical order—the Anglican, Baptist, Greek Orthodox, Presbyterian, Roman Catholic and United Church of Canada. This Christian Pavilion was erected at a cost of $1,300,000, and is the most controversial and challenging of all Expo pavilions. This is how the Commissioner-General of the Christian Pavilion, Monsieur Horace Boivin, sums it up, and I quote:

> This pavilion is no slot machine pouring forth horoscopes intended to give instant solutions to our problems. It is designed to make people think, and there is no attempt to create the impression that "God's in his Heaven and all's right with the world." It may be—in fact it is meant to be—a disturbing experience, but the message intended is the essential Christian one that God is our only hope.

Visitors to the pavilion have varied reactions; some feel depressed while others feel uplifted. The directors of the pavilion claim in answer to their critics that in a world seemingly without hope the Christian Pavilion will present Christ as the hope of the world in a world without love. The pavilion depicts gladness and contentment, sadness and suffering and problems large and small. Christ is shown at the heart of the world giving mankind the power to love.

Now, to return to the Canadian Interfaith Conference. In the many preliminary organizational meetings it was decided that it should not be our aim to plan national programs, but to provide plans and materials to assist churches on a local level, by implementing the need for an interfaith quality in our planning acceptable to Christians and non-Christians alike, yet adequately spiritual in quality. We therefore decided upon a number of projects each under the chairmanship of a member of the board of directors. Our second national conference was held in Ottawa on April 26, 1966, and was a huge success. The attendance was beyond all expectations. Many observers came from the United States, and a Buddist bishop came all the way from Hawaii.

The Centennial Prayer and Declaration, which you have on your desks, and which was read by our late Governor General Vanier over TV and radio at midnight January 1, 1967, was composed by an Anglican, a Catholic priest, a Jewish rabbi, a Presbyterian minister, and a United Church minister under the chairmanship of Reverend Father John Keating, C.S.P. The special ceremony and presentation of this Centennial Prayer and Declaration to Governor General Vanier was made just two and a half weeks before his death, and his most recent photographs were those taken at our official presentation, which adds an additional poignant and historic note to our declaration.

Then came the Centennial Anthem. Within our original limited administrative budget, we yet dared to commission Dr. Healey Willan and Monsieur Robert Choquette to join forces in preparing a Centennial Anthem. Monsieur Choquette invited Mr. John Glassco to translate his French words. This anthem is adult in concept and majestic in scope. It is especially valuable for choirs and choral groups and it was sung at Parliament Hill celebrations on New Year's Eve by the 217-voice choir of the national capital area under the leadership of Mr. V. Goldschmidt.

A hymn for congregational singing was our next project, and from among the hymns submitted the one chosen by the committee was that of the Reverend Kenneth Moyer of the United Church, for which we accepted the generous offer of original music composed by Mr. Rex LeLacheur of Ottawa. Both words and music were donated as a gift to our Interfaith Conference. This hymn lends itself beautifully to congregational singing. Both anthem and hymn will be featured on July 1 for the ceremony on Parliament Hill.

The Anthology of Prayer, prepared under the chairmanship of Reverend Dr. Frank Morgan, grew out of a basic consideration. Interfaith work naturally leads to the idea of interfaith services when all might pray together in the same house of worship. Yet the emotional satisfactions that come with group worship are dissipated when the elimination of possibly unacceptable terminology and/or concepts have to be considered. We therefore sought to create a source book, an anthology, which would include prayers with universally accepted concepts and so articulated as to be accepted by all, from which prayers could be chosen for inclusion in the service of any faith. It could even serve as a source for putting together an interfaith service. Yet the anthology also has a section with prayers specific to each faith, as well as another section with some interfaith and some Christian prayers.

The French sections were chosen and edited by Father Jean Brunelle, chairman of the National Capital Area Subcommittee on Interfaith, and the Reverend Maurice Nerny. The letters of praise which have come to us from so many of those who have received this anthology make us realize that we created something which had been long needed.

Frequently, we each ask ourselves the simple question: What do I know about your faith? There followed the natural question: What single book would you recommend to me to learn about your faith? The answer came through a committee under the chairmanship of Reverend Dr. E. G. B. Foote. Every faith was asked for an official designation of two books and another designation of five books. These lists have been sent to almost 3,000 libraries in Canada.

"Open House," as the term implies, is the technique of inviting to one's house of worship the members of another faith or faiths, in order to explain one's philosophy, one's ritual, one's ceremonial objects, and so on. It is another technique in learning about others. Within this program there are three or four methods. The chairman, Reverend Stuart Ivison, drew his material from the original suggestions by Father Keating, who has continued to be helpful in this respect.

Then "Meet the Canadians at Home" was another idea that developed under the chairmanship of Reverend Dr. Earl J. Treusch, and has behind it the concept of removing the loneliness of a visitor to a strange city, and at the same time bringing together, in a home setting, people of different backgrounds, including different faiths. As we began to study this program, we found that the Canadian Tourist Association was similarly considering it. We were glad to encourage them to proceed—they are much better equipped to do so—and to call on us for help in each local area.

We saw the possibility that in each local area, community demonstrations held to celebrate the Centenary might ignore the religious dimension. We therefore sought a method of preparing ideas for such community demonstrations. Dr. Keith Woolard is in charge of this project.

What the Canadian Interfaith Conference has accomplished would have been impossible without the dedication, devotion and unlimited energy of the Chairman, Rabbi Lavy Becker of Montreal, who represents the Canadian Jewish Congress. I also feel obliged to give an honourable mention to our Executive Secretary, Mrs. Eve Gilstorf who, with only two other ladies for staff, carries on a gigantic correspondence. I can assure you that they have not counted their hours or taken time off for coffee breaks. Our mailing list consists of some 20,000 ministers across the country, and thousands of others who write for information and suggestions. The reverend ministers of every congregation of all 34 faiths receive material, suggestions, and ultimately the sense of belonging to an all-Canadian relationship.

As requests came to us for information, endorsation and support we began to realize that we were not the only ones who recognized the value of an all-inclusive, country-wide agency which, perhaps for the first time in the history of the world, brought together, around one conference table, 34 of the religious faith groups of a country. This is not an ecumenical function. We do not ask any faith to consider changes in its own approaches and expressions. We respect each and every faith, numerically large and small, exactly for what it is. On the basis of mutual respect we are able to find areas of co-operative function. It is a great strength. It has a potential for a long future beyond 1967.

This story of human beings of different faiths and backgrounds working together peacefully and harmoniously is indeed a modern miracle, and the privilege of working with them has been an invaluable and an enriching experience. In my appreciation of the Canadian Interfaith Conference I echo the wish of many people who believe that there is an urgent need to encourage and continue such ecumenism in its broadest sense.

In conclusion, if I may be permitted, I should like to have incorporated in today's Hansard a list of the 34 member faiths to date.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mary E. Kinnear: Honourable senators, in responding to the debate on the Speech from the Throne, I wish first of all to thank each honourable member for the warm welcome and all my friends across Canada for their kind messages of congratulations. I want to congratulate His Excellency the Right Honourable Roland Michener on his appointment as Governor General. Also I want to give special thanks to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Honourable John J. Connolly; to the Acting Leader, the Honourable Jean-Paul Deschatelets; and to the Speaker, the Honourable Sydney Smith.

To the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, I want to pay the highest tribute. He is among the great leaders of the world; he is a man who looks ahead to the needs of others under rapidly changing conditions; he is a man who sets an example in leadership and who has brought this nation to a state of affluence second only to that of our neighbour to the south. Possibly this statement is debatable—I believe we could easily tie with them, not as a great, powerful nation but with regard to equality in living conditions.

I too wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion for an address in reply, and also the succeeding speakers, though I disagree with much that has been said.

The subject I have chosen for discussion is of tremendous importance to the well-being of all living things. The basic elements for good health and even survival are clean water and pure air. This is not a glamorous subject, but it is a tremendously important one. I feel we have gone too far in polluting our lakes, rivers and streams, and the air—and we can include the soil. The Government is taking a strong position in Bill C-290 to assist at all levels in combatting this vital problem. Of course, men and women are the highest order, and I am thinking mainly of the effect that the pollution of air, water and soil will have on human beings.

It is more than a pleasure to confine my remarks to the Niagara Peninsula, where I have lived all my life, though I know that similar conditions apply elsewhere in this land. My home is on Lake Erie, an important lake with many caprices. I wanted to talk at some length about its caprices, but I will confine myself to only one, the very severe storm we experienced this spring, with winds recorded in Buffalo, New York—which is 20 miles away—of 82 miles per hour. This brought about an unusual condition because the water began to rise, and in three hours it had risen seven feet. I am told that the people who live along that shore line from my home stayed up most of the night and hoped we would not be swept away.

It is said that running water clears itself every seven miles. It probably does in streams, but I do not think it does in a lake. The water in Lake Erie has nowhere to go except down the Niagara River.

It has been said often, and in the other place, that Lake Erie is nothing more than a cesspool. That is a very strong statement, but it is partly true. Streams and rivers feed the lake, as do some underground springs. We live in a highly developed industrial area, with industry in both Canada and the United States allowing waste to flow into the lake. The Canadian Government has been actively engaged in testing conditions in the water and air, and in educating industry and the householder in the immediate need to control sewage and prevent it from getting into our fresh water supply.

Despite all past efforts, we must increase the pace of ridding the lakes, rivers and streams of devastating pollution. The clean-up must start in the municipalities. We need more sewage disposal plants, and we must get rid of open ditches draining directly into the lake.

Chemists, scientists, and technologists in this field should spend more time in pursuing and researching all avenues of destroying the algae and impurities without doing harm to the fish.

We have the most beautiful beaches, but all too often they are posted "Unfit for Swimming." Possibly this is the reason there are so many swimming pools in Ontario. Rotting algae and fish on the shores are a source of much discomfort for cottagers. Ships on the lakes very often are offenders, and contribute to the pollution of both air and water. The Canada Shipping Act places some control on ships in this respect, but it is continually being disobeyed. Smoke from the stacks leave long streaks of black oily substance to foul the air. When these vessels are docked and discharging cargo I have seen clouds of smoke pour over the buildings. The employees breathe this smoke-filled air, and I am certain it is detrimental to their health. Garbage and sewage are discharged into the lakes, thereby adding to the pollution of the water.

I have even seen garbage floating down the Welland Canal. The cities along that canal which depend on it for their fresh water supply have a great interest in keeping the water clean.

The exhaust of motor vehicles is a dreadful source of air pollution. While driving in heavy traffic we are advised to keep the air vents closed so that we do not breathe in the exhaust from the car ahead. That is a good precaution, but we can hardly avoid breathing air filled with fumes which contain carbon monoxide, which is very dangerous indeed.

Tourism is becoming one of the greatest industries in the world today. Short hours, wealth, and automation make the world a very small place. Everyone is travelling, we want visitors to come to this lovely country, and so we must pursue more vigorously the crusade to have clean waterways and pure air.

The story about the air we breathe can be repeated. There are so many chimneys belching forth fumes and dust that the land and the people are adversely affected. A statement attributed to the Canadian Press appeared in the Ottawa Journal of May 9 last, which honourable senators may not have noticed. It reads as follows:

> Air Pollution Kills Cattle, Firm Pays.
> Health Minister Matthew Dymond told the legislature Monday that a Port Maitland fertilizer firm paid $95,729.00 last year to farmers as compensation for cattle which had to be destroyed because of air pollution from its plant. Dr. Dymond said 207 cattle were destroyed during 1965 after suffering fluorosis, a disease resulting from an excess of fluoride in bones.

Port Maitland is 20 miles west of my home, and it frightens me to think that it is possible we could be drinking milk or eating meat from this area.

I should like to refer to another statement that appeared in the Welland Evening Tribune on May 12 of this year:

> Air Pollution Causes Garments to Wear Out.

> Air pollution is one of the major causes of garments wearing out more quickly than ever before.

This statement was made recently by D. Hartley Currie, managing director of the Canadian Textile Testing Laboratories in Toronto. Because of air pollution the atmosphere contains many minute particles of grit and soil. These particles are hard and sharp-edged. Consequently, the friction caused by rubbing of these particles on the fibre strands of a garment results in excessive wear.

In 100 years we have come a long way. We have come from the horse-and-buggy days to the day of the space ship, from simple mathematics in which 1 plus 1 equals 2 to the computer and the atomic age, from country fairs to Expo '67, from salt and dried food to fast frozen fresh foods. All of this change has taken place in our lifetime.

Honourable senators, as a change of pace I should like to describe the beauty of the Niagara Peninsula. Last Sunday was Blossom Sunday. The blossoms of the pear, cherry, and peach trees are at their very best now. A drive there is like a drive into paradise, and every one at some time in his life should see the area at this time of year. We have two great lakes, Ontario and Erie, holding us together, with the Niagara River connecting them. The fruit thrives under the escarpment out to Lake Ontario. Strawberries and all small fruits are most plentiful. The Okanagan Valley in British Columbia is our rival. That is a wonderful territory also, but the people of Ontario think that there is no fruit like the Niagara grown varieties.

The magnificent parkway system from Chippawa through to Queenston and on along the Niagara River to Niagara-on-the-Lake is as beautiful as any place in the world. I might add here that the first government of Upper Canada was at Niagara-on-the-Lake. Niagara Falls has several towers from which people may view the surrounding countryside. The new Skylon Tower stands over 500 feet high, and from its top on a clear day one can see Port Colborne on Lake Erie and Toronto on Lake Ontario. Honourable senators, if any of you have not visited the Niagara Peninsula, then you have missed the garden of Canada, and I suggest hopefully that you will join the sightseers who will visit us this summer.

We have American neighbours, and several hundreds of them live in my own city during the summer. As a matter of fact, they come from Buffalo and go on down to Detroit, and live with us along the Canadian shore. I find it difficult to tell a Canadian from an American. I have an American on my right and at my back, and a Canadian on my left, and the lake in front, and so it is two to one for the Americans in my town.

From my window I can see the ships entering and leaving the southern end of the Welland Canal. Sightseeing is becoming very popular. Everyone likes to see the ships going through the canal, and they enjoy particularly watching them go through the locks from Thorold to Port Weller.

We are a community of cities and towns, all within 25 miles of each other. All honourable senators know them, I am sure, but to refresh your memory I will say that they are St. Catharines, Niagara-on-the-Lake, Niagara Falls, Fort Erie, Welland, Port Colborne and Dunnville.

Today we live in an ecumenical atomosphere. We can learn about the canons of the churches of our neighbours, and become more tolerant of the other point of view.

Honourable senators, perhaps I have strayed somewhat from my subject, but I shall close with this fact, that each one of us makes or mars our home, community, and country. We must see to it that Canada achieves her full potential, and plays an ever more important role in the world today.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), for Hon. Mr. McCutcheon, debate adjourned.

VISITING FORCES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved second reading of Bill S-3, respecting the Armed Forces of Countries Visiting Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill reintroduces Bill S-50 which was passed by this chamber during the last session but died a natural death on the order paper of the House of Commons at prorogation.

As you will recall, Bill S-50 was debated here on November 9th and 10th last and was considered by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce on the 17th and 30th of the same month, being given third reading on the latter date.

I assume that all honourable senators are agreed that there is no need for me to repeat all that was said when this piece of legislation was first introduced and debated in this chamber. Consequently, I shall limit myself to restating briefly the purpose of this bill.

The bill repeals the Visiting Forces (North Atlantic Treaty) Act, the Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act, and the Visiting Forces (United States of America) Act, and replaces them by one act which will prescribe the rights, privileges and duties of the armed forces of any other nation whilst stationed in Canada.

As I stated in introducing Bill S-50, the proposed act will provide a more effective vehicle for regulating the activities of foreign forces visiting our country.

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, we are indebted to the honourable Senator Langlois, who has just spoken, and I am sure that we all recall the fine impression he made when he introduced the original bill on the occasion of delivering his maiden speech in this chamber.

I spoke on second reading of that bill, which was later referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee, before which the officials of the department appeared. I think everyone was satisfied with the consideration the bill received. So far as we on this side of the house are concerned, there is no objection to the bill now before us receiving second and third readings.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 17, 1967

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

AMERICAN OTOLOGICAL SOCIETY

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege for which I wish to thank the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Deschatelets) and His Honour the Speaker.

Honourable senators will recall that about three or four years ago I had the signal honour of being elected President of the American Otological Society. The society has been meeting here in Canada today to pay its respects to Canada in our centennial year, in a scientific session at the Seigniory Club at Montebello. In the Speaker's gallery this afternoon we have the very distinguished president and his Canadian wife, Dr. James A. Moore and Mrs. Moore of New York City. In addition we have the immediate past president of the same society, Dr. Harry Rosenwasser and his wife of New York City.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that all honourable senators join with me in extending to these distinguished visitors sincere welcome and in stating how happy we are to welcome this august society to Canada to meet with us in our Centennial year. Thank you very much.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets tabled:

DIVORCE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's first report:

Your committee recommend:

1. That they be granted leave to sit during adjournments of the Senate, and also during sittings of the Senate.

2. That they be granted authority to appoint as many subcommittees as deemed necessary for the purpose of considering such divorce matters as may be referred to them by the committee and to set the quorum thereof, the subcommittee in each case to report their findings to the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, we are adjourning today until June 6. In the interval between now and that date there may be some duties for the Standing Committee on Divorce to perform. One of the recommendations in the report is that the committee have the right to sit during adjournments of the Senate and while the Senate is sitting. Both recommendations are in the language used in similar reports that have been made over the past several years.

Unless any honourable senator has any objection, I would move, with leave, that this report be adopted now. I think it would be wise for us to adopt the report now so that we may have authority to sit during the recess. If there is any objection, of course we will put it over until we reassemble, but I suggest that we discuss it now.

Reported adopted.

INQUIRIES

TRANSLATIONS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

On the Notices of Inquiries:

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have to give notice of two inquiries, but before doing so I rise on a question of privilege.

The other day I asked a few questions, and I learned to my amazement that there is no translator for the Senate and everything that the Senate wants translated has to be sent to the pool. On that day the pool said that they were too busy to make the translation in French for the two or three questions written in the English language. I admit that the former translator of the Senate was incompetent, but at least we had him, and it was a recognition of the rights of the Senate to have a translator. I find it pretty hard for us to have to dictate our questions in English as well as in French in order to have them appear on the Order Paper. I pay tribute to the officials of the Senate who do that work willingly without being obliged to do it. It shows their spirit of co-operation.

However, I find that the whole business of translation is an impossible job; it is painstaking and hard. The silly part of it is that translators make it worse by using words that are not French when they translate into the French language. I am incensed at seeing the word "parrainer" for sponsoring a bill. It is not French. Other words like it are used that are not French. The word "motion" is French but the word "motionnaire" is not French. I wonder whether the silly fellows scratch their heads to try to find unheard-of words for the French translation.

There has been some progresss, particularly with regard to the French versions of the English reports, but lately we received in May the French translation of the reports of sittings that took place in December last year. It was quite a long time, and in the meantime the bills had been adopted, and the French translations which we received were costing a lot of money and serving no purpose. I wonder if this is the price we have to pay for bilingualism, to have something to come to us a long time after it can serve any purpose.

I would like to ask a personal question of the Acting Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Deschatelets). I wonder if the pool of translators that we have in Ottawa have a special compendium of words that nobody understands. They are like putting too much salt or too much pepper on one's food.

If there is such a book or such a list of words that are unused—that is, neologisms, or words that sound crazy—I would like to have that list, to enjoy myself some evening if ever I have nothing else to do.

FURTHER INQUIRIES

Now I come to the questions I have to ask, and I will read them with great care.

No. 1

1. How many times did a Deputy to the Governor General come to the Senate chamber to give royal assent to bills during the first session of the 27th Parliament and on what dates did he come?

2. Referring to the inquiry which appeared in the Senate Debates of July 22, 1964, how many public bills, except supply bills, were assented to each time and what was the title of each such bill?

3. Were the bills referred to in Question No. 2 published separately after they had been assented to, and, if so, how long after in each case?

4. Were copies of the aforementioned bills forwarded to the members of both houses of Parliament?

If so, when, and, if not, why?

No. 2

1. Referring to the bound copies of the Senate Debates for the First Session of the 27th Parliament, when will they be made available in French and English to the members of the Senate?

2. Until then, will the Index of the Senate Debates be completed from March 6, 1967, to the date of the prorogation of the last session, and when will it be made available to the members of the Senate?

3. Were the Senate Minutes and Debates published for the morning session of May 8, 1967 and, if not, why?

I have not received a copy of the Minutes or of the Debates of the prorogation morning, May 8. If there are such copies, I would like to have them. It was, naturally, the last sitting of the first session of this Parliament.

Honourable senators, before sitting down, I would like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, who has been so helpful, whether he has made any progress with regard to the doormats of the House of Commons and the poor lighting of the reading room of the Senate.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, first of all, I should thank honourable Senator Pouliot for having given me notice of his questions, both in French and English. I will go over those questions and also the other questions he asked last week, with the hope that when we come back on June 6 we will be in a position to provide the answers.

On the question of a translator in the Senate, I am aware of this problem. I do not see any reason why this situation should continue to exist. As soon as the leader comes back, we will go over these matters.

Regarding the doormats, I should tell honourable Senator Pouliot that I got in touch with the proper authorities in the other place and they told me that the idea was very good. We might expect that something will happen in this matter.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you very much. It is good news.

APPOINTMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to inquire into and report upon divorce in Canada and the social and legal problems relating thereto, and such matters as may be referred to it by either House;

That the following senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the Special Joint Committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Aseltine, Baird, Belisle, Burchill, Connolly (Halifax North), Croll, Denis, Fergusson, Flynn, Gershaw, Haig and Roebuck;

That the committee have power to engage the services of such technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee, and to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the evidence received and taken on the subject at the last session be referred to the committee; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that house to unite with the Senate for the above purpose, and to select, if the House of Commons deems advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask one question, honourable senators? This committee has been sitting now for a long time and it has done very good work. I know everyone is anxious that they complete their work and that we get some practical results from it in the way of legislation. My question is, when may we expect that the committee will complete its work and be able to advise us or recommend legislation?

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Thank you for the inquiry. It was my intention to say just a word or two along that line. We have been sitting, as the honourable senator has said, for quite a considerable time. We have had no less than 24 open meetings at which we have received a succession of very remarkable and excellent briefs and presentations. I would like to express my gratitude and that of all members for the assistance we received from very many quarters all over Canada. Apparently the subject that has been referred to us is of great public interest in all provinces of this dominion, and we have been giving it very serious consideration indeed.

Now, regarding the report, I suppose senators will readily imagine the difficulties of a report of this kind. The subject is very extensive and is extremely important, having many facets. At the present moment the report is drawn, although I do not say it is perfect by any means, or even perfected to the extent that it should be before it leaves our hands.

But we are only now being reconstituted—or will be when this resolution is passed—and at 4 o'clock this afternoon the Steering Committee will meet for the purpose of considering the report. The plan at present in my mind, and I think in the minds of some of the others on the committee, is that we will meet on June 8. You will recollect that we are returning on June 6. We will meet the general committee with a draft report ready to present to that committee, and it will not be a small report. It numbers now some 240 pages, because it contains much background and many recommendations. It will be presented on June 8, after our return. I hope that it will be ready to be passed by that committee on the following Monday; that is to say, the committee will have the weekend to study the details that are now prepared, and that we can pass it on within two or three days, depending on how many changes are made by the committee and how much typing and other work has to be done.

I am glad to say that this rather monumental piece of work is now pretty well completed, and that we will be prepared to present it to Parliament for its consideration in the very near future. Were we not adjourning for two weeks or so it would probably have been presented in the next few days, but due to this delay it will be in the early days of June.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have not the least objection to the Joint Committee on Divorce that will study the changes to be made, if any, to the actual legislation concerning marriage and divorce. That is the first point I want to make.

But what should be the first recommendation of that committee? It should be to abolish the Divorce Committee of the Senate. It serves absolutely no purpose. I repeat now what I have said many times before, that I have the greatest regard for the members of the Divorce Committee who have undertaken painstaking, dull and discouraging work. But the situation is abnormal. We have judges who wear judges' robes and who are called honourable judges. They are members of the Exchequer Court of Canada; they are paid as judges and, if they die, their widows will receive the pensions that judges' widows receive. But they do not render any judgment. They make recommendations to the Divorce Committee. And we—we know nothing about it. The first time the legislation was sponsored in the House of Commons the then Minister of Justice was so ashamed of it that he hid himself behind the curtain instead of sponsoring the legislation and left it to one of his colleagues to do. Then another Minister of Justice came along afterwards and said he was proud to sponsor that kind of legislation. I do not know why he said that.

What honourable senator besides the Chairman of the Divorce Committee knows about each case that comes before the committee? The evidence is distributed among the members. Each one reads it conscientiously and makes his report, but none of them knows the evidence in the cases submitted to his colleagues. In addition, we are not all members of the Divorce Committee; we know nothing about it, and the names appear before us as if they were on a cinema screen, running too fast for one to be able to remember them. The names come; they are printed in the Senate papers, and that is all we know. Today we have the example of one case which I did not object to so as to show that I am broadminded enough to let these things pass occasionally. But, honourable senators, we really do not know anything about the case that was submitted to us today. The motion was made and it was adopted without anyone knowing anything about it.

Honourable senators, it is time for a change to be made. It is time for the Exchequer Court of Canada to take charge of the business and relieve the Senate of that kind of duty which, in any event, does not belong to the Senate any more since there are judges there to do this work. But these judges are only stooges for the Divorce Committee of the Senate, and it results in a mixup that is unparalleled in any legislative body in Canada.

What about the Canadian Bar Association? What about the local Bar? What do they say about it? They say nothing. They simply suggest that there should be more grounds for the granting of divorce, but they do not examine the situation as it exists. I have seen the Dean of a Law Faculty coming here to Ottawa to teach his students about the Divorce Committee of the Senate, and probably after his visit they fortunately knew no more than they did before coming here. That's that!

I have the greatest respect for the Senate and I have the greatest respect for my colleague, but it is high time for that divorce committee to stop. Let the joint committee on divorce continue its research, providing there is no extravagance in the calling of witnesses, and let it supply us with some information about the changes that could be brought into the law; they will be considered with impartiality and fairness by every one of us.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Would the honourable senator agree to appear before the Joint Committee on Divorce as a witness? Maybe the chairman would be pleased to hear him testify before that committee.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I waited for an invitation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is what I am suggesting.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I have made just a few suggestions, but what I have said here I could repeat before any committee. Besides that, my record is there in the index to the Senate Debates, and what I have said there I am prepared to repeat everywhere because I know it is true and it takes a long time for the truth to prevail.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, June 6, 1967, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask a question of the Acting Leader of the Government? If this motion is agreed to, we will be away for approximately three weeks. I know it is very difficult to forecast what the business of the house might be on our return, nevertheless, I would like to get from the Acting Leader of the Government an opinion as to what we might expect at that time. This would help all honourable members when they return, particularly if they wish to make remarks on any bills that come from the other place.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I am pleased to answer this very pertinent question raised by the Leader of the Opposition. Several honourable senators have already indicated that it is their intention to speak in the debate on the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and they will have the opportunity to do so when the house reassembles.

We will have a number of private bills—I think, five or six—to deal with when we return on June 6. We will also have the report of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, which met in Ottawa last week. Senator John Connolly, the Government Leader, will have returned by then and he may wish to continue the debate initiated last session concerning the status of the Indians of Canada in the Centennial year. Of course, there is a good possibility that a couple of government bills will be initiated in the Senate upon our return on June 6.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Could you give us an idea of the subject matter of those bills?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Unfortunately, Senator Brooks, I am not now in a position to disclose the nature of these bills, but I am given to understand that none of these bills will be debated on the evening of June 6. They might be introduced, but surely honourable senators opposite will have a reasonable amount of time in which to prepare for the discussion of these bills.

Honourable senators, we have much committee work to do. We have the Committee on Divorce; the External Relations Committee may have an excellent topic for discussion; and there is also the Immigration and Labour Committee.

Of course, there is considerable work which can be done and which would occupy us without being strictly dependent on legislation originating from the other place.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux, seconded by Hon. Mr. Nichol, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, I am sorry that I was unable to be here during the entire course of the debate on the Speech from the Throne which has taken place to date, but those addresses which I did not hear I have read. At the outset I must say that this afternoon I will not be able to rise to heights of oratory or talk on the high plane which has characterized the speeches thus far.

I was particularly impressed by the addresses of the mover and the seconder of the reply. They demonstrated a certain artistic quality which can produce beauty out of the starkest scenes. Unfortunately, I feel compelled to adopt a somewhat different tone this afternoon.

Since our return, we have had not just one Speech from the Throne: we have had two; and I am very happy that we are not called upon to express our appreciation of that self-serving document, the first Speech from the Throne, delivered on the morning of Monday, May 8. There is one item in it, however, which I think should be commented upon at this time. Towards the end of the speech we find this sentence:

> Many other important items of legislation—

This is after we have had two pages of self-congratulation.

> —were approved in this session of Parliament which has been one of the most productive in our history.

My leader in another place is reported to have said that Parliament was not a sausage-making machine, with bills to be put in one end, the crank turned, and Acts of Parliament to come out at the other end. With that I am in complete agreement: volume of legislation is no measure of the quality or the effectiveness of Parliament.

I can remember a long recess we had that started in the summer of 1965 and, because of certain events that intervened in November of that year—which of course were completely unforeseen when we recessed—we did not return until early in 1966. During that period of some six months there was a deplorable lack of legislation passed by Parliament, and yet my recollection is that the country went along reasonably well.

This sentiment expressed in what I shall call "No. 1 Speech from the Throne" is, unfortunately, carried through, and in a rather frightening manner, in the Speech from the Throne to which this debate is now directed. A quick perusal of that speech leaves one feeling sorry for His Excellency who was required to deliver it, and supports the pronouncement of one of the columnists who referred to it as full of "high-sounding banalities"—and he was not indulging in poetic licence. There are some statements, when one reads it carefully, which deserve consideration.

Towards the end of the speech this statement appears:

> ...we who find ourselves in positions of authority must always remember that it is our responsibility and our opportunity to serve the needs and aspirations of the Canadian people.

As the Globe and Mail said the following morning: "The difficulty, of course, will lie in making sure that those in "positions of authority" remember the word "serve"—because they go on to refer to the next paragraph of the speech which, by the way, is addressed solely to the members of the House of Commons, in which the Government says with all due modesty:

> The legislative program that the Government proposes is large, and many of the issues it contains are complex. This has consistently been the case in recent years. It is a natural result of the growth and development of our country, the involvement of Government in many matters—and so on.

It is implicit that the Government proposes to continue to be involved, and I shall go through some of the items to which the speech refers. But, it is obvious that the Government prides itself on becoming involved "in many matters."

Again, the Globe and Mail of May 9 says:

> In the early years of our history the tendency of governments was toward participation in those areas of our society where we could not individually achieve our aspirations—we went on the basis > that the best government was the least government. The trend has been manifestly in the opposite direction since the Second World War, but perhaps it has never been stated with such emphasis before.

Those two statements capsule the Speech from the Throne, and the rest is detail. To point out that I am not drawing an unwarranted influence I reiterate that the Globe and Mail says: "...where we could not individually achieve our aspirations..." That is, how the Government is to operate is evidenced by this quotation from a speech made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in which he was referring to those areas where this Government feels it must move in and encompass everyone in the socialistic net that it has been throwing out. Mr. MacEachen said:

> ...overcoming the problems will, undoubtedly, continue to require society to impose rules of behaviour which will inhibit and restrict the realization of some individual potentialities...

I should have thought that the purpose of government—and I have heard other people of the same political stripe saying this in other contexts, so this I believe—should be to enable the individual to attain his complete potential.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): I wonder if the honourable senator would tell me from where he obtained that quotation? I should like to read the whole speech.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I do not mind at all. It is in a profile of the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen which appears in Canada Month for May 1967. When the honourable senator finishes reading it he will realize that I am very fair to Mr. MacEachen, because there are other extracts that I might have read.

The extent to which the present Government is—to use again the words from the Speech from the Throne—becoming involved in many matters, with the burden that that places upon the taxpayer, and the escalation in the proportion of the gross national product which the Government is taking in taxes, and the—I was going to use the word "impudence" but that is too strong—lack of shame with which the Government persists along this line, has never been better indicated than it is by this document entitled, "Twenty-One Million Dollars a Day", a copy of which I imagine all honourable senators received. This document is beautifully printed and well illustrated, and contains drawings in two colours and charts. It is a document which would surely win an award if it were the annual report of a large corporation. But, I suggest that the Canadian taxpayer is not impressed by the amount of money that was spent on the production of that document which boasts that he is being relieved of $21 million a day. The document is dated June 1966, so the taxpayer is probably being relieved of a little more at the present time.

That this question of government expenditures is concerning not a few people is evidenced by the organization, and the substantial and steadily increasing membership, of the Taxpayers' Union under the aegis of the Canadian Economic Foundation, which is a grass roots public response to excessive taxation. I am satisfied that the organizers would increase their membership immeasurably if the ordinary taxpayer had been recognized by being sent a copy of this document, accompanied, of course, by a personalized and simplified tax form, together with the advertisements that appeared in the press telling him how the department was helping him out and how it was really a joy to make out his tax return this year and pay his taxes.

When one looks over the Speech from the Throne one receives the impression that there is almost no area of human endeavour in which this Government is indicating it is not going to play a part. Where the Government lacks complete jurisdiction, it will co-operate with the provinces. Where it has no jurisdiction, it will consult or it will study; it will certainly intrude as far as possible.

Many of the suggestions have been made before. They are warmed over and brought out to the front of the stove again. Many, of course, are the subject of amusement.

This document stresses the importance of developing our culture. It indicates that we have been a pretty materialistic lot of people during the last hundred years, even though we did accomplish quite a bit. But, the author might well have added to its cultural value by improving its clarity, grammar, and punctuation. That, of course, is by the by.

Then there is this statement:

> In foreign affairs Canada has put its major effort into the pursuit of peace. Our diplomacy aims at strengthening Canada's position in the councils of nations so as to work towards that world peace and stability that is the agreed objective of all sectors of public opinion in this country.

And then it goes on to say:

> The Government is prepared to co-operate in the establishment of an international presence in Vietnam to provide the assurances and guarantees which may have to form part of any settlement.

Frankly, I do not know what they mean when they say we are aiming at strengthening our position in the councils of nations. At least I had no idea what it meant until I read in the press last Monday the speech of the President of the Privy Council dealing with external affairs, and possibly that is the sort of method the Government is using to aim at these objectives.

One could go through the whole list. We have been promised broadcasting legislation on a number of occasions previously; we have been promised legislation on immigration; we are going to engage in urban development by doing a study, knowing full well that it is completely outside the field of the federal Government, and we should know full well that the pattern of urban development and redevelopment which is appropriate in one part of this country would be quite inappropriate in another part. That of course is why we have a federation, not a unitary state. That is why we should have some respect for the constituent units in Confederation.

The Government has something to say about that, in the Speech from the Throne, from which I shall read:

> It is in this spirit—

Now, what spirit that is I leave to you to determine by reading the previous paragraph.

> —that the Government has in recent years actively promoted the reform of detailed federal-provincial arrangements which, with the fundamental law, compose the constitutional structure of our country.

I would like a constitutional lawyer to discuss that statement.

> Such reform includes improving procedures for federal-provincial consultation and co-ordination that are increasingly vital to the effective operation of modern government.

Any objective observer, I think, would say that this Government has done much to interfere with and to weaken the constitutional structure of this country. It is not an improved procedure for federal-provincial relationships to have provinces faced with ultimata. It does not improve federal-provincial relationships to have a federal-provincial conference with only one province present and the other provinces advised of it. Those are merely examples.

Now we have an old corpse being disinterred for either the third or fourth time. The Speech from the Throne states:

> You will therefore be asked to consider a bill to establish a Canada Development Corporation in order to further the industrial development and trade of this country by reinforcing the supply—

How do you reinforce supply?

> —of Canadian equity capital ready to share the risks as well as the rewards of investment in Canada business.

That is all the Government says about it at that stage. So we may have some hope that some of our concern may be unnecessary. I will not comment on the proposal in detail, because there is no detail, and because the President of the Privy Council, who was originally responsible for this suggestion, had a different explanation as to the way the corporation was to be set up and as to its function on each occasion on which he referred to it over a period of several years.

I do hope, however, that the Government will not use this corporation as a means of divesting itself of Eldorado or Polymer. This is another area where the Government has failed to take action on the report of the Glassco Commission. The Glassco Commission did not say, "You should sell Eldorado, and you should sell Polymer," but it said, "You should come to a decision so that these companies can operate efficiently and effectively." The Government today is not allowing Eldorado to operate efficiently and effectively as a mining company. It is restricting drastically the area in which it can prospect. While the Glassco Commission made no specific recommendation, I think it was implicit that these companies should be sold. I mention this merely because it is one more piece of evidence showing the Government's failure to reach decisions on the report of the Glassco Commission and to implement them.

I am not one of those who suggest that government should never be engaged in private business or should never intrude actively into the private sector of profit-making enterprises. I think there are certain circumstances where it should. Those circumstances are two in number. One is where the private sector is either unable or unwilling to accomplish or to do a particular thing of importance to the country. I would put Canadian National Railways in that area; Air Canada less certainly, but possibly. The other circumstance is in times of emergency, where it may be necessary for the Government to do what it would not ordinarily do in times of peace. Eldorado and Polymer, of course, are examples of the type of corporations which arose out of an emergency. But the emergency is at an end, and there is no reasonable justification for the Government's continuing in those fields. I say it will be a gross deception of the public if those companies are sold to the Canada Development Corporation at a price which the Government fixes, and on the basis of this ownership the public is asked to make further investment in such a corporation.

Now we are going to have a Department of Consumer Affairs—and I could spend some time this afternoon, but I will not, in considering the report of the special joint committee which dealt with that subject, and which appears as an appendix to our debates of May 8 last. I raise the question: Is there any need for this proliferation of departments? It is accepted that by and large the matters on which the committee reported are in the field of jurisdiction of the provinces. No province has come forward and said, "We would like you to do this or to do that; we would be very happy if we could get agreement to delegate our powers to you." To the extent of what is within the jurisdiction of the federal Government, there is already machinery of government to deal with it, without setting up a new department. There is a department now which deals with quality of foodstuffs, with labelling, with weights and measures, and all these matters which are referred to at one point or another in the committee's report. Surely we do not wish to repeat what was done with the Department of Industry, when a section of the Department of Trade and Commerce was carved out, and a giant was produced and is still growing.

Honourable senators, I am sorry I was not at the first meeting of the Finance Committee this morning—I hope to attend other meetings —but I intend to take a little time to go over some figures which I think should be considered very seriously by that committee. I am referring to that section of the Estimates dealing with Public Service Employment, the appendix commencing at page 595.

I find that on October 1, 1965 there were employed, in all Government departments and Crown corporations—other than what I call the commercial corporations, such as Air Canada, the C.N.R., Eldorado and Polymer—225,000 people. A year later there were 10,000 more people employed. The figures for three or four years are set out in the most recent report of the Auditor General of Canada.

What I think is significant is the comparison of the number of employees with the establishment. The establishment is stated in man years, which means that if two people work six months each that is regarded as one man year. Therefore, the figures are not completely comparable.

The establishment in 1965-66 was 242,000 —I am rounding the figures. You will recall that there were 225,000 employed. On October 1, 1966, the number employed had grown to 235,000, still well below the establishment of 242,000. But the establishment was increased to 254,000.

Now, for the year 1967-68, the establishment is increased to 269,894. Nobody seems to question this and there is no attempt, that I have ever seen, to justify it. This proliferation of departments, and the setting of establishments at high level, contributes heavily to the cost of government. I suspect that, outside of the interest, the amount required to service the public debt, the largest single item in Government expenditure is found in general administration, particularly in salaries.

Parkinson's law inevitably works. Sooner or later the strength will creep up to the establishment. I do not know whether that is why we increase the establishment each year. We increased it for this coming year by 5,000 more than the number of people we added last year. As I said, at that time, we were still well under the establishment of 1965-66.

I referred to the Department of Industry and said I hoped that in setting up a Department of Consumer Affairs we would not cut something out of the Department of Health and Welfare and something out of the Department of Trade and Commerce and start another burgeoning department, as we did when we took a section of the Department of Trade and Commerce and made it into the Department of Industry.

The Department of Industry now has an establishment of 783 man years. It is true that at last October 1 it had only 495 people, but it has obviously got wide scope for growth. Growth is a good thing in a national economy but it is a very poor thing in government. I will come back to that in a moment.

One would have said that the same thing would not be true of the Department of Trade and Commerce. The fact is that the establishment in that department has gone up in two years from 4,200 to 5,400. That is a very substantial percentage increase.

I am sorry, I must apologize. I was quoting the Department of Defence Production, which of course is allied with the Department of Industry, so what I said was valid.

I now turn for a moment to the Department of Trade and Commerce. It has not burgeoned quite so rapidly. Its establishment has gone up from 2,173 to 2,845 in a period of two years and only 147 of that is accounted for by Expo. Therefore, having lost an assistant deputy minister and the staff under him, moved over to the Department of Industry, we still have this escalation.

I do not know how this sort of thing can be controlled in any nice pleasant way but I think it does have to be controlled. Parkinson's law will apply and the strength will move up to meet the establishment, without any question at all. It does not do so only in government: it does so in business.

I made some statements the other day; and as there seems to have been some question as to what I said, I wish to repeat them at this time.

I said the objectives must be to prevent the escalation of rates of taxation and to reduce them where possible. I have not said "reduce taxes"; I referred to "rates of taxes" and the escalation of rates of taxes, because I do not want to be put in the position of being told that I said that taxes could be reduced. Absolute reduction of taxes is probably impossible in a growing country.

To the extent that the cost of government administration contributes to our tax bill, the only answer, so far as proliferation of staff is concerned, is an immediate freeze on the establishment at the number of bodies now employed; no replacements and no additions should be allowed without the express permission of the Treasury Board. No doubt there are departments that need to be beefed up, both in terms of quality and quantity; but there are many others where attrition should be permitted to reduce the number of employees to a reasonable size.

That can be done. That is done in many businesses, when things start to get out of hand. It was done by the former Government in 1962 under circumstances existing then; and the quality or the quantity of the work produced by the public service for the people of Canada was not noticed to deteriorate.

Now, I said that certain departments should probably be "beefed up" in terms of both quality and quantity, and looking at the figures for the Dominion Bureau of Statistics I find that that establishment is actually being decreased for 1967-68 as against 1966-67. The department is roughly 25 per cent under establishment. That is a department where we suffer, in my opinion, from lack of personnel both in quality and in quantity. We have good people there, but we have not enough good people or simply enough people to provide industry or even to provide the Government with the information which it should have in order to plan and project properly and efficiently.

Now, I referred to this proliferation of departments. I said I thought we ought to take into consideration the fact that the number of qualified people available to government in a given field is limited. That is just as true in business as it is in government. And I seriously question whether the overall policy objectives, however admirable—I am being kind there—are not frustrated rather than advanced by spreading such personnel out among a number of different departments. A good example is the Department of Industry. Establishing this department with its own hierarchy, its own empire and its own very considerable budget has certainly not improved the efficiency of the overall operation, and there is no evidence that its objectives could not be better obtained by the particular section, possibly somewhat strengthened, of the Department of Trade and Commerce which used to have this responsibility.

I could go on for some time, but I have taken more time than I intended, honourable senators. I am frightened, though, by the implications of this Speech from the Throne. I am frightened by a government which feels that it is obtaining some advantage or showing itself in the best light by parading what was put before us in the Speech from the Throne before the prorogation of the session on the morning of Monday, May 8.

We hear a great deal about business. To some people the words "big business" imply something sinister, something about which we should be concerned and which we should take extraordinary methods to control. Some of that philosophy can be read into the report of the Joint Committee on Consumer Prices.

But I suggest to you, honourable senators, that far more dangerous than big business is big government. I do not think it is the purpose of government to introduce programs which will make it difficult, to paraphrase Mr. MacEachen's words, or impossible for some individuals to achieve their full potential.

I think it is time we did a little fundamental thinking and realized that the important element in our society is the individual, and that the fewer restrictions, fewer restraints that are imposed upon him, the fewer rules that are laid down for him and the more responsibility that is given him, the more ability he will have to make his own decisions. Whether they are the right or the wrong decisions, and whether you or I agree with them is immaterial.

In other words, the sooner we have smaller government, comparatively, and not bigger and bigger government, the sooner the people will be able to develop their full potential. I commend that to you as being as worthy a centennial project as we can have.

Hon. Keith Laird: Honourable senators, as this is the first opportunity I have had to speak in this chamber, perhaps you will permit me to take one minute to express my sincere thanks for all the kindness that has been shown to me by other members of the Senate: in particular the Government Leader, the Acting Leader and the Leader of the Opposition; Mr. Speaker and also the staff, particularly Dr. MacNeill. Believe me it has been most helpful to have so much assistance, so much direction and so much kindness.

It would be interesting to be able to expound as capably as my friend Senator McCutcheon on the variety of fields which he has covered, but under the circumstances I propose to confine my remarks to two fields in which I hope you will find some contribution. The first the matter of broadcasting, which, as you know, is proposed in the Speech from the Throne as involving a considerable change over and above the present structure.

This exceedingly important field of communication is second only, I suggest, to the newspapers and is something that touches the lives of everyone. As the Prime Minister said the other day in a speech to the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, it is a dynamic means of reaching and influencing the hearts and minds of men. That is certainly an accurate statement of the situation, and broadcasting is a field which I am sure I do not need to urge upon the honourable members here as a particular interest for everyone in Canada—and particularly in Canada because of our peculiar situation vis-à-vis the United States.

Bearing in mind that the Speech from the Throne proposed the type of legislation which was suggested in the White Paper, you will of course remember that it is now proposed to strengthen the Board of Broadcast Governors and to give them considerably more powers, particularly in relation to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

In that connection I do suggest, with respect, that it is exceedingly important for consideration in the other place and in this chamber that the legislation be so framed as to give the maximum possible freedom to the private enterprise projects in that field, and at the same time strike a balance, having in mind the good of the general public.

It is proposed in the White Paper that the number of permanent members of the Board of Broadcast Governors be increased from three to five and that there be part-time members up to seven. Perhaps in a few words I could urge upon this chamber the desirability of having part-time members on that board. At one time there was a suggestion—actually it was by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters themselves—that there should be permanent members only, and I was very glad to notice that in the White Paper this suggestion was rejected in favour of including part-time members. After all, these part-time members coming from various sections of this vast country are in a far better position, in some respects, to direct the energies of the broadcasters in the fields that will best serve the purposes of these wide and diverse communities.

Secondly, I suggest it is most important to consider the legislation which will be brought down shortly, and I understand that it will be given a great degree of priority because of the urgency of the matter. It is important when it is brought down, I suggest, to make certain that the Board of Broadcast Governors is not put in any straitjacket by a number of arbitrary rules made universally applicable to every given situation. Without taking time to read what is in the White Paper, I am glad to note that that very problem is recognized, and that there is an indication that there will be sufficient leeway for the board to take into account individual situations. Quite frankly, what worries me is that if you get a broad rule such as that which says there must be so much Canadian content in any given program, and make it universally applicable, you are, I suggest, putting the broadcaster in a straitjacket. As a practising lawyer who has done some work in this field, I know they have real difficulties in this regard, particularly as to determining what exactly is Canadian content. For that reason I suggest that when we are considering this new legislation we should exercise every caution and insist upon the type of legislation which will give the maximum amount of service to the public through broadcasting without putting the broadcasters in a straitjacket.

Having in mind the lateness of the hour, there is only one other thing that I think you might not mind the senator from Windsor mentioning, and that is the very beneficial effect that the auto pact between Canada and the United States has had on our economy. I am not going to labour this point with a lot of statistics, and I did not come armed with a big blue book as did my friend Senator McCutcheon. I will confine this presentation to the proposition that at least one person in another Government of great importance has recognized the benefits which have emerged from the auto pact, and I shall quote from what Stanley J. Randall, the Ontario Minister of Economics and Development, said about this, as reported on Friday, April 21, in the St. Thomas Times-Journal. It is actually a Canadian Press dispatch, and reads:

> The 1965 Canada-U.S. automotive free trade agreement has created far more benefits than problems for Canada, the Ontario minister of economics and development said Thursday.
> Stanley J. Randall told the Automotive Parts Manufacturers' Association (Canada) that since implementation of the pact Canadian motor vehicle production has risen 34 per cent and 20,860 new jobs have been created.
> He also said price differential on comparable cars sold in the U.S. and Canada has narrowed from eight per cent to between three and five per cent and new capital investment, resulting from the pact, has been estimated at $506,000,000.

Honourable senators, I do suggest with all respect that this pact has proved most beneficial to the economy of the whole country. It happens, of course, that it is particularly beneficial to Windsor, but obviously from these few figures which I have given—since I did not wish to burden you with an exhaustive number of statistics—it is perfectly obvious that nothing that has been undertaken recently in the sphere of international trade has been more beneficial to Canada than the auto pact.

In view of the lateness of the hour, I shall just take time once again to express my appreciation of the kind consideration I have received since becoming a member of this chamber. It has been a most enjoyable experience.

Hon. Thomas J. Kickham: Honourable senators, since the Senate will be adjourning now until June 6, I would like to take the opportunity of making a few remarks at the present time.

Before beginning my remarks on the Throne Speech, I wish to express to you, honourable senators, my deep appreciation of the kind and cordial greetings extended to me in joining with you in this honourable chamber a short time ago. I am pleased to have the privilege of meeting again with former colleagues of the other place, especially the former Speaker and later Leader of the Government in this chamber. His impartiality and capable direction in those responsible positions elicited the good will and admiration of all parties. I am pleased to see him looking so well, freed from the arduous and responsible duties he performed so well. I am referring, of course, to the honourable senator from Brantford (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). I wish also to express my congratulations to the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks), whom I first met in the other place, where later he held a responsible portfolio in the former Conservative Government. It is a pleasure to associate myself with a person of his kind and generous disposition. I observed in the other place that his criticisms while in opposition were never carping or caustic, but objective and constructive.

To the mover and seconder of this address, I join with other speakers who have preceded me, in saying that I thought the material and substance of their speeches was excellent and that their delivery was admirable.

Being primarily a farmer, I am interested in agricultural policies both provincial and federal, and I was pleased to note that a portion of the Throne Speech was devoted to agriculture, and I quote from His Excellency's reference to the establishment of a special task force under the Minister of Agriculture:

> It will be charged with projecting agricultural goals for the future and recommending policies to meet these goals. A firm basis should thus be provided for the development, in full co-operation with the provinces, of a national agricultural policy.

The setting up of a task force as set forth is I feel a very necessary move to aid agriculture and to promote better agricultural conditions in an effort to give to farmers a fair share of our national income.

When I began farming about forty years ago it was easier to make a living on a mixed farm operation than it is today. Farm implements have increased about 700 per cent, but with no comparable increase in farm produce. Farmers in my province are experiencing a most distressing time to make a decent living. It is more difficult for a farmer to make ends meet than at any time since the late 1800s. At that time farm produce marketed in Boston, Halifax, Newfoundland, Bermuda, the West Indies, provided a comparatively better return than present-day prices. Twenty years ago there were 12,000 farmers in our province. Today we have 6,000 and the number is continually declining. Most farmers who can find other employment with an assured income hastily vacate their farms for the more remunerative employment. They move into industry with its fringe benefits such as sick leave and retirement pensions and, in the case of seasonal periods of unemployment, unemployment insurance benefits.

By way of contrast, a farmer must invest risk capital in crops, livestock and farm implements. He is a victim of climatic and unstable price condition. Prevailing returns are not sufficient to meet interest charges on loans. He receives no retirement pension, even if he lives to be as old as Methuselah—only the old age pension. For example, a farmer borrowed $7,000 in May, 1958. He paid off $2,250 by 1960, and when the loan was finally paid off in February, 1967, the total interest had amounted to $2,408, or about 10 per cent. I should point out that this was a loan arranged through the Farm Credit Corporation.

Interest rates are a big factor in farm borrowing. This brings to mind an article which I believe appeared in the Ottawa Journal not long ago, dealing with interest rate factors in the economy. It went on to say that in 1580 Sir Francis Drake stole or pirated forty thousand pounds from Spain, and that Queen Elizabeth I paid off England's foreign debts and established the East Indian Company. Today the value of each pound pirated is one hundred thousand pounds, the grand total value today being four billion dollars.

The family farm is fast disappearing. The farm women and children are not going to wear their fingernails off and get nothing for it. It is most regrettable to see our family farms disappearing, the districts being abandoned and deserted with no one left to support schools or churches. Let me mention another example. Forty years ago a young man was left a farm by his parents, free. Today, a man of the same age who was employed by the railways or some other industrial concern now enjoys a retirement pension. In many cases, such an individual returns from the U.S. comfortably financed, while his farmer friend and neighbour still toils away on his farm, very often in indifferent health.

Of the four groups of primary producers, the origin of all wealth in a country—the farmers, fishermen, miners and lumbermen—the farmers are the least organized and therefore receive the smallest share of the national income. Through their organizations, those engaged in lumbering and mining coerce society into granting them their fair share of the wealth resulting from their labours, but until such time as the farmers effectively organize themselves and use the strike weapon, they will continue to receive the smallest renuneration for their labours. To believe that other commanding groups are so charitably disposed as to hand the farmers' fair share to them, is to harbour hallucinations and to misconstrue human nature.

The honourable senator seconding the motion on this address referred to starvation in other countries while the potato growers in the Maritimes will dump millions of bushels of potatoes. I do not think there is now, or will be, a shortage of food, but there does exist a dire need for a distribution system to move food products from areas of the world where there is a surplus to areas where there is a shortage. Could our surplus potatoes not have been shipped to India? We have shipped them to Greece and England on other occasions, to meet their needs. If it is argued that there is no storage available for potatoes in India, then the potatoes could be processed into potato flour, reducing the bulk and preserving the food that otherwise would be destroyed.

All that farmers require in order to increase production is a commodity price incentive. For example, the present market price that farmers receive for their three highest grades of pork—grades "A", "B" and "C"—is approximately 25 cents per pound dressed weight. At the same time the average price the consumer pays is one dollar per pound. Thus the farmer is receiving only 25 cents of the consumer dollar, the remaining 75 cents being absorbed in processing, packaging and distribution—which seems to be far too large a proportion.

In closing, I wish to extend my congratulations to the Honourable Robert Winters, Minister of Trade and Commerce, and his team of negotiators for their success in securing for Canada better trade conditions under GATT. The wheat growers especially will benefit greatly from the new agreements, bringing greater economic prosperity to the Prairie Provinces and Canada generally.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Willis, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 6, at 8 p.m.

CENTENARY OF CONFEDERATION

CONGRATULATIONS TO SENATE OF CANADA—EXTRACT FROM OFFICIAL REPORT OF HOUSE OF LORDS PRINTED AS APPENDIX

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that I have received the following communication from the Right Honourable Gerald Austin Gardiner, Lord Chancellor of the United Kingdom:

House of Lords
11th May, 1967

Dear Mr. Speaker,

I have the honour to transmit the terms of a Resolution which was moved this afternoon by the Leader of the House, the Earl of Longford, in the House of Lords, and was passed by the House nemine dissentiente.

Yours sincerely,
Gardiner

Senator The Hon. Sydney J. Smith,
Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

The resolution referred to in the Lord Chancellor's letter reads as follows:

Die Jovis, 11 Maii 1967

It is ordered, nemine dissentiente, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, that the following Resolution be communicated to the Senate of Canada, with warm greetings:

"That this House most sincerely congratulates the Senate of Canada upon its centenary and upon the fulfilment of the farseeing hopes with which the Government of Queen Victoria introduced the British North America Bill into this House in 1867, and assures the Canadian Parliament and people of its continuing interest in their future, and in the maintenance of the close ties which have been built up over the past hundred years between this House and the Senate."

David Stephens
cler: Parliamentor

Honourable senators, may I now be permitted to table the text of the speeches made by Lords Longford, Carrington, Byers and Rowley, the Earl of Selkirk, and Viscount Monck in the debate on the aforementioned resolution as they appear in the Parliamentary Debates of the House of Lords dated May 11, 1967.

I ask, with leave, that these speeches be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day. Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

For text of speeches, see Appendix, pp. 113-5.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I thank honourable senators for their warm welcome. Believe me, I am very pleased to be back in my place among you. In due time I will report on my demeanor while abroad, not upon my misdemeanors!

While I am on the subject may I say I am very grateful to our colleague, my deputy, Senator Deschatelets, for the very effective and efficient way in which he conducted the business of the Senate during my absence. Having said that, may I also thank the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks), and indeed all our colleagues for the wonderful co-operation which they gave Senator Deschatelets.

EXPRESSION OF APPRECIATION FROM SENATE OF CANADA TO HOUSE OF LORDS ON RESOLUTION

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) moved, seconded by the honourable Senator Brooks, with leave of the Senate:

That the Honourable the Speaker express to the House of Lords of the United Kingdom the sincere and grateful appreciation of the Senate of Canada for the resolution adopted by the House of Lords on May 11, 1967, conveying its warm greetings and congratulations on the centenary of the Senate of Canada and assuring the Parliament and people of Canada of the continuing interest of the House of Lords in their future, and the maintenance of the close ties which have been built up over the past one hundred years between the Senate of Canada and the House of Lords.

He said: Honourable senators, I am sure that the motion I have just moved, and which the Leader of the Opposition, the honourable Senator Brooks, has been kind enough to second, will give nothing but pleasure to every honourable senator.

The motion in the House of Lords was made by the Leader of the Government in that body, the Lord Privy Seal, the Earl of Longford, supported by Lord Carrington, Leader of the Official Opposition, and by Lord Byers, Leader of the Liberal group in the House of Lords. Lord Rowley, known to so many of us as Arthur Henderson because of his long years of experience in the work of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, also spoke on this occasion.

These speakers were followed first by the Earl of Selkirk, whose ancestor, the fifth earl, was responsible for the coming to Canada of the Selkirk settlers. They came first to Prince Edward Island in 1803 and 1804, and to a place in Upper Canada called Baldoon, where they established very successful settlements of Scots. Later, in 1811, another group of them, came to western Canada and founded there the Red River Settlement and established the Village of Kildonan which is now part of the City of Winnipeg. The story of the Hudson's Bay Company, of the Northwest Company, of the Battle of Seven Oaks, and of many events that are so important in the history of Western Canada, are all part of the Canadian aspect of the Selkirk Saga.

It gives us pleasure to realize, too, that Viscount Monck also participated in the debate in the Lords on this occasion. His contribution was particularly appropriate because his great grandfather was Governor General in British North America when our charter legislation was enacted.

His Honour the Speaker has told me that he has received a very gracious letter from the Earl of Bessborough, whose father also served as Governor General in this country, within the memory of all of us, I am sure, and who regretted that he was not in the Lords on that occasion to speak to the motion.

Honourable senators, there is another aspect of the proceedings in the Lords which I think it appropriate to mention on this occasion. When the British North America Act was introduced to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, it was introduced first in the House of Lords, on February 19, 1867. The sponsoring speech on that occasion was made by the then Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Earl of Carnarvon, another Scot. It was not only a masterly and comprehensive summary of the bill but it contained references to the future of this country which can only be described as prescient. He and his colleagues who participated in that debate 100 years ago spoke very feelingly about the great nation that was about to be born. I shall not retrace the ground which he covered, but I would commend the reading of those speeches to all honourable senators.

There are a few sentences, however, which on this occasion I believe bear repetition. At one stage, Lord Carnarvon said this:

> Let anyone look at the map and observe how bountiful nature has lavished her gifts upon that country.

Honourable senators, how fully we appreciate that fact here today! Later in the speech, and with great magnanimity, he said this:

> We are laying the foundation of a great state—perhaps one which, at a future day, may even overshadow this country.

He spoke too of the provisions of the bill for the protection of minorities and he quoted from the 42nd Article of the Treaty of Capitulation in 1760, and, in French, as follows:

> Les François et Canadiens continueront d'être gouvernés suivant la Coutume de Paris et les lois et usages établis pour ce pays.

He spoke of the west country, and of the arrangements which would be required to be made with the Hudson's Bay Company to establish Canadian sovereignty in that region. As all honourable senators know, these arrangements were finally made in 1869 and Canada bought the territorial rights of that company.

Earl Russell, on that occasion, in supporting the motion, said he believed that > ...there was no other instance in the history of the world of such a noble colony springing from so small a source.

In the committee of the Lords, the federal character of the new institution was debated at length.

In the House of Commons, the bill was introduced on February 28, 1867, by Mr. Adderley, who spoke in a vein similar to that followed by Lord Carnarvon.

There were some critical statements made about the proposals, but in time the bill was given third reading. The minor amendments made in the House of Commons were agreed to by the Lords on March 12, and the bill was then ready for Royal Assent on March 29 to become effective July 1, 1867.

Honourable senators, in concluding my remarks, may I say that on this occasion I think we are inspired with a sense of the historic. Tonight we feel an affinity with those statesmen who in the British Parliament 100 years ago enacted the legislation which has enabled this half-continent to develop. I say further that at this time we feel ourselves drawn closer to the colonial legislators, our own political ancestors, of all parties, who made it possible to have agreement upon the terms of the bill which resulted in the production of the British North America Act.

We are grateful, too, to the present generation of British legislators for their complimentary references to our progress, our Parliament and our people. We remind them that in so honouring us they honour the wisdom of their own ancestors as well.

May I add that we are actuated, too, on this occasion by a profound sense of gratitude to Divine Providence which has indeed watched over and promoted the welfare of our nation in this first century.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, may I at the outset say that we are all pleased indeed to welcome the Leader of the Government back to this chamber. I would also say that in his absence the Deputy Leader of the Government did a splendid job and is worthy of all the praise showered upon him.

At this time I join wholeheartedly with the Leader of the Government in the sentiments he has expressed in reference to the motion which we have before us. Honourable senators, I consider it a great honour to have this opportunity of seconding his motion expressing our appreciation to the House of Lords of the United Kingdom for the resolution adopted by them conveying greetings and congratulations to the Parliament and people of Canada on our Centenary.

The Leader of the Government has already referred to the Earl of Longford, who moved the resolution. I note that the Earl in introducing his motion mentioned the fact that he had the pleasure of entertaining Senator Connolly and discussed with him the contents of the resolution. I have read the debate and his remarks on that occasion, and I know how much he enjoyed having the Leader of our Senate in London at that time and his great pleasure in having the opportunity of entertaining him.

I would like to quote a paragraph from the Earl of Longford's speech:

> The hundred years since the creation of the Confederation of Canada and of the first independent nation of the Commonwealth have seen the peaceful evolution of a young pioneer society into one of the most advanced industrial nations of today.

That is the regard in which the people of Great Britain hold their sister nation Canada. It is a great compliment and one which, I have no doubt, is very sincere indeed.

Now why should this be so, honourable senators, that we are held in such high respect not only by our sister nations in the Commonwealth but by the other nations throughout the world? First, I think it is because of the nature of our people. We are proud and happy of our ancestry. I think it is also due to the fact that we have adopted throughout the century of our Confederation a form of government which had been tried, tested and proved by the Parliament of Great Britain for 750 years. This is a system which is nearer perfection than any other developed through the centuries and is one which can be proudly traced to the common ancestry, as the leader has already stated, of British, Romans, Normans and Anglo-Saxons. These were the people who built up point by point the Constitution today which forms the foundation of the parliamentary system which we are proud and happy to enjoy.

There are many other gifts, which we have received and inherited through our adoption of the systems employed by the Mother of Parliaments. They are well known, and I mention only a few: There is the rule of law, trial by jury, the different freedoms—freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, habeas corpus, and the Bill of Rights. All these we inherited and they have made us proud indeed of the hundred years in which we have carried on our government under those principles. I do not think any other country in the world has more freedom than has our own nation, Canada.

We will receive, as we have already received, other resolutions of congratulation on our Centenary from many other countries, all offered with complete sincerity. In the community of nations Canada is popular and well-liked, and in my view, deservedly so. But of all the congratulations we receive none will be more sincere than that which we have received from the Parliament at Westminster.

It was the British Parliament which gave birth to our Confederation and helped to build and protect it when protection was necessary. It was with Great Britain and the other members of the Commonwealth that we stood side by side on two occasions during the past 100 years to defend, and did successfully defend, the freedom of the world. May I add at this time, that to me it is a sad commentary on the world changes that a nation which exhausted her resources in men and material on two occasions to save the freedom of the world should now be struggling economically to save herself, but I am satisfied that she will do it.

I repeat, honourable senators, it is a great honour and pleasure for me to have the opportunity to second the motion expressed so eloquently and in such appropriate terms by the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the following members of the House of Commons will serve on the part of that house on the Special Joint Committee on Divorce: Messrs. Aiken, Baldwin, Brewin, Cameron (High Park), Cantin, Choquette, Fairweather, Forest, Guay, Goyer, Honey, Laflamme, Langlois (Mégantic), MacEwan, Mandziuk, McCleave, McQuaid, Otto, Peters, Ryan, Stanbury, Tolmie, Wahn and Woolliams.

IMMIGRATION

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the following message has been received from the House of Commons:

Resolved: That a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to examine and report upon the White Paper on Immigration tabled in the House of Commons on October 14, 1966, and the reports on immigration matters made to the Government of Canada by Mr. Joseph Sedgwick, Q. C., in 1964 and 1966;

That twenty-four members of the House of Commons, to be designated at a later date, be members of the said committee; and that the quorum be fixed at twelve members provided both houses are represented and that Standing Order 67 be suspended in relation thereto;

That the said committee have power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses; to report from time to time; and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee, and that Standing Order 66 be suspended in relation thereto;

That the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee in the past session be referred to the said committee and be made a part of the records thereof; and Ordered: That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purposes and to select if the Senate deem advisable some of their members to act on the proposed joint committee.

Attest.

Léon-J. Raymond,
The Clerk of the House of Commons.

JOINT COMMITTEE—COMMONS MEMBERS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a further message has been received from the House of Commons, as follows:

Ordered: That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that the following members have been appointed to serve on the part of this house on the special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons to examine and report upon the White Paper on Immigration tabled in the House of Commons on October 14, 1966, and the reports on immigration matters made to the Government of Canada by Mr. Joseph Sedgwick, Q.C., in 1964 and 1966: Messrs. Aiken, Badanai, Baldwin, Bell (Carleton), Blouin, Brewin, Chatwood, Crossman, Dinsdale, Enns, Haidasz, Klein, Laprise, Leblanc (Laurier), Macaluso, Munro, Nasserden, Orlikow, Prud'homme, Régimbal, Roxburgh, Ryan, Skoreyko

IMMIGRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-118, to amend the Immigration Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I had understood that Senator McDonald, who will have the carriage of this measure, would speak this evening because of an engagement elsewhere tomorrow. However, I am now advised that he will be available to speak on this measure tomorrow. Perhaps it would be more convenient if he were to explain the bill tomorrow, and the debate could be adjourned, if necessary.

Therefore, with leave, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA CORPORATIONS ACT

MR. JUSTICE LANDREVILLE

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR ADDRESS TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

Hon. Daniel Lang: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, June 8, 1967, I will move that the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

> We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to represent to Your Excellency that the office of Judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario is an office of dignity and importance, on the impartial and upright execution of which the honour of the Crown, and the protection of the rights and interests of Her Majesty's subjects greatly depend;
> That on the 13th day of September, 1956, Mr. Justice Leo A. Landreville was appointed to the office of Judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario with effect from the 10th day of October, 1956;
> That by order of the House of Commons on the 21st day of November, 1966, and by resolution of the Senate on the 30th day of November, 1966, a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons was established to consider the expediency of presenting an address to Your Excellency praying for the removal of Mr. Justice Landreville from his office as judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario in view of the facts, considerations and conclusions contained in the report of the Honourable Ivan C. Rand concerning Mr. Justice Landreville dated the 11th day of August, 1966;
> That the special joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons in a report tabled in the Senate and House of Commons on the 17th day of March, 1967, finds that Mr. Justice Landreville has proven himself unfit for the proper exercise of his judicial functions and recommends, with great regret, the expediency of presenting an address to Your Excellency for the removal of Mr. Justice Landreville from the Supreme Court of Ontario;
> That it appears to the Senate and House of Commons that Mr. Justice Landreville has permanently impaired his usefulness as a Judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario and is unfit for the exercise of the functions of that office for the following reasons:
> 1. The stock transaction between himself and Ralph K. Farris whereby, after his appointment to the bench, he accepted delivery of 7,500 shares of Northern Ontario Natural Gas Company Limited, for which no valid consideration was given, justifiably gives rise to grave suspicion of impropriety which, having regard to the special position of a Superior Court Judge with its attendant requirement of manifest integrity, imposed an obligation upon him...

Hon. Sarto Fournier: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Lang:

> ...to remove that suspicion which he has not done; and
> 2. His conduct...

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudiere): Honourable senators, I rise on a—

Hon. Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, may I have leave to continue with my notice of motion?

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes, I think it is in order for the honourable Senator Lang to continue.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudiere): I see no need for the honourable gentleman to continue. I should like to know in what capacity he is making that charge against a Canadian citizen.

Hon. Mr. Lang:

2. His conduct in testifying before the Securities Commission of Ontario in 1962...

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Honourable senators, I think it is my right to have an answer. The honourable gentleman is making a charge against a Canadian citizen and a British subject. My question is: In what capacity is he making it?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Perhaps Senator Lang will allow me to intervene at this point to say to Senator Fournier that Senator Lang is simply giving notice of motion now with respect to a matter which is not debatable at this time, and which can only become debatable on two days' notice. The debate on the content of the motion, notice of which is now being given to the Senate, cannot take place at this time. It can take place only after the efflux of two days.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Honourable senators, it was not my intention to raise a debate. If the honourable senator is doing what the honourable Leader of the Government just said, the only thing he has to do is to put the question, not to make a plea, not to resume the debate according to the vote he gave in committee at the final stage.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I am afraid that if we are getting into a debate I should simply say that it is the right of any honourable senator to put a notice of motion or a notice of inquiry on the Order Paper, and that is a right which is being exercised by the honourable Senator Lang at this time in his capacity as a senator.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): There is no doubt that he has the right—

Hon. Mr. Lang: May I be recognized, Mr. Speaker?

The Hon. the Speaker: I must support the observation of the Leader of the Government. We know that the honourable Senator Lang commenced by giving notice that he would present this resolution at a future sitting of the Senate. The debate on the resolution will take place at that time, and I would give the honourable senator permission to complete his notice of motion of the resolution.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Honourable senators will obviously realize that I am merely making a notice of motion in my capacity as a member of this chamber. I continue:

2. His conduct in testifying before the Securities Commission of Ontario in 1962 and in testifying in the proceedings—

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Honourable senators, there is something going on that I cannot accept.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. I am asking for order to permit the honourable senator to finish his statement. Please let us have order.

Hon. Mr. Lang:

2. His conduct in testifying before the Securities Commission of Ontario in 1962 and in testifying in the proceedings for perjury brought against Ralph K. Farris in a manner that constituted a gross contempt of the tribunals concerned, was a serious violation of his personal duty as a Judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario.

We, therefore, humbly pray that, in accordance with the provisions of subsection (1) of Section 99 of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1964, Your Excellency will be pleased to remove Mr. Justice Leo A. Landreville from the office which he holds of Judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario.

The Hon. the Speaker: Inquiries?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Oh, not that fast. There is a motion there. I think we have the right—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. I must repeat to the honourable senator that the honourable Senator Lang presented his notice of motion of a resolution which is to be presented at a time when any honourable senator will have the opportunity of taking part in the debate on it.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): All I want to point out to honourable senators is the fact that it was not only the presentation of a notice of motion, it was a plea in favour of the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must ask the honourable senator to withhold his remarks in connection with the debate on the resolution until it is presented for debate.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD

TRIBUTES ON ANNIVERSARY OF HIS DEATH

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Harry A. Willis: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, may

I respectfully recall to the members of this chamber that at 10 minutes after 10 o'clock on this date, June 6, 1891, Sir John A. Macdonald, the first Prime Minister of Canada, passed to the Great Beyond.

I do not know whether the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) or the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) intended to speak about the occasion but I did not think that the anniversary date of his death should go unrecorded in this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, we are indebted to the honourable Senator Willis for bringing this significant date in the history of our country to the attention of this honourable chamber. Of all men associated with the concept of Confederation, the man who showed the courage and the vision was indeed Sir John A. Macdonald. He was not alone. He was aided and abetted by many others, Sir George Étienne Cartier, Thomas D'Arcy McGee, George Brown, Tilley, Tupper, and many others.

We have already this evening referred in somewhat glowing terms—I refer particularly to the notable speech by the Leader of the Opposition—to the architectural genius, speaking constitutionally, that these men possessed, and I think on this occasion of the anniversary of the death of the man who was the principal architect, and who indeed described himself as a cabinet maker, we should pause to pay a tribute of gratitude and of recognition to his memory.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I am sure that everyone will understand that it is not possible to make extended remarks this evening. However, I agree with my honourable friend from Peel (Hon. Mr. Willis) and the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly) that Canada owes much to Sir John A. Macdonald, who was the Father of Confederation, and who could very well be called the father of his country. If anyone wishes to read a great tribute to a distinguished man I would recommend the tribute by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, which appears in Hansard on the date of Sir John A. Macdonald's death. I have never read a more eloquent nor a more deserving tribute in my life.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 17, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Honourable Mr. Desruisseaux, seconded by Honourable Mr. Nichol, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, this order stands in the name of the honourable Senator Willis, but if he is not ready to speak now I might as well deliver myself of my speech tonight. It may be that it would have been a better speech tomorrow, but I may have a better sleep tonight!

The length and the argumentative style of the Speech from the Throne could have made superfluous the traditional task of the mover and the seconder.

Yet, the honourable Senators Desruisseaux and Nichol succeeded in avoiding the shoal and, without repeating the Speech from the Throne, gave well-built and documented texts, worthy of the praise they received and which I endorse.

This session, the second of the 27th Parliament will remain important, whatever legislation is or is not placed in the statutes, by the simple fact that it is the session of the centennial of Confederation. For this reason, it will necessarily echo all the ceremonies marking this event.

Canadians have all deplored that the beginning of the year was saddened by the death of General Vanier who crowned a brilliant military and diplomatic career by adding new lustre to the role of Governor General.

The choice of his successor was unanimously approved. Let me here express my personal satisfaction at the appointment of the Right Honourable Roland Michener because of my close relations with him when he was Speaker of the House of Commons and I was his deputy. We already know their Excellencies will fulfill their important functions in the best Rideau Hall tradition.

Expo 67 will probably remain as the most typical expression of the centennial year. A gigantic undertaking which brings honour upon our country, it expresses a duality of languages and the multiple cultures of the Canadian people. When all groups of our population unite in the pursuit of practical objectives, the result can only be a tremendous success. I should recall that one of your predecessors, Mr. Speaker, first mentioned the idea of the universal and international exposition in Montreal. In fact, upon his return from the Brussels Fair, the late honourable Mark Drouin suggested that Montreal be the site of such an event.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is true.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I reread with considerable emotion the speech that the late Senator Mark Drouin made in 1962, in introducing a bill to create the Universal Exposition Commission. What he said then was full of optimism but the reality has gone much beyond it.

We are all very happy, I know, that his memory was recalled by naming after him a pier on Expo site.

So far, the debate has been most interesting. Besides the speeches of the mover and the seconder, we have heard several other excellent speeches. I shall refer only to two.

First, the Acting Government Leader, Senator Deschatelets, deserves our admiration for the way he performed his task in the absence of the leader whom I am happy to see again among us; I congratulate him for the way he discharged his duties in Malta and elsewhere during the last few weeks. Senator Deschatelets spoke about a variety of subjects but he built up his argument in particular on the constitutional problem, to which I will come back later.

Secondly, I would say that the speech of the Leader of the Opposition was a clear, precise, realistic, interesting and sober statement to which we are accustomed with Senator Brooks. We are all proud on this side of the house of our leader and very happy with his leadership.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Senator Brooks stressed the necessity of establishing a priority order for the consideration by the Government and Parliament of the numerous problems which require a solution.

It has been said over and over again that the difficulties which face our country are those of an affluent society, a developed and relatively very prosperous society. The penalty of material and cultural progress is the increasing number of economic and social adjustments made necessary.

It would be very difficult, if not impossible, to summarize the tasks requiring our attention, as it is very complicated to determine the relative importance of our external policy, especially in peace matters—as is readily realized these days—of our economic problems, of perfecting our social legislation, of gearing our Constitution to our current needs, etc. But even the context of each one of these questions, of each of these fields, is already so vast that there is great danger in tackling any specific point of being misunderstood or not understood at all. You cannot see the forest for the trees and sometimes the forest is so thick and deep that the trees can no longer be seen.

In spite of this, I still intend to deal with certain aspects of the constitutional reform.

May I first say a few words on an aspect which will not lead to acrimonious debate, namely, that of the constitutional reform with regard to Parliament and more specifically the Senate. For several years now, the other place has shown interest in this matter. Rules are changed and solutions are sought to adapt the house to the legislative and administrative programs it must face in the course of a year. Here in the Senate we are not in a new field, because this has been under discussion for a long time, and it has been suggested for a very long time that the Senate should handle certain aspects of its own reform.

I agree with those who want the Senate to examine its own conscience and, to do this, an ad hoc committee should be set up to consider certain questions, such as the following, which are not all of the same importance, but which could be usefully answered in every case.

First, would it not be desirable to limit certain powers of the Senate, just like the powers of the House of Lords are restricted? I refer particularly to a provision that the Senate could not block a bill passed by the House of Commons for more than six months, as is the case in Westminster. I see this an advantage in the sense that the Senate might be more prone to use its veto, knowing that it could only be provisional.

Second: on the other hand, I would not suggest that the Senate should not consider any financial bill. On the contrary, I would like the ad hoc committee to study the possibility of introducing some monetary bills here, provided of course that they are introduced by a member of the government.

Third, it would be interesting to consider further a suggestion, which has often been made, to entrust the Senate with certain inquiries of an administrative nature, which were until now entrusted to royal commissions.

Fourth, I have already suggested the appointment of a new standing committee on the Constitution, with terms of reference equal to those of a parliamentary appeal court dealing with problems implying the interpretation of the Constitution and the conflicts between the federal and provincial governments. The Senate has not always, and I would even say has rarely, fulfilled the role which is bestowed upon it by tradition, to protect minorities and arbitrate the conflicts of jurisdiction between the two levels of government. Could this committee not help the Senate to rediscover this calling?

Fifth, I would like consideration to be given to the possibility of changing the ceremony of the royal assent to legislation during the course of the session. Could not this assent be given at the Government House or elsewhere by the Governor General or his deputy on presentation of the bills by two delegates only, one from the House of Commons, the other from the Senate? Such a change would obviously allow, as first result, a gain of many hours during a session. Secondly, it would enable the Senate to carry on consideration of legislation already passed by the House of Commons without feeling hurried, especially when the house adjourns to await the Royal Assent. On many occasions during recent years, the Senate would have been, with this change, in a better position to carry out its work.

I will add a sixth, which is perhaps more subjective and which has been mentioned on a few occasions, that is the review of the act concerning the retirement of senators, especially as far as retirement conditions imposed to senators appointed before the passing of this act are concerned.

I now come to another aspect of the problem, which deals with the jurisdictional reform, that is the problem considered from the standpoint of Government jurisdiction and relations between the federal government and the provinces, which is obviously a much more ticklish matter. There is, first of all, the division of responsibilities between governments, the overriding jurisdiction of one or the other to fulfil certain tasks.

I suggest that the revision of the British North America Act or the drafting of a new constitution will always raise, as a first problem, the factor of the linguistic duality in Canada, the fact that 30 per cent of Canadians speak French as their mother tongue. That fact, historically and actually, is of the utmost importance in the debate which is going on and will go on, whether we like it or not, about amending the British North America Act or simply putting it aside.

In my opinion, it is not so much a matter of considering the scope of that fact from a legal point of view as from a practical point of view. The French language has its place on our territory, because it is that of the first settlers. The English language is here by right of the conqueror, because of something that happened over 200 years ago. At the time of Confederation, as stated earlier by the Leader of the Government who was quoting Lord Carnarvon, the problem of the French-speaking group is not so much a matter of territory as of population.

For several years the Laurendeau-Dunton commission has been concerned with the matter of bilingualism and biculturalism. Its preliminary report states how difficult it is to arrive at final, precise and practical conclusions. Bilingualism can be understood in various ways. There is that which I mentioned earlier, from the point of view, considered alone, that a part of the population speaks French. There is also that of the constitutional provisions dealing with the use of that language. There is also the government or administrative practice in that regard. In addition, there are the population changes, the relations between the French-speaking and the English-speaking groups. I do not intend to discuss today any other than the constitutional aspect of the matter.

I do not intend to talk about biculturalism, because as far as I am concerned it is a concept which is much too vague, much too hazy and, in fact, false. I remain convinced that the Laurendeau-Dunton commission should have been called the commission on bilingualism and multiculturalism.

With regard to culture, so-called neo-Canadians are exactly on the same footing as Canadians of British or French origin. Before coming to Canada, these neo-Canadians or their forefathers knew that they would have to speak a language other than their own, either English or French. There are people who speak only English. There are others who do not speak English at all. All neo-Canadians, whether they came from Poland or another European country or elsewhere, knew that they would have to speak another language, but they also knew that they would be allowed to maintain their traditions and culture here and could contribute in this way to the formation of a distinctive Canadian mentality. Our history shows how neo-Canadians have helped to build the country and make it into the prosperous nation we are today.

Are the provisions of the B.N.A. Act with regard to the French language or the French fact adequate? Before answering, I must refute the objection implicitly put forward by Senator Deschatelets and more directly some time ago by the Minister of Justice. Both suggest, without saying so in so many words, that it would be best to ignore the problem and leave it to the experts appointed by the Government to study the Constitution and propose solutions.

More serene discussions would no doubt be advisable in certain circles on the part of certain persons or groups, but is that sufficient reason to demand a complete or relative silence? Does such an attitude not deny a dialogue with those who call in good faith for the revision or the abandonment of the B.N.A. Act? The present government is dismissing the idea of a constitutional conference. I do not believe, particularly since the Speech from the Throne mentions the report now being drawn up by experts, that this refusal is truly final and a matter of principle. It seems to me that it is tactical and that its object is to postpone the conference until a more favourable and less troubled period rather than to give up the idea.

I feel personally that it is dangerous to delay much longer the convening of that conference which has been contemplated since 1962. In fact, it was suggested by Mr. Diefenbaker and, at that time, the idea was favourably received. Since then, the idleness of the present Government has enabled a lot of people to indulge in monologues to state or strengthen their views and to take some almost irrevocable positions. I say that it is wrong. And when I speak of monologues, I think as well of the debates held in certain legislative assemblies and by certain groups which are, to my mind, far too homogeneous to express balanced opinions. I am not saying the problem must be tackled tomorrow, but I say it should be very soon.

On the other hand, I do not feel that we should conclude, beforehand, that the constitution should be set aside or rewritten. An objective study of all the elements involved may well lead to the conclusion that we need no more than relatively minor amendments. A motor need not be scrapped just because it has grown noisy. At times, only a slight adjustment is needed for it to give excellent service for a long time. That may apply to our constitution.

I now go back to the rights of the French language in the B.N.A. Act. Should section 133 be amended? In my opinion, yes.

Senator Thorvaldson mentioned some time ago that nobody had suggested any amendment to that section. Many have said that it should not, or could not, be amended. For my part, I always thought, and I said so several times, that that section was the nerve centre of Canada's constitutional evolution.

It is not a matter here of safeguarding the French language and guaranteeing its perpetual rights in Canada. It is a matter of whether section 133, in its present wording, is not rather a threat to the survival of Canada itself. The survival of the French language requires a demographic, geographic, communication and educational solution, much more than a constitutional one. In other words, it is not a matter of seeking an amendment to section 133 to guarantee the survival of the French language, but one of guaranteeing, once again, the survival of Canada, for it depends, for a great part, on a constitutional solution.

This section 133 recognizes French and English as the two official languages in the Province of Quebec. Outside Quebec, French is on the same level as English only in the federal Parliament.

I realize that in practice French is recognized outside Quebec in several ways. Once again, that is not the problem I intend to deal with at this time. Much consideration can be shown to the French language here and there, but I wonder if it is logical in 1967 for the rights of the French language to be restricted, on a constitutional basis, to the Province of Quebec and the federal Parliament?

If so, it must be concluded that the French-speaking Canadian who lives in Quebec cannot leave that province without giving up certain rights, whereas the situation is not the same for the English-speaking Canadian coming into Quebec from another province. In other words, the rights of the French-speaking Quebecker, as far as the use of his language is concerned, cannot be transferred or are not portable in the same way, for instance, as those of the Retirement Fund.

Does that suggestion not imply a wish that French-speaking Canadians be confined to the Province of Quebec? Is the French Canadian not given to understand that he should stay in the Province of Quebec? In other words, is there not an element of isolation there which encourages separatist tendencies, whether they originate in Quebec or elsewhere?

All those who believe in a pan-Canadian role for the French element in our nation will, I think, understand that it is imperative and urgent to give French and English equal status in the eye of the Constitution throughout Canada.

That was the ambition of French Canadians in 1867, one hundred years ago. I should like to quote in this respect the words of none other than P. Joseph Olivier Chauveau, who became premier of the Province of Quebec in 1867. Paying tribute to François-Xavier Garneau, in that same year 1867, Mr. Chauveau said this:

> The formal recognition of French in the constitution, as far as the parliament in Ottawa and that of Quebec are concerned, would have been a great comfort to Mr. Garneau; how could the same rights be denied later to the French element in the other provinces when it is strong enough to assert itself and wants to do so?

I will add this important point, even more so today, regardless of the number of French people in any given location, and it is that of the ease of communications. It is possible to travel from coast to coast in a few hours. People visit each other much more often than in 1867 when there might be a small village where only French was spoken and ten miles away another small village where English only was used.

Many will say: we agree with you in principle, but do you not think that as a matter of fact you are asking for something practically impossible? I do not accept this viewpoint because the Quebec experience, where both languages are official and on the same footing from a constitutional standpoint, shows that all practical problems can be settled without real difficulty.

Indeed, in the areas of the Province of Quebec where the English element is practically non-existent, constitutional bilingualism creates no problem. It would be the same in the rest of Canada where the French element is small or non-existent.

I do not think, for instance, that it would cause headaches to Mr. Smallwood if English and French were official languages in Newfoundland.

Will anyone object that a single individual can create unjustifiable complications on the basis of the equality of both languages? I will answer that the same thing is possible in Quebec but that it seldom happens. I suggest, on the other hand, that certain practical solutions have been provided in Quebec which could very well be applied in the rest of Canada. I think in particular of the provision of the Municipal Code of the province of Quebec which deals with the use of official languages and provides as follows:

> Section 130. The Minister of Muncipal Affairs, upon request made to that end by the corporation of any municipality, can prescribe that any public notice, bylaw, resolution or order of the corporation, in that municipality, except those required to be published in the Official Gazette of Quebec, be published in the future in one language only, as determined by the ministerial order.
> The resolution under which said request is made can be passed only after public notice to that end has been given to the residents of the municipality.

You can see how it is possible to make constitutional bilingualism work. When the problem of revising the Constitution or of writing a new constitution is up for consideration, it will be necessary to start from that central point, to find first a solution to that problem, because the trend of the discussion and the distribution of responsibilities which will follow, will be greatly conditioned and influenced by the decision taken on that point.

Right or wrong, I suggest that the terms of the present section 133 not only legally create the Quebec reserve, but have also, as much in the minds of the French-speaking population as in the minds of the English-speaking population, psychologically created such a reserve.

For too many Canadians, a French Canadian is a Quebecker. If a French Canadian is nothing but a Quebecker, how could he really become interested in the future of Canada?

I say that if we want a constitution which will enable the normal or natural geographic development of the founding elements of this country, we must remove the constitutional distinction made between English and French.

That, honourable senators, is my opinion which I humbly submit. I may have been wrong not to take the advice of the Minister of Justice who seems to think that the simple fact of discussing the Constitution vehemently endangers it, but I do not think my voice is strong enough to produce the same effect as the trumpets of the Jews in front of the walls of Jericho, and destroy the Constitution. I submit that only a frank and honest discussion of our different points of view will help us to prepare for a better second centennial.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Davey, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE EXCELSIOR LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard moved the second reading of Bill S-8, respecting The Excelsior Life Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, perhaps before proceeding with my remarks on this bill you will permit me to express my pleasure at the very eloquent and impressive remarks of honourable Senator Flynn in the address he has just given. What he has said deserves the thoughtful consideration of all of us in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators, Bill S-8 is identical to a bill that was introduced in the Senate at the last session. It received first and second reading, went to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, and was reported out of that committee without amendment. It received third reading in the Senate and then went to the House of Commons. Before proceeding to describe the bill itself, perhaps I should tell you what happened to it there.

It passed first and second reading in the House of Commons, and was referred to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills. It was reported out of that committee and was discussed in Committee of the Whole, where an amendment was moved by a private member to deal with the matter of the controlling ownership of the shares. The Excelsior Life's controlling shareholder is Aetna Life Insurance Company of the United States. The motion was to amend the bill so as to require that company to dispose of its controlling interest or at least reduce its interest within a period of five years. That motion was defeated in Committee of the Whole by 20 to 6. Then on third reading the same member moved that the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to committee for further consideration. That motion was defeated by a vote of 133 to 20.

However, at the end of the session this was one of the bills upon which there was not agreement among the parties to pass before the session ended. In the result, the bill did not pass and the petitioners have to start all over again with the present bill.

As I said, this bill is in identical terms to Bill S-26 but perhaps I should refresh your memories because you may or may not remember what was in the earlier bill.

The Excelsior Life Insurance Company was incorporated under the laws of the Province of Ontario in 1889. In 1897 it was licensed under the federal Insurance Act, and for all these years the company has carried on subject to the jurisdiction of both the Province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada. It has grown and expanded, is the twelfth largest life insurance company in Canada, and does business in all the provinces of Canada. However, it has become apparent that the difficulties in carrying on under both jurisdictions were sufficiently great to cause the company to come to the conclusion that it should give up its Ontario incorporation and become a federal life insurance company. This could have been accomplished by incorporating a new federal Excelsior Life Insurance Company and then selling the assets of the provincial company to the dominion company; but this would involve a great deal of administrative work and expense in the transferring of the thousands of mortgages from the one company to the other, in transferring the policies and in dealing with the investments of the company. So, after discussions between the company, their legal advisers, and the Ontario Department of Insurance, the Ontario Attorney General, the Superintendent of Insurance at Ottawa and the Department of Justice, it was decided to draft a bill which would have the effect of continuing the existing company as a federal instead of a provincial one. That is the essence of the bill before you.

Its principle is set out in clause 1 of the bill, which reads:

> The Company is hereby continued as a body corporate under its present name in both the English and French form and shall be deemed to be a company incorporated by Special Act of the Parliament of Canada.

At the same time, complementary legislation has been enacted by the Province of Ontario authorizing the company to apply for this act, and then providing, if, as and when this act is passed, that the Province of Ontario divests itself of its jurisdiction over the company.

The other provisions of the bill are simply ancillary to clause 1. Clause 2 states:

> The Company is invested with all the powers, privileges and immunities and is subject to all the liabilities and provisions set forth in the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act...

Clause 3 states that the directors shall continue in office. Clause 4 states:

> The Company may by by-law change, or authorize the board of directors to change, from time to time, the number of shareholders' directors and the number of policyholders' directors subject always to the provisions of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

Clause 5 carries on its present authorized capital. Clause 6 carries on its present head office. Clause 7 carries on its present business.

Clause 8 is an important one, and provides that:

> All rights and interests of the shareholders, policyholders and creditors of the Company in, to or against the property, rights and assets of the Company and all liens upon the property, rights and assets of the Company are unimpaired by this Act.

So it does not interfere with anybody's existing rights.

Clause 9 provides that:

> The Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act shall apply to the Company as if the Company had been incorporated by Special Act of the Parliament of Canada passed after the 4th day of May, 1910.

Honourable senators, if the bill receives second reading in this chamber, I propose to move that it be referred once again to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. After talking to the chairman of that committee, I may state that it suits his convenience and also that of the officers of the company, who will be here to give evidence, to dispense with the normal rule of seven days' notice so that the bill could come before the committee for consideration tomorrow morning. If, as I say, the bill does receive second reading, at the proper time I shall ask for leave to move that the rule requiring notice be dispensed with.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

THE EMPIRE LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard moved the second reading of Bill S-9, respecting The Empire Life Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is similar to the one that I have just described affecting The Excelsior Life Insurance Company. It is a bill to continue the existence of The Empire Life Insurance Company, which is presently a provincially incorporated company, as a federal company, and to divest the Province of Ontario of its jurisdiction over it. So, all the remarks I have made with respect to the principle involved in The Excelsior Life Insurance Company apply to this company. The wording of the two bills is the same, except for the name of the company.

Clause 1 says that:

> The Company is hereby continued as a body corporate under its present name in both the English and French form and shall be deemed to be a company incorporated by Special Act of the Parliament of Canada.

Similarly, the other clauses carry on the provisions with respect to powers, privileges and liabilities, directors and share capital. Clause 5 states:

> The head office of the Company shall continue to be in the city of Kingston, in the province of Ontario.

Clause 6 gives it the same powers to carry on business. Clause 7 preserves the rights and interests of the shareholders, policyholders and creditors. Clause 8 states that:

> The Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act shall apply to the Company as if the Company had been incorporated by Special Act of the Parliament of Canada passed after the 4th day of May, 1910.

This company was incorporated in 1923 by the Province of Ontario. It has not been registered under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and, therefore, there is not the conflict between the two jurisdictions. It does not do business in all the provinces of Canada, and in order to do business in those provinces where it is not now functioning it must either register under the federal act or acquire a federal charter. For the same reasons that influenced The Excelsior Life Insurance Company to give up its registration and acquire a federal charter, The Empire Life wishes to acquire a federal existence rather than simply to register.

Again, complementary legislation was required from the Province of Ontario, and the act in the Ontario legislature was passed this spring. Again, it will become effective, if, as and when the federal Parliament passes this bill.

This company has not come before Parliament before. The same question does not arise in connection with The Empire Life as to non-resident ownership, as in the case of the Excelsior Life, because there is no question of control outside the Dominion of Canada.

Again, honourable senators, if this bill receives your approval on second reading, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. Later on, with leave, I shall move that the rule requiring seven days' notice be suspended, so that this bill also can be dealt with by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce tomorrow morning.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

THE EXCELSIOR LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—SUSPENSION OF RULE 119

Leave having been given to revert to the order for motions:

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that Rule 119 be suspended in relation to Bill S-8, respecting The Excelsior Life Insurance Company.

Motion agreed to.

THE EMPIRE LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—SUSPENSION OF RULE 119

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that Rule 119 be suspended in relation to Bill S-9, respecting The Empire Life Insurance Company.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

(See p. 94.)

CENTENARY OF CONFEDERATION

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE SENATE OF CANADA—
EXTRACT FROM THE OFFICIAL REPORT OF HOUSE OF LORDS MAY 11, 1967

CENTENARY OF CANADIAN SENATE

2.58 p.m.

The Earl of Longford rose to move, That this House most sincerely congratulates the Senate of Canada upon its centenary and upon the fulfilment of the farseeing hopes with which the Government of Queen Victoria introduced the British North America Bill into this House in 1867, and assures the Canadian Parliament and people of its continuing interest in their future, and in the maintenance of the close ties which have been built up over the past hundred years between this House and the Senate; and that this Resolution be communicated to the Senate of Canada with the warm greetings of this House.

The noble Earl said: My Lords, I rise to move the Motion which stands in my name on the Order Paper. Before I do so, I should like to tell your Lordships that earlier this week I had the pleasure of entertaining Senator Connolly, the Leader of the Senate in Canada. I was then able to discuss with him this Motion, and was pleased to hear from him that what we are setting out to do to-day would be warmly received in the Senate in Canada.

The hundred years since the creation of the Confederation of Canada and of the first independent nation of the Commonwealth have seen the peaceful evolution of a young pioneer society into one of the most advanced industrial nations of to-day. Yet her standing to-day on the world scene is based not only on the material wealth created by the strenuous endeavours of her people but in the example of responsibility, enterprise and democracy which Canada has given to the world in her domestic affairs and in all her dealings abroad.

Members of this House need not be reminded of the sacrifices of Canada—our ally in two world wars—in past years. To-day her efforts continue, within the Commonwealth, within NATO, within the United Nations, for the safeguarding of world peace, the pacification of troubled areas, and the bringing of prosperity to the developing countries. Her contribution to the more harmonious world order which we are all seeking has been second to none. But in moving this Resolution I should like particularly to suggest that Canada's pre-eminent role in modern society and in the international scene is above all a measure of the soundness of her roots, the spirit of her people and the Parliamentary institutions which have so outstandingly guarded her democratic tradition. My Lords, I beg to move.

Moved, That this House most sincerely congratulates the Senate of Canada upon its centenary and upon the fulfilment of the farseeing hopes with which the Government of Queen Victoria introduced the British North America Bill into this House in 1867, and assures the Canadian Parliament and people of its continuing interest in their future, and in the maintenance of the close ties which have been built up over the past hundred years between this House and the Senate; and that this Resolution be communicated to the Senate of Canada with the warm greetings of this House.—(The Earl of Longford.)

Lord Carrington: My Lords, there will be no one in this House who will not wish to associate himself with the Motion moved by the noble Earl, and with the way in which he has commended it to your Lordships. I rise only to say that we who sit on this side of the House wish to join in the good wishes to the Senate and the people of Canada expressed by the Leader of the House.

Earlier this week we were discussing the Common Market, and there may have been some who thought that in some degree this decision might affect the ties—the family ties and the ties of relationship and affection—of those whose history originated in this country and who form the Commonwealth. This would be a complete misjudgment. On the contrary, we believe that such an association will mean a stronger Britain and, consequently, a stronger and closer Commonwealth. Canadians should always know that whatever may happen in the future, Common Market or no, they can always expect from us in this country the same feelings of friendship and kinship which have existed for these last hundred years.

Lord Byers: My Lords, we on these Benches should very much like to be associated with this Motion, and I should personally like to endorse the words of the Leader of the House and of the Leader of the Opposition—and particularly what the noble Lord, Lord Carrington, said about the Common Market. We have a very high regard for the Canadian people. Speaking personally, again, I was in a position during the war to appreciate the very great contribution made by, first, the Canadian Corps, and later the Canadian Army. We on these Benches, in particular, have many friends in the Liberal Administration of Canada, and we should like to join with the other Parties in this House in sending the warmest greetings to the Senate.

Lord Rowley: My Lords, as Deputy Chairman of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, which has 900 members from both Houses of this Parliament, I hope I may be allowed to associate myself with this Motion on behalf of the United Kingdom branch. Last year the Annual Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association was held in Ottawa. The plenary sessions of the Conference were held in the Senate House of the Canadian Parliament, and the committee sittings were held in the Lower House. I am not sure that my noble friend Lord Shepherd, as a hereditary Peer, did not make history as a result of his making speeches at one of the committees in an elected Chamber.

However, be that as it may, I think I should be expected by all the members of the United Kingdom branch to express on their behalf our warm welcome and our warm support of this Motion. I made my own position clear in the debate on the Common Market the other day, but I should like to endorse very strongly what has just been said by the Leader of the Opposition; that the Commonwealth of Nations, whatever action we may take in entering the European Economic Community, will remain as one of the great forces for peace and co-operation in the world in the future.

The Earl of Selkirk: My Lords, I am sure the House does not want to linger long on a Motion about which we are all so fully agreed, but we owe so much to Canada that it would be a pity if there were any suggestion that this was a formal acceptance of what has been moved. I wish particularly to refer to the point which my noble friend Lord Carrington has made, because in the discussions on the European Economic Community not very much was said about Canada, although it may have been in most of our minds. Indeed, there was sometimes a tendency to paint with one brush the United States and Canada.

They are very different countries. Indeed the whole existence of Canada depended on the resolution and character of the Canadians in refusing to join the 13 revolting Colonies. Secondly, Canada is the only country of the Americas—either North or South—which has wanted to maintain positive links with Europe. She has done that to this time, and in the course of doing so has set the pattern of the Commonwealth which we know to-day. It is Canada who set it by her constant refusal to allow institutional reform to supersede her own independence, and yet she maintained considerable individuality of outlook.

As far back as, I think, the time of Mr. Gladstone she refused to support his action in the Sudan. She said: "No, this is something which he has got into and we are not going into it, too." As we all know, she came immensely into the First World War and into the Second World War. She declined to join Mr. Lloyd George in Chanak. I mention this only to show that this was the form which she very early took, and which has been followed in practice by many other countries. She did it very slowly. She took, I think, ten years to get a High Commissioner in this country, about forty years to form the Royal Canadian Navy and sixty years before sending an Ambassador anywhere at all. We owe her a great deal for the form in which she has led the Commonwealth and which has been followed by others, though I regret to say not at the same easy pace which Canada herself has taken.

May I add one other point? Canadians have taken one quality from this country, and that is self-criticism. We are very self-critical and so are they. I believe they carry it to the point of masochism, which is wholly unnecessary. When you go over there they are constantly telling you of the difficulties they have —of geographical lines which are North and South rather than East and West, of the preponderant power of the United States, of their linguistic problems. I hope that that period in Canadian life is over and that they will realise that they are a great nation playing an immense role in the world to-day, and if they disappeared something would be lost from the comity of nations which would be the loss of us all.

Viscount Monck: My Lords, may I, for a very particular reason, be allowed to associate myself personally and very warmly with this Motion? The particular reason is that my great-grandfather was Governor of British North America when the Bill referred to in the Resolution was before your Lordships. He became the first Governor-General, a fact of which my family and I and our successors will always be extremely proud. For that reason I associate myself most warmly with the Motion moved by my noble friend—if I may so call him—Lord Longford, and trust that Canada's future may be even more glorious than her past.

On Question, Motion agreed to, nemine dissentiente.

Ordered, That this Resolution be communicated to the Senate of Canada with the warm greetings of this House.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 7, 1967

The Senate met at 3 p. m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Honourable Mr. Desruisseaux, seconded by Honourable Mr. Nichol, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, as is traditional, I should like to begin by congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. In common with each of them and in common with each of you, I count it a great privilege and honour to be a member of the Senate during our 100th year. In this connection I propose to make several observations, not about Confederation itself nor indeed about the first 100 years, but rather upon the centennial celebrations themselves. I will do so mindful of what I consider to be my triple role in this place, first as a senator of Canada, secondly as a senator of Canada from Ontario, and thirdly as a senator of Canada from Ontario whose designation is York.

It is perhaps appropriate to say a word about the Centennial as it affects each of these jurisdictions, federal, provincial and municipal, because, after all, I am actively involved in each, and so, indeed, is every other Canadian—a fact which sometimes seems to escape members of various governments at each level. For example, we have the inevitable and never ending discussion—perhaps "squabble" would be a better word—about taxes, and who pays for what as between Ottawa and, in my case, Queen's Park, Metropolitan Toronto and even North York. For most taxpayers it is strictly an academic concern. Their real concern is, of course, not out of which pocket the tax money comes but whether or not there is enough money left in the suit to meet the ever-spiralling tax bill.

However, honourable senators, I digress. I should like to draw your attention to the centennial celebrations in general, and more particularly to the work of the Centennial Commission of Canada, which I think has been absolutely first class—a fact which has, I suggest, too often been obscured, first by Expo, whose fantastic success story is already legend, and then by our own inherent reluctance to commend anyone or anything for a good job well done—an inherent reluctance which, I might add, is nowhere more prevalent than in this Senate. The fact is that the Centennial Commission has succeeded well beyond most of our expectations in fostering a true sense of pride at our 100th birthday.

It is no partisan sense that I suggest that this impressive recognition of our Centennial will for ever stand as one of the hallmarks in the remarkable career of our Secretary of State. She has been ably assisted by a competent team of civil servants under the direction of Mr. John Fisher, who happens to be an old friend of mine.

Honourable senators may be interested to know that in 1953 I was one of those who approached Mr. Fisher about becoming a Liberal candidate in the then impending general election. He declined to stand. Indeed, on the very day in 1961 that I was appointed National Organizer of the Liberal Party, Mr. Fisher was named as special assistant to the then Prime Minister Diefenbaker.

John Fisher's love of Canada and sense of showmanship have been effectively blended as well as demonstrated in the Centennial to date. In turn, he has been backed up by a solid team in the Centennial Commission. Possibly it is imprudent to single out any one person in the commission, but I must commend the impressive contribution of Mr. Robbins Elliott, Director of Planning.

This overall centennial impact, if I may use that term, has been obtained only as the result of a remarkable degree of planning, covering a host of events of every kind and description. However, in my opinion there are four such events which deserve our special attention. The first is the Centennial symbol itself, a stylized multicoloured maple leaf representing the ten provinces and the territories which has been presented to the nation in a score of ways, but most frequently on flags or as a piece of jewelry. You have no doubt been impressed, as I have been, at the increasing number of Canadians wearing this maple leaf pin, such as I am wearing today, or some variation of it.

Secondly, in the Metropolitan Toronto area there are hundreds of thousands of centennial flags floating from schools, public buildings, commercial buildings and, I am delighted to say, scores and scores floating from private homes. I understand that flag manufacturers are unable to meet the demand. All this has not just happened; it has involved a great deal of work and planning, but it seems to me that these by themselves would not have been enough. I think we have discovered a sense of national pride long latent in the hearts of our citizenry. It is sophisticated nonsense to downgrade and underestimate the value of external symbols in developing a true sense of national identity.

Probably the Centennial Commission's most conspicuous success has been the wonderfully delightful children's marching song "Canada". This record, a copy of which I am holding in my hand, and a copy of which I shall send to every senator this afternoon, has already become the all-time—I repeat, the all-time—best-selling native record in the history of Canadian music. Already more than one-quarter of a million copies have been sold and they are still selling strongly. Many people can share in the credit for this, but the chief of these is Bobby Gimby, who wrote the song and who conceived the idea of having its bilingualism and its children's chorus. Mr. Gimby, the 46-year old Saskatchewan-born Toronto musician and orchestra leader, tells the story of how he wrote the song in a forthcoming issue of the Canadian weekend magazine. I would like to quote briefly from the article which will appear shortly.

> "The idea first came to me when I was playing an orchestra date at Manoir Richelieu in La Malbaie, Que., back in the summer in 1964," he replies. "On St. Jean Baptiste Day I saw about 50 kids parading through the streets. The boys were dressed in quaint sacking material, and the girls had flowers in their hair, and they were all singing some delightful folk song in French.
> "I thought, 'Wouldn't it be wonderful if the French and English kids of this great country could pull together and sing a song in their own language?' "
> "Well, that thought stuck in my mind for a whole year. When I finally sat down to write the song, the first eight bars sprang on to the paper instantly. But it took nine months, working nights in my Toronto apartment and ripping up many pages of false attempts in the morning, before it came out nice and simple."

Not only does this involve the most remarkable success story in the history of Canadian music, but it seems to me to have become the unofficial anthem of the centennial year, and indeed the very words themselves seem to echo the spirit of Confederation.

> Hur-rah, Vive le Canada!
> Three cheers, hip, hip, hooray!
> Le Centenaire!
> That's the order of the day
> Frère Jacques, Frère Jacques
> Merrily we roll along
> To-gether-er, all the way.

Incidentally, in achieving maximum exposure the Centennial Commission was assisted by the Toronto advertising agency of Vickers & Benson who in turn retained the services of Robert Pugh, one of Canada's leading music promoters. It was a uniquely productive team. It revitalized the dormant sheet music business as well as setting Canadian record sales. It is interesting to note that this song "Canada" was recorded by scores and scores of groups in just about every conceivable music form and variation. In short, this song has already become a Canadian classic and I have no doubt we are destined to hear it again and again long after the centennial year. I have no doubt that as often as we hear it we will rejoice in both its infectious melody and in its unabashed Canadianism.

Then also in the centennial year there have been hundreds and thousands of worthwhile centennial projects in every corner of Canada. It is impossible in this kind of presentation to summarize these events. However, I would like to mention just two other major events, if I could so describe the Centennial Train and the Centennial Caravans—one train and, where it cannot go, there go eight caravans which depict pictorially something of Canada's heritage, its past, its present and its future.

From January 9 to December 5 the train will make 81 stops in all provinces, excluding the Yukon, Northwest Territories, and Newfoundland because of the narrow gauge rails. From May 1 to approximately November 12 the eight caravans will make 656 stops virtually everywhere in Canada, in even the most remote corners of the country—again, a story of unparalleled and unexpected success. The original estimate was that six million people would visit either the caravans or the train. Already there have been three million visitors, and now the estimate has been revised upwards to about 11 million.

Honourable senators, with so much success, not unnaturally, there has been the odd oversight by the Commission. I would like to suggest one such oversight, and I would be absolutely delighted to be proven wrong. It is what I consider to be the inadequate recognition of and attention to the contribution made to Confederation by Canadians other than those of British or French origin. I am referring to the so-called "new Canadians," many of whom have been in Canada much longer than I have. However, not only the Centennial Commission but also business and Government generally pay so much attention to the two founding races that we tend to obscure both the size and the contribution of others, those whom Senator Yuzyk describes in his excellent new book entitled "Ukrainian Canadians" as "the Third Element." I know that Senator Yuzyk will forgive me if I quote very briefly from the introduction to his book, which he describes as his own personal centennial project, for he has some rather revealing statistics. He states:

> The above graph clearly shows that the British Element during the past 60 years has steadily decreased, not in numbers but in proportion, from 57 per cent to 44 per cent. The French Element has constantly held its own proportion, about 30 per cent. The Third Element, on the other hand, has steadily increased, from 12 per cent to over 26 per cent, more than doubling itself, and is quickly approaching the numerical and proportional position of the French Canadians. If the trends of the last 60 years continue, and there is every indication that they will, it means that in the near future the three elements of our population will be approximately equal. Canada, being a country of minorities, is obviously multicultural, a fact which should always be borne in mind by our governments, parliamentarians, politicians and leaders of our society.

Senator Yuzyk goes on to give some very interesting statistics on the multi-racial composition of the population of the various provinces. It is a most useful book, and I would commend it to your attention.

I do not think it is fair to say that the Centennial Commission has completely ignored the third element. It has encouraged many ethnic events, and I have discovered there is one excellent commercial being aired on commercial radio stations all across Canada. I quote two or three lines from the conclusion:

> Some people were born in Canada but the people who chose Canada have a special feeling for our Centennial.

What concerns me, however, honourable senators, is that we may have missed a wonderful opportunity to inform the rest of the people in Canada of the contribution which has been, is, and will be made by these various minority groups all across Canada.

Finally, as it affects the Centennial Commission, I would like to make what I believe are three constructive suggestions which hopefully might enhance the balance of the year's activities and perhaps carry the spirit of Centennial into succeeding years. I think it would be a great tragedy if we were to lose our new-found zest at being Canadian simply because it is midnight on December 31, 1967.

My first suggestion has some immediacy and reminds me of my very first words in this chamber last July. Then, however, I was speaking after the fact: now I am speaking before the fact. It was the July 1st, Dominion Day store openings which concerned me then, and indeed which concern me now. Surely, Canada's hundredth birthday deserves more than crass commercial exploitation, discount merchandising gimmicks and super-duper 24-hour sales. I am in favour of all of these things up to a point, but not on July 1, 1967.

Apparently, however, the federal Government feels that this is a provincial matter, and the provincial government in turn has passed the responsibility on to the municipalities. The net result may well be the desecration of one of the most eventful and, yes, sacred days in our nation's history.

A private member's bill has been introduced in the other place, but it will doubtless die on the Order Paper, if indeed it is even discussed in time. It has one glaring deficiency. It provides a fine of only $50 for those merchants who defy its regulation. I am sorry to say that many big merchants would simply regard this as a token licence fee for remaining open on July 1.

Much more realistic is the legislation advanced, and now passed, by Mayor James Service of the municipality in which I reside, and in this regard perhaps I may be allowed to quote from an issue of the local newspaper, the Don Mills Mirror:

> Merchants have given a qualified vote of approval to North York's bylaw amendment to force stores to close on Dominion Day this year.
> Council recently approved a proposal for making stores liable to a fine of up to $5,000 for staying open.

Ken Silverberg, president of the Bayview Village merchants' association, said, "I think it's a great idea, if it is enforced."

He said all merchants want to stay closed on the 100th anniversary of Canada. "We're in favour of this if everyone stays closed," he said...

H. T. Ross of H. T. Ross Distinctive Clothiers agreed.

"If we can get these stores to agree we're all in favour of closing on Dominion Day," he added...

"When everyone is closed the shoppers' dollar is still there," he said. "But one person open spoils it for the rest."

Mayor Jim Service who proposed the legislation said the prospect of a $5,000 fine should deter large stores from staying open.

"On previous holidays the stores regarded a small fine as a permit to stay open," he said.

Service said the amendment would allow for the opening of retail outlets supplying special services, such as drug stores and gas stations.

"I would be very surprised if surrounding municipalities did not also pass special legislation requiring stores to close on Dominion Day," he said.

Hopefully, honourable senators, the Centennial Commission and governments at every level will take appropriate action in this connection.

Secondly, I should like to make reference to one of the more appealing and visual centennial projects around Parliament Hill. I refer, of course, to the Centennial Flame in front of the Parliament Buildings—again, a centennial attraction which has been perhaps an unexpected, and certainly an unparalleled, success. In my opinion, this outstanding tourist attraction should be retained permanently. It is, after all, one more visual symbol of the Centennial of Confederation, and, indeed, of Confederation itself.

As a footnote, I should add that the tourists from the beginning have thrown coins into the fountain. I understand this money is being turned over to the Retarded Children's Society for use in their own centennial crusade. For the life of me, I do not know why someone does not erect a simple sign indicating that the money thrown into the fountain is being used in this wonderfully constructive way.

My third suggestion is perhaps a more unique one. I have already referred to the thousands and thousands of centennial flags that have added so much to our civic decor and our national pride. What is going to happen to these flags at the end of the Centennial Year? Here is my suggestion. From December 15, 1967 until January 15, 1968 the Centennial Commission should redeem all such centennial flags which it receives for Maple Leaf flags of equal dimension. The net result of this would be an even more impressive and dramatic display of Maple Leaf flags from coast to coast. Any extra or spare Maple Leaf flags so obtained could, of course, be donated to schools and classrooms across Canada. Perhaps some minimum service charge will be necessary, but I would hope not. This would be a worthwhile centennial project for some national corporation.

Honourable senators, the Ontario government has, I am delighted to report, co-operated fully in the work of the Centennial Commission, and well it might because Ontario is the very keystone of Confederation. Indeed, such descriptions as "English speaking Canadian" and "Ontarian" are alien to our ears. They are words we never hear in Ontario, because in Ontario we are, first, last, and always Canadians. Perhaps that is why some of us are uneasy about Premier Robarts' proposed Confederation of Tomorrow Conference. As presented by the Premier in his thoughtful speech to the legislature, the conference seems of itself an excellent idea, but whether or not this kind of provincial initiative in such a delicate area is really worthwhile must await the conference itself. Certainly, speeches like those of the Attorney General in the same debate do not fill me with confidence. Co-operative federalism is, after all, a two-way street. Anything that smacks of Ontario separatism, or of that kind of unenlightened provincial nationalism of, for example, W. A. C. Bennett, will not be well received in Ontario. Hopefully, Premier Robarts realizes that most of us want our Province of Ontario not only within Confederation, but in the very forefront of Confederation.

I want to say something in the Centennial context about Toronto. Toronto may not be the greatest city in the world, but it is much more than merely "Canada's staid second city," as it was recently described in the New York Times. Indeed, Expo not withstanding, I believe that Toronto is Canada's most exciting city—or, at least, it has been up until now, for those of us who live in Toronto find ourselves without a centennial project worthy of the name. Indeed, honourable senators, things are so bad that the single most exciting thing to happen in Toronto in 1967 may very well be the Progressive Conservative leadership convention.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Davey: Sometimes change comes slowly to Toronto, but nevertheless changes do come. For example, we have not as yet introduced party politics into municipal government, but then neither has any other municipality in Canada. Honourable senators will recognize the role played by party politics in municipal government in both the United Kingdom and the United States, and I have never believed that everybody is out of step but us. Indeed, we have the shortcomings but not the virtues of partisan involvement in our civic affairs. So, one suspects that change is inevitable.

Similarly, in the case of the metropolitan government, some form of total amalgamation is inevitable. Suffice it to say, the present system of boroughs was concocted by a nervous provincial government anxious to perpetuate local ward politics as a guarantee against any concerted drive by the provincial authority. Nevertheless, as I have suggested, changes do take place in Toronto—but only in time.

For example, just before the end of the season the Maple Leaf Gardens finally replaced God Save the Queen by O! Canada, at the start of every game. Not only did the roof of the Maple Leaf Gardens not cave in, but the Maple Leafs went on to win the Stanley Cup anyway.

The point I am making is, I hope, clear. I am appalled to admit that one of Canada's great cities, my own, is without a worthwhile centennial project. Mind you, the city fathers have proposed a new civic flag, which fortunately has attracted very little publicity. They have asked our opinion of this new civic flag. Here is mine: We need a Toronto flag about as much as we need another Ralph Cowan. What we do need, however, is a centennial project worthy of the name, and time is running out.

In conclusion, the Centennial of Confederation has generated in all of us a new optimism about Canada, and an honest spirit of co-operation and understanding—a spirit, if you will, of good will as between Canadians that has become downright contagious. There has been the odd sour note, which I regard as the exception proving the rule.

So it was that the Reverend Ray Hord's recent intemperate pronouncements about the Prime Minister of Canada which were hardly in keeping with the spirit of the Centennial, or the spirit of brotherhood usually associated with the church and its various components. If honourable senators missed this news story, I will say that in discussing our policy in respect of Vietnam, Dr. Hord, who is the secretary of the Board of Evangelism and Social Services of the United Church of Canada, said that Mr. Pearson was "a puppy dog on Johnson's leash." The Moderator of the United Church of Canada apologized to Mr. Pearson, but not Dr. Hord. Indeed, he repeated his statement in a display of what I consider to be both bad manners and false courage. I would say at once that I feel that Dr. Hord is a terribly earnest and dedicated person, but it is my opinion that he should consider whether the clergy is really where he should be serving.

Certainly, the Prime Minister can look out for himself. Like the politicians of all parties, he is used to, and has come to expect, outrageous and bad-tempered observations from other politicians and certain sections of the press. I know that he, like all politicians everywhere, welcomes constructive criticism from every corner of the community, including, of course, the clergy—and here I think of the late Dr. J. R. Mutchmor, whose comments were always tempered by good judgment. In short, honourable senators, whenever reverend gentlemen continually make observations with definite political overtones, one wonders whether the clergyman in question should really be out of the church and into the cut and thrust of partisan political warfare, particularly when the party colours are so apparent.

I wonder how many other United Church members like myself were struck with the possible correlation between this news story —Dr. Hord's disrespectful comments about the Prime Minister of Canada—and another news story which followed almost within the same week stating that membership in the United Church has sagged for the first time in the church's history. Certainly it is something to think about.

Honourable senators, forgive me for again digressing. I conclude as I began. It is a unique privilege for us to be members of the Senate in the centennial year. May each of us use this year to renew both our trust and our faith in Canada.

Hon. Norman A. MacKenzie: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege to say that I happen to be one of the original directors of the Centennial Commission and the President of the Centenary Council. On behalf of my colleagues, and with permission, I would like to convey appreciation to Senator Davey for his expressions of goodwill, which I listened to with interest and approval.

Hon. Olive L. Irvine: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in the Throne Speech debate I must first of all compliment the honourable Senator Desruisseaux on his eloquent speech when he moved the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and also the seconder, the Honourable John Nichol. These two gentlemen made a splendid contribution to this debate consistent with their convictions, and discharged the role assigned to them in a most commendable fashion. We welcome them along with our other new senators to this august body.

It is a distinct pleasure for me to welcome Senator Kinnear, and I can assure her that she will find the work of the Senate most interesting, with plenty of scope for participation.

May I join, too, in the good wishes that have been extended to our Governor General and Her Excellency. Naturally, I take pride in the fact that they are both former westerners, His Excellency having been born in the Province of Alberta and Her Excellency in my home Province of Manitoba. The duties of opening this historic session were performed so well by one who was so recently appointed. No one is more aware than he that he follows a great Canadian. Our deep sorrow at the passing of General Vanier is revived as we recall the many previous openings at which he presided and the inspiration that flowed from him because of his love of country and his deep sense of dedication. We remember, too, his most gracious wife. This house is most unanimous in expressing the nation's gratitude to the Honourable Madame Vanier. May she enjoy many happy years, secure in the knowledge that she is held in deep affection by all Canadians.

Our new Governor General, along with his long political career in the House of Commons as a member, and also as its Speaker, has also had experience in diplomatic affairs abroad; and we feel sure that he will discharge his duties in a manner worthy of the traditions and greatness of his office.

The contents of the Speech from the Throne provide hope that the Government intends to introduce legislation which will be of advantage to the Canadian people as a whole, and particularly to the advantage of our older citizens who require an adequate standard of living; of those who require housing; of our farmers who seek parity of income, and to our young people who require education, and others who need retraining.

This afternoon I have chosen as my subject "Yukon and the Northwest Territories." I am having placed on each member's desk a map of these two great northern areas. I will endeavour to deal with the policy for development as part of the fabric for national development.

In the Speech from the Throne there is a paragraph which states:

> At the same time, the search for new resources hastens the opening of the North. Substantial progress has been made in recent years in the government of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, and the Government intends to undertake new incentives for industry and regional economic planning intended to strengthen the economy of the North.

Let us look for a minute at the geographical location of these two vast areas. The Yukon territory is shaped like a blunt-nosed automatic pistol, with its butt resting on British Columbia's northern boundary, and its barrel pointed to the Siberian coast. It has a total area of 1,000,305 square miles, and a population in 1967 of 26,500, including 7,000 Eskimo and 5,000 Indian people. The rugged terrain is heavily mineralized and also has potential for timber and agricultural development. An extensive water area supports a modest fishing industry, although it may be classified as a fisherman's paradise. The Yukon's lakes and streams abound in huge lake trout, fighting Arctic grayling or rainbow trout, scrappy northern pike, and delicious white fish.

Fur trapping continues to be the mainstay of the Indian population. The main species caught are fox, marten, mink, beaver, muskrat, wolverine, squirrel and lynx.

The Yukon and Northwest Territories comprise over 40 per cent of Canada's land mass. It is a land rich in history. In the mid-1800s the Hudson's Bay Company first commenced fur trading in a small way. It was found to be a land rich in history and magnificence of terrain, to say nothing of the unexcelled beauty and potential of its lakes, streams and wilderness.

The Yukon, unusually rich in mineral potential, at the present time looks primarily to mineral production and processing. On August 17, 1896, George Carmack and two Indian companions discovered gold on Bonanza Creek in the Klondike, and the great gold rush of 1898 was on. Prospectors poured into the region and the population figure zoomed. Dawson City, mecca for the gold hunters, counted close to 40,000 heads near the turn of the century. Today the community has a population of around 500. The rush petered out early in the new century and gold mining in the Yukon developed as an industrial operation conducted by a few mining companies. The first boom period was finished, and perhaps one of the most successful gold miners of the Klondike was a young bank clerk called Robert W. Service. The gold he "mined" was in the form of royalties received from the publishers of his Klondike poetry.

After the gold rush bonanza the Yukon's economy wilted and the territory lapsed into another period of inertia. This slumber was rudely interrupted by the outbreak of World War II, and a new economic boom began, triggered by the invasion of United States soldiers and civilians assigned to construct the Alaska Highway. Whitehorse was the chief beneficiary of this windfall, and while it lasted the Yukon's principal urban centre enjoyed unprecedented prosperity.

At war's end and the return to a peacetime economy, the territory was again depopulated and left dependent upon federal Government payrolls, a few mines and some transfusions of welfare money. The Yukon's hope of better days rested upon potentially vast mineral resources.

Now, in Canada's centennial year, the Yukon may have realized its hope of a new gold rush. The "gold" this time is a lead-zinc ore body. The rich 50 million ton ore body is located in an area 16½ miles northeast of Whitehorse.

In late March the Government negotiated a deal with a United States controlled company to mine the ore body. Anvil Mining Company of Vancouver, 60 per cent owned by Cyprus Mines of Los Angeles, will establish an open pit mine to develop its deposits. The remainder of the ore body is owned by Dynasty Mines of Vancouver. The entire production will be sold to foreign markets, including Japan. A movement is on foot to construct a smelter to refine the ore. If this takes place, the work force could increase four-fold and lead to the establishment of a new townsite. The Government at the present time is building a road into the area. Other mines have opened or soon will be opening in the territory; thus the Yukon's whole mining outlook has taken on new dimensions as a result of the Ross River lead-zinc discovery.

Tourism is becoming increasingly important in the Yukon and in its American neighbour, the State of Alaska. I have been told by people making this wonderful trip that the brief hush of twilight is a Yukon moment of magic which will live in your memory always. Growing numbers of visitors are coming into the Territory via boat to Alaska and over the Alaska Highway. A suggestion originating in Alaska may lead to the revival of river steamers on the Yukon River.

In view of centennial celebrations and the interest that will be generated in the legends, songs and stories associated with the early days of the river, efforts are being made to have riverboats running on the Yukon River this summer. The Yukon has a real Klondike exhibit at Expo. It has 400 feet of space located directly across from the expressway station "F", and located next to the Senegal pavilion.

The main theme exhibit is a display of gold. There is a simulated log rocker operation with a gold pan, nuggets, coins, and Yukon jewelry, all floodlit by an old Yukon lantern. The walls inside the pavilion are of simulated log design. A display case of rough lumber shows different ores found in the Yukon. Prize game heads of Yukon moose, sheep, and other animals hang from interior panels. I am sure this exhibit will be a potent factor in bringing more visitors to the authentic Klondike country.

As in the Yukon, the mining spotlight for the past few years in the Northwest Territories has been on the big lead-zinc development at Pine Point, situated between Hay River and Fort Smith on the south shore of Great Slave Lake. Last year was the first year that the mine was in full production, and the output was up some $70 million from the year previous.

The lead-zinc deposits at Pine Point rank with the largest in the world, and with their development by Pine Point Mines Ltd., a subsidiary of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited, a new townsite came into being. Construction of a smelter at this location is now a possibility.

Tungsten is one of the new minerals produced, along with lead and zinc, which is boosting the value of minerals produced in the Northwest Territories. Also coming in for attention are two large iron deposits, one on the Yukon and Northwest Territory boundary, and the other near the Mary River on Northern Baffin Island.

The educational system of the Northwest Territories has developed rapidly during the past ten years. The enrollment in schools has increased from 15 to 20 per cent. It is 85 per cent at the present time, and within a few years this enrollment should reach the maximum of 100 per cent. A student can now enter the primary grades and continue his education through public, high school and college at no heavy financial sacrifice to his parents. The program is a good one but many dwellers in this great section of Canada would like to see the best educational system possible to fit the abilities and ambitions of the northern people and to meet the needs of the society in which they live. For those who wish to specialize and who are beyond school age, vocational and adult education have already commenced. The ultimate success of this educational system will depend upon the degree to which each young person in the Territories is able to reach out and grasp his or her full potential.

The Government is expressing strong support for the extension of television in the north. This will bring many practical advantages to northern communities. It will be a major factor in attracting families to live in areas where there are little entertainment possibilities and where the climate and surroundings are sometimes harsh. The C.B.C. hopes to have an experimental station at Yellowknife by this summer.

A recent major achievement in extending communications to the north was the opening of the Canadian Telecommunications landline along the McKenzie River to Inuvik. It provides up-to-date local and long distance telephone service, telegraph, and private line service as well as radio program circuits to these distant parts of the Territories.

Tourism has increased greatly in the Northwest Territories since the highway to Yellowknife was opened to traffic in 1962. Tourist dollars are beginning to make their impact felt. Residents of southern Canada and of the United States are delighted that roads are being opened up to the vacationer and sportsman. Along with colourful and rugged scenery, the main attraction is the sport fishing for lake trout, arctic grayling and arctic char.

In dealing with the problem of the political evolution of the Yukon and Northwest Territories to self-government, we should not make the mistake of continuing to regard these two territories of Canada's north in exactly the same light. Each of the territories has different histories, different geographical factors existing, different economic and administrative problems, to mention only a few of the differences.

It was away back in 1870 when Manitoba became the first province to be formed out of the huge western territory that was known generally as the northwest territories. Following the establishment of the Province of Manitoba, there was no further development toward provincial status until 1905. In that year the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta joined Confederation, with complete autonomy.

That Yukon and the Northwest Territories will become provinces is not doubted. There are, however, divergent views as to timing. At the present time there is emerging in the far north a vigorous self-assertion giving rise to the same pressures which brought about the first measure of executive control in the Northwest Territories in 1892. The time has arrived when there must be commenced a gradual transfer of executive responsibility from the federal administration to the elected legislative council.

Unlike the Canadian provinces, the Yukon is administered as a territory. The chief executive, who is called the Commissioner, acts under instructions from the federal Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It has a wholly elected council of seven members which has no executive power, merely power to act in concert with the Commissioner in the passing of legislation. It has no power to introduce money bills. The council is elected for a period of three years and has much the same functions as the provincial legislature, while the Commissioner functions along the lines of the provincial cabinet. The seat of government is at Whitehorse.

Transfer of the territorial government from Ottawa to Yellowknife is the big news event this year in the Northwest Territories, and a major step in the direction of self-government. At the present time a commissioner is the chief executive officer of the Territories.

He administers the Territory on the instruction of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or the Governor in Council. The Deputy Commissioner, in the absence of the Commissioner or if that post is vacant, is authorized to exercise all the powers of the Commissioner. The Commissioner is the presiding officer of Council when in session but he is not a member. He may, in the event of a tie, cast a deciding vote. The Deputy Commissioner is a member of Council.

In the past both the Commissioner's and the Deputy Commissioner's posts were filled by senior officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who performed these roles in addition to carrying out their federal responsibilities. In 1963 Mr. B. G. Sivertz was appointed the first Commissioner of the Northwest Territories with no other responsibilities. In August of 1965 Mr. Stuart M. Hodgson, who in March of this year became Commissioner, was appointed to the Territorial Public Service as Deputy Commissioner. He was succeeded as Deputy Commissioner by John H. Parker, the former Mayor of Yellowknife.

The council was set up in its present form under the Northwest Territories Act in 1951. At that time, provision was made for three members to be elected, representing constituencies in the Mackenzie District, and five to be appointed by the Governor in Council for a term of not more than three years. Since then the act was amended in 1954 to increase the number of elected members to four, and again in 1966 to seven. The 1966 amendment to the act made possible the seating for the first time of elected representatives on Council from all parts of the Territories. The number of appointed members has remained unchanged.

The Council of the Northwest Territories has legislative powers much similar to those of a provincial legislature except that all land and natural resources, excluding game, remain the responsibility of the federal Government. Within these limits, the jurisdiction of the Council extends over all the Northwest Territories and its residents.

Council enacts ordinances for the Territories in much the same way as provincial legislatures enact provincial law. Council has jurisdiction, as set out in sections 13, 14 and 14A of the Northwest Territories Act, over such matters as education, health, social welfare, municipal affairs, motor vehicles and roads, game, business and professional licensing, et cetera. Any ordinance or provision thereof may be disallowed by the Governor in Council within two years after its passage.

The Northwest Territories Act requires that a minimum of two sessions of Council be held in each year and that one of these be held in the Northwest Territories. All other sessions must be held at the seat of government. By order in council earlier this year, Yellowknife was named the seat of government of the Northwest Territories effective May 1.

Council's term of office is three years. On April 30 of this year the last Council expired and the Chief Electoral Officer is now making preparations for a territorial general election on July 4. It is expected that all seven seats will be contested. The first session of the new Council will be held in Yellowknife in the fall of this year.

Therefore, honourable senators, you will agree that the north more and more is becoming a place to live in and a place to earn a living. Assisted by an expanding economy in the south, more incentives from Ottawa, recognition of the middle north as a region distinct from the high Arctic and as a region which must be planned for and treated as a unit, the middle north can become a national asset.

This year as we celebrate our Centennial as a nation, does it not create in us a mood of respect for the past, appreciation of the present, and hope for the future?

On the motion of Honourable Mrs. Fergusson, debate adjourned.

CANADA CORPORATIONS ACT

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard moved the second reading of Bill S-10, to amend the Canada Corporations Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is what I might call a tidying-up bill. Honourable senators will recall that in 1964-65 we had before us some major amendments to what was then called the Companies Act. Those amendments were important and very constructive. They were considered by the Senate over a period of some months, particularly by the Committee on Banking and Commerce and especially by the Chairman of that committee.

Hearings were held and witnesses were called representing chartered accountants and lawyers throughout Canada and others, including the departmental officials. As a result, a very constructive bill ended as an act of Parliament passed by both the Senate and the House of Commons.

Since that time there have arisen a few instances where some clarification is required or where amendments should be made because of the provisions of the act—not that there was any oversight at that time, but because from time to time these instances appear and, although in the ordinary case they might be left until a revision of the act or a consolidation takes place, nevertheless, in the case of an act such as the Canada Corporations Act, under which business is carried on day by day throughout the country, it becomes desirable to clarify and make these changes as soon as convenient to do so.

I think honourable senators will recognize, therefore, that as there is no major principle involved in this bill, the best procedure is to run through the amendments and honourable senators can then see for themselves that they are consequential upon the passing of the previous act.

Section 1 deals with section 5 of the act. That is the section which confers upon the Secretary of State the power to issue letters patent or supplementary letters patent to companies; and there are certain exceptions in Section 5, such as loan companies, banks, and insurance companies, those companies which have their own special acts dealing with their incorporation and their powers.

This bill inserts in that section, as an exception, companies doing business under the Small Loans Act. Those companies have had for a number of years their own special act; they are incorporated under the Small Loans Act and they are in the same class or category as the other classes of companies to which I referred. So this amendment simply takes out of the general act and leaves under their own special act companies incorporated under the Small Loans Act.

In the act as it now stands, section 2 reads as if in every case where an additional series of a class of shares is issued there are required additional supplementary letters patent, even though the restrictions and the terms applying to that series have already been set out in the previous letters patent or supplementary letters patent.

Section 2, therefore, makes it clear that once letters patent or supplementary letters patent have set out the terms and restrictions for all series of that class of shares, then no further supplementary letters patent are required as further series are issued.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There is less work for the lawyers.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I should remember that.

Now, section 3 deals with the requirements concerning a by-law changing the head office of a company. The present act requires that that by-law be published in the Canada Gazette. The change is to require that only notice of the by-law be published in the Canada Gazette; the by-law itself is to be filed with the Registrar General and is to be open for inspection. This saves companies the unnecessary expense of having to put into the Canada Gazette the whole by-law affecting the head office. All that will be required now will be simply a notice of the change.

Section 4. The present act requires a company to file, among other papers, a memorandum of agreement. For a long time now companies have not been incorporated by means of a memorandum of agreement, and, therefore, they could not file a memorandum of agreement. This change is to make it read so that, along with the other papers, they will file "a copy of the memorandum of agreement of the company, if any."

Section 5 corrects a printing omission. The word "of" was left out in the third line of subsection 4 of section 116. If one reads the section, he is at once aware that the word "of" should go in. So that in connection with a private company that is given a certain dispensation, it must be a private company that is not a subsidiary of a public company or of a company incorporated otherwise than by or under an act of Parliament.

Coming now to section 6, there is in the interpretation section of the Canada Corporations Act a definition of the words "any other company". Now in section 121B, instead of repeating those words "any other company" the phrase used is "another company". One might assume from that that there is a difference between the two phrases, but no difference was intended, and this change defines "another company" as being exactly the same definition as "any other company".

Section 7, as the act now reads, states that when a company has for three years failed to file its annual return, the Registrar General may give notice to the company that unless within a further year the annual statements are filed, the company may be dissolved. That gives a total of four years in all. The change is to reduce the time by one year, so that if a company is in default in its annual return for two years, the Registrar General gives one year's notice, and the company, in case of default, may be dissolved after three years instead of four.

Section 8: In the amendments made in 1964-65, one important amendment was the power given to companies to amalgamate. The wording in the section was that "Any two or more companies incorporated under this act... may amalgamate." Now the original act, the Canada Companies Act, was passed in 1934, so that in giving the power to amalgamate we only gave it to companies that have been incorporated since that year. There is no reason to differentiate as between companies incorporated prior to or after 1934, and so this change corrects that wording by saying that any two or more companies to which this Part applies may amalgamate, and the definition in the section dealing with the application of the Part brings in companies incorporated prior to 1934. Subsection 2 of that section makes it retroactive to the passing of the original amalgamating powers.

Section 9 seems to me to be a housekeeping matter for the Department of the Registrar General. The act as it reads now requires or states that no letters patent may issue until after all fees are paid. This section extends that requirement so that no by-laws, returns, prospectuses or other documents may be filed until fees are paid.

Section 10 as it now stands refers to section 125A. There is no such section in the act. This is obviously a proof-reading error. There was one originally in the bill when it came before the Senate in 1964, but that particular section 125A was struck out, and the present wording should be "125" instead of "125A".

I think honourable senators will recognize that this is a tidying-up bill, and that the amendments suggested are all helpful and ameliorating.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I agree with honourable Senator Leonard that this is a tidying-up bill, and any bill which required all the amendments that the 1934 Canada Corporations Act required in 1965 should be tidied up, and it must be further tidied up after all the amendments have been made. Two years have passed since amendments were finally passed, and it is surprising to me that there have not been more requests that further sections be tidied up.

This is a housekeeping bill, or a housecleaning bill, if you want to put it that way, and I would suggest to my very able friend, Senator Leonard, that he might now request that this tidying-up process be completed and that the original bill together with the amendments of 1964-65 and the tidying-up bill of 1967 should be consolidated. Lawyers across Canada are having great difficulty with the legislation. If you will make that recommendation, I will be very happy. This is not a political bill; it is just common sense—

Hon. Mr. Croll: Is there a suggestion that it is political?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Well, if it were political, you might be speaking.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It so happens that at the moment you are.

Hon. Mr. Walker: This is a very proud day for you, senator, and we are happy to have you interrupt so that we will know that you are here.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am here more often than you are.

Hon. Mr. Walker: You are becoming quite vehement, I see.

Section 1 of the Canada Corporations Act is amended in Bill S-10. It is obvious that this Small Loans Act had not been mentioned, and that it should have been and now has been included.

Clause 2 makes the wording very much more specific than it has ever been before, because we know that supplementary letters patent may specifically provide particulars of more than one series or class of shares; and now there can be no doubt that all these classes are included.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): You do not mind the loss of fees involved in SLP?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Did my friend mention something about SO—?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No; I said that you do not mind the loss of fees involved in SLP.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Thinking of what my friend opposite said a moment ago, I thought there might be some political connotation in that remark.

Then we come to clause 3 which I am glad to see my friend was dealing with in anticipation. There is no doubt that the printing of a long and detailed by-law is out of place; there is no necessity for it. A simple notice of change of name is very much in order, and it is a great thing to see governments, and particularly a Liberal Government through this nonpolitical Companies Branch, trying to save money instead of trying to find ways of spending it.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): We are at it all the time.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Not very successfully.

Hon. Mr. Walker: In clause 4—we are trying to help you, not that you need it or, I should say, not that you think you need it—in any new incorporation, of course, under both circumstances, no memorandum of agreement is necessary. That was simply an oversight, I presume, in the old act.

As my friend Senator Leonard has said, clause 5 was simply a printing omission. Clause 6 is purely definitive.

Clause 7 is a very good idea. Why should people be allowed three years in arrears to file? Why should they be allowed three consecutive years in which to omit filing before they are taken to task? Boiling it down to two years is a very sensible idea in all the circumstances, particularly since they still have a year after publication of the notice to correct the filing omission.

Clause 8. There is no question about the interpretation here having been too narrow. It would mean simply, if the present wording of section 128A were left as it is at the present time, that the only corporations that would be affected would be companies incorporated since 1934. This change will now make law what we intended in our committee—namely, that all companies, even those incorporated before 1934, would be affected.

Clause 9—again something about getting more fees. The Government is always proficient in getting in the money, but is not quite as proficient in keeping it from being spent.

Hon. Mr. Croll: There is no purpose—

Hon. Mr. Walker: Did my honourable friend say something?

Hon. Mr. Croll: There is no purpose in keeping it.

Hon. Mr. Walker: No. It is very nice, though, to have your interruption. This is your day, and I say that with a great deal of sincerity.

Clause 9. There is no question about this. Why should we wait for fees to be paid? Why should we wait for fees to be paid on anything? Now, before any document can be filed all fees must be paid. Originally, they had to be paid with the filing of the application for letters patent or supplementary letters patent. Now they have to be paid on every document, and unless the fee is included no action will be taken by the department on any of the returns.

Clause 10 rectifies a very small omission, a proof-reading error.

This is all to the good, and the Canada Corporations Act, of course, will be under constant review. After studying the American corporations acts and those of other countries we might quite properly feel our act is a bit old-fashioned. But as a result of the amendments of 1964-1965 and the cleaning up process of this bill, we are a great deal ahead of where we were in 1963, for instance.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I just want to add a word to what Senator Leonard and Senator Walker have said.

I think that what Senator Walker said has pointed up what we all know from experience, that the Senate committee which deals with bills of this kind invariably does an outstanding job. In this case, as Senator Walker of course realizes, there was a subcommittee which looked at the amendments which were made two years ago to the Companies Act, I think for the first time in over 30 years, and it is a great tribute to the work of that committee that so few changes are now necessary to bring the act up to date.

I pay a tribute to the lawyers on that committee and on the subcommittee who paid so much attention to the draftsmanship of the various clauses; and to have two eminent counsel like these two gentlemen from one of the great Bars of this country speak about this measure is something of which the Senate should indeed be proud.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

IMMIGRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-118, to amend the Immigration Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is about as short as it is possible to make one, and the amendment does one thing and one thing only. The amount of money allowed to be outstanding in the advances by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration for loans to immigrants to assist them in their expenses of transporting themselves from their native land to Canada is changed from $12 million to $20 million.

It would be only fair if I were to give some figures as to what has happened since this legislation was first implemented back in 1951. At that time about 4 per cent of the immigrants coming to Canada came under this particular program. Today about 25 per cent of the immigrants to Canada are using this piece of legislation. Over that period from 1951 to date there have been about a quarter of a million immigrants who have used this program to assist themselves to come into this country. The total amount of money that has been lent over the period amounts to some $41 million.

There have been losses. During that period the losses have amounted to about $330,000 or 0.8 per cent of the total amount of money advanced to the immigrants. Personally, I think that is a pretty good record.

There are several reasons why these loans have been uncollectible. In some cases the individuals arrived in Canada and a few days later found themselves in the United States, which made it impossible for the department to collect the money. In other cases they had been ill. In some cases they wound up in a mental institution in our country. But 0.8 per cent over the period from 1951 to 1966, I think, is a pretty good record. To date these advances have been interest-free.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: This is a revolving fund?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: That 0.8 per cent would be of the original amount of $12 million and not of $41 million?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: No, of $41 million. The total amount of money that has been used in the revolving plan, with this ceiling of $12 million, is $41 million, and the losses have been 0.8 per cent of the $41 million, as I understand it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It is half of 1 per cent, approximately.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: To date these loans have been interest-free. It is my understanding that it is the intention of the department to amend the regulations so that an interest rate can be charged. Part of the reason for that is the fact that at the beginning of this plan, as I said earlier, only 4 per cent of the immigrants used it. Today it is 25 per cent, and there is the indication that many people are using this plan who actually do not need financial assistance to come to our country. There is a feeling we ought not to be lending money interest free to immigrants who actually do not need help. So, there is a suggestion that the regulations under the act be amended to charge an interest rate of something in the neighbourhood of 6 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): On all loans?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: No, it is the intention of the department that where there are very difficult circumstances perhaps not only a loan could be made but a gift made to the immigrant, where neither the principal nor interest would be repaid, and in other cases the principal without interest. It would depend on the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Everett: Would the honourable senator tell me whether the ceiling of $12 million has worked any hardship?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: If the honourable senator will bear with me, I will come to that point.

Initially, there was a 24-month repayment period, but again circumstances were taken into consideration. In some cases a much longer time has been taken to repay the loan. But, to come to the honourable senator's question, the ceiling of $12 million on loans has meant that this program could be applied only in certain parts of the world. As a matter of fact, when the legislation was first brought into being there were only certain countries in Europe to which the particular program applied. I think it was last year that these benefits were extended to the Caribbean area. It is the hope of the Government, if this house sees fit to pass this amendment, to increase the maximum amount of the outstanding advances from $12 million to $20 million, after which this program can be extended to all those countries of the world from which immigrants to Canada come.

With that short explanation, honourable senators, I move second reading of this bill.

Hon. Harry A. Willis: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the honourable senator whether previously interest on these loans has been charged.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: No, there has been no interest charged to date.

Hon. Mr. Willis: It is only now that Parliament has decided to charge interest?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Willis: Honourable senators, this bill is typical of the Government in power. I never saw so much money spent by a government in my life. All this amendment to the Immigration Act does is provide that the total amount of outstanding advances shall not exceed $20 million, instead of $12 million. That is all there is to it.

As honourable senators know, there is set up at present a joint committee of this house and the other place on immigration, of which I happen to be a member. That committee has had many meetings, and from what it has heard it is my opinion that the Immigration Department at the present time needs a good cleaning out. Many members of my honourable friend's party in the other place are in agreement with that.

I criticize this bill not to prevent its passage, because we on this side of the chamber want it passed. But, when the minister introduced it in the other place, and when my honourable friend introduced it here today, neither gave any indication whatsoever of what the policy of the Government is going to be with respect to future immigration. They have said not one word about that.

As my honourable friend well knows, these loans have been made for some time. We all realize that more immigrants have been coming to Canada in the last few years than ever before, and there seems no doubt that this added expenditure is necessary. However, the Minister of Immigration tabled in the other place a White Paper, and this bill contains nothing of what is contained in that document.

This chamber should advise the Department of Immigration that it should take a good look to see what other countries are doing in this connection. For instance, Australia has a subsidy plan, and Australia has had two immigrants for every one that has come to Canada in the past few years.

Hon. Mr. Croll: That is, two British immigrants to our one British immigrant.

Hon. Mr. Willis: Yes, immigrants from Britain. It is my opinion that we should have more information. As the honourable sponsor of this bill (Hon. Mr. McDonald) well knows, on March 1, 1966, Manitoba introduced its immigration act. Recently there have been talks between the Premier of Quebec and General de Gaulle in Paris. Why were we not given some information as to whether there have been conferences with the Canadian Department of Immigration and the Immigration Department of Manitoba and the Immigration Department of Quebec? What we need is more information.

All this bill tells us is that the Government wants $8 million more for the purpose of bringing in more immigrants. Goodness knows, Canada needs more immigrants, but, as I say, the policy of the Department of Immigration, as it is now, needs considerable overhauling.

We on this side of the house support the bill, but we do criticize the lack of information that was given this house about it.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, I have just a few words to say on this bill. I agree with the sponsor that it is a very short bill. It changes but one word. It increases the amount from $12 million to $20 million. My criticism is that we do not know where this figure of $20 million comes from. The minister in the other place said that immigration from France alone during the first four months of this year was nearly double that of the same period last year. If that is so, why is this additional amount of $8 million needed? Why not make it $25 million, and let us have more immigrants to this country? This money is supposed to be used for the bringing to this country of unsponsored immigrants, and it is well known that we need many immigrants.

As far as I am concerned it can well be asked: What's a million nowadays? We spend money like drunken sailors, so why not spend $25 million and get all the immigrants we need?

I too am a member of the Joint Committee on Immigration which, at the commencement of its deliberations, studied the White Paper. I must confess that I do not like the situation we are in at the moment. The committee was responsible for two minor bills with respect to immigration—this one, and another that was passed previously—and yet at the very beginning the White Paper says:

> There is a general awareness among Canadians that the present Immigration Act no longer serves the national needs adequately.

It goes on:

> This White Paper is intended to assist in public discussion in and out of Parliament. It attempts both an analysis of the problem and a statement of the principles and policies which the Government believes should be embodied in new immigration legislation.

For my part, it seems that the Government is nibbling away at this—a little bit here and a little bit there—and we are not going to have any immigration policy at all, but are just going to go along with the old one. Finally, we will have two or three little pieces of legislation in respect of immigration picked from the White Paper, and there will be very little left of that document but the skeleton.

I would like to see a thorough report made by the Special Joint Committee on Immigration presented to this chamber and to the other place, and a revised Immigration Act passed by Parliament as soon as possible, one that will assist the country to get all the immigrants it needs. There are many questions that have to be answered in respect of immigration in Canada, and we need a proper basis on which to work.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask the honourable senator whether the White Paper was studied at all by the committee?

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Yes, it was studied for a considerable period of time.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, perhaps it would be helpful if I said one or two things at this stage on behalf of the Government.

First of all, the question is raised as to why the amount of $20 million has been selected. I think honourable senators will gather that this is an estimate made by the officials of the department after a study of the prospects for immigration, and the requirements of these people who come to this country for assistance when they first arrive. Probably arguments could be advanced for other amounts. However, according to the best available evidence, this seems to be the amount that would be satisfactory for a while.

I suggest that this bill go to a committee, at which time the questions on that point might very well be asked of the officials, and indeed of the minister.

Secondly, I refer to the question of immigration policy. Without becoming political, I think it is a recognized fact that in this country we have vast open spaces and an abundance of opportunities for people. A modern immigration policy that is going to meet the requirements of the Canada of tomorrow is something for which all of us will want to strive. The new minister is very much actuated by a sense of urgency in this particular field.

I was impressed to find out the other day when I was in Malta, where I had the privilege of having a discussion with the minister in charge of manpower, labour and emigration in that country, that while 300,000 people live in Malta, more than 300,000 Maltese are living in Australia.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Any Irish?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Oh, there are lots of Irish. There is no problem about finding the Irish wherever you go.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Even in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, even in the Senate; and those who are not Irish wish they were—people with names like "Flynn" particularly.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The minister with whom I had the discussion told me of a scheme, which I think may have been already carried out, whereby by arrangement with the Government of Manitoba and the Government of Canada some 78 families from Malta at the beginning of this month were emigrating to Manitoba. This is sensible policy. It is not simply bringing people in and saying to them, "Here you are, find your own way." Undoubtedly a program has been worked out between the federal authorities and the provincial authorities. These are skilled people in various trades; they are wonderful and friendly people, good types for the Canadian economy and the Canadian population.

The minister is coming here sometime in August to visit this new group which is coming to Canada. He said that he would tell them never to forget their Maltese background, but that their first duty is to become good Canadians. With that kind of co-operation between the authorities in Canada concerned with immigration—and I think there is an interest on the provincial side, certainly on the trade union side—and people concerned with the problem in countries from which immigrants can come, I think there is an opportunity to help with the kind of program we need. We all desire the most up-to-date immigration procedures that we possibly can have.

This is only one step, one phase of the policy, but I think the Government has given an earnest of its intention to do just what I and other honourable senators have been advocating, in presenting the White Paper so that parliamentarians would have an opportunity of reviewing the whole field. Then when the time comes to draft legislation, the views of people, not only of Parliamentarians but of experts and witnesses who are brought before the committee studying the White Paper, can be made available to the draftsmen who prepare the legislation.

So, I think that there is in the making, and it is not done over night, the kind of immigration policy that we all want to see established here.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I am a little confused, which is not unusual for me. Senator Willis speaks of a lack of immigration policy. I recall that he landed here just after the last meeting of the Immigration Committee and said that he did not receive a notice of the meeting, that they forget to send him one. Senator Pearson was at that meeting. The minister appeared before us and in a statement of some length he outlined the immigration policy and the changes that were made by regulations. It was the most extensive commitment that could possibly be made on the part of the Government. As a matter of fact, it seemed to satisfy all of us around the table that he had met most, if not all, of the objections. We felt then that we were well away, that he was going about the business of opening up offices I think in Japan, in the Caribbean, and some other countries in order to bring in immigrants under the new regulations.

So, why do we speak about not having a policy? It has been stated, enunciated and proclaimed, and I do not know what else the minister can do.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Honourable senators, I admit that the minister made a statement and a very good one. However, to bring in these small bits of items of the Immigration Act and not the whole act is not satisfactory to me. I want to see the total act instead of a piecemeal affair all the way along.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: May I remind honourable senators that if the honourable Senator McDonald speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, all I want to say is that if this house sees fit to give this bill second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour. At that time the officials of the department, and the minister himself, if desired, will be available to give all the details needed. I hope some of the remarks that have been made here this afternoon will be made again in committee. I too have some reservations with regard to immigration in this country, coming as I do from the Province of Saskatchewan which has a problem with regard to the unavailability of people to do necessary jobs. I would like to see a policy that would allow people to come to this country if they are available to do necessary work not only in Saskatchewan but in other parts of Canada. The productivity of this nation is being deterred through the lack of people to do the work. The mining, lumbering, and agricultural industries are suffering. It is most difficult to get immigrants to remain for any length of time in one of those three industries, especially in agriculture. They are likely to remain for six months or a year, and when they see the bright lights of Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver they are gone. I do not know what the answer is, but it is a fact that in many cases people who have lived in an agricultural environment in another part of the world want to live on Bay Street when they come to Canada, and that is where many of them are going. If the minister or his officials have the answers, I am sure they will give them to us in committee.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, is there not another great problem in connection with immigration, that is, the shortage in housing? I understand there are thousands of people who could come to Canada but there would be no place for them to live. This has been the experience of many immigrants to this country. I read the other day of someone in Montreal who had to wait for four years before he could get a place which he could call his own, a home for his family. I think our housing problem is a very serious one in relation to immigration.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: There is no housing problem on my farm, but I cannot get immigrants.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: They are moving off the farms. The country farms have vacant houses, but the cities have none.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

INQUIRIES ANSWERED

STATUTES OF CANADA—REVISION

Inquiry No. 2 by Honourable Jean-François Pouliot:

1. On what date was the latest revision of the Statutes of Canada commenced and what are the names of the persons who are carrying out the revision?

2. Are the persons mentioned in the previous question working full time or part time, and in the latter case, what is their main occupation?

3. What work have the abovementioned persons accomplished to date and what work remains in order to complete the revision of the Statutes?

4. What is the regular salary of each of these persons and how much are they paid for overtime?

The answers to Inquiry No. 2 are as follows:

1(a) The Statute Revision Commission was established by Letters Patent dated the 4th day of May, 1965. The consolidation of the public general statutes of Canada began about the middle of July, 1965.

(b) The Commission carrying out the revision now consists of the following:

Hon. Pierre-Elliott Trudeau, P.C., M.P., Minister of Justice and Attorney-General of Canada (member ex officio);

Donald S. Maxwell, Q.C., Deputy Minister of Justice and Deputy Attorney-General;

Jean Miquelon, C.R., Deputy Registrar General of Canada;

Rodrigue Bedard, C.R., Associate Deputy Minister of Justice;

Donald S. Thorson, Q.C., Associate Deputy Minister of Justice;

James W. Ryan, Director, Legislation Section, Department of Justice.

2. The persons named above work part time only on the revision; thus principal occupation is as stated above.

3(a) To date the Statute Revision Commission has consolidated a total of 726 public general statutes, a total of 363 in French and English respectively.

(b) A preliminary revision has been made of 325 statutes in English and 283 in French.

(c) In order to complete the work of the Commission, it is necessary to consolidate all the public general statutes to be included in the Revised Statutes 1967. This number has not yet been determined, because of the multitudinous changes made in the statutes in the previous sessions of Parliament and the changes proposed to be made in this session.

If the new Interpretation Act becomes a reality, the Commission will be in a more favourable position to fix a determination date for the inclusion of statutes. Until now, it has not been practical to fix any such date. It has not seemed desirable to have a revision as out of date as one that would result from a cut-off date that did not include the legislation of 1966-67.

After a cut-off date is established, a period of several months will be required to complete the consolidation. A further period will be required to complete the revision and the preparation of the required Statute Roll in manuscript. Thereafter at least six months will be required for the printing process.

In addition the Commission will in all probability be required to prepare and append a Supplement to the Statute Roll unless there is a change in the pace of legislation coming out of Parliament.

It is anticipated that the Fall of 1968 is the earliest date that the Revised Statutes 1967 can be promulgated and distributed.

4. The salaries of the members of the Commission are their salaries of office. There is no special remuneration for revision work provided the members of the Commission and no overtime benefits.

REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA—USE OF WORD "DOMINION"

Inquiry No. 3 by Honourable Senator Pouliot:

In what clauses and in what lines of the pages of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, and the subsequent Statutes of Canada have the words "Dominion of Canada" and "Dominion" (referring to the Dominion of Canada) been mentioned?

The answer to Inquiry No. 3 is as follows:

The information sought is not immediately available from the records of the Statute Revision Commission. The immediate information available indicates that the terms "Dominion" and "Dominion of Canada" occur in the following Acts:

(a) By Title: Dominion Coal Board Act; Dominion Controverted Elections Act; Dominion Day Act; Dominion Succession Duty Act (Superseded by the Estate Tax Act); Dominion Water Power Act.

(b) Otherwise: Excise Tax Act (ss. 26 & 35 (4)) Canada Land Surveys Act (Dominion land surveyor).

The information sought can only be obtained from a line by line search of all the statutes. So far as the statutes to be included in the revision are concerned it is possible to extract this information in the course of revising without disrupting the revision if sufficient time is available.

ROYAL ASSENT—PUBLIC BILLS

Inquiry No. 4 by Honourable Senator Pouliot:

1. How many times did a Deputy to the Governor General come to the Senate Chamber to give Royal Assent to bills during the First Session of the 27th Parliament and on what dates did he come?

2. Referring to the inquiry which appeared in the Senate Debates of July 22, 1964, how many public bills, except supply bills, were assented to each time and what was the title of each such bill?

3. Were the bills referred to in question No. 2 published separately after they had been assented to, and, if so, how long after in each case?

4. Were copies of the aforementioned bills forwarded to the Members of both Houses of Parliament, and if so, when, and, if not, why?

The answers to Inquiry No. 4 are as follows:

1. A Deputy of the Governor General came to the Senate Chamber to give Royal Assent to Bills twenty-three times during the 1st Session of the 23rd Parliament and on the following dates:—

February 8, 1966; February 23, 1966; March 9, 1966; March 31, 1966; May 12, 1966; June 2, 1966; June 16, 1966; July 11, 1966; July 15, 1966; September 1, 1966; November 17, 1966; November 22, 1966; November 28, 1966; November 30, 1966; December 14, 1966; December 21, 1966; February 9, 1967; February 17, 1967; February 23, 1967; March 1, 1967; March 10, 1967; March 23, 1967; May 8, 1967.

2. See list of Acts passed during the Session 1964-65, Appendix "A" below.

3. No. When they are assented to bills become statutes and are published as such.

4. It is not the practice to deliver loose copies of statutes to members of both Houses of Parliament unless requested. However, these are available within two weeks of Royal Assent and can be obtained by any member or Senator on request from the Distribution Office of the Queen's Printer. Members of both Houses receive the bound Statutes as soon as they are available. Copies of the bound 1964-65 Statutes were delivered to the offices of the members of both Houses of Parliament on July 21, 1965.

DEBATES OF THE SENATE AND INDEX—PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION

Inquiry No. 5 by Honourable Senator Pouliot:

1. Referring to the bound copies of the Senate Debates for the First Session of the 27th Parliament, when will they be made available in French and English to the Members of the Senate?

2. Until then, will the Index of the Senate Debates be completed from March 6, 1967, to the date of the prorogation of the last session, and when will it be made available to the Members of the Senate?

Were the Senate Minutes and Debates published for the morning sitting of May 8, 1967, and if not, why?

The answers to Inquiry No. 5 are as follows:

1: Within three to four months. (See copy of letter from Mr. Hagen, Editor of Debates, to Clerk of the Senate, marked Appendix "B").

2: Yes. It is expected that the Index to the Senate Debates for the 1966-67 Session will be completed and ready for distribution to Senators by 6th June, 1967.

3: Yes.

May 23, 1967

Appendix "B"

MEMORANDUM to:—John F. MacNeill, Q.C., B.A., LL.D., D.C.L., Clerk of the Senate

Re Questions by Hon. Senator Pouliot

Throughout the past session revised copy of the Debates was sent to the Printing Bureau at regular intervals, revised proofs were received, promptly checked and returned to the Bureau for final printing. By this process the copy was moved as quickly as the printers could handle it. As of this date, about 600 pages of final proofs are still to be received. This applies only to the English language version; the final revision work on the French language copy of the Debates is done by the Bureau of Translations, and it deals directly with the Printing Bureau.

As to the likely date of distribution of the bound volume of Debates for the 1966-67 session, the delay could well stretch into three or four months. This estimate is based on the time required in other years, when there was an interval between sessions in which the printers could complete the work from the previous session. I am assured that the bound volume in the French language will be delivered within three or four days of the English.

A complete Index to the Debates of the Senate in pamphlet form—including March 6 to May 8—is now being prepared for publication and will be made available for distribution among parliamentarians only. Photolist (proofs) is now being checked and will be returned to the Bureau with the least possible delay. A further check of the negatives is necessary, but one might reasonably expect delivery of the Index by June 6.

Graydon Hagen,
Editor of Debates.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 8, 1967

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

MR. JUSTICE LANDREVILLE

RESIGNATION FROM SUPREME COURT OF ONTARIO

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to make a statement on behalf of the Government. It is to the effect that the Government has received the resignation from the Bench of the Supreme Court of Ontario of the Honourable Mr. Justice Leo Landreville and that this resignation has been accepted.

For the convenience of honourable senators I shall read into the record the letter of resignation, which is dated Ottawa, June 7, 1967:

> The Honourable Pierre E. Trudeau, Minister of Justice, Parliament Buildings, Ottawa, Ontario.
> My dear Minister,
> Be advised of my consent to retire and I hereby tender my resignation as Judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario effective June 30, 1967.
> After five difficult years and appearing in seven hearings, my health and wealth are impaired. I cannot continue. In any event my usefulness as a judge has been destroyed by the publicity and harassment arising out of such proceedings.
> During my years as a Judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario, I have fully and faithfully discharged my judicial duties. There has been no criticism of my conduct in this area and my integrity as a judge was not made an issue before Mr. Justice Rand who, on this point, says in his report:
> 'No question is raised of misbehaviour in the discharge of judicial duty; the inquiry goes to conduct outside that function.'
> In my personal life, as mayor, solicitor or citizen, I repeat emphatically and reaffirm my innocence of any wrong doing in law or ethics. But I cannot remove unfounded suspicions.
> My gratitude goes to the people of Sudbury who have shown continued confidence and persistence in defending me.
> Yours truly,
> L. A. Landreville

DIVORCE

FIRST REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Divorce, presented the first report of the committee:

> Your committee recommends that its quorum be fixed at ten (10) members, provided that both houses are represented.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: In view of the fact that meetings are in progress at the moment and others are planned, I would ask the indulgence of the Senate to pass it now.

Report adopted.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Ottawa
8th June 1967

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable J. R. Cartwright, M. C., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 8th June, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant
A. G. Cherrier
Assistant Secretary
to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, June 12, 1967, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Is there any special reason for returning on Monday? I notice that on the Orders of the Day for Monday we have:

> Consideration of the second to one hundred and twenty-eighth Reports, both inclusive, of the Standing Committee on Divorce.

I see nothing else on the Orders of the Day. Of course, something else might be added, but it we are coming back on Monday only for that item, I wonder where the urgency arises.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I can quite understand the honourable senator's concern. My answer is that in the first place we have now received a bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and it will be up for second reading and explanation on Monday evening. We would also continue with the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne on Monday evening, and with whatever other business we might have.

As a matter of fact, when the honourable Senator Prowse asked that second reading to certain private bills, be considered on Tuesday, I was going to suggest that this be done on Monday, but he has chosen Tuesday and perhaps I should hold my peace because I have no say on private bills.

I think honourable senators will appreciate a further valid reason for meeting on Monday. We may not have to sit very long next week. Senator Roebuck is joint chairman of the Special Joint Committee on Divorce, and in order to have a meeting of that committee on Tuesday morning it is necessary for the Senate to sit on Monday evening, because the committee is not entitled to sit when the Senate is not sitting. As this is a serious and voluminous report, it was felt that this accommodation should be given him.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Will there be any discussion of this report of the Special Joint Committee on Divorce before the summer recess, or whatever it is called?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am not in a position to say, because the committee has yet to report—if I may put it in this way to the Leader of the Opposition—and there may very well be a debate on the report when it is presented. However, at the moment I am not informed, nor do I think Senator Roebuck is informed as to the date on which the report will be presented to the house.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It would depend on what is in the report. As Senator Roebuck knows what its contents are, I would ask him whether he would consider it necessary to discuss the report before the summer recess.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I will be very disappointed if it is not presented to this house before we adjourn for the summer holidays—that is, at the end of this month. No one can speak for others, and as the report has still to be passed by the committee, in that respect I am in the hands of the committee. But again I say I will be very disappointed indeed if that report is not in the hands of this chamber in plenty of time for a discussion upon it prior to our adjournment at the end of this month.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It will require considerable study.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I agree with you on that.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: And there should be no hurry so far as its being considered is concerned.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No. But once it is in the hands of the chamber, of course, we can take as long as we see fit and can either conclude our discussion before the adjournment, continue it after the adjournment or hold it over until September, or do anything we please.

All I am saying is that I am doing my very best to get the report completed and passed by the committee and the whole subject laid before this chamber. I said some time ago that I hoped to do so by the middle of this month, but honourable senators will recall that we recessed and my forecast was delayed somewhat in consequence. However, I still hope and expect that the report will be in the hands of the members of this chamber well before the summer adjournment.

Motion agreed to.

MR. JUSTICE LANDREVILLE

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR ADDRESS TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL WITHDRAWN

Hon. Daniel Lang: Honourable senators, in the circumstances of Mr. Justice Landreville's resignation, I withdraw my motion.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of my honourable friend who has withdrawn his motion, and it is based upon something that all of us have in mind, namely, the inviolability of the Bench.

There are three parts to our Government: the Executive, the Legislative, and the Judiciary. Throughout 100 years of history our Bench—the Supreme Court of Canada and the provincial courts—has always been above reproach. We members of the Bar, as well as the members of every Bench, have been gravely concerned at the turn of events which has resulted in the resignation of the Honourable Mr. Justice Landreville.

I cannot explain how deeply the people throughout Ontario feel, and particularly how upset has been the Bar of Ontario, and how completely abashed have been the members of the Supreme Court of Ontario. We cannot say that we are happy. We are sad. This is a sad day, but we are satisfied that it has ended in this way.

The administrative branch of our Government has been attacked. The legislative end of it has been attacked. The only part of our Government that has remained free from attack up to the present time in these days of change is the Judiciary itself.

Those of us who have practised at the Bar know that as soon as a man ascends the Bench he is separate from the rest of us. He is above us. From that time on he is making a sacrifice. He must act with the greatest of propriety at all times. We, in turn, appreciating his sacrifice, do deference to him. If we lawyers, through our careers, were unable to go into court convinced of the absolute probity of all of our judges, then there would be an impossible situation, because in every case somebody wins and somebody loses. Never, until recently, in my 36 years at the Bar has even a suspicion crossed my mind: Is this particular judge rendering justice? This feeling has seeped down to the public, and at least now we can have a correction of that very sad state of affairs.

May I say more in sorrow, and certainly not in anger, that on behalf of my leader I ask this very important question of honourable Senator Lang: Is this an unconditional resignation, or are there conditions attached to the resignation, and, if so, what are the conditions? I ask that question because we on this side of the chamber feel that a resignation should be unconditional.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Honourable senators—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps I, on behalf of the Government, should answer that question.

Hon. Mr. Lang: I was going to tell my honourable friend that those matters have not been referred to in my motion. My knowledge of the resignation is the same knowledge that my honourable colleague has. I heard the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) read that letter, and I assume that that letter is as stated. With the resignation having been read to this chamber the motion for an address to His Excellency is, of course, quite out of order and that is why I withdrew the motion.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps I could answer the question of honourable Senator Walker. I certainly appreciate the moderation with which he has approached this situation, which obviously is a delicate one. The resignation, in the first place, speaks for itself. In the second place, it is an unconditional resignation.

Hon. Mr. Walker: In other words, so that there will be no misunderstanding in the future, there are no conditions attached?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): None whatever. The resignation is unconditional.

Hon. Mr. Walker: In concluding, may I, to keep this matter on the plane that it should be, quote an excerpt, which I received from my friend Senator Grattan O'Leary, from a speech of Sir Wilfrid Laurier appearing in the Debates of the House of Commons of 1884, at page 135:

> We owe it to ourselves to preserve the dignity and efficiency of the Bench. There are certain things which should never be impugned, and the honour of the Bench is one of those things; and I say it is not sufficient that the Bench should be pure, but it must also be above suspicion.

The only comment I have concerning the letter of resignation of the former judge, Mr. Landreville, is that justice has been satisfied and justice has been done in every respect to the former judge. He has recited the seven different proceedings before which he appeared as a witness, concluding in the Royal Commission and its report by Mr. Justice Rand, and finally that splendid Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons that laboured over this matter for weeks and came to a very clear conclusion that His Lordship should retire or, in the alternative, should be removed.

Lest we spoil this by any word of acrimony—because there is none in my heart, and I am sure there is none in the heart of any member of this house—may I add that there is no prejudice here, there is no dislike here: all we are doing is attempting to perform the office of this deliberative body, this chamber of considered thought, of second thought. We are trying to do our duty so that the last of the triumverate, the Judiciary itself, may remain in its proud position for the next one hundred years.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of the Honourable Mr. Desruisseaux, seconded by Honourable Mr. Nichol, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, like several who have proceeded me in this debate, I want to express my congratulations and good wishes to our new Governor General and his gracious lady. Because of his kindliness, fairness, tact and competence, the Right Honourable Roland Michener was one of the best liked and most highly regarded Speakers in the House of Commons, and these characteristics will doubtless make him one of our best liked and most highly regarded Governor's General.

My good wishes go to our Speaker who presides over the sessions of this chamber with dignity. Again I would like to say how greatly we miss his late wife who held such a warm place in the affection of the all the women in the Senate, both members and wives of members.

We are happy that the leader on this side of the house (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) has returned to Ottawa in such excellent health, and we are looking forward to his report on the meetings he attended in Malta.

My congratulations go to the Deputy Leader, the Honourable Jean-Paul Deschatelets, for the manner in which he has carried on the work of the Senate during the absences of the leader, and the contributions he makes at all times.

My long friendship with the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) makes me happy to see him performing his duties in this chamber so ably and in such a pleasant fashion; and I cannot refrain from saying a word of appreciation for his Deputy Leader, the Honourable Lionel Choquette, whose pungent remarks I often find stimulating and refreshing.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Due to a commitment made early in the year to make a trip through New Brunswick on behalf of UNICEF with the National Chairman of the UNICEF Committee, Mrs. Konantz—which trip, as you know, had a tragic end—I was unable to be present when the mover (Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Nichol) of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne spoke in this chamber. However, I have read their speeches and sincerely congratulate them on the excellence of the subject matter. For the same reason I was absent when congratulations were extended to the Clerk of the Senate, Dr. J. F. MacNeill, on the occasion when he received an honorary degree from Acadia University. I take this opportunity to say how pleased I am that Dr. MacNeill's outstanding contributions of many years to the public life of Canada have received this recognition from his Alma Mater.

To the Honourable Senator Grattan O'Leary I extend congratulations on his having received the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws from St. Thomas University in Fredericton, New Brunswick, and also on the very excellent convocation address he made on the occasion. I regret I was unable to attend the Convocation for, although sometimes I do not agree with the subject matter and arguments in Senator O'Leary's speeches in the Senate, I always enjoy them and am enthralled by his manner of presenting them and the limitless literary allusions he can call on to embellish his speeches and make his points. However, from what my friends in Fredericton told me of Senator O'Leary's convocation address, and from what I read of it in the press on that occasion, I would have been in perfect accord with what he said then, for, among other things, he strongly supported the institution of the Senate. He said:

> It is a function of Parliament to prevent bad laws as well as to pass good ones.

He must have done a great deal of research, for according to the press he stated that in the last 40 years the Senate has prevented 289 laws and that in only 34 cases did the House of Commons not finally concur in the Senate's veto.

Senator O'Leary also urged all the members of the graduating class to take a very active part in political life. This is most important and something I myself always urge on young audiences.

Honourable senators, I wish to take this occasion to express a warm welcome to all new senators, and in particular to the Honourable Mary Kinnear, a friend of long standing. I congratulate her on her first speech in this chamber, which showed great interest and understanding of the problems of her province and of Canada.

Contrary to the criticisms made by some senators in this debate regarding the content of the Speech from the Throne, I find the speech most stimulating and I am looking forward to the passing of many acts in this session which will bring about great improvements in our country.

When I decided to speak in this debate I planned to refer to a number of these items, but on further study of the Speech from the Throne I find there are so many matters mentioned for which I would like to express support, that I have decided to reserve my comments until later and make them when the proposed legislation is introduced on each subject. I decided to limit myself to a comment on one statement in the speech. It reads:

> The United Nations remains for Canada a major consideration in foreign policy.

I support this statement wholeheartedly, and I am proud of Canada's contributions to the United Nations and to its agencies such as UNICEF, the World Health Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization, and others.

I have just returned from Montreal where I attended the annual meeting of the United Nations Association in Canada, which is dedicated to the support of the United Nations.

I also attended there the annual meeting of the National UNICEF committee, whose goal is to improve the lot of the children of the world, three-quarters of whom live in conditions which do not hold promise of any worth-while future, unless something is done about it. UNICEF, which is the United Nations Children's Fund, is trying very hard to assure a decent future for those children. Our Government, and the voluntary Canadian UNICEF committee, both give support to this work.

These annual meetings were unusually interesting. I think this was due to the presence of U Thant, the Secretary General of the United Nations. It must have been at great inconvenience that the Secretary General, in the midst of the developments taking place at the United Nations, honoured his long-standing commitment to be speaker at the annual banquet. His having done so was deeply appreciated by the over 500 guests whom he addressed and who gave him a tremendous ovation. He received a tremendous ovation also from the hundreds of people waiting outside the door of the hotel where the banquet took place, hoping to catch sight of him as he left. I was told that he was particularly heartened by his reception in Canada.

At the banquet the Secretary General spoke highly of Canada's dedication to the United Nations over the years and assured us that, despite the apparent failure and what might be described as a lack of punch of the United Nations, the world today would be in a much worse situation if that body, made up of so many nations and supplying a forum where they can communicate with each other, did not exist. In another speech U Thant has said:

> Our task in the United Nations is to bring about a real international democracy and to allay mistrust and fear which is the source of all our problems.

The more I meet people of other countries, especially when I meet them in their own lands, the more I realize that misunderstandings and mistrust do exist and the stronger my belief is that if we could meet more often and understand each other better the causes of war would be eliminated from the world.

Through the United Nations and its various agencies, many interchanges take place that help to break down this mistrust and misunderstanding. The Canadian Parliamentary Association, with which we are all familiar, does much to promote understanding between Commonwealth countries. International organizations such as Rotary, the Kiwanis, the Lions, the International Chamber of Commerce, and organizations with which I am more familiar and more closely associated, such as the International Council of Women, the Associated Country Women of the World, the International Federation of Business and Professional Women, the International Federation of University Women, Zonta International, Soroptimists International and others whose members meet regularly—members from many countries—also do much to break down the barriers of mistrust and misunderstanding.

Today I would like to speak very briefly about another international body of which Canada is a member. I refer to the Inter-parliamentary Union, which held its 55th Conference in Tehran, Iran, in September and October 1966 and which I had the privilege of attending as a delegate from Canada. Iran, or Persia as I had known it in my school days, proved as interesting to me as I had always believed it would. I was fascinated by the many beautiful buildings in Tehran, in the old City of Rayy and in the old capital of Isfahan. I was fascinated too by the dainty, attractive and intelligent women of Iran and the warmth of the welcome from all Iranians to all members of the Inter parliamentary Union.

The press of Tehran devoted tremendous coverage to the meetings and many stories and pictures appeared in the press regarding the delegates and recording the proceedings of the conference. The Canadians certainly received a good share of this recognition. The country seemed to me to follow with more interest the fact that the representatives of 58 nations were meeting in their capital, than the people and press of Canada showed when a meeting of the Interparliamentary Union was held in Ottawa in 1965.

We in Canada are inclined to forget that the Interparliamentary Union is the oldest form of man's attempt to solve the ancient problem of keeping peace on earth. Older than the United Nations, older even than the League of Nations, it was thought of as far back as the latter part of the nineteenth century. War-weary Europe felt the need for an organization whose objective would be to prevent wars and keep peace. The first meeting was held in Paris in 1888 between seven British and 27 French parliamentarians. The idea took fire and the second meeting took place in 1889, with 85 delegates from nine countries. Honourable senators may find it of interest to note that that meeting approved the first formal resolution for disarmament ever passed in the world. This is something which we are inclined to believe was a much more recent idea. Except for interruptions between the two World Wars, the Interparliamentary Union has continued to meet annually.

At the 1966 meeting in Tehran there were 450 delegates from 58 countries, all dedicated to the objectives of the I.P.U., which are to achieve international co-operation and understanding, the development of democratic organizations and lasting peace.

I do not propose to give you any detailed report of the matters discussed at the conference. Many of you are members of the I.P.U. and have read the very excellent report of the conference contained in the annual report of the competent chairman of the Canadian group, Mr. Herman Batten, who led the group to the conference. Others who are interested and wish more detailed information can secure a copy of the report, but I would like to urge members to support this organization by joining it, as we have much more influence at a conference when we can say that we have a large number of members of the organization in our Parliament.

I will merely say that in plenary session some time was given to a political debate, based on what were then recent developments in the international situation. Those supporting opposite sides in their speeches, although forceful in their presentations, rather than indulging in recriminations, looked for possibilities of conciliation and action that could lead towards peace.

Cultural and economic matters were also debated, all of which resulted in the conference adopting unanimously three resolutions. The general tenor of the first resolution is that all parliaments and governments should give their support to agreements that will prevent the increase in the number of states having control over nuclear weapons. The second resolution underlines and supports the necessity of effective measures being taken to accelerate the progress of developing countries and invites all parliaments to give full assistance to the preparations for convening the second conference on trade and development to be held in India in 1967. The third resolution calls attention to the fact that economically less developed countries depend for improvement in their living standards on the practical application of existing scientific and technical knowledge and it recommends the free and complete exchange of technical information across national frontiers.

Two plenary sittings were devoted to the discussion of the role of Parliament in the preparation and control of economic development plans. This I found very interesting, for there was a free exchange of opinions by the supporters of various systems, who could, through this exchange, pool their information, compare the experiences of their countries and describe the success which they considered had been achieved through the methods which they had adopted. Incidentally, if as well we were to assess ourselves in accordance with their opinions, it might be quite enlightening.

I will not take time to describe the work of the committees to which the various members of our delegation were assigned by the leader except to say they were interesting, more informal than the plenary sessions, and gave us an opportunity to associate more freely with delegates from other countries.

I believe that through its meetings from year to year the Interparliamentary Union is making some progress towards its objectives even though, as we know, it has not, in accordance with its aims, been able to eliminate wars.

For some years Canada dropped her membership in the Interparliamentary Union, but I sincerely trust that Canada, with her interest in international relations, will not do this again but will continue to give active support to this organization.

Honourable senators may be interested to know that apart from the formal meetings of the I.P.U., I had some interesting experiences in Iran. One of these, inspired by my membership in the Joint Committee on Penitentiaries, was a visit to a large prison for women. Because of my interest in social work I also visited a fairly recently established and what I thought was an excellent school for social work whose director is a social worker with a world-wide reputation. Six of the graduates of this school were employed as social workers in the women's prison. In view of the fact that at the time of my visit we did not have in Canada even one social worker in our federal prison for women, I did not feel proud of our record in this area when I was asked questions about it.

Because of the interest in Canada in what is being done for retarded children, I, as a member of the Advisory Board of CARE which helps support it, visited the only school for retarded children in Iran. This is a voluntary school. It is not government-supported, but its director is a dedicated woman who has devoted to it a great deal of her own money, who is supported by the members of her family and who also receives some assistance from CARE and similar organizations.

Although the Government and the Shah of Iran are sympathetic towards this work, because of established priorities in what are considered more urgent fields, at the time I visited it, it was not receiving Government support.

I visited also, under the auspices of CARE, an institution referred to as an orphanage where a very wonderful old man, formerly a very wealthy merchant, a devout Moslem by religion, has voluntarily dedicated his life, his time and his fortune to provide a place where 1,200 homeless boys, between the ages of six and fifteen, most of whom have run afoul of the law for minor offences, but who are not necessarily orphans in the sense that we use the word, are being educated and trained so that they will be responsible citizens. This is a practical, individual approach to the problem of juvenile delinquency which has not been tried by any individuals in the Western World so far as I know.

A number of reforms were introduced in Iran in 1963, among which was the emancipation of women. Up to that time women were unable to vote or hold office. Already there are women senators and women members of the Majlis or Lower House. Women's groups have been organized which have become affiliated with international organizations. I had the privilege of being guest speaker and describing the position of women in Canada, at a meeting of the Zonta Club of Tehran, when they entertained for luncheon all members of the Zonta International who were in attendance at the conference. A local Business and Professional Women's Club in Tehran, affiliated with the International Federation, also entertained me.

The Government gives so much support to improving the status of women that, at the invitation of the Government, the UN Commission on the Status of Women was held in Tehran in 1965 and the International Council of Women met in that city in 1966. Neither of these meetings could have been held had they not had the strong support of the Government.

My experiences with the members of these clubs in Iran gave me a much better understanding of the people of that country, whom I admire very much, than I would have received if my contacts had been restricted to attending the formal meetings of the Interparliamentary Union and the delightful social activities provided for the delegates.

I was greatly impressed by the Herculean efforts being made to eliminate illiteracy throughout Iran. Stress is put on this in all walks of life, not only in the schools but in prisons and wherever people are gathered together. Thirty thousand army recruits, who have sufficient education to teach, have been sent to rural areas and to the Nomad tribes. I was also impressed by the agrarian reform introduced and fostered by His Imperial Majesty, the Shah of Iran, through which several thousand peasant families who had never owned a foot of land have been given land of their own and are being taught how to manage it.

The age of the country was impressed on me when we were told that this year they are celebrating the 2500th anniversary of the founding of the Persian Empire. I am as proud as anyone that we in Canada are celebrating our centennial year but compared with Iran we are a very young and inexperienced country.

Before closing I would like to refer to one other avenue through which trust and understanding can be and is being promoted between Canada and other countries. That is, when friendly groups with common interests exchange visits. My own experience of this was during the Easter recess this year when the alumni of the Banff School of Advanced Management and their wives, under the Director of the school, our colleague, the Honourable Donald Cameron, visited a number of cities in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Czechoslovakia, Poland and West Germany. Although I have not attended the Banff School of Advanced Management, I was privileged to accompany the party and I was greatly impressed by the way these representative business people from Canada were welcomed by people in the countries which are carrying on similar enterprises under different systems.

For myself, I learned a great deal from the visit and I think a non-government group like this can do a great deal to dispel incorrect opinions about Canada held by many people in other countries. It also does much to eliminate from the minds of Canadian visitors equally incorrect preconceived notions about other countries.

In many lands there is a feeling that everything said by official groups is inspired by the government policies of their countries. There is not this suspicion of groups travelling on their own and such groups are better able to establish contacts and friendships. This is especially true when the groups are under the leadership of a person who has himself established a reputation in his own country and who inspires confidence, friendship and trust, while at the same time making it clear that he expects friendship, co-operation, trust and respect in return, and who is able to command such a response. Our colleague, Senator Cameron, is the ideal director for such a group and I am sure the trip he directed this year, and the similar trip to China which he directed last year, has done much to advance Canada's relations with the countries visited by these groups.

Honourable senators, I reiterate that despite the difficulties the United Nations has encountered, I believe it is the only hope for the eventual establishment of peace in the world and I trust Canada will continue to support wholeheartedly the UN and its agencies, and other international organizations with similar aims, such as the Interparliamentary Union.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Grosart, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

WESTERN FARMERS MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 6:

Hon. David Walker moved the second reading of Bill S-12, to incorporate Western Farmers Mutual Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, the petitioners are all directors of Western Farmers' Weather Insurance Mutual Company of Woodstock, Ontario, and are mostly active or retired farmers. This company was incorporated under the laws of Ontario in November 1905, with authority limited to the writing of weather insurance. For the past sixty-one years the company has been writing windstorm insurance in western and eastern Ontario, principally on farm buildings which are covered by fire insurance in other companies, with a windstorm policy in this company. The company is very strong financially with a surplus in excess of $3 million and they have been most successful in their operations.

There is no provision in the Ontario act for these farm mutual companies to extend their operations into other lines of insurance. To meet the increasing demand of their customers in the areas served they have decided to apply for federal incorporation with authority to write all lines of insurance, except life. This permits them to extend a full line of insurance coverage to the rural areas which they serve. It is not their intention to extend operations outside the Province of Ontario.

May I add that if this bill receives second reading, and if it then goes, as I think it should, to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, representatives will be present to answer any questions.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Walker, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

FARMERS CENTRAL MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. Walker moved the second reading of Bill S-13, to incorporate Farmers Central Mutual Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall be as brief as I can. In this case the petitioners are all of the directors of Farmers' Central Mutual Fire Insurance Company, which was incorporated as an Ontario company as long ago as March 2, 1894. The company has been engaged in this business for the past 73 years, serving the residents and farmers in a very wide area in the vicinity of the Town of Walkerton, in the County of Bruce. The directors are mostly farmers, or those who have been engaged in farming in the past.

It is a low-cost company and renders a valuable insurance service to the community.

The Ontario act restricts these farm mutual companies to the writing of fire insurance and a limited class of property damage insurance, theft insurance, etc., on those buildings which are covered by a policy of fire insurance. The farmers today need much further insurance coverage, apart entirely from fire insurance, and there is no provision in the Ontario act for a farm mutual company to write these other classes of insurance, as there is no deposit with the Ontario Department of Insurance. Therefore, to meet modern conditions the directors of the company find it necessary to apply for legislation incorporating the dominion company, with the power to write all lines of insurance, except life. The company, however, does not have any intention of extending its operations into any other province.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Is there any connection at all between the directors of the two companies which are the subject matter of Bills S-12 and S-13?

Hon. Mr. Walker: I could not answer that, except to say that the petitioners seem to be different. However, I would be happy to answer that question when the bill reaches, as I hope it will, the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, simply for the purpose of the record, I wonder if at the committee stage the honourable sponsor of the bill will have one point cleared up? I note that both in the case of Bill S-12 and Bill S-13 the activities of the two companies are to be confined to a single province. While I think Parliament can do this, normally it is not a practice that is approved in the Corporations Branch of the Department of the Registrar General, as the honourable sponsor well knows. There may be very good reason for doing this, but I think all honourable senators might like to have the reason for an incorporation by the federal Parliament of a company which is going to restrict its activities to one province.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I will be very happy to answer that question in detail later.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Walker, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

PRINCIPAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Second Reading of Bill S-11, intituled: "An Act respecting Principal Life Insurance Company of Canada".—(Honourable Senator Cameron).

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I am informed that Senator Cameron would like Order No. 5 to stand until Wednesday next, June 14.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable J. R. Cartwright, Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:

> Honourable members of the Senate:
> I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Honourable John R. Cartwright, a Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, his Deputy, to do in His Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by the Clerk.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the royal assent to the following bill:

An Act to amend the Immigration Act.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 12, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, June 12, 1967

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. John J. Connolly tabled:

Order in Council P.C. 1967-1098, dated June 1, 1967, authorizing the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, pursuant to section 21A of the Export Credits Insurance Act, to vary the requirements for repayment of its loans made to the President of India as authorized by Orders in Council P.C. 1963-1761, of November 28, 1963, P.C. 1963-1762, of November 28, 1963 and P.C. 1964-282, of February 20, 1964, pursuant to section 21B of the said Act, chapter 105, R.S.C., 1952, as amended 1960-61. (English text).

PRECEDENCE AND PROTOCOL

INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. What orders in council have been adopted concerning protocol and precedence since that which reversed the order of precedence of the members of the Senate of Canada over the judges?

2. What is the text and the date of that order in council?

3. Has the Government of Canada adopted an order in council to the effect that the names of the Privy Councillors not residing in Canada should not be inserted in the "Guide to Relative Precedence at Ottawa", and if so, what is the text and the date of that order in council?

4. Is the order in council mentioned in the previous question still in effect or has it been abrogated, and in this last alternative, on what date was it abrogated?

Hon. John J. Connolly: I have the answers to the honourable senator's inquiry.

(For text of questions and answers, see Appendix pp. 161-3.)

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

MEETING OF WORKING PARTY AT MALTA

Hon. John J. Connolly rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Meeting of the Working Party appointed by the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association at its Ottawa meeting in September, 1966, which meeting of the Working Party was held in Malta, 20th to 27th May, 1967.

He said: Honourable senators, I had given notice that this evening I would call the attention of the Senate to a meeting of a special committee appointed by the General Council of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association at its meeting in Ottawa in September 1966. I do this for two purposes: first, to inform the Senate of the developments in the work of that committee and, secondly, to inform not only the Canadian branch but also all provincial branches of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association as to what the working party proposes be done.

I do not propose to read the terms of reference specifically because they have all been set out in the proceedings of the conference which was held here last fall. Briefly, the purpose of the working party is to consider the formation of a management committee to provide some element of continuity in the work of the association between annual meetings, to review the aims of the association and its functions, and generally to provide effective management to assist the Secretariat in London between annual meetings.

Frankly, I must say that the committees established by the Constitution of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association have now become unwieldy. Under section 36 a General Council is provided for, and there are now about 60 members on that council. There is also provided a Finance and General Purposes Committee, on which there are now more than 30 members.

It cannot be expected that many parliamentarians would want to meet more than once a year, when the General Council meets at the annual meeting. As a result, some years ago a Salaries and Management Subcommittee of the Finance and General Purposes Committee was established to try to assist the Secretariat and, indeed, the President of the General Council in administering the affairs of the association and in arranging for the annual meeting. In practice, however, the Salaries and Management Subcommittee has met generally in London. Usually the only people who could attend were a few from the United Kingdom branch, and sometimes the Chairman of the General Council; and if any other member of the association from one of the other countries happened to be in London at the time and happened to be a member of the General Council, he was invited to attend.

It has been an impractical proposition. For that reason, in 1965 the Australian federal branch gave notice of a proposal that they would like to see some form of management committee established, small in number but capable of looking after the affairs of the association and, in fact, giving it some purpose and direction. This action was taken in 1966 and approval for a study was authorized. The invitation to hold this meeting was arranged by the two Maltese delegates who came to Ottawa at that time—Dr. Guido DeMarco and Dr. Vincent Moran, one of the government party and the other of the opposition party. The Government of Malta kindly consented to invite the members of the working party to come to Malta in May for this purpose, and meetings were held between May 20 and 27.

Perhaps in the first place I should indicate who was in attendance. The chairman was the Honourable Peter Howson, the Minister of Air for the Commonwealth of Australia. I pay him special tribute for the way in which he conducted these meetings and for the vigorous and initiating attitude that he took while the meetings proceeded.

Also present was the Honourable W. W. Kalema, the Minister of Commerce and Industry of Uganda, and the present chairman of the General Council of the C.P.A. I was there in my capacity as immediate past chairman of the Association.

Mr. Bernard Braine, a Clause 24 Councillor, who, as honourable senators know, was elected for a three-year period, was present, and so too was Mr. Malcolm MacPherson, a Labour member of the British House. I was particularly interested to meet Mr. MacPherson because he had been a professor of English at the University of New Brunswick for some ten years and was a member of the Canadian Army in the last war. He represents one of the Scottish constituencies.

Because of the regretted death of Sir Donald Sangster, the Prime Minister of Jamaica appointed the Honourable Roy McNeill, the Minister of Home Affairs, to represent Jamaica. From Trinidad and Tobago we had Senator the Honourable J. H. Maurice, the president of the Senate, and in the absence of Dr. the Honourable Lim Swee Aun, the Minister of Industry and Commerce of Malaysia, we had as his deputy Dr. Ng Kam Poh, J.P., M.P., Assistant Minister of Finance.

From Kenya we had the Honourable Ronald G. Ngala, M.P., Minister of Co-operatives and Social Services. Mr. Ngala is also a Clause 24 Councillor. He was elected for a three-year period at the Ottawa meeting. He is one of the very experienced people from the African states.

Honourable senators will also remember the impressive contribution made to the Ottawa meeting by Dr. N. M. Perera from Ceylon. He was also present.

In addition to the two Maltese representatives at the Ottawa meeting, Dr. Guido DeMarco and Dr. Vincent Moran were in attendance.

Unfortunately, because of parliamentary business in India, it was not possible for the Indian branch to send a delegate. This I regret, because the contribution that the Indians make to the deliberations of Commonwealth organizations is very great indeed. They will, of course, be completely informed about the developments that took place.

In addition to these official delegates, we had from the Central Office the invaluable Mr. Robin Vanderfelt, Secretary-General; Mr. Ian Grey, Editor of Publications; Mr. L. M. Fowler, the Finance Officer; and Miss Betty May, Personal Assistant to the Secretary-General.

The first day we were there we had some formal opening ceremonies. We were welcomed in the magnificent Tapestry Chamber, which is the home of the Maltese House of Representatives, in a felicitous speech by the Speaker of the House, Dr. A. Bonnici. I wish I could describe to honourable senators the magnificence of the tapestries that were put there by the knights 250 years ago, and which still display all their brilliance of colour and imagination. The same can be said of the tapestries in the Conventual Church, the Co-Cathedral of St. John, which is in the City of Valetta.

We were received by His Excellency, Sir Maurice Dorman the Governor General of Malta. He has a connection with Canada because in his early days before he joined the Foreign Service of Great Britain he worked with the Grenfell Missions in Labrador.

The Prime Minister, Dr. G. Borg Olivier, spent considerable time with us. He was present at the opening ceremony, and he received the delegation a little later when he spoke about relations between Malta and various other parts of the Commonwealth.

There are 300,000 people who live on the island of Malta, and there are 300,000 Maltese living in Australia. Seventy eight Maltese families left very early in June to come to this country, where there is already a considerable Maltese population. These seventy eight families are going to live in western Canada, in the area of Winnipeg.

We were also received most graciously by the Bishop of Malta, the Most Reverend Michael Gonzi, an energetic, affable man of at least eighty summers. He was on his way to a reception and so did not spend much time with us, but he certainly impressed us all with the vigour and force of his personality.

I cannot speak too highly of the hospitality that we enjoyed there, not only at the hands of the officials but of many of the Maltese people. Perhaps I should add that Dr. de Marco and Dr. Moran were not only hospitable but efficient and helpful. Mr. Louis Tortell, the Clerk of the Representative Assembly, who was known to many of us, was the acme of efficiency in connection with the meetings.

Now, I want to indicate to honourable senators some of the decisions which were taken at the meeting. I do this not only for the information of the Senate and those members who are particularly interested in the work of the C.P.A., but especially because of the concern that should be felt in the federal branch in Canada and in all provincial branches. I propose, therefore, that the Debates of the Senate which contain my remarks this evening be transmitted to the provincial branches as well as the federal branch in the way of a report so that they will know what to expect when their delegates go to Uganda next fall.

The working party recommended, among other things, that plenary conferences of the association should continue to be held on an annual basis, that where practicable annual conferences should alternate between branches in large and then in small countries. The possibility of branches within a region acting jointly as hosts, where appropriate, should be considered.

The working party also considered that a period of about seven days for a conference would be appropriate, that up to 14 days for tours might be a suitable length of time for large host countries, and up to seven days for tours in smaller host countries, and that these should be guidelines for the future.

The working party also recommended that the present arrangement of regional and area conferences should be endorsed and broadened if possible by the inclusion of more observers from branches in nearby countries.

Honourable senators know that the Senate, indeed, the Parliament of Canada, was ably represented by our friend Senator Grosart at a regional conference in the Caribbean quite recently. This kind of regional meeting for Commonwealth work, in my view, is invaluable to the association at large.

I do not say that we should be going to regional conferences such as the Caribbean to tell them how they should act. That is not our wish at all. However, some of the problems which occur in these regions and the approaches of the people to the general problems of the Commonwealth, are, I think, much more readily understood by attendance, not only at the annual meetings where everyone is present, but at the regional meetings themselves. I was delighted to learn that Senator Grosart, accompanied by Mr. Cashin from the other place, was able to attend that particular regional conference. I am sure the Senate will be glad to hear that the working party endorsed a proposal that these regional conferences be given a great deal of attention and that much importance should be attached to them.

I turn now to what is really the central recommendation, in which the working party recommended the appointment of an executive committee of the General Council, consisting of not less than 12 and not more than 15 members to manage the affairs of the association between annual meetings. The membership of the Executive Committee would consist, first of all, of four persons ex officio —1, the Chairman of the General Council; 2, the Vice-Chairman of the General Council; 3, the immediate past Chairman of the General Council; 4, the Honorary Treasurer. In addition to those four, it is recommended that there should be a Chairman of the Executive Committee, who should be elected by the General Council for a term of three years. This is to provide an element of continuity, giving that continuing experience which can be invaluable to the work of the C.P.A.

In addition to that officer holding office for three years, it was recommended that, for the time being, at least, the three clause 24 councillors, whose term of office is three years —each year one goes out of office and another is elected—should at the moment be continued, although this may not be continued indefinitely.

It has been proposed that, for the practical purposes of this executive committee, the Commonwealth should be divided into seven regions: the United Kindgdom and the Mediterranean; Canada and the North Atlantic; the West Indies, Central and South American mainland; Australasia; Southeast Asia; Asia; and Africa.

It was recommended that from each of these regions there should be selected a member to work on the Executive Committee, ultimately for a period of three years but in the first instance two should be elected for one year, two for two years, and three for three years. It is proposed that, when a permanent or temporary vacancy occurs, the branch which "owns" the member who is no longer able to serve shall be entitled to fill the vacancy.

Members elected to the Executive Committee, it is proposed, need not be members of the General Council when they are elected, although once they are elected they immediately become members of the council. Members elected to the Executive Committee may be drawn from all types of branches, excluding subsidiary branches.

It was also felt that costs of fares of members attending meetings of the Executive Committee should be met from the funds of the association, and the cost of accommodation should also be met from this source, although it was noted that host branches might, following the generous precedent set by Malta, be prepared to pay living expenses or to contribute to them.

In addition to making that proposal for an executive committee constituted in that way, there were rather elaborate terms of reference proposed to be given to the Executive Committee, to deal with such matters as preconference tours, conference agenda, arrangements for the meeting, venues of various meetings in the future, parliamentary courses, and all the other matters in which the C.P.A. interests itself.

Honourable senators, I do not propose to put down on the record of Hansard tonight the details of these terms of reference, because they will be given in detail at the next annual meeting of the federal branch, which is held here in Canada. However, I can summarize them by saying that, generally speaking, it is intended that the Executive Committee should have as its province the management, between annual meetings, of the necessary work of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

Honourable senators, we reviewed, with great care the finances of the association. We had some fine financial documents prepared for us by the Executive Secretary General's office in London. There is no doubt that the increasing load of work done by the C.P.A. will cost more as time goes on and it will not be long before the member countries will be asked to make additional contributions.

In this connection, while the United Kingdom's contribution to the central fund at the present time is some £18,500 per annum, the United Kingdom branch actually spends some £55,000 per annum to further work in the Commonwealth, in addition to what they contribute to the central office. Canada's contribution is some $20,000, and inevitably this will have to be increased.

The United Kingdom had to cut back on their expenses, although they told me that they have been able to do this without cutting down on any of their activities, due principally to a decision to require their delegates to travel to the various meetings by economy fare rather than first-class fare. This means a large saving in the long trips required to attend these meetings.

In addition to this, the working party dealt with the Speakers Conferences, which are held at the same time as the annual meetings; the conference of Clerks at the Table, which are held also at the time of the annual meetings; and with the publications, which are issued now by the Secretary General's office. Some of the existing publications were thought by some to be superfluous; ideas were expressed about changing the format of others; and there were suggestions as to the introduction of new types of publications.

I leave the detail of that to the report which is made to the general meetings of the C.P.A., both of the federal and the provincial branches.

Honourable senators, I feel I should say something about the forthcoming annual meeting to be held in Uganda. The delegates are expected to arrive there on October 14 and 15. A tour of Uganda will take place between October 18 and 24, both dates inclusive. The conference proper will be held in Kampala from October 25 to November 1. The delegates will be accommodated at the Apollo Hotel, which is a new building. The temperature at that time will be about 70 degrees fahrenheit in Uganda.

Following the conference it is expected that Tanzania will invite up to perhaps 120 delegates to visit that country. Kenya has already indicated that it would welcome a tour of its country by about 80 of the delegates.

As has been the practice in the past, there will be representation from the Congress of the United States. Those representatives take part now not only in the debate on foreign affairs but also in the work of the committees. This latter work they did for the first time at the Ottawa meeting.

It is also suggested that the Francophone countries, which are becoming organized now somewhat along the lines of the Commonwealth organizations, should be invited at some early future meeting to send observers. Personally, I think there might be some value in the General Council considering an invitation to observers from the Organization of American States at some time.

I should tell honourable senators, for the record, about the agenda at the Kampala meeting. On Thursday, October 26, the opening ceremonies will take place in the afternoon. On Friday, October 27, the subject of international affairs will be discussed. In the morning the topic will be "Africa in World Affairs." In the afternoon the topic will be "World Peace," and if necessary the discussions will continue that evening. On Saturday, October 28, the first committee meeting will be held. It will deal with aid to developing countries under the following heads: (1) Investment in Developing Countries of the Commonwealth; (2) Scientific Research and Development Services; (3) Food resources and the Population Increase.

The second committee which will sit concurrently with the first will deal with parliamentary institutions under three headings: (1) Erosion of Parliamentary Authority by the Executive and through Subordinate Legislation; (2) The Breakdown of Parliamentary Institutions in Part of the Commonwealth; (3) The Position of the Press in a Parliamentary Democracy.

On Monday, October 30, the conference will discuss in plenary session the Commonwealth and the European Economic Community. On Tuesday, October 31, that discussion will continue. On Wednesday, November 1, the general meeting of the association will be held, the committee reports will be made, and the conference will adjourn.

I am happy also to inform the Senate that an invitation has been received from the Government of the Bahamas to hold the 1968 annual meeting in that country.

I should conclude by saying that without interfering with the foreign policy of any of the member governments, I think Commonwealth parliamentarians, both ministers and backbenchers, are now getting to the point where they feel that where parliamentary institutions are weakening or where indeed, as in some cases, they have disappeared, that they should be in a position to try to influence the trend which weakens these institutions, in the interests not only of the Commonwealth but also of the countries concerned. It was even suggested that some consideration should be given to the establishment of teams of backbenchers from various countries of the Commonwealth to step in in cases of Commonwealth emergencies to see if they could help Commonwealth governments in promoting the aims and objectives not only of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association but of the institution of Parliament itself.

All the recommendations which were made by the working party are subject, of course, to approval by the General Council. The working party is no more than an instrument of the General Council to review these general problems on its behalf and to make a report in Kampala. That will be done.

I hope my remarks this evening have not been too tedious or too long and that they will be helpful to the Canadian delegation not only from the federal house but as well from the various provincial houses.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I would like to ask a question, perhaps an insignificant one, of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Supposing that before the conference takes place, or even afterwards, Great Britain succeeds in joining the European Economic Community, what will be the position of the countries of the British family and especially the economic position of our own country?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Well, the question, as the honourable senator has indicated, is theoretical. Perhaps between now and the time of the meeting in Kampala the entry of Britain into the European Economic Community will not have been brought about. I should add, however, that the working party felt it imperative that this very question should be discussed by the countries concerned. Certainly there is concern, particularly on the part of New Zealand, and perhaps to a lesser extent on the part of Australia, but almost every Commonwealth country is affected one way or another. I received the general impression—and I hope I am able to reflect it correctly in fairness to the people who attended the meeting—that while perhaps there might be serious difficulties in the initial stages if Great Britain should succeed in entering Europe, as the phrase has it, in time it will be of great economic benefit generally, not only to Britain but to Europe and the Commonwealth.

There is much more that could be said on this mater, but obviously I cannot give a definite answer to it. Each country will have its own approach; each country will have its own problems to consider in the light of the disappearance either in whole or in part of what were originally known as the Empire preferences and are now known as the Commonwealth preferences. This is a difficult question. I think I can say no more than that at this time.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce Nos. 2 to 128, inclusive, which were presented on Wednesday, June 7.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, reports adopted.

Resolution 122, for the relief of Fernand Dion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these resolutions be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I am not sure what the program is for the next few days. I suppose I should have asked some questions about it. In view of the doubt I would move that these resolutions be taken into consideration tomorrow.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved the second reading of Bill C-106, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the important provisions of Bill C-106, being an act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, are comparatively simple.

First, it is provided that the minister responsible to Parliament for the Canadian Wheat Board shall be such member of the Queen's Privy Council as may be designated from time to time by the Governor in Council.

Secondly, and certainly the most important aspect of the bill, the powers of the Canadian Wheat Board, which would otherwise expire on August 1, 1967, shall become permanent.

Honourable senators, it is significant and perhaps historical that the Senate should be taking such a step tonight, for it was exactly 50 years ago yesterday that the Government of the day determined that control of distribution and price of grain was a necessity. On June 11, 1917, the Board of Grain Supervisors was created by order in council and granted powers to fix the selling price and to determine the destination and movement of grain.

The Board thus established handled the 1917 and the 1918 crops, which resulted for the first time in producers receiving uniform prices and being relieved of the uncertainty of marketing dates, conditions and other pertinent problems they had experienced prior to this date. Western producers in these two years, 1917 and 1918, were completely satisfied with this new method of marketing grain, and there was strong opinion prevalent in western Canada favouring continued government control of the marketing of grain.

By order in council of July 31, 1919, the Canadian Wheat Board was created for the purpose of both handling and marketing the 1919 wheat crop. The first Canadian Wheat Board and its predecessor, the Board of Grain Supervisors, demonstrated to producers at that time a method of marketing whereby the growers were paid not on the basis of current market prices at the time of delivery, but on the basis of average returns realized over the entire crop year. This stability of price and marketing conditions greatly impressed the farmers, and they have since looked with favour on government control of marketing grain.

Few voices questioned the success of the marketing operations during 1917, 1918 and 1919. As I have said, western producers strongly supported and endorsed the boards through their various farm organizations.

In 1920 the Canadian Council of Agriculture petitioned the federal Government to continue this system of board marketing beyond 1919. Concerted efforts by organized farmers in western Canada were, however, unsuccessful in convincing the Government of the continued need for the Canadian Wheat Board. The Government announced on July 15, 1920 the Board would not function in so far as the 1920 crop was concerned, and the marketing of grain reverted to the Grain Exchange on August 15, 1920.

Throughout the following years, until 1935, producers undertook to form wheat pools in the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, with the orderly marketing of grain as their objective. The undertaking of the pools was seriously curtailed and impaired by the world wide depression of 1929 and 1930. However, throughout these years they did give unstinting service in the interests of producer co-operation. More important, I think, throughout this period they maintained the idea of crop pooling, as originated by the first two wheat boards.

The Canadian Wheat Board as we know it today, and the security it offers to western Canada, is in a real sense an achievement of the wheat pools.

Finally, in 1935, after many years of agitation by western producers and many appeals to parliamentarians, the Canadian Wheat Board was again created as a federal regulatory agency responsible for:

> ...marketing in an orderly manner, in inter-provincial and export trade, grain grown in Canada.

In 1943, by order in council, the board was granted monopoly power. This authority has had to be renewed periodically, usually every five years.

Honourable senators, I bring to your attention these historical facts by way of explanation as to why we have the Wheat Board today and, perhaps, to show how deeply rooted it has become over a long period of history in the western provinces.

In the years since 1935, notwithstanding periods of stress and difficulty, the Wheat Board has served the farmers and the nation well. It has earned the deep and abiding faith, trust and confidence of western producers.

In this regard, I can do no better than quote to you an opinion expressed by Dr. Gordon P. Boals in the American Economic Review of March, 1953. He said:

> Few government organizations anywhere, especially of the size and volume of business handled, can point to a longer untarnished record than the Canadian Wheat Board.

The record of this government agency in the ensuing years would enhance and in no way deter the enthusiasm expressed by Dr. Boals for the Wheat Board. During this period, it has continued to perform its allotted task of selling wheat, oats and barley delivered by western producers on the markets of the world at the best attainable prices.

As a result of its operations, assisted by government leadership, the marketing of grain during the last four years has been at unprecedented levels. Wheat today represents our No. 1 earner of foreign exchange. Western Canada farmers have accordingly realized record farm incomes.

According to the board records and current crop estimates, Canada will have exported in the last four crop-years over 2.1 billion bushels of wheat and wheat flour at an average price of $2.06 per bushel, No. 1 Northern, basis Fort William; that is, 2.1 billion bushels during the last four years, as compared to 1.3 billion bushels during the previous four years, at $1.80 a bushel.

In the present crop year ending July 31, it is estimated that exports will total 525 million bushels at an average price of $2.12 per bushel for No. 1 Northern, basis Fort William. When the current 1966-67 pool is closed and determined on July 31, 1967, I suggest that western producers have every expectation of a record final payment. It will mean a total realized payment of over $2 per bushel for No. 1 Northern wheat, basis Fort William.

The board has been able to establish this impressive record by reason of its sales efforts in three areas of activity. Firstly, it has filled the continuing needs of our traditional markets, and I might say that these markets are the first consideration of the board at all times. They make certain they are able to fill the requirements of our traditional markets before embarking on long-term sales to other nations.

Secondly, there are the exports to the Sino-Soviet countries, which today take nearly 50 per cent of our export wheat. Since 1963 eleven agreements with seven countries have been signed in this area of endeavour.

Finally, under the Government's food aid program, Canadian grain is presently being exported to nearly 100 countries of the world. In exporting to the Sino-Soviet countries it is necessary to extend credit terms under the Canadian Wheat Board Act or the Export Credits Insurance Act. These transactions have been made possible by the Government's assuming credit risks which today amount to $500 million, as compared with $200 million in 1962. In the food aid program the allocation of funds for food in the form of wheat and flour has increased from $4.5 million in the fiscal year 1962-63, to $100 million in the last fiscal year.

In negotiating the recent three-year international wheat agreement the Canadian delegation, led by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture, and assisted by Wheat Board officials and representatives of farm organizations, played a key and central role in finalizing the agreement which, in turn, provided a higher price range for our wheat. This was a significant, and certainly an important, accomplishment for those directly involved in the production of wheat, because it permitted the Minister of Trade and Commerce to announce subsequently an increase of 20 cents per bushel to $1.70 as the initial payment for wheat marketed in the coming crop year.

Honourable senators, the Canadian Wheat Board since 1935, in good years and in bad, with surpluses and shortages, and in war and peace, has been the greatest single stabilizing factor in the economy of Canada. The impact of its operations is keenly felt in every Canadian farm family, if not every Canadian family. It is accepted as an important and integral part of the agricultural community of western Canada, and by the grain trading circles of the world. It is, therefore, the decision of the Government to give permanence to legislation covering the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board. I recommend to you Bill C-106, being an Act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, for second reading.

In summary, the bill provides as follows:

1. The Governor in Council shall designate the minister responsible to Parliament for the operations of the board as provided in clause 1.

2. The powers of the Canadian Wheat Board which would otherwise expire on August 1, 1967, shall be permanent by the repeal of sections 23 and 24, and an amendment to section 31, as provided in clauses 2, 3 and 4.

Finally, clause 5 amends the schedule of mills and feed warehouses in existence as March 1, 1967.

Honourable senators, as I have stated, the Canadian Wheat Board, through good years and through bad, has played a very important and ever increasing part in the agriculture of western Canada. It is certainly regarded as a permanent feature by the producers of western Canada. Therefore, I recommend to you the reading of this bill the second time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, debate adjourned.

DIVORCE

NOTICE OF MEETING OF JOINT COMMITTEE

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I have on my desk a notice that a meeting of the Special Joint Committee on Divorce will be held in camera at 10.30 tomorrow morning.

I should inform the house that at last, after a great many technical difficulties, copies of the report passed by the steering committee are now at hand. I had hoped to place this report in the hands of the members of the committee on Thursday last when the organizational meeting was held, but I was disappointed in that. I hasten to add that this was not because of any fault of the printing establishment; they are really splendid workers, but they ran into some technical difficulties. I had hoped to distribute copies of the report on Friday, but again I was disappointed. However, at 6 o'clock this evening I received the necessary 50 copies, and they are now being worked on upstairs and will be ready tomorrow morning.

I should like to emphasize the importance of the meeting tomorrow. Honourable senators will recollect that the matter of divorce has been the special province of this chamber since Confederation, and I might say that the people of Canada look to the Senate for leadership in this field. The report in question which, as I say, has been passed by the steering committee, is the culmination of one solid year of work, in the course of which the committee held 24 open meetings in which it heard from some 70 witnesses. A very large number of briefs and a tremendous amount of information has been given to us. The report is the culmination of this one year of work, and of all the very great and very valuable assistance that we have received.

The meeting tomorrow morning is in camera, and I do trust that all those honourable senators who are members of the committee, and who find it possible, will attend.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Why not give their names?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, I shall name them.

Senator Aseltine unfortunately will not be present. I understand that very shortly he will be leaving hospital to return to his home. We shall miss him sorely, because for 10 years he was Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce prior to my appointment some 13 or 14 years ago. Senator Baird is here and I am sure he will attend the meeting—no one is more faithful than he. Senator Belisle is also here. I understand that Senator Burchill will be present if he can arrange a flight in time. I expect that Senators Connolly (Halifax North), Croll, Denis, Fergusson and Flynn will be present. I have not seen Senator Gershaw or Senator Haig but I am sure they will be here, and of course I shall be there.

Honourable senators, I apologise for taking your time over a routine matter of this kind but I insist that the subject matter is of very great importance, since it will affect the lives of thousands of our fellow citizens. I trust therefore that as many as possible from this chamber will be present at 10.30 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

PARLIAMENTARY PUBLICATIONS

DELAY IN FRENCH TRANSLATION—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: I rise on more than 40 questions of privilege. According to the Constitution, both the English and French languages are official and the publications issued by the Parliament of Canada shall be published in both languages. I cannot understand the delay in providing French translations.

I have put together the French reports of committees which I have received at various intervals from May 31. On May 31 I received the French translation of the following committees: the ARDA committee sittings of April 25 and April 27; the Transport and Communications Committee of the Commons of April 25; Public Accounts Committee of the Commons of April 20; Transport and Communications Committee of the Commons of April 11; Public Accounts Committee of the Commons of April 13; Banking and Commerce Committee of the Senate of March 22; Banking and Commerce Committee of the Senate, March 20; External Relations Committee of the Senate, March 15; Joint Immigration Committee of the Senate and the Commons of February 23 and 24, and March 2; Public Accounts Committee of the Commons, February 14, 16 and 23; Private Bills Committee of the Commons, February 14, 23 and March 2; Immigration Committee of the Commons, February 22.

All those committee reports, from February 22 until April 25, were received on May 31.

On June 1, I received the French translation of the proceedings of the following committees: the External Affairs Committee of the Commons of April 11; and the Joint Committee on Immigration of March 20.

On June 3, I received the Orders of the Day of the House of Commons of the previous day in French. It came one day too late. This was an exception, but it is to be noted.

On the same day, June 3, I received, in French, the proceedings of the following committees: the Joint Committee on Immigration of April 13; the Committee on External Affairs of the Commons of April 13; the Joint Committee on Immigration, April 11; the Joint Committee on Penitentiaries, April 6; the Joint Committee on the Public Service, March 14; and the Joint Committee on Immigration of March 13 and 14.

On June 5, I received the French translations of the following: External Affairs Committee of the Commons of April 20; the Justice Committee of the Commons of April 18, and the Joint Committee on Immigration, March 16.

On June 6, I received the proceedings in English of the following committees: The ARDA Committee of the Commons of June 1—which was not so bad; the External Affairs Committee of the Commons of May 30; the Committee of Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of the Commons of May 30.

Also on June 6, I received in French the following proceedings: the Joint Committee on Immigration of May 8; the Finance Committee of the Senate of April 26; the Banking and Commerce Committee of the Senate of April 20; the Joint Committee on Immigration of April 18; and the Justice Committee of the Commons, April 11.

On June 7, I received the External Affairs Committee report of the Commons in French for May 30; the Finance Committee of the Commons of May 30; the Committee on Immigration and Labour of the Senate of March 16, 1967, and of June 16, 1966—that one was a year late.

Honourable senators, I wonder if you are impressed. However, I shall have a word or two to say afterwards.

On June 8, I received the translation of the Veteran Affairs Committee report of June 6, 1967—which shows that when they want to do something, it can be done.

On June 9, I received the report of the ARDA Committee of June 1, and of the Public Accounts Committee of April 25.

Yesterday I received the report of the Housing Committee of June 8, which was very good. It was in English. I received the French translation of the report on the very same date—that is excellent. Yesterday also I received the Senate Banking and Commerce Committee report of April 26; the Justice Committee report of the Commons of April 13; the report of the Joint Committee on Immigration of March 21, and the reports on the Joint Committee on Divorce of February 7, 14 and 16.

Honourable senators, the two languages are official, and as the French reports are needed for those who are not familiar with the English language I have come to the conclusion that it would be necessary for a parliamentarian to be familiar with both languages to make any use of the committee reports. To speak in plain English, translations which come so late might be a fine gesture, but they are absolutely useless and a waste of money.

I want to bring this to the attention of the Government. I have spoken about it, and we have been told that a correction would be made, that translations would be done even in Montreal. However, this shows that the translation of the committee reports in French is for the most part unsatisfactory. The thing to do is to publish the reports on time, or save money by curtailing the publication of reports which come too late to be of any use.

HON. MARIANA BEAUCHAMP JODOIN

INVITATION TO UNVEILING OF BRONZE LIKENESS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before calling the Orders of the Day I would like to put on record a reference to the ceremony mentioned by the Government Leader (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West).

Tomorrow, June 14 at 5.30 p.m., the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, Prime Minister of Canada, will unveil a bronze likeness of the Honourable Mariana Beauchamp Jodoin, a former member of the Senate, in the Senate antechamber. Madame Jodoin and some members of her family will be guests at that time, and I would urge that all senators make a special effort to attend the ceremony, which will be followed by a small reception in the Speaker's chambers.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hastings for the second reading of Bill C-106, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, before dealing with this bill, I wish to congratulate my honourable colleague, Senator Hastings, on the fine explanation which he gave when moving the second reading. He did a worthwhile job, and most honourable senators now have a better idea of the act and what it has done for western Canada. There are, however, some points which he might have brought in and which I should like to mention.

The farmers in the West will be very pleased to know that the Canadian Wheat Board will be a permanent institution, no longer subject to being reconstituted every five years.

It seems ironic that it is the party which was strongly opposed over the years, especially in their eastern section, to the Canadian Wheat Board, is the party which has had to bring in this bill and finally make the Wheat Board a permanent organization.

This act was originally introduced in 1935. There were attempts to build up a wheat board as far back as 1917, as the honourable Senator Hastings said, when during the First World War the Government set up a board, which really was not a wheat board as we know it today but a board to handle the wheat of western Canada. This board was under a man named McFarland who came from the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. He did a very fine job as to price during the First World War, as far as the farmers were concerned. I must say that the price at that time was very much higher than the price during the Second World War. I remember that in 1919, the year after the war, the price was something like $2.48 a bushel for No. 1 Northern.

That board was discontinued in 1920. In the election in the following year, we in western Canada were asked to vote for Mr. Motherwell, then Minister of Agriculture. We were asked to vote for him and a wheat board. He was elected but could not do anything along the line of setting up a wheat board because of opposition in the east. The price of wheat in 1921 dropped substantially. During the 1920s the farmers became restless and decided the only thing to do was to form a pool or co-operative of all the farmers and attempt by force or persuasion to bring in a wheat board along the lines of that in use during the First World War.

In those days, it was not a case of being unable to sell wheat: the problem was to maintain our price. I well remember that in 1928 we had an excellent crop—it was low-grade, of course—but most of it, 500 million bushels or a little better, was disposed of by the grain trade without much difficulty. We boast today about our 500 million bushels, but this amount was sold in 1928.

In 1929, due to the financial embargoes throughout the world, the price dropped from $1.60 or better very rapidly until it hit a low of around 90 cents. In the 1930s the West was suffering from drought, and the price fell still further until it reached a low in Saskatchewan of about 40 cents a bushel.

The wheat pool in Saskatchewan ran into financial difficulties at that time because they had guaranteed or given out a minimum or first payment to the farmers, which was more than what the market warranted. The Government of Saskatchewan at that time advanced about $10 million to save the wheat pool.

This was at a time when we had a Conservative Government. Right Honourable R. B. Bennett could see the problem and decided that the only thing to do was to form a wheat board, which the farmers had been crying for for almost two decades, and so remove some of the vicious gambling that was upsetting to the farmers. Mind you, many of the farmers were themselves gamblers in the wheat market. Mr. Bennett brought in a wheat board act in 1935. However, the next government, which had the problem of carrying out the provisions of the act, allowed some to sell their grain outside the board. Those who remained with the board received the low price of 87½ cents as an initial payment, and nothing further was paid beyond that initial payment in 1936-37, while those who sold their grain outside the board received as high as $1.40 a bushel.

Things apparently drifted along for the rest of the thirties and on through the war period when the federal Government again undertook to control the sale and price of wheat, with the result that the farmers took a loss of, some say, as high as $600 million during the war years from the sale of their wheat. Since that time the Wheat Board has been functioning and has been growing stronger every year.

Finally, in 1956 after a series of good crops, a surplus began to build up, so much so that farmers had piles of wheat on their farms, and grain companies had piles of wheat outside their elevators, with no storage space available for it.

In 1961, under the former Minister of Agriculture, the Wheat Board got permission to close a deal on a credit basis with mainland China. Honourable senators will remember that this same minister took a great deal of ribbing in both houses because he would not produce the agreement made with China, and he was laughed at because the Opposition felt that he had made a deal which would show a great loss to this country, as they believed the Chinese would never live up to the terms of their agreement. However, to date, they have carried out meticulously the terms of their deal, and have gone on to buy a great deal more wheat from our Wheat Board.

So, honourable senators, the Wheat Board has finally proved itself as the greatest marketing agency that has been brought forward for farm products, which include wheat, oats and barley. Some day I hope that the farmers of eastern Canada will be able to build a board of a similar nature to aid them in the marketing of their produce.

On page 2 of Bill C-106, honourable senators will see a schedule of grain handling bodies authorized to handle grain for the Wheat Board. Under the schedule you will notice the lists of flour mills in Manitoba, the seed cleaning mills and the feed mills and feed warehouses. On page 4 you will see the same information for Saskatchewan, and on page 6 for Alberta.

It is interesting to note, in referring back to the schedule in the act of 1935, there has been quite a change not only in the names of a great many of these flour mills but also in the numbers of seed cleaning and feed mills. In the Province of Manitoba, for instance, in 1935 there were 25 flour mills; there are now seven. In 1935 there were four seed cleaning plants; now there are 68. In 1935 there were 37 feed mills; now there are 64. In the Province of Saskatchewan similar changes have taken place. In 1935 there were 30 flour mills; now there are eight; there were two seed cleaning mills, now there are 34; there were 21 feed mills and now there are 29. Alberta shows a greater change. There were 40 flour mills in 1935; now there are nine; there were eight seed cleaning mills, now there are 39; in the feed mills and warehouses there were 49, and now there are 194.

With regard to the flour mills there used to be what we called grist mills in many of the small towns. As farm transportation got better and farmers were able to travel further, these mills became fewer. Now most of them have gone out of business and we have only the large flour mills in the main centres of each province. The striking thing to me is the large number of seed cleaning plants that have been built up, which shows that the farmers are very conscious of keeping their seed as pure as possible, in order to obtain a higher yield by eradicating the weeds. With regard to feed mills and warehouses, it indicates the tremendous build-up of herds of cattle, hogs, etc., on the Prairies, particularly in Alberta. Even in British Columbia we now have four mills and feed warehouses and three seed cleaning mills. These, of course, are up in the Peace River area.

I have mentioned the foregoing, honourable senators, to draw your attention to the changes in the schedule which graphically show the changes taking place in the western provinces. I wholeheartedly support this bill.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, the bill now before us will undoubtedly be given unanimous approval which it has already received in the other place. The Canadian Wheat Board has had a long and varied history, but one thing that has been consistent throughout the years is the support of farm organizations for this method of handling western grain. I would suggest that while various political parties may from time to time have taken somewhat different attitudes to the Canadian Wheat Board, today the board enjoys the support not only of all farm organizations but of all political parties. Therefore, it would seem to me that this kind of measure, and the Canadian Wheat Board itself, is very much above politics and day-to-day political strife. Certainly that is the way it should be.

This measure has been asked for by farm organizations for a long time, and I think it is in keeping with the general situation in Canada that the Canadian Wheat Board should be made a permanent institution by this measure. The board has proven itself, and there is certainly no need to have it inferred, as it might be, that there is any possibility at all of the board being dropped at the end of any given five-year period.

The Canadian Wheat Board has sometimes been called a socialist organization. It has sometimes been held up to ridicule by political parties, and there are still some active politicians in the country today who have made rather disparaging remarks about it in the past. Nevertheless, I think that the development of the Canadian Wheat Board has brought about, at least in this area, an excellent balance between Government initiative, producers' initiative and private initiative.

The board itself is independent. It was established by Parliament, but it has been made the agent of the producers. The function of the board is not to operate in any sense as an agent of the Government, but as an agent of the producers, and they very much wish to keep it this way.

As a producers' board, it operates from the moneys taken from the grain sold on behalf of the producers, and although it is a well-known fact among people who understand its operation, there is still a feeling abroad that the Canadian Wheat Board is somehow or other financed by the Government of Canada. Nothing could be further from the truth. Every single item of cost of the Canadian Wheat Board—with the possible exception, if one might add the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, which pays certain storage costs when grain is in a surplus position—is paid for by the producers themselves, including the administrative costs of the board, the cost of buildings, postage, salaries and even the pension of retired members of the board.

It is an exceedingly efficient operation. The total administrative cost of the Canadian Wheat Board is less than two-thirds of a cent per bushel of wheat the board handles, and if you could wipe out the Wheat Board tomorrow and bring in some organization that would function at no cost, the total saving would be only two-thirds of a cent a bushel. So, as I say, it is an exceedingly efficient organization, and farmers are pleased to pay this two-thirds of a cent in order to ensure that it is their marketing board and that it will remain independent.

I said it is a kind of combination of Government and private initiative, in that a vast part of the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board is carried on by the grain trade itself, which is composed of co-operative and private organizations. Even in the day-to-day selling of Canadian wheat, my understanding is that at least in the majority of instances almost all, if not all, of the actual selling is done by the elevator companies and the grain organizations themselves. In other words, the private trade is out hunting for world markets and is making the actual arrangements for particular sales. Even with some of the Iron Curtain countries, to my personal knowledge, there has been an important initiative taken from time to time by private grain trade in bringing about certain sales of grain to some of these countries. So, I think it is a very useful combination of Government initiative, of a board functioning in the interests of the producer and receiving the active assistance and support of the grain trade, the private grain trade and the co-operative elevator companies.

There are some quite optimistic features of the present grain situation. First of all, some real optimism has been generated by the new cereals agreement. It means, at least as far as the floor and ceiling is concerned, they are trending in the right direction—an improvement in the floor price and an improvement in the ceiling price. Prices, of course, will range between the floor and the ceiling and, therefore, the actual price that may be obtained from time to time is certainly unknown, but it will range between $1.98 per bushel No. 1 Northern, basis Fort William, and $2.38 per bushel No. 1 Northern, basis Fort William, expressed in Canadian dollars.

The Canadian Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Honourable Robert Winters, and the Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable J. J. Greene, have played distinguished roles in promoting and bringing about this agreement. They have been ably assisted by representatives of farm organizations, and I think that without the authority of the Canadian Government behind it, without the prestige and the activity of the Canadian Wheat Board, without these organizations there would not be a cereals agreement today. The fact that the Canadian Wheat Board is operating in Canada and is playing this important role, with the full support of the Canadian Government, is the main reason there is a new cereals agreement.

What about the actual world situation in grain today? Well, there is no room for complacency. It is still true that two-thirds of the people of the world go to bed hungry at night. It is still true that there is a tremendous shortage of food grains in the world. It is unfortunately true that within the last few years there has not been the same increase in food production as there has been in population growth and, therefore, there is a further lag; but, nevertheless, there is a very large quantity of grain on hand in the world today. The United States is forecasting the biggest crop in its history. If you take the stocks as of April of this year among the major exporting countries of the world, they have available for export 1200 million bushels, which is 150 million bushels higher than the year before.

Canada is waging a real battle with the United States, in the area of wheat prices today, with the Canadian Wheat Board acting as spokesman for Canadian producers, because the United States feels from time to time that, in order to move their grain on the world markets, the best answer is to cut the price of wheat. I think they are mistaken. I think it is something the Canadian officials should be resisting, as they are, and I wish them every success.

However, the price the Wheat Board is receiving today for Canadian wheat has gone up considerably in the last number of months. Today it stands at $2.12 a bushel for No. 1 Northern, basis Fort William. This is not, in fact, the price the farmers themselves would like to receive. They hope that the Wheat Board, the Canadian Government and others who play a role in this field will be successful in their continuing efforts to get a higher price for wheat; but I think we would be foolish, as producers or parliamentarians, to think that any increase in the price of wheat in the next few months is certain or automatic. I think the Canadian Wheat Board feels that their biggest problem at the moment is to hold the current selling price at $2.12 a bushel.

There has been an announcement that the initial price for wheat will be increased on August 1 from $1.50 a bushel, basis No. 1 Northern Fort William, to $1.70 a bushel. I think that this is a correct move. It is sensible, because it means that even with the initial price going up to $1.70 a bushel, the Wheat Board will still operate on a margin of 42 cent a bushel. There is no danger to the board unless there is a calamitous fall in price. The board has an ample margin. The farmers will get 20 cents a bushel more when they sell, and they need that money. They are most grateful that the Wheat Board, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have agreed, and have so acted so as to bring about on August 1 an increase in the initial price of 20 cents a bushel.

Senator Hastings said last evening that the outlook in respect of the present crop is for exports of some 525 million bushels of wheat from Canada, and I think that is accurate. This will certainly be another very great accomplishment. I believe it is the third highest figure for exports in the history of this country.

Farmers' marketings up until the end of May totalled 457 million bushels, as compared to 390 million bushels the year before. The marketing situation has never been better. The quotas are very high. In fact, in most places for all practical purposes there is an open quota, and the farmers are able to market a large part, if not all, of the grain they have on hand. This is another encouraging feature in the present grain situation.

Honourable senators, I have looked at the remarks that have been made in the other place in debating this legislation. I think the debate generally was on a very high and non-partisan level, with positive suggestions being put forward by the members. I do not think it is any criticism of any measure to say "I support the measure." However, I do think certain improvements can be made. Mr. Warner Jorgenson, M. P., for example, asked that steps be taken to increase production of grain by emphasizing new breedings and methods of providing greater scientific information, and by other means. Mr. Jorgenson is a farmer himself, with experience in the farm movement, and what he said was a contribution to the debate.

Mr. E. Nasserden, M.P. from Saskatchewan, asked that the initial quotas for grain from small farmers should initially be higher in the fall. I do not know how realistic is that suggestion, but it is certainly a positive one that I am sure the Wheat Board has considered many times in years gone by and will consider many times in the future. Whether there is an initial quota of 400 bushels as it now is, or 300 bushels as it used to be, the important factor is whether the farmers—the small and medium-sized farmers, and even the larger ones—have an opportunity to market the grain they produce at a reasonable price.

I have one suggestion that I would like to make at this time with respect to the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board. I think it is constructive, and I hope that the Wheat Board officials, as well as the Minister of Trade and Commerce, will take a look at it to see whether it might be followed in order to remove a criticism that I have heard from time to time—a criticism that upsets me because I do not like to see the Wheat Board criticized, if it can possibly be avoided.

There is a policy in effect, as honourable senators know, and has been for some years, of cash advances on farm stored grain—interest-free advances. In the fall the farmer can go to the local elevator agent, and the agent on behalf of the Canadian Wheat Board has authority to grant him, on the basis of a 50 cents per bushel, up to a maximum, depending upon the size of his farm, of $3,000 interest free. This money is automatically paid back as the farmer delivers his grain. The experience has been excellent. The losses have been surprisingly low—almost negligible.

This has been a good operation. But what happens is that every spring there may be a few thousand farmers who for one reason or another have not marketed sufficient of their grain to pay back their cash advance. They have the grain. They have given the security of their permit book, and then somebody in the legal department of the Canadian Wheat Board writes the individual farmer a letter. I do not suppose these letters today are quite as starchy as they once were, but these persons in the legal department of the Wheat Board send such letters by registered mail. They make the farmer feel that the Canadian Wheat Board thinks he is absconding with the money that he has borrowed. Such letters make the farmer angry with either the Canadian Wheat Board or with the government of the day, or with both. The farmer becomes completely upset.

If you want to get a farmer upset, just send him a registered letter when he is busy seeding, telling him, in effect, you had better quit your seeding and get busy hauling some grain to town. Of course he is not going to do it. This brings about a criticism of the Canadian Wheat Board and I think could well be avoided.

My suggestion is that a greater responsibility be given to the elevator agents themselves. When a farmer hauls a load of grain to the elevator, the elevator agent decides the grade and the dockage, and he buys the grain on behalf of the Canadian Wheat Board. Any argument that the farmer may have—and we all have arguments when somebody wants to decide whether they should give us less money than a certain figure—is with the local elevator agent, who is an agent of the company, which in turn is an agent of the Wheat Board.

I would like to see the Canadian Wheat Board give the elevator agent—the very man who gave the farmer the advance in the first place—the responsibility of collecting from the farmer, when the quotas are available and when the grain can be hauled in. The elevator agent is far better able to know the position of the farmer, to know when the grain should be hauled in, than is somebody sitting in the office of the Wheat Board in Winnipeg and who has before him just cold statistics but who does not know the particular circumstances. I think that my suggestion would remove this kind of criticism that one hears from time to time.

Every once in a while in the history of the Canadian Wheat Board an operation takes place which receives the resounding approval of the producers in western Canada, or some other operation may take place which disturbs the producers and which can become something of a political football. In January 1965 the Canadian Wheat Board, in a series of steps, reduced the selling price of Canadian Wheat of various grades over a period of a few days from 12 to 17 cents a bushel. The price of No. 1 wheat, for example, dropped from approximately $2.03 to $1.91 a bushel, and a great howl went up in the country. There were politicians who condemned the government or the Wheat Board for having done this.

Nobody likes to see the price of wheat reduced, but I think the Canadian Wheat Board would have been subject to far greater criticism, and the government along with the board, if they had said, "We are keeping our prices at their present level whether we sell the wheat or not." Other countries would have been selling wheat at lower prices, and instead of getting the lower price for a large quantity we would have gotten no price at all because we would not have been able to sell any wheat.

The Wheat Board made its decision very clear, and it outlined why it had to take these various steps. It had an opportunity of selling some lower grade wheat—No. 5 wheat—to China, and sold it at competitive prices. The Americans stepped in soon after, and cut the American price. There was a series of price cuts after the Canadian Wheat Board had cut its own price in order to meet this competition. The Americans continued to cut their prices even further.

The point is that the Canadian Wheat Board did this to meet competition. I was very sorry and disturbed to read the statement by the Leader of the Opposition in this country (Hon. Mr. Diefenbaker), when he stated:

> They have not forgotten, though, that while 21 cents is the maximum increase in the price of wheat under the new international agreement, two years ago 17 cents was cut off their price. The result is that the wheat farmers of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba received an income in those two years of about $190 million less—> —than they would have received because of the action of this Government.

And here are the words I wish to emphasize:

I believe that statement is false, that there is no foundation for it at all in fact. If there were it would certainly be an extremely disturbing statement because it would say, as it does say, that the Government of Canada took action in which the Wheat Board acquiesced, that cost producers in this country in the amount of $190 million.

I can see in political campaigns this kind of statement being hurled across the country, that an action taken by the Government cost the wheat producers $190 million. No action taken by the Government of Canada in relation to this problem has cost the wheat producers of western Canada five cents. No action was taken by the Government. The Wheat Board met existing competition. As a wheat producer, I am certainly glad they did; they did a good job of moving our grain.

The arithmetic that goes into the $190 million figure, I am unable to fathom. Apparently it assumes that for two full years this drop has been in effect and that it is related to the sales of wheat within that period. Of course that is not true. A few weeks after the cut the Wheat Board was, step by step in the light of changing conditions, able to increase the price of wheat, and the price of wheat today is nine cents a bushel higher than in January 1965, when the initial reduction in price took place.

To demonstrate that the Wheat Board has been able to do a very competent job, one needs only point out that in the year in which this price cut was effective the final payment was still 38 cents a bushel, which compares to final payments in 1958-59 of nine cents, in 1959-60 of nine cents, and in 1960-61, 29 cents, and so on; and the final payment last year which would cover a large part of the two-year period which was referred to by the Leader of the Opposition, was 48 cents a bushel, which is the highest final payment ever made by the Canadian Wheat Board in the history of its operations.

I think this is a tremendous tribute to the Canadian Wheat Board and demonstrates that while it had to take steps to meet competition at a given time, it was acting in the interests of the producer, that instead of losing $190 million, as has been alleged, it probably saved the wheat producers $500 million or $600 million by meeting existing competition in a fair way.

The kind of statement I have referred to would not be disturbing if it had not come from a man in the position of the Leader of the Opposition, but since it does come from him it is a serious and an uncalled for reflection on the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board.

I have referred to certain members who took part in this debate and had some constructive things to say. When the Conservative party was in the throes of selecting a leader, a new leader, or an old leader reaffirmed, it would have been interesting to see the stand of these would-be leaders on this very important question. And not one of the would-be leaders, the Honourable Mr. Fulton, the Honourable Mr. Hees, the Honourable Mr. Starr or the Honourable Mr. Hamilton, spoke in this debate. Of course, as I am reminded, there is a prospective leader from this place who may give us his views on this important legislation. However, I would think the people of western Canada would appreciate learning whether or not these other prospective leaders in fact support the operation of this important board as it now exists and whether they agree or disagree with the statement that was made by the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask the honourable senator a question? When he was looking to be the prospective leader of a certain party in the other house some years ago, did he use that chamber as a sounding board as to whether or not he should be selected as a leader?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Well, I did my very best. One has to be energetic over there.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: You can be overly energetic.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Apparently it did not have any effect. However, I am 100 per cent sure that each of the prospective leaders of the Conservative party, either from this or the other place, is endeavouring to show in that place what substance he has, what his opinions are, and whether or not he might be a good prospective leader. I admire them for it. I think they should be doing that. However, I am a little disappointed—

Hon. Mr. Walker: May I interrupt the honourable senator for a moment? Honourable senators, I appreciate that my learned friend is tub-thumping again for some political campaign that is forthcoming.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Walker: But we do not like to hear the honourable member, whose career is behind him, making the allegation against our Leader of the Opposition in the other place that he has made false statements. I am not a farmer, and am therefore not in a position to answer my friend in detail, but we know this: that of all the criticisms levelled at the Leader of the Opposition in the other place, there is one criticism one can never make, and that is that he makes false statements. I think my honourable friend should be entirely ashamed of himself, and that he ought to realize that he is now in a place of quiet second thought and forget the tub-thumping that got him nowhere during his career. He had to switch his party at the last moment in order to get a place in this house.

Some hon. Senators: Order.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I think I can take those barbs and not worry about them. I consider the source from which they come.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I hope you do.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I will tell my honourable friend that I have not changed that much from former days, and he probably has not changed at all, because this is exactly the same sort of thing he was coming up with then.

I did not say that the statement I referred to was deliberately false, but certainly it is false. I do not believe that the Government of Canada took action that cost the producers of western Canada $190 million; and because this is a reflection not so much on the Canadian Government, because the Government does not set the selling price of wheat, but a reflection on the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board, I feel I am justified and have a responsibility to take exception to that statement.

Now, the operations of the Wheat Board, in spite of some of these things that have been said, have been good and are getting better.

I have in my hand the official United States Government publication, The Wheat Situation, for May 1967. It gives the prices in the United States to wheat producers. For example, in 1965 the average return to wheat producers was $1.71 a bushel for those who agreed to reduce their acreage. In many counties in the United States the farmer's allotted acreage is about 29 per cent of his cultivated acreage; that is, $1.71 per bushel for those who have agreed to curtail their wheat acreage to 29 per cent of their cultivated acreage. For those in 1965 who wanted to produce, as farmers do in Canada, to be free to produce everything they can at home, their return was $1.35 per bushel. The $1.35 per bushel is the farm price in the United States as compared to $1.75 per bushel as the total price on the farm for No. 2 wheat. I think this comparison shows the good job the Wheat Board is doing for the Canadian farmer.

The proof of the pudding is in the eating, and within the next few months or early next year, a final payment will be made on the crop now being marketed. If the Wheat Board is not able to do more than hold the present price of wheat in the next few months, I would forecast a final price of at least between 55 and 58 cents a bushel and perhaps as much as 60 cents a bushel, making a ten per cent increase over the price, which has already been the highest in the history, a price that will give the Canadian wheat producers the biggest payment that they ever received in the history of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Honourable senators, the Canadian Wheat Board deserves the support of every person acquainted with agriculture and with farm movements in this country, and the board should not be subjected to unjustifiable criticisms.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I would remind honourable senators that if Senator Hastings speaks at this time, it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Honourable senators, I am naturally pleased that Bill C-106 is to receive the unanimous support of senators, which is as it should be. I shall close the debate briefly.

First, I would like to thank honourable Senator Pearson for his kind words with respect to my presentation. There is one point which he put and which I think I should answer. He referred to its being ironic that the party in power, which has strongly opposed the Canadian Wheat Board, should be the party making it a permanent institution.

Honourable senators, the Canadian Wheat Board and the cause of orderly marketing of wheat has always made the greatest advances under a Liberal Government. The original Wheat Board created in 1917 was jettisoned in 1920. The board's term expired on July 31 of that year and trading on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange was resumed August 20, 1920. That was the first wheat board that was torpedoed. The cause of orderly marketing and of the Canadian Wheat Board was set back 15 years until 1935.

The cause of the Canadian Wheat Board had no greater or better friends than W. R. Motherwell, James G. Gardiner or Charles Dunning in those years. Through his ten years as federal Minister of Agriculture, the Right Honourable James Gardiner was always a friend of the pools and did remarkable work for western Canada.

It is true that the Wheat Board was created in July 1935—but the Government which created it lasted only until the following October.

During the intervening years, through the Honourable C. D. Howe and the Honourable J. G. Gardiner, the greatest advances in the orderly marketing of wheat were made. Under the Pearson Government, more wheat has been sold in the last four years than during any four years in the history of the board, and at the highest price.

The sales to the Sino-Soviet countries have expanded to the point where they take half of our export of wheat, and our food aid program increased from $4.58 million in 1962 to $100 million in the last fiscal year.

The cause of the wheat pools and the orderly marketing of grain, I repeat, have made their greatest advances under Liberal Governments, and we have never opposed the Canadian Wheat Board.

Honourable senators, the Canadian Wheat Board has performed faithful service to the western wheat producers and during the years, its record has been one of accomplishment.

I therefore strongly commend second reading of this bill, which will make the Canadian Wheat Board a permanent agency of government with respect to the marketing of grain.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hastings, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

PRIVATE BILLS

BRITISH NORTHWESTERN INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson moved the second reading of Bill S-14, respecting British Northwestern Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a brief bill on the surface, and seems to require no explanation, but I think the house is entitled to some more background than is evident, and I will try to give that.

Prior to 1964, the Eagle Star group of companies of England, and internationally known—and I expect known to most honourable senators—had a number of insurance companies licensed under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act to operate in Canada.

The British Northwestern Insurance Company, the company being considered in this bill, is one of these companies, having as parent the Eagle Star Insurance Company of London, England. This latter British company is presently licensed to carry on the business of general re-insurance in Canada under the act. It is now the purpose of the parent company to consolidate the Canadian operations and combine the portfolios of the various companies which it owns, to combine these in the British Northwestern Insurance Company, and in consequence to increase the capital of this company by an appropriate amount.

As a natural corollary, the parent company wishes to retain its name, which has become known throughout the world, and for that purpose desires to change the name of its company, in which the activities have been consolidated, from the British Northwestern Insurance Company to Eagle Star Insurance Company of Canada, and to have also a name in French, Eagle Star Compagnie d'Assurance du Canada.

To go a little further into the background, there are in reality four insurance companies involved. First, there is the Eagle Star Insurance Company Limited of England, the parent company to which I referred.

Secondly, there is the company for whom this bill is put forward, the British Northwestern Insurance Company.

This company, originally incorporated in Manitoba in 1906, was incorporated as a Dominion company by chapter 70 of the Statutes of 1910 as the British Northwestern Fire Insurance Company. The name was changed in 1952 to the present name, that is, by the elimination of the word "fire". The company has for many years been licensed under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act to conduct the business of general insurance.

The third company concerned is The British Crown Assurance Corporation Limited. This is a British company which, for a number of years, was licensed in Canada to carry on general insurance but ceased active business in Canada in 1964 when its portfolio was absorbed by British Northwestern.

The fourth company concerned is Security National Insurance Company. This is a Canadian company incorporated by statute in 1934, chapter 71. It also has been licensed to carry on the business of general insurance and is presently withdrawing from active operation in Canada. Its portfolio is being absorbed by British Northwestern.

In essence then, several companies cease independent operations and consolidate all their activities in one company. The latter company increases its capital to an adequate figure for the size of its business and then desires to change its name to one which identifies it perfectly with that of its British parent company.

If honourable senators are pleased to give second reading to this bill, I propose to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: What type of insurance is this?

Hon. Mr. Molson: General insurance for all companies concerned except the one I mentioned as being in re-insurance.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Molson, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

SEABOARD FINANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. J. Harper Prowse, for Hon. Mr. McDonald, moved the second reading of Bill S-15, to incorporate Seaboard Finance Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, it may be remembered that this bill was passed by this chamber at the last session as Bill S-21. Unfortunately, it did not get any further at that time, so this is a reintroduction.

The Seaboard Finance Company of Canada was incorporated by Ontario letters patent on August 17, 1955. May I assure my honourable friends that while apparently it had Conservative parentage at that time, the purpose now is not just to change the political parentage of the company. Since it was incorporated as a money-lending company—a small loans company—it has expanded successfully into practically all of the provinces of Canada, and therefore it is felt appropriate that it should have a Dominion charter. That is the purpose of this bill.

It is my intention, if the bill should receive second reading, to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. In that event, the people concerned will appear to answer any questions that honourable senators may wish to ask.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Prowse, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

CABRI PIPE LINES LTD.—SECOND READING

Hon. J. Harper Prowse moved the second reading of Bill S-16, to incorporate Cabri Pipe Lines Ltd.

He said: Honourable senators, the incorporators are seeking a charter for a Special Act company with the right to construct interprovincial and international pipe lines for the transportation of natural gas, oil, liquid petroleum and other products.

The pertinent facts are that the intention is to build a pipe line which would carry the natural gas from the source well approximately two miles east of the border between Saskatchewan and Alberta, past the City of Lloydminster, to a gas storage well which lies about 3½ miles inside the border of Alberta. This would be a six-inch pipe line and would enable the gas from the well in Saskatchewan to be produced at a steady rate. Then during the summer months, in the low-demand periods when the gas is taken off for the use of the city, the excess gas goes into storage so that you get the production of two wells in order to have the gas available to meet the peak requirements during the winter months.

The immediate reason for the request for incorporation is that the company requires a special act of incorporation because the pipe line crosses a provincial border.

Now with the development going on in the fields on both sides of the border, the company does propose, when the bill comes before you, to ask for incorporation in general terms, so that they will then have the necessary authority to expand, should the circumstances indicate that expansion is justified.

Honourable senators are undoubtedly aware that before any pipe line can be built or any extensions undertaken, approval has to be obtained from provincial authorities, I presume, or in any event from the National Energy Board. That in itself will be a safeguard. It will ensure that we are not giving carte blanche to people to build pipe lines all over the place for any purpose they choose. But they must have incorporation before they can make application to the National Energy Board which, in the final analysis, will decide on the specific application what a pipe line company will be allowed to undertake.

The proposed incorporators of this company are prominent businessmen in Alberta who have particular experience in gas and oil exploration and in the development and the transportation of these products. The manager and a director of Cabri Pipe Lines Ltd. will be Stanley A. Milner, of the City of Edmonton, who is president of Chieftain Development Co. Ltd., Blue Crown Petroleums Ltd. and the Lloydminster Gas Co. Ltd. He and his associates have been actively engaged in the production and transportation of natural gas and other petroleum products.

Included in the general objects of the company is the right to construct and operate transportation and communication facilities which might be required for the operation of their systems on an interprovincial basis.

The present plan calls for the construction of a pipe line from a source well in Saskatchewan to a gas storage well in the Province of Alberta for supplying the City of Lloydminster, as I have outlined to you.

The application has been advertised in: The Lloydminster Times, Lloydminster, Saskatchewan; the News-Optimist, North Battleford, Saskatchewan; the Journal, Edmonton, Alberta; the Leader-Post, Regina, Saskatchewan; and the Canada Gazette. To date there have been no objections filed to the granting of the charter to the company.

The applicants have conducted initial feasibility studies and are satisfied that this is an economical venture. They have themselves the financial means to carry out the project, and it is not their intention to sell any shares to the public or make any offer of shares to the public for the purpose of carrying out the project they presently have in mind.

If this bill receives second reading, it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, at a meeting of which the principals will be able to appear and answer any questions honourable senators might have to direct to them.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Prowse, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

VAWN PIPE LINES LTD.—SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. Prowse moved the second reading of Bill S-17, to incorporate Vawn Pipe Lines Ltd.

He said: Honourable senators, with regard to Vawn Pipe Lines Ltd., yet another group of Edmonton businessmen are seeking a charter, in this instance because they propose to build a pipe line from a point about six miles inside the Alberta border to a point about 12 miles inside the British Columbia border. The site is on the other side of the province from that in connection with the bill I have just been speaking about, and quite a bit farther north, to connect an area that is being developed on the Alberta side of the border with transmission lines that presently exist on the B.C. side of the border. It is a different group of Edmonton businessmen who have experience in this field. They have the finances necessary to carry out their project and it is not their intention to seek financial support from the public at this time.

The incorporators are asking for quite broad powers and, again may I say, they are aware, as we are, that before any of these powers can be specifically exercised they must make application to and receive the approval of the Energy Board of Canada.

Here again, the application has been advertised, but I do not think it is necessary for me to list the names of the newspapers. They include publications covering any areas in which people might be concerned, including the areas around Vancouver, Edmonton and Calgary. To date no objections have been received.

If and when this bill receives second reading, it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, at a meeting of which any detailed questions can be answered by those involved.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Prowse, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 8, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux, seconded by Hon. Mr. Nichol, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable Senators, if my count is correct, I am the fifteenth speaker in this debate on the motion of Senator Desruisseaux, seconded by Senator Nichol.

As I shall certainly be referring to Senator Desruisseaux on several occasions, I should perhaps apologize in advance if my pronunciation of his distinguished name is not all it should be. However, I did look it up in my French dictionary and was interested to find that "ruisseaux" means "brooks", and I am sure he is happy to find himself so well connected in this place!

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): And it flowed very well.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I regret that I did not have the privilege of hearing the speeches of the mover and seconder, or, indeed, of the nine speakers who followed them. As excuse, I can only plead that I was on Senate business elsewhere, as the Notice of Inquiry in my name will indicate. However, I spent most of Sunday reading the speeches of those who have preceded me. While some might say that there are more devout ways of spending the Sabbath, I would have to reply that whatever these speeches lack in spiritual uplift they certainly make up for in mental exercise.

I congratulate all the speakers who have preceded me, and particularly the mover and seconder who had the very difficult task of making the document which is the subject of this motion appear to contain new and enterprising legislation. That is an almost impossible task because, as Senator Brooks pointed out, of the 28 items mentioned only four are new. The document is largely, therefore, a list of promises deferred, or an agenda of unfinished business left over from the last session. Perhaps I should not be overcritical on that score because I know that in the other place there is a minority government, a strong opposition, and fractious flanking parties.

My personal view is that all the frustration of that very long session will have been worthwhile if it convinces the Canadian public that the only way out of the difficulties with which Parliament has been faced in the last few years is a return to the two-party system, which alone can guarantee a government majority and the efficient operation of Parliament.

However, I pay tribute to those who have had the conduct of our affairs in this chamber, the first of which, of course, is His Excellency the Governor General. I have known him and his gracious lady for many years, and I congratulate them upon the high honour that has been bestowed upon them. I congratulate the Government upon its wisdom and, I might add, its political impartiality in the advice tendered to Her Majesty on this occasion.

The Right Honourable Roland Michener is our third native Canadian Governor General. The first was Mr. Massey, who was affiliated at one time with the Liberal Party. He was appointed by a Liberal Government and served with great distinction and, indeed, his term of office was extended by a Conservative Government.

The second Canadian-born Governor General was the late beloved General Vanier who, as far as I know, had no political affiliations, but who was appointed by a Conservative Government.

We have now our third Canadian Governor General whose party affiliations are well known to the members of the Conservative Party. He was appointed by a Liberal Government. When the time comes for the appointment of the next Governor General the Conservative Party will, of course, be in office.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): You can dream, anyway.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Perhaps at that time it might be appropriate to return the compliment, and for that Conservative Government to appoint to this high office one who has been affiliated with the Liberal Party. With that in mind, as I look across the chamber and to my left, I find myself wondering whether I might have the honour to be serving here with the next Governor General.

I join, of course, with my colleagues in the congratulations that have been paid the honourable Leader of the Government in this chamber (Senator Connolly, Ottawa West), and I welcome him upon his return from his very important mission to Malta. I listened with the greatest of interest to the very fine report he made last night.

I join also in the congratulations that have been tendered to the Deputy Leader of the Government, Senator Deschatelets, upon his interim leadership. I said to someone the other day that if he wished to see a demonstration of courtesy and consideration in Parliament he should come here and see Senator Deschatelets in action, and I meant it.

Honourable senators, if there is anyone here who excels in those two special qualities, it is my own leader, Senator Brooks. It is very easy to forget that he has been a member of one or other of the legislatures of Canada for over 40 consecutive years, because he carries his years so well. We all agree, I think, that they show only in the unfailing skill with which he carries out his important functions here.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I was delighted to hear Senator Fergusson's remarks in respect of our Deputy Leader, Senator Choquette. I can only add to her mention of his often pungent, but always to the point, interjections in debate, that some of us on this side would like to hear more of them.

To climax this series of compliments that I have the privilege of rendering at this time, I pay my respects to his Honour the Speaker. I am sure we all look forward to his continuing to preside over our affairs with the distinction he has shown in the past. We particularly take pride in the distinction he will bring to his important duties in connection with the Centennial celebrations and the visit of Her Majesty.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The topics dealt with by the previous speakers in this debate, and which, as I said, I read on Sunday, have been legion. We have been reminded that this is the Centennial session of Parliament, and that Canadians are entitled to look back to the past with pride, and to the future with confidence. Emphasis has been placed upon the role that the Constitution has played in our development, and will play in the future, particularly the written part that we call the British North America Act.

I was glad to read that the mover of the motion spoke of Confederation as creating here in Canada a "new nationality". That, to me, is the keystone of the structure of the nationhood that we have built upon the existing foundation of the two founding cultures We can be bicultural or multicultural, bilingual or multilingual, as some nations are, but, in my view, we must be and remain one nation and one nationality if we are to achieve our full destiny on this continent of North America, and in the world.

I have not the competence to talk about the feasibility or even the desirability of such things as "special status" for one or other of the provinces, but I have no confidence at all in the constitutional viability of what is called "associate statehood," because I had an opportunity recently of observing the latest experiment in associate statehood in the Caribbean. The experiment there is less than a year old, and even under generous terms it is already proving difficult, if not impossible, to work out, and at least one associate state finds itself, within less than a year, in a critical constitutional position.

The most remarkable fact about our own Constitution is not that it may need revision, but that is has already proved its remarkable flexibility to deal with the changes brought about by the stresses of a hundred years.

Senator Thorvaldson, in his penetrating review—indeed, it was one of the best reviews of constitutional development I have heard in a long time—pointed out that the Constitution has already been amended many times. I think he said it has been amended 21 times, but I have not had a chance of checking that.

I found myself in agreement certainly with Senator Flynn that the present apparent attitude of the Government in postponing, if that is a correct assumption, the calling of a Constitutional Conference may be dangerous. One of the many dangers, as he pointed out, is that in the absence of a more general dialogue, attitudes are hardening and postures are becoming permanent.

I was unhappy to find Senator Deschatelets defending that delay, and particularly Senator Davey saying that he was "uneasy" about the action of Premier Robarts of Ontario in arranging his proposed "Confederation of Tomorrow Conference." I had difficulty in following his argument that Confederation is a two-way street and at the same time implying that the provincial end of the street should be a dead end.

As I read the history of the federal-provincial conferences of past years, I become more and more convinced that the main stumbling block has been the insistence of the federal Government in announcing hard reservations in advance on a "take it or leave it" basis. The time has long gone, I believe, for this, what is called in Quebec, "federaliste" or "centraliste" attitude to be carried into such conferences as a chip on the shoulder of any party to such a conference. The federal Government is the unquestioned senior of the eleven partners, and therefore is the most likely to appear to be arrogant, and for that reason, if for no other, it should approach these discussions with a completely open mind.

Like Senator Thorvaldson, I am appalled at the delay in domesticating the British North America Act. I believe he used the word "repatriating," but someone has said that the British North America Act was never "patriated" in Canada, and therefore it cannot be repatriated. That may or may not be so.

The mover of the address in reply (Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux) referred to the British North America Act as a pact. I know that many constitutional lawyers disagree, because it was and is an act of the British Parliament; but the fact remains that it was referred to over and over again by its authors in the Confederation debate as a treaty.

The way in which the British North America Act became the law of Canada tends, I think, to support the mover. We know, for example, that the Province of Canada, as it was then—Upper and Lower Canada—practically invited themselves to join the deliberations towards union of the four Atlantic provinces, and that two of them, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, disagreed with the proposed terms of union and withdrew. We know that the British North America Act itself as passed by the British Parliament was really nothing more than the necessary legal instrument of the agreed terms that Canadians had worked out in their conferences in Charlottetown, Quebec, and in London.

I agree with Senator Thorvaldson that there appears to be no valid reason for the long delay in carrying out Part I of the now famous Fulton-Favreau formula of 1964, which provides only for the return of the Constitution. I have heard some objections from Quebec. There was an objection some years ago from Premier Lesage. However, it seems to me that Part I of the Fulton-Favreau formula gives the provinces, and particularly Quebec, far greater constitutional control of any future changes in the fundamentals than they have today because, as has been said here on many occasions by eminent constitutional lawyers, the power exists in effect now in the Parliament of Canada to make any change it wishes in the British North America Act. I realize that only in some aspects can Parliament act directly, and that in others it must act through a joint address. However, the fact remains, as I understand it, that in effect unlimited power is now in the hands of the Canadian Parliament.

Senator Irvine called our attention to another interesting aspect of our Constitution which is often forgotten, namely, the continued colonial status of those Canadians who live in the Northwest Territories. As I listened to her very full and explicit account of the respective constitutional powers of the legislature and the Commissioner, I could not but reflect that they were almost exactly the same as those of the Colonial Administrator and legislature of the small Cayman Islands which I visited recently.

The final aspect of our constitutional growth is the national anthem. Personally, I was very happy when "O Canada" was given its present status in our Centennial year. However, to put it mildly, I think it was a constitutional lapse on the part of my friend Senator Davey to refer, in what I thought were satirical terms, to the fact that at Maple Leaf Gardens in Toronto before the hockey games "God Save the Queen" is not now played. "O Canada" has been substituted. Senator Davey commented that "not only did the roof of Maple Leaf Gardens not cave in, but the Leafs went on to win the Stanley Cup". I am sorry to have to disagree twice in one speech with Senator Davey, but he seldom gives me the opportunity to disagree only once so he will not mind my making the most of this occasion.

Of course I have no objection to that change, but surely it is unwise to set these two anthems off against each other in this competitive way. Both are the official anthems of Canada; each has its special significance and its special place in our national life. The Queen is still the Queen of Canada and head of the Commonwealth, and I for one hope she long remains in that capacity. Be that as it may, I see no useful purpose served by any remark such as that made by Senator Davey which might be considered as disrespectful to the old anthem which has served us so long.

The second major topic which I noticed in the speeches was that of Senate reform. Senator Brooks has suggested, if I may quote his words, "a study of the place of the Senate in our government and the reform of our rules". Senator Thorvaldson suggested that some future nominations to places here might be made by the provincial governments to the Prime Minister. That is certainly a good suggestion, which I think would present no constitutional difficulties because they would merely be nominations and would not require any fundamental change of the British North America Act. Senator Flynn proposed an ad hoc committee of the Senate to consider how the conduct of our business and our contribution to Parliament might be made more effective.

I find myself in general agreement with these suggestions. It is noticeable, of course, that all three came from the Opposition side of the house. However, I shall have listened very badly to the unofficial comments of some of my colleagues if there is not some general support on the Government side for the proposition that the Senate should forthwith consider how it might make itself more effective and useful. I would hope that honourable senators on the other side, if they are so disposed, would give us their views now that the matter has been brought out into the open in a manner more likely to achieve results than at any time since I have been in this chamber. It is a golden opportunity, and I would hope those of my colleagues who have expressed more or less the same sentiment to me would express themselves in this debate before too long.

I will not go so far as Senator Flynn and try to delineate every suggested change. The Leader of the Government here, Senator

Wishart Robertson, early in 1951 proposed a resolution for the formation of such a committee; in speaking to it he went into very great detail, and I think frightened some senators at that time so that there was opposition voiced and the motion did not come to a vote, even though it had been sponsored by the Leader of the Government. I believe that we must make some changes or someone else will make ones that we will not like very much, particularly if the situation arises where there is an examination of the Constitution section by section.

I am convinced that the Senate has an important and essential role to play in Parliament. I am further convinced that the Senate can do a better job than it is doing, and I am even more convinced that the Senate itself is the best instrument for bringing about whatever changes may be necessary in the interests of Parliament and the nation. I therefore fully support the suggestion that there should be a committee of the Senate formed to consider this matter, and I would say to the honourable Leader of the Government that there may be some urgency about it. Perhaps the time is now. Perhaps such a committee might be constituted even before we recess. It might even be wise to meet for a couple of days during the recess so that when we meet again the committee can come back with a report on which some action might be taken.

There were many other topics discussed by honourable senators and I hope it will not be regarded as an imposition on the time and good nature of senators if I make a few short comments on them. Senator Kickham spoke knowingly about the problems of farmers. A farmer himself and a former member of the House of Commons, he made a stirring plea for some assured economic reward for the individual farmer's contribution in both capital and labour to the progress of the economy. It was a plea on which I think action has to be taken. We saw a march of farmers in Ottawa here. I was with a gentleman over the week-end who had something to do with a similar march of farmers on Dublin. We have had marches of farmers on the seats of provincial governments. I think it would be a mistake for any government to ignore the fact that there is deep underlying unrest among the farm population of Canada and of other places. I would include in that the equally moving plea of Senator Gershaw for other Canadians who, through no fault of their own, are not in a position to benefit from the progress of the economy.

I find myself in agreement with the expert knowledge of Senator Laird about the importance, indeed the necessity, of the Board of Broadcast Governors being given both full and flexible power over broadcasting in Canada. As I listened to the honourable senators speak of the fantastic success of Expo, I found myself thinking what a lesson there is in that success for all the programmers of entertainment in Canada, whether they be programmers of radio, TV, theatres, or even publishers of magazines and newspapers. As I see it, the lesson of Expo is that bad taste, vulgarity and deliberate offensiveness are not necessary to attract the interest of the widest possible audience of Canadians.

The charm of Expo is its proof that good taste, esthetic excellence, and high entertainment value can be successfully combined with modern, even avant-garde, values and judgments as to what the public wants. Most impressive of all to me, during the trips I made to Expo, was the fact that in the crowds the young people predominated and their conduct responded magnificently to the opportunity given to them by the intelligent adults who planned that great exposition. The indication is that young people will respond if the adult planners, the adult programmers, will give them an opportunity to do so. What a striking contrast it is to what other presumably intelligent adults in radio, television, publishing, movies and theatres are foisting on them in the name of an ersatz new morality.

In the same sentiment, what a pleasure it was to read Senator Quart's full and fine description of the success of the many projects of the Interfaith Conference both at Expo and elsewhere, and to participate in her enthusiasm for this practical demonstration of the place of the things of the spirit in modern life.

I was particularly interested in what Senator Kinnear had to say about the Niagara Peninsula. It so happens that on Saturday last I conducted the Irish gentleman, whom I mentioned a few moments ago, on a tour of the Niagara Parkway, from Niagara Falls to Niagara-on-the-Lake. As I showed him the historic sites of some of the battles of 1812-14—Ridgeway, Lundy's Lane, Chippewa, Stoney Creek, Queenston Heights—and told him some of the story, he finally said to me: "So that is why Canadians have made so much of their country; they had to fight for it." I thought to myself that there may be in that observation a lesson for us today.

A theme which has run all through the debate so far is that we should not despair of a solution of our current problems, for the good reason that over these 100 years we have overcome so many others that seemed at times insurmountable.

Senator McCutcheon also reminded us that all our current problems are not constitutional. He drew special attention to the growing problem of big government. I am far less competent than he to talk about that, but I agree with his warning about the danger in Canada of bureaucratic expertise taking over the functions of our elected representatives.

The author of Parkinson's Law about job empire-building has, in another of his famous books, told us that the growth of an overweening bureaucracy leads inevitably to the loss of many of the freedoms which Parliament is, above all else, designed to protect.

Somewhere there must be a limit to the number of citizens which any country can afford to employ in its public service. In the private sector there are such limits—the productivity and profitability of each employee—but there seems to be no such measure in the public service.

Surely the time has come to call a halt to the proliferation of jobs in the public service, which Senator McCutcheon has documented, until we have better information than we have now as to whether we can afford them.

The danger is a very real one. Every civilization which perished in the past did so when the weight of its growing theocracy or bureaucracy became greater than the productive capacity of the nation could bear. Egypt is an example of the former, China of the latter—and after thousands of years, both of those countries are still suffering from the habit and the effects of what was at one time merely a development of too many people in the public service and not enough people engaged productively to support them. It might well be a worthwhile subject of a reference by the Government to the Economic Council of Canada.

Finally, may I comment on the speech made by Senator Fergusson, who immediately preceded me in this debate. In her very informative report on the last Interparliamentary Union Conference in Iran, she stressed the importance of continuing and even more frequent personal contacts between the elected members of the parliaments of the nations.

The case she made for that proposition is incontrovertible. It is in this area of nation-to-nation dialogue that I believe we will eventually find the formula for universal peace. This is of course the basic concept of the United Nations and the reason why, despite some qualifications which have to be considered, I would support the inclusion of Red China in that body.

Even so, the United Nations is mainly a meeting of diplomats rather than of parliamentarians, of governments rather than of parliaments. It operates in the harsh spotlight of international publicity. Its representatives are obviously given to public posturing from which they find it difficult to withdraw in private.

How different it is, as Senator Fergusson told us, in these parliamentary conferences which, I am glad to say, are steadily increasing in scope and frequency. At these we commit our nations to no hard positions. In fact, we do not commit them at all. Most of our contacts are private rather than public. We travel together, tour together and talk together. As Senator Fergusson has said, we find that we have similar problems at home and mutual interests abroad. I am not persuaded that the diplomats of the world are ever going to find the answers to world peace. But I do believe that the parliamentarians of the nations—if they meet each other often enough in each other's countries—can and will in the Good Lord's good time bring about that meeting of the minds of the ordinary people of the world, in the proposition that, 2,000 years after we were first given the message, the time has come for universal peace on earth and mutual goodwill among mankind.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, my first remarks must be to say how much I appreciate the honour of having been appointed to the Senate of Canada and how deeply grateful I am to our Government leader, Senator John Connolly, for his kind references to my wife and myself on the occasion when I was presented to this body and took my seat in this chamber.

Honourable senators, I should like to record also my sincere thanks for all the kindness and assistance I have received since coming here, both from my Senate colleagues and from the Senate staff.

Next, I should like to congratulate a former colleague in the other place, the Right Honourable Roland Michener, on his appointment as our Governor General, and to extend to him and to his gracious lady, our very best wishes for a very happy tenure of office and every success in the arduous duties and responsibilities which they have assumed.

Before coming to the substance of my remarks, I should like to associate myself with all those who have congratulated the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne on the excellence of their presentations and on the fine manner in which they discharged their assignment.

The Speech from the Throne must have been one of the longest in Canada's parliamentary history. It contains some 62 paragraphs and takes up some nine printed pages in the Senate Proceedings of May 8. Among the many items listed are four which are of particular importance to the Atlantic provinces and especially to my own Province of Newfoundland.

I am happy to learn that the Government intends to broaden the scope of the Area Development Program and to continue giving encouragement to the Atlantic Development Board as stated in paragraph 19.

I welcome also the Rural Economic Development program mentioned in paragraph 24 and the reference to long term loans to agricultural and fishery associations, described in paragraph 46.

As a Newfoundlander who for 17 years had the great honour of sitting in the other place, representing a rural riding which at the same time was the largest year-round fishing area in my province, I know you will understand what I mean when I say that I feel it to be almost an obligation to address myself to these four items. The fact that I am taking this opportunity to talk about something else is a measure of the concern which I feel about the matter which I am about to draw to your attention. That subject, honourable senators, is the Senate itself, this honourable institution to which we all belong, its present operations and its prospects for the future.

This to me, honourable senators, is a matter of vital importance because it is bound up with the survival of Canada's parliamentary system upon which depend the individual liberty and freedom of all Canadians. On coming here from the House of Commons one cannot help being impressed by the tremendous wealth and variety of talent represented in this chamber. Neither can one help being struck by the small fraction of this huge potential which is actually being utilized in the service of Canada.

On the other hand, as a newcomer, one cannot escape the feeling that much of what we do in this chamber is done in a sort of routine manner which gives the appearance of going through the motions. This in turn creates the impression of artificiality, which I believe detracts from its meaning, and unless something is done I believe there is a very great danger that the Senate will not continue to survive as a part of Canada's parliamentary system.

I have two reasons for making that statement. We are living in an age when the moral and spiritual foundations of our democratic society are being questioned. This is noticeable particularly in the younger generation, but it is by no means confined to them. This attitude can be expected to increase as future generations become better educated and more sophisticated and less influenced by custom and tradition. If a survey were to be made today, I believe we would be astonished at how few Canadians regard the Senate as an essential part of our parliamentary system. Indeed we might well be surprised at how few give any thought at all to, or even know of, its existence.

In view of present trends it is clear that institutions that lose their meaning will be discarded. I believe we can accept that as a fact. For that reason I feel it would be wise for us to start thinking about this problem in time so that we can take steps to utilize more fully the great potential for service that resides in the Senate, and thus make this institution more meaningful to all Canadians.

My second reason for feeling that the Senate might not continue to survive is because there are forces at work in Canada whose expressed purpose is to destroy our democratic way of life. They seek to do this by undermining our democratic leaders and institutions, and by holding them up to ridicule so as to destroy the people's faith in them. While three or four Senate committees, such as the Divorce Committee, the Committee on Consumer Credit, the committees on Aging and Land Use, have received a fair amount of publicity, the Senate as a body seldom receives any publicity at all, and most of what it does receive is designed to promote the idea that the Senate is maintained at public expense to the tune of some $3 million per year for the useless purpose of providing a club where, to use a familiar quotation, party hacks and broken-down politicians can be put out to pasture. We have all seen senators themselves held up to ridicule in cartoons, in printed articles, and even in editorials, by being portrayed as decrepit old people with ear trumpets and being moved around in wheel chairs, receiving their reward for faithful service—service, honourable senators, not to the nation, but to the party.

This brings up the question of what can or should be done about it. In this connection I should like to make a few suggestions. In my opinion the first and most important step is to find some way of getting more considerate treatment from the Government and from the other place. On more than one occasion the Government has sent important legislation to the Senate and arranged to have royal assent the very same day. This happened during the last session. On March 21 the other place passed Bill C-222 and Bill C-223 after weeks of debate on second reading, and further weeks of study in the standing committee and in the Committee of the Whole. On March 22 these two bills, with a total of 293 clauses and 190 printed pages, were received by the Senate, were given first and second reading sent to committee, reported back from the committee, given third reading and received royal assent, all on the same day.

Honourable senators, how can we honestly expect such an operation to be really meaningful to anyone, particularly when, as is pointed out on page 1736 of Senate Hansard, such haste was not necessary since the Senate was due to reassemble on April 3, after the Easter recess, and the old Bank Act did not expire until April 12? The Government may not realize that by treating us in this way it is in effect telling the public that the Senate is an inferior institution, that it serves no useful function except to rubber-stamp legislation sent over from the other place, and to accommodate the political convenience of the governing party. I know it is not intended to convey this impression, but when all is said and done that is what it boils down to.

The Government itself should realize that when it shows disregard and discourtesy to this institution it is in fact undermining Parliament as a whole and hurting the cause of democracy everywhere. When established democratic processes are repeatedly subordinated to government expediency and convenience, one cannot escape the conclusion that there is no real belief in democratic principles at all. It is futile to talk about democracy. The important thing is to practise it, and when our actions belie our words all our expressions of devotion to the democratic way of life merely amount to lip service.

This, I believe, will not be lost on the younger generation, nor on the still uncommitted nations which are even now making comparisons between democratic government and the totalitarian state.

We all know that there is no deliberate intention or wish on the part of anyone in the Government or in the other place to subject the Senate to public insult and humiliation, but unfortunately that is the result and the effect remains the same, regardless of how it comes about.

I know from my own experience in the other place—and other senators who have sat there will bear me out—that the pressures are much greater than they are here. Every day brings new problems, new pressures, new deadlines, and in trying to cope with them it is easy to become so engrossed that time passes without one realizing it. But when this happens, unfortunately this chamber is suddenly confronted with a decision, either to behave like "Nice Nellies" and accept a most embarrassing situation gracefully, or to insist that the rights of this institution be recognized and thereby upset the Government's program and schedule.

Honourable senators, such happenings can easily be avoided, however, because all that is required is some sort of device or signal to remind the Government and the other place before time has run out that this house has equal status with the other place and that its rights should be treated with equal respect and courtesy.

Such a device could very easily be embodied in a rule or standing order stating that the Senate must be given adequate time to consider legislation before royal assent can be requested; and to ensure adequate time, the rule or order could specify that major bills be sent to the Senate not less than five sitting days before Christmas Eve, Good Friday or any other recess or adjournment.

I realize that we in the Senate could invent a rule of our own that would have the same effect, but I suggest that the remedy more properly belongs in the other place, because it is obvious that the unfavourable public image of the Senate cannot be changed until the Government and the other place recognize and respect our rights.

Towards the end of the Throne Speech, in paragraph 58, reference is made to the Commons Committee on the Rules of the House, which was set up by the other place during the last session. I realize that this paragraph is directed specifically to the other place, but it contains a hint on which, I believe, we ourselves might usefully act. I am glad therefore to support the suggestion made by Senator Brooks and supported by others, that the Senate set up its own committee to examine the Senate Rules and Proceedings and to bring in whatever recommendations are necessary to bring them up to date.

I should like to quote the last two sentence of paragraph 58, which read as follows:

> In this session you will be asked to continue and expand that committee's work.

That refers to the committee in the other place, of course.

> Canada, in embarking upon its second century of federal government, must provide its Parliament with every facility to ensure that efficiency and thoroughness of deliberation which, in the consideration of every item of public business, is alone the sure protection of the liberty and well-being of our people.

It is interesting to note that this is the only time that the word "liberty" appears in the Throne Speech, and it is used in the context of "thoroughness of deliberation" by Parliament—not just by the other place, but by Parliament, which includes the Senate.

In the light of past experience, perhaps one may be forgiven for wondering whether the word "Parliament," as used in paragraph 58, is not being employed as a synonym for "the other place," and therefore it follows that we should not take it seriously. Personally, I believe we should accept it in good faith, because our democratic processes break down once we begin to impute motives. The Government's interpretation and its sincerity will be indicated by how soon and in what manner paragraph 58 is implemented.

Since the proceedings of our two houses of Parliament are related, I believe this fact of life should be reflected in the rules and standing orders of both institutions. The maximum liaison between the rules committees of both houses is absolutely essential in order to achieve the greatest possible harmony between the workings of Canada's two national assemblies. If and when the Senate does set up such a committee, I hope we will make arrangements to exchange observers with the other place, because some such advice is necessary to ensure that one house does not embarrass or encroach on the preserves and prerogatives of the other. If Canada's two highest assemblies cannot eliminate such simple reasons for friction, how futile it is to think that we can give leadership in the development of that unity which our nation so badly needs.

So much for the first step which involves improving the relationship between this house and the other place.

The next step is closer to home, because it involves getting rid of what appears to be a sort of inferiority complex which, to my mind, pervades this whole institution.

This complex is illustrated by our docile acquiescence to the treatment we receive, which I have already described. It is illustrated by our acceptance of the use of the word "Parliament" as a synonym for "the other place," which implies that this institution does not exist.

It is reflected in other ways as well. I think it desirable that we re-examine our present method of keeping attendance records. I can remember when a suggestion was made in the other place that the Senate method of keeping attendance records be adopted, but this suggestion was rejected because it was not considered to be in keeping with the prestige and status of members of Parliament. Since the B.N.A. Act gives equal status to both houses, this raises the question as to whether senators also should not be equally sensitive to reflections upon their prestige and integrity.

Another example is the facilities and services that are placed at our disposal—typing equipment, secretarial services and working space. Paragraph 58 uses very involved language, but when we cut out all the excess verbiage it simply says that, "Canada...must provide...Parliament with every facility to ensure...efficiency...". In the other place the members are supplied with dictating equipment, and their secretaries with electric typewriters. The Senate secretaries have to make do with ordinary typewriters, many of them of very ancient vintage, and they do not have even sufficient space in which to work.

There is still another example in our postal service. During recess senators are denied mail and mailing facilities on weekends when the Commons side of the post office is open. Since the service to both houses can be provided by the same staff, which has to be on duty anyway, this is absolutely unnecessary. If it is logical to provide dining room and restaurant service on a parliamentary basis then surely it is equally logical that postal services should be provided on the same basis.

I am not advocating waste or useless expenditure. What is needed is an upgrading of services and equipment. By accepting these conditions, honourable senators, we are accepting an implication that the Senate is a second-class institution and that the senators themselves are second-class parliamentarians. This is not only contrary to the British North America Act, but this kind of mentality is sensed by the public at large, and it creates the impression that one should be expected almost to apologize for the Senate as an institution, or for being a member of it. In this way we play directly into the hands of the enemies of democracy by contributing to the destruction of the idea that the Senate is a vital part of the Canadian Parliamentary system.

The third step, honourable senators, in my opinion, is to enlarge the Senate's role, and to increase its usefulness so as to make it an even more vital element in our democratic system. The historic role of the Senate has been to safeguard the rights of minorities, particularly the rights of the provinces, and to give sober second thought to legislation passed by the other place. Sometimes perhaps our thoughts have been a little too sober and perhaps a little too quiet.

Democracy has many imperfections, but we must remember that it is still in a state of evolution, and that despite its many deficiencies it has one overriding virtue, namely, that when all is said and done it still remains the best device known to man whereby individual liberty and freedom can be preserved.

Freedom is never free, and since this is Veterans' Week this may be an opportune time for me to emphasize this fact. Our freedom was dearly bought by our forefathers, and we to whom the torch has been thrown must never let the Canadian people forget the terrible human sacrifice that had to be paid in two wars in order to preserve it for us. That is one of the reasons why I feel so strongly about the matter I am placing before you today.

To ensure freedom and liberty of the individual, even in a democracy, requires a system of checks and balances. In a multiparty system, such as ours, the balance of power often rests with small splinter parties. This gives them a political power out of all proportion to their numbers or their national support. The Senate is a very essential check on the abuses of power by small political groups. It is a check also on one-party rule, because the fact that a party is elected is no guarantee that it will not become tyrannical.

I realize that there are some who think that democracy begins and ends with the election process, and that being elected somehow conveys some sort of superior status. To those I would point out that in a multiparty system such as ours many members are elected with a plurality, and therefore cannot claim to have majority support. This applies to governments as well as to elected representatives. On the other hand, there may be many senators who although appointed may command as great a consensus of support in a province or in the nation as a whole as those who happen to be elected.

The Senate then is a vital safeguard of individual liberty and freedom which is the very essence of democracy. Checks and balances do not exist in a uni-chamber parliament, and this role of the Senate deserves to be emphasized much more than it is.

But, there are other roles that the Senate can perform to a much greater extent than it does. One of Canada's greatest needs today is a sound public opinion on the great national issues of our day, and on those issues which Canadians will have to face in the foreseeable future.

A Commons of minorities cannot provide this. It is not in a position to do so. But, the Senate has the time and the talent, and it is not hampered by minorities. In my opinion, the Senate could and should fill this need by functioning as Canada's great national forum.

This role could be facilitated if some changes were incorporated into our present House Rules and Standing Orders. In particular, I should like to see some changes that would enable senators to put notices of motion and resolutions on the Order Paper, as is done in the other place, instead of debating notices of inquiries as at present. I should like to see changes made to enable senators to put questions on the Order Paper and receive written answers, as is done in the other place, and to have answers printed in our Hansard. I should like also to see rules that would enable debates on notices of motion and resolutions to be organized so as to provide continuity and make it possible to arrive at conclusions.

Finally, I should like to see, if possible, some changes that would make more provision for the airing of public and individual grievances that are brought to our attention. Perhaps this could be done more in our supply debates than has been done in the past.

Another role that the Senate might perform to a much greater extent than at present is that of being the guardian of individual rights, and particularly the rights of federal employees or all those employees which come under federal jurisdiction. During what has been referred to as the "Coyne affair" the Senate caught the public's imagination because it fulfilled this function. There are many federal employees—little men—who are treated very unjustly by their federal employer. I could name several now from personal experience. I should like to see the Senate set up a committee that would act as a sort of ombudsman for these people, by investigating their complaints, either directly or through the Civil Service Commission.

This institution, the Senate, is composed in such a way as to provide representation of regions rather than of individual ridings. I think it would be a good thing if some way could be found to establish a more direct contact between the Senate and the Canadian people. Senate committees can keep track of economic trends, anticipate developments, and accumulate and make public a body of information as a foundation for sound public opinion, on which remedial policies could be based. In performing this service, perhaps Senate committees should move around among the poeple more than has been done in the past.

Honourable senators, it may seem presumptuous on my part as a newcomer to speak in this manner after such a brief time in this chamber. I have done so only for the following reasons. As Senator Grosart pointed out a few moments ago, I too am convinced that the Senate is a vital and essential part of Canada's parliamentary system. I am convinced that the Senate can provide opportunities for service equal to and perhaps even greater than the other place. If I did not believe that, I should never have accepted my appointment to come here. I am equally convinced, however, that there is a great danger that the Senate may disappear during Canada's second century, possibly during the next 20 years, unless some positive steps are taken to prevent it.

The Senate cannot disappear or become a second-class institution unless we permit it to happen. We therefore have a responsibility in this matter, regardless of whatever action may be taken by the other place or by other individuals. I feel I would be failing in my duty to the Senate and to the Canadian people if I did not share with you my concern about this problem and my thoughts about possible solutions. I do hope therefore that my remarks will be received in the spirit in which they are presented and that some positive action will result.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Haig, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 14, 1967

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. John J. Connolly tabled:

Capital Budget of the Farm Credit Corporation for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1968, pursuant to section 80(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, R.S.C., 1952, and a copy of Order in Council P.C. 1967-1114, dated June 1, 1967, approving same. (English and French texts).

VISITING HEADS OF STATE

ROYAL SALUTE—PRIVILEGE

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, may I rise on a question of privilege?

The 21-gun salute is a traditional honour which under normal circumstances, I am sure we all agree, is appropriate to honour visiting heads of state. I am certain none of us take exception to it, and we should adopt any way we can to honour and recognize distinguished visitors. However, in order to afford this honour, is it necessary that as a result of that salute we should be subjected to a blast such as caused the Senate to be adjourned for a few minutes yesterday? Perhaps that was appropriate, but not in the middle of my distinguished colleague Senator Grosart's remarks. It might have come more appropriately during my remarks later on!

Honourable senators, should these blasts be of such magnitude as to shake the foundations and certain parts of this building? As the former Minister of Public Works responsible for the construction of the tunnel connecting the centre block with the west block, I can say that we were at that time forced to endure heavy explosions because the tunnel had to go through hard rock. A 21-gun salute has nothing to do with tunnelling through hard rock, so I ask if it is appropriate that it be carried out with such resounding explosions as almost to scare to death some of the distinguished ladies in these delegations.

I am sure that there is some reason for the loudness of the blast. It may be that the unified command is responsible. Perhaps the chain of command is such that a message has not yet reached the salute battery which, I may say, was formerly on Nepean Point and now has been moved a quarter of a mile closer to the Parliament Buildings, near the site of the Artillery Memorial. It may be that the Air Force should be in charge of this. In any event, honourable senators, perhaps the gunpowder charge has not been reduced to allow for the battery being a quarter of a mile closer to these buildings.

In this Centennial Year it is appropriate to recall that Sir John A. Macdonald once propounded a riddle by asking a very important colonel—this was before unification—"Colonel, can you tell me how much gunpowder I would be required to put under a bull's tail to blow off his horns?" No one has yet determined how much gunpowder is necessary to have a quiet, dignified, and gentle boom in the distance to welcome our distinguished visitors. Surely, honourable senators, the warmth of our welcome to these distinguished visitors is not to be measured by the extent of the noise we make.

May I therefore on behalf of you all, with the greatest of sincerity, supplicate the Leader of the Government in the Senate, whom, along with the Leader of the Opposition, we all admire so much, that he speak to the powers that be—not necessarily the whole Cabinet, but those members who would control this important matter—and perhaps arrange that this condition be ameliorated so that in the future we shall be able to please even the most fastidious of our visitors and at the same time pass muster with that very severe man, the master of protocol.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I shall certainly be very pleased to bring the remarks of our good and learned friend, the honourable Senator Walker, to the attention of the appropriate authorities, but on the one condition that when we know in advance he is going to make a speech we arrange for a 21-gun salute with less powder to be fired before he starts.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

WESTERN FARMERS MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, for Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the following report:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to which was referred the Bill S-12, intttuled: "An Act to incorporate Western Farmers Mutual Insurance Company", has in obedience to the order of reference of June 8, 1967, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Your committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: On division.

Report adopted, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Honourable senators, in view of the proposed adjournment, I move, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FARMERS CENTRAL MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, for Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the following report:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to which was referred the Bill S-13, intituled: "An Act to incorporate Farmers Central Mutual Insurance Company", has in obedience to the order of reference of June 8, 1967, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Your committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: On division.

Report adopted, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Walker: In view of the proposed adjournment, I move, with leave of the Senate, that this bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, June 27, at 8 p.m.

Before the motion is carried, Senator Roebuck will make a few remarks, but I think I owe it to the Senate to say that I have chosen June 27 for two reasons. The first is that we have completed all the work on our program, with the exception of the Speech from the Throne, and there is no need to keep the members of the Senate here specifically to deal with that item.

A bill having to do with the Cape Breton coal situation will be placed on the Order Paper in the other house today or tomorrow, and I hope it will have been debated and disposed of by that house some time next week. If we get it by Tuesday, June 27, we can debate it that evening and on Wednesday and Thursday, taking whatever time we require.

Honourable senators are also aware of the hope that the 1967-68 Estimates will be completed in the other place by the end of June and we may very well be presented with the final appropriation bill. This of course will be subject to the production of supplementary Estimates, as happens every year. No one can be sure whether that bill will be ready by the end of that week or not. It could be that the Senate would work through Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday and perhaps have no business before it on Friday, June 30. I am sure all honourable senators would want to be here for the ceremonies in connection with the Queen's visit on Saturday, July 1, but it is possible that we will have very little, if anything, to do on June 30.

In the circumstances, I still think that it desirable to adjourn until the date proposed, and I hope it carries the unanimous approval of all members.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, if I may, I should like to say a few words.

I would like it understood by the chamber and as a matter of record that the recess which has just been announced by the honourable Leader of the Government applies only in small part to the members of the Special Joint Committee on Divorce. That committee will meet next Tuesday, June 20, and I have the assurance of all those who were present at the last meeting that irrespective of any recess or adjournment which we decide upon, they will be present at that meeting.

On Tuesday we hope to debate the question raised by the proposed report, and I hope by Wednesday at least to have completed our consideration of the subject. If that is carried out and we meet again on Tuesday, June 27, I hope that we will have the copies ready for presentation the following day.

My reason for speaking at the moment is to make clear that the chamber recesses do not apply to committees such as the Special Joint Committee on Divorce and others. Honourable senators will remember other joint committees whose members attended day after day while the chamber itself was in recess. That is the case now so far as the Special Joint Committee on Divorce is concerned. I am quite sure about the attendance of those who were at the last meeting because they assured me they would be there. I would hope that assurance applies also to all other Senate members of the committee who for some reason were not present on the last occasion. I hope they will all attend if possible next Tuesday.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

PRINCIPAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Leave having been given to proceed with Order No. 3:

Hon. Donald Cameron moved the second reading of Bill S-11, respecting Principal Life Insurance Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, may I express my appreciation for your courtesy in extending me the privilege of speaking at this time. I shall be brief.

It may be recalled that on May 18, 1965, I introduced Bill S-9, an act to incorporate the Principal Life Insurance Company of Canada. At that time I indicated that the capital stock of the company was to be $1 million, made up of shares of $100 each and with provision that the capital stock might be increased to $4 million. The bill also provided that the amount to be subscribed before the general meeting for the election of directors was called was to be $500,000, with an additional $500,000 to be contributed as a capital surplus.

At that time I also indicated that the group of young executives who were behind the Principal Life Insurance Company were known as the Collective Group, an organization which had at that time 10 years' experience in selling savings certificates and whose growth record represented an increase in assets of 2400 per cent between 1956 and 1965. The company at that time had 38 offices in Canada and two in the United States and employed over 400 people. In short, this company known as the Collective Group had achieved one of the most spectacular growth records of any company in western Canada. This company has now become known as the Principal Group Limited with their head office in the Financial Building in Edmonton, Alberta.

The Principal Group now controls the following subsidiary companies: First Investors Corporation Ltd., Associated Investors of Canada Ltd., Principal Savings and Trust Company, Athabasca Holdings Ltd., Athabasca Mortgage Corporation Ltd., Principal Mortgage Corp. Ltd., Imperial Real Estate Ltd., and Mercer & Williams Agency Ltd., and affiliated companies, Principal Investors Corporation, Principal Certificate Series Inc., and Collective Mutual Funds Ltd.

May I interject that this company was started one night by a group of young men on their way to an Edmonton-Winnipeg football game. It has had spectacular success since then.

The Principal Group is a diversified financial complex offering the public a complete package of investment and savings services. The group's history of growth is attributable in part to an efficient organizational structure which allows each of the operating companies in the group to make use of the highly specialized pools of talent available at head office. In other words, this is a fully integrated company. Sales, administration and investment are each handled by a specialized arm of the head office group. The sales force distributes the varied financial services of all the operating companies. In this way the Principal Group is able to offer the widest possible range of financial savings and investment services. These services include instalment savings certificates with optional advance deposits, single deposit investments, completion insurance, term annuities, mutual funds, registered retirement plans, savings deposit accounts with free chequing privileges, estate planning and administration, group and executive pension plans, guaranteed investment certificates, mortgage brokerage, real estate brokerage, real estate development and insurance brokerage.

The assets under the administration of the Principal Group Limited totalled $68,692,815 as at December 31, 1966.

As I indicated earlier, on May 12, 1965 I introduced Bill S-9, an act to incorporate the Principal Life Insurance Company of Canada. That bill received royal assent sometime later that year, with the understanding it would not commence any business of insurance until at least $500,000 of its capital stock had been subscribed and at least that amount paid in advance, together with a contribution to surplus of $500,000.

It will be recalled that since that time there have been a number of developments in the financial world which have caused all governments to tighten up and raise their requirements of financial backing before permitting companies to go into business. This tightening up of regulations stemmed from such misadventures as the collapse of the Atlantic Acceptance Corporation, and others, which justifiably raised the concern of governments. In the result, capital requirements have been very substantially increased, with the consequence that all financial institutions dealing with the public's money are now on a much sounder basis than previously.

The effect of the tightening up of these regulations, as far as Principal Life Insurance Company is concerned, can be graphically explained by the following illustrations. For example, one of the member companies of the Principal group is Principal Savings and Trust Company, incorporated with $250,000 of paid-up unimpaired capital. In the spring of 1966, amendments to the governing legislation by the Province of Alberta raised this requirement to $500,000. The requirement has been further increased, by mid-1967, to $750,000.

Two other member companies of the Principal group are, Associated Investors of Canada Limited and First Investors Corporation Limited, both being investment contract companies dealing in a type of savings certificate similar to Investors Syndicate Limited. The Province of Saskatchewan, where these companies are licensed and carry on substantial business, made certain changes to existing legislation in mid-1965, increasing the minimum required net worth to approximately one-twentieth of the statutory reserves of the company. This is the value of the qualified assets, according to The Canadian & British Insurance Companies Act, less the statutory reserves and other liabilities. In order to qualify under the new standards, Associated Investors of Canada Limited will require an additional $388,000, and First Investors will require an additional $112,000, making a total additional requirement of $500,000 additional capital. These three changes mean $750,000 more is required if the three companies are to remain in business in those jurisdictions.

The third factor has been a change in the capital test under The Trustees Act of Alberta. In order to be an approved corporation under the amended act the unimpaired paid-up permanent capital must be increased from $500,000 to $1 million.

As can readily be understood, these very justifiable changes were more than sufficient to disrupt the capital schedule of the Principal group. Consequently, the group needs more time to raise the additional capital required and is therefore asking that the charter, which expires on June 30, 1967, be extended and kept alive for another two years. That, in essence, is the purpose of this bill, simply to give this very successful and very conservatively managed company more time to raise the capital funds required.

In fairness, I should say that the company could have proceeded to finance the Principal Life Insurance Company even under the present circumstances of greatly increased capital requirements, but they have felt they must first ensure that all their subsidiary companies are in a position of first-class soundness, and, rather than spread their funds too thinly, the directors decided to apply for an extension of the Principal Life charter.

In the event that this bill receives second reading, my intention is to ask that it be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee, at which time the principal officers of the company will be available to answer any questions senators may have to ask.

I commend this bill to your sympathetic consideration.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Cameron, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

CAYMAN ISLANDS REGIONAL CONFERENCE

Hon. Allister Grosart rose pursuant to notice:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Caribbean Regional Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association held in the Cayman Islands, 7th to 14th May, 1967, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I apologize for inflicting my views on you for the second time in two days.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): You are not getting the royal salute today!

Hon. Mr. Grosart: As the honourable Leader of the Government knows, I had suggested that the agony might be postponed until honourable senators had had an opportunity to recuperate from my rather long speech yesterday, but the Whips decided otherwise.

As the Notice of Inquiry indicates, it is my duty to report on the Regional Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, held in the Cayman Islands in the second week of May.

The countries represented by delegates were: the Bahamas, Barbados, Bermuda, Grenada, Guyana, British Honduras—shortly to be called Belize—Jamaica, Montserrat, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Trinidad and Tobago, and the British Virgin Islands. Represented by observers only were: The United Kingdom, Canada, and the Turks and Caicos Islands.

There were 28 delegates and five observers present at the conference, Canada's being Mr. Richard Cashin, M.P., Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries, and myself, representing the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association of the House of Commons and Senate. I need hardly add, especially for the benefit of those who know Mr. Cashin, that he proved himself to be an excellent travelling companion and made excellent speeches and good friends for Canada.

The locale of the conference was Georgetown, the capital of Grand Cayman Island, one of the three small islands which constitute the group lying about 180 miles northwest of Jamaica. Together they constitute the group known as the Caymans, consisting of Grand Cayman, Little Cayman and Cayman Brac. The total population of the islands is only about 8,000, so the Caymans are probably the smallest country having a branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

However, I am glad to report that this is one part of the Caribbean which is extremely prosperous, possibly the most prosperous single area in the Caribbean. The main source of income of the islanders is the high wages earned by the seafaring men from the islands and the tourist industry. Caymanians are reputed to be among the world's finest seamen and are in great demand among the shipping lines of the world. There is no unemployment in the islands, wages are high by Caribbean standards, and there is substantial development going on.

The one major problem of Grand Cayman is mosquitoes, but I hasten to say that the mosquitoes behave very well because they do not come out until the tourist season is over. However, they have one of the greatest mosquito control projects in the world under way. A brilliant international team is carrying out the project on a large scale to eliminate the effect of the mosquito problem, hoping to set a pattern that will be useful in Africa and elsewhere. One member of the team is a young Canadian scientist who is operating under the auspices of our External Aid Program. The project requires far more equipment than it has, and Mr. Cashin and I will be discussing the possibility of further aid from Canada under our External Aid Program.

I must say that the arrangements for the carrying out of what proved to be a very successful conference were excellent. I am sure they surpassed what any of us expected from such a small and new branch of the association. The accommodation we had was up to the standard of any of the famous resort areas of the Caribbean. Certainly, the members of the local branch—the chairman, Mr. Spurgeon Ebanks, and the very talented secretary, Mrs. Sibil McLaughlin—deserve the greatest credit for carrying out such a successful conference with the limited resources of people and equipment at their disposal.

They were assisted by Mr. Louis Marriott of the headquarters staff of the C.P.A. in London, and by Mr. Michael Lawrence, a Deputy Principal Clerk of the House of Commons at Westminster.

It is one of the interesting and very important features of these regional conferences that small branches, such as that of the Cayman Islands, are able to call on the help of other branches. I am told that later on Canada will be assisting in these conferences.

The chairman, Mr. Spurgeon Ebanks, as usual, proved to be a very congenial host, and I say the same of the administrator, Mr. John Cumber, C.M.G., M.B.E.

The agenda, of which I shall give you only an outline in order not to take up too much time, was roughly as follows: A discussion of regional co-operation in the economic development of the Caribbean was broken down into Industrial Development, Agricultural Development, and Tourism, and then under the subheading of External Aid we dealt with the United Nations organizations, Canada, the United Kingdom, the O.A.S., and others; the Role of the Ombudsman in Caribbean countries; Nation Building in the Plural Societies, which included discussions of the problems of population, and immigration and emigration in the Caribbean; and the Future of the Caribbean, which included constitutional developments, the future of the smaller islands, and the future of the independent islands.

Honourable senators, I have spoken before about what I consider to be the usefulness of these conferences. As many of you are aware, and as was pointed out by Senator John Connolly, the regional conferences take place between the main Commonwealth Parliamentary Association conferences. They are increasing in number and, for those who have taken part in them, I think it is fair to say that they are increasing in importance. It is perhaps significant that my report today is the fourth to be presented to the Senate in this session, short as it has been, of an interparliamentary meeting. The first was a report on the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group which was presented here on May 8, and included in the record of our proceedings. The second was Senator Fergusson's report on the Interparliamentary Union Conference in Iran. The third was the report Senator Connolly made last Monday night on the C.P.A.'s General Council Working Party Conference in Malta.

Honourable senators, as I said, the Cayman Islands conference was not of the importance of the others in size; it was a regional conference. The primary subject of discussion was on those matters that are of mutual interest to the peoples of the Caribbean. It is there that new nations are emerging every year, and sometimes more frequently. I need hardly emphasize Canada's intense interest in the exciting things that are happening in that area. In this decade already four new sovereign nations have emerged, namely, Jamaica, Trinidad and Tobago, Guyana, and Barbados. Others are certainly well on the way towards independence.

Five countries, as I indicated yesterday, have acquired what is known as associate status. That is, they are Associate States with the United Kingdom, which is a status which accords them full self-government in their domestic affairs, and the right to declare themselves independent at will. These countries are: Antigua, Grenada, St. Lucia, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, and Dominica, and after some constitutional problems are settled, St. Vincent will shortly assume associate status.

This leaves five of the territories of the Caribbean still under the administration of the Colonial Office of the United Kingdom, but each one has its own legislature. The Cayman Islands, with only 8,000 people, and Montserrat, the British Virgin Islands, British Honduras, and the Bahamas, all have a legislature and an administrator appointed by London.

I remember a couple of years ago that some of us who had been interested in the Caribbean for a long time were beginning to think that Canada had missed the boat. There appeared to us to be at that time something less than the full degree of official involvement in the problems of these, the closest of our Commonwealth neighbours. I will not go into all the reasons for that, except to say that it was probably because all of these islands and territories, until very recently, were the official constitutional responsibility of the United Kingdom, and there was a hesitation on the part of our statesmen and officials in the Department of External Affairs to move in, in a colonial kind of way, while another sovereign nation had the major responsibility. The situation, however, has changed and is changing at a very rapid rate.

These new nations are taking their place in our sunny south. I say "our sunny south" because Canadian business has been operating in almost all of the islands and territories there for many years and has made itself welcome. Recently individual Canadians have been flocking into the Caribbean, and in many cases are providing the main source of income. Except for some particular primary resources in, perhaps, Jamaica and Trinidad, by and large the great and the only really important resources of many of these new nations are the sun, the sea, the sand, the climate and the beaches.

Honourable senators, in a very real sense these are our neighbours, and I think they would like me to report to you that they like us Canadians very much. They are already beginning to call Montserrat "little Montreal".

The hotel in which we stayed on the Cayman Islands was owned by Canadians from Vancouver who every season fly down eight P.W.A. flights, each carrying about 85 passengers. The British Virgins, next door as they are to Puerto Rico and the American Virgin Islands, are praying—and I do not think the word is too strong—that their next tourist invasion will be Canadian rather than American.

In the last year or so I am glad to say that the Canadian Government has begun to take a real neighbourly attitude towards, and interest in, the Caribbean. The Caribbean Conference held in Ottawa last year, which was attended by all of the Chief Ministers, is still the subject of very favourable comment in the Caribbean, and they are certainly looking forward to some results from the implementation of the undertakings the Canadian Government gave at that time.

There was recently a Canadian-Caribbean Trade Conference held in St. Lucia, and in Georgetown in the Cayman Islands we heard favourable comments on the attitude taken by Canada.

Even so, honourable senators, there is much still to be done by Canada as a nation to show more interest than it has in the warm welcome that awaits Canadian initiative there. I hope that I may be allowed to say that "Canadian initiative," without giving offence to anyone, will be more welcome there than the initiative of any other nation, large or small.

I was glad to read in the Speech from the Throne that:

> Steps will be taken further to develop Canada's special relations with the Commonwealth countries of the Caribbean.

And:

> The Government also intends to play an active part in the forthcoming meeting of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, as it attaches great importance to the trade problems of less-developed countries.

It is unfortunate that some Canadian reservations taken at the last United Nations Conference on Development were misunderstood. We took an attitude that was interpreted as indicating that we were not in favour of extending product preferences to some of those countries, but there is an explanation, and I am sure it will be cleared up at the forthcoming conference.

It is a further good omen that the assisted immigration project of our Department of Manpower and Immigration is now for the first time being extended to the Caribbean. Our friends there understand the problems in that connection just as well as we do, and I am sure they will co-operate to see that it works out wisely and well.

Honourable senators, I close my remarks by saying that it was a highly successful conference, and I think it was important that Canada be represented there. Our neighbours are certainly to be congratulated on the very high calibre of the background, education and statesmanship, and above all the dedication to parliamentary democracy of those who are leading those countries into full membership in the world community of nations.

They have tremendous problems, and they are looking to us for help which in terms of our affluence is negligible, but in terms of their future may well be the deciding factor between failure or success of nationhood. They have ideals for the future of their own wonderful people in which, apart altogether from any self interest, it will be an everlasting honour for Canada to be a generous and willing helpmate.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, first of all, we are indebted to Senator Grosart and Mr. Cashin for attending this regional conference in the Caribbean. Secondly, we are indebted to Senator Grosart for making this comprehensive report, because the opportunity of doing so in the other place is not as readily available as it is here.

I should like to put on record again that, as a former President of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, I attach the highest importance to these regional conferences, even though our parliamentarians attend only as observers. Senator Grosart has come back fully informed to give a report to the Members of Parliament on the conditions, the aspirations and the desires of the peoples of these areas.

There are parts of the Commonwealth where if this kind of knowledge had been available in other days, perhaps different political results could have been achieved. I think therefore we can obtain a great deal of benefit not only for ourselves but for the Commonwealth at large and for the country affected, if we continue to send people who are as interested in these regional conferences as were Senator Grosart and Mr. Cashin. The Commonwealth Parliamentary Association can only meet once a year, and we cannot repeat the same delegates each time because we have to give opportunities for more and more members to go. So, very often the result is that our touch or feel for the problems of a far distant country is completely unreal. This can be cured in large measure by the relatively inexpensive exercise involved in sending observers to regional conferences. They can help us and also help the general idea behind the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. Again, I thank Senator Grosart.

HON. JOHN J. CONNOLLY, P.C.

TRIBUTE TO HIS WORK AS LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT IN THE SENATE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris: Honourable senators, I ask the indulgence of the house for not more then five minutes. I have my transportation, and I shall be returning to Vancouver tomorrow morning. Before I depart, not knowing when I shall return, I want to be on record as saying something that I believe to be the unanimous view of this house, that is, how fortunate we are in the leader we have on this side of the house (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West). That is no derogation of my honourable friend, the leader on the other side (Hon. Mr. Brooks), who left for New Brunswick a few minutes ago, and whom I also greatly admire.

I have before me the report made by Senator Connolly on June 12 in connection with his attendance at the meeting held recently in Malta. In listening to it I knew that sooner or later I must give expression, as I now do, to my admiration for him and his wonderful capacity for work.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved the third reading of Bill C-106, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, now that the Canadian Wheat Board has become a permanent institution in Canada, I feel that I should point out a few of the historical beginnings of the board itself.

I have before me a book entitled The Canadian Grain Trade by Duncan Alexander MacGibbon, M.A., Ph.D., who was a member of the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission in 1923-24, a member of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada, and for some time Professor of Political Economy at the University of Alberta. At page 57 he states:

> A Commission on Wheat Supplies was set up in London, England.

This was during 1917.

> The British government then created the Wheat Export Company, a grain purchasing agency under the control of this Commission. The Canadian government came into contact with these bodies while acting as intermediary for the Canadian farmers.

On the succeeding page:

> On June 11, 1917, this step was taken by the Dominion Government, which appointed a Board of Grain Supervisors upon which appeared representatives of the various grain interests, with wide powers of control over the disposition of grain.

Yesterday in my remarks I said "Canadian Wheat Board" when I should have said "Board of Grain Supervisors".

Then on page 61:

> When hostilities ceased there was a relaxation of government control over the purchase and distribution of food supplies. A few months after the armistice the arrangements which had existed among the allies and certain neutral nations for the purpose of buying wheat and other supplies, automatically disappeared. In Canada the federal Government was obviously reluctant to continue the Board of Grain Supervisors.

And on page 62:

> The Dominion government called conferences in June and towards the end of July. As a result it decided to create the Canadian Wheat Board to handle the wheat crop of 1919 and such other wheat of previous crops as remained undelivered on August 15, 1919, for after that date the Board of Grain Supervisors would cease to accept grain.

And on page 63:

> The Canadian Wheat Board ceased to accept wheat on August 15, 1920, but by an act of parliament had been given a lease of power for 18 months, dating from November 10, 1919, in order properly to wind up its business.

> When free trading re-opened on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange in the middle of August, 1920, the range in prices for the first week for No. 1 Northern wheat was between $2.69 and $2.74 per bushel. Prices continued to advance until the second week in September, when the high level of $2.85 5/8 per bushel was recorded. Thereafter a decline set in, at first slowly, but gathering force in October until by the end of the year the average price had fallen to below $2.00 per bushel. The downward trend continued. The crop of 1922, having regard to the general level of prices, was marketed at quite unprofitable values.

After the First World War the price of wheat was considerably above what it was prior to that war; and apparently the farmers were quite satisfied with the conditions, when allowing the wheat supervisors and the Wheat Board to operate.

Due to circumstances in 1921, 1922 and 1923, prices began to drop and crop conditions in western Canada were getting poorer in some areas. That brought on a more restive feeling among farmers, that they must have the Wheat Board back again to adjust matters.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Did the honourable senator say that the Wheat Board was really a creation out of the First World War?

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Yes, in 1919.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux, seconded by Hon. Mr. Nichol, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, many of my remarks today are made from notes which were written some few weeks ago. Owing to the exigencies of this Parliament, I was not permitted to proceed then, but I am happy to do so now.

I wish to pay tribute to the mover of the motion for an address, Senator Desruisseaux. I enjoyed his speech. I did not quite follow it as he delivered it, but I read it with interest. I pay tribute also to Senator Nichol, who made a different type of approach. When I left the chamber that afternoon I was rather worried because of the number of deaths which it was forecast would occur in Canada over the following 24-hour period.

Honourable senators, it is impressed upon us every day that this year is Canada's Centennial Year. In Winnipeg, where I come from, in January we had the world hockey tournament, which was most successful both from the standpoint of hockey and of the spectators.

The centennial train came to Manitoba. It was officially welcomed at Brandon on a cold bitter day and then it moved on to other areas of Manitoba. It was in Winnipeg for a week, and over 10,000 people went through the train while it was at the C.N.R. station on Main Street.

Our next item of centennial celebrations was the Military Tattoo, which took place at the arena in May. Only half of the national tattoo, it was a two-hour and fifteen minute show; it started one minute late and ended one minute after it was supposed to end. The tattoo is a wonderful tribute to the three services, who contributed to the spectacle. It was a spectacular historical show, was well done and gave exceedingly great pleasure to those who had the opportunity to attend. I hope that honourable senators will not miss any opportunity they have to visit the tattoo when it is in their area.

Another event to take place this year—in addition to Expo and the Progressive-Conservative leadership convention in Toronto in September—is the Pan-American Games, which will come to Winnipeg from July 27 to August 7.

I have spoken about this before, but the plans are now reaching the final stages. We expect some 3,300 to 3,400 athletes, plus trainers and officials. At the present moment we know that this is the largest Pan-American Games ever held and also the largest sporting event in the North American continent. One can readily appreciate that this two-week period will be a most important period for the City of Winnipeg.

At the end of the show, Winnipeg will receive an Olympic-size swimming pool, the only one in Canada; and we will receive a Velodrome which, to the uninitiated, is a cycling track. The interior of that track will be used for high school football games.

Honourable senators, there were approximately 29 articles in the Speech from the Throne but only about four of them were new. One of those four is a proposal to enforce certain safety standards. That, however, has not been spelled out in the Speech from the Throne, so we must wait to see whether it will apply only to automobiles, boats and other vehicles.

Senator Kinnear, as reported at page 76 of Senate Hansard, gave us a clear exposition of the dangers of water and air pollution. Fortunately, in my province that has not been a serious problem as yet. I can understand the difficulties people have who are affected, especially by water pollution.

In the past, there has been a grey area in the criminal law, on the question of capital punishment. There was a free vote last year in the House of Commons, and the proposal to abolish capital punishment was not sustained. Evidently the Government intends to introduce another proposal for the abolition of capital punishment.

There is also to be a report from the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Divorce. I have had the opportunity to read that report and discuss it with the co-chairman, Senator Roebuck. Without divulging the confidential contents of that document, I would say that practically all the briefs that we received and discussed with witnesses indicate there should be some relaxation or broadening of the present grounds. The committee's report will not be unanimous in its present form, changes will be made in it, but that will not be through any fault of our chairman Senator Roebuck. He did a tremendous job in organizing the committee meetings, in seeing they were kept going, and in the monumental task, with his assistants, of preparing this report. When members receive it, as they will shortly, they will find it a document which will take its place among those things the Senate does well.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: A favourite topic amongst members of this chamber and outsiders is the question of the retention, abolition or reform of the Senate. I have spoken about this before. During the last session I raised a question of sitting hours, suggesting that we meet at 2.30 in the afternoon. The Leader of the Government indicated that would require rule changes which could be taken up at the new session. I hope that a study of rule changes will be proceeded with, or at least referred to a committee.

I think that the potential capabilities of the members of this house, coming as they do from all parts of Canada, from different professions and businesses, is not being made use of to the fullest extent. It is absolutely wasteful that we should have leaders in business and the professions coming down here on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday till about 4 o'clock. I think it is a waste of talent and ability. If, as Senator Carter said yesterday, senators are under the gun, if you want to call it that, the proper and full use of this chamber can be taken care of in several ways. I think there should be a better organization and an increase in the committee work. Last session there were several occasions when two or more committees were meeting at the same time. Why do we have to start in normal sessions on the Tuesday night at 8 o'clock, sit Wednesday and Thursday and have the committees meet on Wednesday morning and Thursday morning? It is all very well for those who can get a train or an airplane out of here and get home in an hour or two, but the far eastern and far western members are not in that position. I therefore throw out as a suggestion to the leaders that we might sit for three weeks and adjourn for a full week, because there have not been many times when this house was so rushed that we had to meet a deadline.

There is another factor that I do not like at all. It happened last session. We passed a supplementary estimate for Expo of some $21 million, gave it Royal Assent, and then had a committee meeting on it the next day. We were told by Mr. Shaw, the Deputy Commissioner, that he had notified the Government two weeks before we met that he could not meet his payroll without assistance. I think that is bad management, and it should not happen again.

There is something further I would like to say. I do not take the pessimistic attitude that Senator Carter has taken of this place. You do have a certain sense of frustration because of the fact that you are down here, you have had some experience in certain areas and it has not been made use of. I believe that a solution, or a partial solution, would be to have the chairmen of the standing committees meet and decide what time of the week they would hold their meetings. I think it is a disgrace for visitors to this chamber to see the lack of attention that is being paid to public business. Some time ago I raised the question of conversations having taken place between members. It happened again this afternoon. I spoke to His Honour the Speaker about it and he did stop it the next time it occurred, but it is still going on.

As Senator Carter said, this is not a place for burned-out politicians, party hacks. It is for people who have accepted a summons to this place, who feel that they can provide some help in governing our country. We are facing a difficult time in the world today. The point is that we must recognize that this Parliament is only one of three arms of the legislative capacity who have the power to tax. There is the federal, the provincial and the municipal authorities. All three authorities are trying to say, "Let the other fellow do it." The municipalities and cities say, "Let us build something; we will get it from the province." Then the provinces say, "Let us get it from the federal." But the money is coming out of the same pocket whether it is spent federally, provincially or municipally. I therefore think all governments should take a closer look to see that our expenditures do not exceed our ability to pay.

I also think that when you start all these grandiose schemes of social welfare, adding payents here and payments there, somebody has to meet it, and the sooner we step in and face up to our responsibility as legislators the better it will be for Canada.

I have one other comment in connection with Expo. When we first heard about Expo some three or four years ago the cost to our minds was staggering, and yet it went ahead. I have visited it several times and think it is the most imaginative, well thought out and well conducted exposition that has ever been held. I believe it will be of lasting benefit to Canada. It should draw together the different groups in our country. True, certain mistakes are being made, or have been made, but they will be corrected. Every person I have spoken to who has been there has strongly recommended his or her friends to attend. It gives a wonderful opportunity to all sections of Canada to visit "La Belle Province". I think it will create a greater sense of unity, or at least it should—if it does not, it will not be the fault of Expo 67.

I cannot close without paying tribute, as many others have done, to the honourable Leader of the Government. Senator Connolly is under great strain to get legislation through this house. As Senator Carter indicated yesterday, it is not our fault that the other place does not get the legislation over, but I certainly do not like to see the Senate endorse supplementary Estimates just 15 to 20 minutes before the Deputy Governor is due to come here to give Royal Assent. I therefore suggest that this place has an opportunity to correct and abolish any faults that we may think we have, or that other people think are here.

Hon. L. M. Gouin: Honourable senators, first of all I wish to congratulate Senator Haig on his remarks. I would add that I share his enthusiasm for Expo. I am convinced it will do much to promote Canadian unity. It is not only a national enterprise but also an international undertaking, and at the present time the eyes of the whole world are turned towards Expo, Montreal.

I also listened with great interest to the remarks of Senator Haig concerning what I would call the reform of the Senate or its procedures. Personally, I am absolutely in favour of having a committee to study that matter as soon as possible. First of all we would have to try to work out a program so that our deliberations would produce the good results we are all anxious to obtain.

I particularly congratulate, though he is not present just now, Senator Desruisseaux, who moved the motion now before us, and Senator Nichol who seconded it. Among the excellent addresses to which we have listened, I wish to mention especially that of the Acting Leader (Hon. Mr. Deschatelets), and also that of the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks). The acting leader did exceedingly well, but we are very glad to see the leader with us again.

The sources of inspiration for my modest contribution to this great debate are found in the remarks of Senator Desruisseaux to some extent, and for the rest in the Speech from the Throne.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the period from 1867 to 1967 is a century of history; during those hundred years, the feeble colonies which united in 1867 have become a prosperous and dynamic country. This astonishing progress was achieved through the patient efforts and energy of those who have preceded us. The progress has been maintained by our contemporaries, for they have remained faithful to the lessons of their forefathers and even more so to their example.

We are today the heirs of the political masterpiece undertaken 100 years ago. Undoubtedly, our Constitution is not perfect but this 100-year old charter has enabled us to survive, to progress and to grow which is undoubtedly what matters. Only a federal union could ensure Canadian unity while respecting in our various ethnic groups the diversity of our origins, of our languages, of our beliefs, of our traditions, of our way of life.

To the four original provinces were added, with time, six other provinces as well as the Yukon and the territories of the far north. In 1867, there were about 3 and a half million people in Canada, and today, we are at least 20 millions inhabiting this vast land, one of the largest in the world.

In the last 100 years, as mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, the world has gone through such an evolution that those who laid the foundations of Confederation would no longer recognize it. Up to now, our constitutional framework has withstood the attacks of time and all kinds of difficulties.

[English]

And, honourable senators, this first century of our experiment with federalism has proved that it was basically sound for the period that has just been completed. We must now show our willingness to adapt the application of our Constitution to changing needs and changing conditions. As remarked in the Speech from the Throne:

> It is in this spirit that the government has in recent years actively promoted the reform of detailed federal-provincial arrangements which, with the fundamental law, compose the constitutional structure of our country.

In other words, without changing the B.N.A. Act on some points, as Senator Thorvaldson remarked, it is possible to develop and to improve procedures for consultation and co-ordination between Ottawa and the governments of our ten provinces. Such a reform, such a system of intergovernmental co-operation, becomes with time more and more necessary for the effective operation of our federal system.

It seems clear, for instance, that the Quebec Government wants to take charge completely of social security in our province. From this, it must not be concluded that Ottawa trespassed on provincial rights when it inaugurated a system of social security. Such legislation on social security was not an encroachment on the prerogatives of the province. For one reason or another, Quebec at that time could not or would not initiate its own system in a great part of social legislation. That field was unoccupied and Ottawa stepped in to fill that vacuum. Amendments to our Constitution were obtained for Unemployment Insurance and for Old Age Security. Federal contributions were accepted for promoting vocational training, for family allowances, for hospitals, etc. Quebec now wants to recover its unused jurisdiction. I hope sincerely that this result can be achieved in a reasonable way, provided federal-provincial negotiations are carried on in good faith and with a sincere intention to render justice to all parties concerned.

It would be premature, honourable senators, to take steps to amend our Constitution when we do not know yet what changes the majority of our population wants to be introduced in the B.N.A. Act or on what principles a new Constitution should be based.

The Speech from the Throne refers to an orderly reform "which may well be the best way of preserving and strengthening our heritage," but evidently "the most careful consideration must be given to what we do." In this matter, there must be room for a sober second thought.

Constitutional studies, which I have not had the opportunity to read, have recently been tabled in the Ontario Legislative Assembly. The Quebec Legislature appointed a few years ago a special committee to study our Constitution and to report on the changes which it would deem advisable. Personally, I am very anxious to take communication, as soon as possible, at least of a preliminary report from the Quebec committee on the Constitution. From that moment we would know at least to some extent what problems may be studied in what I would call a concrete manner and not purely in the matter of theories or doctrines. I hope that the recommendations which will be made to our provincial authorities will show wisdom and good judgment and a sense of realism. I trust that the changes to be contemplated will, after full discussion, be of such a nature that they can be implemented in a practical way and without destroying—that is the vital point, without destroying—our country as we know it. We have not yet reached the stage where a legal draft may be made to embody such fundamental amendments. Instead of speaking in general terms and of proclaiming vague principles which may be interpreted as meaning many different things, according to the various mentalities of those who use such phraseology, it is high time to define clearly what is really wanted.

A politician in Quebec once said that he was in favour of an associate state. He added "I don't know what it is, but I am in favour of it." Well, I am sorry, but this shows a complete lack of responsibility, because this is a very serious matter and I do not think that the proof of the validity of the benefits of an associate state have yet been shown anywhere in the world. It was tried at the end of the colonial period of what I would call the French Empire for the countries of North Africa, and the result was purely and simply the end of the colonial empire.

Two of my good friends, an excellent Conservative notary, Marcel Faribault, and a good Liberal lawyer, Robert M. Fowler, remain the only ones of our prominent businessmen who have submitted in black and white their suggestions in a book intituled Ten to One. It is the only tentative draft which just now we can possibly have before us, and I submit that it can be studied with great interest even in the matter of the reform of the Senate.

I do not accept the point of view of those two authors with regard to everything, but it is the only way in which we can know with what part of their work we agree and with what part we disagree; it is the only way to try to proceed in a reasonable and practical fashion, to have a text, I repeat, in black and white. I am sorry there are only two prominent businessmen who have taken the trouble to present us with such an excellent essay.

The Speech from the Throne states that studies to obtain the best advice on constitutional reforms are now under way, with a view to subsequent consideration of the whole problem by Parliament. Recently, an eminent Montreal lawyer, Carl Goldenberg, Q.C., and a distinguished professor, Professor Head from western Canada, have been appointed Counsel and Assistant Counsel to serve on the team now working here in Ottawa on constitutional matters. It gave me great satisfaction to be made aware of those developments.

Personally, I am convinced that the Government is following the right course in this important matter, because it is necessary to gather as quickly as possible the documentation required for the deliberations of a constitutional conference. Such a conference cannot be called unless the papers required for its deliberations have first been prepared and classified. Otherwise, I believe it would simply result in confusion. There is no clear public opinion on those questions and, in a certain sense, we would not know with what part of the reforms we should begin.

The necessity for amendments to our Constitution is, to a large extent, the consequence of the evolution of our concept of the state. The interventions of the state 100 years ago were of a purely negative character. The state had more or less the role of the glorified policeman. It was there to prevent breaches of the peace; it was there to repress crime. It was the era of individualism, of "laissez faire, laissez aller," and the state was supposed to interfere as little as possible with the liberty of the individual. Unlimited competition, or the law of the jungle, was the rule, and the result was the survival of the fittest. Poorhouses existed for those who had failed, but the community had not yet devised any scheme to give to all its citizens, at the start, an equal opportunity to secure by their own efforts sufficient means to provide for the mass of the people a decent standard of living, not only during the active part of their life, but also during their old age.

The Speech from the Throne states very clearly that what must be "the central concern of Canadian society" is:

> the well-being of each individual, so that, regardless of his place or station at birth, he will have an equal chance to realize his full potential in the economic, social, political and cultural sense.

By way of conclusion of that doctrine of equal opportunity, the Speech from the Throne proclaims:

> A country is a home—

I think this sentence is really full of meaning; it is in itself a whole philosophy.

> A country is a home; it must be built and furnished for the good life of its people.

Let me now apply this doctrine to the particular case of the Canadians of French origin. Speaking for myself, I declare without any hesitation that I feel at home anywhere in Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from our border to the south to our Arctic regions. However, we should try to find ways to have all Quebeckers and all Canadians of French origin feel at home wherever they are in Canada. I want us to show to all our fellow Canadians that we are earnestly carrying on our struggle "against social injustice, against cultural mediocrity, against spiritual stagnation and against all forms of intolerance." Again, those words are to be found in the Speech from the Throne.

Surely, this is a great ideal. In its pursuit, we are inspired by the glorious example of our forefathers whose mission it was to occupy and develop this northern half of the New World. For their heroic display of physical effort, for their sacrifices in pursuing this gigantic task and in surmounting obstacles which seemed impossible to conquer, let us pay a tribute of admiration to those who have preceded us and who have left us that splendid heritage.

By way of conclusion, I wish to refer to a booklet I received at the beginning of the month from the Ambassador of the United States to Canada. It is an interesting publication entitled, The Great Ring of Canada. On the first page there is a foreword signed by no less a person than President Johnson. The first citizen of our good neighbour notes that:

> For a century Canadians have fought to fashion a strong nation stretching across a hard and untamed continent. They have succeeded beyond the dreams of the pioneers of 100 years ago.

The President adds:

> Today Canada is a prosperous land of free people deeply committed to the cause of liberty.

The President of the United States is quite right when he states that we live in a democratic society. I would add that our Canadian society is inspired by an ideal of social justice, that it believes ardently in social justice, that it wants also to be a "good society"—to use an expression so often found in the speeches made in the great republic—a society in which it is good to live, whether we be young or old. Yes, we trust that it will be possible to give to every Canadian a guaranteed minimum income. Yes, we want, with all our hearts, to succeed in our war against poverty. We are thankful to President Johnson for having extended to us, on behalf of all Americans, their warmest congratulations on our great achievements of the past century, and for having expressed to us their best wishes for a successful and prosperous future.

Honourable senators, we are proud of our past and our ancestors. We are anxious to imitate them, to preserve and to continue to develop our sacred heritage, this wonderful land of ours.

For our future, "In God we trust". May our success and our prosperity continue to flourish. If we really want such a blessed era not to cease—and I quote once more from the Speech from the Throne—we "must be aware that as our success and promise of today rest on the actions of the past, so what we have tomorrow will depend on what we do today." For the succeeding generations, the present is the continuation of the past, as tomorrow will be the continuation of today.

May God continue to guide us.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Argue, debate adjourned.

ST-JEAN-BAPTISTE DAY

TELEVISION COVERAGE OF PARADE IN MONTREAL

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

Since we will not be sitting again until June 27, and since the day of the patron saint of French Canadians is Saturday, June 24, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to something that occurred last year, which I thought was of particular national significance. It was the celebration of the Feast of St-Jean-Baptiste by a great parade in Montreal. The parade was carried over the French TV network. I watched it because I happened to be alone in the country, and I had my television set tuned to the French channel. I was most impressed with the program, and I thought it was a great pity that there were no English commentators, and that this great event was not broadcast to all parts of Canada. It is one of the great demonstrations that takes place spontaneously in this country.

I am mentioning it at this time in the hope that it will be reported in the press. I am personally going to get in touch with the C.B.C. to see if it can be broadcast on the English network, in the same way as it is on the French network.

I draw it to the attention of the Senate because it is a matter of national significance and importance.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 27, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 27, 1967

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—perhaps I should address you as My Lords, because the seating arrangement in the chamber tonight is similar to that of the House of Lords. Their Lordships sit on benches like these, instead of on chairs behind desks.

I now table the following documents:

Report of the National Research Council, including the Report of the Medical Research Council, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, pursuant to section 16(3) of the Research Council Act, chapter 239, R.S.C., 1952, and also the Report of the Canadian Patents and Development Limited for the same period, certified by the Auditor General, pursuant to sections 85(3) and 87(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

Order in Council P.C. 1967-1130, dated June 6, 1967, authorizing, under section 21A of the Export Credits Insurance Act, long-term financing by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation for the purchase, for export, of rails and track accessories by Ferrocarriles Nacionales De Mexico from Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, Limited, pursuant to section 21B of the said Act, chapter 105, R.S.C., 1952, as amended 1960-61. (English text).

Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, of Wednesday, June 14, 1967, pursuant to section 7 of the Regulations Act, chapter 235, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

Report of the Postmaster General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1966, pursuant to section 77 of the Post Office Act, chapter 212, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

Copy of Treaty on Principles governing the Activities of States in the Exploration and use of Outer Space, including the Moon and other Celestial Bodies. Done at London, Moscow and Washington January 27, 1967. (English and French texts).

Report of the Agricultural Stabilization Board for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, pursuant to section 14 of the Agricultural Stabilization Act, chapter 22, Statutes of Canada, 1957-58. (English and French texts).

Report of the Agricultural Products Board for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, pursuant to section 7 of the Agricultural Products Board Act, chapter 4, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

Report on the Administration of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, pursuant to section 49 of the said Code, chapter 38, Statutes of Canada, 1964-65. (English and French texts).

Report on the Operations of the Municipal Development and Loan Board, including its Accounts and Financial Statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, pursuant to section 20 of the Municipal Development and Loan Act, chapter 13, Statutes of Canada, 1963. (English and French texts).

Report of the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, pursuant to section 21(1) of the Atomic Energy Control Act, chapter 11, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

Report of the number and amount of Loans to Immigrants made under section 69(1) of the Immigration Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, pursuant to section 69(6) of the said Act, chapter 235, R.S.C., 1952 (English and French texts).

Statement of Receipts and Expenditures under Part V of the Canada Shipping Act (Sick Mariners) for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, pursuant to section 321 of the said Act, chapter 29, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

OUTER SPACE TREATY—URGENCY TO RATIFY

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, perhaps I should take this opportunity to make a short statement about the ratification by Canada of what is now known as the Outer Space Treaty. The intention is that Canada should ratify the treaty touching the principles governing activities of states in the exploration and use of outer space, including the moon and other celestial bodies. An order in council authorizing such ratification will shortly be passed.

I should first say something about the reason why ratification by Canada is a matter of some urgency. It is because the three depositary countries—the United Kingdom, the United States and the Soviet Union—are themselves in the process of ratifying this treaty in accordance with their respective constitutional procedures. The three governments will soon agree on the date upon which each will deposit its instrument of ratification with the other two, as prescribed in the treaty, thereby bringing it into force. Once this has happened other countries will be able to deposit their instruments of ratification and thus bring the treaty into effect for themselves.

Canada played an active part in the negotiations which culminated in the adoption of the text of the treaty. Since Canada was one of the first countries to sign the treaty on January 27, this year, it is thought that we should be among the first to ratify it. The treaty, a copy of which I have already tabled, is intended to ensure that outer space, the moon and other celestial bodies, will be explored and used only for peaceful purposes and that there can be no national appropriation of any such body.

The parties to the treaty undertake not to place in orbit around the earth any body carrying nuclear weapons or any other weapons of mass destruction, or install such weapons in or on celestial bodies or station such weapons in outer space. The establishment of military bases, installations and fortifications on celestial bodies, and the testing of any type of weapons there are also forbidden.

These terms incorporate the main ideas expressed in the 1963 United Nations resolution on outer space.

The treaty emphasizes freedom of scientific investigation on celestial bodies. It also stresses co-operation among states, both in avoiding the contamination of outer space and in the dissemination of information on conditions which might cause harm to the health or affect the safety of astronauts. States which are party to the treaty are to consider, on the basis of equality, requests from other parties to build tracking facilities on their territory for observing the flight of space objects.

The treaty does not, by its terms, require any legislative action on the part of those countries which become parties to it.

It would be particularly appropriate for Canada, by ratification, to be among the first countries formally to accept the principles which the treaty enshrines.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask the honourable leader if this is the treaty which was drawn up by the International Legal Committee of the United Nations?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The treaty follows the lines of the resolution which was passed at the United Nations in 1963.

FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Divorce, presented the committee's second and final report.

He said: Honourable senators, I have a document in my hand that has taken me, along with the rest of the committee, a very long time to complete and to put into this form. I have the honour to present the second and final report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Divorce.

The Clerk Assistant (reading): The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Divorce makes its second and final report as follows—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I have the privilege of addressing the Senate for a few minutes?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I hope that honourable senators will bear with me for at least a little while. I realize that this subject has been a special duty and responsibility of the Senate for 100 years, and that no consequential amendments to the laws regarding divorce have been before us in all that time, with four minor exceptions.

Honourable senators will remember, of course, the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act which was passed. That was one of the amendments and a fairly important one. Then there was the change, as you will also remember, in 1930, when we made a partial correction of the ancient rule with regard to the domicile of wives deserted by their husbands. Then there was the empowering of the courts of the Province of Ontario to hear divorce petitions and to adjudicate thereon, and there was the trifling matter in British Columbia of transferring the right of appeal in divorce matters from the courts of first instance to the Court of Appeal of that province. That is everything that has occurred with regard to the substance and procedures in the law of divorce that has occurred in Canada in the last hundred years. Thus a very great task was undertaken by the committee which I have the honour to represent at the moment. This committee entered into a virgin field, with a very great deal of material and very much to alter and consider. For that reason I wish to give some assistance to my fellow members when they come to read the report which will be in their hands, I have been promised, tomorrow.

Before doing so there is an explanation which I think I owe to this house. This chamber is entitled to know the contents of a report to Parliament prior to the information being published. Yet, honourable senators will remember that on Wednesday last, June 21, the members of the house heard, or most of them did at least, on the air and read later in the press what purported to be the particulars of this report of the Special Joint Committee on Divorce. This report was not in existence when you heard those reports made on the air and read them in the press. This report has not been made public until this moment when I have presented it to this house, and I wish to assure my fellow members in this chamber that that information was not divulged by the committee, or on its instructions, or by the joint chairmen or by either of them. The information was pirated from the committee while in private session, meeting in camera, for the purpose of considering and preparing this report. The information contained comes in large part from a memorandum prepared as the basis for discussion by the committee in private, and the report, as I said, was not then in existence. Those who published the report well knew at that time that it was the private proceedings of a parliamentary committee meeting in secret, in private, in camera.

Now, what I would like to point out is that the publication of information of a private meeting of a parliamentary committee is a breach of the privileges of Parliament. It is not only that: it is action in contempt of Parliament.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I might point out that committees of Parliament are regarded in parliamentary law, traditionally, and at the present moment, as part of Parliament itself and of the house that constitutes the committee in question.

Item 203 of the Third Edition of Beauchesne says this:

> It is declared to be a breach of privilege for a member, or any other person, to publish the evidence taken before a Select Committee, until it has been reported to the House.

I am speaking strongly, not that I have any feeling particularly in the matter, but because there will be many such parliamentary committees in the future, from time to time, which will surely be entitled to their privacy when meeting in camera to consider their advice to Parliament. To spy on a committee of that kind is very much like eavesdropping on a jury when it is considering its verdict. Further, I point this out, that were the privacy of members of Parliament not respected when sitting in a committee behind closed doors, it would be impossible for our committees to function properly. I want it clearly understood that no matter who gives the information away, that institution which publishes information obtained as a result of a violation of a confidence entrusted to someone, is doing so in contempt of Parliament, in breach of the privileges of Parliament, and is making the carrying on of the work of Parliament almost impossible.

Hon. Mr. Walker: As many of us had not realized that this had happened, would the honourable senator be good enough to tell us the newspaper involved?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, I will not.

Hon. Mr. Walker: That is not important?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I do not know who gave the information out, and I am not interested in that. I am interested only in those newspapers, and radio or television stations which took advantage of a breach of confidence and published a report contrary to the privileges of Parliament. It is the institution I consider, not the individuals. I would rather not go into detail as to just who was responsible. I do not know who was responsible.

Honourable senators, I felt duty bound to make that statement. May I turn now to something more pleasant, I hope, and that is the report of the committee itself.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Before the honourable senator proceeds, may I ask if he has considered the fact that some member of his committee leaked this information to the newspapers he is talking about?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Are you asking if it was a member of the committee?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have no means of knowing, but I can do my guessing.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Unless the report is entirely untrue, surely somebody must have leaked the information to them, and that somebody could only be a member of your committee. You are denouncing the press as a whole. I should like to ask the honourable senator if he has discussed this with members of his committee.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I am not a detective, and I am not interested in accusing any honourable senator or any honourable member of the House of Commons of violating a confidence. All I know is that some news media that should be responsible transferred that confidence to the public.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): But, sir, you must know the news media that published the information. You are indicting the whole institution of the press—why would you do this? You know where you read this information.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I heard it on the air.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): If the Toronto Daily Star first published the information, then why not say so?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I heard it on the air. That is all I know.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Was it the C.B.C. that broadcast it?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, I heard it over the air.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: And did you read it in the Toronto Daily Star?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is as far as I am going.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Did my honourable friend not read it in a newspaper?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I am not going to be cross-examined.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: You read the newspapers.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): I would ask the honourable senator to be frank with us.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have told honourable senators that I heard it first in a C.B.C. broadcast. Once it has been made public I cannot see how other newspapers could avoid making reference to it.

Hon. Mr. Walker: You are accusing the Toronto Daily Star, are you not?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Exactly.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, I am not.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: May I ask the honourable senator, was it more than one newspaper that published this report originally, or only one?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have not read them all.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): But you read some?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, and so did you. You can get up and say where you read it, if you wish.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): I know nothing about it, but if I were making an accusation against the press I would specify the newspaper or newspapers in which I read the report.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I will leave that to honourable senators. I have put the facts before my colleagues, and I give warning that publication of private information of that kind of a parliamentary committee is a breach of the privileges of Parliament. That is as far as I am going. If you want to accuse some newspaper of it, go ahead and do it.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Will the honourable senator permit a question? Does he think it fair to single out one TV network and name it, and then, having said he read a report in the press, to refuse to name the newspaper? The honourable senator has named the C.B.C. I ask him, in all fairness, to name the newspaper in which he says he saw this report.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, I will not do that.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Why not?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): You are indicting the whole press. You will not name the one newspaper in which you saw it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I am not indicting the press at all. I told you that I heard it first on the C.B.C. That is as far as my knowledge goes. You have read the newspapers, and you know just as much about this matter as I do.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): I never saw it in the press at all, but you did, and yet you refuse to name the paper in which you saw it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have made all the answer I am going to make. If I may, I shall return to what I hope is a more pleasant subject, namely, the report.

Honourable senators, the report is divided into five parts, the first of which contains the recommendations which are themselves divided into four divisions.

The first division contains descriptions of marital offences which have been considered grounds for divorce, and others that the committee considers should be made grounds for divorce. In the second division honourable senators will find incorporated the idea of the marriage breakdown as the result of certain actions on the part of one or other of the partners to the marriage which may not be marital offences, and which are certainly not offences of which one can be accused in court. The third division deals with separation. When the parties to a marriage have separated and the marriage has become a dead letter, and where the marriage partners have not been living together, the committee feels that one or other of them should be allowed to have the marriage dissolved.

In Part II will be found a very clear and somewhat comprehensive statement of the law of Canada and the various provinces. Our law and its history is stated there, as well as that of England, Scotland, Australia, New Zealand, and the States to the south of us, particularly the State of New York which for a long time allowed divorce on the ground of adultery only, very much as we have in Canada, but which more recently has widened the grounds for divorce very materially.

Let me come back to the first division. Adultery has been the ground for divorce, as all honourable senators know, for a long time. It was the ground for divorce because it was adopted as such in England in 1858, and the English law was made applicable in a number of our provinces as it existed on July 5, 1870.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: July 5 or July 15?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It was as of July 5, 1870.

Adultery, and in addition rape, sodomy and bestiality, have been grounds for divorce, according to the law of Canada, or most of its provinces, for a very long time. This report advocates that we make no change in that law as it stands today. In fact, no suggestion was made to the committee in its many hearings that that law should be changed, but only that it be extended.

It will be noticed that the next matter on which the committee advises is with respect to cruelty. Cruelty is a ground for divorce in England, Australia, New Zealand, and in some of the states of the United States. It has also been a ground for judicial separation in all the provinces of Canada except one, Ontario, and that is because the courts of that province up to this date have not had the power to grant judicial separation. Cruelty is something that completely upsets the marital relationship and for a very long time it has been a ground for ending the marriage by judicial separation, without the right of remarriage, in all but one of the provinces of Canada.

The next matter is that of desertion. Where the wife or the husband has been deserted by the other spouse for a period of three years, during which there has been no cohabitation and where there is no reasonable expectation of a resumption of cohabitation within a reasonable period, then the committee recommends that that be a ground for divorce.

The next subject—and I must, of course, cover them quickly if I am not to make an unreasonably long speech—is wilful non-support. Of course, that is very prevalent as you know. The family courts of some of our provinces have made heroic efforts to obtain support for deserted wives. But frequently the husband cannot be found, and if he is found and brought back, often at considerable expense, he can beat the order easily by pleading poverty. Therefore, when the husband wilfully fails to support his family we think it is reasonable that the wife should be able to obtain dissolution of the marriage and perhaps make a better marital arrangement elsewhere.

Bigamy in our law has been considered adultery and has been acted on by our courts on the basis of adultery. It is quite obvious, however, that as the law stands, the applicant must prove not only the second marriage but also that the parties have been living together; that is, the adultery as well as the bigamous marriage must be proved. It does seem to us to be reasonable that if a husband or wife enters into a second marriage bigamously that should give the other party the right to dissolve the marriage.

Finally, in this division, is a wilful non-consummation extending for a period of at least one year. Honourable senators will remember that for a long time the Senate Divorce Committee and the courts of most of the provinces have granted annulments on the ground of non-consummation of marriage, but restricted to non-consummation as a result of some infirmity on the part of one of the spouses. In England, and as well in Australia and New Zealand, but not in Canada, a wilful refusal to consummate is considered ground for divorce. This committee is of the opinion that that should be the law in Canada, namely, that wilful refusal to consummate over a period of at least one year should give to the offended spouse the right to dissolve the marriage.

Those are the offences upon which the committee advises extension of the grounds for divorce.

The next division gives effect to the reasonable portion of the principle of marriage breakdown. We were strongly urged by quite a number of responsible witnesses to abolish all offences as grounds for divorce and to concentrate on one point, that is, marriage breakdown. If there is a breakdown, if cohabitation has ceased and there is no reasonable prospect of a resumption of marriage, irrespective of the actions of either of the parties, either party may apply for divorce. Well, that is quite a big order, is it not? The idea of marriage breakdown became public and widely so, because the Archbishop of Canterbury appointed a small committee to study the question of divorce. That committee brought in the widely-publicized report called Putting Asunder, in which it advanced the theory that all offences be abolished as ground for dissolution, and that the ground on which dissolution should be granted is the marriage breakdown, that is, that the marriage in fact no longer exists.

They pointed out that the change would be so great that our present methods of trial would be no longer sufficient and should be replaced by an inquisition, that is, the courts should be armed with social workers, professional persons, and others, and that when an application is made these people should go around and nose into the affairs of the family in question. That sounded all right when it was said, but it did seem to me and to most of the members that it would be highly objectionable to have social workers investigating the private affairs of the family and reporting to the judge behind the backs of the interested parties.

Perhaps I can give an illustration. Supposing my wife—unfortunately, I no longer have one—is suing me for divorce in the court, and the court puts the crews of social investigators on me. They will investigate the family, so I suppose the first person they would interview would be my mother-in-law. I have nothing against mothers-in-law.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Draw the line somewhere!

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I think they are very fine people, but I can tell you that in a row between a husband and wife the mother-in-law is a partisan of the wife, and quite naturally so.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Not always.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Pretty nearly always. There would be a good deal of chit-chat at the corner grocery store and elsewhere. Think what would happen when these investigators returned to the judge and informed him confidentially what they had found out. Would you say that would be less objectionable than the ancient methods of trial developed in England, and here for many years, where the accuser came in the open? An accused has a chance to know who is accusing him and what is the accusation and has an opportunity of reply.

Our committee has no intention of advising the abolition of our present methods of trial or of adopting the methods of inquisition of ancient Rome or, for example, present Spain or Germany. We will stay with the present methods.

While we are not prepared to scrap our present methods of trial or to abolish the ancient and well-known grounds for divorce, nevertheless this idea of marriage breakdown as a ground has some merit. When the marriage is, in fact, no longer in existence there is probably little reason for maintaining it at law. We are therefore recommending that when the marriage has broken down for a period of three years, during which there has been no cohabitation between the parties and there is no reasonable prospect of a continuance of cohabitation, and the breakdown is by reason of certain things which are not particularly accusations, then the court shall have the power to dissolve the marriage. The first is marriage breakdown because of illness, either physical or mental, in which the parties have been separated for at least three years and there is no reasonable prospect or likelihood of a resumption of cohabitation.

The next is criminality and imprisonment. The committee would hesitate to dissolve a marriage because of the criminality of the individual, but we would have no hesitation in dissolving the marriage because of the results of his criminality and imprisonment; that is, if the marriage has broken down and is gone, with no chance of its being revived, we would dissolve the empty shell.

Then there is the marriage broken down by reason of criminality and imprisonment, where the man has been serving a sentence of at least three years, or three years in successive sentences in a period of five years. In those circumstances the court in its discretion may declare the marriage dissolved.

The next cause is alcoholism and drug addiction. No one would wish to dissolve a marriage because the husband or wife was drunk, even it it were a continuous habit, but when drunkenness or drug addiction breaks up a marriage and it is gone and no longer exists, when it is just a husk of a marriage, then in three years, the report says, the court may, in the discretion of the judge, order that the marriage be dissolved.

Next, there is disappearance. You know that when a husband or a wife has disappeared for a period of seven years, section 240 of the Criminal Code provides that if the deserted wife or husband marries again, he or she cannot be charged with bigamy, provided that for the previous seven years they had no knowledge of any kind, either from the party or of the party.

I think the presumption is that the man or the woman is dead. However, the only provision in the law is that if the deserted person marries again he or she cannot be prosecuted for bigamy.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: May I ask a question? I understood that in cases of desertion for seven years, it was necessary for the deserted spouse to get an order of the court presuming the death of the other spouse. Is that not necessary at the present time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is provincial practice. Under those circumstances, when one of the parties applies for a marriage licence, some of the provinces at least require that the party applying have done everything possible to find the other spouse. We provide the same thing in our recommendation. But notice that the law in Canada does not provide that the marriage is dissolved by reason of the disappearance for seven years of one of the spouses. Therefore, if the spouse does turn up, the original marriage still stands, the second marriage is void and the children of that second marriage are illegitimate.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: But, honourable senator, is not that a very reason for requiring an order of the court as to presumption of death of the other spouse, because that locks the door in regard to the marriage you are dealing with now. Is that not the case?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, it does not lock the door. If the original husband or wife turns up, he or she is still the husband or wife. That fact hangs over the heads of many people, the horrible thought of a person who was supposed to be dead turning up and claiming rights as the husband or wife. Therefore, this committee recommends that when the party has disappeared and has not been heard of and when every effort has been made to locate him or her for a period of three years, in the discretion of the courts, the marriage may be dissolved. Then the man or woman who has been deserted may marry again without this cloud hanging over their heads.

Honourable senators, I know I am taking too long, but I cannot go more quickly. Briefly stated, those are the grounds we recommend for divorce, with these exceptions.

I have already stated that there is merit in the proposal that marriage breakdown be made a ground. Everyone knows of the thousands of cases where women particularly, and men too, have been deserted but there is no evidence of the desertion. Perhaps the parties have separated because of incompatibility, but the separation has continued for years and neither of them is able to remarry unless one will commit a marital offence and the other sue for divorce.

That is not healthy; it is not kind to those kept in such bondage. The marriage is a mere shell and in fact the marriage has long since disappeared.

Therefore, this committee recommends that separation for a period of three years, in which there has been no cohabitation and in which there is no reasonable prospect or likelihood of their future cohabitation, shall be a ground for divorce, but with a number of protective clauses.

The first clause is that the court shall have the right, if there is any possibility of bringing the parties together, to adjourn the trial for as long as it thinks fit, in order that during that period of adjournment an effort may be made to revive a love which the parties thought they had at one time but which later died an unnatural death. Also, there must be provision, when either spouse is applying on such grounds, for the maintenance of the wife and the children.

There is a further provision to ensure that no public interest is adversely affected. You will realize that some people are on welfare assistance, and the public interest is involved. Finally, such a decree shall not be unduly harsh to either of the parties involved.

Honourable senators, those are the grounds for divorce which this report advises be made the law of this country.

There are certain other matters of great importance which the committee has considered and on which it has made recommendations.

The first I would like to mention is the ancillary rights which the federal Parliament possesses at the time of, or in connection with, a decree of divorce. The committee is relying on the opinion of the then Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. Driedger, who gave us a splendid opinion. It was that such matters as alimony, maintenance of the children, custody of the children, and access to the children, which follow a decree of divorce, are ancillary to the divorce and are within the jurisdiction of this Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Is that not something revolutionary?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, not at all. I was about to say that in the early days, shortly after Confederation, the Parliament of Canada dealt with these matters as ancillary to divorce in a number of cases, but we have not been doing so in more recent years. One reason is that it was taken care of in the provinces.

We on the Divorce Committee are very conscious, when we give a decree of divorce, that we have not taken into consideration its effect upon the parties. Where a man or a woman applies for, and is granted a divorce, we make no order with regard to the maintenance of the wife and children, custody and access to the children, or anything of that kind.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Has this ancillary question been a subject which has been referred to a superior court, such as the Supreme Court or the Privy Council? In other words, has it been dealt with in respect of Canadian law, by a court?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, in those words it has not. As I say, we have the considered opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, and we have our own thoughts, and most of us on that committee are lawyers. We are satisfied that this is within the Dominion jurisdiction. We are asking that the courts of those provinces having courts authorized to issue the decrees of divorce, together with ourselves here in the Senate, be empowered to deal with such questions as I have mentioned: alimony, custody and so on, with the exception that so far as we are concerned we do not wish our commissioners to deal with the division of marital property. That is not necessary. It is most necessary, however, that they take care of the custody of the children and the support and maintenance of the wife and children at the time of the issue of the decree.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Will that not apply only to the divorces which will come before the Senate, owing to the fact that our provincial courts now, as my honourable friend knows, on the grant of a dissolution, will look after questions of alimony and custody of children?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Where did those provincial courts get such jurisdiction, if not from the federal authority originally?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, the provincial courts did not get any such jurisdiction from the federal Parliament. They got that jurisdiction in most provinces by laws in force prior to Confederation. We are not interfering with that jurisdiction, because we are recommending that the provincial courts shall have power to revise an order of the court which issues the decree of dissolution.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: All that we recommend is that the courts of the provinces having power of dissolution and who give judgments as to the division of marital property, alimony and maintenance, may have those judgments revised at a later stage, which is most necessary. A decree of divorce is a solid, definite, lasting thing. That is settled. But questions of alimony, maintenance, custody, access and so on are continuing things.

That is the rule in the courts now. You may get a judgment on those matters today and return to the courts tomorrow, usually on the basis that new grounds have arisen, and you may have a revision of that judgment. And that will be so should our recommendation carry into law.

My colleagues who sit behind me at the moment will, I know, be interested in the next matter upon which we are advising. As I told you earlier, the domicile of the wife, according to the law that was in force in Canada for a very long time, went with the husband. If the wife was deserted in one of the provinces of Canada the wife's domicile went with the husband, the wife perhaps not knowing where. If she did know where and wished to take action against the husband, she had to follow the husband to his domicile and commence action there.

Well, that situation was so outrageously unjust that in 1930 we in this Parliament passed an act allowing the deserted wife who had lived in the province for a period of two years after desertion, to take action in the province where she was deserted.

Well, honourable senators, you will realize that travelling is relatively easy today, and a woman deserted in Halifax with parents living in British Columbia might very well return to her parents; but in such a case her only access to the courts will be in Halifax, Nova Scotia.

Many organizations representing women have complained against that unreasonable law. To meet the objections, therefore, we have advocated that we establish, for matrimonial purposes only, a Canadian domicile which will attach to any man who has a provincial domicile and which will attach to any woman, married or unmarried, as though she were an unmarried woman. That is a complete answer.

Note that we are not to become a "Reno" for divorce in this country. We have therefore provided that to have access to our courts the persons applying must have domicile in Canada; they cannot come here just for six months, as can be done in some States. They must come here to get domicile, that is, with intention of staying here permanently. Then, too, in order that we get rid of the idea of shopping around, as is done in Australia where the person may apply to enter the courts of any of the states of that country, we make this added provision: that the party applying shall have lived for a period of one year in the province of the court to which he applies.

So you have the two provisions: first, the party applying has to come here to live permanently; secondly, the party applying must reside for one year in the province where the action is taken.

There has been a great deal of discussion about condonation, connivance and collusion. We are defining collusion for the first time, so that it shall be perfectly clear in these divorce actions that the man and the woman have a right to confer over reasonable matters such as the division of property if the divorce goes through. There is the custody of the children, access to the children and such matters. That is the only honourable thing for them to do, but because of the confusion which exists in this regard lawyers are advising their clients not to talk to each other—the husband not to talk to the wife nor the wife to the husband—while the proceedings are in progress, lest the court find that there is collusion and throw the case out.

Now, we are defining collusion and doing it clearly. It must be an evil arrangement such, for instance, that the wife will not oppose the husband in the court; that she will give false evidence; that a witness shall not be called; that the truth shall be covered up, and all that sort of thing. There is the still more virulent matter of the manufacture of evidence or the fabrication of evidence and the giving of false evidence. Agreements such as those are definitely collusive and we should stop them to the extent of our ability.

Condonation, you know, is where the parties have lived together, where there has been cohabitation.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: They have not only lived together, but after adultery has been committed they go on living together. That is condonation.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes. Now, we have provided that there shall be no revival. Once they have lived together the past is closed. Furthermore, we are providing that, if they go together for a time—and we have limited it to three months—with a main, primary purpose of conciliation, that shall not be considered condonation so as to cure the past, but the get-together must be only for that short period.

Connivance we are making discretionary, instead of a statutory bar as it is now.

The Province of Ontario is the only province in Canada that has not the authority in its courts to grant judicial separation, a form of divorce but without the right of remarriage. The reason for this was, I think, an inadvertent error in that when we passed the act of 1930 we mentioned "the dissolution of marriage" and we overlooked adding "judicial separation". So, the courts of Ontario have held that they have no power to grant judicial separation, which is a useful weapon in the hands of the courts. Therefore we are recommending that the courts of the Province of Ontario be given the power that is enjoyed by the courts of all the other provinces in this matter.

We had before us a very valuable witness in the person of the former Chief Justice of the Province of Ontario, the Honourable James McRuer. He, out of his vast experience, told us, and we know it very well ourselves, that the trial of divorce cases in the superior courts is not satisfactory. It has been the custom in the past when giving power to the courts to choose the superior court, but you will appreciate that the judges of superior courts sit in the county towns only every six months or so. They pass a long list of divorces, usually looking upon them as a positive nuisance. They get rid of them as fast as they can and then go on to something which they think is more important. Worse than that, as soon as they have issued the decree of divorce they go away. They may come back in six months but, likely as not another judge will come instead. Therefore if one wants a revision of a decision—not in divorce, of course, since you cannot revise a decree of divorce—in matters relating to alimony or custody and things of that nature, you have to apply at the Weekly Court in the City of Toronto, or Winnipeg, as the case may be.

Because of the great inconvenience this causes, His Lordship recommended to us, and we have accepted it enthusiastically, that we give concurrent jurisdiction to the county courts so that if one wishes to take action in the County Court, which is in his own county, and at less expense and with less complication than in the superior courts, he may do so. But if either of the parties desires to have the action heard in the Superior Court it can be moved into that court. However, even if they do that, this recommendation will give to the County Court judge the right to revise judgments, even if given by a Superior Court judge, from time to time as the circumstances require.

In my view, honourable senators, this will provide a great service, and will benefit a very great number of people.

Honourable senators, that is about all I have to say with the exception of one matter relating to parliamentary divorce. There have been those who have urged us to recommend that we transfer the jurisdiction which we now possess to the Exchequer Court. We have refused to make any recommendation in that connection for this good reason: for many years, long before Confederation, there has been a large body of people opposed to court trials in divorce matters, and it was for that reason that we have relied upon parliamentary divorce. We have avoided offending these people during this past one hundred years.

We should not now introduce a question of this kind with regard to a mere matter of procedure and which would do no particular good to anyone. The men who are now trying these cases as commissioners are judges of that court, and we should not take the risk of an upset on something that is of no particular value, and which would give no relief to anyone. For this reason, we have not touched that question at all. However, honourable senators will recollect very well the difficulty we had in the matter of appeal. As you are all aware, when we pass a resolution here dissolving a marriage, and one of the parties files an application for a private bill, our resolution is stayed until the bill has been disposed of. Now, that private bill is of course for divorce, and in the nature of things it is referred to the committee on divorce. But that committee has already passed on that case, inasmuch as it has recommended a resolution. Honourable senators opposite will remember that they objected on the first appeal we have had in three years, and as a result we appointed a special committee. This was unsatisfactory. Therefore, we recommend that the 30 days' delay be after the Commissioner has heard the case and before the committee has recommended a resolution. In contested cases, therefore, anyone who objects to what the Commissioner has found and recommended may come to the committee by way of appeal. The committee then may take such action and may make such report to this house as it finds to be just, and then when this house decides the case, that is it.

Honourable senators, that is the report, summed up very briefly, as you may imagine. I have omitted very much of what I would like to have said, but had I included all we would be here all night. It is a very extensive report, but I think that what I have said will help honourable members in the reading of it. I have no doubt that it will be discussed at great length in this chamber when the time comes. As you know, the Prime Minister has announced that a bill will be introduced next fall, and I hope it will contain the items that we have recommended. We have, of course, no responsibility in that regard; it will be a Government bill. But at that time I think we should enter into a very careful discussion of these recommendations. In the meantime you will have ample time to read the 265 pages of the report which I have just now presented.

Thank you for the time you have permitted me to take for this short, or perhaps I should say concise, survey of what we are proposing.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to delay the house long. However, I think something should be said about the speech which has just been made by honourable Senator Roebuck.

It would indeed be like gilding the lily to commend him for his devotion over 14 years to the very arduous work of the divorce committee. But now after long and arduous hearings by the joint committee, working with a great many people, hearing almost a countless number of witnesses, because there were organizations as well as individuals who appeared before the committee, and preparing a report of the magnitude of this one, of more than 265 typewritten pages, I feel that Parliament, the Senate, Canada, is indebted to that committee, to its joint chairmen and, perhaps more especially, to Senator Roebuck for this monumental piece of work.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It is indeed a magnum opus. It is a review of a very difficult and contentious problem. Senator Roebuck would be the first to concede that a good many of the provisions in this report will not receive the full commendation of every member of the Parliament of Canada. Nonetheless, a great piece of work has been done, and I am sure all honourable senators cannot but believe that Senator Roebuck played a major part in the compiling, editing and presentation of this report.

Personal references are perhaps not too appropriate but, with his permission, there is one thing that I would like to say to him in the presence of all his colleagues. First of all, his performance tonight has been a remarkable feat. He has stood with two small pages of notes and has given us the substance of 260 pages of report. But the remarkable thing is that this has been done by a man who is in his ninetieth year.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There are very few statesmen in the world who could do a job of this kind, preside over a committee the way he has presided with his co-chairman, contribute so much to preparing such a comprehensive report, and come to a deliberative body like this and give this account of what he has done.

I am sure that I voice the sentiments of all honourable senators when I say that we hope that Divine Providence will keep him with us for many years to come.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: At the next sitting.

Hon. Malcolm Hollett: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to have the honour of saying a few words relative to the chairman of the committee, the honourable Senator Roebuck.

Unfortunately for me, the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) has taken the words out of my mouth: what he has said about Senator Roebuck was what I was about to say.

It is an honour for us all to be present in this assembly and to witness the performance of this man, the honourable Senator Roebuck. Soon after I was appointed to the Senate in 1962 he asked me to serve on the Divorce Committee, and under his guidance I have served on that committee ever since. I will say this, honourable senators, that I have never done anything under better guidance than that of the honourable Senator Roebuck.

This report is a magnificent achievement, a marvelous piece of work, to have been brought about by a man who, as has just been stated, is in his ninetieth year. Thousands—I am sorry to say, many thousands—of people in this Canada of ours will be full of gratitude for this report which we hope will be translated into legislation. As has been pointed out, we may not all agree with every concept in it, but we unanimously agree on this one thing, that it could not have been done so assiduously, so superbly, under the guidance of any other man I know. I want to congratulate the Senate on having a man of the type of Senator Roebuck as one of its members.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I wish to say that I heartily agree with the remarks of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) and the honourable Senator Hollett.

However, I would like to go one step further and suggest that this is a great occasion in the life of the Senate and this Parliament. I think all of us, and particularly we lawyers, watched what happened in the British House of Commons with regard to the question of divorce 25 to 35 years ago. If I remember correctly, it was A. P. Herbert, M.P. who fought in the United Kingdom Parliament for many years for the reform of the divorce laws of that country. He performed his task with great devotion and, finally, the job was done in that country and the divorce laws were greatly improved. Indeed, the divorce laws of that country were at that time amended in most respects along the lines recommended by this report.

I for one, having done some work in the divorce courts in the early days of my practice, simply rebelled against the laws of our country at that time, and I wondered, when, oh when, would the Parliament of Canada exercise the common sense that even then I thought was due this problem, to reform the divorce laws of Canada.

I think that every one, indeed, millions of people in this country, have had feelings similar to mine in this regard: Why, oh why, does not the Parliament of Canada act, and why has it not acted in the last 20 or 30 years?

Honourable senators, I agree entirely with the remarks that have been made about the tremendous dedication that has been shown by the honourable Senator Roebuck in this cause. Indeed, when I entered this house in 1958 I recognized that the honourable senator was dedicated to the proposition that there must be an expansion of the grounds of divorce and a review and reformation of the divorce laws.

It has taken a long time, but I think the reason is obvious to all of us. It is very difficult in a country like Canada to change the law which is so deep-rooted in the social fabric of our country, affecting as it does the various religious groupings, the various social strata, and so on. Consequently, in Canada it has been much more difficult than in the United Kingdom, and it has taken us another 25 to 30 years to achieve what they did this many years ago.

I wanted to make these few remarks because, to my mind, this is a great occasion in the life of the Senate; and I say it will be a great occasion in the life of the Parliament of this country when we finally achieve an amendment to the laws substantially in accord with the report of the committee as it has been detailed to us tonight.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I concur in the tributes that have been paid to Senator Roebuck. As he knows, I share in a personal way the respect of his colleagues for what he has done in the Senate, for what he has achieved in his career and for what he stands for in principle. For that reason, I regret that I have to disagree with him on one thing. I have to disagree with him on the indignation he showed concerning the premature disclosure of what was apparently on the minds of the members of the committee.

I was hoping that he would name the newspaper to which he was referring—not that I wanted any blame attached to that newspaper. On the contrary, I rise to support what that newspaper did in publishing the report. I assume that the honourable senator was referring to the report that appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of June 21 under the by-line of Mr. Walter Gray. I hasten to say that Mr. Walter Gray is a member of the Press Gallery who has the highest respect of his colleagues and of the profession.

The article is date-lined Ottawa, and it reads:

> Parliament will be asked next week to widen the grounds for divorce to include marriage breakdown, voluntary separation and such matrimonial offences as cruelty, sodomy, bestiality, conviction on a charge of rape and desertion.
> The recommendations are contained in a report now being drafted by a joint Commons-Senate committee which has been studying Canada's divorce laws for the past year.
> At present, adultery is the only grounds for divorce.
> The committee is meeting behind closed doors—and so on.

I point out, honourable senators, in spite of what Senator Roebuck has told us about a breach of the privileges of Parliament, that Mr. Gray was not reporting the meeting of the committee. He was not intruding himself into any in camera sessions. He was not quoting any memorandum or what was said in the committee. He was merely saying, in effect: There is a committee sitting. It is sitting in camera. From information I have received I think they are drafting a report, and this is what they are going to put in it.

Now, honourable senators, that is the normal practice of a newspaperman in the Press Gallery in respect of not only committees of Parliament, but also of caucuses and meetings of cabinet. Of course there are complaints. Of course people who hope to carry on their deliberations in secret, and who are found out by the press and whose deliberations are revealed by the press, are annoyed. I can understand Senator Roebuck's annoyance, but I do not concur in the blanket condemnation he has made of newspapers—and I presume he was referring to this newspaper, and to Mr. Walter Gray.

It may well be that this was a technical breach of the privileges of Parliament. I am not entirely sure, because the quotation from Beauchesne that the honourable senator gave us did not fully cover what happened in this particular case. However, even if it is a breach of the privileges of Parliament, I suggest to honourable senators that to endeavour to maintain that privilege would make us seem ridiculous. We would be saying, in effect, that any committee of parliament any caucus, or any cabinet, can say to the press; "We are meeting in secret. You must not say what we are doing. You must not try to find out what we are doing. If you do, you are in breach of the privileges of Parliament, or even in contempt of Parliament."

Honourable senators, as an ex-newspaperman I cannot believe for one minute that this action by Mr. Walter Gray in finding out what was going on in that committee was a breach of the privileges of Parliament, and it was certainly not in contempt of this institution. If Mr. Walter Gray was called before a court, or indeed called before the Bar of this House, and it was insisted that he disclose the source of his information, he would, I am sure, refuse to do so. He would refuse regardless of any request or demand made by any judge or even by this Parliament, and in doing so he would be acting in one of the finest traditions of the press. The right not to disclose the source of information is a right that has been fought for by the press.

The honourable senator did not know from where the leak came. I suggest to him that it occurred in one of the elevators. I do not know whether honourable senators have noticed—I certainly have, being an old newspaperman —that after any important meeting of caucus, of cabinet, or of a committee such as this, the elevators are filled with newspapermen, and all they have to do is listen to all the chit-chat that is going on. I think we shall have to blame the elevators for this, or perhaps the enthusiasm of the members of this committee for the very good work they have done—they just could not keep it to themselves. However, that is no reason for blaming Mr. Gray for obtaining this information.

The honourable senator said that this was eavesdropping. Of course, it was. Any newspaperman who is not an eavesdropper is not a newspaperman. I sympathize fully with Senator Roebuck. I can understand that he did not want any radio or television station or newspaper to take the cream off an announcement that was to be made, but I do not think any harm has been done. If the report was true, then it would have been harmless. If it was speculative and not entirely true, or even if it was entirely false, no harm would have been done. I cannot concur in any statement that Mr. Walter Gray or the Toronto Daily Star was in breach of the privileges of Parliament, or that the members of the committee and the journalistic profession have been dishonoured.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to ask the date of that newspaper report?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It was published in the Toronto Daily Star of June 21.

Hon. Mr. Croll: What day of the week was June 21?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. Croll: On the preceding Tuesday evening in the C.B.C. news broadcast the commentator referred to the report of this committee. During the 8 o'clock news the next morning I heard the report again. Whatever Mr. Gray wrote was by that time public knowledge because it had been broadcast over the airwaves the night before. Under no circumstances could Mr. Gray be held responsible, because the information by that time was available to anybody who wanted to print it. It may have appeared in other newspapers, and Mr. Gray did merely what any ordinary newspaperman would have done.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: In spite of what Senator Croll has just said, the story reads to me like a scoop for Mr. Gray, because what could very easily have happened is that Mr. Gray filed his story, the galley of which would have been available to the Canadian Press before the time of the broadcast. That is probably how it happened. I would like to believe that Mr. Gray obtained this outstanding scoop.

Hon. Mr. Argue: You will both be reported tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I have the privilege of thanking my colleagues for the perfectly lovely things they have said about me. Senator Hollett's expression of friendship moved me greatly, and Senator Thorvaldson and others have made remarks so wonderful that one might treasure them for a lifetime. I am simply overwhelmed by what the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) has said.

Let me just say thank you to all of you. I have enjoyed the friendships that are formed in this chamber. They cut across party lines. They are charming. They make the work done in this chamber worthwhile and rewarding. Please let me just pass the matter over with a very sincere statement of thanks.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION TO PRINT REPORT AS APPENDIX TO THE DEBATES OF THE SENATE AND TO THE MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Roebuck, with leave of the Senate, moved:

> That the second and final report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Divorce, presented today, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date and form part of the permanent records of this House.

He said: Honourable senators, I should point out that I have the assurance of the Printing Bureau that the report which I have tabled will be ready for inclusion in this day's Hansard which honourable senators will receive tomorrow, if this resolution is passed.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask the honourable senator if this report will also be published in the House of Commons Hansard? It seems to me that there is far too much publication.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The report of the committee was presented simultaneously in both houses and will appear in the House of Commons Hansard, as well as in the Senate Hansard. The printing department has been setting up the type.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Will the report be printed in the Votes and Proceedings of the other place?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The House of Commons may include it in its Votes and Proceedings. Our custom is to print the report both in Hansard and the Minutes of the Proceedings. I think that should be done in this instance, because if we run out of one of the publications we shall have access to the other.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Then I take it that there will be a complete report published separate and apart?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There will be a complete report published between good covers just as soon as the printing department can produce it.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Then it will be a triplication of the committee's report?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: But it will be printed better and on whiter paper, and will also be bound better between fairly hard covers. It will be sold by the Queen's Printer. I do not know what the price will be but it will be considerable. It will not be produced for quite some time, and that is why it is necessary that we make the report an appendix to the present Hansard, so that we shall get it tomorrow.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, can the Leader of the Government give us a brief summary of what business we may expect within the next few days before the summer recess?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I shall certainly be pleased to do what I can. Probably all honourable senators are aware that in the Votes and Proceedings of the other place an order of the house was made under date of June 26 whereby the debate with reference to the supply bill will be concluded at 9.30 o'clock on the evening of Thursday July 6.

There are two and possibly three pieces of legislation to be dealt with, depending upon how one of them is handled, which we can expect to deal with before the beginning of the summer recess. First, an act with respect to the Cape Breton coal situation. It is possible that that bill may receive third reading in the other place tonight, but if not, probably tomorrow. I had hoped we might receive it tonight.

The other piece of legislation dealing with supply may be in two parts. There will be certain departments which have already been passed by the other place, and I assume that final supply in those departments will be asked for. I understand the agreement in the other place in respect to the departments which have not yet been finally dealt with, is that there will be interim supply of four months. Those are the two important topics with which we shall have to deal.

This evening I introduced two new bills, one respecting the Northern Boundary of British Columbia, the other an act respecting the Publication of Statutes. It is not necessary to proceed with either of these now. However, if the Senate continues to sit, being obliged to wait here we could deal with these two bills, if the other pieces of legislation I have referred to are not before us.

There of course remains the debate in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and a number of honourable senators desire to speak to it before the house adjourns for the summer recess.

I should also point out that this week there will be meetings of the Finance Committee, the Banking and Commerce Committee and the Transport Committee, and that next week the Chairman of the Finance Committee proposes to hold a further meeting. So, I would think that the contents of the supply bill when it reaches us will be known to the members of the Finance Committee. In any event, all of them will know the departments which have finally been dealt with in the other place. If there are any questions dealing with Estimates in respect of those departments, they can be dealt with by the Finance Committee when it meets next week or even this week.

Perhaps I should say something about the actual time of sitting.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Before the honourable leader continues, it will be impossible for us to know which department the interim supply would cover until the very last minute, after the other place has considered the departments which have not been dealt with.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Which have not been finalized?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: We would not know what had been dealt with until practically the last minute.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Not quite. I believe honourable senators could easily discover—and if they need any help my staff will certainly get the information—the departments which have already been passed by the other place. If there are departments that are to be dealt with to finality before the supply bill reaches us, I would think those departments would be known in ample time for the Finance Committee to deal with them as they require.

As for departments the estimates for which have not been finally disposed of by the other place, and for those departments only, there will be interim supply of four months. I should not think there would be very many more departments finally dealt with before the time the summer recess begins.

I hope this answers the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition.

Honourable senators, we certainly will be sitting tomorrow. We would like to sit on Thursday and if we have the Cape Breton legislation before us we would wish to make as much progress as we can. Since I believe all honourable senators expect to be here on Saturday, it might even be desirable, and we will work this out towards the end of the week, to sit on Friday morning.

It is not desired to sit on Friday afternoon. In the event of inclement weather on Saturday, which God forbid, the arrangements for Her Majesty's appearance with Parliament will be held in this chamber instead of outdoors. Some things will have to be done here and time will be required on Friday afternoon to make those changes.

I should try to go a little further about next week. If we make good progress with the Cape Breton legislation, perchance before the end of the week we may have had ample time to deal with it to a conclusion. We could not expect the supply bill to come to us until a week from Friday, because they will probably not finish it in the other place until Thursday, July 6, pursuant to their agreement. We may not have to sit more than on Friday, July 7, to deal with supply. If we do not finish the Cape Breton legislation this week, we should sit earlier in the following week to deal with it.

I hope I make myself clear. As the week unfolds, we will be able to see a little more clearly where we are going.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

PART I

INTRODUCTION

Public interest in divorce law and practice has developed markedly in Canada in recent years and the opinion has grown that our divorce law has become inadequate to meet the needs of modern society. Two changes only in the substantive law of divorce have been made in the past one hundred years, one with regard to the so-called "Double Standard" and the other as to the right of action of married women deserted by their husbands.

An indication of the prevailing dissatisfaction is the fact that during the last session of Parliament a number of Members of Parliament in the Commons introduced bills to reform the divorce laws of Canada.

On the 24th day of February 1966, the present Senate Co-Chairman of your Committee introduced such a bill in the Senate and on second reading he asked for the appointment of a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament to study the entire subject of divorce in Canada.

The request was promptly granted and on the 23rd day of March 1966, the Senate passed the following Resolution:

> "The Honourable Senator Connolly, P.C., moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck:
> That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament to inquire into and report upon divorce in Canada and the social and legal problems relating thereto, and such matters as may be referred to it by either House;
> That twelve Members of the Senate to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the said Special Joint Committee;
> That the Committee have power to engage the services of such technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;
> That the Committee have the power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee and to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate; and
> That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly."

On March 29th, 1966, the following Senators were named members of the Committee:

> The Honourable Senators Aseltine, Baird, Belisle, Bourget, Burchill, Connolly (Halifax North), Croll, Fergusson, Flynn, Gershaw, Haig and Roebuck.
> (On becoming Co-Chairman of the Special Joint Committee on Public Service of Canada, Senator Bourget was replaced by Senator Denis.)

The Commons had acted promptly and on March 15th, 1966, the House of Commons passed the following Resolution:

> "On motion of Mr. McIlraith, seconded by Mr. Hellyer, it was resolved—that a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to inquire into and report upon divorce in Canada and the social and legal problems relating thereto, and such matters as may be referred to it by either House;
> That 24 Members of the House of Commons, to be designated by the House at a later date, be members of the Special Joint Committee, and that Standing Order 67(1) of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;
> That the Committee have power to engage the services of such technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;
> That the Committee have the power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, and that Standing Order 66 be suspended in relation thereto; and
> That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting Their Honours to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it so advisable, some of its Members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee."

On March 22nd, 1966, the following Members were appointed to the Committee:

> Messrs. Aiken, Baldwin, Brewin, Cameron (High Park), Cantin, Choquette, Chretien, Fairweather, Forest, Goyer, Honey, Laflamme, Langlois (Megantic), MacEwan, Mandziuk, McCleave, McQuaid, Otto, Peters, Ryan, Stanbury, Trudeau, Wahn and Woolliams.

Commencing on the 28th day of June 1966, the Joint Committee has held 24 open meetings in which the views of churches, organizations and individuals have been presented supported by more than 70 briefs. Your Committee is deeply indebted to the many witnesses who have come to Ottawa to give information to Parliament on the subject of divorce and for the many well considered and most informative briefs presented.

The following witnesses have been heard:—

No. 24, April 20, 1967: James Byrne, M.P.

The experience possessed by the members of your Committee, supplemented by the knowledge of many witnesses, and our investigations of conditions both within Canada and abroad convinced your Committee that considerable changes are required in the divorce laws of Canada. Canada's Constitution as expressed in the British North America Act confers jurisdiction in the matter of "Marriage and Divorce" exclusively upon the Parliament of Canada. The Act also provides that the laws in force in the several provinces at Confederation should continue until amended or repealed by the governmental authority having jurisdiction. Thus, authority in the matter of divorce is in the Parliament of Canada. While English laws of divorce of over one hundred years ago in the form of pre-Confederation Statutes, are in force in most of the Canadian provinces, the Provincial Legislatures concerned have been unable to abolish or amend them or to enact new or more timely provisions.

There are a number of causes for the dissatisfaction which your Committee finds to exist but the strongest and most universal source of complaint is the grounds to which the courts are restricted for the dissolution of marriages. With the exception of the one Province of Nova Scotia, the principal ground for divorce is adultery. In the Province of Nova Scotia cruelty by one spouse towards the other is an additional ground for the dissolution of marriage.

While adultery furnishes good reason for the termination of the marriage bond, and has been so recognized from time immemorial, there are several other marital offences which drastically interfere with the continuance of the marriage relationship but for which the law of Canada provides no relief. In addition, conditions arise in marriage in which no provable fault or misdemeanor is chargeable against either spouse and yet in which, in the interests of all concerned, including the children and the community, the legal ties should be removed.

This incompleteness of the judicial process has brought disrespect upon the courts where much too frequently the ground pleaded is not the real cause of the marriage breakdown, the charge of adultery being the restricted form of procedure required by law to achieve the desired result.

Because of the inability of the courts to grant relief, except on the one ground, many thousands of Canadian citizens are driven into illicit unions and actually forced into what is popularly known as "Common Law" marriage. Where a party to such an irregular union is subject to a previous undissolved and subsisting marriage, the Common Law gives no legality or status to such a union. The words "Common Law marriage" may have some social significance, but are otherwise misleading. The relationship confers no rights of marriage, except to the extent of special statutory provisions such, for instance, as are found in certain war veterans legislation. The children of such a union are illegitimate.

These and other undesirable conditions in Canada have been carefully considered by your Joint Committee and are dealt with to the best of its knowledge and judgment in the following Report.

Your Committee as authorized by Parliament, has directed its study to the problem of divorce, but it has been made aware that such an inquiry raises still wider questions of human relations. Representatives of the Churches and of social organizations have urged the need for premarital education, family guidance and conciliation in event of marriage breakdown, and they have raised questions as to the legal minimum age for marriage.

While the provision of educational, social and conciliation services on a nation-wide scale presents extraordinary administrative and constitutional difficulties, the need has been borne in mind by your Committee and should not be lost sight of when consideration is given to the Committee's specific recommendations.

The Report is divided into five parts. Part I deals with the Committee's conclusions, shortly stated, and its recommendations. Parts II, III and IV set forth in more extended form, where necessary, the product of the Committee's thinking and investigations. Part V is a draft bill incorporating the Committee's recommendations in legal form. All five parts should be read for a complete understanding of the Committee's recommendations and of the reason therefor.

With the aid of many witnesses, your Committee has studied the law and practice of divorce in Canada and other countries. Particular attention has been given to the divorce laws of England, upon which the divorce laws of Canada and its provinces are now based, and where notable changes have been made during the past thirty years. The laws of Australia and New Zealand are especially worthy of attention, for like Canada, these countries of the Commonwealth have followed English precedents and have made notable advances in recent years. The law of divorce in the State of New York has in the past been similar to that of Canada in that adultery has been the sole recognized ground for the dissolution of mariage. Recently, however, New York State has altered drastically its former divorce practice, so that its experience is of special interest in Canada. Something has also been learned of the divorce laws of Scandinavian and other European countries.

A study of this experience from abroad together with a knowledge of divorce conditions in Canada and her provinces, and aided by the information and advice of a considerable number of public spirited and well informed witnesses, has enabled your Committee to reach the several definite conclusions set forth in the first Part of this Report. All Parts are respectfully submitted.

Your Committee closes its introduction to the First Part of its Report with an expression of its gratitude to all those who have assisted it as witnesses in personal appearances and in written briefs, at no inconsiderable cost to themselves in time, thought and outlay. These witnesses have made a major contribution to the national well-being and their assistance to your Committee is gratefully acknowledged.

Your Committee is also indebted to its Special Assistant, Dr. Peter King, Professor of History at Carleton University, who has made an outstanding contribution to the production of this Report.

The services of Mr. Patrick Savoie, of the Committees Branch of the Senate, have been most efficient and most valuable. He has acted throughout as the Committee's Secretary. The excellence of his work is the more remarkable as it is his first experience in such an office.

To all officers and members of the Senate and Commons and of the public who have assisted, your Committee expresses its thanks.

A. J. P. CAMERON (High Park)
Joint Chairman

ADULTERY

It has been urged upon your Committee by a number of responsible witnesses that the entire theory of marital offences as grounds for divorce be abandoned and that there be substituted therefor the fact of marriage breakdown. The practicability of adopting marriage breakdown as the exclusive ground for divorce is discussed elsewhere in this Report.

From time immemorial, adultery on the part of one of the spouses has been deemed a violation of the basic obligations of the marriage relationship entitling the wronged and innocent partner to an immediate dissolution. The marriage need not necessarily break down should the infidelity be forgiven but should the offended spouse consider otherwise, he or she should be entitled to a release from the marital ties without delay. In our monogamous society a woman is allowed but one husband and a husband but one wife.

There is obviously no need for a statutory definition of adultery. It was not defined in the Imperial Statute of 1857 or subsequently, nor has it been defined in any of the Canadian provinces whose law is based upon that statute or in the pre-Confederation law of any of the other provinces. What adultery is in law has been made plain in the decided cases and no difficulty has been experienced in the courts, not even when the law was amended for the abolition of the double standard.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that the marital offence of adultery be retained as a ground for the dissolution of marriage on the petition of the offended spouse, subject of course to the legal defences.

RAPE, SODOMY AND BESTIALITY

The unnatural offences of rape, sodomy and bestiality are violations of the marriage relationship akin to adultery and in some instances are included in that definition. They were made grounds for divorce in the English Act of 1857 and thus became grounds in Canada in those provinces which adopted the law of England as of the 15th of July, 1870. They should be retained as separate grounds for the dissolution of marriage.

A statutory definition is unnecessary and undesirable.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that rape, sodomy and bestiality be retained in Canadian law as grounds for divorce.

CRUELTY

Cruelty by one spouse towards another is a violation of the marriage undertaking. Cruel conduct on the part of one spouse may create intolerable conditions in the home that are highly detrimental to the children and dangerous to the life and health of the victim spouse.

Cruelty is so abhorrent in the matrimonial relationship that it has been made a ground for the dissolution of marriage in most civilized countries, including England, Australia and the States to our south.

Cruel conduct in order to constitute grounds for divorce should of course be of substantial character, and, for the determination of this, reliance may be placed upon the wisdom and good sense of Canadian judges, guided as they are by decisions made in our own country in actions for judicial separation and for both judicial separation and divorce in Nova Scotia, and elsewhere in the divorce practice of the United Kingdom, and Australia. Some witnesses before the committee expressed concern lest trivial actions be included as cruelty, but the jurisprudence developed in the experienced tribunals mentioned would be considered by the Canadian Bench as authoritative and would be followed, without the need of a detailed definition of the offence. In fact, a comprehensive and satisfactory definition of marital cruelty is not possible, nor is it desirable for the good reason that acceptable conduct within the home differs from time to time and from place to place and among differing classes in society. On the other hand, a competent judge has no difficulty in recognizing cruelty for what it is when the circumstances are before him.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee, therefore, recommends that cruelty be made a ground for the dissolution of marriage, and that for the present at least, this ground should be undefined and its administration be left to the learning, good sense, responsibility and wisdom of Canadian judges, guided as they are by the jurisprudence of our own courts and those of England.

DESERTION

Desertion is a marital offence which is much too common in Canada and when the husband is the deserter it is usually a cruel disaster to the wife and family and, as well, an injustice to the community. Marriage creates a duality of responsibility. The husband is normally the breadwinner while the wife takes care of the children and the home, and acting together they supply the essentials of fatherly guidance and motherly love, the essential elements of a home.

When a wife deserts, the husband is left without the comforts and supports of married life and the children are forsaken. Desertion by the husband can be even more cruel for it leaves the home without the guidance and discipline which a father can supply and often without the financial support essential to the household.

In Canada, many thousands of wives have been left by their husbands in lonely neglect to bear the burden of their own support and that of the children, and many deserted wives are struggling heroically to maintain as well as to care for their family households and to feed, clothe and educate their children.

Family Courts in some of the provinces make a real effort to enforce maintenance orders, but deserting husbands are frequently difficult to locate and even when at considerable public expense they are brought to book, the effort is frustrated by the wrongdoer by a plea of poverty.

Irregular unions are the inevitable result of the unnecessary restrictiveness of our laws of divorce. Faced with this impossible situation many deserted wives and husbands have been driven into what is known as "Common Law" marriage. There are said to be thousands of couples living in what is legally adultery and whose children are according to law illegitimate. This is highly undesirable for the couples themselves and for the community.

In the interests of deserted spouses, of the children of marriages broken by desertion and of the community, desertion for some considerable period of time without reasonable prospect of resumption of cohabitation should be made a ground for divorce.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee, therefore, recommends that desertion for a period of three years, on the petition of the deserted spouse, where there is no reasonable prospect of a resumption of cohabitation within a reasonable period of time, be made a ground for the dissolution of marriage. Provided that a period of cohabitation of not more than three months for the primary purpose of reconciliation be excluded from the count of the said three years. Your Committee is of the opinion that the definition of desertion other than as above, should be left to the courts, guided by the jurisprudence developed in Canada in relation to judicial separation and in the courts of the United Kingdom in respect of both divorce and separation.

WILFUL NON-SUPPORT

Traditionally the duties of homemaking are divided between the marriage partners, the wife caring for the house, the children and her husband's comfort and the husband supplying the essential financial support. The husband is the breadwinner, and when he fails to discharge his share of the duty the home is disrupted. Distress and privation result; the children are neglected, the wife is frustrated. Happiness is no longer possible and the marriage breaks down.

When such disastrous conditions are brought about by involuntary unemployment or illness on the part of the natural provider, most people are genuinely sympathetic and the public purse is available without much hesitation to avoid actual tragedy, but when these conditions are brought about by the wilful neglect, bad faith and selfishness of the head of the house, his conduct is reprehensible and a violation of the expressed or implied marital undertakings.

Such conduct on the part of the husband places the wife in a most difficult position and if persisted in should make it possible for the court to free her from the marital ties. Both she and the children may be better off without the incubus of a deliberately negectful husband and father.

Wilful non-support on the part of the husband is a serious marital offence, but each such case must be judged on all the circumstances, with due regard to the degree of culpability on the part of the husband and the effect of his neglect on the wife and family. The court should accordingly be allowed the fullest discretion and, in its own good judgment should have power to decree judicial separation or to dissolve the marriage.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that wilful refusal or neglect without lawful excuse on the part of the husband to provide support for his wife and family for a period of one year be made a ground for dissolution of marriage, subject, however, to the fullest discretion on the part of the court.

BIGAMY

In the past in Canada, bigamy has been adjudicated upon on the basis of adultery; this is satisfactory, except that proof is required that the parties to the second marriage have cohabited. The deserted spouse is under the necessity of proving three essentials, the first marriage, the second bigamous marriage and the adultery. Cohabitation usually follows a bigamous marriage, but not necessarily so.

Proving the adultery together with the bigamy may be difficult, at times impossible, and almost always, expensive.

The present ground of adultery in the event of bigamy must logically be retained, but your Committee is of opinion that bigamy of itself should be sufficient to justify dissolution of the legal marriage, thus freeing the innocent spouse. When it is shown that the respondent spouse has remarried bigamously, the legal marriage should surely be capable of being dissolved.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that a bigamous marriage by the respondent spouse be made a ground for the dissolution of the first or legal marriage.

NON-CONSUMMATION OF MARRIAGE

Wilful refusal by one of the spouses to consummate a marriage is ground for annulment in England, but not in Canada. (Power, On Divorce, p. 194) In those Provinces of Canada where the law of England as it was on the 15th of July 1870 is in force, non-consummation because of some physical or mental defect on the part of one of the spouses renders the marriage voidable at the suit of the other partner. Some of these defects are possible of correction, but the consent and co-operation of the party having the defect is required.

When non-consummation of the marriage is due to the wilful refusal of one of the spouses, the law at present affords no right of action to the other marital partner. No relief is available when the purpose of marriage is thus frustrated by the abnormal conduct of one of the spouses.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that the present law as to the non-consummation of marriage due to the physical or mental defect of one of the spouses be retained and that wilful refusal to consummate by one of the spouses for a period of one year or more be made a ground for dissolution of the marriage at the instance of the other spouse.

MARRIAGE BREAKDOWN

It has been impressed upon your Committee by a number of prominent and responsible witnesses that the presently existing adversary system of trial in divorce cases on the ground of alleged matrimonial offence be abandoned and that there be substituted therefor an inquisitorial procedure of trial on the ground that for some or any reason the marriage has broken down. It was argued that the present court procedure, based on an alleged misdemeanour by one of the spouses, promotes antagonisms between the parties and decreases the likelihood of reconciliation.

Whether an "inquest" by public officials into family conditions at the instance of one of the spouses would be less objectionable is open to argument, and the whole subject of marriage breakdown is considered by your Committee at length in Part III of this Report.

It is sufficient at the moment to make clear that your Committee is opposed to the abandonment of the traditional British system of court trial conducted by an independent judge presiding, while opposing interests if any, present their evidence and arguments.

Moreover, such a change would be impracticable. Aside from the excessive cost of such proceedings, the necessary trained social workers are not available and the comparative few who do exist are engaged in other important activities.

While the adoption of Marriage Breakdown as the sole cause of action in divorce proceedings is neither practical nor desirable, at least not at present, the idea is not without merit. Nor is it something new. That a marriage in fact is no longer subsisting, that the parties are separated in antagonism and that a resumption of cohabitation is impossible, are circumstances which a judge must necessarily bear in mind in any matrimonial proceeding, and particularly so when both plaintiff and defendant are at fault.

Should Parliament see fit to widen the grounds of divorce sufficiently to relieve the thousands of Canadians caught in the bonds of dead marriages, marriage breakdown is the natural criterion when the marital relationship has failed without reasonable prospect of revival and without culpable and triable fault or matrimonial offence on the part of either spouse.

Many marriages fail through no fault of either partner. The parties to the marriage may be just fundamentally incompatible. Often such partners try repeatedly to revive the affection that they once had for each other or believed they had. Sometimes such couples separate because the tensions within the home have an adverse effect upon both the partners and their children. The marriage is simply dead, or, in other words, has broken down.

Such conditions of dead marriages do exist in Canada in large numbers with disastrous results in the lives of many Canadians. The misfortune of innocent spouses caught in the merely legal ties of dead marriages cries out for relief. The remedy is considered by your Committee in the following paragraphs.

There are a number of conditions destructive of marriage which do not involve a marital offence such as mentioned earlier on the part of either spouse, but which terminate cohabitation effectively. Among these are the disappearance over a long period of time of one of the parties, gross and habitual drunkenness, drug addiction, persistent criminality resulting in long terms in penitentiary and lengthy illness, mental or physical.

ILLNESS

An illness such as insanity may create conditions which effectively destroy the substance and purpose of marriage. While the regrettable marriage failure may not be due to any conscious fault on the part of the incapacitated partner, the resulting condition frequently involves a disastrous hardship to the other spouse.

Recognizing the need for relief under such circumstances, many jurisdictions have adopted insanity as a ground for divorce. Great Britian introduced it in 1937 and witnesses before your Committee have strongly urged its inclusion in Canadian law.

A lapse into mental illness is not a marital offence, but if of long duration without prospect of cure in the foreseeable future, it effectively terminates the marriage relationship. It is thus not the illness that constitutes ground for the dissolution of the marriage but rather the consequences which flow from the illness, the termination of cohabitation and of the marriage state.

Witnesses have spoken to your Committee of "chronic" or "incurable" unsoundness of mind, but the representatives of the Canadian Mental Health Association and of the Canadian Psychiatric Association have testified that the words "unsoundness of mind" covers the whole field of mental illness. The Canadian Bar Association stipulated that for mental illness to be actionable in divorce, the patient must have been confined in a mental institution for some long period of time. Such confinement was said to be the best evidence available of the permanence of the illness, and in addition would of itself destroy the marriage.

As to the word "incurable", medical men are conscious of the advances in medical science and refrain from testifying that an insane person is incurable.

The Canadian Mental Health Association witnesses objected to mental health being considered differently from other illness. To single out mental illness for special provisions with regard to marital relations would, they said, intensify the stigma which has traditionally been attached to mental illness. Other chronic disabling illness may affect marital relations severely.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee therefor recommends that Marriage Breakdown and separation for a period of three years by reason of mental or physical illness be constituted a separate ground for divorce, provided that no reasonable prospect exists of a resumption of cohabitation and that there is no satisfactory evidence of a reasonable expectation of recovery and of a resumption of cohabitation in the foreseeable future, and further that the dissolution of the marriage will not be unduly harsh or unjust to the disabled spouse and that reasonable arrangements have been made for the maintenance, care and custody of the affected spouse and the children.

The granting of a divorce on this ground should be within the discretion of the presiding judge, subject to appeal.

CRIMINALITY AND IMPRISONMENT

Several witnesses have urged that persistent or habitual criminality and imprisonment be included as a ground for divorce. This would be in keeping with the practice of several other jurisdictions. There seem to be two issues here: firstly, the criminal behaviour itself, and secondly, the consequences of it which may include imprisonment. The first aspect seems to be that criminal behaviour by one spouse is itself an offence against the marriage partner. A spouse may be desirous of ending a legal tie to someone who has demonstrated anti-social tendencies and bad character. A spouse might be well rid of such a partner and the children also might be better off. To make criminal behaviour per se a marital offence would involve difficult problems of definition. What criminal offences would be included and how many offences would constitute the persistent or habitual?

However, the incarceration of one partner for an extended period of time terminates matrimonial cohabitation as effectively as if the imprisoned partner had deserted. The economic effects can be as serious and the need to re-establish a stable family environment for the partner and children as imperative. Long or repeated imprisonment makes impossible the fulfilment of the role of husband, wife and parent.

The objection that has been raised to granting divorce on the ground of long imprisonment is that the husband or wife of the criminal may play a part in his or her rehabilitation. The restoration of the prisoner to a family environment may well improve his likelihood of again becoming a useful citizen. However, any spouse who seeks a divorce on this ground is not one to patiently await the prodigal's return or who would be of very much help in his rehabilitation. Those who would be of use in the rehabilitation of criminals would not seek divorce. The defining of persistent or habitual criminality or the length of sentence is difficult, but separation having taken place, the court in exercise of its discretion could consider the likelihood of resumption of cohabitation. It could determine whether there is any substance of marriage left in the circumstances.

The Marriage Breakdown caused by imprisonment should therefore be ground for divorce, subject to the discretion of the court.

Serving a term of imprisonment for a period of at least three years should provide ground for the dissolution of marriage.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee therefore recommends that the breakdown of marriage consequent upon the serving of a term of imprisonment by the spouse of not less than three years, or for successive terms totalling three years within the five years preceding the institution of proceedings, be grounds for divorce, provided that there is no reasonable possibility of a resumption of cohabitation, and subject to the discretion of the court.

ALCOHOLISM AND DRUG ADDICTION

Alcoholism and Drug Addiction have been made the grounds for divorce in numerous jurisdictions, Australia for example. Their adoption in Canada has been urged by several witnesses before the Committee, including the Seventh Day Adventists, and it was proposed in one of the Bills introduced in the Commons and referred to the Committee. Like insanity and imprisonment, alcoholism and drug addiction may involve marriage breakdown. Alcoholism and drug addiction are conditions more akin to illness than to wilful or culpable conduct and their effects can ruin a marriage and produce misery for the other spouse and the children. The Baptist Federation suggested that they be classed as a form of insanity. When these conditions lead to a commital to an institution for a protracted length of time they amount to marriage breakdown and not infrequently to cruelty.

To be a ground for divorce the condition must have extended over a considerable period of time, show little prospect of cure and be such as to have made the normal marital consortium impossible. It must have caused an irretrievable breakdown of marriage. It is not so much the actual condition that gives rise to a ground for the dissolution of marriage as it is the results of the condition upon the marriage and the family that are abhorrent.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee therefore recommends that the breakdown of marriage by reason of gross and protracted addiction to alcohol or drugs be made a ground for divorce, subject to the discretion of the court and to the absence of substantial prospect of cure, or a resumption of cohabitation within a reasonable period of time.

DISAPPEARANCE

Section 240 of the Canadian Criminal Code provides that no person commits bigamy by going through a form of marriage if the spouse of that person has been continuously absent from him for seven years immediately preceding the time when he goes through the form of marriage, unless he knew that his spouse was alive at any time during those seven years.

If the remarrying spouse did not hear directly or indirectly from the missing partner for the full seven years, he or she cannot be convicted of bigamy but this exemption from the prosecution does not affect the validity of the first marriage.

Should the missing spouse reappear the first marriage is still valid. The second marriage is a nullity and the children of that marriage are illegitimate. Such an eventuality is terrifying and the very possibility hangs like the Sword of Damocles over the spouses of the second marriage and their family perhaps for years. If desertion for the three years is sufficient to afford ground for divorce, disappearance for a similar period, whatever the cause, or for unknown cause, should be sufficient to release the remaining spouse from its sterile bonds. If the missing spouse is in fact alive he or she should realize that failure to communicate may end the marriage. Three years absence should be a sufficient length of neglect in this age of world-wide communication and widely scattered and diversified facilities.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that absence of either the wife or husband without knowledge by the other spouse of or from the missing partner for a period of three years be made a ground for the dissolution of the marriage, thus enabling the deserted spouse to remarry in legal security.

THE SEPARATION GROUND

The introduction of the ground of separation for a specified period would be the most practical way to solve the problems of simple marriage breakdown. There can be no better evidence that a marriage has failed than the termination of cohabitation and the failure to resume it after a substantial period of time. If there is no likelihood of reconciliation there is little point in retaining the empty legal shell of the marriage.

There is little doubt that the concept of marriage breakdown envisaged in the separation ground seems to have won wide acceptance. The majority of witnesses appearing before the Committee have advocated it in one form or another, usually in the form of a separation ground. It has been introduced into numerous jurisdictions whose legal and social structure are not dissimilar to our own, Australia and New Zealand, and various American states—and it has existed for a long time in most European countries, notably Scandinavia. Undoubtedly, as practical legislation in all of these countries, it does work.

Certain safeguards would need to be introduced along with the separation ground:

(i) the court should have the power to adjourn for a specified period if there seems to be a possibility of reconciliation;

(ii) provision should be made for the financially weaker party, usually the wife, before a decree is granted;

(iii) no decree should be issued until satisfactory arrangements have been made for the care and custody of the children;

(iv) the court should have discretion to refuse the decree on the ground of public interest.

Your Committee is consequently of the opinion that a period of separation of three years immediately prior to the institution of proceedings would be sufficient to establish the breakdown of marriage and should be introduced as a ground for divorce with the safeguards discussed above.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that Marriage Breakdown as evidenced by at least three years of separation immediately preceding the institution of proceedings in which the parties have not cohabited and in which there appears no reasonable expectation of a resumption of cohabitation within a reasonable period of time, be made a ground for divorce, provided that:

(1) the Court may adjourn the proceedings for such time as it deems desirable should there seem to it to be reasonable possibility of a reconciliation;

(2) due provision has been made for the future maintenance of the wife, and under special circumstances of the husband, and for the custody, access, maintenance, care and education of the children as may be necessary; and

(3) the Court may refuse the decree if it considers in its discretion any public interest may be adversely affected or that such a decree would be unduly harsh to the respondent or the dependent children.

ALIMONY AND RIGHTS ANCILLARY TO DIVORCE

Alimony for the wife, maintenance for the children and their custody and the division of marital property are all matters ancillary to divorce and are thus within the jurisdiction of Parliament. For this your Committee has the authority of the then Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. E. A. Driedger, as follows:

> "...jurisdiction to make laws in relation to divorce is in essence jurisdiction to make laws for the lateration of the legal status created by the marriage; the jurisdiction therefore extends to the abolition of the rights and obligations created by the marriage and the restoration of pre-existing rights. As I have already indicated, I think it must follow that these rights and obligations can be terminated in whole or in part.
> "It is the husband's duty to maintain the wife. If the marriage is dissolved, that obligation normally ceases because the relationship of husband and wife no longer exists. For the reasons I have indicated, I think that Parliament is competent to define the extent to which a dissolution of marriage alters the rights and obligations inherent in the marriage and therefore could provide for a continuation of the obligation to support....
> "The same reasoning would apply to maintenance and custody of children. During marriage the husband is under a duty to maintain and provide for the education of the children of the marriage, and the husband and wife have joint custody. These are rights and obligations that arise out of the marriage relationship. A divorce, which terminates the marriage relationship, obviously interferes with these rights and obligations, and in my opinion Parliament's jurisdiction in relation to divorce would include jurisdiction to prescribe the extent to which these rights and obligations are to be abrogated or continued...
> "The Division of property between divorced persons (apart from the question of support or maintenance), as well as such matters as marriage settlements, dower, homestead rights, the right of married women to own property and sue in their own names, etc., may well stand on a different footing. These matters do involve rights and obligations between husband and wife, but they seem to me to relate more to the property and civil rights of the parties to the marriage than to their legal status as married persons. They could vary from time to time and from jurisdiction to jurisdiction and a particular rule is not necessary or essential to constitute a marriage."

The Parliament of Canada has at one time exercised this Constitutional Authority.

According to Dr. P. M. Ollivier, Parliamentary Counsel and Law Clerk of the House of Commons, in the early years of Confederation, a number of Acts were passed by Parliament dissolving marriages and providing maintenance for the wife and children. Parliament has not exercised this jurisdiction in recent years and divorced women are left to the provincial courts for relief. In Ontario, maintenance is frequently granted together with a decree of divorce by the courts of that province, but in Quebec, a wife has no legal claim for maintenance against her former husband following the dissolution of her marriage.

Your Committee is of opinion that a wife's right to maintenance after divorce is a question for the courts to decide in each individual case and the decision should be made by the judge who decrees the divorce, when the facts are freshly before him. He should also deal with the division of marital property and the custody, access to and maintenance of children. These matters are connected with and arise out of the divorce decree, or in legal language are ancillary to divorce. The courts should, of course, be possessed of a continuing power to modify the court order as changing conditions require and so as not to interfere with provincial laws enacted under Property and Civil Rights provision of the British North America Act. It is, in your Committee's opinion, essential in the interests of justice, irrespective of the province in which the parties reside, that the court which hears the evidence in first instance and issues the divorce decree have power to complete its judgment with respect to the ancillary matters above-mentioned, and your Committee so recommends.

The courts of the provinces should be given power to issue orders coincident with decrees of divorce and ancillary thereto with respect to the division of property between the parties, the future maintenance of the wife and under special circumstances of the husband, and the future custody, maintenance, care and education of the children of the household affected and with power to modify or repeal such orders from time to time, all as required in the circumstances and the Senate should be given similar powers with the exception of the division of property between the parties.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that the courts of those provinces having jurisdiction in divorce be given power to issue orders coincident with decrees of divorce and ancillary thereto with respect to the division of marital assets between the parties, the future maintenance of the wife and children, and under special circumstances of the husband, and the future custody, care and education of the children to whom either of the parties stands in loco parentis, and access to such children, and with power to modify or repeal such orders from time to time as required in the circumstances, and that the Senate by virtue of the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act be given similar power, with the exception of the division of marital property between the parties.

DOMICILE

As the law stands, a court may exercise jurisdiction in divorce proceedings only if the parties are domiciled in the province in which the proceedings are commenced. In effect, this means the province in which the husband is domiciled. A married woman automatically acquires the domicile of her husband on marriage and retains it so long as the marriage subsists. This unity of domicile derives from the common law doctrine that the husband and wife are one person. While this requirement presents little difficulty to the husband, who takes his domicile with him, and who can, therefore, institute divorce proceedings wherever he is domiciled, it often causes great hardship to the wife.

Before 1930, if a wife was deserted by her husband and the husband departed to live in another province or country, the wife could seek a divorce only in that province or country, not where she herself resided. The Divorce Jurisdiction Act of 1930 alleviated this situation by permitting a wife deserted for a period of two years by her husband to petition for divorce in the province where the couple were domiciled at the time of desertion.

While the Act of 1930 did help the situation to a considerable degree, it has by no means solved the problems that arise from the rule of domicile. Society today is highly mobile. People move freely from province to province and from country to country, and the right to commence divorce proceedings in the province of desertion may be most inconvenient. It may not be practical for a wife to remain in the province in which she was deserted, or return there later. In any case, the 1930 Act requires that the wife prove desertion as well as actual ground for the divorce, and it does not cover those cases of separation where no actual purposeful desertion took place.

The present law of domicile discriminates against the wife, who lacks access to the courts similar to that enjoyed by her husband. Women's groups appearing before the Committee have urged that married women be given the right to their own domicile.

There have been two major solutions proposed to the Committee. One would be to abandon the concept of domicile and permit either spouse to petition for divorce in the province in which he or she resides. This has been suggested by the Manitoba Bar Association, the Law Society of British Columbia, the Canadian Committee on the Status of Women, Mr. Justice McRuer and Professor Stephen Skelly. The other suggestion is to abandon the concept of provincial domicile in favour of that of national domicile. This is premised on the fact that Canada is one country and should be regarded for divorce purposes as such. This would be to follow the precedent set by Australia which introduced the law of Australian domicile in matrimonial proceedings to overcome the difficulties encountered in that country due to separate state domicile. This suggestion has been made by the Barristers Society of New Brunswick, the Canadian Congress of Women and Professor Julien Payne.

To rely on residence alone for the institution of matrimonial proceedings might present complications in internal law and lead to difficulties in the recognition abroad of Canadian divorce.

The requirement of domicile would restrict the use of Canadian courts to those of residence in this country who intended to remain permanently and the one year residence requirement would prevent "shopping" from province to province or the choice of a Province on the basis of its inconvenience to the respondent or co-respondent.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends:—

(i) A husband or wife domiciled in Canada may institute proceedings praying for the dissolution or annulment of the marriage, and for ancillary relief, in any province with a court having jurisdiction to provide such relief, if the petitioner or the respondent has resided continuously in that province for a period of at least one year immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

(ii) For this purpose "Canadian Domicile" is defined as follows:

(a) a husband has Canadian domicile if he is domiciled, in accordance with the existing rules of private international law, in any province of Canada; and

(b) a wife has Canadian domicile if she would, if unmarried, be domiciled, in accordance with the existing rules of private international law, in any province of Canada.

BARS TO DIVORCE

1. Collusion

Collusion in divorce cases is illegal at common law and is prohibited by statute in the Law of England as it existed on the 15th of July 1870 and the prohibition was thus introduced into certain of the Provinces of Canada. It should be included in any Act of the Parliament of Canada consequent upon this Report, but not so as to discourage or prevent negotiation between the parties or their solicitors or agents with a view to the reconciliation of spouses or the making of bona fide and proper arrangements with regard to the custody of and access to children, the maintenance of the wife or division of assets. It is not desirable that the man and wife be kept at arm's length by a rule of law and prevented from doing what is right and honourable under the circumstances or which may lead to reconciliation.

Collusion has not been defined by statute either in England or Canada, and confusion and misunderstanding exists in the public mind and even among solicitors as to what it means and as to what its prohibition actually prohibits. This is not in the public interest and should be corrected.

A dictionary meaning of collusion is "a secret agreement for an unlawful or evil purpose." It is the evil purpose of the agreement that renders it collusive.

> "It is very important that the ignorance about what collusion is or may be should be dispelled...collusion means a corrupt bargain...to bribe the party bringing the petition, or, it may be to suppress a defence or to falsify the facts." (Lord Merriman, Debate in House of Lords, Hansard, Vol. 199, col. 133, Power, On Divorce, p. 78).

There must be a corrupt agreement or conspiracy to which the petitioner is a party to obtain a divorce by some fraud or deceit practiced on the court, to pervert the course of justice or by bribing the respondent or co-respondent to deprive the court of the opportunity of hearing what may be the truth.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that collusion be prohibited in somewhat the following terms:

> Collusion shall be a bar to divorce, being a corrupt agreement or conspiracy to which the petitioner or respondent is a party, to effect some illegal, wrongful or improper purpose such as the bribery of a respondent or co-respondent not to defend the action or to appear as a witness or to perform an illegal or improper act in order to furnish evidence, or to pretend to do so, to give false evidence thus deceiving the court or depriving it of an opportunity to learn the truth and an agreement for the reasonable support and maintenance of a husband or wife or children shall not be deemed to be collusive.

2. Condonation

Like collusion, condonation is also a statutory bar to divorce and, like collusion, it has never been given statutory definition. The bar prevents a spouse who agrees to resume cohabitation with a partner who has committed a matrimonial offence from holding that offence over the other partner's head for ever after. The condoned offence is, however, subject to revival if the forgiven spouse should commit another matrimonial offence.

The existence of condonation as an absolute bar, however, actively discourages attempts at reconciliation. One spouse may condone an act of adultery to try to save the marriage and prevent the destruction of the family. If, however, the gesture proves futile and the marriage is not saved, the ground for a divorce action is lost. Thus the law at present encourages couples not to seek reconciliation because by attempting reconciliation and failing, they would put the eventual dissolution of their marriage in jeopardy.

For this reason, your Committee has been urged to make condonation a discretionary bar so that the courts could take all the factors in the situation into account when deciding to reject or grant the petition. Such a solution, however, might still leave doubt as to when and how the courts will exercise their discretion and may still, therefore, tend to discourage reconciliation attempts. The parties preferring to "play safe" and keep at arm's length.

One of the provisions introduced into English law by the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1963 provides a solution to this problem. By that Act, a period of cohabitation for not more than three months, which has reconciliation as its primary purpose, is not deemed to have condoned the offence. Although in English law condonation remains an absolute bar.

Furthermore, your Committee recommends that the doctrine of revival be abolished. If attempted reconciliation is not considered condonation, the doctrine of revival is unnecessary. If the reconciliation attempt fails, a divorce may still be granted. If, however, the reconciliation succeeds, it is better that the couple put the past completely behind them, so that the marriage may make a fresh start with nothing, in the legal sense at least, hanging over it.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that the statutory bar to divorce of condonation be retained in the law of Canada subject to the discretion of the Court provided that a resumption of cohabitation by the spouses for a period of not more than three months which has reconciliation as its primary purpose shall not be deemed condonation, and further provided that a marital offence which has been condoned shall not be capable of being revived.

3. Connivance

Connivance is where the petitioner spouse encourages, assents to or aids in the commission of the matrimonial offence, thus becoming accessory to the offence. The aid or encouragement may under certain circumstances be by silent as well as spoken action, or implied consent, or by so arranging conditions as to assist its commission. Such action on the part of the petitioner should of course, deprive the petitioner of the aid of the court as against the respondent and co-respondent.

It is unnecessary to attempt a definition of connivance as it has been a bar to divorce for many years and is made known in numerous decisions of the courts both in England and Canada.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that connivance remain a bar to divorce within the discretion of the court in each individual case.

JUDICIAL SEPARATION

Judicial separation is on occasions a useful power to be possessed by the Court. Prior to the United Kingdom Act of 1857, it was known in England as divorce a mensa et thoro and its meaning is separation from bed and board without the right of remarriage. Its usefulness is when the Court wishes to give legal status to a separation which usually has already taken place and frequently in association with orders involving maintenance and the custody of children. Such a legal arrangement, while having legal validity which the police will enforce as between man and wife, does not preclude the possibility of eventual reconciliation.

For some reason authority to order judicial separation was omitted from the Dominion Act of 1930 which conferred on the Supreme Court of Ontario power to decree dissolution and annulment of marriage. That Act should be amended to correct what was likely an inadvertent omission.

Most, if not all, of the other provincial courts have had the power as a result of pre-Confederation law which remained in force by virtue of Section 129 of the British North America Act. As such, the provinces are unable to amend or abolish the pre-Confederation law, so the time has come for the Parliament of Canada to accept its responsibility which it has possessed for the past one hundred years and has continually avoided.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that the Divorce Act (Ontario), of 1930 be amended to conform and that the prospective Divorce Act of Canada contain a provision granting to the courts of all the Provinces of Canada and to the Senate by virtue of the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act, a uniform authority to decree Judicial Separation.

COURT JURISDICTION

In the Ontario Divorce Jurisdiction Act, which conferred authority to decree dissolution of marriage, and in the pre-Confederation statutes in the provinces other than Quebec and Newfoundland, it was uniformly the Supreme or Superior Court which was selected to administer the law of divorce. In the experience in Ontario of almost forty years and in the other provinces of the past one hundred years, the Supreme Courts have proven in some respects inadequate for the task. The Judges of the Supreme Courts visit the county towns, other than the cities, usually twice a year, so that long lists of divorce cases await the Assizes and are dealt with perfunctorily. They are run through rapidly as something of a nuisance in order that the more interesting and financially important actions may be heard.

Moreover, such matrimonial and family proceedings are continuing matters. While the marriage itself may be permanently and decisively disposed of, matters such as the division of marital property, alimony and the custody and maintenance of the children remain to be dealt with from time to time. To reach the judge who made the original order involves a trip to the provincial capital or a wait for a maximum of six months for the next Assizes, when unfortunately a different judge may be sitting.

To meet this obvious difficulty, the former Chief Justice of Ontario, the Honourable James McRuer, advised that the County Courts be given concurrent jurisdiction with the Supreme Court in matters of divorce. The County Court Judges are resident in the county towns and their local offices and officials are available at all times. The judges are present when required to explain or vary an Order or to make additional provisions.

Chief Justice McRuer spoke from his own long experience of the Supreme Court when speaking of the obvious advantage of having matrimonial matters dealt with by local judges. He would not interfere with the present authority of the Supreme Court Bench. Divorce litigants should have access to the Supreme Court if they wished a High Court trial, as they are now in cases beyond the jurisdiction of the County Courts, but neither should the great advantage of the County Courts be denied them. Your Committee has had recommendations that Matrimonial Causes be sent to family courts. This is a matter that could be left to conferences between the Minister of Justice and Provincial Attorneys General because of the lack of uniformity in such courts at present.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that the County Courts of all provinces having jurisdiction to dissolve marriage be given jurisdiction in divorce equally and concurrently with the Supreme Courts of the respective provinces.

PARLIAMENTARY DIVORCE

The Parliament of England has for centuries possessed power to dissolve marriages and when the British North America Act gave to Canada a Constitution "similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom", the Parliament of Canada obtained a similar jurisdiction, and has exercised that authority as it has been necessary to the present time. The Courts of Quebec have not at any time possessed jurisdiction in divorce, nor had those of Ontario until the passing of the Divorce (Ontario) Act of 1930. When Newfoundland entered Confederation in 1949 her Courts also had no such jurisdiction. Those seeking divorce in Ontario and Quebec therefore petitioned Parliament, until Ontario obtained her own courts. Thereafter, Quebec was alone in this respect until joined by Newfoundland. Since then divorce for persons domiciled in these two provinces has been by way of Private Bill and by Act of Parliament. The jurisdiction still remains but in 1963 Parliament conferred power on the Senate to dissolve marriages by resolution by passing the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act. This enactment constituted a supplementary procedure, which in practice has been a marked success. Professional jurists hear the evidence respecting each petition and report thereon with recommendations, and the Senate by passing a resolution enacts the dissolution or annulment or rejection of the petition as it sees fit, on Report of the Standing Committee on Divorce.

The number of divorces granted since Confederation have grown with the passing years. Dr. Ollivier told your Committee that in the first twelve years following Confederation Parliament when acting for both Ontario and Quebec enacted eight divorces. In the year 1966, the Senate passed over one thousand divorce resolutions.

A consideration of this procedure may not be within your Committee's terms of reference, but, in any event, the system created by the Act of 1963 is working satisfactorily; your Committee has not examined it critically and makes no recommendations at this time with respect to it. Should a considerable increase in the number of divorce petitions result from the additional grounds which the Committee is recommending, the problem can be readily solved by an increase in staff.

Your Committee is of opinion that the changes in the substantive law of divorce which it is recommending should be of Canada-wide application. The purpose of the changes proposed is to give relief as required to Canadian citizens and to improve the administration of justice to the benefit of the individual. The recommendations are not regional in character and Parliament's relevant jurisdiction and responsibility is to the nation as a whole.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act be amended as required to make the provisions of the prospective Canadian Divorce Act herein recommended applicable to divorce by Senate Resolution as well as to divorce by decree of the Courts.

APPEALS IN PARLIAMENTARY DIVORCE

In one particular the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act has proven in practice to be unsatisfactory. This is as respects so-called appeals against a resolution of the Senate passed on the authority of a report by the Standing Committee on Divorce and almost always in accordance with a recommendation by the Senate Commissioner. The resolution does not take effect so as to dissolve the marriage and thus permit the parties to remarry until thirty days after its passage, and during these thirty days, an aggrieved party may file a petition for a private bill, the effect of which is to stay the operation of the Senate resolution until the bill has been disposed of.

Only one such petition has been filed since the Act was passed in 1963, so that the procedure of appeal has not been accepted as satisfactory by those affected, and it has proved to be unsatisfactory in practice.

The period of delay after the passing of the resolution until the thirty days have elapsed or the bill is disposed of is undesirable, and the consideration of the bill by a Senate Committee presents problems. If the bill is considered by the Standing Committee on Divorce, objection is taken that the so-called appeal is to the judicial body which has already acted in the matter by approving the divorce in the first place and then presenting the resolution to the Senate. This objection is made though the individuals on the Committee did not sit when the Resolution was under consideration and were unfamiliar with the facts of the case.

If a committee were chosen to hear the appeal whose members were not on the Standing Committee, the members would be inexperienced in Parliamentary divorce under the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act. In addition the highly undesirable situation would be created of one committee of the Senate overruling or revising another committee in a judicial proceeding, and particularly so since the evidence submitted to the second committee is not restricted to that heard by the first committee, and in practically all instances would differ substantially.

It is, therefore, recommended that when the Commissioner makes his decision on the evidence heard by him, he notify the parties accordingly and that a thirty day delay take place thereafter before the Commissioner's decision be considered by the Standing Committee, during which time the parties may appeal to the Standing Committee on the evidence already presented.

If no appeal is taken the Standing Committee may move the resolution on the authority of the Commissioner's decision. If an appeal is taken, the Standing Committee's duty would be to review the evidence and hear such argument as the parties might present on the evidence, and recommend to the Senate such action as the Committee might deem just. The Senate itself would then act with finality.

This change would shorten and speed the procedure. The Commissioner would be relieved of reporting at length on the facts of each case as now, except when an appeal is taken, and the aggrieved party could appeal to an experienced body which would come fresh to the hearing.

RECOMMENDATION

Your Committee recommends that the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act be amended by the repeal of Section 2 and 3 thereof and the substitution therefor of the following:

2. (1) The Senate of Canada may, on the petition of either party to a marriage, by resolution declare that the marriage is dissolved or annulled, as the case may be, and immediately on the adoption of the resolution the marriage is dissolved or annulled, as the case may be, and shall be null and void, and thereafter either party may marry any person whom he or she might lawfully marry if the said marriage had not been solemnized.

(2) Officer's Recommendation.

The Senate shall adopt a resolution for the dissolution or annulment of a marriage only upon referring the petition therefor to an officer of the Senate, designated by the Speaker of the Senate, who shall hear evidence, and report thereon, but such officer shall not recommend that a marriage be dissolved or annulled, except on a ground on which a marriage could be dissolved or annulled, as the case may be, under the laws of England as they existed on the 15th day of July, 1870, or under the Marriage and Divorce Act, Chapter 176 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, or on any ground added by the Divorce (Extension of Grounds) Act, 1967.

(3) Report of Commissioner.

In any uncontested case, the Commissioner shall report his recommendations to the Senate's Standing Committee on Divorce, together with such facts and finding as may be required in each instance by the Committee or the Chairman thereof and the Committee may recommend the passage of a Resolution in accordance with the Commissioner's recommendation and on the authority thereof, or may take such other action as to it seems just.

(4) Notification of Parties.

Following the hearing of each contested case the Commissioner shall deliver personally or by registered mail to the parties or their respective legal representatives of record a copy of his report and recommendation and on the expiration of thirty days thereafter such report and recommendation may be taken into consideration by the Standing Committee of the Senate on Divorce.

Provision for Appeal in Parliamentary Divorce

3. (1) During the said thirty days, any of the parties to such contested case may give notice of appeal against the recommendation of the Commissioner to the Standing Committee of the Senate on Divorce, which shall hear the appeal on the evidence already submitted, together with arguments and representations of the parties or their legal representatives.

(2) If no such appeal is lodged within the said thirty days, the said Standing Committee may recommend the passage of a resolution in accordance with the Commissioner's recommendation and on the authority thereof, or may take such other action as to it seems just.

(3) If an appeal is lodged with the said Standing Committee within the said thirty days, the Committee shall hear the appeal on the evidence already presented, together with the arguments and representations of the parties or their legal representatives, and may approve the Commissioner's recommendation or may vary and amend it as to the Committee seems just and may recommend to the Senate accordingly.

CONCLUSION

In the foregoing pages is set forth what your Committee believes to be a comprehensive reform of the divorce laws of Canada. The acceptance of the Committee's recommendations would broaden the grounds upon which marriages may be dissolved, in order to meet the needs of modern society. It would give to the courts of the provinces and to the Senate on resolution, authority to dissolve marriages on proof of such marital offences as adultery, cruelty and desertion, and to dispose of the legal ties in cases where the marriage is irretrievably broken down because of the incapacitating illness of one of the spouses, whether mental or physical, or of criminality and long-term imprisonment, alcoholism, drug addiction or non-consummation, or of the disappearance of one of the marriage partners, and in addition where the marriage has broken down although there is no triable fault alleged or incapacity but in which there is no reasonable prospect of a resumption of cohabitation.

The exercise of these powers by the courts and the Senate, in accordance with the safeguards provided, will bring relief to many thousands of Canadian citizens, a relief which is sorely needed, and will contribute to the well-being of society and to the happiness of many.

In addition to broadening the grounds for divorce, married women deserted by their husbands will be given access to the courts on equality with men. Decrees as to alimony or maintenance, the division of marital property and the custody of and access to children will become possible, coincident with decrees of divorce as ancillary to divorce. Decrees of judicial separation will be uniform within the jurisdiction of the courts in all Provinces. The law with respect to collusion and condonation will be clarified, and access to the assistance of the courts will be more readily available when the County Courts are given concurrent jurisdiction with the Supreme or Superior Courts in matrimonial causes and matters.

It has been the effort of your Committee to make the law of divorce and related matters more in accordance with the needs of the people, more humane and at the same time more practical.

While this first part of your Committee's Report contains its recommendations concisely stated, a reading of the following parts is respectfully urged upon those who would understand your Committee's thinking and reasons therefor.

PART II

CANADIAN DIVORCE LAW AND THE LAW OF OTHER COUNTRIES

I CANADA

1. The Evolution of Canadian Divorce Law

Although the Parliament of Canada enjoys exclusive jurisdiction over marriage and divorce by virtue of section 91, head 21 of the British North America Act of 1867, expressed in the words "Marriage and Divorce," the essence of Canadian divorce law is to be found in an intermingling of English and pre-Confederation colonial statutes that have undergone only limited amendment by the federal Parliament. The courts of eight of the provinces (British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island) have the power to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii (from the bonds of marriage), while those of Quebec and Newfoundland have not. In the Yukon and Northwest Territories, the courts also have authority to grant divorces. Parliamentary divorces are provided for persons domiciled in Quebec and Newfoundland, or whose domicile is uncertain. With the exception of the three Atlantic provinces, which have divorce law of their own enactment antedating Confederation, the divorce law administered by the courts of the provinces, other than Quebec and Newfoundland, is basically the same as the English divorce law as it was on July 15, 1870. The English law of that date was set out in The Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857.

This complicated pattern and the predominance therein of nineteenth century English law has resulted from the piecemeal growth of Canada and the introduction of English law into the various colonies before they joined Confederation. In colonies of settlement, such as Nova Scotia, the common law of England and the then current existing English statute law became the law of the colony, while in colonies acquired by cession, such as Quebec, the existing laws of the territory, if there were any, continued in force until or unless expressly altered or repealed by the Crown.

In colonies of settlement, it was established by the eighteenth century that laws could be made only with the assent of an assembly in which the people were present either in person or by their representatives. Once a colony possessed its own legislature and made its own laws, statutes passed in England no longer automatically applied to the colony unless specifically stated to do so. While the Imperial Parliament could, and often did, legislate for the Empire as a whole and for certain specific colonies on particular occasions, Imperial legislation became applicable prima facie to the United Kingdom only and not the colonies. Any colony could, of course, adopt English law in whole or in part by legislative action and any law so instituted could be changed by the colonial legislature.

At the time of Confederation, section 129 of the British North America Act provided that the law then in force in the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick should continue in force until and unless repealed, abolished or altered by the Parliament of Canada or the provincial legislatures according to their respective legislative authority as set out in the Act. Similar provision was made for the continuance of the existing law of the other provinces and territories when they joined the Canadian federation.

The three provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island were all originally part of Nova Scotia which was a British colony of settlement and subject to the law of England. Nova Scotia was granted a Legislative Assembly, the first meeting of which was held on October 3, 1758. Nova Scotia law, therefore, was the English law as of that date, and thereafter subject to change by the colonial legislature, or by Imperial legislation that by express terms or necessary implication applied to Nova Scotia. Since England had no Divorce law at that time other than judicial separations granted by the ecclesiastical courts, there was no divorce court in Nova Scotia empowered to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii.

Prince Edward Island, acquired in 1763, became a separate province in 1769 and its first Assembly met in 1773, while New Brunswick became a separate province with its own legislature in 1784. These provinces thus acquired the law of England as of October 3, 1758, and later Nova Scotia law as of 1773 and 1784 respectively. Thereafter these provinces made their own law. But since there were no civil divorce courts in England in 1758, there were none in Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick. Nova Scotia, however, lost no time in enacting its own civil divorce law. An Act of 1758 (17 Geo. II, c. 17) gave the Governor with the members of his Council authority to hear and determine matters relating to prohibited marriage and divorce. The Nova Scotia legislature provided that marriages should be declared null and void only on grounds of impotence and consanguinity within the degree prohibited by the English Statute 32 Henry VIII, c. 38 and that divorce could be granted for adultery, and desertion without necessary maintenance for three years. In 1761 a further Act (I Geo. III, c. 7) removed desertion as a ground for divorce but added cruelty. Nova Scotia is still the only province in Canada in which cruelty is a ground for divorce. The composition of Nova Scotia courts was somewhat altered in 1841, and in 1866 a "Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes" was established. This court retained not only the pre-existing authority but it was also given the same powers in respect of, and incidental to, divorce and matrimonial causes and the custody, maintenance and education of children which were possessed by the divorce courts of England at that time. By virtue of section 129 of the British North America Act, these laws continued in force after Confederation and form the basis of divorce law in Nova Scotia, except as modified by the Dominion Statutes of 1925 and 1930.

New Brunswick also entered Confederation with a divorce law of its own enactment. The first Act was passed in 1787 but later revised in 1791 (31 Geo. III, c. 5). This established a Divorce Court and provided as grounds for divorce frigidity, impotence, adultery and consanguinity within the prohibited degrees. While the number of reported cases from New Brunswick is small, it seems that the effective ground for divorce in that province is adultery.

Theoretically, Prince Edward Island acquired the divorce law of Nova Scotia when it was constituted a separate province in 1769, but this law remained in practice a dead letter until the province established its own divorce courts by Acts of the legislature in 1833 and 1835. The Act of 1835 was not utilized, however, until 1945 when Rules of Practice and Procedure applicable to the divorce court were promulgated. Concurrent jurisdiction was conferred on the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island in 1949.

The Province of Ontario became a separate province with its own legislature by virtue of the Constitutional Act of 1791. When the Legislative Assembly first convened on October 15, 1792, the common law of England was adopted as the law of the province, but otherwise English law ceased to apply. Thus Upper Canada had no divorce law. Since none had been enacted before Confederation either by the legislature of Upper Canada or by that of the United Province of Canada, Ontario entered Confederation without any such law. Since divorce fell within Federal jurisdiction by the British North America Act, the province has since Confederation been unable to enact legislation on divorce of its own. The Ontario courts derive their jurisdiction from a statute passed by the Federal Parliament in 1930. This Act introduced the law of England as to the dissolution and annulment of marriage as of July 15, 1870.

Quebec too entered Confederation without any provisions for the dissolution of marriage. Although English criminal law was introduced into Quebec in 1763 and was subsequently continued, the Quebec Act of 1774, section 8, re-established Quebec law in matters concerning property and civil rights. The French Civil law was continued by the Constitutional Act of 1791. The Civil Code, which was enacted by the United Province of Canada in 1866 and which was continued in force by the British North America Act, states quite clearly in Article 185: "Marriage can only be dissolved by the natural death of one of the parties, while both live it is indissoluble." Since the Quebec legislature cannot repeal or amend that clause and since the Parliament of Canada which can, has not done so, the courts of the province of Quebec have no authority to grant dissolutions of marriage. They do, however, have power to grant judicial separations and declarations of nullity.

Although Newfoundland did not join Canada until 1949, its courts lack the power to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii. Newfoundland did not acquire the English law of 1857 because Newfoundland received its own legislature in 1832. Thus the laws of England which applied in Newfoundland were those in force in 1832 only, and the Supreme Court of the province has held (Hounsell v. Hounsell (1949) 3 C.L.R. 38, Nfld.) that the provincial courts had in 1832 only the jurisdiction of the English Ecclesiastical Courts, which could decree only judicial separation (divorce a mensa et thoro) and not dissolutions of marriage (divorce a vinculo matrimonii). The English secular courts did not acquire jurisdiction to grant divorce until twenty-five years later.

The divorce law of the remaining provinces, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba and the Yukon and Northwest Territories is substantially that contained in the English Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857. The reason for this again is due to the introduction of English law and its subsequent continuation when these territories and provinces became part of Canada.

In the case of British Columbia, the laws of England as of November 19, 1858, were declared to be in force by a Royal proclamation in 1858. Similar provision was made by a United Kingdom Ordinance in 1867 when Vancouver Island and British Columbia were united and the same provision remained in force after British Columbia entered the Canadian federation in 1871, subject of course to alteration either by the Parliament of Canada or the provincial legislature, according to their respective jurisdiction under the British North America Act. Thus British Columbia now has in force the English Act of 1857.

The provinces of Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan were all carved out of the territory surrendered by the Hudson's Bay Company in 1869. The Rupert's Land Act of the Imperial Parliament (31-32 Victoria, c. 105) which provided for the acquisition by the Crown of Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territories from the Hudson's Bay Company, also provided that the laws in force in these territories on July 15, 1870, when they were united with Canada would remain in force until altered by the Canadian Parliament or the Lieutenant-Governor of the Northwest Territories. The Northwest Territories Act of the Canadian Parliament in 1886 provided that the laws previously in force in the Territories would continue and the Alberta and Saskatchewan Act of 1905 similarly provided that the then existing laws would continue in force in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan until altered or repealed by the Dominion Parliament or the respective provincial legislature. Thus the law of divorce in these provinces is still the law of England as of July 15, 1870, and consequently their divorce law is based upon the English Statute of 1857. The situation in Manitoba is essentially the same, although as a result of a court case (Sinclair vs Mulligan, 5 Man. L.R., 17) a Provincial Statute and a Federal Statute (51 Victoria, c. 53) were felt necessary to declare it so formally.

Likewise, the divorce law of the Northwest Territories and Yukon is based on the 1857 English Statute. By the Northwest Territories Act of 1886, the Civil and Criminal Law of England as of July 15, 1870, was continued in the Territories, subject of course to repeal or amendment by the appropriate authority. The Yukon which was carved out of the Northwest Territories in 1898 acquired the existing law of the Territories.

What then was the Law of England on the magic date of July 15, 1870? The Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 provided for a dissolution of marriage on the petition of the husband if his wife had committed adultery since the celebration of the marriage. For the wife, however, to obtain a divorce, it was necessary for her to prove that since the celebration of the marriage the husband had been guilty of either (i) incestuous adultery; or (ii) bigamy with adultery; or (iii) rape, sodomy, or bestiality; or (iv) adultery coupled with such cruelty as would have entitled her to a divorce a mensa et thoro; or (v) adultery coupled with desertion for two years or longer without reasonable excuse. Thus a "double standard" was established that permitted a husband a greater latitude in this regard than was possessed by his wife.

This so-called "double standard" was removed in Canada in 1925 when the Parliament of Canada exercised for the first time its general legislative jurisdiction over Marriage and Divorce. Heretofore, Parliament had passed only private divorce Acts. The Marriage and Divorce Act of that year permitted the wife to sue for divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery alone. This Act applied, of course, only in those provinces where the courts had power to grant divorces a vinculo, but the same principle has been followed since in parliamentary divorce.

Since then there have been only four other federal Acts directly concerned with Divorce. Two of these were applicable to specific provinces only and all of them concerned the extension of the jurisdiction of the courts rather than the grounds for granting divorces. The Divorce Jurisdiction Act of 1930 permitted a wife who had been deserted for two years or more by her husband to petition for divorce in the province in which she was domiciled at the time of the desertion. Before this measure, since the domicile of a married woman is in law that of her husband, the deserted wife had to petition in the province or country in which her deserting husband was then domiciled. In the same year, Parliament granted to the Supreme Court of Ontario jurisdiction to decree dissolution and annulment of marriage in accordance with the law of England as it existed on July 15, 1870. This gave Ontario its first divorce law.

The fourth Act of Parliament, passed in 1937, regularized a curious situation that had arisen in British Columbia. By the 1857 Act, divorce cases in England have been heard by three judges from whom there was an appeal to the House of Lords. But when the laws of England were introduced into British Columbia, the powers exercised by three judges in England were granted to a single judge in British Columbia and no provision was made for appeal. Consequently, it was held that there was no right of appeal from a single judge in British Columbia when either granting or refusing a divorce. The British Columbia Divorce Appeals Act of 1937 of the Dominion Parliament conferred the right of appeal in divorce cases to the Court of Appeal of British Columbia.

The last and most recent Act to be passed by Parliament on the subject of Divorce was the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act of 1963. This Act provided a new procedure for the granting of Parliamentary Divorces. Before the importance of this Act can be considered, it is necessary to look more closely at Parliamentary divorce.

2. Parliamentary Divorce

A Parliamentary divorce is procured by the passage of a private Act of Parliament dissolving a particular marriage. Parliament, as the supreme legislative power, has the right to exempt persons from the application of specified laws of the country, if it sees fit to do so. The Parliament of the United Kingdom granted divorces by private Act of Parliament long before the establishment of the English Divorce Courts in 1857. Thus, although marriages were otherwise indissoluble under the ordinary law, Parliament made exceptions in specific instances. The preamble of the British North America Act indicates the intention of the federating provinces to have a constitution "similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom." Accordingly, the Parliament of Canada exercised after Confederation a jurisdiction similar to that of the English Parliament. The Parliament of Canada is the only legislative body in Canada with authority to pass private divorce Acts, since it alone has jurisdiction in matters of "Marriage and Divorce".

The existence of parliamentary divorce has met the need of persons domiciled in provinces which lack divorce courts, to obtain dissolutions of marriage. Thus, although residents of Quebec and Newfoundland, and prior to 1930, of Ontario, have been unable to seek relief in the courts of their provinces, they have been able to appeal to Parliament. While Parliament has not imposed an unwanted divorce jurisdiction on the courts of those provinces not seeking it, it has not prevented the residents of those provinces from obtaining divorces.

Theoretically, the jurisdiction of Parliament in granting parliamentary divorce is quite unfettered. It has power to grant a dissolution of marriage to any petitioner domiciled in Canada and for any cause or for no cause at all, as it may see fit. However, Parliament has not exercised its wide jurisdiction to the full.

Its practice has been to grant divorce only on such grounds as the English courts recognized in 1870, save that it will grant a wife a divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery without qualification.

Similarly, although Parliament's power to grant a divorce is unqualified, in fact it has entertained petitions only from persons who lack an alternate remedy in the courts. That means from those domiciled in Quebec and Newfoundland, or from those whose domicile in a province is in doubt.

While parliamentary divorces were rather few in the nineteenth century, the number has grown rapidly since 1900. Consequently, in 1963 the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act (12 Eliz. II, c. 10) delegated to the Senate the power to dissolve and annul marriages by resolution, without concurrence by the House of Commons; subject to an appeal to Parliament as a whole. Such an appeal may be made by the aggrieved party within 30 days after the passage of such a resolution by petitioning Parliament for a private Act. Such a petition has the effect of staying the resolution until the bill has been disposed of by Parliament. If the appeal is not made, the resolution becomes effective 30 days after the adoption of the resolution by the Senate.

Under the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act, each petition must be referred to an officer of the Senate, designated by the Speaker, who hears the evidence in the case and reports on it to the Senate. This officer, however, may recommend the dissolution or annulment of the marriage only "on a ground on which a marriage could be dissolved, or annulled, as the case may be, under the laws of England as they existed on the 15th day of July, 1870, or under the Marriage and Divorce Act, Chapter 176 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952." In effect, this means that parliamentary divorces are granted on the same grounds as divorces are granted by the courts in the Prairie Provinces, British Columbia and Ontario.

The existence of this procedure does not fetter Parliament in any way. When the case has been referred to the Divorce Commissioner and his report has been received, the Senate has a right to refuse or to grant a resolution of divorce as it sees fit, subject, of course, to the right of the parties to apply for a private bill from Parliament as a whole. Parliament can still pass private divorce bills as it has in the past. The Senate has been given an additional jurisdiction in respect of divorce, but the sovereign power of Parliament in matters relating to marriage and divorce has not been impaired.

3. Jurisdiction

Parliament is assigned exclusive jurisdiction over "Marriage and Divorce" by the British North America Act. The provincial legislatures enjoy exclusive jurisdiction over "Solemnization of Marriage" in their respective provinces. Parliament's jurisdiction extends to the right to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii. The provinces have the right to prescribe the necessary procedural rules and this they have done. The provinces draw their authority from Section 92, subsection 14, of the British North America Act, whereby the provinces are authorized to make laws dealing with "administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts". While the courts for the administration of divorce laws are at present the provincial courts, Parliament has authority to establish a federal divorce court under section 101 of the British North America Act. Parliament may also confer divorce jurisdiction on provincial courts as it has done in the courts of Ontario. It may do so explicitly, or implicitly by passing a law without establishing a court for its administration. In this case, it is presumed that Parliament intended the law to be administered by the provincial courts.

While the situation regarding dissolutions of marriage and procedure are quite clear, the jurisdiction of Parliament over judicial separation and matters ancillary to divorce is not specifically stated. However, it is the considered opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice that Parliament's jurisdiction extends to judicial separation. In ecclesiastical law, a decree of judicial separation from bed and board was known as a divorce a mensa et thoro, and this decree was granted only by the church courts. The English Act of 1857 transferred this jurisdiction from the ecclesiastical to the civil courts and renamed the decree separation. The decree under both courts had the similar effect of dissolving the marriage without conferring on the parties the right of remarriage, so that when ten years after the passage of the Act of 1857, the British North America Act conferred divorce jurisdiction on the Canadian Parliament, it follows that divorce a mensa et thoro (judicial separation) was included with divorce a vinculo.

Looked at from another point of view, a marriage creates a new legal status for the parties. New rights and duties are created, such as the obligation to support and the right to consortium, while a right to again marry is extinguished. A divorce a vinculo destroys the legal status involved in the marriage and restores the parties to their former positions. When the divorce is granted, these rights and obligations cease and the parties are free to remarry. A judicial separation is a divorce without the right to remarry. "The legal status created by the marriage has been extinguished," to quote a witness before the Committee, "but the status enjoyed by the parties thereto immediately before the marriage has not been fully restored. . . If Parliament can say that pre-existing rights are fully restored, it can also say they are only partially restored."

It is interesting to note, that in 1879, parliamentary divorce was granted, an Act for the relief of Eliza Maria Campbell (42 Victoria, c. 79) which in fact was a judicial separation, providing that "the said Eliza Maria Campbell shall be and remain separated from the bed and board of her husband." This Act was passed by a Parliament containing as members many of the authors of the British North America Act. They seemed to have had no doubt as to Parliament's jurisdiction. However, it should be added that this was the only Act of judicial separation passed by Parliament and that its validity has not been judicially tested. But neither has it been judicially questioned.

Parliament has not in recent years dealt with matters ancillary to divorce.

Heretofore, these matters have been dealt with by the provinces, if for no other reason than that Parliament has refrained from doing so. The Committee is of the opinion that the exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament over divorce includes legislative authority over matters ancillary to divorce.

Divorce alters the legal status created by the marriage. Jurisdiction with regard to divorce thus includes the abolition of the rights and obligations created by the marriage and the restoration of certain pre-existing rights. Such rights can be terminated or restored in whole or in part.

A husband has a duty to maintain his wife. That obligation normally ceases when the marriage is dissolved because the relationship between the parties no longer exists. As Parliament is competent to legislate to divorce, it may also define the extent to which a dissolution of marriage alters the rights and obligations inherent in marriage. Parliament, can, therefore, provide for the continuation of the obligation of the husband to support the wife.

A similar argument can be advanced regarding the maintenance and custody of children. While a marriage exists both parents have joint custody of the children and the husband is under an obligation to provide for their maintenance and education. The termination of the marriage by a divorce interferes with these obligations and Parliament's jurisdiction relative to divorce necessarily includes authority to stipulate to what extent they shall be continued, altered or destroyed.

The Committee's authority for the foregoing is memorandum of Mr. E. A. Driedger, Deputy Minister of Justice. This document is presented here verbatim:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Ottawa 4, December 28, 1966.

The Honourable A. W. Roebuck,
The Senate,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Senator Roebuck:

In your letter of October 20 you asked for my views on two additional points as follows:

(a) whether Parliament has jurisdiction with regard to judicial separation, and

(b) whether Parliament has jurisdiction with respect to alimony, custody and maintenance and division of property of divorced persons and their families.

I have now given some consideration to these problems and am able to put my views before you. I should like to state at the outset, however, that the views hereinafter expressed are not in any sense to be regarded as the views of the Government or any member thereof. They are merely my own personal opinions which I offer for such assistance as it may be to your Committee.

Before dealing with your questions I think it is important to bear in mind the fundamental nature of marriage and divorce from a legal point of view. A marriage creates a new legal status between the parties thereto. At the moment of marriage new rights and obligations between the parties thereto arise, and at the same time a pre-existing right is extinguished. Thus, there arise the obligation to support and the right to consortium; at the same time, the pre-existing right to marry is lost. These are some of the essential legal characteristics of a marriage; without them, the marriage status would not exist.

A divorce a vinculo matrimonii also changes the legal status of the parties; it destroys the legal status created by the marriage and restores the parties to the status they had before the marriage. At the moment the divorce takes place, the rights and obligations inherent in the marriage cease and the parties are thereafter free to re-marry.

Coming now to your first question, you may recall that I did touch upon this when I appeared before your Committee. I said at that time that having regard to the nature of a decree of judicial separation it was reasonable to conclude that Parliament's jurisdiction extended to both divorce a vinculo matrimonii and judicial separation. I might now add to that observation that a judicial separation is in reality a divorce without the right to re-marry. The legal status created by the marriage has been extinguished, but the status enjoyed by the parties thereto immediately before the marriage has not been fully restored. I would therefore consider that the expression "marriage and divorce" includes judicial separation, because the latter deals with the legal status of married persons and the effect of a judicial decree on that status. Putting it another way, one might say that the greater includes the less; if Parliament can say that pre-existing rights are fully restored, it can also say that they are only partially restored.

Dealing now with your second question, as I have indicated, jurisdiction to make laws in relation to "divorce" is in essence jurisdiction to make laws for the alteration of the legal status created by the marriage; the jurisdiction therefore extends to the abolition of the rights and obligations created by the marriage and the restoration of pre-existing rights. As I have already indicated, I think it must follow that these rights and obligations can be terminated in whole or in part.

It is the husband's duty to maintain the wife. If the marriage is dissolved, that obligation normally ceases because the relationship of husband and wife no longer exists. For the reasons I have indicated, I think that Parliament is competent to define the extent to which a dissolution of marriage alters the rights and obligations inherent in the marriage and therefore could provide for a continuation of the obligation to support. The remarks of Lord Atkin in Hyman v. H. (1929) A.C. 601, would support this line of argument. He there said at pp. 628-9:

> "The necessity for such provisions is obvious. While the marriage tie exists the husband is under a legal obligation to maintain his wife. The duty can be enforced by the wife, who can pledge his credit for necessaries as an agent of necessity, if, while she lives apart from him with his consent, he either fails to pay an agreed allowance or fails to make her any allowance at all; or, if she lives apart from him under a decree for separation, he fails to pay the alimony ordered by the Court...When the marriage is dissolved the duty to maintain arising out of the marriage tie disappears."

This view is also supported by the remarks of Crocket, J. in McLennan v. McLennan (1940) S.C.R. 335, and by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Rousseau v. Rousseau (1920) 3 W.W.R. 384.

The same reasoning would apply to maintenance and custody of children. During marriage the husband is under a duty to maintain and provide for the education of the children of the marriage, and the husband and wife have joint custody. These are rights and obligations that arise out of the marriage relationship. A divorce, which terminates the marriage relationship, obviously interferes with these rights and obligations, and in my opinion Parliament's jurisdiction in relation to divorce would include jurisdiction to prescribe the extent to which these rights and obligations are to be abrogated or continued. In the Reference re Adoption Act (1938) S.C.R. 398, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld provincial legislation, but at page 402 Chief Justice Duff left the door open to federal legislation when he said that > "We are not concerned with any ancillary jurisdiction in respect of children which the Dominion may possess in virtue of the assignment to the Dominion Parliament by section 91 of the subject of Marriage and Divorce."

The division of property between divorced persons (apart from the question of support or maintenance), as well as such matters as marriage settlements, dower, homestead rights, the right of married women to own property and sue in their own names, etc., may well stand on a different footing. These matters do involve rights and obligations between husband and wife, but they seem to me to relate more to the property and civil rights of the parties to the marriage than to their legal status as married persons. They could vary from time to time and from jurisdiction to jurisdiction and a particular rule is not necessary or essential to constitute a marriage.

The provinces of course have jurisdiction over property and civil rights. Since Parliament has exclusive jurisdiction over marriage and divorce, it would seem to be clear that the provinces could not define the status of marriage or divorced persons and therefore could not prescribe the rights and obligations constituting a marriage or the extent to which the rights and obligations created by the marriage shall be abrogated or continued by a divorce. However, generally speaking, their jurisdiction over property and civil rights would include the matters mentioned in the preceding paragraph as well as the welfare of the people of the province. The provinces could therefore make provision for the support of its residents, whether they be single, married, divorced, children or adults. Provincial legislation dealing with property and civil rights, and not being legislation qua marriage or divorce, would no doubt be valid. If, however, any particular provincial law should clash with a federal law, then, under the normal rule, the latter would prevail.

I was also asked by the Special Assistant of your Committee to clarify the comment I made when I appeared before the Committee to the effect that at the time that Prince Edward Island was established there was no divorce law because the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act of England was not enacted until 1857. What I had in mind, of course, was that the English Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act did not become the law of Prince Edward Island because the Act was passed after Prince Edward Island established its own legislature in 1773. Between 1773 and the year 1883, when Prince Edward Island enacted its own Divorce Act, the law of Nova Scotia would have applied because Prince Edward Island was originally part of Nova Scotia. However, I believe there was in Prince Edward Island no court with divorce jurisdiction between 1773 and 1883, so that the substantive law of divorce that was carried forward into Prince Edward Island had no practical effect. As I indicated earlier, rules of procedure were not promulgated in Prince Edward Island until 1945 so that between 1883 and 1945 the Prince Edward Island divorce law was not in practice being applied.

I hope that the foregoing clarifies all of the additional points that have been raised. If I can be of any further assistance to your Committee, please let me know and I shall do my best to accommodate you.

Yours truly,

E. A. Driedger,
Deputy Minister.

It may be of significance to note, that in the past, Parliament in the passage of private divorce bills has exercised jurisdiction over these matters. In the Campbell case referred to previously, Parliament prescribed alimony for the wife and laid down how it should be paid. It also determined not only the custody of a child of the marriage but also provided for the child's maintenance. There were five other private divorce Acts, passed in the period between Confederation and the year 1896, which made provision for the custody of the children. (47, Victoria, c. 47; 50-51, Victoria, c. 131; 51, Victoria, c. 110-111; 55-56, Victoria, c. 80).

4. A Note on Judicial Separation

Parliament has jurisdiction over judicial separation as well as over the dissolution of marriage. Judicial separation has been defined as "divorce without the right to remarry". Lord Buckmaster in the case of Hyman v. Hyman (1929 A. C. 601) has provided the classic description. He said:

> "Judicial separation, which has been the subject of much learned and mighty censure, is nothing but enforcing through the order of the court an arrangement which the parties could—were they willing—equally effect for themselves, it merely makes in the form and with the force of a decree an arrangement for the parties to live apart."

The law concerning judicial separation in Canada has been determined by the same processes that established the law on dissolution of marriage. British Columbia and the Prairie provinces thus base their law of judicial separation on the law of England as it was on November 19, 1858 and July 15, 1870. The exception is Alberta which in 1927 passed an Act purporting to govern judicial separation. The legislature acted on the assumption that the subject was one of civil rights. Judicial separation clearly affects the rights and obligations resulting from the marriage status and thus falls within federal jurisdiction. Hence the validity of this provincial legislation is doubtful. The provisions of the Alberta Act, however, are not dissimilar to those in force in the other Prairie provinces.

The English law is founded on the English Act of 1857 already mentioned. The grounds provided in the English Act are adultery, cruelty, and desertion without just cause for two years or more. However, that Act provided that relief could also be granted on principles which, in the opinion of the court "are as nearly as may be conformable to those followed by the English Ecclesiastical Courts before 1857." Thus the grounds may be somewhat wider than those actually enumerated. Alberta and Saskatchewan have by statute widened the former grounds for judicial separation adding (i) desertion constituted by the fact that a spouse has failed to comply with an order for restitution of conjugal rights; and (ii) sodomy or bestiality or attempts to commit either offence.

In Nova Scotia and Newfoundaland the substance of the English law of 1857 also provides the legal basis for judicial separation. In the latter province, the Supreme Court has all the powers exercised by the English Ecclesiastical Courts prior to 1832 and this includes competence in actions for judicial separation. Nova Scotia has conferred on its divorce courts the jurisdiction to grant separations in accordance with principles and practices of the English courts in 1866. In New Brunswick the law dates back to an Act of 1791 and the grounds for a separation are the same as those for divorce with the addition of desertion.

Thus in seven provinces there is a degree of uniformity in the law providing for judicial separation. The exceptions are Ontario, Prince Edward Island and Quebec. Prince Edward Island seems to have no grounds specified at all for the granting of judicial separation, and the Courts of Ontario have held they do not possess the jurisdiction to grant relief in this field. They base their contention on the wording of the Divorce Act (Ontario), 1930, which provided for the dissolution and annulment of marriage only, and not for matrimonial causes generally. Consequently, in Ontario there is no law of judicial separation which in practice is dealt with as a matter of legal contract between the parties concerned.

Quebec is an exception only in the sense that its law is not based upon the English law of 1857. The Courts of Quebec do grant "separations from bed and board". Voluntary separation has no legal recognition in that province. A written separation agreement made by the spouses will not be enforced by the courts. While the existence of such an agreement may indicate that no desertion has taken place, it can in no way change the legal duties of the marriage partners to each other or to their children. By Quebec law, a husband and wife owe each other mutual fidelity, succor and assistance. A wife is under an obligation to cohabit with her husband, and reside with him wherever he chooses to live. For his part, a husband has a duty to receive his wife and maintain and support her to the best of his ability and condition. Any breach of these conditions by one partner, gives the other grounds for action in separation from bed and board. Such separation may be demanded on the grounds of adultery or of "the outrage, ill-usage or grievous insult committed by the other."

Since a dissolution of marriage can be obtained in Quebec only through parliamentary divorce and since a proportion of the population of the province find divorce contrary to their religious beliefs, judicial separation is a common procedure in that province.

II ENGLISH DIVORCE LAW

Since the basis of Canadian Divorce law rests, for the most part, upon English law, it may be useful to put on record a brief summary of the English law of divorce and its development in order to provide a basis of comparison.

1. Ecclesiastical Courts

Until the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857, the English civil courts lacked the jurisdiction to grant divorces. Up to that time, matrimonial causes had been reserved to the Ecclesiastical Courts. These courts, however, could grant a decree of judicial separation, divorce a mensa et thoro, only. Dissolution of Marriage, or divorce a vinculo matrimonii, was not within their jurisdiction. Exclusive jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts over all matters relating to marriage and its dissolution extends back very far in English history. Matrimonial causes had been the exclusive prerogative of the Ecclesiastical Courts since the thirteenth century, and perhaps even earlier.

The trial of matrimonial causes within the Ecclesiastical Courts meant that it was Canon Law rather than common law or even Roman civil law that shaped the law of divorce in England. Before the Reformation, the Church regarded marriage as a sacrament and thus it was virtually impossible to obtain a divorce a vinculo. The Pope alone could grant a dissolution of a validly contracted marriage and he rarely did. It was relatively easy, however, to obtain a decree of nullity. The grounds for a nullity were precontract (proof of a binding promise to marry another), consanguinity and affinity. Consequently elaborate rules of a highly artificial character grew up around the table of prohibited degrees set out in the Book of Leviticus. These even included blood relationship and relationship by marriage down to the seventh degree. The doctrine of spiritual affinity invented by the Emperor Justinian also became the basis for a similar set of complex rules. The extent of these rules is well illustrated in the case of Roger Donnington whose marriage was declared null and void because before its celebration he had had sexual intercourse with a third cousin of his future wife.

The Reformation worked some changes in the English law. Jurisdiction still remained with the church courts, but the relations between church and state were put on a new basis. Under Henry VIII, the King became head of both Church and State and by the Act in Restraint of Appeals of 1533 the right of appeals from the Ecclesiastical Courts to Rome was abolished. The Protestant reformers restricted the degrees of affinity by the famous Statute of 32 Henry VIII, c. 38, and thus tightened the procedure whereby nullity proceedings had become a virtual substitute for divorce. At the same time, however, it came to be regarded in the sixteenth century that a divorce granted by the courts on the ground of adultery was a divorce a vinculo and entitled the parties to marry again.

This state of affairs did not remain in existence for long, however. In 1602, in Fuliambe's Case the court of Star Chamber sitting under Archbishop Bancroft held that a pronouncement of divorce by the Ecclesiastical Courts did not dissolve a marriage completely. This decision effectively closed the door to anyone attempting to obtain a dissolution of his marriage from the church courts. Thereafter, the proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts were restricted to granting divorce a mensa et thoro. These were granted on the grounds of adultery, cruelty and unnatural practices. Desertion was remedied by a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, not by a divorce. Disobedience to this decree led to the miscreant being declared contumacious and being excommunicated. By the Ecclesiastical Courts Act of 1813 the divine sanction was replaced by a more immediate one; the sentence of excommunication was replaced by imprisonment for not more than six months. The courts also pronounced decrees of nullity on the grounds of consanguinity or affinity, mental incapacity, impotence, force or error, impuberty (i.e. marriage under age) or a prior existing marriage.

2. Parliamentary Divorce

While divorce a vinculo was unobtainable from the Ecclesiastical Courts, there was a remedy to Englishmen who wanted their marriages dissolved. This was by resort to a private Act of Parliament specifically dissolving their marriage. This was an extremely expensive practice which grew up at the end of the seventeenth century and was a "proceeding, which was open, as a matter of course, on sufficient evidence, to anyone who was rich enough to pay for it." (Cmnd 9678, p. 4) It was a procedure that was little used. Between 1715 and 1852 the number of such divorces averaged less than two a year.

At the end of the eighteenth century, in 1798, as a result of resolutions passed by the House of Lords, the process of parliamentary divorce was rendered more difficult and expensive. After that date all petitions had to be supported by a divorce a mensa et thoro from the Ecclesiastical Courts and by a verdict of damages for criminal conversion brought against the wife's seducer in the Common Law Courts, or to show circumstances explaining their absence. Adultery was the only ground upon which a petition could be presented and normally relief was granted only to a husband; there are only four cases of relief being afforded to the wife and those concerned circumstances of aggravated enormity. It is significant to note, however, that care was taken that the wife was not left destitute. The House of Commons possessed an official known as the "Ladies Friend" whose task it was to ensure that a husband made 'suitable but moderate provision' for his divorced wife.

3. The Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857

Following a Royal Commission appointed in 1850, the situation was radically changed by the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857. That Act achieved two things. In the first place it established a civil court upon which was conferred all jurisdiction then exercised by the Ecclesiastical Courts of England in all matters, causes and suits matrimonial. It also provided for the dissolution of marriage, divorce a vinculo. The Act substituted judicial separation for "divorce a mensa et thoro" and provided that such a decree could be obtained by either husband or wife on the ground of adultery, cruelty or desertion without cause for two years.

Dissolution of marriage was provided for on the ground of adultery of the wife. If a wife wished a divorce, however, she had to establish more than mere adultery, namely:

(i) incestuous adultery;

(ii) bigamy with adultery;

(iii) rape, sodomy or bestiality;

(iv) adultery coupled with such cruelty as would have entitled her to a divorce a mensa et thoro;

(v) adultery coupled with desertion, without any reasonable excuse, for two years or upwards.

These more stringent provisions in the case of the wife simply followed the established procedure for the granting of parliamentary divorce. In the case of judicial separation, on the other hand, no distinction was made because of the sex of the petitioner.

By the Act of 1857, connivance, condonation and collusion were made absolute bars and adultery on the part of the petitioner, delay, desertion, cruelty or conduct conducive of adultery were made discretionary bars to petitions for divorce.

While the law passed in 1857 still forms the basis of the divorce law of most of Canada, it has ceased to provide the basis for the current law of divorce in England. There have been numerous Acts concerning divorce passed by the British Parliament since 1857. In 1923, the so called "double standard" was removed, placing the wife on an equal footing with her husband, in that she could sue for divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery alone. She was no longer obligated to prove further matrimonial offences. A similar step was taken in Canada, as previously mentioned, in 1925.

The English Divorce courts derived from the practice of the church courts the power to award alimony pendente lite. The Act of 1857 further allowed the courts to award permanent alimony and maintenance after decrees were granted of judicial separation or dissolution of marriage. In 1907, the courts were given similar powers after making a decree of nullity of marriage.

A Royal Commission had been the spur to produce the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857. A further Royal Commission, the Gorell Commission, was appointed in 1909 to enquire into the state of divorce law. The Commission recommended that the grounds for granting divorce should be widened to include not only (i) adultery, but also (ii) wilful desertion for three years and upwards; (iii) cruelty; (iv) incurable insanity after five years of confinement; (v) habitual drunkenness found incurable after three years from the first order of separation; (vi) imprisonment under commuted death sentence. It was also recommended that the "double standard" be abolished. This latter was the first, and really the only one, of their recommendations that found early fulfilment.

4. The "Herbert Act", 1937

Changes recommended by the Gorell Commission did not find their way into law until 1937. Then a private members bill, introduced by A.P. (later Sir Alan) Herbert was enacted. This Act, the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1937 provided three additional grounds for divorce: (i) wilful desertion for three years and upwards; (ii) cruelty; and (iii) insanity after five years confinement. It also made provision for the dissolution of the marriage on the presumption of death of the other spouse. The additional grounds for nullity recommended by the Gorell Commission were also introduced substantially by the 1937 Act. These were (i) wilful refusal to consummate the marriage; (ii) that either party at the time of the marriage was of unsound mind or mentally defective or subject to recurrent fits of insanity or epilepsy; (iii) that the respondent was at the time of marriage suffering from venereal disease of a communicable form; or (iv) was pregnant by some person other than the petitioner. Grounds (ii) through (iv) were restricted by the proviso that: (i) that at the time of the marriage the petitioner was ignorant of the fact alleged; (ii) that the proceedings were instituted within a year of the marriage; and (iii) that marital intercourse with the consent of the petitioner has not taken place since the discovery by the petitioner of the existence of the ground for the decree.

The relevant English statutes were consolidated in the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1950 and in 1965 a further consolidating statute was passed incorporating changes made in the law since 1950.

An important provision of the 1937 Statute stipulated that no divorce proceedings could be taken within the first three years of marriage without special leave. The rationale behind this requirement was that young people in many cases were not making sufficient efforts to overcome the difficulties of adjusting to married life. In case of exceptional hardship to the petitioner or in the event of exceptional depravity on the part of the respondent, special leave can be obtained from a judge to begin proceedings before the three year period has expired.

5. Bars to Divorce

In 1963 and 1965, by the Matrimonial Causes Acts of those years, the law relating to condonation and collusion was amended. Before those Acts, the forgiveness of one spouse for an act of adultery committed by the other was conditional on the offending spouse committing no further matrimonial offences. If further offences were committed, and these could include cruelty and desertion as well as adultery, the old offence of adultery was revived. The 1963 Act, however, provided that adultery which had been condoned could not be revived. It also provided that a period of cohabition between the parties for not more than three months, which had as its primary purpose reconciliation, should not be deemed to have condoned an act of adultery or cruelty.

The 1963 Act also attempted to solve the problem arising from agreements made by the parties to a divorce before or during divorce proceedings, such as bona fide arrangements to settle questions of maintenance for the wife and children, but there was always the risk that such agreements might be held to be collusive. The 1963 Act, therefore, made collusion a discretionary bar and also made it possible for the court to take any such agreement into consideration and give direction upon it. If the Court approves any such agreement, it is freed from the taint of collusion. If the court does not approve, it can either be rewritten or simply abandoned. This provision has made it possible for sensible arrangements to be reached by the parties without running the risk of losing the divorce action because of collusion. At the same time, the bar of collusion still applies to improper agreements. As the judge in the case of Nash vs. Nash (L. R. 1965, p. 266) stated:

> ". . . since the enactment of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1963, it is no longer appropriate to treat all collusion as mischievous or all who negotiate collusive bargains as mischief makers. A collusive bargain, which in the ordinary meaning of the word is corrupt, remains an offence legally and morally, e.g. the procurement of a decree upon a false case of improper pressure by financial bribes or threats upon a spouse to bring a suit or abandon a defence; but a collusive bargain, which represents an honest negotiation between the parties which is not intented to deceive the court either by putting forward false evidence or suppressing or withdrawing a good defence and which takes its place in an agreement which is intended to make reasonable provision for the parties, according to its subject matter, is a perfectly reputable transaction. There is no objection to solicitors and counsel negotiating such a bargain. . . the institution of marriage should not be undermined by an unworthy and disreputable market in its dissolution."

Since the introduction of cruelty, desertion and insanity as grounds for Divorce in England by the 1937 Act, a considerable jurisprudence has grown up on these subjects. Cruelty and desertion were left undefined in the Act and it has been the duty of the courts to evolve practical definitions.

6. Cruelty

The legal definition of cruelty in England has stressed that such conduct must have caused danger to life, limb or health, either bodily or mental, or at least given rise to a reasonable apprehension of such danger. Until 1964, it was also assumed that cruelty must have been aimed at, or intended to hurt, the other spouse or the children of the marriage. However, in the cases of Gollins vs. Gollins and Williams vs. Williams, the House of Lords held that if the conduct complained of was grave and weighty and if the injury or apprehended injury to the petitioner's health was shown, then it was not necessary to prove that there was an intention to injure.

Actual physical violence is not necessary to establish cruelty. The matrimonial relations between the spouses must be considered, particularly in cases where the alleged cruelty consists not of actual physical violence but of persistent and injurious reproaches, accusations and "nagging". The knowledge and intentions of the respondent, the nature of his or her conduct, the character and physical and mental weaknesses of the husband and wife must all come under consideration. In the Gollins case it was held "that when reprehensible conduct or departure from the normal standards of conjugal kindness caused injury to health or an apprehension of it, it was cruelty if a reasonable person, after taking account of the temperament of the parties and all other particular circumstances would consider that the conduct complained of was such that "this spouse should not be called upon to endure it." "It is a question of fact in each case whether the conduct of this man to this woman, or vice versa, is cruelty."

It is interesting to note that in England, drunkenness, gambling and wilful neglect to maintain are not cruelty per se. If persisted in, however, they become so, especially if the culprit has been warned that the conduct may be injurious to the health of the other spouse.

If the petitioning spouse provoked the cruelty complained of, he or she is not entitled to relief. Nevertheless, the provocation must be such as to deprive a reasonable person of self-control. The accused party must be acting under the stress of such provocation and the mode of expressing their resentment must not be unreasonable.

7. Desertion

Desertion, like cruelty, has no statutory definition. The Royal Commission on Marriage and Divorce defined desertion as follows:

> "A separation of the spouses which is against the will of one spouse and which is accompanied by an intention on the part of the other spouse without just cause permanently to end the married life together." (Cmnd. 9678, p. 4).

It was introduced into England as a ground for divorce in 1937. The physical departure of one spouse from the matrimonial house does not, however, make that spouse necessarily the deserting partner. Desertion is not so much a withdrawal from a place as from a state of things. Desertion commences from the time when the factum of separation coincides in point of time with the will to desert (animus deserendi). A separation may take place without there being an animus, as in a case where the separation is by mutual consent or by compulsion. If the spouses part by mutual consent without any stipulation as to the length of the separation, either of them may at any time put an end to the agreement. If this happens, the other spouse will be treated as being in desertion from that time on and the three year period would be counted as having begun at that time.

It is possible for the animus deserendi to arise before the actual physical separation, and this occurs when the other partner is driven from cohabitation. The mere fact of having left the matrimonial home does not make the partner who actually leaves of necessity the deserting party. If that spouse was forced out by the conduct of the other party, it may be that the other party may be the deserting partner. (Winnan vs Winnan, L. R. 1949, p. 174). This is the doctrine of constructive desertion.

Under the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1965 Section 1 (2), if the parties resume cohabitation for a period not exceeding three months with the primary purpose of attempting reconciliation, that period is not considered as interrupting the three year period for establishing desertion.

8. Insanity

Unsoundness of mind was first introduced as a ground for divorce by the Herbert Act of 1937. By that Act the respondent had to be of incurably unsound mind and to have been under care and treatment continuously for a five year period immediately prior to the presentation of the petition. However, if the conduct of the petitioner has been conducive to the insanity either through neglect or otherwise, the decree may be refused. It is required that the respondent be under treatment in a mental hospital and the continuity of the care and treatment and the statutory requirement regarding the detention of persons of unsound mind must have been strictly adhered to. Non-compliance may have the effect of breaking the continuity and thus lead to a rejection of the petition. An Act of 1959, the Divorce (Insanity and Desertion) Act, permits a break in continuity of detention for less than 28 days to be disregarded.

Finally, the degree of insanity is of no concern to the court. The position that has been taken in defining "incurable unsoundness of mind" is that the phrase describes a mental state, which, despite five years treatment, makes it impossible for the spouses to live a normal married life, and there being no prospect of improvement which would make it possible in the future.

9. Provision Regarding Children

Following the recommendations of a Royal Commission, the Morton Commission, which reported in 1956, greater attention is now paid to the interests of the children of the marriage in any matrimonial proceedings. (Cmnd. 9678, paras 373-394). The Matrimonial Causes Act of 1965, section 33, provides that the court may not grant a decree absolute unless it is satisfied with the arrangements made for the care and upbringing of all "relevant" children, if it is practicable to do so and that the arrangements are satisfactory, or are at least the best that can be made in the circumstances. The services of court welfare officers can be drawn upon to assure the court of the suitability of the arrangements and the court can order that the children be separately represented. Despite the introduction of these provisions, there is still dissatisfaction in England not only with the way these provisions are working, but also with their scope as well. The Law Commission has expressed its intention to undertake a thorough investigation of this subject as soon as possible. (Cmnd. 3123, p. 24).

III SCOTS DIVORCE LAW

Although similar to English divorce law, the law of divorce in Scotland is quite distinctive and based upon its own traditions. Currently, the grounds for the dissolution of marriage in Scotland are: cruelty, adultery, desertion, incurable insanity and sodomy or bestiality. A marriage may also be dissolved on the presumption of death of one of the partners. Adultery is a ground derived from the common law while the other grounds have a statutory basis in the Divorce (Scotland) Act of 1938. Desertion, however, has been a ground for divorce in Scotland since the sixteenth century when it was introduced by an Act of 1573. Cruelty, insanity, bestiality or sodomy and presumption of death were introduced by the 1938 statute. (T. B. Smith, A Short Commentary on the Law of Scotland [Edinburgh, 1962]).

1. Adultery

Adultery has no statutory definition in Scotland. The term is construed in the light of cases anterior to 1938. In Scots law, adultery committed by the pursuer (petitioner) is no defence to an action of divorce for adultery; the discretionary bar raised by the petitioner's own adultery in English law is unknown. Also long delay or mora is no bar to the successful pursuit of an action on the ground of adultery.

2. Desertion

In Scotland desertion is a ground for divorce if the defender (defendant) "has wilfully and without reasonable cause deserted the pursuer and persisted in such desertion for a period of not less than three years." The Scottish courts have built up a considerable body of jurisprudence on the subject of desertion in the course of applying the statute of 1573. The term in the 1938 Act is, therefore, construed in the light of cases decided before 1938. The deserted party must have intimated a desire to continue or resume cohabitation, or in Scots terminology to "adhere". Cruelty, adultery or sodomy would be good grounds for refusing to adhere and thus constitute a good defence. A spouse who commits adultery during the three year period (the triennium) is considered to have demonstrated an unwillingness to adhere and to have given the other spouse a cause for non-adherence. Thus he or she cannot seek divorce on the ground of desertion. However, the three year period is vital; once that time has elapsed the right of action vests regardless, and adultery committed after the three year period by the pursuer does not constitute a bar to divorce.

The doctrine of "constructive desertion", whereby a party driven from the matrimonial home may petition on the ground of desertion is unknown to the law of Scotland. Conduct that falls short of a matrimonial offense may, however, be relied on as a defence to a petition based on desertion.

3. Insanity

Incurable insanity has been a ground for divorce in Scotland since 1938. The court has discretion to refuse to grant a decree on this ground if the pursuer has been guilty of such wilful neglect or misconduct as to have conduced to the insanity, although adultery per se is no bar. The defender to be proved incurably insane must have been under "care and treatment as an insane person" for five years preceding the action. A person is deemed to be under "care and treatment as an insane person" if he or she has been receiving treatment for mental illness as a resident of certain approved institutions, whether as a voluntary patient or otherwise. The period must be continuous for five years, although an interruption of less than twenty-eight days is disregarded.

On granting a decree for insanity, the court may make an order for the pursuer (petitioner) to pay an allowance for the maintenance of the defender and the children of the marriage.

4. Cruelty

By the 1938 Act, the courts may grant decrees of divorce where the defender has been guilty of such cruelty toward the pursuer as would justify the granting of a separation a mensa et thoro according to the law of Scotland at the time of the passage of the Act.

The basic definition of cruelty in Scots law is very similar to the one prevailing in England.

> "Personal violence, as assault upon the woman, threats of violence which induce the fear of immediate danger to her person, maltreatment of her person so as to injure her health...(Furthermore,) any conduct towards the wife which leads to any injury either creating danger to her life or danger to her health, that too must be taken as sufficient ground for divorce." (Lord Brougham in Paterson vs. Russell, (1850) 7 Bell's App. 337 at p. 363).

However, the Scottish courts have interpreted this definition with more rigidity of late than have the English judges. Intention to injure on the part of the defender is virtually an essential element in actions based upon cruelty. Particularly in cases of mental cruelty, the Scottish courts have stressed that the conduct complained of must have been "aimed at" the pursuer, even though such conduct did cause an injury to health and that the consequence of it could be foreseen by the defender. Lord President Clyde observed in Hutton vs. Hutton (1962, S.L.T. 67):

> "To establish cruelty the facts must enable the courts to infer that the defender's persistence in a course of crime was deliberately pointed at the wife."

In cases of alleged cruelty, the English and Scottish law are not identical. The Scottish courts have held that to be guilty of cruelty, volition must be shown. Thus under Scots law, insanity is a good defence against cruelty (Breen vs. Breen, 1961 S.C. 1583, c.f. Williams vs. Williams).

There is a further difference between the two British legal systems on cruelty. This rests on that provision of the 1938 Act which gave the courts power to grant divorces on the ground of such cruelty as would justify the granting of a decree of judicial separation under the existing law. At that time, to obtain a degree of judicial separation, it was necessary to establish not only that the defender had acted cruelly but that the pursuer could not in safety resume cohabitation. Thus, consideration of future danger to the petitioner is relevant in Scots law. While in England divorces on the ground of cruelty are based purely on past behaviour, in Scotland the future protection of the spouse is a vital factor. The actual test is not whether the pursuer was in danger at the time of the action or prior to it but whether he or she would be in danger if cohabitation were resumed. It is, of course, incumbent upon the defender of the action to establish that he has reformed his conduct, and that the spouse would not be in danger.

There is one other interesting provision of the Scottish law on cruelty. By the Licensing Act of 1903, section 73, habitual drunkenness, as defined by the Habitual Drunkards Act, 1879, section 3, if established in a matrimonial cause, is held to be equivalent in law and to have the same effects as cruelty and bodily violence by the habitual drunkard toward his or her spouse. No ill-treatment of the other spouse by the habitual drunkard is necessary to satisfy this statute.

5. Sodomy or Bestiality

These grounds were added by the statute of 1938. The crime must have been committed since the marriage, and under the criminal law of Scotland, it seems that they refer to acts committed by males but not by females. The 1938 Act, unlike the 1937 English Statute (which introduced rape, sodomy and bestiality as grounds in England) omits rape as a separate ground. Under Scottish law, cases of rape would be covered by the ordinary law regarding adultery.

6. Dissolution of Marriage

A married person who can establish reasonable grounds for supposing that the marital partner is dead may obtain a decree dissolving the marriage. Continuous absence for seven years, if the applicant has no reason for believing that the absent party has been living during that time, is evidence of death unless the contrary can be proved. However, there is doubt in Scots law as to the status of a subsequent remarriage should the absent partner eventually reappear. The Royal Commission on Marriage and Divorce urged that the matter be clarified, but as yet nothing has been done. (Cmnd. 9678, pp. 1195-1198.)

7. Bars to Divorce

Three defences to a divorce action in Scotland are: Condonation, connivance (or lenocinium), and collusion.

(i) Condonation

As in English law, condonation of the defender's adultery by the pursuer is a bar to divorce. Generally, condonation must be established by a resumption of cohabitation; a verbal expression of forgiveness which is not followed by a resumption of cohabitation does not constitute condonation. Unlike Canadian practice, or English practice before 1963, however, condoned adultery cannot be revived by the subsequent misconduct of the erring spouse.

In cases of cruelty, however, if a spouse forgives an act of cruelty and resumes cohabitation, and if the cruelty is repeated and a divorce is sought, the injured party is entitled to reopen the past history for certain purposes. Acts of cruelty prior to the reconciliation cannot form the sole basis for a divorce action, but they can be considered in the determination of the real issue of the case, whether the pursuer could with safety to health and person resume cohabitation with the defender.

(ii) Connivance

Connivance has never been defined either statutarily or judicially in Scotland. It is a defence that is rarely presented and even more rarely successful. An essential element that must be established is something of an active character. One spouse must have been an accessory to the conduct of the other partner, or a participant in the crime, or a direct occasion of it.

(iii) Collusion

The doctrine of collusion prevailing in Scotland differs from the one current in England. Scottish judges have emphatically rejected the English position. In Scotland, the definition of collusion is more limited than in England. It is "permitting a false case to be substantiated, or keeping back a just defence." (Walker vs. Walker, 1911, S. C., pp. 168-9) Collusion is only relevant in a Scottish divorce case when there has been fabrication or concealment of evidence. "Mutual desire that a decree in a consistorial cause should be obtained, and mutual action to facilitate this end, are not collusion if there be no fabrication or suppression." (Administration of Austrian Property vs. von Lorang, 1926, S. C., p. 628). If a husband or wife invites their spouse to commit adultery, and he or she does so, this is no basis for a defence of collusion. It may, however, provide a defence of connivance. However, mere acquiescence in the other spouse's unilateral expression of intention to commit adultery, would not raise either bar to an action under Scots law.

IV AUSTRALIAN DIVORCE LAW

Your Committee believes it worthwhile to draw attention to the divorce law of some jurisdictions which have an affinity to Canada either because their law, institutions and society are similar to our own or because they have adopted measures which provide valuable experience upon which the Committee can draw. The situations in Australia and New Zealand are obvious areas of study. As sister Commonwealth nations their legal structure enjoys the same foundation as ours in the English common law and the divorce law of both countries has recently undergone revision and reform.

1. Grounds

The two most distinctive features of the Australian Matrimonial Causes Act of 1959 are first, its departure from exclusive reliance on the concept of matrimonial offence and, secondly, its provisions designed to promote reconciliation. The Act provides fourteen grounds for the dissolution of marriage. In three of these grounds there is no element of matrimonial offence whatsoever. These are the grounds of insanity, separation for five years and presumption of death. The other eleven grounds are (i) adultery, (ii) desertion for not less than two years, (iii) habitual cruelty during a period of not less than one year, (iv) wilful and persistent refusal to consummate the marriage, (v) rape, sodomy or bestiality committed since the marriage, (vi) habitual drunkenness or intoxication by drugs for a period of not less than two years, (vii) frequent conviction for crimes and habitually leaving the petitioner without reasonable means of support within a period of five years, (viii) serving a term of imprisonment of not less than three years after conviction of a crime punishable by death or imprisonment for life and still being in prison at the time of the petition, (ix) conviction of attempting to murder or unlawfully kill the petitioner or of committing offences involving the infliction of grievous bodily harm on the petitioner, (x) wilful and habitual failure to pay maintenance under a court order or separation agreement over a two year period, (xi) failure to comply throughout a period of at least one year with an order for the restitution of conjugal rights.

The provisions regarding insanity are not dissimilar to the English Acts: the other party of the marriage must be of unsound mind and unlikely to recover and have been confined to an institution for an aggregate of five years within a continuous six year period preceeding the institution of divorce proceedings.

Most interest, however, is presented by the Separation Ground. Section 28 (m) of the Act provides that a petition for the dissolution of marriage may be based on the ground that:

> "the parties to the marriage have separated and have thereafter lived separately and apart for a continuous period of not less than five years immediately preceding the date of the petition and there is no reasonable likelihood of cohabitation being resumed."

The intention of this section is to provide divorce on the basis that the marriage has irretrievably broken down. The Act provides specifically that the termination of cohabitation need be due to the conduct of only one spouse, whether constituting desertion or not, and notwithstanding the existence of any court decree suspending the obligations of the parties to cohabit or the existence of a separation agreement. While many divorces are granted on the ground of separation, it is far from being the most widely invoked ground.

Certain safeguards were introduced, however. The courts are given discretion to refuse to grant a decree if such would prove "harsh or oppressive to the respondent, or contrary to public interest." It is also provided that the court may withhold the decree until the petitioner has made adequate financial arrangements for the maintenance of the respondent, if such are required. The court is also given the discretion to refuse a decree if the petitioner has committed adultery which had not been condoned either before or after the separation. And finally, the court is not to grant a decree on the ground of separation in cases where both partners bring petitions, if it can properly make a decree upon the other petition on any other ground.

Australian courts are still in the process of developing their jurisprudence on the interpretation of these safeguards. The second stipulation concerning financial safeguards for the respondent does not seem to have presented any major problems. However, there does not seem to have developed any clear definition of what is meant by the terms "harsh and oppressive" or "contrary to public policy". Indeed, the Full Court of New South Wales has held that the test must relate to the actual circumstances of the case:

> "What is envisaged is not some such concept in the abstract or as applying generally to others, or even to the reasonable man and woman. The phrase connotes some substantial detriment to the party before the court." [(1964) 65 S.R. (N.S.W.), 450-51]

The courts have given effect to what they understand to be clear intention of the Australian Parliament, "that a petitioner is not to be denied a decree merely because it can be shown that he was at fault in bringing about the separation that has taken place."

There also seems to be a feeling among Australian judges that they are to act judicially and not inquisitorially, that is, they do not believe that a court must satisfy itself that reasons for refusing a decree do not exist, and that in undefended cases it would be highly exceptional to withhold a decree.

The Australian Act of 1959 has also written the doctrine of constructive desertion into statute law. Section 29 reads:

> "A married person whose conduct constitutes just cause of excuse for the other party to the marriage to live separately or apart, and occasion that other party to live separately and apart, shall be deemed to have wilfully deserted that other party without just cause or excuse, notwithstanding that that person may not have intended the conduct to occasion that other party to live separately and apart."*

2. Reconciliation

The Act of 1959 is a Matrimonial Causes Act, not simply a divorce statute and consequently, the Australian legislation has incorporated provisions aimed at facilitating reconciliation. Two major approaches have been used. One has been to empower the Attorney-General to give approval to marriage guidance agencies and also to make grants from public funds to support them. The agencies themselves, however, remain private bodies. No governmental guidance organization has been established. The sum appropriated for the current year to subsidize marriage guidance agencies is $183,000 (that is about $200,000 in Canadian funds).

* The final clause of the section, concerning intention, was to specifically overrule judicial decisions then current.

While the agencies remain independent, to secure approval they must report to the Attorney-General on their activities and the government has encouraged the agencies to co-ordinate their activities and, in consultation with university social welfare departments, to set up courses for the training of marriage guidance personnel. The work of marriage guidance organizations has improved and increased substantially since the introduction of the Act.

Furthermore, by the procedural rules established by the Act, solicitors cannot proceed with a matrimonial petition until they have drawn the attention of the parties to the procedures in the Act relating to reconciliation and until they have brought to their notice the approved marriage guidance agencies that are available. Additionally the solicitor must discuss with his clients the possibilities of reconciliation. There is some evidence that members of the Australian Bar are taking these obligations seriously.

The Australian law now requires, by section 14 of the Act, the judge, in those cases where there is reason to believe that reconciliation is possible, to adjourn the case to give the parties the opportunity to become reconciled. Additionally, he may attempt reconciliation himself, or nominate either a marriage guidance agency or some other suitable person to attempt to act as a conciliator. The most recent information available on this provision, however, would indicate that it has achieved little. By the time the case gets to court, at least one of the parties is usually determined to terminate the relationship, and judges have seldom instituted reconciliation attempts and there is little evidence that those instituted have been successful. (Selby, M.L.R., 1966 p. 487).

Marriage guidance counsellors have received protection from forced disclosure of any information they might acquire in the course of their duties. They are required to take an oath of secrecy and they cannot be compelled to disclose to the court any communication made to them in their capacity as marriage guidance counsellors. This has given them greater opportunity to fully gain the confidence of their clients and render more effective help.

The Act has also attempted to "draw the teeth of the bogey of collusion". The rules provide that before a defended suit can be set down for trial, a conference must be held between the petitioner and respondent, so that they may make a bona fide endeavour to reach agreement on matters of maintenance of a party, property and care, maintenance and custody of children. Similarly, section 40 of the Act no longer provides an absolute bar of collusion but requires "collusion with intent to cause a perversion of justice".

An amendment to the 1959 Act, passed in 1965, has adopted the English restrictions on the bar of condonation, whereby a period of cohabitation for not more than three months with reconciliation as its object is not considered as condonation. Analogous provisions are also made which prevent the interruption of the statutory two year period of desertion and five year period of separation.

One other provision intended to promote reconciliation is the rule that normally requires all matters of ancillary relief to be instituted in the petition asking for the dissolution of the marriage. The need to make a claim for financial assistance, to set forth the financial position of the parties and so forth and to detail the provisions for maintenance, the education and welfare of the children and many other matters, all of which must be faced and solutions proposed, was intended to bring home to the petitioner the complications involved in the dissolution of marriage and to cause an overhasty party to think again and consider reconciliation.

Finally, the Australian Matrimonial Causes Act of 1959, section 71 and the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1965, section 12 both lay great emphasis on the necessity to safeguard the welfare of the children of divorced parents and have empowered the courts to withhold the decree nisi until they are satisfied that suitable arrangements have been made for the care of the children.

3. Domicile

As a federal country, Australia in the past, like Canada today, suffered from complications caused by the requirements of domicile for instituting divorce proceedings. The 1959 Act attempted to solve these difficulties by abolishing separate state domiciles in favour of a single Australian domicile. The 1959 Act provides that proceedings can only be instituted by a person domiciled in Australia. A deserted wife is deemed to be domiciled in Australia if she herself was domiciled in Australia immediately before her marriage; if her husband was domiciled in Australia immediately before he deserted her; or if she has been resident in Australia for three years immediately before her petition is presented. The last provision makes it possible for a wife to seek a divorce on the basis of three years residence alone, without any need to rely on domicile at all. While the petition will normally be heard in the courts of the state or territory where the petitioner is resident, the petition may be presented to courts of any state or territory, which have the authority either to hear it or to transfer it elsewhere.

V NEW ZEALAND DIVORCE LAW

1. Grounds

New Zealand has long been considered the pioneer in Commonwealth divorce legislation. The latest New Zealand Statute, the Matrimonial Proceedings Act of 1963, is the culmination of a series of statutes, and incorporates many changes made as long ago as 1920. This Act makes little change in the grounds available for divorce in New Zealand. The only addition is that a husband may now divorce a wife who undergoes artificial insemination without his consent.

New Zealand was the first country in the Commonwealth to introduce the separation ground. In 1920, separation by agreement for three years or longer was made a ground for divorce. Since that date separation by agreement or court order has remained a ground. By the 1963 Act, however, the ground is a discretionary one. While it is unnecessary to establish that there is no prospect of reconciliation, it does forbid the granting of the decree if the respondent opposes the petition and can show that the separation was due to the wrongful act or conduct of the petitioner.

In 1953, the idea of marriage breakdown was extended and separation, where the parties have been living separate and apart for seven years or more and are unlikely to be reconciled, was made a ground for divorce. By the 1953 Act the court, however, was obliged to refuse the decree if the respondent objected and could show that the separation was caused by the conduct of the petitioner. This limitation was removed by the latest Act. Nevertheless, this bar still applies to the ground of three years separation under a separation agreement or order. The ground is, however, a discretionary one. Yet, while the court is specifically directed not to refuse a decree because either party had committed adultery since the separation, no other guidance is provided as to how the court shall exercise its discretion.

Another interesting feature of the grounds for divorce provided in New Zealand is the absence of a ground of cruelty. There is a ground of "inebriety and cruelty for three years" but it is little used. However, the grounds are wide enough in New Zealand to insure that anyone with a just cause can find relief somewhere.

Of the many grounds provided by the New Zealand Act, only four or five are used to any extent—(i) a separation agreement between the parties that has been similarly in effect for three years; (ii) adultery; (iii) desertion; and (iv) the parties have lived separate and apart for seven years and are unlikely to be reconciled. It is obvious that while the separation grounds are widely used in New Zealand, more so than in Australia, there is still considerable reliance upon the matrimonial offences of adultery and desertion.

2. Domicile

Although New Zealand is not a federal country, its law has always shown considerable concern for the fate of the wife deserted or left by her husband, who, because of the rules of domicile, found access to the courts difficult or impossible. The 1963 Act has provided an extremely simple solution to this problem. For the purposes of the Act, a married woman's domicile is to be determined as if she was unmarried, and a divorce petition may be founded upon the domicile of either the husband or the wife in New Zealand.

3. Reconciliation and Bars

Provisions for reconciliation were introduced into New Zealand by the recent Act. The court must now consider the possibilities of reconciliation between the parties and may adjourn the proceedings from time to time and appoint conciliators, if it believes it worthwhile.

Following the practice of Australia and England, New Zealand has also relaxed the bar of condonation, so that a trial period of cohabitation with reconciliation as its primary intention, will not raise a bar to any subsequent divorce petition. The Act provides for "one occasion for a continuous period of not more than two months". The New Zealand Act also follows the 1963 English Act by abolishing the anomalous rule that a husband who had sexual intercourse with his wife after becoming aware of a matrimonial offence on her part was conclusively presumed to have condoned the offence. Under the new rule, sexual intercourse raises the presumption of condonation for both parties but this may be rebutted by evidence to the contrary.

New Zealand has adopted the most liberal provisions on collusion of any Commonwealth country, combining both the British and Australian law. Not only was collusion made a discretionary bar to divorce by the 1963 New Zealand Statute, even in cases of adultery, but following the Australian Act the scope of the bar was limited still more by the addition of the words "with intent to cause a perversion of justice" to the appropriate provision of the Act (section 31).

Previously, since 1867, in New Zealand collusion had been an absolute bar only in cases of adultery; in petitions based upon other grounds it was merely discretionary. Furthermore, the existence of the separation ground based upon an agreement by the parties, has meant that the New Zealand courts have had to develop a more restricted view of the concept of collusion.

4. Maintenance and Children

With regard to the custody and maintenance of children, New Zealand has again followed Australia and England in making it a prerequisite to the granting of a decree that adequate arrangements have been made for the custody and welfare of all the children of the marriage. "All the children" is defined widely to include not only the children of parties to the divorce, but any child who was a member of the family of the husband or wife at the time when the couple ceased to cohabit or instituted proceedings.

Finally, New Zealand law has attempted to put the two sexes on a greater footing of equality. Henceforth, the third party in a case of adultery has now become a co-respondent and is liable for damages regardless of sex. Also, a husband can now claim maintenance from his wife, if he is unable, by his own means or labour, to support himself.

VI THE DIVORCE LAW OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK

1. Grounds

Until the passage of chapter 254 of the laws of 1966, the State of New York, permitted a dissolution of marriage only on the ground of adultery. The major provisions of the Act of 1966, will become operative on September 1st, 1967. The grounds for the dissolution of marriage in the state of New York will be (i) cruel and inhuman treatment so as to endanger the physical or mental well-being of the plaintiff and to render cohabitation unsafe or improper; (ii) abandonment for two years or more; (iii) confinement in prison for three or more consecutive years; (iv) adultery, which is defined as:

> "the commission of an act of sexual or deviate sexual intercourse, voluntarily performed by the defendant, with a person other than the plaintiff after the marriage of plaintiff and defendant."

(v) that husband and wife have lived apart pursuant to a decree of judicial separation for a period of two years after the granting of such decree; (vi) that husband and wife have lived separate and apart pursuant to a written separation agreement for a period of two years after the execution of such an agreement. (Chapter 254 and proposed amendments to it are to be found in appendices #66 and #68 of the Proceedings, pp. 1185 ff. 1202 ff. The major proposals in appendix #68 HAVE NOT been adopted.)

It is further provided under items (v) & (vi) that the plaintiff must have "duly" performed all the terms and conditions of the separation decree or agreement. It is also stipulated that any separation agreement must be filed with the clerk of the county in which the parties reside within thirty days of its execution, if it is to form the basis of a subsequent divorce action. Merely having lived separate and apart is not sufficient to found a petition on the ground of separation. It should also be noted, that these provisions are regarded specifically as "grounds for divorce" and not in any way as prima facie evidence of marriage breakdown. Thus the court does not have the discretion to refuse the decree if there is a likelihood of a resumption of cohabitation. Insanity does not exist as a ground for divorce under the New York Domestic Relations Law. However, if either spouse can be shown to be permanently insane, then the marriage can be dissolved. However, provision has to be made for the upkeep of the insane partner. This is neither a divorce proceeding nor an annulment but is provided for under the state mental hygiene laws.

New York has also sought to abolish the traditional defences and bars to divorce. Until the introduction of recent legislation, a divorce could be denied because of the equal guilt of both parties, as well as because of collusion, connivance or condonation. However, in New York the distinction between law and equity is recognized, and it is felt that the bars of collusion and connivance are thus unnecessary because a court would refuse a divorce as a matter of justice in cases where the evidence has been faked or the court deliberately misled.

2. Domicile

The state of New York permits a married woman to establish her own domicile. Section 61 of the New York Domestic Relations Law states;

> "The domicile of a married woman shall be established by the same facts and rules of law as that of any other person for the purposes of voting and office-holding."

A married woman may commence matrimonial proceedings if she is resident in the state of New York regardless of where her husband lives. Section 231 of the Domestic Relations Law reads:

> "If a married woman dwells within the state when she commences an action against her husband for divorce, annulment or separation, she is deemed a resident thereof, although her husband resides elsewhere."

A recent amendment to the Domestic Relations Law, Section 230, effective September 1, 1967, provides that an action for divorce may be maintained when "either party has been a resident of the state for a continuous period of at least two years immediately preceding the commencement of the action".

3. Conciliation

It is the purpose of New York's Domestic Relations Law to save marriages as well as to dissolve them.

The 1966 Act established a conciliation bureau in each judicial district (Art. 11—B, Section 215a) and the law provides that the plaintiff to a divorce action must file within ten days a notice of commencement of his action with the conciliation bureau of the Judicial District wherein the action is commenced. Such a notice must give full details of the family, including the children.

The Commissioner of the conciliation bureau may then decide whether a conciliation proceeding is called for. If he decides it is not, a report is made to the supervising justice and the suit goes forward. Otherwise the case may be referred by the commissioner to a conciliation counsellor. The counsellor must hold at least one conciliation conference, which both parties can be compelled to attend, and such further conferences as the rules may call for. Such conferences are conducted on an informal basis. The counsellor must file a final report with the commissioner within thirty days.

If reconciliation is effected the case is dismissed; if no reconciliation can be achieved, the counsellor refers the matter to the commissioner who may decide (i) that reconciliation is at an end or (ii) hold a conciliation hearing, attendance at which is mandatory for all parties to the proceedings.

The Conciliation Hearing is a formal procedure at which the parties may present evidence, cross-examine witnesses and be represented by attorneys. If upon the evidence, the Commissioner finds that reconciliation is possible and in the interests of the parties and the children, he may apply to the supervising justice for an order requiring that the parties attempt to effect a reconciliation for a period not exceeding sixty days. If, on the other hand, the Commissioner finds that reconciliation is not possible, he reports the fact to the supervising justice and the conciliation procedure is at an end.

The Act also provides that the records of conciliation conferences shall be confidential and available only to employees of the bureau or to the parties and their attorneys. If there are minor, handicapped or incompetent children of the marriage, a special guardian may be appointed. Such a guardian becomes a party to the proceedings with the duty to look after the interests of the children in the proceedings and to recommend temporary care, custody and maintenance during the hearings.

The conciliation bureau is empowered to appoint marriage counsellors to its own staff and may also use public, religious and social agencies in the various judicial districts.

PART III

GROUNDS FOR DIVORCE

INTRODUCTION

Marriage is the institution at the root of our society; the family is the fundamental unit of our social organization. Canada is part of the tradition of western civilization, which has always recognized marriage as monogamous and for life. Through marriage, two human beings are enabled to find mutual support and comfort and ensure for themselves a richer and fuller life. Ideally marriage provides love and affection, economic benefit and security, and the environment in which future generations are born and reared. Society is vitally concerned in the preservation of marriage, for by fostering the institution of marriage it is preserving itself. It is not only in the interests of society, however, that marriage should be monogamous and life-long, but also in that of the parties themselves and the children. A stable family environment not only benefits society as a whole, but is essential for the well-being and happiness of the individual.

Nevertheless, human beings are not creatures of perfection and it must be recognized that some marriages will not last for life. In almost all societies divorce has been recognized in some form. When marriage fails, no service is rendered to either society or the parties themselves by preserving the empty legal shell of a relationship that no longer exists as a fact. Divorce, therefore, cannot be eliminated from society. Marriages have failed in the past and today the rapid pace of social change and the increasing complexities of life subject the institution of marriage to greater stress than ever before.

Canadian divorce law was established over a century ago, when ideas of marriage and divorce and the nature of society were very different from those prevailing today. The existing system of divorce law has long since served its purpose and is in need of reform. The witnesses before your Committee and the briefs it has received, have all urged that reform be undertaken. There has hardly been a voice raised anywhere to defend the status quo. Before your Committee undertakes a discussion of the deficiencies of the present law and its suggested remedies for them, it is essential that it make clear the climate in which it has been working and the assumptions which it has made.

Marriage is not an ordinary contractual relationship. Few people have considered it as such in the past, and your Committee believes few in Canada take that view today. Marriage is not only a contract with which society is vitally concerned, but one which has to most Canadians a deep religious significance as well. When society was fairly homogeneous in its religious beliefs and when the state was content to leave matrimonial affairs to the Spiritual Authorities or to accept their lead, those religious beliefs were written into the law of the land. Today, however, the situation is different. We live in a pluralistic society. People differ widely in their religious and ethical beliefs and hold differing views on the institution of marriage and the status of divorce. Our society believes in religious freedom, indeed in freedom of belief generally; it does not believe that the ideas and creed of any one section of the community should be forced unwillingly upon all of society's members. Witnesses before your Committee have stressed:

> "That those whose religious principles are against divorce in any form should no longer be able to impose restrictions on the lives of those whose principles are different in this respect."

This view has been unchallenged and the representatives of the Churches appearing before your Committee have wholeheartedly endorsed it. "The Christian Church no longer has the right to enforce its views on a pluralistic society", declared the Baptist Federation of Canada, a view endorsed by the Catholic Women's League of Canada:

> "While we do not believe in divorce ourselves we cannot expect the laws of the country to be used in such a manner as to prevent those, who unlike ourselves do not believe that marriage is monogamous and indissoluble, from acting in accordance with their own religious convictions...We would also emphasize that while we have beliefs in the matter of marriage, we do not wish to impose those beliefs on the entire Canadian society through the medium of civil law."

Your Committee thus accepts the proposition that marriage is the foundation of the family and of social organization. It believes that marriage should be essentially monogamous and for life and any divorce law should have as its primary objective the reinforcement of the stability of marriage and not its destruction. Nonetheless, it recognizes that some marriages do fail and irretrievable break down. Once this happens, nothing is to be gained by preserving the empty shell. It should be removed with "the maximum of fairness, and the minimum of bitterness, distress and humiliation." (Cmnd. 3123, p. 10) Divorce should not be made so easy that there is no inducement to overcome temporary troubles and to make the marriage work. Nor should the form and procedure of the divorce courts hinder or hamper attempts at reconciliation. Indeed, when possible they should actively promote it.

It renders no respect to the institution of marriage, and does little to help its stability, to preserve in form marriages that have ceased to exist in fact. To do so merely encourages illicit sexual unions, "common law" relationships and the procreation of illegitimate children. Far from preserving the institution of marriage, it encourages disrespect for it. That a person should wish to be freed from one marriage so that he can contract another, as an alternative to establishing a common law relationship, shows respect for the institution of marriage, not contempt.

Divorce law should make it possible to dispense with the legal bond of matrimony when it has ceased to have any reality in fact. To quote the English Law Commission: "If the marriage is dead, the object of the law should be to afford it a decent burial." (p. 11) Equally important, if the marriage is to be dissolved, it must be done with justice to all concerned. This means not only with justice to the partners but also to the children of marriage, who may be the innocent victims of their parents failures and mistakes. The marriage should also be dissolved in a dignified manner. This means not merely the observance of traditional court proceedings but also the recognition of the dignity of the unfortunate spouses themselves as human beings, thus causing the minimum possible of embarrassment and humiliation to them and their children. The law should do nothing to further embitter the relationship between them and their children.

Finally, the law must be capable of understanding and worthy of respect by the public at large. Unless the principles upon which it is based are generally understood and respected, the law will almost certainly fail in its wider aims of bringing stability to the institution of marriage while alleviating the suffering of those citizens whose marriages have failed.

A viable, practical system of divorce should not make the obtaining of a divorce more complicated or expensive to the parties or to the State. Any system that required a great expansion of courts or the appointment of investigators and large numbers of additional public servants, would probably be unacceptable to the public. The amount of public money available is limited and so are the numbers of trained social workers and welfare personnel.

Under modern conditions a husband and wife will part when life becomes intolerable and some will enter illicit relationships or common law unions after so doing. Once marriages have broken down and the spouses are in the divorce courts, the chances of reconciliation while not totally absent are remote. Marriage is not simply a matter concerning the two parties to it; the children are as vitally affected by a divorce as are the husband and wife. In every divorce proceeding where there are children their interests should be carefully protected.

RISING DIVORCE RATE

It is inevitable that when the grounds for divorce are widened, the divorce rate will increase to some degree. Initially, it can be expected to advance for a few years as the number of broken marriages that have been without relief heretofore are dissolved. Thereafter, the rate can be expected to fall somewhat. This has been the experience in other countries when the divorce laws have been reformed. The mere increase in the number of divorces granted, however, should not necessarily be a cause for alarm. The number means little if it merely reflects the regularization of what previously have been illicit unions. It is better for society that the divorce rate be higher, if the number of "common law" or bigamous unions be thereby reduced. It must be borne in mind, that there has been an increase in the number of marriages in the twentieth century. In England, for example, the number of married women in the population has doubled. This is not only because the population has increased, but because women now marry earlier and the ratio of married to unmarried women in society is altered.

Because people now marry earlier and live longer, marriages are almost doubled in their duration and also consequently are the risks they face. There is no evidence that marriages break down more readily now than in the past. Divorce is now an accepted solution to a broken marriage. In the past, this was less so, not only because of religious objections to divorce and the social scandal that it occasioned, but also because to a major portion of the population divorce was an expensive luxury beyond their financial means. In recent years, however, with great changes in the social structure and educational system of the country, divorce and the resultant possibility of remarriage, have become desired by many who were formerly content with illicit unions.

Your Committee is of opinion that the need for reform of the divorce laws is made more urgent by these changes and that an increase in either the number of divorces or of the divorce rate per head of population would not indicate a weakening of the institution of marriage. On the contrary, the fact that more people seek divorce in order to terminate impossible matrimonial relationships may be indicative of greater respect for the institution of marriage.

GROUNDS FOR DIVORCE
FIELD OF CHOICE

In selecting the system which may be used to effect the dissolution of marriage, there is in theory a fairly wide choice available. There are essentially four bases for divorce in the world today: unilateral declaration, consent, matrimonial offence or fault, and marriage breakdown. These doctrines are not mutually exclusive and can be combined in numerous ways. Your Committee has considered each of them.

I UNILATERAL DECLARATION

The unilateral system has existed in the past and it exists in many parts of the world today, particularly in Islamic countries. With such a system one spouse, usually the husband, can simply dissolve the marriage more or less at will and with little reason and without any consultation with the other, who is merely informed that the divorce has taken place. This system was current in Talmudic times in Israel where a husband delivered a bill of divorce to the wife. Traditionally, it has been a system whereby a man may get rid of his wife, rather than one which allowed a wife to be rid of her husband. Such a system has been advocated by no one and does not seem to merit serious consideration by your Committee. It need not detain us further.

II DIVORCE BY CONSENT

Divorce by consent is an ancient method of terminating marriages and one that goes back to Roman times and earlier. In essence this is founded upon the proposition that marriage is a contract between the parties and like any other contract, may be terminated with the consent of both parties to it. Under Roman law the state was concerned or involved in a divorce proceeding only in so far as it was necessary to insure that the legal forms had been observed and that the contract was terminated in the proper manner. The state had no concern with the actual termination of the contract itself or the grounds for it.

Since divorce by consent is a term that has been used widely and often imprecisely by many people, it should be made clear what your Committee understands by the term. Divorce by consent means a divorce at the will of the parties to the marriage. If they wish the marriage to be dissolved, then it will be dissolved. The role of the state or the courts, if they are called upon to play any part at all, is simply to see that the proper forms are observed. The state would have no discretion at all to prevent the granting of the divorce. Once the state assumed a discretionary power to refuse the decree, it is no longer divorce by consent. Under such a system, therefore, it is the will of the parties alone that determines the issue. Under the present system, even though the parties may both wish to have their marriage dissolved, it is the courts which actually dissolve it and which have the authority to refuse a decree, if they find there to be good reason for so doing.

1. Arguments for Divorce by Consent

At least two witnesses before your Committee have urged the adoption in Canada of some form of divorce by consent as an addition, though not as a substitute for the present system. These are Mr. J. H. MacDonald and The Baptist Federation of Canada. It is contended that if a couple find that they cannot successfully live together and wish to be rid of their marriage ties, it is impossible to make that marriage a reality and it would be better to allow them to terminate it. No purpose is served by the retention of an empty tie. It is further argued that this would only introduce an element of reality in the divorce picture. At the present time, 90% of divorce cases are uncontested and thus there is a strong element of consent involved in them. To allow divorce by consent would permit a couple to obtain a dissolution of marriage without the need to allege or to actually commit matrimonial offences. Thus all the distasteful features of the present system could be avoided, as could the need to prove offences and to wash a great deal of matrimonial dirty linen in public. Embarrassment and bitterness could be removed thereby from divorce proceedings.

2. Objections to Divorce by Consent

There are several objections to the introduction of divorce by consent that your Committee believes to be valid. In the first place, there is an inherent contradiction between the proposition that marriage should be a lifelong union and the one that it can be terminated at will by the parties to it without any need to show cause for such a dissolution. Putting Asunder makes this point very strongly:

> "(Divorce by consent) subjects marriage absolutely to the joint will of the parties, so making it in essence a private contract. Since it gives the court, as representing the community, no effectual part in divorce, it virtually repudiates the community's interest in the stability of marriage. Moreover, if the convenant that initiates marriage is to be revocable by mutual consent, its intention cannot meaningfully be called 'lifelong'. Provision for a divorce can be reconciled with a lifelong intention only if divorce is subject to an authority that is independent of the will of the parties." (p. 34)

It is in society's interest to maximize the number of stable marriages within the community and there are many people who suspect that the introduction to divorce by consent would seriously undermine this objective. It is significant that most of the briefs presented to your Committee which have advocated a widening of the grounds for divorce in Canada, especially those supporting the introduction of marriage breakdown, have taken pains to stress that their proposals would not lend to divorce by consent and would not thus weaken the institution of marriage.

Since society does have an interest in the preservation of marriages, the marriage contract is not like any other contract. The community should have a greater part to play in the dissolution of marriage than merely overseeing the legal requirements for the dissolution of a private contract. The spouses, and above all the children, have a vital interest in the existence of the marriage tie. They are vitally affected by any change in it. The community has the duty to see that its interests are safeguarded. The interests of the spouses and the children require that society through the courts oversees and sanctions the dissolution of the marriage bonds. With their judgments distorted by marital unhappiness and tension, the parties cannot be relied upon to keep the interests of society, the children, or even themselves always in mind.

A further cogent objection has been raised by the Scarman Commission. Mutual consent may not always be true consent. There will always be the danger that the stronger partner, especially in the economic sense, may exert pressure on the weaker to give consent to a divorce. It is unlikely that the parties will be in equally strong positions. (Cmnd. 3123, p. 41-42)

Divorce by consent would tend to effect the dissolution of marriages that had not really broken down or been destroyed. Unless some test or provision were introduced to determine this fact, there is the likelihood that many couples would rush into divorce without really giving their marriage a chance to work or without trying to work out what might well be soluble problems.

As the sole ground for divorce, consent would not be practical. Many marriages should be dissolved whether or not both parties consent. While divorce by the consent as the sole ground for divorce is both impractical and objectionable, it has been suggested to your Committee by Mr. John M. MacDonald, Q.C., that is be given serious consideration in the case of childless couples. Certainly, if there are no children, one reason for judicial oversight is removed. However, all the other objections to divorce by consent still apply: the implicit threat to the institution of marriage as a lifelong union; the danger that the weaker party economically may be overborn by the stronger; the possibility that essentially good marriages may be terminated in the heat of a matrimonial dispute.

A test that the marriage has failed would still be required. A period of separation as a test of breakdown would be essential. If separation were introduced as a ground in itself, however, the need for divorce by consent would disappear. Marriages could still be dissolved without the public allegations and bitterness that may be present in a proceeding based upon the fault ground. There would be some test of marriage breakdown, and furthermore, the interests of the parties could be safeguarded by the courts.

The Scarman Report also mentions one further final objection to the introduction of divorce by consent for childless couples. This is that it would distinguish between two kinds of marriages. (Cmnd. 3123, p. 41) It would be basically unjust to discriminate between fruitful and fruitless marriages in this way. One objection to making such discrimination is the effect such a distinction could have on the children themselves. Marriages with children are liable to break up as well as those without children. To make special provisions that would in effect make divorce easier or, at least, less troublesome for childless couples, might very well cause resentment on the part of couples with children against their children for being an obstacle to their obtaining matrimonial relief. Since the object of divorce law is to provide relief for marriages that have failed, to distinguish between marriages on criteria other than those of their health and stability would be unreasonable.

III THE MATRIMONIAL OFFENCE CONCEPT

Traditionally, the grounds for divorce have been based upon the concept of matrimonial offence. From a civil point of view, marriage has been seen as a rather special kind of contract with certain rights and duties incumbent upon the parties to it. The violation of any of these provisions by one spouse is a breach of the contract and entitles the other, or wronged, spouse to a dissolution of the marriage. Under this system, it is the right of the wronged or injured partner to sue for divorce on the ground of the transgressions of the other. If the court finds that one spouse committed the offence alleged, the marriage is dissolved. The option to sue rests with the wronged party. If that party chooses not to do so, then the couple remain married, at least, in law if not in fact.

Generally, the spouse who offends cannot terminate the marriage on the basis of his own offence; the criminal, as it were, cannot benefit from his own crime. There are, your Committee believes, great numbers of people in Canada, who share this view. Of course, as times change, so do people's views of marriage and what should be expected of the partners to a marriage in respect to each other. The gradual evolution of the status of women during the last hundred years has modified the idea of marriage current over a century ago when Canada's divorce law was founded in Victorian England. A wife is no longer regarded as her husband's property and is no longer expected to be not only faithful but also obedient and submissive to her husband's commands. The twentieth century sees the marriage partnership somewhat differently and consequently has different views as to what conduct constitutes a matrimonial offence.

The grounds for a dissolution of marriage at present permitted by Canadian divorce law rest exclusively on the idea of fault or offence, namely adultery, and, in Nova Scotia only, adultery or cruelty. The divorce law of most other common law jurisdictions is similarly based upon the notion of matrimonial offence. This is the traditional system for granting divorces in the Canadian and British courts and while, as a concept it is now under attack, its merits, as well as its weaknesses, require careful examination. Because the existing law in Canada is in need of reform and because that law rests upon the doctrine of matrimonial offence, it does not of necessity follow that it is the matrimonial offence concept in itself that is erroneous.

The advantages of the matrimonial offence idea urged by those favouring its retention are numerous. In the first place, it is a definite system generally understood by the public at large. The parties know that if they restrain their conduct within certain bounds they cannot be divorced; if they transgress they can. It has been argued that this provides security for the marital relationship, especially for the wife past middle age who has lost her youthful charm and whose husband has a roving eye.

Other additional factors are relevant too. Because the present system is definite and well understood, the courts have a real issue to determine: was or was not the alleged offence committed. Thus lawyers can advise clients as to their rights with some degree of confidence.

Furthermore, there seems little doubt that the matrimonial offence concept in some form is widely held by the public. Most briefs that your Committee has received advocating reform, have assumed that this would be the basis of any prospective reform. Few groups have called for its actual abolition although almost everyone has asked that the grounds for divorce be broadened.

While some witnesses before your Committee advised the abandonment of divorce on the ground of offence and the adoption of the marriage breakdown theory, whereby the ground would be the separation of the spouses for a specified period with no reasonable prospect of a resumption of cohabitation, your Committee is of the opinion that the public in general holds that in the case of the major matrimonial offences, such as adultery, cruelty and desertion, the innocent and offended party is entitled to an immediate divorce.

1. Adultery

It would be difficult to dispense with the matrimonial offence theory completely. Most people regard marriage as an institution which provides certain specific rights and duties for the spouses in respect of each other. There is a commitment to mutual love, support and assistance; and it provides the social basis for the engendering and raising of children. Marriage is a normal, indeed natural institution in our society and most people partake. The basic pledge in the marriage bond is that the parties will keep exclusively one to the other. Moreover, this is a monogamous society in which we live. A husband can have but one wife and a wife but one husband. Should either a husband or wife depart from the standard of marital fidelity, the other should have the right to a divorce and immediately so, if he or she so wishes. If one partner to a marriage dishonours its basic obligations, the other should have the right to be free of the legal ties. On the other hand, a spouse who is willing to forgive and forget, does not appear in the divorce courts.

Adultery strikes at the root of the institution of marriage and in consequence has from time immemorial, been recognized as a valid ground for divorce in those societies which accept divorce at all. Its retention as such has not been seriously questioned. Even the advocates of marriage breakdown as the sole ground for divorce, the United Church for example, admit that evidence of adultery creates a special case meriting special treatment.

The English Royal Commission on Divorce sitting between 1951 and 1955, did consider changes in the law of adultery. It was suggested that a single act of adultery should not be enough for the granting of a divorce but that there should be proof of either an adulterous association or repeated acts of adultery. These views have not found favour in the testimony of any witnesses before your Committee. Nor does your Committee look favourably upon them either. One act of adultery is sufficient to destroy a marriage. If the marriage is a sufficiently stable one, a single act of adultery may not lead to divorce, if the offended spouse is willing to forgive and forget. But if the offended spouse is determined that the infidelity of the other partner has terminated the marital relationship, then it should be possible for him or her to dissolve the legal bond.

Accordingly, your Committee is of the opinion that the marital offence of adultery should be retained as a ground for the dissolution of marriage on the petition of the offended spouse, subject of course to the usual defences. There is obviously no need for a statutory definition of adultery. It was not defined in the Imperial Statute of 1857, nor has it been defined in any of the Canadian provinces whose law is based upon that statute, nor was it defined in the pre-Confederation law of any of the other provinces. What adultery is in law has been made plain in the decided cases and no difficulty has been experienced in the courts, not even when the law was amended for the abolition of the double standard.

2. Rape, Sodomy and Bestiality

At present rape, sodomy and bestiality are recognized as grounds for divorce only at the suit of the wife and in those provinces whose divorce law is based upon the English Statute of 1857. Several of the private bills which have been referred to your Committee propose their inclusion as such a ground, as have several witnesses, including the Canadian Bar Association. Most proposals for the inclusion of these grounds generally include them under the heading of adultery, and indeed this is logical, because they are clearly a rejection of the sexual commitment by one marriage partner toward the other. It is perhaps arguable that they are included in the meaning of adultery itself but the courts may not be prepared to accept this interpretation. The Barristers' Society of New Brunswick following the practice of the State of New York, suggested a definition of adultery for inclusion in a statute which encompasses these offences within the same general category:

> "The commission of an act of sexual or deviate sexual intercourse voluntarily performed by the defendant after marriage with a person other than the plaintiff (Petitioner) or with an animal."

This definition would also have the advantage of putting both sexes upon an equal footing.

While a statutory definition is unnecessary and undesirable, your Committee is of the opinion that these marital offences should be included as grounds for the dissolution of marriage.

3. Cruelty

The real defect of the matrimonial offence theory as now in practice in Canada seems to be not its existence but that the offences recognized as grounds for divorce are inadequate. The concept of what is to be expected from and endured in marriage changes with the times. There is more to modern marriage than merely abiding by a standard of sexual fidelity. The obligation of husband and wife to love and cherish one another, as expressed in the marriage ceremony, should be observed by each of the parties and should be recognized in law. Cruelty by one spouse toward the other is a violation of this elementary undertaking. It threatens the life and health of the injured spouse and is detrimental to the children. Cruelty may create intolerable conditions in the home, intense suffering both physical and mental to the offended spouse and an unhealthy environment for the children. Nova Scotia alone of the Canadian provinces recognizes the right of a spouse to petition for divorce on the ground of cruelty. Other Canadians require a similar right.

Cruelty is now recognized in all but one province of Canada as ground for judicial separation. Cruel conduct is considered in all these provinces as sufficient ground for divorce a mensa et thoro, which is, in more modern terms, judicial separation, and which terminates cohabitation thus destroying the essentials of the marriage. Yet it is in Nova Scotia only that cruelty is recognized as a ground for the complete dissolution of marriage.

Canadian divorce law has not changed with the times. Society now believes that cruelty is sufficient ground for the dissolution of a marriage. Husbands are no longer thought to own their wives nor to possess the right to beat and ill use them. Nor does modern society tolerate brutality on the part of the wife.

Witnesses appearing before your Committee were of the opinion that cruelty in order to constitute grounds for divorce should be of a substantial character. The Canadian Bar Association suggests that cruelty must be conduct such as to endanger the life and limb of the marital victim, or to be so grossly insulting and intolerable that the person complaining could not reasonably be expected to cohabit with a spouse guilty of such conduct. These, of course, are general terms and would not be really helpful in the trying of cases.

Cruelty has never been satisfactorily defined. For one reason, because public opinion as to what constitutes cruelty is continually changing and differs considerably from place to place and among different individuals and classes of individuals. One English judge is quoted as saying that, while it is impossible to define cruelty, there is no difficulty in recognizing it when one sees it.

Fortunately, your Committee does not believe it necessary to attempt a definition of cruelty. Some witnesses have expressed concern lest the introduction of cruelty as a ground would open wide the door to numerous abuses and hence they have urged careful definition. However, in Canada, we have a bench of judges upon whom we may rely and moreover, there has been built up over the years a body of jurisprudence which all Canadian judges would be expected to follow and would follow.

In the first place, there are all the numerous decisions in those provinces which grant divorce a mensa et thoro, or judicial separation. Courts in the province of Nova Scotia have been granting dissolutions of marriage on the ground of cruelty for many years. While such adjudications have not been very numerous, they yet form a body of useful precedents, and they illustrate the common sense which we may expect from Canadian judges. Furthermore, the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan have enacted a statutory definition of cruelty for purposes of alimony and judicial separation. This definition includes conduct which creates a danger to life, limb or health and conduct which, in the opinion of the court, is grossly insulting or intolerable, or of such a nature that the petitioner could not be reasonably expected to live with a partner who indulges in such conduct.

In addition to this Canadian experience, there is the vast jurisprudence built up in the English courts since the passing of the Matrimonial Causes Act over a hundred years ago. A study of the leading cases as decided in the British courts shows a continuous growth in human understanding and an ability of the bench to change with the growth of that universal understanding which we recognize as public opinion.

Your Committee is of the opinion that cruelty should be made a ground for the dissolution of marriage, and that its administration be left to the good sense of Canadian judges, guided as they are, by the experience gained already in our own courts and those of the United Kingdom.

4. Desertion

Marriage involves more than mutual love and respect, more than that the partners refrain from committing adultery and acts of cruelty against each other. The family is the basic unit in our social organization. Such a unit provides for the husband and wife the companionship most human beings seem to require in life as well as allowing the true fulfilment of their sexual desires. Normally in such a relationship the husband is expected to bear the economic burden, to maintain and provide for his wife and family, while the wife in return cares for the home, the husband and the children. This association is a vital part of any marriage and if one partner withdraws from it a basic part of the marriage is destroyed.

Desertion is not an isolated occurrence, indeed in the opinion of one brief, it is probably the most prevalent of all matrimonial offences. Certainly in its effect and its consequences it can be most serious, especially if the husband is the deserting partner, as is most often the case. If there are no children, a wife can often support herself, but not always so. If there are children, however, the situation can be most severe. The effect of desertion is generally to deprive the wife and children of economic support. But the wife at present is unable to remarry, when remarriage may be her only hope of restoring economic security, the legal dissolution of the first marriage is thus necessary. It may be possible for a wife through the courts to extract maintenance from a deserting husband, but to leave her chained legally to a man who does not care enough for his family to remain with them is both futile and unjust.

Economic difficulties are not the only evils that result from desertion. The withdrawal of support is serious, but the children are deprived often of parental control and a full family life as well. The effects of desertion upon the children can be particularly evil when it is the wife who is the deserting party.

Desertion inevitably leads to other difficulties as well. If the deserting party is the husband, he is often difficult to locate and it is not uncommon for him to neglect his financial obligations even if he can be found. Not unnaturally the costs incurred in keeping himself apart from his family, especially if he has taken up with another woman, make great inroads into his financial resources and thus make it very difficult for him to contribute to the support of his family. As has been pointed out to your Committee, often a deserted wife is not only left with the family, but also with a large collection of debts contracted in good faith under the assumption that the marriage would last. The effects of this can be serious indeed.

Consequently, many wives realizing the need for a stable environment for their children and for steady financial support, often enter into "common law" relationships. Thus illicit unions are encouraged and more illegitimate children result. To enable a deserted partner, especially a wife, to establish a lawful and stable relationship, a protracted period of desertion should be a ground for divorce.

Desertion can, of course, be more than the mere removal of one party from the matrimonial home. In English law it has never been given a statutory definition. Indeed, it has been described as not so much a withdrawal from a place as from a state of things. It is even possible that the one spouse who remains in the matrimonial home may in fact have been the deserting party, because his or her conduct was such that, without being cruelty sufficient to occasion a divorce, it drove the other party out. (Winnan vs. Winnan, L.R. 1949, p. 174). Consortium is a vital aspect of married life and destruction of it by one partner without the consent of the other, whether it be by physical separation or merely by conduct such as refusal of support or refusal to fulfill the obligations of marriage, could very well be desertion.

There seems to be general agreement among the witnesses who have appeared before your Committee that desertion should be ground for divorce in Canada. Indeed, in a brief presented by a group of organizations whose members have had ample and bitter experience of desertion and its baleful effects, the view was expressed that desertion would become the most widely used ground for requesting divorces in a reformed system. This may or may not be true generally. In England, which has had such a ground since 1937, this has not proved to be the case. But in many segments of Canadian society it may well prove to be a much used ground. In any case, there would seem to be a very large number of people, particularly wives who have been deserted by their husbands, who are now desperate for release from their marriage bonds. The testimony of such associations as Parents without Partners, the Mothers Alone Society and Canadian Single Parents Association establishes this. Your Committee has received large numbers of letters from deserted wives pleading for a change in the law to enable them to be rid of the shackles of empty and meaningless mariage ties to husbands who have long since disappeared, so that they may regularize illicit unions that they have been forced to contract and to provide legitimate fathers for their offspring. Anyone who has read these letters cannot but be convinced of the misery and unhappiness that exists because of the failure of our present law to permit divorce on the grounds of desertion.

It has been argued that in most of these cases, a ground already exists, since many desertions involve adultery as well. The husband may desert to take up with another woman, or may do so after he has deserted; the wife may be forced into a "common law" union, which is technically adulterous, after her desertion simply to provide a home and support for her children. However, the problem of finding the husband and proving the adultery may not be an easy one; in fact, it is often impossible. Desertion should be a ground in itself and it would not only be more practical but more just to treat it as such. Nothing terminates marital consortium so effectively as desertion over a protracted period.

The question that remains is the time period of the desertion. A period of one year with the mutual consent of the parties was suggested by the Single Parents Association, but the Baptist Church of Canada favoured a period as long as five years. The figure most often suggested was three years; the Canadian Bar Association, the New Brunswick Barristers' Society and the Anglican Diocese of Huron to name but three. Three years is the period specified in England and this seems to be the reason for the general approval of this figure. Certainly, the time should be long enough to ensure that the desertion was not a passing whim or fancy and to establish that the deserting party has decided to terminate the marriage relationship. Desertion without cause for a period of three years should be long enough to establish this. Longer periods only increase the number of illicit unions and illegitimate children.

Some witnesses feel that there should be reasonable certainty that reconciliation is not possible before a divorce is granted. A court should certainly consider the likelihood of reconciliation before terminating a marriage on this ground, but after three years absence, the chances of reconciliation would in most cases be slight. However, couples who honestly try to patch up their marriage relationship and fail, should not be penalized for so doing. Consequently, in determining the period of desertion it would seem a sensible idea to adopt the English practice whereby a period of cohabitation for not more than three months with reconciliation as its primary object, should not stand in the way of granting a divorce, should the attempt prove to be unsuccessful. The three month period would not be considered as interrupting the stipulated time for desertion.

Your Committee, therefore, is of the opinion that desertion for a period of three years, on the petition of the deserted spouse, where there is little likelihood of a resumption of cohabitation within a reasonable period of time, should be made a ground for the dissolution of marriage. Your Committee is of the opinion further that the definition of desertion, other than as above, be left to the courts, guided by the jurisprudence created in Canada in relation to judicial separation and in the courts of the United Kingdom in cases of both divorce and separation.

IV MARRIAGE BREAKDOWN

During the course of its public hearings, your Committee has been urged almost continuously to abandon the presently prevailing doctrine of marital offences, such as adultery, as the ground for divorce and substitute marriage breakdown as the sole ground for the dissolution of marriage. The arguments in favour of such a course were most impressive and were presented by persons of responsibility and knowledge. Among the most impressive were the presentations of the United Church and the Anglican Church of Canada.

In 1962, the Board of Christian Education of the United Church of Canada published a report of a commission of that church on Marriage Breakdown, Divorce, Remarriage which had been approved by the church and in which the marriage breakdown idea is discussed. The best exposition of the idea has originated not in Canada but in the United Kingdom. In 1964, a study group was appointed by His Grace, the Archbishop of Canterbury, under the chairmanship of the Rt. Rev. R. C. Mortimer, Bishop of Exeter, consisting of distinguished churchmen, lawyers, doctors and sociologists. This group recommended that marriage breakdown be the sole ground for divorce in Great Britain. Their Report was published last year under the title Putting Asunder (London, S.P.C.K., 1966) and it has received a very extensive circulation.

A careful study of the implications of Putting Asunder have been made by the English Law Commission. Their report under the title of Reform of the Grounds of Divorce: The Field of Choice (Cmnd. 3123), was presented to the United Kingdom Parliament by the Lord Chancellor in November of last year. In the report, the Law Commission, under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Scarman, emphasize the difficulties and objections of the substitution of the marriage breakdown approach for the traditional marital offence doctrine based on the adversary system. The implications of this study will be examined later.

1. Marriage Breakdown: What it is and its Implications are

While the phrase Marriage Breakdown has recurred very often, precise definition of it, the implications of it, and suggestions as to how and how far it should be incorporated into Canadian law have been left somewhat vague. Your Committee apparently has been presented with three alternatives:

(i) to accept marriage breakdown as the sole ground allowable for the dissolution of marriage,

(ii) the complete rejection of the idea altogether,

(iii) its incorporation into the existing system by some means or another.

It would be most useful to consider it first in its purest and most absolute form: that is as the sole ground for divorce. As the Pastoral Institute of the United Church of Canada has said:

> "the adoption of the concept of marriage breakdown and the elimination of the concept of 'matrimonial offence' as the sole basis for divorce is by far the most important point for consideration by this Committee."

> "Marriage breakdown is a basis for divorce that adopts the policy that a marriage which has irretrievably broken down in fact should be dissolved in law. Conversely a marriage should not be dissolved in law until it is clearly demonstrated that in fact it has irretrievably broken down."

This breakdown would be the only ground on which a petition for divorce could be presented. The task of the court would be to satisfy itself that the marriage had broken down and that there was no likelihood of reconciliation between the parties and no hope of resumption of cohabitation. The question the court would have to ask itself is this:

> "Does the evidence before the court reveal such failure in the matrimonial relationship, or such circumstances adverse to that relationship, that no reasonable probability remains of the spouses again living together as husband and wife for mutual comfort and support?" (Putting Asunder, pp. 38-39)

The most important circumstances in the proof of the breakdown would be that the parties had been living apart for some considerable time before the petition was made. Separation in itself, however, would not be conclusive proof of a breakdown. The court would have to consider each case on its merits. Those actions which under the existing Canadian and English law constitute matrimonial offences, i.e. adultery, cruelty, etc. would be available as evidence to prove the breakdown but would not in themselves be grounds for granting a divorce. Also the court would have to take into consideration many factors that are not at present considered in divorce cases. This basically is the position taken by the Mortimer Group, as your Committee understands their report.

The form in which this scheme was actually presented to your Committee suggested specifically that the court should, upon the presentation of a petition by one of the parties to a marriage, decree a dissolution whenever the marriage had irretrievably broken down. To prove the irretrievable breakdown there must be evidence that there is no reasonable expectation of resumption of cohabitation and also evidence that the parties are in fact living separate and apart and have so lived for a continuous period immediately prior to the date of granting the decree for three years, or one year where the respondent has been guilty of adultery, extreme cruelty, sodomy, bestiality, or an attempt to commit sodomy or bestiality. In determining separation, a period of cohabitation no more than two months with reconciliation as its primary purpose would not be considered.

It was also pointed out that certain safeguards would obviously be required in such a scheme to protect not only the innocent victims of a divorce, that is the children and perhaps an unwilling spouse, but also the institution of marriage itself. Thus the United Church Pastoral Institute has proposed that no decree would be issued if the court believed it to be contrary to public policy. Public policy permitting such refusal would be (a) that the decree would prove unduly harsh or oppressive to the defendant or respondent or (b) that the defendant had failed to comply with a court order or is likely to fail to comply with an order of the court concerning maintenance of the respondent or a child of the parties or as to the custody of, or access to, such a child. The Mortimer Group envisage similar safeguards in their proposals.

The proponents of the pure marriage breakdown thesis have advanced many arguments in its favour and made numerous criticisms of the existing system of divorce based upon matrimonial offence. While not wishing to repeat criticisms of the current system made elsewhere in this report, some of these points are worth noting. The fundamental argument against the present system, even with the addition of further grounds, is that it fails to get to the heart of the matter—the state of the marriage itself. It merely deals in superficialities and external or overt factors. The Pastoral Institute has agreed that:

> "The addition of numerous legal grounds, based upon the matrimonial offence is evidence of a struggle to do justice to persons whose marriages are in trouble without coming to grips with the marriage breakdown as such."

Adultery may be evidence of marital trouble but it may not mean that the marriage has broken down. It may merely point to the need for counselling and education rather than to divorce. The existence of matrimonial offences may not thus prove a breakdown, and hence legitimately occasion a divorce; conversely, a marriage can break down without any matrimonial offence having been committed. Many other factors must be considered in determining the failure of a marriage; such factors as immaturity, personal inadequacies, marked difference in background, inadequate preparation for marriage and external interference from in-laws and outsiders. There are many factors in society, economic, moral and social which threaten marriage and family life.

Besides being remote from the realities of the marriage, the existing law engenders a great deal of bitterness and encourages recrimination on the part of the parties by the use of the adversary system and the use of the idea of a guilty party. Marriage breakdown by abolishing the adversary system and getting rid of the idea of a "guilty party", would end all this. Furthermore, whereas the present law inhibits attempts at reconciliation, the marriage breakdown theory would encourage it because an attempt at reconciliation would almost certainly precede most divorce actions, if for no other reason than that an attempted reconciliation that failed would provide good evidence of a marriage breakdown in any subsequent proceedings.

As the Mortimer Group have stated it:

> "A divorce law founded on the doctrine of breakdown would not only accord better with social realities than the existing law but would have the merit of showing up divorce for what in essence it is—not a reward for marital virtue on the one side and marital delinquency on the other, not a victory for one spouse and a reverse for the other; but a defeat for both, a failure of the marital 'two-in-one relationship' in which both its members, however unequal their responsibility, are inevitably involved together." (Putting Asunder, p. 18)

Furthermore, it is argued, such a system would not only provide relief for those situations where marital offences have not occurred, but would provide relief for those whose moral sense and civic responsibility prevents them from deliberately committing adultery or perjury to obtain a divorce. By so doing, it will eliminate the possibility for easy divorce and divorce by consent that the law affords to those deliberately willing to commit or pretend adultery. Thus it will not make divorces harder for those who merit them; but it will impede those who do not. As the United Church has pointed out, divorces are at present granted quite quickly and the three year waiting period will allow a system of marriage counselling to operate and thus supersede the system of instant divorce following isolated matrimonial offences which give the counsellor no time to operate.

Additional benefits, it has been suggested, that would flow from this system are the eradication of the vengeful or vindictive spouse who deliberately thwarts a divorce for no good reason, and the opportunity for full argument on property settlements and maintenance. The court having fully investigated the facts, it will be no longer necessary for the wife to forgo legitimate alimony or the husband to pay excessive settlements simply to get their divorce.

The Mortimer Group have also proposed other reasons for adopting marriage breakdown, which are not at the moment relevant to the Canadian situation but which would be, if certain other recommendations before your Committee were to be followed. The inclusion of the ground of insanity in the English law is inconsistent with the idea of matrimonial offence, being based on an underlying moral principle. Yet, "if it is morally right to grant divorces in cases where the common life has been brought to an end by circumstances outside the control of either party, it is hard to see why the law should make the decrees depend on the commission of an offence, except in the one case." (Putting Asunder, p. 28)

Finally, it has been urged, marriage breakdown would consider the subject of divorce from the social standpoint and would strengthen family life, the preservation of which is a major concern of society. Under marriage breakdown, society, through the courts, would decide who had the right to remarry, not the parties themselves. Under current procedures either the innocent or the guilty party may decide whether the other shall remarry either by concealing evidence of their offence, or by refusing to institute divorce proceedings.

The ground of separation suggested by the Canadian Bar Association and other groups would not really fit the marriage breakdown conception in this regard it is alleged. Because if separation alone is the ground for divorce, the parties would know that if they stayed apart, eventually they would be free to remarry, even if it took some time. Thus the choice still basically rests with the parties. By requiring something beyond mere separation, society will be able to assert its vital interest in the stability of family life, by giving the final decision to the court, society's representative, not the parties themselves.

A good summary of the argument advanced by the proponents of the marriage breakdown theory is provided by the following paragraph:

> "Present legislation significantly fails to permit the legal dissolution of marriages that are broken down beyond reasonable hope of restoration. Many persons with broken marriages are quite capable to re-establishing family life, but are unable to obtain divorces because there has been no proven and uncondoned adultery. Many too find themselves denied divorces, or their divorces may be placed in jeopardy, because of the often capricious judgement of an estranged spouse not to mention the financial difficulties of affording the cost of the proceedings. To broaden present legislation mainly by adding to the number of matrimonial offences will not alone be a realistic way of protecting human dignity, or of contributing to healthier family life."

The novelty of the marriage breakdown theory does not lie simply in the grounds it proposes for dissolutions of marriage, but also in the procedure that would be required to effect the system. Indeed, it is not the essential validity of the theory that seems to merit the most careful inspection at this stage, but the practical consequences that would flow from it, were it to be adopted.

The existing system for the trial of divorce cases based upon the adversary method, the traditional practice of our courts, whereby the judge is the arbiter between two contending parties, would have to be changed. The procedure would have to be that of an inquest or inquiry into the state of the marriage, if the marriage breakdown system were to work. The parties would not provide all the evidence and the court might have to seek out and introduce evidence of its own. As the Mortimer Group have expressed it:

> "We believe that to alter the law while leaving the method of its administration just as it now is would be to make divorce easier to obtain without any compensating advantages." (Putting Asunder p. 67)

The court would no longer be concerned with establishing the guilt or otherwise of a person against whom it is alleged a certain offence had been committed. Instead it would be inquiring into the alleged fact and causes of the "death" of a marital relationship. The Mortimer Group believe that > "it would have to be made possible for the court, therefore, to inquire effectively into what attempts at reconciliation had been made, into the feasibility of further attempts, into acts, events, and circumstances, alleged to have destroyed the marriage, into the truth of the statements made (especially in uncontested cases), and into all matters bearing upon the determination of the public interest." (Putting Asunder p. 67)

In short, the court would need to know far more about both partners to a marriage and their respective conduct toward each other than is now the case.

In pursuit of all the relevant facts, the courts would necessarily require assistance. As the Mortimer Group declare:

> "it would be contrary to the ethos of English law to ask judges to act as inquisitors." (p. 70)

It would presumably be equally contrary to the ethos of Canadian law to so ask Canadian judges. Therefore, the court will need officers to assist it, especially as a great deal of the information will be required of experts trained in the social sciences and family matters who can advise the courts on reconciliation and its likelihood of success, the effects of the situation on the children of the marriage and so forth. Such officers would also be needed to supervise the arrangements made for maintenance and custody.

It has been pointed out by advocates of this system, that an inquisitorial procedure is not unknown in Canadian legal practice. In the Province of Ontario, social workers carry out an investigation in divorce cases where there are children under sixteen and they file a report with the court on behalf of the Official Guardian. The courts also conduct inquiries where there is suspicion of connivance and collusion and may, and often do, conduct what amounts to an inquiry where it is necessary to consider whether the court's discretion should be exercised in favour of a plaintiff who has also committed a matrimonial offence. Nevertheless, the fact that a particular procedure may be resorted to from time to time, is not necessarily an argument that should be the basic procedure to be applied in every case.

Although not necessarily connected with the essence of the breakdown theory, the advocates of it propose that at the time of the divorce, the court should also deal with all aspects of the case, making provision for maintenance, custody, the division of family property and the award of possible pension rights to the wife and so forth. In making these arrangements it would bear in mind all the facts of the case that it had discovered.

2. Marriage Breakdown: Problems of Implementation

While there may be many general arguments against the adoption of the marriage breakdown theory as the sole ground for divorce, it seems first of all worthwhile to consider just how feasible such a scheme would be in actual practice. Your Committee has not heard from any witnesses who were prepared to dispute the validity of the doctrine under discussion from a practical point of view. However, most of the witnesses who proposed it did so as an addition to the present system, not as a substitute for it. This is largely because the public generally was unaware of the theory before the hearings began, as were some members of your Committee.

Nonetheless, it has raised many questions in the minds of your Committee members, questions which have been examined recently in a Report of the English Law Commission published in November of 1966. (Cmnd. 3123)

The English Law Commission believes that despite the contention of witnesses that the issue of breakdown is triable, it is doubtful if it can be adequately tried under the present court system; and no one, not even the Mortimer Group has suggested a root and branch reform of the court structure and procedure in divorce cases. In any case, the actual test of breakdown leaves considerable room for interpretation and discretion. The attitude and decisions of individual judges may vary greatly. As a result, decisions would be varying and highly unpredictable, and lawyers would encounter the greatest difficulty in advising their clients. The alternative would be to spell out in the legislation the requisite conditions for finding a breakdown of marriage in endless detail, but this would hardly be practical. In any case, even if it were, the result, given the tenor of our legal system, would probably be for judges to treat the stipulations as formulas, and if the external facts fitted, to grant the divorce without really delving into the heart of the matter. Even if the details were not spelled out, and the judges did rapidly begin to render their verdicts with some degree of consistency, there would be a danger, especially given the propensity and tradition of our courts to look to precedents, that once a particular set of circumstances had been established as proving that a marriage breakdown had occurred, that there would be a marked tendency for lawyers to plead and judges to accept, these circumstances in future cases as proof of breakdown. Obviously adultery, desertion, cruelty and separation would be such circumstances. It is quite likely, therefore, not merely in the long, but probably in the short run too, that the matrimonial offence doctrine, if it were formally tossed out of the front door of the legislature, might in fact surreptitiously creep in again through the court house window.

The English Law Commission was also concerned with the personal aspects of a divorce case. The trial of a divorce, even an undefended one, can be a bitter and humiliating experience for the parties concerned. Under the marriage breakdown system, the inquest would be on a scale far more extensive and intensive than is now the case. Such a proceeding would certainly prove extremely distasteful and embarrassing to most people. It is hard to see how this would contribute to the minimization of bitterness, distress and humiliation, which should be one of the objects of a good divorce law. (Cmnd. 3123, p. 10)

The Commission points out that not only would trial procedure be more painful to the parties, but it would be considerably more extensive in the time and space it would occupy. If all cases were to be inquired into, trials would inevitably be longer. The vast majority of cases at present are undefended and therefore can be dealt with both swiftly and without complications. The proposed system would necessitate more courts, more judges, and, most essential, the new procedure would require large numbers of trained investigators and social workers to assist the court. All this would be extremely expensive and would have to be paid for largely by the taxpayer, although it would no doubt be reflected in higher cost of divorce to the parties as well. Far from making divorces simpler and cheaper, it might well have the opposite effect.

Above all, the weakness in Canada would be a lack of the social workers and experts in marriage counselling: they simply do not exist. The Scarman Commission has alluded to the shortage of such trained personnel in England, and expert witnesses have testified before your Committee that the shortage is no less acute in Canada. Not only that, but were such highly trained people to be absorbed in the divorce court structure, they would be denied to many other, and perhaps more worthwhile services such as probation work, child care, as well as marriage guidance and reconciliation procedures.

Finally, there is the strong probability that this system would react in a detrimental way on the existing facilities for marriage counselling and reconciliation. Most witnesses before your Committee, whether they have advocated marriage breakdown or not, have emphasized the importance of counselling and reconciliation. While the advocates of marriage breakdown did not agree among themselves whether reconciliation attempts should be mandatory, discretionary, or absent in the divorce procedure, the Pastoral Institute of the United Church has suggested that since an attempt at reconciliation that had failed would be a strong argument in the court for proving marriage breakdown, it would thus encourage reconciliation attempts. While this might be laudable in itself, especially if it took place before the marriage had completely broken down, there is a greater probability that conciliation attempts will become simply standard pre-trial procedure, undertaken on legal advice, with little hope of success. Thus the existing agencies would be swamped with what are largely hopeless cases to the detriment of those who could indeed be helped by conciliation procedure.

The Scarman Commission has also expressed the belief that marriage counsellors and conciliation agencies are disturbed by such a proposal. They fear that one or other of the parties may wish to subpoena them to persuade a judge that every effort has, or has not, been made to save the marriage. The agencies fear that if this became common practice, public confidence in them would be undermined and their efficacy gravely impaired.

From the procedural point of view, there is an added complication in Canada to be borne in mind when considering the practical implementation of marriage breakdown. While this may not be insoluble in theory, it is one that raises a great many practical difficulties. This is the very matter of court procedure itself. If the implementation of marriage breakdown is to be left to the provincial courts which now administer the divorce laws, it will be a provincial, not a federal matter, to establish their procedure. While the federal authority may be able to set out general guide lines, the details would rest with each individual province. The establishment of a series of federal divorce courts with their own procedure and staff would probably be the only way out. But this would be a radical step and would raise further problems.

For example, the hope that all matters pertaining to a divorce could be dealt with altogether at the same time, raises very serious jurisdictional problems. As has been outlined in a previous section of this Report, while federal authority extends to matters of custody and maintenance, once the question of pensions rights, marital property, the continuing custody, maintenance and guardianship of children are at issue, federal jurisdiction becomes very dubious, indeed probably non-existent. To establish a federal divorce court to achieve comprehensive proceedings and then to find that part of its activity is ultra vires would be to leave matters worse than before.

While the scheme in its most absolute form would, therefore, seem to raise insuperable problems of implementation, there is much in the underlying idea that is appealing. To some degree already, the idea has crept into divorce law along with matrimonial offence, especially in jurisdictions which have added insanity to their grounds. For insanity is not an offence but a condition that destroys marriage. (Insanity as a ground for divorce is discussed elsewhere.) There would seem to be a somewhat less cumbersome method of procedure that could be used. The essence of this would be to dispense, to as great a degree as possible, with the investigation to satisfy the court that the marriage has irretrievably broken down. This full scale inquest would be the most expensive, distasteful and time consuming part of the process. The court would likely assume on the basis of easily provided external evidence that the marriage had broken down unless there was clear evidence to the contrary.

A scheme somewhat along these lines seems to have been in the minds of the authors of the brief presented by the Pastoral Institute of the United Church of Canada, albeit perhaps unconsciously. Nevertheless, the best exposition of a simplified breakdown procedure was provided by the English Scarman Commission, although not recommended by it. A divorce case based on marriage breakdown has to answer four questions. Firstly, has the marriage broken down? Secondly, if so, are there any reasonable prospects of reconciliation? Thirdly, if not, is there any reason of public policy, especially involving the parties or the children, why the divorce should be denied? And finally, if not, what arrangements should be made regarding the parties and the children?

By the suggested procedure, on proof of a period of separation alone, the court would be prepared to assume a positive answer to the question has the marriage broken down; and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it would assume similarly that reconciliation is not reasonably likely and that there is no reason to withhold the divorce. If there was anything in the evidence that led the court to believe reconciliation was possible, it could adjourn the case for an attempt to be made, but unless the fact of the marriage breakdown was strongly disputed by one of the parties, there would be no inquest to establish that the marriage had irretrievably broken down. As the Scarman Commission put it:

> "the ending of cohabitation and a sustained failure to resume it are the most cogent, objective and justifiable indications of breakdown."

Probably the only occasion for a full inquest into a marriage would be when a wife opposed it on the grounds that it would bring hardship upon her and her children, despite the fact that a husband had made quite an equitable arrangement. These cases would probably be few and the courts would be able to cope with them without any undue strain.

In a suggested bill appended to their brief, the United Church Pastoral Institute proposed what in practice would be a similar system:

> "The court shall upon a petition by one of the parties to the marriage, decree dissolution whenever the marriage had irretrievably broken down. . . Irretrievable breakdown of marriage shall be proven by evidence that there is no reasonable presumption of cohabitation and shall include evidence that the parties are in fact living separately and apart and have lived separately and apart for a continuous period, . . . such a period to be either:
> (a) One year when the respondent has been guilty of adultery, extreme cruelty, sodomy, bestiality or an attempt to commit sodomy or bestiality, or
> (b) three years in every other case."

The authors of this proposal expressed the hope that the judges would inquire into the marriage rather than accept the external fact of separation or separation with adultery, but admitted the possibility that they might not, especially at first. It was hoped that the new system having been introduced alongside the old system, the new would eventually displace it: the old being swallowed up by the new. There is perhaps some room for scepticism on that point.

The real problem with this simplified version of the marriage breakdown theory is an extremely basic one. How long a period of separation should be required before a husband or wife can ask the courts for a divorce? The witnesses proposing the inclusion of separation as a ground for divorce in some system or another, have suggested various periods of time ranging from two to seven years. Similarly, the Mortimer Group in England thought three years; the members of the English Royal Commission on Marriage and Divorce (1951-1955) believed seven years (Cmnd. 9678, p. 25) to be a reasonable time. If the period chosen is too short, the parties might rush into a divorce without having time to recover from either a violent matrimonial quarrel or a passing affair or infatuation. Nor might they have time to consider whether the difficulties in their marriage were capable of solution.

On the other hand, if the period is a relatively long one, say three years, what becomes of those who presently can obtain divorces on the ground of outrageous conduct by their spouse. Must they have to wait three years? It seems unlikely that a period could be agreed that would render justice to all parties in both categories. Therefore it does not seem possible that breakdown could constitute the sole and comprehensive ground. If the period of separation is to be more than six months, then it can only offer a practical solution if it is coupled with other grounds which would provide far more rapid relief. This is not to reject marriage breakdown ideas completely. Far from it. The introduction of it through the Ground of Separation is discussed in the following section of the report.

V THE SEPARATION GROUND

Your Committee is of the opinion that marital offences, such as adultery, cruelty and desertion, cannot be abandoned as grounds for divorce, yet it realizes that many marriages fail for reasons other than provable offences on the part of one of the spouses. The plight of thousands of persons caught in the bonds of dead marriages presents a problem of major importance. It is in this connection that the principle of marriage breakdown provides a practical solution.

Many marriages fail through no fault of either partner. Neither party commits adultery, there are no acts of cruelty, and one spouse does not actually desert the other. The parties to the marriage may be fundamentally incompatible. Often such partners try repeatedly to revive the affection that they once had had for each other or believed they had. Sometimes such couples separate because the tensions within the home have an adverse effect upon both the partners and the children. Under such circumstances the partners may be better off if remarried and the children given a more healthy family environment. As one brief expressed it:

> "It is difficult, if not impossible, to see what interest the State might have in the promulgation of this marriage bond. It is difficult to see what possible interest the State could have in endeavoring to reunite or preserve a bond between two people who have absolutely no intention of resuming cohabitation. Providing all the ancillary obligations are dealt with, there is no reason why these people should not have a divorce."

As the law now stands such broken marriages are indissoluble unless one of the partners is prepared either to commit the matrimonial offence of adultery, or to fabricate evidence that a court might accept as proof of such misconduct. This is not a happy situation. The widening of the grounds for divorce by the addition of cruelty, desertion, and so forth, would not alleviate this situation. The present law, as has been pointed out, punishes those whose integrity prevents them committing perjury or adultery, but allows those less scrupulous to obtain relief. The object of a good law should be the very reverse.

There are many cases where one of the spouses has simply disappeared leaving no proof of conscious desertion, or any other fault such as adultery or cruelty. Some marriages have ended and future cohabition has become impossible by reason of some incapacitating physical or mental illness or by persistent alcoholism, drug addiction or criminal behaviour.

The utter cruelty of denying to an unfortunate spouse the right to a normal married life under such circumstances is obvious. The great number of persons so affected is such that the problem can no longer be ignored. The several classes of such cases will be dealt with individually in the course of this report.

1. The Separation Ground as Proof of Marriage Breakdown

The introduction of the ground of separation for a specified period would be the most practical way to solve the problem of simple marriage breakdown. There can be no better evidence that a marriage has failed than the termination of cohabitation and the failure to resume it after a substantial period of time. If there is no likelihood of reconciliation, there is little point in retaining the empty legal shell of the marriage. As one brief before your Committee succinctly put it:

> "If after living apart...a couple have no desire to ever again live together as man and wife, no law can make it so and no service is rendered mankind to refuse divorce."

Only by divorce can the partners to a broken marriage hope to be free of their marital ties, and thus enabled to lead full lives again. To deny such people the opportunity to contract new and possibly more happy and stable marriages serves no public good. Indeed, it is difficult to see what service is rendered to the concept of marriage as a life long union, to retain fossilized relics of it that only cause hardship and misery, and are likely to lead to irregular and illicit unions and the procreation of more illegitimate children.

The introduction of the separation ground into Canadian divorce law may appear to some to be revolutionary. Certainly it would be a departure from the principles at present in vogue. In actual fact, the radical nature of the proposal is more apparent than real. If insanity, drug addiction and criminality are introduced as grounds for divorce, one has already departed from the matrimonial offence concept. The tendency in cases of cruelty and even desertion is now to look to the circumstances produced by these offences as justifying the relief, rather than to the offences themselves. This is to recognize in large measure the fact that the marriage has broken down.

There is little doubt that the concept of marriage breakdown envisaged in the separation ground seems to have won wide acceptance. The majority of witnesses appearing before your Committee have advocated it in one form or another, usually in the form of a separation ground. It has been endorsed by such large and representative bodies as the United Church of Canada, the Anglican Church and the Baptist Church, as well as the Canadian Bar Association, The Congress of Canadian Women, and the Canadian Committee on the Status of Women. A large number of social organizations with considerable experience in the problems of divorce, as well as many legal societies, medical associations and individuals with wide experience in the problems of family and matrimonial law have similarly endorsed the principle. It has been introduced into numerous jurisdictions whose legal and social structure are not dissimilar to our own; Australia, New Zealand, and various American States, and it has existed for a long time in most European countries. There is no doubt that, as practical legislation in all of these countries, it does work.

There are, nevertheless, certain problems connected with the introduction of the separation ground that must be examined and solved. The procedure must be determined and certain safeguards introduced. In accordance with the separation ground, as presented to your Committee, divorce would be available to either spouse where the husband and wife have lived separate and apart for a period of three years immediately preceding the commencement of proceedings. The ending of cohabitation and the failure to resume it are clear and objective indications that the marriage has broken down. It may not necessarily mean that it has broken down irretrievably, but it does indicate a reasonable presumption that this is so. If the parties are convinced that reconciliation is impossible, the chances of saving the marriage are very remote. As the Scarman Report justifiably notes:

> "the parties are likely to be better judges of the viability of their own marriage than any court could hope to be."

2. Safeguards

Nevertheless, there should be safeguards in such a system. In the first place, the court should be reasonably satisfied that there is no hope of reconciliation, otherwise the proceedings should be adjourned. The realities of the situation in all probability, however, are that unless the marriage has fully broken down, the parties would not be before the court asking for a divorce.

Before granting the divorce, the court should be satisfied on two other matters. Firstly, that the granting of the divorce would not be unjust or cause undue hardship to either of the parties to the marriage or to the children. The phraseology suggested by the witnesses supporting the introduction of this ground is:

> "that the issue of a decree will not prove unduly harsh or oppressive to the respondent spouse."

Secondly, the court should be assured that satisfactory arrangements have been made for the maintenance of the defendant spouse and the maintenance and custody of the children.

Circumstances exist, however, when the court should exercise its discretion. The financial circumstances of the wife are important. It would be intolerable for a husband to divorce his wife after three years and leave her without means of support, and especially so if she has the task of rearing the children. The financial arrangements must be fair and equitable in the circumstances. Should a husband remarry after his divorce, it might well be that his financial resources would not extend to the support of two women. Again, if a divorce is granted to the husband, a wife may lose pension rights or other benefits thus causing her great hardship. In such circumstances it would be necessary to withhold the granting of a decree. The interest of the children might similarly preclude the granting of a divorce. Also, outrageous conduct on the part of the petitioner might be a legitimate cause for refusing a decree. The Scarman Report has pointed out that while it may not exactly help the institution of marriage to keep someone in it who flagrantly abuses it, it is equally possible that by letting him escape he may serve as a bad example to others. Spouses who indulge in outrageous conduct should not be permitted to get away with it. (Cmnd. 3123, p. 20) It would perhaps be wise to add as a condition to the granting of a decree that it not be unduly harsh or oppressive to a defendant spouse.

Finally, it would also be necessary to consider the interests of the petitioner himself and also of any partner or offspring he may have as the result of an illicit union.

The most controversial and troublesome aspect of the separation ground is the problem of the so called "innocent spouse" who is divorced against his, or most probably, her will. The safeguards discussed above would deal in large measure with this problem, although they are also applicable when both spouses agree to the divorce proceedings. Both the Mortimer Group and the English Law Commission have examined this problem very carefully. The conclusions may be summarized as follows:

There seem to be four ways in which the wife may be adversely affected if it were possible for her husband to divorce her against her will:

1. that she would suffer economic deprivation;
2. that she would lose status by being divorced;
3. there would be the public scandal of the petitioner taking advantage of his own wrong; and
4. the wife would have a feeling of insecurity knowing that she could be divorced at any time against her will regardless of her own conduct.

The first problem can be overcome by the safeguards already introduced. Adequate financial arrangements must have been made for the support of the wife while unmarried and the children.

A wife may object to a divorce on religious grounds. However, if the marriage really is dead, there can be little point in the preservation of its legal form. From a theological point of view, most churches do not object basically to divorce as such but to remarriage. A wife with strong religious scruples who has been divorced, with due financial safeguards, is not compelled to remarry.

The second problem, loss of status, is not a major ground for rejecting divorce against the will of an objecting spouse. Divorce is no longer the social scandal it was in Victorian times. Indeed, the whole purpose of the divorce legislation proposed is the relief of hardship and suffering in society. As the Scarman Report has shrewdly observed:

> "from the point of view of the wife herself, it is not clear that the status of a rejected wife is at the present day superior in society's esteem to that of a divorcee." (Cmnd. 3123, p. 22)

The scandal of the wrong-doer benefiting from his own bad conduct would be safeguarded by allowing the court's discretion to refuse the divorce, if it believes it to be contrary to public policy. As the Scarman Report states:

> "The expedient of preserving the sanctity of marriage by insisting that one who has shown wanton contempt for it should be punished by remaining married seems illogical and unattractive, especially if, as is usually the case, it involves punishing others as well." (ibid. p. 23)

This matter could be safely left to the discretion of the court. In such a case, the interests of other persons, the common law partner and the illegitimate children of the petitioner must also be considered.

Finally, the threat to the security of the wife, has been very much overemphasized. As the Mortimer Group have pointed out, the power to keep one's legal status is not the same as being secure from the disruption of the home and family. A petition for divorce arises only after that disruption has occurred, and it does occur, whether or not there is a separation ground for divorce. In the words of the Mortimer Group:

> "Whenever, a husband (or wife for that matter) has so far broken away from the original marriage as to set up a new menage with the intention that it should be permanent, the lot of the deserted partner cannot be appreciably improved, in terms of human life, by mere maintenance of the legal status quo. The real damage has already been done." (Putting Asunder, p. 55-56)

The real fear is that if divorce could be granted on the ground of separation despite the objection of one of the parties, this would lead to increased insecurity in marriage and a lack of respect for the permanence of marriage has not been borne out by the events in jurisdictions which have introduced this ground into their law. While it is possible to imagine cases where it would not be desirable to grant a divorce on the ground of separation, and it is clearly essential in such cases that the courts have the discretion to refuse them in actual practice, the courts would probably need to exercise it little.

It is equally possible to envisage situations where it clearly would be desirable to grant a divorce in spite of the strenuous objections of the other party. The objections of some partners may be based upon nothing more than sheer spite or vindictiveness, no matter what excuse may be given. A wife might wrap herself in a cloak of religious objections merely to hold up her husband for a higher maintenance settlement.

For these reasons, it seems to your Committee to be desirable to introduce "separation without fault" as a ground for divorce subject to certain safeguards, whether or not both spouses agree. The alternative, to make the ground voluntary separation, as proposed by the Canadian Bar Association, is not acceptable. This could rule out divorce in many cases where it would be most desirable.

To summarize briefly the safeguards that it would be necessary to attach to a separation ground: (i) The court to have the power to adjourn for a specified period when there seemed to be a possibility of reconciliation; (ii) Provisions to be made for the financially weaker party; (iii) No decree to be issued until satisfactory arrangements have been made for the care and custody of the children; (iv) The court to have discretion to refuse the divorce on the ground of public interest. In addition, in cases where the other spouse does not object to the petition, provision should be made to ensure that the spouse has independent advice, realizes what is involved, and the consequences of the granting of the petition. The Scarman Report suggests that it might even be desirable to send a welfare officer to visit the non-objecting spouse to make sure that all the implications are fully understood.

Since the introduction of the separation ground would be a complete departure from the matrimonial offence concept, the usual bars of collusion, condonation and connivance would not apply. They would clearly be inapplicable in the circumstances.

3. Determining the Period of Separation

A question to be resolved on the introduction of the separation ground, is the length of the period of separation to be required. The length of time suggested to your Committee has varied from a minimum of one year to a maximum of seven. Three years is the time span most generally suggested. Clearly it must fulfill two conditions. In the first place, the period must not be so short as to undermine the stability of marriage and lead to quick and easy divorce. But on the other hand, it must not be so long as to preserve in legal existence marriages that have not existed in fact for a considerable time, since in cases of desertion this would withhold the right to remarry and would foster illicit sexual relationships. Seven years is certainly too long; one year is almost certainly too short. If the period is too long, those couples who could get a divorce on another ground, but who would prefer to use the separation ground to avoid the recrimination and hostility usually associated with the more usual grounds, would not be prepared to wait. The Scarman Report thought that those couples seeking to end their marriages without public fault finding might be prepared to wait two years.

The object of the separation ground is to provide relief for those marriages which have irretrievably broken down. In fixing the period of separation, therefore, the prime consideration should be, does this period provide a fair test that the marriage has broken down? It has been suggested that two years separation is sufficient to establish this, especially if the case is undefended. If the parties have lived apart for two years and then take steps to end the marriage, there is little hope of reconciliation. In any event, the court would have power to inquire into the possibilities of reconciliation, if it appeared warranted. Two years might be a little on the short side. Three years would perhaps be better.

The Scarman Report also suggested, although no witnesses before your Committee endorsed it, that there should be a longer period of separation in cases where one spouse objects. If the period for undefended cases were to be set at two years, there might be a case for taking this position. If the parties have been separated for three years, or longer, however, it is hard to believe that the marriage had not irretrievably broken down. Certainly the court would be expected to consider carefully defended cases especially with a view to the possibility of reconciliation. However, if a couple were irreconcilable after three years, it is unlikely that they will be more amenable to cohabitation after five years.

The introduction of two periods of separation, one for defended, and another for undefended cases, does not seem to have much merit. Two periods might provide a less scrupulous spouse with an opportunity for blackmail by threatening to defend the action.

Your Committee is consequently of the opinion that a period of separation of three years immediately prior to the institution of proceedings would be sufficient to establish the breakdown of a marriage and should be introduced as a ground for divorce with the safeguards discussed above.

4. Can Marriage Breakdown and Matrimonial Offence Doctrines be Mixed?

It has been argued, most notably and forcefully in Putting Asunder, that the separation ground should not be added as simply one more ground for divorce. Either marriage breakdown alone should be the sole ground, or else reliance should be made upon matrimonial offences exclusively. Basically, it is asserted the two concepts are based on fundamentally different principles and to have a divorce law containing both would be glaringly illogical.

This argument has as its premise the contention that Parliament must choose one principle as the exclusive one. Your Committee does not subscribe to this view. There is no reason why the one principle cannot be used to satisfy the case of the spouse against whom a wrong has been committed, while the other principle can serve in the case of those spouses against whom no offence or misconduct can be proven. The legal system often uses different principles to dispose of distinguishable situations. The aim of your Committee is to suggest practical remedies for real grievances.

Basically, those opposed to mixing the two concepts are arguing that only one principle can apply; as one brief rejecting such a mixed system stated:

> "If you start with breakdown you are premising your solution on a particular meaning of marriage, and must act accordingly."

Your Committee questions whether society at large has one particular view of marriage. Parliament is legislating for the whole of Canada. There is no doubt that many still hold to the matrimonial offence concept, just as it is clear that others are coming to believe in marriage breakdown. To reject one theory held by many, to replace it exclusively by one as yet held by relatively few, would not be desirable.

Mr. Justice Scarman has expressed what seems to your Committee to be a realistic approach to the problem:

> "I believe that society recognizes that a spouse should be able to get a divorce when he or she has been deserted, has been treated with cruelty, or has had to face the infidelity of adultery. Why should a spouse, if in a position to prove any of these situations, have to go further and prove irretrievable breakdown, or consent or failure of attempts at reconciliation? The ordinary man's sense of justice revolts at any such requirement. The law would do well to keep in touch with the ordinary man's idea of what is right and proper, and, though the lawyer can argue that the logical way to handle offences is solely as evidence of underlying breakdown, I think this argument, if carried to a logical conclusion, would fail to win general approbation and would certainly impose a very much greater strain on the administration of justice than our limited resources in legal man power could meet." (Quoted by Prof. Julien Payne).

Another argument against the combination of the two systems is that it would provide an open-ended law and thus make divorce easier. The motto would be, if all else fails try marriage breakdown. (Putting Asunder, p. 59) With all due respect to the authors of Putting Asunder, your Committee does not accept this contention. It seems to ignore the fact that such a combination does exist in Australia, New Zealand, numerous American States and European countries. Were the separation ground to be introduced, there might immediately be a considerable number of divorces sought under it. This would merely prove the need for the ground. Thereafter, the rate would decrease to a steady figure. Australian experience bears this out. Two years after the introduction of the separation ground, the number of petitions based on that ground fell off sharply and at no time was it the most widely used ground for seeking divorce. "One conclusion may be reached. The inclusion in the Act of the ground of separation has not brought the flood of divorces which was so confidently prophesized." (D. M. Selby, "The Development of Divorce Law in Australia", Modern Law Review, XXIX, 476, 1966.)

It has also been objected that the separation ground would introduce divorce by consent. This is not so. Divorce by consent means that the parties alone shall act as the judges of their case. Under the separation ground, the court would have to formally approve the divorce and would have the power and, indeed the duty, to refuse to grant it under the circumstances discussed above. However, the fact remains, that divorce with consent exists in every system as a matter of fact. Despite the rigors of the present law, 90% of all cases at present are uncontested. This indicates a large measure of consent on the part of the parties. The introduction of the separation ground would not weaken the institution of marriage. The separation ground would involve waiting for three years or longer.

It has been suggested that the separation ground be restricted to those marriages where the partners are living apart under a judicial separation. This was advocated by the Barristers' Society of New Brunswick and Judge J. T. J. OHearn of Nova Scotia. A similar practice is followed in the State of New York. Your Committee can see little merit in the proposal. If a separation exists, it matters little whether it is merely de facto or whether concurrent with a judicial decree. It is the separation that is crucial, not the accompanying formalities.

Also, it would be a superfluous provision on the one hand, and provide a bogus ground for divorce on the other. Judicial separations are granted only on certain specific grounds, grounds which under a revised statute would themselves be grounds for divorce, i.e. cruelty, desertion and adultery. Thus, the proceedings for a dissolution of the marriage could be based on these grounds. The element of separation would add nothing. Furthermore, it is hard to see what advantage would be gained by the necessity of going to court twice: once for the judicial separation and again for the divorce. It would place an added burden upon the courts and inflict financial hardship upon many people. It might even make the cost of divorce prohibitive for others.

VI SEPARATION WITHOUT FAULT

There are a number of conditions destructive of marriage which do not involve a provable marital offence on the part of either spouse but which, nevertheless, terminate cohabitation effectively. Among these are insanity, gross and habitual drunkenness, drug addiction, persistent criminality resulting in long terms in the penitentiary, and the disappearance over a long period of one of the parties.

While these conditions might be encompassed within the separation ground already recommended, they are of an identifiable nature and it seems more logical to treat them as separate or special cases of marriage breakdown. Besides, difficulty might be experienced in trying to bring these conditions under the general ground of separation. Difficulties have been encountered in the United States, for example, where the courts have refused to grant decrees on the ground of separation where the separation was caused by insanity.

We shall deal with these conditions individually beginning with insanity.

1. Insanity and Illness

Matrimonial offences, such as cruelty and desertion, are valid as grounds for divorce, not only because they violate the rights and duties of the matrimonial bond, but because they create situations which actually destroy the marriage itself. With desertion and cruelty the offensive conduct is wilful but other cases can arise where the conduct of a spouse effectively terminates the marriage as a viable union, even though no real fault is involved. Such a situation may exist when one partner to a marriage is insane. Many jurisdictions have introduced insanity as a ground for divorce. Great Britain introduced it in 1937 and the majority of witnesses before your Committee have strongly urged its inclusion in any reformed Canadian legislation.

To introduce insanity as a ground for divorce would be a departure from the essence of the matrimonial offence doctrine, and would recognize that insanity breaks up a marriage, not because becoming mentally ill is a crime committed by one partner against the other, but because it creates a situation where the marriage can no longer exist. The actions or behaviour of the patient may render continued cohabitation impossible or the sick partner may be detained for an extended period in a mental institution thus frustrating most of the purposes of marriage. In such circumstances, it is unjust for one partner to be tied to the mere legal shell of a non-existent marriage.

The introduction of insanity as a ground for divorce is a matter which needs the most careful consideration. It must be firmly kept in mind that it is not the insanity itself that is the ground for divorce but the consequences that flow from it.

The usual ground suggested to your Committee has been "chronic" or "incurable unsoundness of mind". However, both the Canadian Mental Health Association and the Canadian Psychiatric Association have pointed out the dangers of these phrases. "Unsoundness of mind" in itself covers the whole gamut of mental illness, from minor neurosis to extreme psychotic conditions. As leading psychiatrists have pointed out to your Committee, no one is completely of sound mind, just as no one is in perfect physical health. There could be many occasions where a patient may be mentally ill, and thus technically of unsound mind, but perfectly capable of fulfilling matrimonial responsibilities. It is for these reasons that witnesses, like the Canadian Bar Association, have stipulated that the patient must have been confined to a mental institution for a long period of time. This would be tangible evidence of the serious nature of the illness, but more important, such confinement would destroy the marriage.

It must be perfectly clear, therefore, that if insanity is to be considered a ground for a divorce, it must apply only to those cases where the insanity by its consequences actually destroys the marital relationship.

The insanity must be incurable. This, however, raises a problem. Medical science is making sweeping advances. Even in the last five years, tremendous strides have been taken in the treatment and cure of mental illness. Consequently, the medical profession is very loath to say flatly and categorically that a person is incurably insane. Mental illness can be treated in the majority of cases, and your Committee is assured that even patients who are suffering from psychosis and who are confined to mental institutions for treatment, usually improve enough to leave the hospital. Psychiatric skill, knowledge and drugs are constantly improving, thus the Canadian Mental Health Association believes:

> "It is becoming increasingly difficult, therefore, even for a high qualified specialist in psychiatry to certify that a person suffering from mental illness is incurable, and that he will never be able to live at home in the community again."

Thus while a husband or wife may be in a mental institution and have been there for some considerable time, it is by no means certain that they may not be cured.

The medical profession and those experienced in dealing with mental health are very reluctant to see insanity included as a ground for divorce. To do so would raise serious difficulties and would also discriminate against mental illness. This is a serious point that is often overlooked. Mental illness has suffered from a social stigma in the past, one that is only now being overcome. To single out mental illness would reinforce this stigma. There are other physical illnesses of a severe and chronic nature whose effects on a marital relationship can be every bit as severe as insanity: multiple sclerosis, cerebral hemorrhage or even severe disabling arthritis, and these are diseases which can produce profound character changes on the part of those suffering from them. It would be logical, it has been argued by the Canadian Mental Health Association, to make disabilitating illness, either physical or mental, a ground for divorce, if its consequences were such as to destroy the marriage.

Since it is the consequences, rather than the insanity itself, that destroy the marriage, it has also been suggested that insanity as a ground could be dispensed with altogether and that its consequences could be dealt with under other proposed grounds, especially if the separation ground were to be introduced.

Cruelty might very well be a ground as a result of the conduct of a mentally ill spouse, and the case of Williams vs. Williams before the House of Lords in 1963 held that insanity was no defence to cruel treatment because it was the nature of the conduct, not the intention behind it, that the court had to consider in establishing cruelty. Furthermore, if the separation ground is introduced, it might be possible to deal with the cases of spouses committed to a mental hospital for protracted periods of time. The consequences of this committal seem to be the major motive for the advocacy of insanity as a ground for divorce at all. Indeed, the Canadian Mental Health Association's submission suggested that, if separation for a period of three years were adopted as a ground, there would be no need for a separate ground of insanity at all. Certainly, the Mental Health Association believes that in cases of real incurable insanity a divorce should be granted, so long as the defendant spouse is not unduly oppressed by the granting of such a decree. However, they argue that it would be better to grant the divorce for the real reason, the separation rather than making the chronic unsoundness of mind itself the ground for divorce.

Consequently, your Committee is of the opinion that marriages in which the conjugal life has been effectively prevented for a period of three years or longer by the mental or other disabling illness of one of the spouses, and in which there is no reasonable likelihood of a resumption of cohabitation, should be capable of dissolution subject to the discretion of the court, provided that the dissolution of the marriage shall not be unduly harsh or unjust.

2. Disappearance and Presumption of Death

There are circumstances where a marriage is destroyed through the disappearance of one of the spouses who leaves no proof behind of conscious desertion, or any other matrimonial offence such as adultery and cruelty, and whose absence would make it difficult to proceed under the separation ground. In such a situation, cohabitation is at an end and the marriage has ceased to exist, but at present the other spouse has no remedy.

Your Committee believes that the present situation, whereby a spouse who has reason to believe that their partner is dead, can remarry only at his or her peril, should be ended. While presumption of death is sufficient to protect the partner who remarries from a charge of bigamy should the missing spouse eventually reappear, it does not protect the second marriage. This becomes a nullity and any children of it illegitimate. Your Committee, therefore, believes that legislation should be introduced permitting the courts to decree a dissolution of marriage if there are reasonable grounds for assuming that the petitioner's spouse is dead.

3. Non-Consummation

Wilful refusal to consummate a marriage is ground for annulment in England (it was introduced by the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1937) but not in Canada. (Power, On Divorce, p. 194) In those provinces in which the law in force is that of England as of 1870, to be a ground for annulment the non-consummation of the marriage must be because of some physical or mental defect which renders coitus impossible. Experience has shown this limitation to be so restrictive as to prevent relief in cases where the purpose of the marriage is frustrated by the abnormal behaviour of one of spouses.

A better approach to the problem of non-consummation is with respect to the effect of the non-consummation on the marriage, one of the basic purposes of which is the procreation of children. Were relief granted on the ground of marriage breakdown resulting from non-consummation, the reason for the non-consummation would be of secondary importance, and would include voluntary refusal over a protracted period as well as physical or mental inability.

The introduction of wilful refusal to consummate as a ground for divorce has been suggested by the Canadian Bar Association, the Benchers of the Law Society of British Columbia and the York County Law Association. The suggestion is logical since a decree of nullity is granted for some defect of incapacity existing at the time of the marriage ceremony, whereas divorces are granted for conditions that arise after the ceremony. Wilful refusal to consummate occurs after the wedding has taken place. In Australian Law this distinction has been made. The Australian Matrimonial Causes Act of 1959 provides for divorce on the ground of wilful refusal to consummate, while retaining impotence as a ground for annulment. In New Zealand, however, the Matrimonial Proceedings Act, 1965, follows the English practice and allows wilful refusal as a ground for annulment.

The actual designation, whether divorce or nullity, may be of secondary importance, and were relief given on the ground of marriage breakdown by reason of non-consummation rather than directly on the non-consummation itself, the proceedings would clearly fall within divorce and not nullity.

Your Committee, therefore, is of opinion that marriage breakdown by reason of non-consummation either wilfully over a protracted period or because of some physical or mental disability rendering coitus impossible, should be made a ground for divorce, subject to the discretion of the court and the absence of any substantial prospect of resumption of cohabitation within a reasonable period of time. However, the above shall not preclude an immediate dissolution of marriage by way of nullity on the grounds of non-consummation by reason of impotence on the petition of one of the spouses. It is, therefore, recommended that in addition to the new ground for divorce, the right to petition for nullity on the ground of impotence, as it exists at present, shall remain.

PART IV

PROCEDURE AND JURISDICTION

I DOMICILE

This has been fully discussed in Part I. No further comment is required.

II BARS TO DIVORCE

1. Condonation

Your Committee has been widely urged to make condonation a discretionary instead of an absolute bar to divorce. Although condonation has received no statutory definition and derives from the common law, it is a statutory bar to divorce in Canada. (Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, section 30; R.S.C. 1952, c 176, section 5). The purpose of the bar of condonation is clear. It is to prevent a spouse who agrees to resume cohabitation with a partner who has committed a matrimonial offence, from holding that offence over the other's head for ever afterwards. A resumption of cohabitation, which is an outward sign of forgiveness, is held to seal off the past. It would hardly augur well for the success of a marriage, if the atmosphere was potentially poisoned by the ability of one spouse to hold a former offence over the other's head and threaten divorce on it at some later date.

The condoned offence, however, is subject to subsequent revival, if the former erring spouse commits another matrimonial offence. Such an offence does not have to be of so serious a nature as the original one which as the law now stands would have been adultery (except in Nova Scotia). Cruelty or desertion can revive former acts of adultery. In this sense, condonation does not constitute absolute forgiveness, but rather conditional forgiveness on the understanding that the guilty spouse behaves correctly thereafter.

While the purpose of the bar is understandable, its existence as an absolute bar, does severely restrict the freedom of parties seeking a divorce. One spouse, particularly a wife, may very well condone an act of adultery in order to save the marriage and avoid the pain and heartbreak of family disintegration. If, however, the gesture proves futile and the marriage is not saved, the ground for a divorce action is lost. Thus an absurd paradox exists; if a couple attempt to save their marriage and fail, thereby proving its death, they cannot get a divorce, whereas, if they make no attempt at reconciliation, the marriage can be dissolved. Thus the real evil stemming from condonation as an absolute bar is that it directly discourages reconciliation. Consequently a law which has as its avowed purpose the preservation of the stability of marriage, actively mitigates against its professed object. For this reason the Canadian Bar Association, the Seventh Day Adventist Church, the United Church of Canada, the Canadian Committee on the Status of Women, and other witnesses, have urged that condonation be made a discretionary bar to divorce. Thus the court could take into consideration all the factors involved in the situation in deciding whether to reject the petition.

An alternative solution would be the one adopted in the United Kingdom, as well as in Australia, whereby condonation remains an absolute bar to divorce but a period of cohabitation for a period of not more than three months, which has reconciliation as its primary purpose, is not deemed condonation.

The English Act also provides that acts of adultery which have been condoned can never be revived at law regardless of the circumstances. This is a logical provision, if attempted reconciliation is no longer considered condonation. For should the reconciliation fail, the divorce may proceed and the doctrine of revival becomes quite unnecessary. If the reconciliation succeeds, then it is better that the couple put the past completely behind them. The forgiven partners know that their former lapses are finished with and cannot later be held against them. A marriage can thus make a fresh start with nothing, in a legal sense at least, hanging over it.

The English solution to this problem has one clear advantage. An attempted reconciliation does not raise a bar, whereas, if the bar were merely made discretionary, there might be some doubt as to the circumstances in which the courts might seek to apply it. However, if cohabitation for the purpose of reconciliation is not deemed condonation, this doubt would be resolved.

2. Collusion

Collusion is presently an absolute bar to divorce in Canada. Although collusion derives from the common law, it has been explicitly made an absolute bar to divorce by statute. (Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, c. 85, sections 30 & 31; Marriage and Divorce Act, R.S.C. 1952, c 176, section 5.) Unfortunately, there has been neither a statutory comprehensive judicial definition of collusion and there is considerable confusion not only in the mind of the public but even among lawyers as to what exactly collusion is.

As a result of this uncertainty, lawyers tend to keep their clients at arm's length from their spouses, lest any negotiations made between the parties to a divorce, or any agreement reached by them, be held as collusive and the action be lost. This is most undesirable. It not only hinders possible reconciliation, but actually discourages it. Prior agreements or maintenance, custody and distribution of matrimonial property are similarly discouraged.

The general principles underlying the doctrine of collusion are clear enough. Collusion is a corrupt bargain to deceive the court either by fabricating evidence suppressing a valid defence, or bribing the petitioner respondent or co-respondent. The intent is clearly to prevent deliberate attempts to pervert the course of justice by misleading the court. However, the actual application of this general principle to particular cases has tended to be somewhat erratic and on appeal the verdicts have seldom been unanimous. This is especially so in "good cases", that is where the adultery alleged did actually take place. One spouse may voluntarily provide the evidence the other needs; this may not be collusion. Nor is it necessarily collusive for a husband to make financial arrangements for his wife in the interim before the divorce proceedings or for the parties to agree on the amount of maintenance to be paid afterwards. However, in drawing up agreements particularly if they deal with who shall pay for the action, lawyers may be verging on dangerous ground, especially in some provinces. For one spouse to invite the other to proceed or to facilitate the divorce by providing evidence and/or to offer to pay the expenses of the action has been held collusive in some cases but not in others. The courts do not seem to have drawn the line with any clarity or consistency, and it is a clear line that can be reached, but not transgressed, that lawyers need in advising their clients.

Witnesses before your Committee have urged that the present law be changed to make collusion a discretionary bar, so that if doubts arise as to the actions of the parties, or one of them, but without a clear intention to defraud the court, the court may use its discretion and grant the dissolution. By this means, it is hoped that a husband and wife could come to some reasonable agreement regarding the financial provisions to be made both before and after the divorce, for the care and custody of the children, the maintenance of the wife and the division of the family property. Only in cases where the parties actually conspired to withhold a just defence or put forward a false case would the bar of collusion be applied.

The basic problem in recommending this solution, is the attitudes of the courts. If there is uncertainty now as to what the court will hold as collusive, there will no doubt also be uncertainty as to the circumstances in which the court will exercise its discretion. If it is possible to establish the circumstances in which collusion will operate as an absolute bar and those in which it will not, it ought to be equally possible to define what collusion is. A definition of collusion would be far more desirable and render the law far more certain than the introduction of another element of uncertainty, a discretionary bar, into an already uncertain field.

The Proposals of the English Royal Commission on Marriage and Divorce, 1951-55, are worth noting:

> "Collusion should be defined by statute on the basis of the following considerations:
>
> (i) The spouses should be restrained from conspiring together to put forward a false case or withhold a just defence, and
> (ii) divorce should not be available if one spouse has been bribed by the other spouse to take divorce proceedings or has exacted a price from him or her for so doing.
> "In addition, it should be provided by statute that it should not amount to collusion if reasonable arrangements are arrived at between husband and wife, before the hearing of the suit, about financial provision for one spouse and the children, the division of the matrimonial home, and its contents, the custody of, and access to, the children, and costs. It should be the duty of the petitioner to disclose any such arrangements to the court at the hearing and the parties should be able to apply to the court before or after the presentation of the petition for its opinion on the reasonableness of any contemplated arrangements." (Cmnd. 9678, p. 312)

This last provision was introduced in England by the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1963.

III JUDICIAL SEPARATION

Judicial separations may be granted by the courts of every Province in Canada with the exception of Ontario. The Divorce Act (Ontario) of 1930 which authorized the courts of Ontario to grant dissolutions of marriage omitted to grant specifically the power to decree judicial separations. The courts of Ontario have consequently held that they do not possess this authority.

Judicial separation is a useful device, although it is tending to fall somewhat into disuse. Its utility lies in the fact that it gives legal status to a separation and the sanction of the courts to any arrangements that are made for the maintenance of the wife and the maintenance and custody of the children, and similar matters. For those couples who wish to live apart without actually dissolving their marriages, it provides a convenient arrangement. It is especially useful where one or both of the spouses are opposed to divorce for religious reasons.

At present, if a couple in Ontario decide to separate but not seek a divorce, they may make a separation agreement with regard to such matters as alimony, the disposal and assignment of their property and the custody and maintenance of the children. However, problems arise when a couple cannot agree on the terms of the agreement, or if one partner does not wish to terminate cohabitation. In every other Province of the country, in such circumstances, the matter can be brought before the courts by a petition for judicial separation. In Ontario, however, there is no clear remedy for this problem.

Consequently, your Committee feels that it would be in keeping with the desire for the uniformity of law throughout Canada, as well as in the interests of the inhabitants of Ontario, if the courts of the Province were authorized to grant judicial separations. Since the grounds for judicial separation are virtually uniform in the eight common law Provinces other than Ontario, and based on the English Act of 1857, Ontario should be given the power to grant judicial separations according to the Law of England as it existed on July 15, 1870.

IV COURT JURISDICTION

1. Jurisdiction

It is the practice in those Provinces where dissolutions of marriage are granted for jurisdiction to be exercised by the Superior Courts. This practice has obvious disadvantages. The procedure of the Superior Courts is costly and involved, and these courts, burdened with cases of a more weighty character, tend to dispose of their long lists of divorce cases as quickly as possible and in a perfunctory manner. The Superior Courts lack the assistance of social workers and counsellors such as Family and Juvenile Courts possess. Most people are unfamiliar with their procedure and atmosphere, which, while dignified, is not conductive to the therapeutic or conciliatory approach to marital problems. Even more important, the judges of the Superior Courts are often remote from the parties to the action and their circumstances, especially where the divorce actions are heard at Assizes by a visiting judge.

Nor should it be overlooked that family and matrimonial proceedings are often continuing affairs. The marriage may be dissolved, but matters arising from the dissolution, maintenance and custody of children, division of marital property, rights of visitation and the like, may still have to be dealt with from time to time. This may involve a trip to the provincial capital to reach the judge who made the original order, or a long delay until next Assize, when a different judge, quite unfamilar with the circumstances, may be sitting. The Honourable James McRuer, former Chief Justice of Ontario, demonstrated decisively the problems that face Superior Court judges in dealing with matrimonial causes.

To overcome these difficulties it has been suggested to your Committee by the Pastoral Institute of the United Church, that a special domestic proceeding court be established to deal with all matters, both civil and criminal, in which the parties are, or were, married to each other and with jurisdiction over divorce, separation, nullity, restitution of conjugal rights, presumption of death, custody, adoption, affiliation, wardship, maintenance and alimony, consent to marriage, school attendance, and crimes where one of the parties injured is married to the accused. Such a wide and sweeping reorganization of the court structure of the nation is beyond the terms of reference of your Committee. It would require, in any case, far more study than your Committee could give to it.

As a practical solution to the problem there seems to be two alternatives open for consideration. One is the transfer of the jurisdiction to the Family Courts, the other is to give jurisdiction to the County Courts concurrently with the Supreme Court.

The Family Court, at first glance, would seem to be the obvious place to deal with divorce and other matrimonial causes. The case for this was most ably argued by Judge P. J. T. O Hearn of Nova Scotia. He pointed out that Family Courts deal with questions every bit as important as divorce and of equal difficulty, Juvenile offences, neglect of children, maintenance and wardship are all such questions. The basic problems in divorce cases are seldom purely legal. These are the questions dealing with the state of the marriage and the provisions to be made after its dissolution. The Superior Courts have none of the auxiliary help that Family Courts enjoy in the way of social workers, personnel trained in family matters, and ready access to welfare and similar agencies. Such services are essential to a proper disposal of a divorce action, and it would be far better to give divorce to the Family Courts than to risk the confusion that would be created by trying to apply Family Court techniques in the Superior Courts.

The basic argument against vesting jurisdiction in the Family Courts is a practical one. Not every province has an established system of Family Courts that are qualified to deal with divorce cases. Some Family Courts may be competent, but your Committee believes that, at present, such courts are in a minority. In the future, as the Family Courts develop, the problem may be worthy of further consideration, but at present your Committee is opposed to jurisdiction in divorce matters being given to Family Courts.

It would seem a far better solution to vest in the County Courts concurrent jurisdiction with the Supreme Courts. These courts have advantages over the Superior Courts for the disposal of local divorce cases. Their procedure is less involved and consequently less costly. County Court judges are resident in County towns and their local offices and officials are readily available at all times. The judges can be easily reached when an order needs to be explained or varied and when additional provisions are required. Furthermore, County Court judges are more familiar with the local circumstances and situation, as well as being more accessible, and consequently are in a better position to make helpful judgments.

Your Committee believes that the County Courts should receive concurrent, not exclusive, jurisdiction. The right to proceed in the Superior Courts should be retained for those who wish to use it. In some cases, which hinge particularly on legal questions, the Superior Court provides the better forum. Nevertheless, your Committee believes that divorce petitioners should be allowed the advantages of trial in the County Courts, not the least being in speed and cost, and readiness and continuity of access.

2. Provisions Regarding Children

Closely related to the question of the forum in which divorce cases are determined, is the scope of the hearing. Many witnesses have urged that all matters pertaining to a divorce be disposed of at the same time and in the same hearing. It must be realized that in granting a divorce, the courts are not merely dissolving a marriage but are also often dissolving a family as well. The first duty of the court must be to see that the members of the family do not suffer from the rupture of family life more than is necessary. The Court must be satisfied that proper arrangements have been made first for the custody, maintenance and welfare of the children, and then that the provisions made for the maintenance of the wife, if applicable, are appropriate. These matters are all within federal jurisdiction, as ancillary to divorce, and Parliament should provide that all these matters should be dealt with at the same time.

If these matters are dealt with together at the same hearing, the overall situation can be kept in view. Furthermore, the withholding of a decree until suitable arrangements have been made provides a strong incentive on the part of the petitioner to be cooperative. To deal with various ancillary matters in different courts at different times, not only increases the complexity and expense of divorce actions, but prevents an overall view being taken by each court. In such a piecemeal approach, the children are apt to suffer.

Your Committee, therefore, believes that no divorce should be granted until arrangements have been made for the care and upbringing of all minor children, and that such arrangements are satisfactory or are the best that can be devised in the circumstances. This would be to follow existing British practice. All minor children should be taken to mean all children in the family whether they are the offspring of the couple before the court or only of one of them by a former union, or of the family by adoption.

V RECONCILIATION AND MARRIAGE COUNSELLING

While it is your Committee's opinion that a broadening of the grounds for divorce would not undermine the stability of marriage as an institution, it does believe that legislation seeking to rationalize the dissolution of marriage should not overlook the fact that dissolution is only the ultimate solution to a broken marriage and that an alternative is to try to mend it. Many witnesses before your Committee have stressed the desirability of an established reconciliation procedure to save as many marriages as possible. Some witnesses have urged that reconciliation attempts should be mandatory before divorce petitions are permitted to proceed. This has been suggested by the United Church of Canada, together with such organizations as the Catholic Women's League of Canada. Others have urged mandatory conciliation and counselling in certain cases and there has been considerable support for the establishment of marriage counselling services as adjuncts to the courts. Most witnesses would be satisfied, nevertheless, if provision were made for counselling and reconciliation procedure in those cases where it might prove beneficial.

Two separate issues are really involved here: Firstly, the provisions of the actual law itself regarding reconciliation procedure, and secondly, the far wider implications of how much active interest the institutions of government should take in marriage guidance and counselling services.

To take up the first question, there is no doubt, that the law as it stands at the moment, does little to promote the reconciliation of couples contemplating divorce, and some of the provisions actually tend to discourage it. The existence of the absolute bars to divorce of collusion and condonation tend to keep the parties at arm's length. The law should be changed to ensure that any efforts a couple may make to save their marriage should not be held against them if they are unsuccessful in the attempt. In both the United Kingdon and in Australia, to cite but two examples, this problem has been recognized, and steps taken to obviate the difficulties. These provisions have been made to ensure that cohabitation for a limited period of time with reconciliation as its objective should not be considered as condonation and that reasonable negotiation between the parties should not be held as collusive. Such reforms are clearly necessary in Canada. (See section on Condonation and Collusion).

More can be done, however, than simply removing the legal obstacles to reconciliation. Steps can be taken to actively promote it. However, this is no simple task. Compulsory reconciliation procedure is not the answer. There are numerous objections to such a step. In the first place, it must be realized that in the vast majority of cases, once the case has reached the divorce courts, the time for reconciliation in most cases has passed. Couples do not lightly rush into divorce actions without making sincere and strenuous attempts to save their marriages. Therefore, in the great majority of cases, compulsory reconciliation would be futile.

In any case, marriage counselling is not a task just any person can do; it requires considerable training and skill and the number of persons so qualified is limited in Canada today. Counselling services would be swamped and in the vast majority of cases, their counsellors would be wasting time and talents that would be better spent trying to save those marriages that were salvageable. Compulsory marriage counselling is not a practical proposition.

Nevertheless, not all cases that reach divorce courts are lost causes. The practice followed in Australia, and other jurisdictions, of giving the judge the authority to adjourn the proceedings in order for reconciliation to be attempted, if from the evidence before him it seems warranted, certainly has a great deal to commend it. It might even be desirable to empower the judge to direct a couple, in such a case, to take marriage counselling, if he has reason to believe there might be a reasonable chance of its succeeding.

However, while the introduction of such provisions into the law might be desirable, it would be a mistake to expect too much from them. The experience in Australia, and some other jurisdictions, would lead one to believe that such powers tend to be exercised infrequently.

There are other steps that could be taken which might have some effect. The Australian practice of requiring lawyers to bring marriage counselling services to the attention of their clients and to explore the possibilities of reconciliation with them, before they can proceed with the action, is an interesting experiment. However, it is to be hoped that conscientious lawyers would do this without official urging. The unconscientious lawyer could easily turn this into a mere formality, were it to be required. It is doubtful, if at present, there are adequate marriage counselling services available to which clients could be referred.

More helpful perhaps would be to adopt another Australian practice which protects marriage counsellors from being compelled to reveal in court the information they discover in the course of their professional activities. This certainly would render their work more effective and enable married couples to deal in complete frankness with counsellors without fear of what they disclosed being later used against them in a divorce action. The Scarman Commission indicated that there was unease in English marriage counselling circles about lack of such protection in the existing English law, which is the same as the Canadian in this respect.

One fundamental obstacle to the introduction of elaborate reconciliation machinery as adjuncts to the divorce courts, is the sheer lack of personnel. Until there are ample numbers of trained people, any discussion of the desirability of such facilities must be academic.

It is not within the reference of your Committee to explore fully and make recommendations in these matters, and it has not done so. Nevertheless, your Committee believes it relevant to observe that both the federal and the provincial governments should examine what can be done to promote the growth and development of marriage guidance services and the training of personnel in this field of social work. Your Committee has been told that there are at present only two institutions in Canada especially organized for the training of professional marriage counsellors and that there is need for the establishment of professional standards as well as more training programmes. The Australian government, for example, has already undertaken financial assistance to marriage guidance organizations and encouraged the development of training programmes, all with beneficial results. If society is serious in its belief in the stability of marriage and the preservation of this institution, it should consider what positive steps can be taken to assist those whose marriages are in difficulties.

PART V

In a Report to Parliament on a subject so important as divorce, clarity is essential. This is particularly so in the present instance because of the many facets of the subject and the fact that the substantive law has remained almost unaltered for so many years while public opinion with regard to the matters involved has been constantly changing. One of the best methods of promoting definiteness and clarity of thought is to state proposals in legal form such as one might find in an Act of Parliament.

With this desire for definiteness and clarity in mind, and in an effort to be helpful, your Committee has restated its proposals in the form of a draft Bill which it sets forth below.

Some explanation of the draft Bill is required. It is assumed that it is unnecessary and also undesirable to restate the present law as to divorce on the ground of adultery. No objection has been taken to the present substantive law in that regard by any of the informed witnesses who have addressed your Committee. They have urged an extension of the grounds, not an alteration or reform of grounds as at present in force.

The draft Bill accordingly deals only with the grounds recommended in the Report which are in addition to any ground upon which a marriage may now be dissolved. This general policy of non-interference with the law as it now exists has been carried through in the draft Bill. For instance, the matter of non-consummation of marriage on account of physical or mental defect is unaffected and the draft Bill deals only with wilful refusal to consummate.

The Bill is in three divisions. Part I deals with marital offences, in addition to the existing ground of adultery, such as desertion, cruelty, bigamy, non-support, and wilful non-consummation, followed by such stipulations as are necessary.

Part II defines marriage breakdown and provides for dissolution when the separation is caused by mental or physical illness, alcoholism or drug addiction, imprisonment, disappearance or other cause. These are circumstances in which the marriage has completely failed but in which there is no apparent wilful fault on the part of one of the spouses. The enumeration is followed by the necessary stipulations.

Part III is headed "General" and takes care of such matters as giving co-ordinate jurisdiction to the County or District Courts, domicile and the right of access to the courts of women deserted by their husbands, the granting of relief in matters ancillary to divorce such as maintenance and the custody and care of children, condonation, collusion, amendments to the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act, rules of court and the coming into force of the proposed Act.

Your Committee trusts that this statement of its recommendations in legal form will prove useful and will be substantially carried out.

In conclusion, your Committee gratefully acknowledges the valuable assistance given it by Mr. E. R. Hopkins, the Senate's most competent Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel, in the preparation of the draft Bill which appears in the following pages. Mr. Hopkins has given freely of his profesional ability and legal knowledge and experience and his advice has been sought on many occasions. He has made a major contribution to the production of this Report.

2nd Session, 27th Parliament, 16 Elizabeth II, 1967.

An Act to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief, and to provide for related matters.

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

Short title.

1. This Act may be cited as the Divorce (Extension of Grounds) Act, 1967.

PART I.

Matrimonial Offences.

Grounds added.

2. (1) Subject to section 9, in any court having jurisdiction to dissolve marriages, any husband or wife may commence an action praying that the marriage be dissolved, on the following grounds, in addition to any ground upon which the marriage may now be dissolved; namely, that the respondent

"Desertion."

(a) has deserted the petitioner without cause for a period of at least three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition;

"Cruelty."

(b) has, since the celebration of the marriage, treated the petitioner with cruelty;

"Bigamous marriage."

(c) has, since the celebration of the marriage, gone through a form of marriage with another person;

"Wilful refusal to consummate."

(d) has wilfully refused to consummate the marriage for a period of at least one year immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

(2) Where the ground of the petition is desertion

(a) before pronouncing a decree of dissolution, the court must be satisfied that there is no prospect of resumption of cohabitation within a reasonable time, and Qualification.

(b) any period of resumption of cohabitation not exceeding three months, for the primary purpose of reconciliation, shall be excluded from the calculation of the three-year period of desertion mentioned in subsection (1).

"Wilful non-support."

3. (1) Subject to section 9, in any court having jurisdiction to dissolve marriages, a wife may commence an action praying that the marriage be dissolved on the ground that her husband, for a period of at least one year immediately preceding the presentation of the petition, has wilfully and without lawful excuse refused or neglected to support the petitioner, the children of the marriage or any child to whom either party stands in loco parentis.

Qualification.

(2) The court may pronounce a decree of dissolution on the ground mentioned in subsection (1), but shall not do so unless it is satisfied, having regard to all the circumstances, including the degree of fault on the part of the husband and the effect of his refusal or neglect on his wife or dependent children, that the decree should be pronounced.

Duty of court.

4. If the court is satisfied by the evidence that the case of the petitioner has been proved on any of the grounds added by sections 2 or 3 and, where the ground of the petition is cruelty, the petitioner has not in any manner condoned the cruelty, and that the petition is not presented or prosecuted in collusion with the respondent, the court shall pronounce a decree of dissolution, but if the court is not satisfied with respect to any of the aforesaid matters, it shall dismiss the petition: Provided that the court shall not be bound to pronounce a decree of dissolution and may dismiss the petition if it finds that the petitioner has during the marriage been guilty of adultery, or if, in the opinion of the court, the petitioner has been guilty

Proviso.

(a) of unreasonable delay in presenting or prosecuting the petition; or

(b) of cruelty towards the other party to the marriage; or

(c) where the ground of the petition is desertion or non-support, of such wilful neglect or misconduct as has contributed to the desertion or non-support.

PART II

Marriage Breakdown.

"Marriage breakdown" defined.

5. For the purposes of this Part a marriage has completely broken down if the parties are living separate and apart and if, in the opinion of the court, there is no prospect that they will resume cohabitation within a reasonable time.

"Marriage breakdown" when a ground.

6. Subject to section 9, in any court having jurisdiction to dissolve marriages, a husband or wife may commence an action praying that the marriage be dissolved on the ground that it has completely broken down for any of the following causes; namely, that the respondent

"Protracted illness." (a) has suffered from mental or physical illness for a period of at least three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition during which the parties have not cohabited and in respect of which there is no reasonable prospect of recovery or resumption of cohabitation;

"Addiction." (b) has been grossly addicted to alcohol, narcotics or drugs restricted by statute, for a period of at least three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition and there is no reasonable prospect of the respondent's recovery;

"Long imprisonment." (c) has served a term of imprisonment for at least three years, or several such terms totalling at least three years in the five-year period immediately preceding the presentation of the petition;

"Disappearance." (d) has been absent from the petitioner for a period of at least three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition, during which period the petitioner, having made reasonable efforts to acquire such knowledge, has had no knowledge, direct or indirect, of or from the respondent.

"Separation." (e) has been living separate and apart from the petitioner, for any cause other than those mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (d), for a period of at least three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

Duty of court. 7. (1) Where the ground of the petition is marriage breakdown, the court may, if it is satisfied that the facts are as alleged, pronounce a decree of dissolution, but shall do so only if it is satisfied that

(a) every reasonable effort has been made by the petitioner to remove or alleviate the cause of the breakdown and to effect a reconciliation of the parties and a resumption of cohabitation;

(b) where the cause is as mentioned in paragraph (a) or (e) of section 6, due provision has been made for the future maintenance of the respondent, and where the ground is marriage breakdown for whatever cause, for the maintenance, custody, care and education of any children of the marriage or to whom either party stands in loco parentis, and for access to such children;

(c) no public interest would be thereby adversely affected; and

(d) the pronouncement of the decree would not work an undue hardship on the respondent.

(2) In the course of any hearing held pursuant to this Part, the court may, having regard to the available facilities and the prospects for succeeding therein, adjourn the proceedings from time to time, as it sees fit, for the purpose of attempting to remove or alleviate the cause of the breakdown and to reconcile the parties.

PART III

General.

Jurisdiction of County and District Courts.

8. In any province with courts having jurisdiction to dissolve marriages, the County or District Courts shall have jurisdiction, equally and concurrently with the Superior Court therein, to dissolve marriages and to provide ancillary relief, on any existing ground or on any ground added by this Act: Provided that, on the application of any party thereto, an action for dissolution commenced in a County or District Court shall be transferred to the Superior Court, and provided further that any ancillary relief granted by the Superior Court coincidentally with a pronouncement of dissolution may be enforced, and may be varied from time to time as circumstances may require, by the County or District Court in the county or district in which the petitioner resides.

Provisos.

Residence as a basis for jurisdiction.

9. (1) A husband or wife domiciled in Canada may insitute proceedings praying for the dissolution or annulment of the marriage, and for ancillary relief, in any province with a court having jurisdiction to provide such relief, if the petitioner or the respondent has resided continuously in that province for a period of at least one year immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

"Canadian domicile" defined.

(2) For the purposes of this section

(a) a husband has Canadian domicile if he is domiciled, in accordance with the existing rules of private international law, in any province of Canada; and

(b) a wife has Canadian domicile if she would, if unmarried, be domiciled, in accordance with the existing rules of private international law, in any province of Canada.

(3) The court has jurisdiction to grant the relief sought by a petition presented pursuant to subsection (1).

Repeal.

(4) The Divorce Jurisdiction Act, chapter 84 of the Revised Statutes of 1952, is repealed.

Ancillary relief.

10. The Court, in entertaining a petition for the dissolution of a marriage on any ground added by this Act, may, coincidentally with the pronouncement of a decree of dissolution, grant such ancillary relief, relating to the maintenance of the respondent, to the maintenance, custody, care and education of any children of the marriage or to whom either party stands in loco parentis, for access to such children, or for the division of property, as a Superior Court may now grant in respect of a petition for dissolution on an existing ground.

Bars to divorce.

11. Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act or in any other Act, for the purpose of any petition for dissolution on the ground of a matrimonial offence

"Condonation"

(a) the resumption of cohabitation for any period of not more than three months, with reconciliation as its primary object, shall not be deemed to be a condonation of the matrimonial offence, subject to the discretion of the court;

(b) a matrimonial offence, once condoned, shall not be capable of being revived;

"Collusion"

(c) "collusion" is defined as a corrupt agreement or conspiracy, to which the petitioner or the respondent is party, to effect an illegal or improper purpose, such as the bribery of a respondent or co-respondent not to defend the action or appear as a witness; to perform an illegal or improper act in order to furnish evidence or pretend to do so or to give false evidence, or to fabricate or suppress evidence in a manner calculated to deceive the court or to deprive it of an opportunity to learn the truth, and an agreement such as for the reasonable support and maintenance of a husband, wife or children shall not be deemed to be collusion;

"Connivance"

(d) where the matrimonial offence complained of is adultery, connivance thereat shall be deemed to be a discretionary, rather than an absolute, bar to the pronouncement of a decree of dissolution.

R.S., 1952, c. 85. Judicial separation in Ontario.

12. Section 2 of chapter 85 of the Revised Statutes of 1952, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"2. The law of England as to the dissolution of marriage and as to the annulment of marriage, and as to judicial separation, as the law existed on the 15th day of July, 1870, in so far as it can be made to apply in the Province of Ontario, and in so far as it has not been repealed, as to the Province, by any Act of the Parliament of Canada or by this Act, and as altered, varied, modified or affected, as to the Province by any such Act, is in force in the Province of Ontario."

13. Sections 2 and 3 of the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act, and the headings thereto and therein, are repealed, and the following substituted therefor:

"Marriage Dissolved or Annulled.

1963, c. 10.

2. (1) The Senate of Canada may, on the petition of either party to a marriage, by resolution declare that the marriage is dissolved or annulled, as the case may be, and may coincidentally therewith make such ancillary orders, hereinafter called "ancillary relief", as it considers just concerning the maintenance of the respondent, the maintenance, custody, care and education of any children of the marriage or to whom either party stands in loco parentis, and access to such children, and immediately on the adoption of the resolution by the Senate the marriage is dissolved and annulled, as the case may be, and shall be null and void, and thereafter either party may marry any person whom he or she might lawfully marry if the said marriage had not been solemnized.

(2) The Senate shall adopt a resolution for the dissolution or annulment of a marriage only upon referring the petition therefor to an officer of the Senate, designated by the Speaker of the Senate, who shall hear evidence, and report and make recommendations thereon, including any recommendations for ancillary relief, but such officer shall not recommend that a marriage be dissolved or annulled, as the case may be, except on a ground on which a marriage could be dissolved or annulled, as the case may be, under the laws of England as they existed on the 15th day of July, 1870, or under the Marriage and Divorce Act, chapter 176 of the Revised Statutes of 1952, or on any ground added by the Divorce (Extension of Grounds) Act, 1967.

(3) In any uncontested case, the Commissioner shall report his recommendations to the Senate's Standing Committee on Divorce, together with such facts and findings as may be required in each instance by the Committee or the Chairmen thereof and the Committee may recommend the passage of a resolution in accordance with the Commissioner's recommendation and on the authority thereof, or may take such other action as to it seems just.

Notification of Parties.

(4) Following the hearing of each contested case the Commissioner shall deliver personally or by registered mail to the parties or their respective legal representatives of record a copy of his report and recommendation and on the expiration of thirty days thereafter such report and recommendation may be taken into consideration by the Standing Committee of the Senate on Divorce.

Provision for Appeal.

3. (1) During the said thirty days, any of the parties to such contested case may give notice of appeal against the recommendation of the Commissioner to the Standing Committee of the Senate on Divorce, which shall hear the appeal on the evidence already submitted, together with arguments and representations of the parties or their legal representatives.

(2) If no such appeal is lodged within the said thirty days, the said Standing Committee may recommend the passage of a resolution in accordance with the Commissioner's recommendation and on the authority thereof, or may take such other action as to it seems just.

(3) If an appeal is lodged with the said Standing Committee within the said thirty days, the Committee shall hear the appeal on the evidence already presented, together with the arguments and representations of the parties or their legal representatives, and may approve the Commissioner's recommendation or may vary and amend it as to the Committee seems just, and may recommend to the Senate accordingly."

Rules of court.

14. The Court may make such rules of court as it may deem desirable or expedient for the exercise and application of the jurisdiction conferred by this Act.

Coming into force.

15. This Act or any Part or section thereof, shall come into force on a day or days to be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council.

All which is respectfully submitted.

A. W. ROEBUCK,
Joint Chairman.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 28, 1967

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-135, to establish the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Donald Smith, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, I consider it an honour to have been chosen by the Leader of the Government in the Senate to present this bill to you in the form of a statement on second reading. There are some reasons why it pleases me. One is that all my adult life I have been very closely associated and friendly with the people who come from the Island of Cape Breton. That association started with my high school days and has continued to the present time. One of my best friends, who is in the medical profession in my own town, is a Cape Bretoner whose family for generations before him worked in the mines of Cape Breton Island.

Therefore, over the years I have acquired a deep interest in Cape Breton Island in a personal way as well as my interest from the standpoint of the economic well-being of the people there. I have even attempted to speak previously on the coal problem in this house, and I was spurred by the conditions which affected my province in general and because of my interest in the Cape Bretoners.

Honourable senators, I realize it would have been more appropriate if the privilege of explaining this bill had been extended to a senator from Cape Breton. In the normal course of events, I have no doubt that our colleague Senator Urquhart, who has lived in Cape Breton all his life, would have been the logical person to have presented the bill. As we all know, Senator Urquhart has been ill for some little time. He had a serious surgical operation, followed by rather severe complications, which has kept him in the Victoria General Hospital in Halifax for over a month. You will be interested to learn that a recent note from him to some of his colleagues from Nova Scotia indicates that he is now on the road to recovery, and we expect to welcome him back in full health in the fall.

As a great many of the members of the Senate know, the difficulties of the coal mining industry in Nova Scotia are very long-standing. We also know, particularly those of us who peruse the Estimates, that financial assistance to the industry in the form of subventions, making it possible to continue to market coal both inside and outside the Atlantic region, as well as in the form of financing the mechanization of the mines, has been extended over a period of many years.

With respect to the financial implications of this assistance, I have learned that during the 37 years of providing assistance towards the movement of coal to markets, the industry has received more than $200 million in subvention payments. Now, these costs have spiralled during the last few years. For example, in 1957-58 the payments amounted to about $8 million. In 1964-65 they had risen to $17 million, and for this past year the total is expected to be in the order of $30 million. For the next year it is estimated, because of the anticipated lower coal production, that the total of the subvention payments will be about $27 million.

It presently requires a subsidy of from $8 to $9.50 per ton to move coal to markets in Quebec and Ontario. And even to move coal to markets in the Atlantic provinces the subsidy required averages over $6.50 per ton, and this latter market, by the way, is for 2,000,000 tons.

The extent of the federal assistance to the industry in the past becomes, I think, rather dramatically obvious and understandable when I tell you that today the total of subvention payments amounts to more than $4,000 annually per coal miner in the Province of Nova Scotia, and since the average wage per day in 1956 was about $17, the subsidy of $4,000 per miner comprises the major part of the average annual income of the Nova Scotian coal miner, which is something in the order of $4,500.

In 1950 both the company and the federal Government, accepting the recommendation of the Carroll Royal Commission on Coal, made a serious attempt to modernize coal production methods. With the aid of $7½ million from the federal Government the Dominion Steel and Coal Company embarked on an $18 million program of mechanization and rehabilitation. But despite this effort, difficulties continued which led to the 1960 Rand Royal Commission investigation. Deterioration of the situation continued, however, until it reached a point in 1965 when Dosco informed the federal Government of its intention to dispose of its coal interests and withdraw from coal mining completely in Nova Scotia. Abundant supplies of relatively low-cost oil had further undermined the long-term competitive position of coal as a source of energy, even in the Atlantic provinces. If the current offshore drilling program for oil and gas is successful, the coal situation will, of course, be further aggravated.

These, then, were the circumstances which led to the appointment of Mr. J. R. Donald to inquire into the whole situation and to make recommendations to the Government. The Donald Report was tabled in 1966, and since that time has been under study by all interested parties, and in particular by the federal Government and the Government of Nova Scotia.

By December 1966 the two governments were able to reach agreement on the basic points of policy to be followed. The formal agreement which was formally signed on June 13, 1967 is now a public document, and I believe it would be of interest to those of us who have a closer relationship to the problem to have the text of the agreement made available to them in a convenient form. At this point I would ask your permission to table a copy of the agreement signed by the Premier of Nova Scotia on behalf of the Nova Scotia Government and by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on behalf of the federal Government. At the same time I would ask your permission, since it is a document of more than two foolscap pages in length, to have it printed as an appendix to Hansard.

More recently these agreed policy points were incorporated in the legislative form we now have before us, an act to establish the Cape Breton Development Corporation. In bringing this bill forward, the federal Government recognizes that the approach should deal with the social and humanitarian factors of the coal problems of Cape Breton, with at least equal emphasis as is placed on those of an economic and financial nature because they are closely interrelated.

We are concerning ourselves in this legislation with the social and economic future of a work force of over 6,000 wage- and salary-earners and their dependents who are concentrated in a more or less urban area and whose families for generations have lived a coal miner's family life.

In that same area is the Sydney steel industry, presently beset with market difficulties making necessary very large reductions in the number of employees. The latest estimate I saw in the press was of the order of 1,200 laid off within recent weeks.

Also in that area, as a result of improvements in operating methods at the C.N.R. terminal at North Sydney—and I am sure our friend across the way, Senator John M. Macdonald, is most familiar with this problem—hundreds of jobs will be lost in a few years.

This combination of circumstances can be regarded as presenting economic and social problems beyond the capacity of the provincial Government to meet. By presenting this bill the federal Government is accepting the challenge of a difficult task, even though it is primarily the responsibility of the provincial Government.

It has now been accepted that even on a heavily subsidized basis the realistic working life of the Cape Breton coal mining industry, as we now know it and have known it for many years, cannot be more than about 15 years. Indeed, some of the mines have already reached the end of their economic operating life. Both levels of government have agreed that this period of 15 years should be used to prepare the foundations for a new Cape Breton economy, hopefully based on relatively high labour content industrial development. For both governments to do otherwise is to sit back and await the certain arrival of economic and social disaster. This indeed might very well have been the situation without the intervention of the federal Government in financing it. However, this bill makes it possible for the Government, through a crown corporation, to start right now to plan for the inevitable and, in the meantime, for the corporation to acquire and operate those mines which can be rendered viable through the application of capital investment at least for the duration of the phasing-out period.

Until the rationalization of the Cape Breton coal mining industry gets under way, subsidies will have to be continued. In time, however, with the phasing-out of some mines, there will be a substantial saving of subventions which can then be directed to other development needs in the area. At the present rate of subsidized coal production it is estimated that to continue these subventions for the 15-year period, without any interference in the present rate of production, would cost a total of over $400 million.

Honourable senators, I think that presents the problem in general to you, and I must confess I regard it as being in rather sketchy form. Perhaps there are some vacant areas that I have left, and I would hope that whoever might follow me would fill in a few of those areas. So, with that as a background, perhaps, I might turn to the bill and try to explain as briefly as I can a number of the parts of the bill which I consider would be the most useful to deal with.

The legislation setting up the Cape Breton Development Corporation provides for the appointment of a chairman and a president of the Corporation by the Governor in Council, after consultation with the Lieutenant Governor in Counciil of Nova Scotia. Of the five additional directors to be appointed by the Governor in Council, two shall be appointed on the recommendation of the Lieutenant Governor in Council of Nova Scotia. It is provided that the president will be the chief executive officer of the Corporation with the appropriate authority required, and of course his will be a full-time job.

I believe it is important to note that two divisions of the Corporation will be created. They will be the Coal Division, and what will be known as the Industrial Development Division. Each will be under the management of a vice-president of the Corporation who is to be appointed by the board on the recommendation of the president, to whom he will be responsible for his management functions.

I should like to proceed now with an explanation of the functions of the Coal Division. As I mentioned previously, the Corporation will be empowered to acquire the lands and personal property of the DOSCO coal companies in Cape Breton. The purchase may be by agreement with the former owner, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, or it may be by agreed arbitration or by expropriation.

In the case of expropriation proceedings, the compensation to be paid shall be determined by the Exchequer Court. But, there are some special ground rules provided for the guidance and direction of the Exchequer Court, should this particular expropriation proceeding be necessary. The amount of the award by the court shall be based on the fair market value, if any, of the property acquired. In establishing the fair market value of the property it shall be assumed that all subsidies, subventions, and other financial assistance were terminated on June 15, 1967. In other words, a mine that has not a subvention and that has no hope whatever of getting financial assistance again may not be worth anything. A great many people believe that much of this real estate has no real value, except to someone who can put a great deal of new investment into it. There shall be deducted from the amount of the compensation or the award any outstanding balance of principal and interest owed to the federal Government under the financing agreement of 1950. The amount in default is at present about $5 million.

The Corporation will be required to submit to the Governor in Council for approval an overall plan of an efficient coal mining operation. The plan shall incorporate the progressive reduction of coal production, and the phasing out of mines that are not economically viable. Such plans, however, shall have regard to the progress made in providing employment in other industries.

Authority is given to the Corporation to make pension arrangements for its own employees, and to continue pensions now being paid to former employees of the company by the provincial Government or by the company itself. There is provision in this bill for the payment of benefits to employees who have been laid off or retired at an earlier age than normal resulting from the reorganization and rehabilitation by the Corporation of coal mining. But, all such bylaws governing benefits and pensions made by the Corporation must be approved by the Treasury Board.

The financial provisions of the bill with respect to the Coal Division of the Corporation are of course important since they will be a direct and a substantial charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

In accordance with approved budgets submitted by the Corporation, amounts not exceeding in aggregate of $25 million may be paid for purposes of reorganizing and rehabilitating the coal mining operations. In addition, authority is given for advances to be made to the Corporation for working capital not to exceed a total amount of $10 million at any one time.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: For working capital?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): I am speaking about the federal responsibility and its impact on the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

The Province of Nova Scotia is not required under the agreement to participate in the financing of the Coal Division. This relieves the province, of course, of the very heavy financial responsibilities which are primarily theirs.

An operating budget and a capital budget for the Coal Division for the next following financial year shall be submitted for approval of the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the responsible minister—that is, the Minister of Finance—and the President of the Treasury Board. After approval the capital budget shall be laid before Parliament.

I think I should now briefly outline some of the implications of the bill with regard to the Industrial Development Division. The objects of this division of the Corporation, in the words of the bill, are as follows:

> ... to promote and assist, either alone or in conjunction with any person or the Government of Canada or of Nova Scotia or any agency of either of such governments, the financing and development of industry on the Island of Cape Breton to provide employment outside the coal producing industry and to broaden the base of the economy of the Island.

That is stating the objects in broad language, and I think it is quite inclusive.

In carrying out its objects the Corporation is authorized to lend money, make grants, or invest in shares of companies or persons proposing to make substantial contributions to the industrial development of the area. It may acquire and dispose of lands or interests in any way appropriate in attaining the objects of the Corporation. It may concern itself in the fields of advertising and promotion in general of industrial opportunities.

The Corporation is obliged under the legislation to consult and co-operate with the interested branches of both the federal and provincial governments either directly or through any co-ordinating committee which may be agreed upon by the two governments.

Then, as to the financial provisions with respect to this division: For the purposes of the Industrial Development Division, in accordance with approved budgets the Minister of Finance is authorized to pay to the Corporation out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund amounts not exceeding in the aggregate $20 million, and such additional amounts which may from time to time be appropriated by Parliament. I understand that these additions will be in the form of transfers from savings in subvention payments with the phasing-out of some of the mines, and will most likely make available rather substantial payments from time to time.

The Province of Nova Scotia, according to the agreement already entered into, is obligated to pay to the Corporation for industrial development purposes an amount of $10 million. This, I understand, is the only financial contribution to the Corporation by the province. Here again the major financial role is played by the federal Government, whereas the primary constitutional responsibility is that of the province.

It is understandable to me that there are times when federal intervention is strongly criticized in some areas and regions of Canada, but when one agrees that this is a problem of national concern I am sure this kind of intervention will be warmly welcomed by all people in the province from which I come.

As in the case of the Coal Division, the Corporation is obliged to submit an operating and a capital budget. The capital budget must be laid before Parliament by the minister, in this case the Minister of Energy Mines and Resources.

The Corporation shall submit separate annual reports for the Coal Division as well as the Industrial Development Division to the minister and to the Lieutenant Governor in Council of Nova Scotia. These reports shall be laid before Parliament within the usual limitations of time.

I think it is important to note that the mining operations of the Corporation are declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada, and thus it brings them under federal jurisdiction in so far as labour relations are concerned. It is also provided that the present certification of labour unions under the Trade Union Act of Nova Scotia will be deemed to have been certified under the federal legislation, that is, the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Honourable senators, I have tried to provide sufficient information to enable you to have an understanding of the situation at present existing in the coal mining industry of Cape Breton as well as the situation which would exist without early and perhaps drastic action by the federal authority.

In explaining some of the provisions of the bill I have dealt with perhaps less than half of the 36 sections which the bill contains, and I have no doubt that there will remain in the minds of honourable senators some unanswered questions with respect to details of the legislation. I am not sure that I am in a position to answer questions as to details, but perhaps before the debate concludes I might attempt to answer some of them. Then if further information is required I would welcome the opportunity to refer the bill to the Banking and Commerce Committee for further consideration.

Before concluding, I would remind honourable senators of the document which I asked permission to put on the record as an appendix to today's Hansard, because that document sets out in some detail the policy on the Cape Breton coal problem which has been agreed to by both governments. I urge those who have a special interest to read this document carefully, since it is an important supplement to my remarks. It will indicate that the provincial government of Nova Scotia is in complete agreement with the terms of the legislation which is before us.

Finally, I wish to say that in my opinion the federal Government is to be commended, perhaps quite highly, for grasping this unpleasant nettle in such a bold and comprehensive manner. I think most of us have now agreed that the time for palliatives and ad hoc measures has long passed. This kind of treatment in the past has been easy to prescribe, but the medicine is becoming increasingly expensive and it cannot effect a cure. The new approach now being taken has high hopes of ultimate success. To bring success, however, will require the earnest and sincere co-operation and assistance of all levels of government, of public organizations and of the clergy of the area, many of whom, by the way, have been deeply concerned with, and intelligently attentive to, the social and moral aspects of a deteriorating economic situation.

Morever, the ultimate success of the undertakings contemplated cannot be achieved without the personal involvement, the assistance and perhaps even the temporary sacrifice of members of the labour organizations. Whether the reasons for it are valid or not, it is my impression that in the minds of many people from other parts of Nova Scotia, and from other regions of Canada, the image of the attitudes of labour in eastern Nova Scotia is in need of improvement. During recent years there have been altogether too many labour disputes on the sites of new industrial development in eastern Nova Scotia. Most of them have been in the nature of temporary walkouts and illegal strikes, brought about through the unwise action of those who form no part of the old-established mine workers unions of this part of the province. The leadership of those old unions, with the support of their membership, should seek ways to improve the image of the total labour movement.

During the last few difficult years the restraint and evidence of responsibility on their part has been most commendable. In order to be successful in persuading new industrialists to establish in Cape Breton, good evidence of labour stability must be presented to these decision makers.

The industrialist of today does not seek cheap labour anywhere in this country. He can find that in some foreign countries, and he can find his productivity suffers because he gets cheap labour. What he does seek is a work force which will give an honest day's work for a fair day's pay. He should expect to find workers in Cape Breton who will not, without the best of reasons, use the strength of union which is theirs, to attempt to force the acceptance of unfair demands. How best to create such an image we must leave to those whose experience makes them most knowledgeable in this field.

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Honourable senators, may I ask a few questions of my honourable friend? I will put them one by one and I hope he will not think I am critical of what he has said.

First, could he tell us approximately how many people are employed at the moment in the mining industries of Cape Breton?

Secondly, approximately how many tons of coal are extracted yearly?

Thirdly, how many tons of coal are used by Dosco and how many tons are shipped to the outside markets?

Fourthly, is Dosco using any oil or imported coal in the processing of steel at the moment?

Next, are any subsidies paid by the electrical energy producing people or electric power producers?

May I mention the Nova Scotia Light and Power Company and the Nova Scotia Power Commission? Are these companies using any oil at this date?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): I must confess right away that my good friend Senator Fournier is asking some questions which I cannot answer, particularly as to detailed statements. I would not be surprised if my colleague who sits on the other side would have this information, and if I had an opportunity to consult with him I could give an accurate figure.

I believe that the number employed in the mines in Nova Scotia is of the order of over 6,000.

Inclusive of all the coal mining areas of Nova Scotia, it is something of the order of 6,000, and it is decreasing every day.

The honourable senator asked me how much coal they have produced in a year. A few years ago it was approximately six million tons, and I understand it is now down to less than five million tons.

There was a question about the use of coal in the local area. The latest figure I have for the consumption of coal in the Atlantic provinces is of the order of two million tons a year. Senator Isnor may have something to say in this debate later on. I know he takes an interest in the operations of the power-producing companies and it may be he can help both of us in giving an idea of what percentage is used in some of the power-producing plants using both oil and coal.

I am sorry I have not got the exact information, but it is readily available and I can see that it is obtained and sent to my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: May I ask one question? Has the Government given any consideration to the industrial development of the two islands of Newfoundland, one of which is Bell Island, where some time ago 2,000 miners resided and the operation is now closed down? Has any thought been given to the development of that area similar to what is proposed for Cape Breton.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): All I can say in answer to the question is that that situation here, or similar situations in other parts of Canada, are not within the terms of this bill.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I listened with a great deal of interest to the very fine explanation of this bill which was given by the sponsor. Like him, I regret that my colleague from Cape Breton, Senator Urquhart, is unable to be with us today. He has a good grasp of the coal mining situation in Cape Breton and I am sure that if he were here he would make a very useful contribution to our debate. I also express the hope that he will be able to be with us in the fall, fully restored to good health.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton): The sponsor of the bill dealt with the history of the coal mining industry in Nova Scotia. It is not my purpose to go into this, but I wish to bring some points to your attention.

Coal mining has been carried out in Nova Scotia for a great many years. In fact, there is a French ordinance of 1677, made at Paris, which imposed a duty of 20 sous per ton, to be extracted from any person taking coal from the pits of Cape Breton.

In 1711 Admiral Walker advised that Cape Breton in time of peace was being used in common by French and English for loading coals which are extraordinarily good here, and taken out of the cliffs with bars only and no other labour. However, it was not until 1825, with the formation of the General Mining Association, that coal began to be mined in Cape Breton on a very systematic basis, and that has been done ever since.

This bill is somewhat unusual in that its purpose is to set up and establish a new crown corporation which is to be known as the Cape Breton Development Corporation. It is to have a twofold purpose, one function being to acquire the ownership of four mines which are located on the Island of Cape Breton. One of these is in the Town of Sydney Mines, one in New Waterford and two in Glace Bay. Having become the owner of these mines, the Croporation will operate them, but with a view to their eventual closing.

The second function of the Corporation is to obtain new industry for the area where these mines are, in order to provide employment outside the coal mines and to broaden the base of the economy of Cape Breton Island. The two functions are somewhat interrelated in that while it is not spelled out in the bill, yet I think it is the hope and the expectation that new industry will be found in order to provide employment for at least some of those who will lose their employment as a result of mine closures.

Honourable senators will appreciate that I have a special interest in this bill, as I feel I represent here the area where these mines are located. Of course the question might well be asked why it is that, in effect, the Government is going into the coal mining business in this very direct way, for, as a rule, governments are not anxious to become directly involved in what is normally regarded as a private enterprise industry. There must be a reason; there must be a strong and compelling reason why these mines are being nationalized.

However, before considering the reasons for the proposed action, perhaps some further mention should be made of what has been done by governments in the past to assist the industry. In this way we can understand why further assistance by government, short of a take-over of the mines, would not solve the problems now being faced by the industry in Nova Scotia.

I think, though, it should be remembered that Nova Scotia is not the only place in Canada in which there is a coal mining industry. There is a coal mining industry in New Brunswick and another in western Canada, and they have shared in many of the actions taken by governments in the past. However, as coal mining was pretty well concentrated in Nova Scotia, it followed that the bulk of assistance went to the industry there.

Ever since 1924 such assistance has been granted in various ways. For example, there were the provisions of the Canadian Coal Equality Act, the Atlantic Power Development Act, the Coal Production Assistance Act, and the Maritime Freight Rates Act; there was assistance by coal subventions and by various governmental directives concerning coal.

Now, as has been stated, the original competition which coal companies in Nova Scotia had to meet was from coal being mined in the United States. This coal was of equal, and in many cases of better, quality than that which we produced, and it could be produced at a much lower cost. Subventions were provided to meet this competition on certain markets, and until recent years the cost to the federal treasury was not too great. However, in more recent times the picture has changed. The competition from United States coal has remained and, in addition, there has been fierce competition from oil and natural gas.

As the cost of mining coal in Nova Scotia was ever-increasing, the result was that traditional markets were lost and, notwithstanding the increasing governmental assistance, the coal mining industry in Nova Scotia faced more and more difficult problems until the survival of the industry itself was in doubt.

Some people, I suppose, felt that if the industry could not stand by itself it should not survive. But it should not be overlooked, honourable senators, that a great many industries in Canada were, and indeed are, assisted in one way or another by governments. And there is justification for such a policy. In the case of coal it was believed to be advantageous, and indeed necessary, to have a source of supply of this commodity in Canada so as not be wholly dependent on foreign suppliers.

During the two great wars a tremendous drive was made to increase the production of coal in Canada. It was not until after the last great war that the picture changed, and there was a decreasing demand for coal and, at the same time, an increasing demand for oil and natural gas. I suppose the expected development of nuclear power also had its effect.

As I said, while competition was increasing, the cost of producing coal in Nova Scotia was also increasing. In recent years two royal commissions have studied the whole problem of the coal industry in Nova Scotia: the Rand Commission made its report in 1960, and the Donald Commission made its report in 1966. Both commissions made certain recommendations, but we need to consider only the Donald Report since it is the more recent one and the bill before us is based to a considerable extent on its recommendations.

On page 1 of that report we find this very concise statement of the problem:

> The Cape Breton Coal problem is essentially the dependence of the Cape Breton economy and, to a lesser extent, that of Nova Scotia on the coal mining industry, and the cost to the federal government of sustaining these operations. The difficulties of the coal mines are those of long established mining operations confronted with mounting costs and increasing competition from other fuels and sources of energy, notably petroleum. The uneconomic nature of the operations is basically due to the problems inherent in mining coal some 3 to 4 miles out under the sea and to the limitations this imposes upon both management and labour.

Honourable senators, perhaps it would be well to mention here that since at least 1924 the coal mining industry in Canada has been recognized as the responsibility of the federal Government in so far as assistance is concerned, rather than as the responsibility of the governments of the provinces where the mines are located, although the provincial governments are responsible for legislation dealing with the operations of the mines themselves and regarding safety and methods of operation and the like.

I think it can be assumed without any question that coal mining would never have survived in Nova Scotia were it not for the assistance of the federal Government. Over the years communities grew up which were wholly dependent for employment on the coal mines. According to the 1961 census, the Town of Glace Bay had a population of 24,186; New Waterford, 10,592; Sydney Mines, 9,122; and 56 per cent of the labour force of New Waterford was engaged in coal mining, while 38 per cent of the labour force of both Glace Bay and Sydney Mines worked in the coal mines. You can well appreciate that the service industries in these localities were dependent on coal production for their existence.

Thus, over the years these communities have been built on coal. It was the coal miners who built churches, schools, hospitals and other institutions. And indeed the coal miners of Nova Scotia pioneered in prepaid medical and hospital care, having had both years before either was available in other centres.

Honourable senators, we have a situation where the economy of three communities in Cape Breton are almost wholly dependent upon coal mining, an industry which the federal Government has felt an obligation to assist and has indeed for at least 43 years assisted to keep in operation. I think it is but logical then for the federal Government to feel and to accept the obligation of assuring all these communities, and others around them, that they will not be allowed to decline into nothingness by the abrupt closing of four coal mines, and the disappearance of the employment of about 6,500 men.

How serious then is the situation? I quote the Donald Report again. At page 5 it says:

> Since 1960, the economic and competitive position of the industry has continued to deteriorate. As a result of closures, Dosco now has 5 operating coal mines compared with 9 in 1960—coal production and employment have declined. Dosco pithead costs have risen to around $12.00 per ton, subsidies have increased alarmingly and are continuing to rise.

The report also said that due to the uncertain prospects of the industry and the unprofitable nature of the operations, maintenance of the pits and equipment have been inadequate and substantial expenditures will be required to rehabilitate both underground and surface facilities.

It is interesting to note in relation to the Donald figure of $12 per ton, that the Rand Report mentioned that in 1958 the average pithead cost of Nova Scotia coal was $10.52 per ton, and when speaking to this bill the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stated that Dosco coal at the pithead currently costs about $14 per ton. So it is easy to understand why the problem of producing and marketing coal has intensified during the last few years, especially in the last year or two. Of course this became a matter of grave concern to the federal and provincial governments and to the people of the communities involved, as well as to those who worked in the mines. It was apparent that coal from Nova Scotia could be marketed only to the extent that the federal Government was prepared to underwrite the cost, and the future cost was impossible to estimate.

Then, as the sponsor mentioned, Dosco had informed the Government that it wished to withdraw from coal mining altogether, and offered to sell its entire coal mining interests to the Government. The minister stated the policy being followed by the Government has been influenced by several considerations, such as the intention of Dominion Steel & Coal Corporation to get out of the coal mining operations in Nova Scotia, the limited lifetime of the mines in question, which has been estimated at 15 years, the need for very large capital expenditures to modernize and rehabilitate the mines if they are to continue in operation, and the lack of markets without federal subsidies. The minister felt that to continue under the present policy would only be postponing the evil day, as it were, when a final solution must be found, and the very large expenditures necessary might be put to better advantage, as, for example, in broadening the base of the economy of Cape Breton Island.

Honourable senators, up to now the assistance provided the industry had not been unique. Other industries had been helped in various ways; for example, the gold mining industry found itself in a position where gold had to be sold at a fixed price regardless of production costs. So in the Report on the Administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1966, we find this statement:

> Since 1948 the Federal Government under the provisions of the Emergency Gold Mines Assistance Act, has given assistance to operators of marginal gold mines to meet increasing costs of production against a fixed selling price for gold. The assistance so provided has extended the operating life of many gold mines and has given the communities which are dependent upon them the opportunity to adjust gradually to diminishing economic support.

This report also states the amounts paid to gold mine operators to March 31, 1966 for the years 1948 to 1965, inclusive, totalled $216,-184,450.15. With an estimated $14,814,000 paid in the year ending March 31, 1967, almost $231 million has been paid out by the federal Government in assistance to the gold mining industry since 1948, and the end is not yet in sight.

So, honourable senators, industry in Canada has had governmental assistance in the past for social as well as economic reasons —assistance given to aid the communities where the withdrawal of industry would cause much hardship.

And in Canada we are quite accustomed to Government ownership, through the means of Crown corporations. I suppose the first of these was the nationalization of various railways which now make up the Canadian National Railways. So, the nationalization of four coal mines in Cape Breton is not a great departure from precedent. The objectives are new but are justified by both economic and social conditions for, as stated by the minister, the nationalization of these mines is justified by the economic and social situation on the Island. Personally I commend the minister for his attitude. He has shown himself to be a man of wide understanding, a man of deep sympathy with those people and communities who suffer hardship through no cause of their own making. And I think too the agreement mentioned between the federal and provincial governments is a fine example of real co-operation between them, and both governments are to be commended for their actions in this matter.

Honourable senators, I do not propose to examine the bill in detail. The sponsor has given a very complete explanation of its provisions. And it is obvious the directors of that Corporation must be given a considerable degree of latitude and flexibility so they can deal with problems as they arise according to their best judgment. I do think the bill is based on the Donald Report and reading the preamble confirms that impression. The directors of the new Corporation are not, of course, bound by anything contained in that report but I expect they will follow many of its recommendations.

The report examined two proposals which it named "Proposal I" and "Proposal J". Under Proposal I, production would be cut to 2,143,000 tons by 1972 with the work force reduced to about 3,000. The new capital required would be about $14 million. Under the proposal, McBean mine would close in one year's time, No. 12 Colliery in Waterford in three years, and No. 20 in Glace Bay in five years. This would leave two mines operating which, until they were phased out, would produce about two million tons. Under this proposal no new mine would be opened.

Under Proposal J, production would be cut to the same figure by 1972, with the work force reduced to about 2,500. The capital required would amount to about $25.5 million. The cost per ton would be reduced to $8.77 as against $10.23 under Proposal I. The main difference would be that a new mine would be opened and be in full production in five years' time, and No. 26 colliery would then be closed.

The Donald Report recommended that Proposal I be adopted. The adoption of the proposal would reduce production to about 2 million tons in five years and, as stated by the sponsor, the Corporation would then be financed by the savings effected, which were estimated to be about $10 million a year or $150 million over the 15-year period.

The Donald Report recommended that two crown corporations be established—one to operate the mine, and the other to promote new industry in the area. I think the Government was wise in establishing the one with the two divisions, as in this way there will be greater co-operation in achieving these two purposes. Honourable senators will notice though that $25 million is being provided to the Corporation, which is about the capital required under Proposal "J". I understand that this was done because the Government in 1965 had given an undertaking to provide financial assistance for the rehabilitation of the existing mines and for the opening of a new mine at Lingan. That was before the Donald Report, so while the money is being provided, the decision as to whether or not a new mine is to be opened is left to the new corporation.

Honourable senators, clause 17 of the bill provides that the Corporation must within a year submit an overall plan for the conduct of coal mining and for the progressive reduction of coal production and for the closing of some mines. The plan is to take into account what progress has been made in providing other employment. It had been hoped by many that the legislation would require that new employment opportunities be provided before old ones were done away with, but this is not to be the case. I think that unless generous pension provisions are made to cover early retirement—as I believe can be done under clause 18—much hardship will result in so far as unemployment is concerned. I think it must be realized that the amount provided for the promotion of industry will not go far to encourage the type of industry which requires a large number of employees to come to Cape Breton. We must remember also that a great deal of effort has already been made to bring new industry to that area, and while there has been some success, certainly it has not been sufficient to take care of all those entering the labour force year by year. The industry which has come there has required large capital investments.

There has been some criticism too about one mine, the MacBean in Pictou County, which is not being taken over by this new corporation. I will not comment on that, except to say that since it will be the only mine owned by Dosco, I hope its attitude towards the continuation of its operations will be made clear. If they are going to close that mine—and I expect they are—they should let it be known, so at least those who work there and the communities involved will know where they stand and can prepare for it.

There has also been some criticism because the steel works in Sydney is not also being taken over by the new corporation. There is grave concern about the future of that plant. As the sponsor mentioned, there have been many layoffs: men with over 20 years' service have been laid off. The result is that there is a great feeling of uncertainty and a real fear of what the future holds. I can understand why the Government would not want this crown corporation to take on this added responsibility at this time, but I do say that many people feel—and I am one of them—that there is a very poor future for that plant if it remains under its present ownership.

I believe it has been suggested that the federal Government should set up a royal commission to study the steel industry of Nova Scotia. We have had such commissions study the coal industry, and while they did not perhaps provide all the answers, they did give valuable information which enabled people to understand the difficulties and the problems of the industry. So, I believe a royal commission to study the steel industry would make a valuable contribution to our understanding of it.

Honourable senators, I support this legislation, and while I feel perhaps there are some parts of it that are open to criticism, I realize it is a new venture and I believe we should give the proposed corporation, when it is established, every opportunity to find solutions to the problems of employment and future employment on Cape Breton Island. If it should be that more authority or wider powers are necessary, then the legislation can be amended.

I believe that the people of industrial Cape Breton will welcome the Cape Breton Development Corporation and wish it well. I believe also it can and will give valuable assistance to our economy and industrial growth. At the same time, I am not one of those who expect too much from it, or who expect it will be the final answer to our economic and social difficulties.

I recall the statement of the sponsor regarding the steel industry and the reduction of the number of men to be employed at the Port of North Sydney, which this legislation does not touch.

Honourable senators, while appreciating the difficulties facing the Corporation, I certainly hope and trust it will be able to give valuable assistance to the people of Cape Breton.

If I may, I shall attempt to answer one or two of the questions asked by Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche). As was mentioned, the number of men employed was approximately 6,500. For the year ending December 31, 1966 the production in Nova Scotia was 4,125,989 tons of coal. The total Canadian production was just over 11 million tons.

I am not too familiar with Dosco, which uses some coal, but it is decreasing every year. They do use oil and electricity in their steel plant. In the process of trying to meet competition under the present system it just so happens our coal is not as suitable as some American coal for the making of steel, with the result that more and more United States coal has been imported for use in the Sydney steel plant, and I expect that this year or next year no Cape Breton coal will be used in that plant.

I think one of the other points you mentioned was as to the amount used by the power plants. Just about one million tons of coal have been used by the thermal plants. The Nova Scotia Light, Heat and Power Company in Halifax used 225,000 tons, and the Tuft's Cove plant 300,000 tons. The Seaboard Power Plant at Glace Bay, now owned by the Nova Scotia Power Commission, used 180,000 tons of coal, and this year will use more on account of supplying steam to the heavy water plant. The power plant, at Trenton, owned by Nova Scotia Power Commission, used 200,000 tons, and a small plant at McCann used 50,000. If there are any other questions by honourable senators they will have to be asked of the sponsor. I thank you for your kind attention.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Perhaps I might be allowed to ask one short question. Would the honourable senator give me some indication as to whether he thinks any useful information would be obtained if this particular bill were referred to a committee, before which the minister and his officials could be asked to attend?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton): Honourable senators, I meant to mention that point but overlooked it. I do not think any useful purpose will be served by sending this bill to a committee. It must be realized that this is a new venture, and we have now all the information that we can possibly obtain about it. We shall have to wait and see how it will work out.

Hon. Mr. Croll: What bothers me is this: who is sponsoring this bill?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It has a joint sponsorship.

Hon. Mr. Croll: That is what I thought.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, it might be useful if a senator from a province other than Nova Scotia interjected himself into this debate, and endeavoured to put the matter in the perspective of a province that is a large coal consumer and a large tax paying province.

We have today in Ontario an exceptional situation so far as the consumption of coal is concerned. Honourable senators might be interested to know that in the two electricity generating stations in Toronto, the Lakeview and the Thomas Ahearn stations, there is burned annually more coal than the total Nova Scotia production. Within ten years this consumption will rise from its present level of something in excess of 4 million tons a year to around 8 million to 10 million tons a year, notwithstanding the introduction of nuclear power.

Having said that, I can imagine many honourable senators wondering just what is the malaise that is affecting the Cape Breton coal mines in a climate of such heavy demand. I want to assure this House that the demand for coal as a source of energy in the generation of electricity is going to climb to a magnitude that is almost unbelievable. Honourable senators will recognize the fact that an industry as sick as that of the Nova Scotia coal industry in this sort of climate must be sick indeed.

I do not think I am making an over-statement when I say that the policy pursued by the Government in connection with the operations of the Nova Scotia coal industry during the last 10 or 12 years has been one of economic folly.

My honourable colleague mentioned that governments do subsidize other industries, and I recognize this. The gold mining industry was mentioned as an example. But, the economic folly that I am speaking of is not an economic folly in respect of subsidizing an industry, but economic folly in subsidizing an energy source—and gold is not an energy source—that goes completely against the logistics of a continental energy system. This has been so apparent and obvious since 1955 that any one could recognize the imperativeness of it. In spite of this, and indeed since 1960 when the Rand Report came down, we have pursued—perhaps with charitable motives—a policy of subsidizing this industry to the tune of over $100 million, and we must remember that today we are considering a bill that will involve a further expenditure of something in the nature of $400 million.

Honourable senators, I ask your permission to review some points in order to show you how bad this industry is in terms of the economy in Canada generally. In Mr. Donald's excellent report will be found figures relating to the Cape Breton coal mining industry for 1965. In that year that industry employed 7,500 men, and produced 4.3 million tons of coal. This production was at the rate of 2.8 tons per man shift. The same figures for coal from the Fairmont field in the United States coming into Canada, according to Mr. Donald's report, is 11.97 tons per man shift. In other words, per man production in the United States is five times that of Nova Scotia.

Honourable senators, I know that this is attributable for the most part to a geographic situation that entails men travelling for 1½ hours each shift to and from the coal face, but if economics have any meaning whatsoever it is impossible to credit sensible men with trying to maintain an operation of this kind.

Dosco's pit-head price in 1965 was $12 a ton. Fairmont coal from the United States is laid down in Toronto at $8.98 a ton, and that is after the imposition of a 50 cent per ton tariff on that coal; so, the pit-head price must be around $4.25 a ton. When these figures are compared it can be seen what an ailing industry we are faced with, and how necessary something like this legislation is in order to salvage it, and I hope put an end to it for all time.

Let us look at the figures in respect of coal consumption by Ontario Hydro in a year. In 1965 Ontario Hydro used more than 4 million tons of coal—just about the equivalent of the Nova Scotia production. Of those 4 million tons, Ontario Hydro imported from Nova Scotia 750,000 tons. The cost to the Canadian taxpayer of bringing that coal in and laying it down in Toronto at the same price at which United States coal is laid down was $5.8 million.

Now, this may be justified on the ground of concern for the populace of Cape Breton, but we are a strong and vigorous country. I would venture to say that there is not a Cape Breton miner today who could not find employment at better wage rates in hard rock mining in Northern Ontario, or in the great coal fields of British Colombia which have the rising potential of exports to Japan ahead of them, and which will keep those mines going for many years.

We must be compassionate and have concern for these people, but we must be realistic as well. I know that some of the forebears of these same Cape Breton miners immigrated to that part of the country, and after a very short time became dissastisfied, and built themselves ships and headed for Australia. Their leader was a man who was senior in years. That was the spirit that built our country. Let us be very careful, when we are dealing with this business, to make sure that we are realistic. Let us not allow parochialism and politics to cause us to fall into the trap of economic positions that are outlandish.

I do not have to look further for support in what I am saying than the report of Mr. Donald, which I commend to all honourable senators as one of the most concise, accurate, and practical analyses I have ever read of any industry. In that report Mr. Donald says:

> Surely in the expanding economy of this country there is something better for these young men to do—
> That is, the young men of Cape Breton.
> —than to enter an industry with a limited future to produce a commodity that is not only not wanted but constitutes a heavy drain on the economy.

To that thought I say Amen. And may I remind those good people of Cape Breton that Ontario is a nice province too, and a prosperous one. We welcome the people of Cape Breton to our province. Perhaps British Columbia is even more desirable. Millions of people the world over would like to live there. Moreover, both of those provinces, like Nova Scotia, are also Canada.

Hon. Mr. Welch: May I ask the honourable senator for clarification on one point. He referred to the figure of 2.8 tons per man shift as against 11.97 tons per man shift in the United States. Does that refer to strip or deep mining?

Hon. Mr. Lang: Deep mining.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Thank you.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Honourable senators, in keeping with what seems to be the concensus, for I have not heard any objection to the procedure suggested by Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), I suggest that the bill be not referred to a committee. Apparently it is an exercise which is not considered to be useful in this case. I move, therefore, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

Jodoin, the first French-speaking woman appointed to the Senate of Canada, in the Senate Antechamber on June 14, 1967.

PRIVATE BILLS

PRINCIPAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the following report of the committee on Bill S-11, respecting Principal Life Insurance Company of Canada:

Your committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. Hayden reported that the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce had considered Bill S-11, respecting Principal Life Insurance Company of Canada, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendment:

Page 1, clause 1: Strike out line 17 and substitute therefor the following: "purposes whatsoever,".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave of the Senate, I move that this report be adopted now.

Honourable senators, the explanation of the amendment is simple. There was a company by this name, Principal Life Insurance Company, incorporated about two years ago. Within two years of incorporation a company must, of course, procure its certificate of registration from the Superintendent of Insurance. The company has been delayed in getting into operation and has come back this year and presented this bill, which in effect was to extend the life of the original act or charter for a further period of two years. However, the bill was drafted in such a way that the life of this company, the moment this bill was passed, would last only until June 30, 1969, overlooking the fact that if the company secures its certificate of registration in the meantime it can go on forever as long as it is enabled to secure annual renewals of registration. So, all we have done is strike out that limiting provision in the bill.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Burchill, for Hon. Mr. Cameron, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH NORTHWESTERN INSURANCE COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the following report:

> The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to which was referred the Bill S-14, intituled: "An Act respecting British Northwestern Insurance Company", has in obedience to the order of reference of June 13, 1967, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.
> Your Committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

SEABOARD FINANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the following report:

> The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to which was referred the Bill S-15, intituled: "An Act to incorporate Seaboard Finance Company of Canada", has in obedience to the order of reference of June 13, 1967, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.
> Your committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

There is a desire on the part of some senators not to proceed with third reading until the printed report of this morning's committee meeting is available. If the report is not available tomorrow, some senator could ask that the order for third reading stand.

Motion agreed to.

HON. MARIANA B. JODOIN

SPEECHES AT UNVEILING OF BRONZE PORTRAIT—PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that the speeches delivered by the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, Prime Minister of Canada, the Honourable Sydney J. Smith, Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable John J. Connolly, P.C., Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Honourable Lionel Choquette and the Honourable Mariana B. Jodoin, on the occasion of the unveiling of the bronze portrait of the Honourable Mariana B. Jodoin, the first French-speaking woman appointed to the Senate of Canada, in the Senate antechamber, on June 14, 1967, which were tabled today, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE

FINAL REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE—CORRECTION OF STATEMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, may I ask your indulgence, perhaps under our Rule 35, to make a correction in some of the remarks I made yesterday evening and which are reported on page 215 of Senate Hansard.

My correction of course does not affect the principle which I asserted at that time, of the importance of the maximum of freedom of the press to carry out its important function in the parliamentary process. It is merely a matter of giving credit where credit is due.

I am afraid I was misled, as were other senators perhaps, by the mention of the date, Wednesday, June 21, as the occasion of the first disclosure of the intentions of the members of the Joint Committee on Divorce. Senator Roebuck mentioned that date. I believe he had the same impression as I had, that this was the first occasion of disclosure. However, my current information from the Press Gallery verifies what Senator Croll suggested, that the first disclosure in fact took place the night before, on the evening of June 20.

My correction is that the first disclosure was made by Mr. Tom Gould of the C.B.C., who obtained the information directly, by his own efforts and from his own sources.

I have on occasion been critical of the C.B.C. in other aspects of its programming and I take this opportunity to give credit to the enterprise in this case of Mr. Gould and the C.B.C.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 14, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux, seconded by Hon. Mr. Nichol, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, as Senator Argue, in whose name this order stands, is not in the chamber at this time, would it be agreeable that Senator Inman be allowed to take his place?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, we have entered the second session of Canada's 27th Parliament since Confederation. This is Canada's 100th birthday, it is our centennial year, and it is also the year of Expo, a proud year for all Canadians.

I would like to extend my congratulations to the Right Honourable Roland Michener, our new Governor General. Those of us who were privileged to serve on committees with him, when he was a member of the House of Commons, know well the depth of his knowledge and keen insight. He was a very distinguished and popular Speaker of the House of Commons. His success as High Commissioner to India is well known. Those qualities which made his career outstanding in these other positions make him eminently suitable to be Her Majesty's representative in Canada. In all of his successes he has been assisted most ably by his charming wife. Mrs. Michener's personal attainments in academic, as well as in social and cultural fields, make her well qualified to be the châtelaine of Rideau Hall. I am sure that her kindness and help to lady parliamentarians, and to wives of parliamentarians, as wife of the Speaker of the House of Commons, are well remembered by those of us who benefited from her advice and assistance.

I wish at this time to congratulate the Speaker, the leaders, and deputy leaders of the Senate. It gives us great pleasure to see them all in their accustomed seats. My congratulations are offered also to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. They gave excellent speeches and we look forward to hearing them speak often in this chamber.

I wish also to congratulate Senator O'Leary (Carleton) and Mr. NacNeill who recently had honours conferred on them.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Inman: I extend a warm, well-deserved welcome to our new senators, and I wish to say a very special word of welcome to Senator Mary Kinnear. We have been friends for a long time and I know that she brings to this chamber a wealth of experience in public affairs. It is a pleasure also to see my friend of long standing, Senator Thomas J. Kickham, join us in the Senate. Senator Kickham comes from a long line of parliamentarians and has himself served both in our provincial legislature and in the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, I wish to speak for a few minutes about the United Nations. Since the end of World War II, Canada has played an ever-growing prominent role in the field of international affairs. Canada was one of the fifty nations represented at San Francisco in 1945 when Mr. Mackenzie King, then the Prime Minister of Canada, signed the charter of the United Nations.

On January 1, 1948, Canada was elected a member of the Security Council for a two-year term. In 1952 the Honourable L. B. Pearson, then Secretary of State for External Affairs, was President of the United Nations Assembly. Canada is a permanent member of the Atomic Energy Commission, and Canadians have served some three-year terms on the Economic and Social Council.

One of the chief functions of the Economic and Social Council is the co-ordination of the activities of the specialized agencies of the United Nations. Canada has membership in all of those agencies, namely, the World Health Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization, the International Labour Organization, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Monetary Fund, and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. There are other programs, such as the Colombo Plan, Technical Assistance, Canada West Indies Aid, UNESCO and UNICEF, in which we participate.

The Special Industries Service program, quite a new form of economic aid to developing countries, is one of the most successful projects of the United Nations. In the past year more than one hundred countries have turned to UNIDO, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, for advice and help in some of their industrial problems.

Last year we were fourth in rank among the United Nations Development program and International Development Association, third in contributions to the United Nations Relief Works Agency, and second only to the United States of America in contributions to the World Food Program—quite a record for a country of only 20,000,000 people.

Honourable senators, it was my privilege and pleasure to be the observer from this chamber to the 21st Session of the United Nations General Assembly for the first two weeks of October 1966, and I wish here to express my sincere thanks to our Prime Minister the Honourable Lester B. Pearson, and to Senator John J. Connolly for having given me this opportunity.

The representative from the House of Commons and I arrived in New York on Monday, October 3, and were met by Mr. Moffat from the Canadian mission, after which we went to meet the Canadian Ambassador to the United Nations, His Excellency Mr. George Ignatieff, a very gracious and charming gentleman.

I would like to express my grateful thanks to His Excellency George Ignatieff, Ambassador of the permanent mission of Canada to the United Nations, and to the staff at the Canadian mission for the courtesy extended to me while in New York. I do feel that the staff were dedicated young people, very helpful and co-operative in every way, who took a keen interest in their work at the United Nations. I know many of them look forward to careers in the diplomatic service.

After a half-hour briefing by His Excellency we went to the United Nations.

Our ambassador and his wife are gracious and charming. It is a pleasure indeed to know them. I must say his thoughtfulness and kindnesses contributed much to the pleasure of my sojourn at the United Nations.

Our ambassador has great responsibilities. First, of course, he must represent and speak for Canada on any matters concerning Canada which come before the United Nations. He also has many social obligations which often necessitate, so he told me, his appearing at perhaps three functions in one evening. I had that experience on one occasion while there and I would not wish to have it happen too often. I attended a Holy See Reception, a violin recital and afterwards a reception to meet the artist at the Consul General's residence. It made a very full evening. One realizes that our ambassador and his wife are extremely busy people seven days a week from morning till early next morning.

Because many members of the Senate have already attended sessions of the United Nations as delegates and observers, I will not go into much detail regarding the charter and statute of the International Court of Justice, the judicial organ of the United Nations, except to state that the purposes and principles of the United Nations are: first, to maintain international peace and security; second, to develop friendly relations among nations, and thirdly, to co-operate internationally in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

I would like to tell honourable senators that I was very proud of my colleagues from the other place who went to the United Nations as observers. They were very loyal in their attendance at the General Assembly and at the various committees to which they were appointed. I know full well from observation and conversation that Canadians have the full confidence and respect of other members of the United Nations.

At the briefing each morning we were assigned to the General Assembly or to committees of our choice. I attended the General Assembly meetings every morning as I found it very interesting to hear the viewpoints of the delegates from the different countries regarding the many subjects that came before the General Assembly. There are six committees with one member from each country represented at the United Nations.

The general debate in the General Assembly Hall was continued at 10.30 a.m. Four countries took part on October 3: Greece, Bolivia, Nepal and Afghanistan. Mr. Toumbas of Greece congratulated Mr. Pozwak of Afghanistan on his election as President of the current session.

I was impressed with the President of the United Nations at that time; he was an East Indian and an outstanding personality. I met him at a luncheon and found him to be a very charming and delightful person.

Mr. Toumbas gave great credit to the United Nations for what it had already accomplished in the social, economic and humanitarian fields, as well as in those of education, literature of peoples, human dignity and human rights. He did stress that much remains to be done, particularly in economic, financial and technical aid to the developing countries. This was a very excellent speech, I thought, and it covered many subjects. Yet it was fair and gave credit where credit was due.

The Bolivian representative came next and I was impressed with his appeal for peace and Christian unity. Guyana had just become a new South American state which was a cause for great rejoicing as was also the re-admission of Indonesia.

The Nepal representative, Mr. Bista, among other topics, praised the United Nations for the handling of the India-Pakistan conflict last year, with special words of thanks to the Secretary General U Thant. Mr. Bista expressed great concern for the situation in Viet Nam, and understandably so since they are almost neighbours. He also spoke of the People's Republic of China and thought she should have representation at the United Nations. He was very positive about this.

At the plenary sessions of the General Assembly, representatives from Belgium, Yugoslavia, India and Dahomey spoke and all stressed disarmament, also the lack of peacekeeping, and were quite critical of United Nations achievements and all talked about Viet Nam. The consensus seemed to be, among those countries at that time, so far as I could tell, that the Western World should not have interfered in this war.

Mr. Mazid spoke for Afghanistan. He too welcomed Guyana and Indonesia. He spoke of the slow progress in the application of the declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. He brought up the question of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia, Angola and Mozambique. He spoke at some length on this subject, as did many others during the time I was attending the meetings. But I must say the bitterest attacks I heard were in the Third Committee. There seemed to be great criticism of the attitude of Great Britain towards the Rhodesian situation. I listened to this particularly in the Third Committee.

It was a thrill to sit in the General Assembly and listen to our External Affairs Minister, the Honourable Paul Martin, address the United Nations from the podium. Mr. Martin is always a forceful and convincing speaker.

Mr. Donald Macdonald, M.P., also spoke for Canada on one occasion during my tour and gave an excellent address.

Mrs. Fullerton of London spoke in the Third Committee and brought honour to Canadian women. I was indeed proud to be a Canadian.

I was very impressed with women from Africa and the Eastern countries. They were well briefed in the affairs of their states and were good speakers.

Of course, it was not all just attending meetings and observing. There is a social side also which can be enlightening, besides being delightful. It was a distinct pleasure to attend the reception of the representative of the Holy See at the Waldorf Astoria. He was most gracious and he was interested to know that I came from Canada. It was one of the outstanding social functions I attended.

I will say here that I attended as much as possible the receptions given by the peoples of the African and Eastern countries because it was very enlightening to hear them being able to speak English so well and to listen to their ideas. I might just say here that this was at one of the conferences. I was surprised and asked why so few women were with them, since so many African countries had quite a large representation of women. The answer was that next year they would have twenty who were presently being trained. These women come as delegates, observers and staff, and are well trained and well aware of their responsibilities.

From my observations at the United Nations, I realize that women have a very important role to play in world affairs and I do think the women of the developing countries are perhaps more aware of this situation than we of the Western World are. Perhaps we have taken too much for granted in our way of life. Life has been easy for us in these later years. I do know that these women of the Afro-Asian countries are very serious about their position in government: what they can do, what they stand for and what they can control. They no doubt represent the views of their countrywomen and their interests, and they are very sincere in their efforts to make life in their countries happy and productive of the things that make living worthwhile.

I think we Canadian women have let opportunities slip by because while an observer at the United Nations I realized that other countries and especially the developing countries of Africa are very cognizant of the value of women in government. It was brought to me very clearly that we women of the Western hemisphere have not exercised our potential to the full.

I had the experience of meeting a doctor and his wife from Nigeria and also a doctor and his wife from Malowa. I still correspond with the doctor from Malowa and I understand that he is coming with his wife and three children to Prince Edward Island. I asked this man what he was going to do and he said he was going back to work with his own people. He said "Of course, we expect a lot of help from you Canadians." I said we were very willing to help all developing countries but they must not forget that they must also help themselves to some extent. I pointed out that we were still a young nation and had much developing to do ourselves.

The experience of attending the United Nations as an observer is something one will always remember. Even as an observer one feels a part of this tremendous organization, a part of our international family which, like most families, has its disagreements on occasions, only on a very much larger scale.

You work, talk, and consult with those who control the destiny of a country. It is of course a responsibility, which one cannot fail to accept as a delegate to these conferences, that one must be careful in the use of words.

It was an opportunity, as observer, to become aware of what this huge organization is doing in shaping the destiny of its member countries. It is trying to bring understanding, tolerance and peace to the various nations and the countries who have joined the UN, and to date we must say the United Nations has had some measure of success. We hesitate to think what could have happened on many occasions if there had been no United Nations.

I am not going into a lengthy speech about my observations at the United Nations, for I realize that today most intelligent people, and I am sure the members of this chamber are very intelligent, have acquainted themselves with the aims, hopes and ideals, of the United Nations. When one has had the very interesting experience of attending the session as an observer, even for a short period, one feels that the world has grown much smaller on account of fast travel and communication. Countries have problems which they should share with one another. The solution for unity and peace is co-operation and a recognition of each other's rights and privileges in human existence.

In speaking with some of the delegates and observers from these emerging African countries, I found that they have a great ambition to be recognized by the Western World. They are proud of their newly found independence and look forward to becoming an influential factor in an African Commonwealth. I do not feel that they have ambitions other than this—I got the impression that they know Africa is a great continent and as such will in time be considered of the same importance as other continents.

Honourable senators, perhaps this is the year to assess ourselves. We can look back a hundred years, and now we must look to the foreseeable future. Canada has progressed from being a dependent colony a hundred years ago to its present position in the world.

The Speech from the Throne gives great encouragement for the future progress and development of Canada; better programming by the C.B.C., more good Canadian features, upgraded and of more cultural and educational value; housing programs are of prime importance; a new department—a Department of Consumers Affairs; a more adequate and expanded communications system, and many other matters to benefit the people of Canada.

The world of tomorrow is even now dawning and anyone can listen today by way of radio and television to what is taking place in all corners of the world. Tremendous advances have been made and are being made each day in the sciences and cultures so that predictions for the future are paving the way for the forces of progress.

Honourable senators, we are a prosperous country and we are on our way to greatness. That greatness is in the hands of our youth today. We must hope that they will recognize their responsibility and I think they will. The beards, the mini-skirts, the rock and roll, which is even now passé, are a phase. In the days of the Roaring Twenties, as those years were called, they danced the Charleston, wore skirts above the knees and drank pink champagne and silver fizzes. It was fun, but when the time came the youth of that day settled down and did their duty to their families and to their country. Life became serious again during the depression years and people accepted the fact. Then World War II came and it was not easy to see our teenage sons go to fight; it was a time of testing. Again I feel that our young people of today will face up to the issues of tomorrow and accept their responsibilities with courage and ability.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) for Hon. Mr. Lamontagne, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND NOVA SCOTIA

JUNE 13, 1967

This Agreement made this 13th day of June 1967.

BETWEEN

THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA, hereinafter called "Canada",

and

THE GOVERNMENT OF NOVA SCOTIA

Hereinafter called "Nova Scotia",

Whereas Canada and Nova Scotia agreed on certain basic principles concerning future policy for Nova Scotia coal, as announced on December 29, 1966, in Ottawa by the Prime Minister of Canada and in Halifax by the Premier of Nova Scotia, and as described in Appendix "A".

Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and the Agreements contained herein and in the aforementioned Appendix "A", the parties agree as follows:

1. The Corporation

(1) The Crown Corporation referred to in Appendix "A" shall be called the "Cape Breton Development Corporation".

(2) The Chairman and President of the Corporation shall be appointed by the Governor-in-Council following consultation with Nova Scotia. The Chairman may serve on a part time basis and is to hold office for a period not exceeding seven years. The President shall serve full time as the Chief Executive Officer of the Corporation and shall hold office for a period not exceeding seven years.

(3) The Corporation shall have a Board of Directors consisting of seven members, of which two shall be the Chairman and President of the Corporation, all to be appointed by the Governor-in-Council. Three of the five remaining Directors shall be nominated by Canada, and the remaining two Directors shall be appointed on the recommendation of the Lieutenant Governor-in-Council of Nova Scotia, all to hold office for periods not exceeding five years.

(4) The Corporation shall have two main divisions—a Coal Division and an Industrial Development Division—each under a Vice-President. The two Vice-Presidents may attend meetings of the Board of Directors but will not have voting privileges.

(5) The Corporation shall submit annual capital and operating budgets for both its Coal Division and its Industrial Development Division, to the appropriate Minister for approval by the Governor-in-Council, in such detail as the Governor-in-Council may require, including but not limited to, a statement of the relationship between industrial development and the target phase-out timetable for the coal mines.

(6) The Corporation shall submit an annual report to both Canada and Nova Scotia, in such form and detail as the Governor-in-Council may require, including but not limited to, an accounting of expenditures for the year and of progress in meeting the target phase-out timetable.

(7) The Corporation shall maintain adequate accounting records to reflect the operations of its Coal and Industrial Development Divisions, respectively.

(8) Nova Scotia shall consent to the transfer to the Corporation of all the rights of Dominion Coal Company, Limited, and Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, Limited, under any lease granted by Nova Scotia to those companies in Cape Breton Island and shall also grant to the Corporation for a nominal consideration its interests in all lands used by those companies or subsidiaries in Cape Breton Island, which lands have never been granted or leased by Nova Scotia.

(9) Canada shall provide working capital through loans to the Corporation to a maximum of $10 million at any one time.

(10) The cost of the acquisition of the Cape Breton coal mining and related interests of Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, Limited and Dominion Coal Company, Limited shall be borne by Canada.

(11) The amounts to be made available to the Corporation for industrial development, in accordance with Appendix "A", shall be paid to the Corporation as required, Canada and Nova Scotia making pro rata payments in accordance with such needs.

2. Co-ordination of Economic Development

(1) Canada and Nova Scotia shall enter into an agreement, at an early date, respecting the undertaking of economic development activities, specifying the extent to which each will undertake such activities through their respective departmental and agencies programs.

(2) Canada and Nova Scotia shall establish a Cape Breton Coordinating Committee, hereinafter called the "Committee", charged with the co-ordination of economic development activities on Cape Breton Island.

(3) The Committee shall be composed of 9 members—5 appointed by Canada, 3 by Nova Scotia, and one by the Corporation. Members shall be selected from federal and provincial departments and agencies which are involved in development programs on Cape Breton Island.

(4) The Chairman of the Committee shall be appointed by Canada and shall be the senior federal official responsible for the co-ordination of federal activities on the Island.

(5) The Committee may establish an Advisory Council, including representatives of local areas, to advise the Committee.

3. Existing Subsidy and Loan Programs

(1) Immediately the Corporation acquires the Cape Breton coal mining and related coal works and coal undertakings of Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company Limited and Dominion Coal Company Limited, Canada shall withdraw Order-in-Council PC 1966-54 dated March 23, 1966, which provides for the payment of subventions in respect of coal produced in Nova Scotia, insofar as these subventions relate to the coal mines being acquired by the Corporation and to the independent coal mines, it being understood by both Canada and Nova Scotia that the McBean Mine in the County of Pictou is not an independent mine.

(2) Effective December 29, 1966, no further loans shall be made to coal producers in respect of coal mined in Nova Scotia, under the terms of the Coal Production Assistance Act.

4. General

Nova Scotia shall recommend to the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia the implementation of such of the terms of this Agreement as may require legislative approval.

In Witness whereof The Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, has hereunto set his hand on behalf of Canada, and The Honourable Robert L. Stanfield, Premier of Nova Scotia has set his hand on behalf of Nova Scotia.

UNVEILING OF BRONZE PORTRAIT OF HON. MARIANA BEAUCHAMP JODOIN

IN THE SENATE ANTECHAMBER,

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14, 1967

The Hon. the Speaker of the Senate: Madame Jodoin and members of your family, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, my colleagues of the Senate, and ladies and gentlemen: We are particularly happy, after many postponements, some because of illness and others by reason of recesses of Parliament, to be able finally to confer this mark of honour upon our old colleague, Madame Jodoin.

I am delighted to extend a particular welcome to the Prime Minister, who has consented to officiate at this ceremony. I shall not enlarge on my introduction of the Prime Minister. He is a busy man, and we appreciate very much his taking the time to be with us on this occasion.

Ladies and gentlemen, I present to you the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, Prime Minister of Canada.

The Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, Madame Jodoin may be your old colleague, but she looks awfully young to me.

I do not need to tell you, I am sure, of how happy I am to be here on this occasion when we honour Madame Mariana Beauchamp Jodoin who herself had the honour in 1953 of being the first French-speaking Canadian lady called to the Senate.

However, that is only one of the many honours that have been conferred on Madame Jodoin during her lifetime of service to her city, Montreal, her province, Quebec, and her country, Canada. They are honours that she has certainly well deserved because of her dedication to public service throughout her life. Indeed, during all her life—I have been looking up her record this afternoon, and I have learned much about her—she has been active in charitable, social and political activities. But, her achievements have not all been in public activity.

Elle a été en même temps l'épouse d'un membre fort occupé du Barreau et la mère dévouée de quatre enfants. Il serait trop long d'énumérer ici en détail toutes les organisations et les associations dont madame Jodoin s'est occupée au cours de sa vie.

Perhaps I should mention one or two in order to demonstrate what a versatile person she has been in women's organizations. She has worked in the rehabilitation of the deaf and the dumb, la Société des Femmes Universitaires, le Cercle des Femmes Journalistes, the Business and Professional Women's Club, and, of course, the World Association of Women Executives.

During World War II, Mr. Speaker—and you may not know this—Senator Jodoin served as a "dollar a year man" for six years with the Wartime Prices and Trade Board. She has always been busy, and she has always been charming too.

In unveiling this bronze bust by a well-known sculptor, Sylvia D'Aoust, whom we are delighted to have with us this afternoon, we are recognizing Madame Jodoin's services to her country, and the distinction of being the first French-Canadian lady called to the Senate of Canada.

I take great pleasure in unveiling this bust.

(The bronze portrait was unveiled)

The Hon. the Speaker of the Senate: Before I call upon Madame Jodoin, I am sure we would like to hear from the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Mr. Prime Minister, Madame Jodoin, and ladies and gentlemen, there is very little one can add by way of embellishment of what the Prime Minister has already said about Madame Jodoin. Upon her retirement from the Senate, or, immediately after her retirement, we there paid her a tribute that all of us felt from our hearts she deserved. I can only add today that we enjoyed her company in the Senate and we miss her very much.

Madame Jodoin is the daughter of a great jurist, she was the wife of a jurist, and she is the mother of a fine family. As the Prime Minister has said, she has occupied herself in charitable, philanthropic, and patriotic work throughout her lifetime, and we are indeed most happy to be here on this occasion when she becomes not a senator again, but a continuing permanent member of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker of the Senate: It is our pleasure to have with us the acting Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, Senator Choquette. He is here representing Senator Brooks, who is unavoidably absent from the city. We would all like to hear from Senator Choquette.

L'honorable Lionel Choquette: Monsieur le premier ministre, madame Jodoin, mesdames et messieurs, c'est à regret que mon chef, M. Brooks, a dû s'absenter pour se rendre à une autre cérémonie au Nouveau-Brunswick. Il m'a demandé de le remplacer et surtout de transmettre un message à madame Jodoin. Il m'a dit: tu pourras la rassurer que je l'ai toujours trouvée une femme très charmante; chaque fois qu'elle parlait, je savais qu'elle dirait quelque chose de constructif et qu'elle le dirait très bien. Il utilisait toujours son appareil auditif pour écouter la traduction simultanée.

En 1958, lors de ma nomination au Sénat, on m'a dit que je devrais hésiter à accepter parce que, entouré de vieillards, je vieillirais à vue d'œil. Je me suis aperçu qu'ils n'avaient pas raison, mais, aujourd'hui, je constate qu'ils avaient raison parce que, depuis que madame Jodoin nous a quittés, elle semble avoir beaucoup rajeuni.

Je félicite les dames d'avoir organisé cette belle fête et d'avoir su immortaliser les traits de madame Jodoin dans un buste qui prendra désormais place dans l'antichambre du Sénat.

The Hon. the Speaker of the Senate: Now, Madame Jodoin, we will give you a chance to reply.

L'honorable Madame Mariana B. Jodoin: Monsieur le premier ministre, monsieur le président du Sénat, chers collègues, chers amis, il y a un an je quittais le Sénat emportant avec moi le souvenir ineffaçable de votre amitié et des bons égards que vous avez toujours témoignés à la première Canadienne française nommée au Sénat par le Très Honorable Louis St-Laurent.

Je viens vous donner la preuve de mon attachement au Sénat, où, par la pensée, je revois souvent vos personnalités attachantes, en reprenant ma place non loin de vous. Cet honneur que j'apprécie hautement, croyez-le bien, je le dois tout particulièrement à l'honorable Sydney Smith, président du Sénat, qui a bien voulu faire ce geste gracieux d'honorer, en ma modeste personne, la première Canadienne française et lui accorder l'hospitalité dans l'entrée de la Chambre Haute du Parlement canadien où règne la plus cordiale affabilité.

Mr. Prime Minister, thank you very much for your kind remarks. You have always in your life proved that you are a great man, and a great diplomat. I admire you very deeply, and I appreciate very much your presence here today. It will be a great souvenir for my family and myself.

Je remercie également le leader du Sénat pour les belles paroles qu'il a eues à mon égard, ainsi que l'honorable M. Choquette, leader suppléant de l'Opposition, mais en ce moment je crois qu'il n'y a pas d'opposition, alors j'en suis très reconnaissante.

Accompagnée par madame Flore Jutras, l'instigatrice de cette idée de perpétuer, par cette effigie, la présence de la femme canadienne-française à la Chambre Haute, ma gratitude envers elle est sans borne, car elle témoigne de sa valeur personnelle qui d'ailleurs dépasse les bornes de la province de Québec.

A l'artiste canadienne Sylvia D'Aoust, sculpteur de grand mérite, je dis un merci bien profond, pour avoir réussi, par ses talents inspirateurs, à voiler un peu les années accumulées sur ma tête.

Merci à vous tous chers sénateurs qui, par votre présence, me rappelez de bien beaux jours passés sous ce toit. Entourée de ma famille et d'amis très sincères, ce moment est pour eux et pour moi un jour mémorable et nous en sommes très émus.

En leur nom et au mien, je vous dis le plus profond merci!

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 29, 1967

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL COMMISSIONS OF INVESTIGATION

NAMES, PURPOSES, COSTS, ETC.—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Notice of Inquiry of Hon. Chesley W. Carter:

That he will inquire of the Government:

1. How many Royal Commissions, commissions or other special investigating bodies has the federal Government appointed in the last 20 years?

2. What, in each case, is (a) the name, (b) the purpose, (c) the year of the appointment and the year of termination; and (d) the cost to date of such Royal Commissions, commissions or other special investigating bodies?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Stand.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I wish to make just one observation respecting this inquiry, which is of a much wider scope than the inquiry I placed upon the Order Paper of the Senate a few months ago. This concerns investigations made by royal commissions, but it embraces all royal commissions that have been appointed in this country during the last 20 years. My inquiry was in respect of only the royal commissions and the lawyers appointed to them over three years, and for the Province of Quebec only. The information I received was shapeless, and 84 Crown companies and government agencies did not comply with the order of the Senate which had been conveyed to them by the Secretary of State.

In order to know something of the amounts paid to each firm, the records of each department had to be checked and the information put on pieces of paper and then arranged in alphabetical order. That work was done in my office under my direction, and I returned the file with the revised answer to the honourable Leader of the Government.

I must warn Senator Carter to be very careful and very wise, because in many departments no attention is paid to the orders that are received from either the Senate or the House of Commons. I must tell my honourable colleagues that on one occasion I asked a question of a former Deputy Minister of National Revenue, who was one of the top civil servants, Mr. David Sim. A bureaucrat of some kind submitted his answer to my question to the attention of Mr. Sim. Mr. Sim looked at it, and said, "This is most unsatisfactory. Mr. Pouliot will not accept such an answer. Go and draft it again, and make it complete.

I am afraid that Senator Carter will have the same experience.

The inquiry stands.

CRIMINAL CODE (HATE PROPAGANDA)

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to study and report upon amendments to the Criminal Code relating to the dissemination of varieties of "hate propaganda" in Canada as set out in Bill S-5, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code";

That the following senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the Special Joint Committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Belisle, Bourque, Choquette, Croll, Lang and Roebuck:

That the committee have power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee, and to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that house to unite with the Senate for the above purposes, and to select, if the House of Commons deems advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

He said: Honourable senators, I gave notice of this motion two days ago. It simply re-establishes the committee.

Motion agreed to.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Donald Smith moved the third reading of Bill C-135, to establish the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS

PRINCIPAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—THIRD READING

Hon. Donald Cameron moved the third reading of Bill S-11, respecting Principal Life Insurance Company of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BRITISH NORTHWESTERN INSURANCE COMPANY—THIRD READING

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson moved the third reading of Bill S-14, respecting British Northwestern Insurance Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux, seconded by Hon. Mr. Nichol, for an address in reply thereto.

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I should like in the first place to thank my colleague, Senator Deschatelets, for having temporarily lent me his desk, so that I could more easily follow my notes.

[English]

I want my first words in this house to be a tribute to my distinguished predecessor, the Honourable A. K. Hugessen. During his active public life, Senator Hugessen made a lasting contribution to the Senate, although he did not seek publicity. He was truly a wise man, and as such perfectly qualified for the sober second thought.

I remember vividly the speech he made on the Coyne affair. His contribution was, in my view, the best of the entire debate in both houses. He was deeply attached to our democratic institutions and to the principle of human rights on which they are founded. I do hope that his retirement will not prevent him from continuing to serve our country for many years to come.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I want also to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address. The time at my disposal does not allow me to comment in detail on their speeches. I merely want to say that both of them have fulfilled their honourable task with intelligence and dignity.

Before dealing with my main topic, I want to express my most sincere gratitude to all honourable senators who have congratulated me, either orally or in writing, upon my appointment to this chamber.

I intend to concentrate my remarks today on the paragraphs in the Speech from the Throne dealing with our scientific effort. In the long run, and apart from the issue of peace and war, this is in my view the most important area of our national policy, because if our scientific effort fails or is inadequate we will not be able to adjust as a nation to the formidable challenges of the new society which is now rapidly emerging.

Since the beginning of the nineteenth century we have witnessed two major technological revolutions. The first was based mainly on coal and steel; the second, which appeared at the beginning of the present century, was characterized by substitutes for coal as sources of energy and by substitutes for steel, which had been up to that point the main industrial material. This second industrial period has also been described as the age of electricity.

Now a third major technological revolution has begun. The new era will become the atomic age, the space age and, what is perhaps more important for our planet, the age of cybernetics, that is, the joint application of automation and electronic brains.

Ever since the invention of the steam engine we have produced better and better machines, which have been wonderful extensions of our bodies. Today we have machines able to reproduce the most intricate and most complicated movements of the human body—only they do it more rapidly and with fewer mistakes.

What is even more amazing is that we are now inventing "intellectual" machines, which are becoming the frightening extensions of our minds. They can learn; they can detect and correct their own mistakes. They can think as originally as a man of average skills. The new era will be primarily a revolution in methods and techniques of production. The physical and intellectual work done by man today will, in the future, be performed more and more by machines. Children born today will live in a "cyberneticized" world when they enter the labour force.

If scientific progress were now to stop, the full consequences of the new inventions already made would be far-reaching and all-embracing, but the terrifying fact is that scientific progress will proceed in the future at a much more accelerated pace than the unprecedented rate experienced in the last 25 years.

There are approximately 1,500,000 researchers in the world today. They represent more than 90 per cent of all those researchers who have lived since the beginning of humanity. The United States alone is spending about $25 billion annually on research and development. This means that scientific research has ceased to be an isolated and rare phenomenon. Progress and discoveries have ceased to be fortuitous events. They have become a regular process determined by the level of exenditures devoted to research. For the first time in its history, humanity is entering into an era of permanent scientific revolution.

We must also realize that science and technology now live closer together; that research and development have become a continuous process. Technical progress leading to innovations is much more directly related to scientific progress than before. Even the time lag which used to exist between the two has been greatly reduced. Thus, the permanent scientific revolution will generate what I call a permanent technological revolution.

Finally, the spreading of innovations in the economic flow is much more rapid than before. Technological information is more abundant and more readily available. Better communications, the increasing role of the scientist in industry, the breaking of geographical barriers between markets, and more active competition within industries are all factors contributing to the more rapid diffusion of innovations. Thus the permanent technological revolution is producing finally a permanent industrial revolution.

Humanity itself is being propelled into orbit by its own scientific achievements and it will remain in perpetual motion for the foreseeable future. The world is condemned to change radically, rapidly and constantly. This is unprecedented in our history. Up to now, because our evolution was relatively slow, we could let the past determine the present. From now on we will have to look at the future to decide the present, if we do not want to be always and more and more late, and if we do not want to solve problems which have already disappeared. Thus, at a time when we are required to adjust to affluence, we must face the much greater challenge of the permanent industrial revolution.

[Translation]

With the permanent technological revolution and the constant transformations that ensue for humanity, the creation of a dynamic and balanced science organization and policy is to my mind becoming an urgent and absolute necessity at least in industrial countries. At a time when scientific and technical progress determines to an ever-increasing degree the pace and direction of growth and conditions of affluence, the collective research effort in the field of physical sciences becomes of basic importance. It bears directly upon productivity, the standard of living of the population and the competitive position of an economy. It forms in a way the basis, the starting point of the new society.

But the scientific endeavour of a nation must not stop there. It must also extend to the sciences of life. More and more advanced research on plant and animal life are essential to the progress of agriculture, fishing and the forest industry. It also brings a valuable contribution to the science of human life, as it has often been shown.

In this latter field, research must be intensified because affluence and the evolution of mankind require the renewal of medicine and related sciences. Infectious diseases have been defeated. Now, degenerative diseases or what we call the "diseases of civilization" must be dealt with. The knowledge of the properties and of direct and indirect effects of new drugs is clearly inadequate. Diseases of the soul are spreading fast but remain quite mysterious. Rapid changes in living conditions threaten the psycho-effective balance of man. The dehumanization of labour, crowding, restraints, boredom, affluence itself, bring on psychoses and depressions, possibly easier to prevent than to cure. And yet, research and preventive medicine are still being neglected.

Finally, a general scientific policy must have a third dimension: that of human sciences, the social sciences. We are gradually making the discovery of which the rich man has long been aware that "money is not happiness." And we are not prepared as a community for this discovery. In the past, we used to believe that if mankind could achieve plenty, man would find happiness. It is to a large extent because of this belief that we have promoted by means of substantial grants the development of natural sciences but neglected the human sciences. Natural sciences could bring us affluence. Once this was achieved, what could human sciences bring to a human race that was supposed by then to have achieved happiness?

Now that we have affluence and a scientific society, we discover that man—his environment and also his institutions—must be altered more and more rapidly, that his efforts to adapt himself affect his whole behaviour, that he needs compensations to avoid wandering off the path upon which he is being led by the new society. We realize that it is not easy to organize constant change, and economic, social and political problems are becoming complicated instead of being eliminated.

In short, it is a three-dimensional scientific society that must first be evolved, if we want to prevent a promising future from becoming catastrophic to man. To achieve that aim, we must try to make the most of the results of research conducted in other countries and avoid useless duplications. But in our own interest and because of our peculiar problems, we cannot be satisfied with that parasitical condition. We have already achieved much by ourselves, especially since the second world war. We must now hasten to do more.

[English]

In the field of the physical and life sciences the research effort in Canada has for a long time been markedly inferior to that of most other industrialized countries. According to a report prepared by the O.E.C.D., in 1961 the United States appropriated approximately 3.5 per cent of their gross national product to research and development expenditures. That percentage reached almost 2.5 per cent in the United Kingdom, and approximately 1.5 per cent in Sweden, Western Germany, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Japan and France. In Canada it was only 0.8 per cent.

While in most other countries the percentage of research and development expenditures in relation to total expenditures had increased rapidly in the fifties, and while this trend did not give signs of slowing down, in Canada that ratio was relatively stable. Based on a rough estimate, it hardly exceeded one per cent in 1964-65. I wish to emphasize, however, that the Government substantially increased its assistance to research agencies, both public and private, since that time. But the fact remains that, on the admission of the Minister of Industry, the Honourable Mr. Drury, who takes so much interest in this problem, the amounts we are spending on research, even now, are far from adequate.

Several factors contributed to restrict our scientific development. Our universities were forced for budgetary reasons to concentrate on teaching. Some of our industries merely exploited our natural resources. Others, most of which were subsidiaries of American firms, resorted, sometimes with some delay, to a technology developed in the United States, but which was not always adjusted to Canadian conditions. In the public sector, provincial governments showed little interest in scientific research. Finally, at the federal level, research and development expenditures rose but slowly after the Second World War, particularly when compared to the increase in our national income. Under such conditions, the progress achieved is amazing.

Although our research program in the field of the physical and life sciences is too restricted, it appears gigantic as compared with our effort in the field of the human and social sciences. Here, even the assessment of research and development expenditures is still to be done. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics and similar provincial departments surely make a valued contribution through their surveys. The public and private sectors increase their development expenditures quite rapidly by using more and more experts in the human sciences for the development of their new projects and policies.

Royal commissions give sporadic encouragement to applied research. Several government agencies have made marginal contributions, and recently the Canada Council has devoted half of a far too limited budget to the human sciences and the humanities. What we have done for the human sciences in particular is, therefore, completely inadequate. That inadequacy is all the more acute as the results of research done abroad are usually applicable in Canada in the case of the physical and the life sciences, while they do not always apply in the field of the human sciences. Little wonder that our understanding of our economic, social and political problems and their solution is so limited.

In short, our scientific effort has grown rapidly in the last few years, yet it remains clearly inadequate compared with other industrialized countries. We now spend approximately one per cent of our gross national product on research and development, while most of the other Western countries averaged 2 per cent and some have even exceeded that percentage. With the era of the permanent scientific revolution, the rate and content of our development will inevitably suffer from that deficiency. Already we lose each year too many of our scientists. Eventually it will be the Canadian people as a whole who will suffer.

In my view we must double our effort in the field of scientific research as soon as possible. That objective is not exaggerated since it will not enable us to come even near to catching up with most of the industrial countries. To achieve that without waste during the next few years, we must, right now, put to efficient use all our available resources and increase them as quickly as possible in terms of researchers as well as equipment. That is a gigantic task in which we, as a nation, cannot afford to fail.

Honourable senators, not only are we not doing enough in the field of scientific research, but the very structure of our scientific society at present, especially at the government level, is deficient. The creation of the National Research Council in 1916 was for us a most important step, and that agency remains a model of its kind throughout the world. However, a high proportion of our total research program has gradually become the by-product of the activities of various government departments. These scattered scientific activities result in imbalance, prevent co-ordination, lead to inefficiency, and create isolation, at a time when scientific research becomes more and more interdependent. Those observations have already been formulated by the Glassco Commission. They are probably even more valid today.

In the field of the physical sciences, in 1964-65, seventeen different organizations within the federal Government spent $80 million on applied research, and eight devoted $34 million to basic research. The researchers within these organizations were submitted to very different administrative systems. Some of them came under crown corporations, enjoyed more freedom, and worked in a climate favourable to research; others were in the armed forces or in government departments. Each organization had its own research program, and often also its own system of grants. It is very likely that the quality of research varied from one organization to the next.

In the field of the life sciences, in 1964-65, 17 federal agencies appropriated a $43-million budget for applied research, and nine earmarked $18 million for basic research. Agricultural sciences received $33 million, biological sciences $16 million, and medical sciences $12 million. Furthermore, 15 various agencies showed an interest in biological sciences, and five in medicine. Research in the field of the life sciences was still more scattered than in the field of the physical sciences and programs appeared even more unbalanced.

Finally, there was very little fundamental and applied research done within the federal Government, in the field of the human sciences, except in the Economic Council of Canada and, occasionally, by royal commissions.

Canada will not have the dynamic, efficient and balanced scientific society which it needs, as long as our effort, especially at the level of fundamental and applied research, is organized on the basis of subjects such as agriculture, fisheries, forestry, rather than on the basis of scientific disciplines.

The re-organization of our scientific effort is urgently required. The recent establishment of the Science Secretariat and the Science Council of Canada will no doubt contribute to an improvement of the situation, but I think that the reform needed is much more drastic.

I am sure we all agree that our scientific society must be pluralistic and that the private and public sectors can complement each other in their role. The contribution of universities and industry is essential, but in the end I think that we shall find, as other countries have realized, that we shall have to rely more and more on what the Government does, either directly or indirectly, through incentives and subventions.

All countries entrust their central government with the prime responsibility of the state in the field of scientific research. The same applies even for those countries which have a federal constitution, such as the United States, West Germany, Switzerland and Australia. Canada is no exception to that rule. Several reasons justify such an arrangement.

Because of its responsibility in the field of external relations, the federal Government must normally be the main centre of scientific information, accumulating all possible data on research being carried out in Canada and in other countries. Then, the role played by the federal Government in the fields of defence, space control, atomic energy, agriculture, fisheries, transport and communications, and overall economic growth, compels it to make massive and extensive research efforts to be equal to its task. Finally, a main centre of co-ordination and financing of scientific policy is extremely desirable if we want to save money and manpower, which is already scarce, if we want to avoid gaps and duplications, and maintain a proper balance between the various sectors of research.

If an efficient scientific policy requires a main centre, it certainly does not exclude the active participation of provincial governments which must ensure that an increasing portion of university budgets is devoted to research. They must also take an interest in development research to help small enterprises and industries which are mostly provincial in scope. Provincial governments must set up appropriate agencies to carry out efficiently those new tasks.

On the other hand, the main responsibility of the federal Government in the field of research is not seriously questioned in our country, except by a few extremists. But then our Government has the obligation to play its role fully, as efficiently as possible. That means, first of all, that it must be ready to double its effort during the next few years, and this will eventually imply an additional expenditure of more than $300 million a year. That means also a basic revision of the structures designed to formulate and implement our scientific policy.

What is needed most of all, within the federal Government, is the centralization and better co-ordination of scientific policy, at the level of basic research and applied research in the three fields of the physical, the life and the human sciences. To achieve that centralization and to carry out that integration it will be necessary, in my opinion, to create three institutes which will become the centres of basic research and, especially, applied research in the three fields I have just mentioned, and which will also make grants, for those purposes, to industry and universities.

In this new context, the National Research Council, by giving up its activities in the field of the life sciences, would become the Physical Sciences Research Institute. The greatest possible integration within this institute of all federal endeavours in the field of the physical sciences would be most desirable. The same would apply to the Life Sciences Research Institute which would also assume the responsibilities of the Medical Research Council, which the Bladen Commission has already recommended. Finally, the Human Sciences Research Institute, by establishing its own research program, would answer a great need in our country. It would also manage the grant program, now handled by the Canada Council, in the field of the human sciences. Those three institutions would complete the work of the universities in basic research, while dwelling more specifically on applied research.

The Science Council should be above those three institutes and should be assisted, as it is more and more now, by a permanent secretariat. The Council would study all the aspects of scientific policy and make recommendations to improve it. Its disinterested advice, based on a comprehensive knowledge of research programs in Canada and other countries, would make it easier to propose an overall scientific budget, to establish priorities and to distribute the work between the private and the public sectors.

Finally, with the integration and merging of the Government's main scientific activities the time has come to create a federal department of scientific affairs. Great Britain, France, Germany, and Italy already have such departments. In Canada, as in Belgium and Sweden, the Prime Minister is responsible for scientific matters, although this function is shared by several other ministers whose departments are particularly involved in certain scientific and technical questions. A cabinet committee tries, without too much success, to ensure co-ordination.

Experience proves that this arrangement is inefficient. A Prime Minister is so overworked that even though he should like to be concerned with scientific policy, he has not the time required to deal with it in detail. The Glassco Commission suggested that this responsibility be turned over to the President of the Treasury Board. This solution is contrary to the experience of several other countries which are seeking to remove scientific policy from the nerve centre of budgetary control.

The establishment of a department of scientific affairs is the only efficient formula, since we must not only co-ordinate but unify and consolidate our scientific efforts. This department would include the three research institutes I have suggested, the Science Council, and a permanent scientific secretariat. It would have the overall responsibility for scientific policy, including assistance programs to the private sector. Finally, the minister of scientific affairs would preside over the committee on scientific policy.

Honourable senators, I would like to conclude my speech by making a concrete proposal to this chamber. In the course of my remarks I have criticized our present scientific policy and I have shown how it could be improved. I certainly do not pretend that my criticism is fully justified, or that the blueprint I have put forward should be implemented immediately, without further discussion. I hope, however, that the two following propositions will remain unchallenged.

Firstly, as we enter the era of the permanent industrial revolution, our collective scientific effort becomes of vital importance for our future prosperity, and even for our future independence. Secondly, our federal scientific policy should be carefully and systematically reviewed and investigated at this most appropriate moment. Both its structural organization and its content should be considered in order to appraise its priorities, to detect the areas of duplication and gaps, and, generally speaking, to evaluate its adequacy and efficiency.

The proposed investigation of our scientific policy should be undertaken by the Senate during the present session. I am not too impressed by most of the criticisms I hear about our Chamber. I feel, however, that the Senate has not been using its wide powers of investigation enough. We should use this prerogative more systematically, and concentrate on the consideration of long-term problems which do not receive enough attention in our country. The other Chamber is unfortunately, but almost inevitably, too much involved with day-to-day and short-term questions. Here we have the time, the talent and the detachment which are necessary for the proper consideration of more fundamental and perhaps less urgent issues.

Our scientific effort is certainly one of those, and I do hope that the investigation I have proposed will soon be undertaken by a committee of this Chamber, assisted by a qualified staff. If, at the end of our hearings and discussions, a realistic but imaginative report is issued, this could mark the beginning of a radical reform of the structure of our central government, which is so urgently needed if that government is to fulfill adequately the important tasks required by the new emerging society.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of this debate, if it is to be resumed after the summer recess of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the honourable senator mind if Senator Argue continued the debate very briefly tomorrow morning, after which he could move its adjournment? Perhaps Senator Pouliot would give way to Senator Argue, on that understanding.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I have no objection. I move the adjournment of the debate on behalf of Senator Argue. Will the debate be continued until after the recess?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, for Hon. Mr. Argue, debate adjourned.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I understand that all honourable senators are agreed that the remaining items on the Order Paper stand.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 10.30 a.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, June 30, 1967

The Senate met at 10.30 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. John J. Connolly tabled:

Order in Council P.C. 1967-1269, dated June 22, 1967, amending Order in Council P.C. 1967-1098, dated June 1, 1967, which authorized the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, pursuant to section 21A of the Export Credits Insurance Act, to vary certain of the requirements for repayment of its loans made to the President of India, pursuant to section 21B of the said Act, chapter 105, R.S.C., 1952, as amended 1960-61. (English text).

Order in Council P.C. 1967-1290, dated June 27, 1967, authorizing, under section 21A of the Export Credits Insurance Act, long-term financing by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation for the purchase from Northern Electric Company Limited of telecommunications equipment, goods and services by the Post Telegraph and Telephone Administration, Ankara, Turkey, pursuant to section 21B of the said Act, chapter 105, R.S.C., 1952, as amended 1960-61. (English text).

Report of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, including its Accounts and Financial Statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, pursuant to sections 85(3) and 87(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

Report on the Administration of the Small Businesses Loans Act for the year ended December 31, 1966, pursuant to section 11 of the said Act, chapter 5, Statutes of Canada, 1960-61. (English and French texts).

Report on the Administration of the Veterans' Business and Professional Loans Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, pursuant to section 13 of the said Act, chapter 278, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

Report of the Atlantic Development Board for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, including its Accounts and Financial Statements certified by the Auditor General, pursuant to section 19 of the Atlantic Development Board Act, chapter 10, Statutes of Canada, 1962-63. (English text).

Communique, dated June 23, 1967, issued following the eleventh meeting of the Joint Canada-United States Ministerial Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs, held at Montreal, June 20-22, 1967 (English text).

Report of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, including its Accounts and Financial Statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, pursuant to section 14 of the Surplus Crown Assets Act, chapter 260, and sections 85(3) and 87(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Friday, July 7 next, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I take it you anticipate that that is when the Appropriation Bill will be available for our consideration, and that there is no other business to come before us?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): As I am advised at the present time, the only matter to come before us at that time will be final supply on the ten departments agreed to in the other place, interim supply for four months on the remaining departments for which final supply has not been granted, and four months' interim supply on the supplementaries tabled yesterday. There may be additional items in certain of the departments to cover seasonal expenditures, but this is customary in supply bills.

I would draw to the attention of honourable senators the fact that the Finance Committee will be meeting on Friday morning, probably at 10 o'clock; in any event, notices will be circulated. At that meeting any items honourable senators desire to inquire about in respect of the bills in question will certainly be open for discussion.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

CABRI PIPE LINES LTD.—THIRD READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald, for Hon. J. Harper Prowse, moved the third reading of Bill S-16, to incorporate Cabri Pipe Lines Ltd.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

VAWN PIPE LINES LTD.—THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. McDonald, for Hon. Mr. Prowse, moved the third reading of Bill S-17, to incorporate Vawn Pipe Lines Ltd.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate resumed from yesterday, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux, seconded by Hon. Mr. Nicol, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, my first words in this debate are to congratulate His Excellency on his appointment as Governor General. I know he will bring great distinction to this office, and in doing so he will enjoy the help and encouragement of his talented and gracious wife.

I also extend my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, both of whom, I thought, made outstanding contributions to this debate.

The press of Canada often deal harshly, unfairly and sometimes in the most extravagant terms with our national political leaders, but never I think more unfairly than in an article by Peter C. Newman in The Canadian magazine early this year, wherein he likened the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson and the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker to two neurotic, troublesome zoo animals in the care of an animal psychiatrist; and again, in making a would-be joke, Mr. Newman said that if the two were going down on a sinking ship the country would be saved.

In what surely must have been a mental black-out, Mr. Newman referred with approval to the United States having changed leaders three times during the period of the Pearson, Diefenbaker leadership. A strange reference, when leadership in the United States was not changed by the ballot but, in the case of President Eisenhower, by the Constitution which prevented him from seeking a third term, and in the case of President Kennedy by an assassin's bullet.

I think senators on both sides of this chamber deplore this kind of journalism.

In spite of attacks of all kinds, progress has been made in our country during the leadership of both the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker and the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson.

Because of this attack and others, I want at this time to make a brief review of the major accomplishments of the Pearson Government since it took office. Remember, whatever the accomplishments, they have been achieved under the most difficult circumstances, a minority government throughout the whole of its period of office, facing as it has a multiple, vocal and sometimes intransigent opposition. The opinions as to the achievements of this Government, of course, vary greatly. Some have seen it as weak, indecisive and floundering. Others have said the Prime Minister of this country, with the achievements of his government, will go down as one of the great Prime Ministers of all time. What does the record show?

From a standpoint of national unity these have been very trying years. We have had outbursts of separatism in the Province of Quebec. There has sometimes been violence. There have been irresponsible outbursts in other parts of Canada. Extremist elements have formed a separatist party in one place, a Bulldog party in another.

During this period of time, the Pearson Government has endeavoured to bring about quiet reform, has given sympathetic understanding to the legitimate aspirations of Quebec, as well as the other provinces. Not only have Canadians of French origin found an improved climate in the federal Civil Service and in industry, but there has been in general across the country an almost spontaneous action by provincial governments to improve the knowledge and use of the French language. Important steps have been taken to strengthen unity in our country. Very much remains to be done, but it seems to me that there has been a vast improvement in understanding throughout our country. There has been a real strengthening of national unity, and the voices of the extremist elements are neither as loud nor as dangerous as they were a few years ago.

And as we have spoken of the two founding races, English and French, greater attention has been drawn to the enormous contribution to our strength and culture by people from the many lands of Europe and from other still more distant countries.

The foundations of our nation are truly being secured and strengthened.

One of the greatest forward movements by the Pearson Government has been in the field of social security legislation in old age and in retirement pensions. There has been a rapid and almost revolutionary advance in the whole old age pension and old age security system. This can be stated briefly as follows:

First, the basic old age pension itself has been increased from $55 to $75 per month in two stages. Starting January 1, 1966, the eligible age for the old age security pension was reduced from 70 to 69 years, and then provision was made for a one-year reduction each year so that by January 1, 1970 everyone in Canada aged 65 or more will be entitled to the basic security pension of $75.

Second, by new legislation passed last year, all those people in receipt of the old age security pension are guaranteed a minimum income of $105 a month. This means that everyone in receipt of the old age security pension who has little or no income will be guaranteed a supplement of the amount necessary to provide a basic minimum income of $105 a month.

A further major advance in retirement pensions was brought about by passage of the Canada Pension Plan. This is based on the belief that each person capable of earning an income should make a contribution to his or her pension, and the size of the pension should be related to the individual's earnings. The Canada Pension Plan is in general all-embracive and includes all people earning incomes. It came into operation January 1, 1966, and after it has been in operation for a period of ten years it will be fully operative, in that those who retire will receive the full pension just as though they had been contributing to the plan over a full working lifetime.

An increased old age security pension, a guaranteed minimum income to pensioners of $105 per month, together with the Canada Pension Plan, constitute gigantic steps forward in the whole field of old age security.

For many years, organizations, political parties and others have been demanding, promoting and promising suitable symbols of Canada's nationhood. For a long time, political parties promised to deal with the question of a suitable national flag for Canada. It was left to Prime Minister Pearson and his Government to take the initiative in asking Parliament to adopt a suitable national flag for our country. It is to the credit of the vision, tenacity and courage of Prime Minister Pearson that in the face of much filibuster, ranging over a long period of months and strong opposition in certain parts of the country, the maple leaf flag was adopted.

As one travels the cities, the highways and by-ways of this country, it is obvious that Canadians have taken to their new flag as they seldom have taken to a new thing in the past. It flies not only from Government buildings of all kinds but from the buildings of private companies and schools, and is in the yards and homes of very many Canadians. It is a symbol only, but an important one, of our nationhood and our growing unity.

Parliament has agreed unanimously that we should have a national anthem and we are in the process of adopting music and lyrics that will have meaning for Canadians from coast to coast. Our old age security system, our flag and our new national anthem will all have an important and permanent place in the future development of this country.

In agriculture there have been major achievements. Fluid milk producers received $2.92 a hundredweight for milk in 1963. This has steadily increased through Government policy until today it has reached $4.75 per hundredweight.

For the wheat producer whose own accomplishments of increased efficiency have been phenomenal, exports have increased from a one-time normal of 300 million bushels per year to consistent exports in each of the last three years in excess of 500 million bushels. And in the last three years, the Wheat Board final payments have ranged between 38 and 48 cents per bushel, bringing the farmers a net price at the farm of between $1.63 and $1.73 per bushel for No. 3 northern wheat. Moreover, barring unforeseen circumstances, there is the prospect of a further net increase of from seven to 10 cents per bushel in the final payment next year.

One of the most serious problems facing our nation at this time is to bring about greater efficiency in government itself and a reduction of expenditures wherever possible. It is very easy for a government facing constant political pressures to take too often the easy road of saying yes when the answer should be no, or of failing to bring about economies, because somebody invariably gets hurt. In this whole field it seems to me that the Pearson Government is making major advances.

One that comes to mind is the unification of Canada's armed forces. In taking this step, Canada has led the rest of the world. The Government and the Minister of National Defence, the Honourable Paul Hellyer, believe that the unification of the armed forces will result in greater value for the defence dollar. This action has been a break with tradition, and has encountered strong, honest and sincere opposition. The Government and the minister are to be congratulated in maintaining a consistent policy that will lead to what many are convinced will be an improvement in efficiency in this important area of Canadian activity.

A royal commission set up under the previous Government led by the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker to inquire into the operation of transportation facilities in this country made its report to the Pearson Government. It would have been easy in this complicated area to let this report gather dust. Instead after full inquiry and further examination, the Government proceeded with legislation, and after much discussion and many further amendments a new transportation policy is now the law of the land. It is my own personal view that further changes to transportation policies will probably be required to protect the legitimate interests of certain parts of the country.

The objectives of the Government to bring about measures of competition between the modes of transportation to relieve the Government, and thereby the taxpayers, of heavy subsidies paid to the railways, and to remove the albatross of automatically increased Government subsidies every time the railways granted wage increases are laudable. The Government has been courageous in bringing about this new transportation policy.

Another major royal commission report is on the doorstep of the Government. The Carter Royal Commission, inquiring into the taxation policies of this country, has found duplication, overlapping, inefficiency, a general hodgepodge of taxes and exemptions that everyone admits require major changes. It seems to me that the simple theme of the Carter Report is that taxation duplication and overlapping should be removed.

A major proposal to bring about this new concept is to provide taxation on all incomes whether earned or not, whether wages or salaries or capital gain. The prospect of the capital gains tax is disturbing to certain industries and to certain businesses, but the present situation seems to be grossly unfair in that if an individual by using his brain and his brawn exerts his own personal energy to obtain an income he is subject to the full income tax. The man who is already wealthy and whose investments experience a rapid capital gain has initially little or no tax to pay.

The easiest way for the Minister of Finance, the Honourable Mitchell Sharp, would be to say, "The Carter Commission was set up by another Government, and we will ignore it." Instead he has taken the position that this report deals with an exceedingly complicated and important problem, that its main features and recommendations should be considered by the Government and by a parliamentary committee, and after considering all further representations the Government should then introduce appropriate legislation.

I have enumerated in a brief and cursory fashion some of the major accomplishments of the Pearson Government. Although this Government has accomplished a great deal to date, it is today in the active process of pioneering new action on controversial questions where, in the judgment of the Government, it is time for enlightened action. The Government is opposed to capital punishment and has made this crystal clear not only by the fact that since taking office no one has been executed, but the Government has now accepted the responsibility of bringing in a measure to abolish capital punishment.

The Government has also decided that the time has come to broaden the grounds for divorce in Canada. One can truthfully say that up until this time such action would have received much greater opposition from many important parts of our nation. One can also say, however, that just as soon as it appeared possible to embark on this reform, the Government indicated its intention to do so; and, of course, no institution has played a more distinguished part in this whole field than the Senate of Canada, and in the Senate no individual a more distinguished part than the honourable Senator Roebuck.

The Pearson Government has announced that it is prepared to study the advanced concept of a guaranteed annual income. Some have seen this idea as just another means of giving people money whether or not they are prepared to work.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Argue: On the other hand, the guaranteed annual income will remove much of the duplication of the present hodgepodge patchwork system of social welfare and other income measures. The guaranteed annual income may well mean the consolidation of such things as Old Age Security, Old Age Assistance, Canada Assistance Plan, Unemployment Insurance, Family Allowances, etc.

The Pearson Government will give the guaranteed annual income the fullest study and, based on that study, may well lead the world in legislation providing a guaranteed annual income. The Pearson Government has used the role of government to improve our free enterprise system and to strengthen individual welfare, freedom, initiative and opportunity. The Pearson Government has acted to increase competition in the field of banking, railroads and airlines and in the manufacture of drugs. I suggest that the Pearson Government has proven itself in tune with the times. This is a government that thinks young and acts young. It is a government of action, intelligence and enlightenment. When the toughest of problems have confronted the Government, whether of national unity, manpower training, social reform, taxation, transportation or banking, the Government has acted. Whatever Mr. Pearson's future plans may be, I indeed wish him many more years of service to his country, and I think that we can all agree that our centennial Prime Minister has already acquired a place in history among the greatest of Canada's prime ministers.

On motion of Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough), debate adjourned.

PUBLICATION OF STATUTES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING —DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill S-18, to amend the Publication of Statutes Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in the first place, may I say that it is not the intention to proceed with this bill at this stage of the session beyond the explanatory stage which normally takes place on the motion for second reading. I also understand there is considerable interest in the subject matter of the bill, particularly on the part of the members of the legal profession. When the appropriate time comes, I shall propose that it be referred to a committee of the Senate—likely the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Before I come to the bill itself, I think it might be helpful were I to give a little background by way of a review of two statutes that are on the statute books of this country.

The first one to which I would refer is An Act respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 48 of the 1964-65 session, 13-14 Elizabeth II. I might summarize that statute briefly by saying that at that time, in 1965, Parliament established a Statute Revision Commission to be called The Commission and to consist of the Minister of Justice and five other members to be appointed by the Governor in Council. The act sets out the duties of the commission and generally follows the pattern of acts which have been passed by Parliament from time to time when the statutes are to be revised. It states the powers of the commission as to alterations, tables to be prepared by the commission, proclamations declaring the statutes in force as a result of the revision, the effect of the proclamation, and many other similar matters peculiar to the problems attendant upon the revision of statutes.

I would particularly draw the Senate's attention, however, to section 13 of that act, and for the record I will read it. It is as follows:

> The laws relating to the distribution of the printed copies of the statutes, and to the style of printing and binding of statutes, do not apply to the Revised Statutes, but the same shall be distributed in such numbers and to such persons only as the Governor in Council directs and shall be printed and bound in such style or form as the Commission deems best suited to the Revised Statutes.

I draw that particularly to the attention of the Senate because there is a broad power given by the act with reference to the form in which the Revised Statutes will appear, and the ultimate authority in respect of this has been left to be exercised by order in council.

I should like to turn to the act which it is now proposed should be amended by this bill. It is chapter 230 of the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1952, and is called the Publication of Statutes Act. Briefly, it deals with the publication of the annual statutes. It sets out the requirements and procedures to be followed in respect of the publication of statutes passed by each session of each Parliament. It provides, for example, that the Clerk of the Parliaments—who is the Clerk of the Senate—is to have custody of certain original documents. There is provision for a seal. There is provision for copies for the Registrar General. Section 9 deals with the requirement of furnishing certified copies to the Queen's Printer for the purpose of printing the bills passed by Parliament in the Annual Statute Book.

Section 10 is one of the sections to be amended by the bill now before the Senate. It is in part reproduced on the right-hand side under the explanatory notes and is the section with which we are most concerned. It provides that:

> The Acts of the Parliament of Canada shall be printed in two separate Parts, the first of which shall contain such of the said Acts and such Orders in Council. Proclamations and other documents, and such Acts of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, as the Governor in Council deems to be of a public and general nature or interest in Canada and directs to be inserted.

Those are the more general enactments, the more general public statutes which Parliament passes annually. The section continues:

> —and the second Part shall contain the remaining Acts of the session, and shall be printed after the first Part.

Honourable senators who are members of the legal profession, and others who have occasion to consult the statutes, realize that the private acts fall into this second category and are usually placed in the second section, towards the end of the volume.

The section also provides by subsection 2 that these two parts shall be bound together in one volume, unless it is impracticable to do so.

The section which is to be amended is section 10(3), and this is reproduced on the right-hand page of the bill before honourable senators. It presently provides that:

> Copies of the volume or volumes referred to in subsection (2) shall be printed in the English and French languages, respectively, by the Queen's Printer, who shall, as soon after the close of each session as is practicable, deliver or send by post or otherwise, in the most economical manner, the proper number of copies of the volume or volumes, in either or both languages as he is directed, to . . .

And here I am paraphrasing: in the first place, Members of Parliament and, in the second place, certain departments and other agencies of government.

Section 11 also provides for the form and character of the print that is to be used in the publication of the annual statutes. I draw attention to the fact that this bill also amends section 11. Section 11, which is set out at the bottom of the explanatory notes to the bill, presently reads:

> The Statutes shall be printed in royal octavo form on fine paper, in eleven point type, not more than four and three-quarters inches wide—

I need not read the rest because this is purely a technical provision that is perhaps best known to people who are familiar with the printer's trade.

Honourable senators will see on examination of the bill that section 10 (3) not only provides now for the printing in English and in French, but for distribution as set out now in the section. The requirement as to the printing in the two languages is now deleted from this section. It will appear in the next section. It is now provided:

> Copies of the volume or volumes referred to in subsection (2) shall be printed by the Queen's Printer, who shall, as soon after the close of each session as practicable, deliver or send by post or otherwise, in the most economical manner, the proper number of copies to . . .

And then there follows the present subsections (a) and (b) which mention members of the two Houses of Parliament, Government bodies, and others.

The second clause of the bill repeals section 11 of the act and substitutes therefor:

> (1) Subject to this section, the Statutes shall be printed in the English and French languages in such form, on such paper and in such type and shall be bound in such manner as the Governor in Council may prescribe by regulation.

The important point of the explanation is right here. What is sought to be accomplished by subsection (1) of section 11 is to give authority to make the form of annual statute books conform as closely as possible to the wide provisions, or the discretionary provisions, of section 13 of the Act of 1965 with respect to the printing of the Revised Statutes of Canada.

I need not deal with the two other subsections, one of which speaks about marginal notes and the size of print, and the other requires that if possible the annual statutes be printed in a single volume.

What I have given so far is the background of the legal instrument that we have before us for consideration. From a practical point of view, the purpose of this amendment is to achieve conformity. This bill provides for conformity in the form of the annual statutes with the form that the Commission charged with the publication of the Revised Statutes of Canada shall adopt.

I can say that it is proposed that when the revised statutes are printed it is the hope and expectation that each page will have two columns, one in English and one in French. Therefore, this bill makes it possible for the annual statutes to be published in the same form. Whether this is a desirable step to be taken depends a great deal, I think, upon the information that is to be gathered when this matter reaches the committee stage.

I am informed that the print that will be used for both the revised and the annual statutes will be somewhat smaller than the print in the present annual statutes and Revised Statutes of Canada, and the paper will be lighter. Putting both the French and English versions together on the same page will result in the addition of one volume to the revised statutes.

I am informed that the only other jurisdiction in which the statutes are required to be printed in both languages is the Province of Quebec. For years they have been publishing their statutes in this way. Based on the experience that was gained at the time that the Statutes of Quebec were revised in 1940 it was thought that with the lighter paper and the smaller print only one extra volume would be required.

I am informed that there are some 340 or so statutes to be included in the revision. Of course many statutes, by the time the revision occurs, are spent. Many statutes passed annually are replaced, and many statutes passed by Parliament are temporary.

Aside from those, there are other major omissions from the Revised Statutes of Canada. For example, the Criminal Code is not now included because it is constantly subject to revision. For that reason few lawyers would go to the revised statutes, as a preference, in order to read and consider a provision of the Criminal Code in which they were interested. The same applies to the Income Tax Act. I do not think a lawyer, an accountant, or a private citizen would go to the Revised Statutes of Canada to look at the provisions of the Income Tax Act, because they are changing from year to year, and sometimes oftener. As a result of this experience it is customary to omit certain of these larger and more voluminous statutes. That is one of the reasons why it seems to be reasonable to say that only one extra volume will be added.

There may be some advantage in having both the French and English versions on the one page. I am informed that at the present time the practice is to write the statutes in English and then translate them into French, but that practice is not to be continued. The English version, as passed by Parliament, will be drafted in English, but the French version will not be a translation of the English. It will be a French version of the law. It will have the same force and effect, of course, but it will be drafted as a French statute rather than being a translation from the English. I think that for the purpose of clarifying obscure meanings of sections, it is often helpful to the courts, to the legal profession and to other interested persons, to look at both French and English versions. Therefore, there may be some value in giving serious consideration to the proposal to print both French and English versions on the same page in narrow columns. This has proved to be successful in the Province of Quebec. It may very well be a useful procedure to be followed not only for the Revised Statutes of Canada but as well for the annual statutes.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, since most of us have had an opportunity of looking at this proposed bill only since yesterday, may I respectfully suggest to the Leader of the house that the matter might stand.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Do you wish to move the adjournment of the debate?

Hon. Mr. Walker: If I have the consent of the house.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Certainly.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Walker, debate adjourned.

BRITISH COLUMBIA-YUKON-NORTHWEST TERRITORIES BOUNDARY BILL, 1967

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill S-19, respecting the boundary between the Province of British Columbia and the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

He said: Honourable senators, I am sorry to inflict myself upon the Senate so soon again. However, this bill is a short one and readily understandable. I wish to say immediately that there may be a fairly wide interest in the measure, and therefore I propose at this stage that an explanation only be given; then the debate can be adjourned, and in due time the bill can be referred to committee, if the Senate so desires.

Briefly, the purpose of the bill is to confirm a series of surveyed monuments which have been placed to mark all but 39 miles, I believe, of the northern boundary of British Columbia. Altogether 622 miles of this boundary have been marked off on the ground between the years 1899 and 1959. The most westerly 39 miles have not been marked. Again, I think a little background is required in order to understand this measure.

In the year 1866 the British Parliament passed an act, being chapter 47, Anno Vicesimo Nono & Tricesimo, Victorie Reginae section 7 of which deals with the boundaries of British Columbia until the union of British Columbia with Canada. It reads as follows:

> Until the Union British Columbia shall comprise all such Territories within the Dominions of Her Majesty as are bounded to the South by the Territories of the United States of America, to the West by the Pacific Ocean and the Frontier of the Russian Territories in North America, to the North by the Sixtieth Parallel of North Latitude, and to the East from the Boundary of the United States Northwards by the Rocky Mountains and the One hundred and twentieth Meridian of West Longitude, and shall include Queen Charlotte's Island and all other Islands adjacent to the said Territories, except Vancouver Island and the Islands adjacent thereto.

There has obviously been a great change in boundaries, the territorial extent, of British Columbia since that time, but it is clear from this section, which has never been amended in this respect, that the northern boundary of British Columbia is the sixtieth parallel of north latitude.

The Yukon Act of 1952-53, as amended in 1958, chapter 9, refers in the schedule to the boundary of the Yukon territory, in this way:

> The Yukon Territory shall be bounded as follows: On the south, by the province of British Columbia and the United States Territory of Alaska; on the west,—

So, in effect, under this act the boundary set by the original British act for the Northern Boundary of British Columbia is adopted as the southern boundary of the Yukon Territory.

The Northwest Territories Act, which is the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 331, provides in section 2, subsection (i), in the first paragraph:

> (i) 'Territories' means the Northwest Territories, which comprise
> (i) all that part of Canada north of the Sixtieth Parallel of North Latitude, except the portions thereof that are within the Yukon Territory, the Province of Quebec or the Province of Newfoundland,— and certain other exceptions in Hudson Bay.

Honourable senators for many years no marks existed on the ground to indicate where the sixtieth parallel north latitude was. It was obvious, too, that at some stage there would be need in the interests of prospectors, miners, hunters, and the provinces themselves, to know precisely where the boundaries were for British Columbia and the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, and the province and the federal Government responsible for administering or controlling the development in the area certainly had to know where the boundaries began and ended.

In that remote part of Canada, the development came in three stages.

In 1898 with the advent of mining in the western section, particularly during the Klondike gold rush, there was great concern about the location of the boundary. In 1943, when the Alaska Highway was being built, in the central section there was some concern as to where these boundaries were. In 1947, when exploration for petroleum and natural gas began in the eastern section, again the question of the markings became important.

In each of these periods, the responsible ministers, both federal and provincial agreed that a survey should be arranged. The first of these surveys was undertaken in the year 1898 when the federal Department of the Interior, after discussion with the provincial authorities, undertook to survey the most westerly 165 miles of the boundary. This survey took from 1899 to 1908.

In 1943, the Government of Canada, with the concurrence of the Province of British Columbia, established the British Columbia-Yukon-Northwest Territories Boundary Commission. That commission was charged with the responsibility of surveying the boundaries and reporting to Parliament. The commission consisted of the Surveyor General of Canada and the Surveyor General of British Columbia. The survey began in 1945. As I have already indicated, with the exception of 39 miles, it was completed in 1959.

This survey included a rechecking of the 165 miles which had been surveyed between 1899 and 1908. In all, 622 miles of the boundary were surveyed and marked on the ground as a result of the work of that commission. The commission prepared its report, dated February 15, 1966. That report includes an atlas of the maps, which I show to honourable senators, and, if they are interested, I would be glad to let them have copies, especially if they are thinking of going up there to look over the situation. The maps in the atlas show the position of the boundaries by showing where the monuments are erected. The report was tabled in the Senate on December 14, 1966. This happens to be a particularly interesting report and, on the eve of the Centenary of our Confederation, it might be appropriate if I were to read briefly from the foreword prepared by the Dominion Archivist, Dr. W. K. Lamb. He says that the 60th parallel:

> ..."is thought to be the longest visibly marked parallel of latitude in the world." Extending from the Panhandle of Alaska to the western shore of Hudson Bay, its length is over 1,500 miles. The report which follows describes the immense and dramatic task of marking the far western segment of this boundary—661 miles miles in length—which divides British Columbia from the territories.

Dr. Lamb goes on to say that:

> The 60th parallel became the northern boundary of British Columbia in 1863, but it remained a purely imaginary line until the Klondike gold rush made it necessary to locate it with some precision in the region west of Teslin Lake...A long pause then followed until the construction of the Alaska Highway made further work necessary, and widespread prospecting for oil and natural gas led to a decision to survey and mark the entire British Columbia boundary.
> The rugged terrain and extremes of climate in the region made the task a daunting one. The limited early surveys had required five seasons; the much more comprehensive later ones absorbed no less than seventeen seasons—and this in spite of the great help given by the most modern equipment. In the early days a surveyor was compelled to do much of his travel on foot, with some help from dog teams and pack horses. Later survey parties were frequently transported and supplied by airplanes and helicopters. But the elements can still have the last word, and the report of the final season's surveys notes that "adverse weather retarded the work beyond all premeditation."

Dr. Lamb goes on to say that the survey is not yet complete. He mentions that the 38 miles—although I am told it is 39—at the extreme western end have not been marked, but are remote, lofty and ice-bound, and that at the moment their accurate demarcation would serve no practical purpose.

If honourable senators would look at this report, they would see what troubles these surveyors must have encountered going through forests as thick as forests could possibly be, crossing lakes, crossing mountain ranges, crossing bogs and crossing ice fields. Nevertheless, the monuments were erected. For the most part this was accomplished by the steel chain method.

But the pictures are completely fascinating, showing a part of the country that probably very few people, except the surveyors themselves, have ever seen, although there are areas now, particularly in the region of the Alaska Highway, where civilization has pushed forward. In fact, there are settlements shown here, and there are mills, some new and relatively modern and some old. But it is a very interesting story of a section of our history about which very few of us know much.

I should now refer to the fact that Section 3 of the British North America Act of 1871, which was passed by the United Kingdom Parliament, has this provision:

> The Parliament of Canada may from time to time, with the consent of the Legislature of any Province of the said Dominion, increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of such Province, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said Legislature, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any such increase or diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any Province affected thereby.

At this stage I would refer to an act passed by the Legislature of the Province of British Columbia, read the first time on March 3 1967, and assented to on March 23, 1967 Rather than read the whole document, I would ask for permission to have it placed on the record after I have given a summary of it.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): By this act, the Legislature of the Province of British Columbia consents that the Parliament of the Government of Canada do declare the line surveyed, marked, and shown in the manner referred to in the preamble to be the boundary-line between this Province and the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, whether or not the same increases, diminishes, or otherwise alters the territory of this Province.

That last part simply repeats the language that is in the Imperial statute of 1871.

(The Act passed by the Legislature of British Columbia follows)

Certified correct as passed Third Reading on the 3rd day of March, 1967.

BILL

No. 3] [1967

An Act of Consent Representing the Adoption of the British Columbia-Yukon-Northwest Territories Boundary

Preamble.

Whereas by Imperial Statute dated the twenty-eighth day of July, 1863, the north boundary of the Colony of British Columbia was fixed as the sixtieth parallel of north latitude between the eastern and western boundaries of the Colony:

And whereas the legal description of the boundaries of British Columbia as defined by sections 7 and 8 of the Imperial Act of 1866 (29-30 Vict., c. 67) remained unaltered in 1871 when the Colony of British Columbia became a Province of the Dominion of Canada:

And whereas section 14 of the Act to Amend the Yukon Territory Act, assented to on the twenty-third day of May, 1901, defined the said territory as bounded on the south, in part, by the Province of British Columbia:

And whereas the district of Mackenzie, Northwest Territories, is described in Order No. 655 of the Privy Council of Canada, dated the sixteenth day of March, 1908, as being bounded on the south by the sixtieth degree of north latitude:

And whereas that portion of the boundary between British Columbia and the Yukon Territory from Teslin Lake west to the westernmost crossing of the Tatshenshini River was surveyed and marked on the ground by the Department of the Interior of Canada in the years from 1899 to and including 1908:

And whereas, in order to continue the survey and demarcation of the boundary between British Columbia, the Yukon, and the Northwest Territories, a Commission to undertake the same and designated the "British Columbia-Yukon-Northwest Territories Boundary Commission" was appointed and authorized by Order No. 5355 of the Privy Council of Canada, dated the fifth day of July, 1943, and by Order No. 1015 of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, dated the seventeenth day of July, 1943, and further by Orders of the Privy Council of Canada numbered respectively 4895, dated the twenty-eighth day of November, 1946; 3074, dated the eighth day of July, 1948; 2616, dated the sixth day of May, 1952; and 1954-706, dated the thirteenth day of May, 1954, as required for a continuous succession of Commissioners:

And whereas the said Boundary Commission in the years from 1943 to and including 1959 caused the survey and demarcation of the remainder of the said boundary except the westernmost thirty-eight miles, more or less, to be completed, and has caused the same together with that portion of the boundary surveyed by the Department of the Interior of Canada during 1899 to and including 1908 to be duly shown on thirty-six map-sheets entitled "British Columbia and the Yukon and the Northwest Territories Boundary," and signed by the Commissioners, which map-sheets have been printed and copies thereof deposited in the office of the Surveyor-General of this Province.

And whereas it is expedient that the lines surveyed and marked as aforesaid by the Department of the Interior and the British Columbia-Yukon-Northwest Territories Boundary Commission should be established as the boundary between this Province and the said Yukon and Northwest Territories:

And whereas by section 3 of the British North America Act, 1871, it was enacted that the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada may from time to time, with the consent of the Legislature of any Province of the Dominion, increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of that Province upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by the said Legislature, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any such increase or diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any Province affected thereby:

Therefore, Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of British Columbia, enacts as follows:—

Short title

1. This Act may be cited as the British Columbia-Yukon-Northwest Territories Boundaries Act, 1967.

Legislative consent

2. The Legislature of the Province British Columbia consents that the Parliament of the Government of Canada do declare the line surveyed, marked, and shown in the manner referred to in the preamble to be the boundary-line between this Province and the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, whether or not the same increases, diminishes, or otherwise alters the territory of this Province.

When similar acts were passed last year with respect to Saskatchewan and Manitoba, our colleague Senator Benidickson told about flying over that area and seeing, when he was not beyond the tree line, the cuts that were made for the purpose of the survey. These cuts now extend practically all the way across, between the northern boundary and the western provinces, and between the western provinces and the territories. The only other thing I have to add is that it is my understanding that the markings on the ground delimiting the boundaries of Alaska from the adjacent parts of Canada have not yet been made, and we are not concerned with that in this measure.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Honourable senators, I am not rising to object to this bill. The leader has given a very thorough explanation and, of course, this measure simply deals with the completion of a survey which has been made of a boundary which has already been determined between the Northwest Territories and the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta.

I understood from the leader that this bill will be sent to a committee at a later stage. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, that will be my suggestion.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I also take it that there has been no opposition and that there has in fact been agreement between British Columbia and the federal Government as to the boundaries?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I think it is a good idea to send this to committee. While this bill may seem to be one that does not require very much study, I would like to point out that when bills originate here we have very little opportunity to get the background of them. Such a bill is not in the same position as one coming to us from the House of Commons where they have had long debate and consideration in committee. For that reason I am glad that this bill is being stood over until the fall. There is much to be studied about the Northwest Territories, an area which comprises one-third of the territory of Canada, and there is great interest among members of the House of Commons and members of the Senate and the people in general as to what is going on in that area. For that reason I am pleased that we will have the opportunity to study this in committee. It is not only the boundary which is of interest, but the economy of the country, the population increase and recent change of government, and where perhaps there may be a further change.

Therefore, honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Before the motion is put I would like to express my agreement with what the Leader of the Opposition has said. I shall see that his remarks are sent to the appropriate authority so that the officials who can give us this kind of information will be present. It is my hope that not only will we have some explanation as to the development that is going on there, but also, because of the character of this particular survey, that some of the pictures and photographs of the terrain will be made available to members of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Before the motion is put, may I ask the honourable leader a question? As I read the third paragraph of the preamble, commencing at line 20, I gather that the Legislature of the Province of British Columbia has consented to this. I realize this is a constitutional necessity. On the other hand, the sponsor of the bill did not make any reference to the consent of or consultation or discussion with the people of the Yukon and Northwest Territories or their legislatures. I would now ask him if they have consented or if they have been consulted on this.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The responsibility for these matters, and I made a special inquiry on this point, lies with the federal Parliament, and not with the Territorial Councils either in the Yukon or in the Northwest Territories. However, this point also can be dealt with in committee. For further explanation on this point, we will arrange to have one of the law officers of the Crown present in committee to give us full details.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Brooks, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

SEABOARD FINANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald, for Hon. Salter A. Hayden, moved the third reading of Bill S-15, to incorporate Seaboard Finance Company of Canada.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, this bill was read a second time in this house on June 13 and was sent to committee. The committee considered the bill on Wednesday, June 28. Following along the lines suggested by Honourable Senator Brooks in the previous order, it is sometimes worth while to inquire into some of the details that are not quite so obvious at the time that second reading to a bill is given in this house. That, in fact, is the purpose of study in committee. Arising out of that, I would like to give you some of the facts that came to light in the course of the Committee hearing.

The Seaboard Finance Company of Canada was incorporated in Ontario in 1955, and it has 134 branches in Canada. Its assets in Canada are about $73 million, $30 million of which is loaned out under the Small Loans Act, which is a Dominion statute under which the Dominion grants a licence for loans made under certain conditions up to $1,500. Another $30 million approximately is put out by the corporation by way of other loans almost entirely to its subsidiaries.

Now, this $73 million in assets is made up in this way: $13 million was loaned from banks in Canada, $27 million came from short-term notes sold in Canada, and $24 million came from the parent corporation in the United States. The $30 million loaned out under the Small Loan Act brought a gross income of $4,900,000 and a net profit of $559,000. The $25 million that was loaned out mainly to subsidiaries brought a gross income of $1,800,000, and a net profit of $86,000. I am sure the question will come to your minds as to why there should be such a great differential; one return of profit has six times the other. This was covered to some extent in the evidence before us, that it had resulted from more favourable loans to their own subsidiaries. Then the question arose: what was paid for services from the parent company in the United States for research and management?

I turn now, honourable senators, to page 17 of the report, copies of which you already have, and there you will see that Mr. Humphrys said, "The total expenses charged against the small loans account were $4.4 million," which left $559,000 by way of net profit. Then I stated:

> ...but we were speaking of what went to the States for services rendered and management fees.
> MR. HUMPHRYS: I have no figures on that.

Mr. Berteaux, the president of the company, then stated:

> Last year it was something in the neighbourhood of $200,000—maybe $225,000 or $230,000.
> SENATOR CROLL: Approximately $200,000 for management services rendered by the parent company in the United States?
>
> MR. BERTEAUX: Yes.
>
> SENATOR CROLL: What did they consist of?
> MR. BERTEAUX: I suppose the supervision. They handle all our accounting. The individual branch reports on a daily basis to the data processing system in Los Angeles. All reports are processed by IBM equipment and are sent out on a monthly basis. A certain amount of advertising comes out of the advertising department in Los Angeles. I suppose a general, overall part of the business is really under their control.

Senator Thorvaldson followed that up on page 18 and asked:

> Can you tell us if there is a standard practice among these Canadian companies to pay management fees to the foreign owner?
>
> MR. HUMPHRYS: No, I would say it is unusual.
>
> SENATOR THORVALDSON: That is, in regard to companies that your department knows of.
> MR. HUMPHRYS: Yes.

SENATOR THORVALDSON: It is unusual?

MR. HUMPHRYS: It does happen, but it is not a usual custom. If the parent company is in the United States then sometimes the Canadian subsidiary will make use of the computers and the high speed, but very expensive, data processing equipment. It will use the equipment in the head office of its parent, and it will pay for that. This type of thing goes on, and it is increasing to some extent. However, we have not thought that it represents any problem at the present time.

Then I went on and asked some other questions. I asked him how many branches they had in Canada, and he said they had 134. I asked:

Is there any justification for not having the accounting done in this country?

And Mr. Berteaux, the president, answered:

No, not really, other than as Mr. Humphrys has pointed out, the expense of these high speed computers et cetera can be very great.

SENATOR CROLL: But there are many companies with far fewer branches and which do less business that have their computer arrangements in this country. If we close our eyes to this sort of process how are we ever to get computers established here?

THE CHAIRMAN: Surely, that is a judgment decision, which will be based upon the economics of it.

SENATOR CROLL: Yes, but I will be outspoken about it.

MR. HUMPHRYS: I think this point is well taken. In our view the Canadian company should have its books of account here, and have its accounting done here. We have found in our administration that it is rather difficult for us to take that view with a Canadian company, and tell it that it must go down the street and use the services of a data processing company and have its computer work done there, and that it cannot use the machines in its head office.

However, we have not objected to their having their data processed through their head office so long as we have access to the full records, and the books of account are kept in Canada.

Then Senator Thorvaldson goes on.

This was all very well ten years ago when computers were very rare, but will the same argument hold true throughout history? These data processing services are being developed in the United States instead of in Canada. I think this is a situation which deserves a general review, having regard to the hundreds of Canadian companies that are wholly-owned by foreign parent companies.

MR. HUMPHRYS: I agree with your view, senator.

The point I want to make now is that from reading the evidence, and having heard it, it is obvious that our Canadian subsidiary is only a dot, possibly a dash, and more likely a cypher, in the data processing machinery in Los Angeles. This, in my view, is carrying the branch plant mentality further than I have seen it carried heretofore.

What we were getting at—and Senator Thorvaldson and I suspected—was that they were siphoning off profits for the purpose of sending the money to the States under the guise of management, research and what-not. Here you have a company with 134 branches having their accounting and bookkeeping done in Los Angeles.

I went on and said:

As Senator Thorvaldson has pointed out, there was an excuse some time ago for having this work done in the United States, but that is not valid today.

MR. HUMPHRYS: Not so much, senator. They were doing more of their accounting in Canada before the computer systems came into being.

There is quite a trend now in corporations that have a wide-spread branch office system to use central data processing and to send data in from the branch office on a daily basis through leased wires overnight, have it tabulated and processed and back to the branches ready for the morning. This goes on to an increasing extent, and it creates many problems in relation to the point Senator Thorvaldson was raising, that the Canadian subsidiary very often is treated as another branch and gets swept up in this sort of branch operation.

Unless there is some vigilance by someone, therefore, it can result in a situation where the records in the Canadian company are practically non-existent.

This is Mr. Humphrys speaking.

The question was asked why it was they wanted federal incorporation. They had been incorporated, as I indicated, in Ontario and were carrying on business.

MR. HUMPHRYS: They desire federal incorporation to give recognition to the fact that they do business all across the country; therefore, federal incorporation is appropriate in the circumstances. They are interested also in protecting their name, and I think they believe that there will be some additional prestige through their status as a federally incorporated company.

There is nothing to interfere with their right to carry on business or with the use of their name, and no one could attempt to take it from them, but, of course, what they want is the prestige of a federally incorporated company. We must ask ourselves if we can afford to lend prestige to a corporation that, in my view, is operating in a manner that rings of eighteenth century mentality and colonialism. In these circumstances, it appears to me that it is not the sort of corporation which should be entitled to that assistance from us.

We went into the matter a little deeper. I asked the question on page 21:

Mr. Humphrys, you said there were five companies incorporated under the federal charter.

That is, five companies operating a similar sort of business.

What are their names, please?

Mr. Humphrys replied:

Beneficial Finance, Brock Acceptance, Canadian Acceptance, Household Finance, Laurentide Finance.

SENATOR CROLL: How many of those are American?

What I meant was, the parent company being American.

MR. HUMPHRYS: Beneficial is, Canadian Acceptance is, and Household Finance.

They do, I think, about 80 to 85 per cent of that sort of business in Canada, and they do it within the law and there is no complaint about that. I am not opposed to that. I do not share Walter Gordon's views on American capital or any other capital that comes into this country. I am one of those who welcome it, but I feel that when it comes into this country it ought to be integrated in this country and ought to become Canadian in every sense.

This raises a question we have not looked at hard enough in the past. They have 134 branches in this country; the bookkeeping and accounting is all done in the United States. How much of that sort of thing goes on in this country? It is about time we knew. We ought to do something about it when the circumstances are such as appear from the record which is available to all of you. We should urge on the Government that it take action in some form to bring this sort of thing to an end.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few remarks in regard to this matter. One of the reasons why I asked questions in committee of Mr. Humphrys and the other persons present representing the company was that I was shocked to learn again of the extent of the small loans business in Canada and the volume of loans made under this act.

It has always been my feeling that the Small Loans Act is the cause of what I call legalized usury. It permits interest rates of 24 per cent to be charged on loans of up to $1,500, and that is 2 per cent a month. In my opinion, that is outrageous.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I sometimes wonder whether we should not take a very good look at this whole situation in respect of small loans in Canada with a view to endeavouring to stop usury of this kind.

I, for one, feel that part of the reason for such a tremendous volume of this kind of business in this country is that the banks have been hamstrung by legislation of this Parliament in respect of the interest rates that they are permitted to charge on loans. I am positive that there is not nearly as much of this type of lending in the United States. The reason is obvious: It is because the banks in the United States have a much wider latitude in their carrying on of a legitimate banking business.

Some may say that it is a good thing to place a limit on the interest rates that banks may charge. I do not believe it is a good thing at all. If we had done less limiting in the past few years, the banks to a much greater extent would have taken over this type of business, and at a much lower rate of interest to the public.

This company is one out of 80 such companies in Canada licensed to do business under the Small Loans Act, and yet it has 134 branches in this country, and it has $30 million out in loans which come under the provisions of this act. Let us look at the figures that Senator Croll mentioned as to the tremendous income this company derives from the lending of $30 million. Its gross income on this lending was apparently $4.9 million. Of course, the operating expenses of this type of business are large. However, that indicates to me that it is a completely uneconomic type of business. It may employ many people, but it is a completely uneconomic employment of people, and it does not contribute anything to the economy. That is just one aspect of this business.

As I say, I "see red" when I think about these companies that operate under the Small Loans Act, and are authorized by law to charge a fantastic rate of interest on their loans.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Did they give any figures as to bad debts?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Yes, and they were quite heavy.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: There were really no figures given on bad debts. There was a slight reference to that, but there was nothing very exact given in the testimony of the officials of the company. I assume, of course, that the bad debt load is quite heavy, but I do not know. There is little to indicate that in the record from which Senator Croll read, namely, the verbatim report of the meeting of the Bank and Commerce Committee.

Senator Croll referred also to the question of management fees—that is, management fees paid by Canadian companies to their American owners. This has always raised a question in my mind as to just what the real situation is in respect of management fees that are passed across the border from Canadian companies to the American parents. One wonders whether there is really any control over that in this country.

I presume that the Income Tax Department exercises some supervision, but a question that occurs to me is: Are there abuses in the matter of the payment of management fees to American companies? Here, for instance, the president of the Canadian company said that $235,000 was paid in management fees to the American company. How do you or I know whether the payment of these management fees to the United States parent company is right or wrong, or whether it is a good or bad thing for Canada? This practice may be one of many factors causing the standard of living and incomes in the United States to be approximately 25 per cent higher than in Canada.

I have never opposed foreign investment in Canada, and I do not intend to do so now. Foreign investment builds up Canada in the same way that it built up the United States a hundred years ago. At the same time, I am not one of those who say that we must be blind to the abuses that can result from uncontrolled foreign investment in any country, including our own.

We know as a fact that there are many countries in the world that do not allow foreign investment as freely as we in Canada do. For instance, if a foreigner wishes to invest in a company in Mexico he is allowed, by the laws of that country, to invest in only up to 49 per cent of the equity or voting stock of a company. In other words, voting control of companies must reside with nationals of the home country. I cite this as an example of what some other countries are doing in respect to exercising supervision, and greater supervision than we do, over foreign capital investment.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Most countries are doing this.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Yes. As Senator Deschatelets says, most countries are now taking a closer look at foreign investment and how it should be supervised.

I am not suggesting that there are too many abuses, but it occurs to me that this question of management fees paid to foreign companies is something that should be looked at by the Government of Canada.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say in this debate, but it is rather interesting to realize that our thoughts have gone in this direction because of a relatively unimportant bill that has come before this house. Nevertheless, this bill did generate these thoughts in my mind, as it did in the mind of Senator Croll and other members of the committee.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Walker, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Friday, July 7, at 3 p.m.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 5, 1967

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-146, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1968.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-146, known as the Appropriation Act No. 5, is one of the two supply bills we have to consider today. The bill will be distributed to honourable senators in a few moments. I wish to put into the record immediately the fact that the Standing Committee on Finance dealt with this bill this morning with Dr. Davidson and his assistant Mr. Glashan as witnesses.

Bill C-146 will grant full supply for a certain number of departments whose estimates have been approved in committee of supply in the other house. These departments are: Atomic Energy; Defence Production; Energy, Mines and Resources; Fisheries; Indian Affairs and Northern Development; National Defence; National Health and Welfare; National Revenue; Post Office; Solicitor General; and Transport. The form of the bill is the usual one for supply bills.

May I say, honourable senators, that the fact that we are asking for full supply at this time of the year for a certain number of departments is not unusual. That was done last year and, I am told, also in 1957. I will agree that as a general rule it was a tradition to grant up to eleven-twelfths of the expenditures of a department and to keep the remaining one-twelfth for the last appropriation bill. However, we must take into consideration the fact that in the other place there was an all-party agreement to vote the supply for these departments in full at this time, and in view of this it was found more appropriate to ask us to vote this supply in full.

I must also point out that these are not new items. All these votes are recorded in the Blue Book, and in fact on two occasions when we granted one-twelfth for the month of April, and two additional twelfths for the months of May and June, we had the good fortune on those two occasions to discuss and deal with these items in our Finance Committee, and of course in the Senate itself.

To appreciate the effect of the present bill on the main Estimates, may I draw to the attention of honourable senators the following figures in a financial statement for the Estimates of 1967-68, which I understand is before you. As honourable senators know, the main Estimates amount to $10.1 billion. We will have today in the other bill supplementary estimates for expenditures amounting to an additional $95.5 million. If we consider the payment from the Old Age Security Fund, which amounts to $1.4 billion, the total of the estimated expenditures to date amounts to $11.6 billion, of which $4.1 billion are statutory and $6 billion are to be voted.

As I said before, we have already voted three-twelfths, generally, of all the items in the Blue Book—one-twelfth for the month of April and an additional two-twelfths for May and June. With this bill—which amounts to $2.4 billion—we are granting the full balance of the main Estimates for these departments. The passage of this bill, will leave a balance of something over $2 billion to be voted.

The votes and details in this bill C-146 correspond to the votes and details for these departments in the Blue Book, and I do not think I need explain further.

The passage of this bill, granting full supply for several departments mentioned in the bill, means technically that these items and these votes are no longer subject to our review in the Finance Committee. I can only give my own undertaking, but I do so without any hesitation, and say that if any senator wishes to ask questions or seek further explanation concerning these departments, though supply be voted in full today, I, as Chairman of the Finance Committee would welcome such questions and would give any explanation required.

Having said that, honourable senators, if there is any further explanation desired I shall surely do my best to give it.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, first of all, may I congratulate the sponsor of the bill, who is also chairman of the Finance Committee. He has followed the precedent set by Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) of giving us for the record a fairly detailed explanation of the items before us today. The former chairman of the Finance Committee is seated on his right hand, and I congratulate both of them on the promotion that appears to have come to them today.

Honourable senators, once again we are being asked to give pro forma consideration to the appropriation of very large sums of money, amounting to well over $3 billion. This is an exercise we go through under some compulsion every now and then. Very often we complain about the speed with which we are required to do it, and the compulsion under which we act. When I was asked to take Senate responsibility from this side, of commenting on this bill, the question came to my mind: How long has this been going on?

First of all, I take some solace from the fact that the treatment of these Estimates in the other place has been just as perfunctory. It is a remarkable fact that these three appropriation items, the appropriation on the main Estimates, on the supplementaries and on the interim supply, went to the Committee of Ways and Means in the other place, then to the Committee on Supply and then back to Ways and Means, and the total pagination in their Hansard devoted to that exercise is actually less than three pages. Perhaps we might do a little better than that today.

It is also interesting—certainly, it was news to me and I think to some of the members of the other place—that no debate was allowed. Indeed, the bill was not distributed to all members in the other place. When they did get copies they found that the pages were not numbered. Finally, one exasperated member said, "Well, we are not allowed to speak on it; at least, perhaps we will be allowed to read it." In that respect, honourable senators, we are a little better off.

However, when I attempted to find out how long this practice had been going on, one of the authorities I consulted indicated that it has been going on since Confederation. I refer to Professor Norman Ward, whose book, The Public Purse, is perhaps the only definitive history of public finance in Canada.

In this book of some 334 pages, Professor Ward discusses many aspects of the procedures by which public moneys are voted, but he says that the reader will notice two omissions in his book. In the first place, he does not discuss the Committee of Ways and Means, because he says it is outside the context he has chosen for himself. The second omission is that he does not discuss the Senate, and he explains why on page 8:

> The Senate's role in parliamentary control of finance, as the term is employed in this book, also receives little attention for the very good reason that it is negligible, and has been since Confederation.

He goes on to say that the Senate has:

> ...generally held itself aloof from the process of appropriating and accounting for public money outlined above, beyond hinting darkly from time to time that it could take a more active part if it chose.

And he adds that:

> ...while the committee work is often well done, and has occasionally been an interesting reflection on the House of Commons (which was not doing similar work), it is nonetheless outside the main stream of parliamentary control.

The author goes on to say that:

> ...although the Senate itself has asserted that—

With some exceptions, which I will not detail.

> —its powers in financial matters are the same as those of the Commons, the Senate has not acted as if they were.

Again, and I am skipping, Professor Ward says:

> Having early eschewed participation in the parliamentary audit, the senators equally early found themselves deprived of any extensive participation in the granting of supply to the Crown, not necessarily because of constitutional limitations, but because of the facts of parliamentary life.

Then, and this will be my final quote in which honourable senators will find an interesting echo in the present circumstances, Professor Ward has this to say:

> Today it is accepted as a normal practice for the Senate to be notified of an impending visit of the deputy of the Governor General for the giving of royal assent to sundry bills, including appropriation acts, and then to receive from the Commons a bill appropriating many hundreds of millions of dollars—

Today, of course, to update it we must say "billions of dollars". This book was written in 1960.

> —to which the Senate is clearly expected to give all three readings within an hour or two, or else keep the Governor General's deputy waiting.

Now, naturally, honourable senators, I have to ask if this is necessary. Professor Ward says it has been going on since Confederation. Does that mean it has to go on until we celebrate the next anniversary 100 years from now—assuming this institution is still here?

This morning in the Senate Finance Committee I asked the same question of one of the most eminent authorities in the field, Dr. George Davidson, the Secretary of the Treasury. Without going into all the details of his reply, I will say that I was certainly encouraged to hear him say that the Senate had, or could have, a very important role in the scrutiny of the public finance.

I specifically asked him about the long history of the scrutiny of a bill such as this. It of course started with the department, went to the Treasury Board, from there to the Commons and from the Commons to its Committee of Supply and Committee of Ways and Means and then to standing committees. I think all of the departments except two have been referred to and reported on by the standing committees. But, as I have said, and as Dr. Davidson also said, nobody seems to be looking at the overall impact, and he referred to that extraordinary happening in the House of Commons last evening when at 9.30 the bills were called and put through with less than three pages of comment in Hansard of that house.

Now I am not going to say that the Senate should attempt to assume a dominant role in appropriation or supply aspects of public finance, but I do believe, and I was encouraged to do so by Dr. Davidson's remarks, that we have a role to play, perhaps on the audit or performance side. A very good start has been made in our Finance Committee under Senator Leonard and now under Senator Deschatelets. I think this role should be expanded as a matter of public interest, and as a matter of self-respect on the part of the Senate.

Naturally, one may ask how can we do this. My first comment would be, where there is a will there is a way. If honourable senators have the will to assume a responsible and important role in the scrutiny of public finance, I am sure a way can be found. One suggestion I could make is that we should begin immediately to take one department a year and subject the spending of that department to intense scrutiny, even if it takes us a whole session to do so. I have discussed this with some of the officials, and they tell me it is practical and they believe it would be beneficial.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Will the honourable senator permit me a question? Is he proposing that we should examine one department a year? Is that the intention?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: That was my suggestion, and I believe Senator Leonard has had it under consideration. I believe we could start with one a year, and then as we became more proficient, as we undoubtedly would, we could take three or four departments. In this way the departments concerned would be taken by surprise because we would call upon them at very short notice and ask them to come and answer some questions. Honourable senators might wonder what questions we should ask them. Well, this morning we had certain $1 items which I shall discuss at length later on another bill. But, there is the matter of transfer within votes. Apparently once a vote has been approved, the department concerned can make a transfer from one vote to another.

We had an interesting talk about this this morning, and an excellent example will be found in Vote 15a of the next bill, if I may mention that as it impinges upon the main Estimates. As I said, honourable senators, Vote 15a is a good example of where a department has found a very large sum of money to put up some buildings here in Ottawa. I do not have all the relevant facts before me, but it involves the sum of $1½ million. Where did they find this money? What particular projects approved by Parliament have not been proceeded with or where were the savings that made this possible? We were told, in effect, in committee that one does not get the answer to that question in the Finance Committee; one gets it from the officials.

This is the kind of thing that would be dealt with if we were to undertake such an examination. So beclouded is the question with respect to transfers that we had some fun in committee this morning when we asked about this, and we were referred to the French word used by scholars which is virement, to describe this process, yet I venture to say that few parliamentarians have ever heard it used in this connection. It is done ordinarily without any check until the matter comes out in the supplementaries.

Then, there is the question of planning public expenditures on a project basis. We have been told over and over again that there is a new look in public financing, and that from now on we are going to appropriate sums for projects rather than on an individual vote basis. We have been told by Dr. Davidson that we must go in this direction. This is the kind of thing our Finance Committee could examine. We have been told by Dr. Deutsch we must institute five-year planning, and here again is the kind of thing the Senate committee could scrutinize and examine. It could ask these officials, "How are you making out on this plan? How close are you coming to completion on time? How close are you coming to meeting the objectives you gave Parliament?"

Another matter that might well be discussed is the subject matter of the item in the Main Estimates on page 590, "Loans, Investments and Advances." We discussed this very briefly this morning. The situation is that there are two views as to how this should be handled. Some of us object to items being shown as assets when they certainly are not. The Auditor General objects because he is required to certify the statements of the assets and liabilities of Canada, and he has said on several occasions that some of these figures that are before us in these Main Estimates are not in keeping with proper accounting.

The Public Accounts Committee in the other place has said the same thing. Speaking, in this particular case of Expo grants—and I make it clear I am not opposed to the grants, but to the principle of the accounting—the chairman of the committee said:

> We have discussed this matter on various occasions. This concerns money which has been advanced to "Expo" or the National Capital Commission in the form of a loan when, in fact, it was an outright grant, and the Committee felt that it should be treated as a grant and appear as a budgetary expenditure.

The Public Accounts Committee is an important body, and one would assume that the Department of Finance would act with some expedition on its comment. The fact of the matter is that for over a year now the committee has been complaining of non-response from the Treasury Board, and the Auditor General has taken up the complaint. I mention this, honourable senators, to indicate that there is an area of scrutiny and investigation that may well be open to the Senate.

This whole matter is discussed in the Auditor General's report for 1966 at page 122. The Auditor General states that in the Statement of Assets and Liabilities of the Department of Finance as at March 31, 1966 the principle is laid down that only realizable or interest- or revenue-producing assets should be offset against the gross liabilities. He continues:

> This explanation reflects a policy established by the Minister of Finance in 1920, that assets to be included in the Statement of Assets and Liabilities should be confined to those which are readily convertible or which are revenue-producing.

He goes on to state:

> The Minister had immediately implemented this policy by removing from the Statement of Assets and Liabilities a substantial amount in loans, etc., which could not meet this test.

He said that the rule began to be broken in 1957-58. By mentioning that period, honourable senators will be assured that I am not being partisan in this matter. He continues:

> This policy has been followed by successive Ministers of Finance ever since but a major exception was introduced in 1957-58 (in respect of) the National Capital Commission...

He goes on to say that the Public Accounts Committee has on two occasions requested the Department of Finance to review the existing practice, but nothing has happened. He says that there was a further major exception to the policy. This was in 1964-65 in respect of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; and there was another one in 1965-66 in connection with Expo. He further states:

> In its Seventh Report 1966 presented to the House on October 26, 1966 the Public Accounts Committee stated that it was disturbed to learn that not only was no review undertaken by the Department in the case of the National Capital Commission but that the practice was continued and further extended in 1964-65 when the House was asked to approve loans to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Honourable senators, again I say I hope this indicates to you there are areas where the Public Accounts might be looked at with a little more assiduousness than has been the case in the past.

I must say, honourable senators, it does give me some satisfaction to say that the Main Estimates that are now before us have been before the Finance Committee for a number of months. They have been discussed, and the opportunity has been given, and has been exercised, for questions to be asked. We have had answers from responsible officials. While I am not entirely satisfied that we know all we should about the Estimates, certainly it is reason for some satisfaction that a committee of this house has given the time it has to them.

Also, as Senator Deschatelets has said, it is most fortunate that this particular bill was before the committee for two hours or more this morning. Again Dr. Davidson, and also Mr. J. G. Glashan, the Director of Estimates and Supply Procedures of the Treasury Board, were there to answer questions, and they answered them well. However, I remain unconvinced that these important matters of public finance are being given the scrutiny they deserve in the other place or here—certainly, not the scrutiny that sums of this magnitude would receive in the private sector of the economy.

While it is not for me to suggest what action might be taken in the Commons, it is a good sign and greatly to their credit that they have adopted the practice now of referring departmental Estimates to standing committees, and they are getting scrutiny of a kind there. Unfortunately, however, it tends quite often to be political rather than actuarial, but I believe we in the Senate have an equal opportunity. After all, public finance is today and every day acquiring a much more important place in the economy of the country, which means in the well-being of every citizen of Canada. This is a new phenomenon of our times, and I would suggest that we can forget what happened in the past. Whether it can be justified or not does not matter. I believe a great opportunity faces us now in these new circumstances, and I trust that consideration will be given to the future role of the Senate with respect to bills such as this.

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor: Might I inquire of the honourable senator who has just spoken: In his judgment, how would he charge up the amount he mentioned in connection with the advances made to Expo? Would they be regarded as a loan, an advance, an investment, or an expenditure, capital or otherwise?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I can only reply to the honourable senator—who has shown a very keen interest in this matter and whose business experience is much greater than mine—that I do not know, because I do not know the terms of the instrument under which those advances were made. I do not even know what they were. There is nothing in the document before us to say whether they were loans, advances or investments. I would suggest that in future when we have documents such as this lumping together loans, investments and advances—and it is quite a job even to remember the title from time to time—it should at least be signified whether they are loans, investments or advances; what are the terms of repayment of principal, payment of interest; and what security is there for repayment? As all honourable senators know, we are often, in fact every year, in the ridiculous position of appropriating money for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to pay back interest on the money we have already appropriated and some part of the principal. I do not know under what item I would put it, because I have not the information and I do not think anyone in Parliament has.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Honourable senators, I inquired of the honourable senator in respect of that question because there is a doubt in my mind, and I think we in the Senate should appreciate the interest taken by Senator Grosart and other members of the Finance Committee.

I know the Deputy Leader of the Government will forgive me for referring to the period before he took over as chairman of the Finance Committee, but I have particularly in mind the splendid work done by Senator D'Arcy Leonard as chairman of the Finance Committee.

I also think that credit should go to the Senate as a whole for the careful manner in which the senators follow the expenditures as reported, and the manner in which they take into consideration the Auditor General's criticisms. It is a good thing that we have such a fine Auditor General as Mr. Henderson.

I have been interested in this subject and, like Senator Grosart, I sometimes wonder whether the capital expenditures are outright gifts or loans on which interest willl be paid, or are investments. I perhaps look on Expo in a slightly different light than a good many senators do. I believe it is a wonderful thing for Canada that we are able as a nation to invest that amount of money to bring so much outside revenue into Canada through the tourist industry and visitors to Expo. I would not put it under the heading of write-offs, because I think it has already returned good revenue to us, and I believe we will realize a fairly large amount from the sale of buildings and other assets on which this money has been spent.

I thought I should say this, largely because I wanted to pay tribute to the work being done by the Finance Committee. We sincerely appreciate the remarks of Senator Grosart as a financial critic.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, may I remind the house that if the honourable Senator Deschatelets speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, perhaps I might add just a word of explanation in response to Senator Isnor's queston concerning Expo.

In connection with Supplementary Estimates, (A) Vote L40a, he mentioned that the Government of Canada was acquiring securities issued by Expo, and this is the way in which they get their working capital operations. Whenever they need money to meet their expenditures they sell to the Federal Treasury some securities issued by the World's Fair Corporation. When Expo winds up and revenues are in, the expenditures counted and the salvage values estimated, the government of the Province of Quebec will share in the deficit to the extent of 37½ per cent, the City of Montreal 12½ per cent, and the federal Government share will be 50 per cent of any deficit resulting even from the purchase of the securities issued by Expo.

Hon. Mr. Walker: May I interject a question to the honourable Acting Leader? What are the total advances to Expo so far by the federal Government.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I would not like to give an incorrect reply—I will have the information the honourable senator wishes in a minute or two. Even if the bill has been passed, I will inform him as to exactly what amount of money has already been advanced by the federal treasury to the World's Fair Corporation.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I should compliment Senator Grosart on the constructive suggestions he made following the meeting we had this morning and the presentation of this bill this afternoon. He must know that some of the views he has expressed are shared by many other senators.

When he asks how long this will go on, what answer can I give? I do not know if this will satisfy him, but as chairman of the Finance Committee I am planning, when the Senate resumes in the fall, to have an informal meeting of that committee. We have in its membership many honourable senators who have many years' experience. They have their own ideas about improvement, and if we could meet informally at the beginning of the session we could examine all these suggestions. This is what I have in mind, and I hope it will meet the approval of honourable senators.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move the third reading of the bill now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 6, 1967

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-147, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1968.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-147 is known as Appropriation Bill No. 6, and is the last appropriation bill we shall have to consider today. This bill was examined in the Senate Finance Committee this morning, at which meeting Dr. Davidson and his assistant Mr. Glashan were witnesses.

May I bring to the attention of honourable senators clause 2, which provides that four-twelfths of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the main Estimates be paid to defray certain expenses of the public service, and this will cover generally the needs for the months of July, August, September and October. Honourable senators will recall that we have already voted one-twelfth for April, plus two-twelfths for May and June, and now we are asking for four-twelfths generally. If this bill is passed, it means that we shall have voted seven-twelfths of all the items of the Blue Book. Since there are certain expenses for which we are asking for more than four-twelfths, I shall give a few short explanations.

If honourable senators will refer to Schedule A of the bill under Public Works, Vote 65, I will explain the reason why we are asking here for more than four-twelfths. Additional proportions are required because of the high proportion of construction projects at this time of the year, together with the associated repayment of the loans made in previous years for the acquisition of properties which were expropriated for the Centennial, such as the Colonel By Drive, the Ottawa River Parkway, and the Confederation Square projects.

On page 5, Schedule B, under Legislation, Vote 15, additional proportions are required here for the following reasons. First: Membership assessments of $75,000 are due and should be paid shortly to certain international parliamentary associations, such as Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, and the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. These associations operate on a calendar-year basis and require funds to meet their operating expenses; secondly: expenses of two delegations from European parliaments which are visiting Canada must be paid, in the sum of $25,000; thirdly: a sum of $10,000 is required to cover the cost of special parliamentary visitors arriving within the next few months.

If honourable senators will now turn to Schedule C, under External Affairs, Vote 10, additional proportions are required here to complete the purchase of property in Paris, France, which will be used as a cultural centre. This purchase was recently approved with the understanding that the purchase of this building would be completed as soon as possible.

Also under Schedule C, Vote 35, additional proportions are needed here to meet the major part of the cost of the Centennial observance during the summer months. Under Vote 40, additional proportions are required to meet increased costs, the carry over of accounts from 1966-67, and peaking of expenditures which occur during the summer months.

Schedule C, Secretary of State, Vote 45: additional proportions are required to meet anticipated commitments under these programs. The major portion of these projects will be completed early in the year, thus grants must be made in accordance with the formal agreements.

Schedule C, Trade and Commerce, Vote 29: an additional proportion is required to make final payments to performers participating in the special events, contractors, and other administrative and operational expenses, having to do with the 1967 World Exhibition.

Referring now to Schedule D, under Agriculture, Vote 55: this vote provides for the administration, operation and maintenance necessary to meet requirements of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. An additional proportion is requested to meet the usual peak period of operations during the summer months.

Under Municipal Grants, Vote 10, an additional proportion is requested to meet eight large interim payments which will be required shortly. The largest payment, totalling approximately $7 million, will be made to the cities of Ottawa, Toronto and Vancouver.

Under Vote 1, National Film Board, an additional proportion is required to cover the usual peak expenses of the summer filming schedule.

The last is Schedule E. vote L40a, under Loans, Investments and Advances. Additional proportions are required to meet forecast cash requirements for the corporation, having to do again with the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition. Revised cash estimates indicate requirements of at least $26.8 million, and possibly higher.

Vote L112a provides the authority for the Canadian Government to give financial assistance in the form of a loan to the British West Indian Airways to meet its immediate financial obligation.

Honourable senators, having given you some explanations of why we are asking Parliament to grant more than the general four-twelfths on certain votes, may I say that this bill was examined in the Finance Committee this morning, and I think we had a very good discussion. In past meetings, under the chairmanship of my colleague the honourable Senator Leonard, certain criticisms were expressed to the Government for not projecting a more complete financial picture of the expenditures in the Blue Book. This criticism was expressed quite often, and we are told now that Supplementary Estimates (A) are for a lower amount than in any preceding year. This means that the objective expressed by these criticisms has been achieved, at least in part. I am sure honourable senators will appreciate this.

Furthermore, this morning we had a fruitful discussion on certain $1 items. This is not the first time criticism of this kind was expressed. Again we have to admit that there is at least a certain improvement in the Supplementary Estimates (A) which we have to consider. I personally must agree that it is not a wise thing to use the device of the $1 item to avoid the regular legislative process.

In the bill we have now, as far as the $1 items are concerned, in most cases the money has been voted already. All the Government is trying to do, by the device of the $1 item is seek the authority to spend this money for certain other purposes. The reason of course is the matter of urgency.

Honourable senators will agree that because of unexpected or unforeseen circumstances something has to be done. If the Government had to wait for the regular legislative process it might take five, six or eight months. This is the explanation we had this morning. The criticism expressed this morning has been well taken, as honourable senators know, and in the future there will surely be an attempt to avoid this situation as much as possible.

If any honourable senator desires further explanation, I shall be pleased to give it if I can.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: May I ask the honourable sponsor of the bill if I am correct in assuming that both Bill C-147 and the supplementary Estimates are now before us?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I hope so. Yes, these items are before us. The Supplementary Estimates (A) were distributed at least a week ago.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: My question, if I may put it more explicitly, is whether there is before us at this moment for debate the supplementary Estimates as well as Bill C-147?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Yes, they are in this bill.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, the remarks I have already made on the main Estimates apply to both the items before us now. Interim supply is of course merely the drawing of moneys for purposes which have been approved by Parliament already.

We can assume that these amounts are needed in the proportion of twelfths in which they are asked. We are all aware that departments do not spend at the same rate per month, and therefore the requirements in some, particularly in those departments which are especially active in the summer months, will be greater than in others. That explains the difference we are asked to vote.

As honourable Senator Deschatelets has told us, the supplementary Estimates are greatly improved this year. We were told this morning, in the Standing Committee on Finance, by Dr. Davidson, the Secretary of the Treasury Board, that this is the lowest amount that we have ever been asked to vote in supplementary Estimates in June, the reason being that the Treasury Board has now instructed the departments that they are simply not to carry on the old practice of holding out anything they like for supplementary Estimates. They are being told now, as he told us, to make the main Estimates much more realistic than in the past. I for one feel that the Senate Committee on Finance deserves some of the credit for this. Under Senator Leonard's chairmanship, this was one of the things drawn to the attention of the Treasury Board, and I have no doubt that we had some influence in making this very desirable improvement.

We can assume that the supplementary Estimates now are realistic in that they are required only in regard to certain emergencies which arise.

We cannot all agree, as Senator Deschatelets has said, about the method in which these emergencies are handled. He referred to the $1 items. There is the most notorious example ever seen of statutory amendment by the fictional $1 vote in the supplementaries before us. Particularly for my legal friends, I would like to read into the record Vote 17a on page 11:

> To provide that, effective the 1st day of July, 1967, the definition of "civilian" for the purposes of Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act be read and construed as though for paragraph (g) of subsection (1) of section 75 of the said Act there were substituted the following:
> (g) a person who served in the United Kingdom with the Newfoundland Overseas Forestry Unit during World War II
> (i) for a period of more than six months, or

(ii) for any period, if the service was terminated on medical grounds.

Naturally I have no objection to this item appearing in the supplementary Estimates, as far as its purpose goes. This is something that my colleagues from Newfoundland have asked for. The interesting thing is that the act is amended. We could find no assurance in the committee this morning that there is any procedure laid down by which this would be referred to the Commission on Statutory Revision or even that it would automatically go into the office consolidation of the act.

One would wonder how any person, seeking to ascertain his rights, by a reading of the act would know about this change. It might be a veteran from Newfoundland who would hear of $250,000 being available, but reading the act he might feel that he is not entitled. He might go to a lawyer who would say "The Act says you are not entitled."

I suggest some method should be devised—and I am sure there are enough brains in the Treasury Board and elsewhere which can devise it—by which we will stop amending Acts of Parliament by $1 votes in supplementary Estimates. I say it is not a proper procedure, and it is not to me an excuse to say that this was done last year or the year before or that this has always been so.

This happens to be a particularly glaring example. I do not say that all the $1 votes come into this category. They do not. There are nine of them here and some are in quite explainable categories. This one I suggest is not.

Again we have the situation in regard to Loans, Investments and Advances. In case I have been misunderstood, I would like to say that whatever the amount advanced for or invested in or loaned to Expo, I would be inclined to put it under the middle part of the title and say that it is just about the best investment in Canada that the Government has ever made. I do not know what the amount is, but the last figure I saw was $143 million for all governments; I believe it is considerably in excess of that now. I might say that the total to date of loans, investments and advances is being increased by the $46 million we are voting today, to $625 million.

Again I say we have no details. There is nothing here before us to show what we are voting, to indicate what kind of instruments these are, or whether there is any assurance that there are interest rates. I suggest that in future this be set forth clearly in the Estimates, the supplementary Estimates or elsewhere before we are again asked to pass these items.

That is all I have to say at this time, honourable senators, except once again to congratulate the sponsor on the excellent explanation he has given.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, there is one expenditure in which I am particularly interested. Perhaps the members of the committee will remember that this morning in committee, when supplementary Estimates were being discussed, I mentioned the subject of the expenses allowed for the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada. I am greatly pleased that the Government heeded the requests of the many national women's organizations throughout Canada and established the Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

During its sessions, ever since it was established in 1948, the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women has, through reports made to it and investigations made by it, discovered that discrimination against women does exist in many places in the world. The United Nations Commission on the Status of Women supports the establishment of such commissions in member countries, and a number of these have been set up, one of the latest being the one established in Canada.

Many countries have few laws that deliberately discriminate against any persons on the ground of sex, and Canada, I believe, is one of these. But, notwithstanding this, in those same countries there exist many traditions and customs which have been accepted and followed for many years that obstruct the appointment and promotion in business, in the professions and in the Public Service of members of the female sex, even when they are adequately qualified for such appointment or promotion.

Honourable senators, I would like to illustrate this point by telling you of an incident in which I was involved. In the late 1940s I was elected an alderman of the City of Fredericton. One of the first matters to come before the council was the subject of an increase in salaries for the staff. A committee was appointed which held meetings, and when they made their report they recommended that each male employee should get an increase of $100 and each female employee should get an increase of $50.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Were they doing the same work?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: The work was comparable, and about the same number of males and females were involved. Mind you, everybody would not be doing the same work, but there were both men and women doing senior jobs, and men and women doing junior jobs. The recommendation, however, was simply for $100 for men and $50 for women.

Honourable senators will probably realize that I could not accept that, and I raised quite a strong objection. The matter was sent back to committee for reconsideration and they brought back a report that all employees should get an increase of $100. Their explanation was that they had nothing against the women who were employed on the staff. In fact, they thought they were being good to them. But it had always been the case that women received less than the men; they got lower salaries and smaller increases. The committee was just following the custom that had been established for years.

I think that this following of tradition and custom is the reason why so few women are in senior positions in Canada, in business, public service and the professions.

This is not only a loss to women but it causes great difficulty for women who have to earn a living, for many of them have to support large families just the same as men do, and it costs them just as much to buy food and clothing and pay for the rent as it does for male employees. They should be paid the same amount for the same work. I grant you that we have legislation for equal pay, but I still think that holding these prejudices and sticking to old customs often prevents appointments and promotions, despite our legislation for equal pay.

In the July 1966 issue of the Chatelaine magazine there was an editorial by Doris Anderson in which she said that, although Canada ranks near the top in the number of women with higher education, we rank near the bottom of all western nations in the percentage of women in the professions or in managerial jobs.

I hope, honourable senators, that the Royal Commission on the Status of Women will bring these matters to the attention of the public, for I really believe that the knowledge and realization of the existence of such discrimination will be all that is necessary to do away with it in Canada. I trust that the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada will be given every assistance, financial and otherwise, to make a very thorough study of this matter.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I would remind honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Deschatelets speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Walker: May I interject to ask the Acting Leader if he is prepared at this time to answer the question that I raised earlier?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I am prepared to do so. I wish first of all, however, once again to thank Senator Grosart for his constructive contribution to this debate, and, secondly, to take this opportunity to say to Senator Fergusson how much we all have appreciated the remarkable work she has done, not only this year, but all through the years, especially for the women in the Public Service.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Senator Fergusson is discriminating.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Now, honourable senators, I have the answer to the question asked by Senator Walker covering the federal financing for Expo. We have first of all the grant authorized by the original act which was $20 million. That was in 1962, I believe. However, I do not believe that it has anything to do with the securities of Expo. This is an original grant of $20 million. Later during 1966 and 1967, securities were purchased amounting to $131 million, and we have provision in the 1967-68 Estimates for the purchase of additional securities amounting to somewhere in the neighbourhood of $30 million, making a grand total at this date of $181 million.

Hon. Mr. Walker: How do you differentiate? You said that one was a grant and the other was a purchase of securities and you lumped them together.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: My only intention was to give complete information. My honourable friend will remember that the federal Government subscribed $20 million under the Act creating the Canadian World Exhibition Corporation. This was a grant, and it is not recoverable. Neither is it shared, because the Province of Quebec subscribed a certain amount, which I have forgotten, and the City of Montreal subscribed some $5 million.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I would like to know exactly when the $20 million contribution from the federal Government was decided.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: It was in 1962 under the previous administration when they passed the act creating the Canadian World Exhibition Corporation.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Perhaps honourable senators will permit me to say a few words, because I have a little experience in this field. In my opinion when we first made application to the international board in Paris we had to disclose the contributions of the federal, the provincial and the municipal governments, and so far as I can remember that was before 1962. Would the Acting Leader kindly check that?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I am sure it was before 1962, but what I say is that the act was passed in 1962. What the honourable Senator Fournier means is that the commitment was made prior to that. It might even have been in 1959.

Hon. Mr. Walker: The honourable Senator Fournier was Mayor of Montreal at the time the original commitment was made to get the fair started. Is the other $161 million, which is the sum involved in the purchase of the securities, an advance by the federal Government?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Yes, I think the act provides that these securities must be purchased by the federal Government alone. There is no private concern which could buy or have access to them.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Just for the record, I should mention that while we were in Paris discussing some of these matters—and at that time Mr. Diefenbaker was Prime Minister, and there was a Union Nationale Government in the Province of Quebec and a different administration in Montreal—at a certain moment there was some difficulty and the Honourable Paul Beaulieu, who was the member of the Legislative Assembly for St-Jean, noticed some hesitation on the part of the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce from Ottawa. I was present when he told them, "If you don't want to pay the $20 million, we will double the contribution of the Province of Quebec." So it was already voted. I think that should be cleared up for the record. I think Mr. Diefenbaker deserves some credit, and some credit should go to Mr. Duplessis and to Mr. Beaulieu. It seems to me that all these people are being forgotten today.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: And to Sarto Fournier.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): No. I just want to make the record clear that the money was already voted by Ottawa. There was $20 million from Ottawa, $15 million from Quebec and $5 million from the City of Montreal. Today it is amazing to see that all those people who were there at the start are completely forgotten. I feel it my duty to state that for the record.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Well, I am sure that when the story is written the name of Sarto Fournier will surely be on the record.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): That is very kind and I appreciate it, but everything was done in 1962. It was not the start of it; it was the end of it.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: C'était un fait accompli.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
Ottawa
7 July 1967

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Roland A. Ritchie, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 7th July, at 5.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. G. Cherrier,
Assistant Secretary
to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate.

PRIVATE BILL

UNITED INVESTMENT LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-114, to incorporate United Investment Life Assurance Company.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, first of all may I thank the Senate for giving unanimous consent to proceeding with second reading. Perhaps I should start, therefore, by explaining the reasons for asking for second reading of this bill at this time and also for asking for leave, which I shall do later if the bill receives second reading, to expedite the further steps towards its enactment.

Over a year ago a bill to incorporate the United Investment Life Assurance Company was introduced in the Senate, received first and second readings, and was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. Mr. Humphrys, the Superintendent of Insurance, appeared before that committe and explained the bill, including who were the controlling shareholders behind the company. It was then reported out of the committee, passed by the Senate, and referred to the House of Commons.

The bill did not pass the House of Commons at the last session. The question of the non-resident ownership of the controlling interest in the company arose, and among a number of other bills in which the same question arose, it died with the last session of Parliament.

The bill was reintroduced in Parliament this session, but this time it started in the Commons rather than in the Senate. On second reading in the House of Commons the company indicated, through the sponsor of the bill, what it was prepared to do in connection with increasing the extent of Canadian ownership of the company. The bill therefore received second reading in the House of Commons. It was then referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and in that committee was amended by the addition of a clause dealing with the extent to which the company was prepared to go in changing its degree of Canadian ownership.

I may say that the bill as introduced in the House of Commons was the same as that introduced and passed by the Senate last year, but in committee an additional clause was added, which is now clause 8 of the bill. That bill, as amended, was reported out of the committee and received third reading in the House of Commons on Tuesday last. So, in the normal circumstances, had we been sitting on Wednesday and Thursday, the bill as amended would have been before us then.

Perhaps I should go back and briefly explain the bill itself before coming to the amendment. The bill proposes to incorporate a life insurance company in the usual, standard form. It will have $500,000 of capital and $500,000 of surplus paid in before it starts business. The life insurance company is associated with a group that is connected with the United Accumulative Investment Fund in Canada. The actual ownership of the life insurance company will be in a Canadian company that has been operating for some time as the manager of the United Accumulative Investment Fund. This is one of the largest mutual investment funds in Canada, having assets of more than $300 million, but the control of the management fund which will own the shares of the life insurance company is 80 per cent in the hands of residents of the United States. This is in accordance with the act. The company comes under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, but because of this question of Canadian ownership arising in the House of Commons, the amendment to which the company has agreed in clause 8 provides for a gradual diminution of the interest of non-resident owners.

There are three steps to be taken. Within two years the company controlling the life insurance company itself will offer to Canadian shareholders 25 per cent of its interest, and at the same time also the company in the United States which controls the management company here will also divest itself of 25 per cent of its interest in the management company, and this will reduce the non-resident ownership, direct or indirect, to about 56¼ per cent of the company. Then, within a period of 10 years a further offering of shares to Canadian shareholders will result in the ownership of non-residents, or at least of those who presently control it, being less than 50 per cent—49 per cent of the company. There is always the possibility within these 10 years that certain Canadian residents might move to the United States, which would have some effect on these particular percentages, but that is something over which the company itself has no control. In so far as there is control over it, the intention of those sponsoring this company is that within 10 years over 50 per cent will be in the hands of Canadian shareholders.

Honourable senators, this is the explanation of the bill. This is the explanation of why I am asking leave of the Senate to proceed with it today. It passed the Senate a year ago, when we were satisfied with the 100 per cent ownership of the company by a Canadian company which was, in turn, controlled by a United States company. The only additions now are to bring about a further degree of Canadian ownership in the company. The sponsors are agreeable to this; this is in accordance with their own intentions; and it is now spelled out in the legislation.

Honourable senators, I realize that time is short. We probably have the better part of an hour before royal assent, and I do not think there is very much more on the Order Paper. So, if honourable senators are satisfied to give this bill second reading now, I would propose that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. For that purpose, I may also ask for leave to dispense with the usual seven days' notice that is required. The chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce has agreed to call a meeting of the committee commencing when the Senate adjourns during pleasure, and Mr. Humphrys is available to attend that meeting, as also are the officers of the company.

Honourable senators, with this explanation I ask you to give second reading to the bill; and if it is satisfactory to you, I would then move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I do not know whether anyone insists that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. I know of no one on this side who is insisting on it. In view of the fact the bill previously passed the Senate and that it has now passed the House of Commons with a minor amendment, which has been clearly explained to us by the sponsor, I would suggest that it be not referred to committee. I do not see any necessity for it.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Suspend the rule.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes; suspend the rule.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, this bill which we considered carefully some months ago and approved unanimously, died because the Commons did not pass it during the last session. As the honourable Senator Leonard has pointed out, it has now been amended by the addition of clause 8 increasing the degree of Canadian ownership; and if it was all right then, surely it is even better now.

I agree with my honourable friend the Acting Leader, and see no necessity to have it submitted to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, even though I always like to hear the honourable chairman of that committee explain the measure.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I may say that I am in the hands of the Senate, and if the suggestion of Senator Choquette and Senator Walker represents the unanimous feeling of this chamber, I would accept that and move whatever motion is necessary to dispense with the reference to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I have the greatest respect for the chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee and the work that goes on under his jurisdiction. I am only taking advantage of this opportunity under the rules to say one thing, which is that I think the notices of meetings of the Banking and Commerce Committee are rather short. I am usually in Ottawa and I face the same situation as all members of the Senate with respect to our senatorial staff, but I find the notices from the Committee on Banking and Commerce are rather short in time. I think that today this is an amendment upon which we agree, and perhaps we should not meet, but I do think that through the mail or through the secretarial staff the arrangements could be improved upon, because we do not get the advance notice of committee meetings that we should.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Could we hear a word from the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Commerce? Is it reasonable to proceed without further reference to the committee?

Hon. Salter A Hayden: Yes, I think the house can proceed and possibly waive the rule which requires a reference to it. I do not see any difficulty in that. I do not see any necessity for the committee to meet to consider the bill again.

I take this opportunity to say that I note Senator Benidickson's remarks about the lack of adequate notice of meetings of the Committee on Banking and Commerce. Notices of meeting of that committee go out in the same way and with the same length of notice as those for any other committee meetings. The only time when there is shortness of notice is when we sit in the morning and are going to resume sometime in the afternoon; the notices are sent out and put in the rooms of the committee members. We cannot guarantee the regular and early attention of senators; it depends on when they come back into their office and see them. However, we try to get the notices out in good time, and I think we do a good job.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read the third time?

SUSPENSION OF RULE 117

Leave having been given to proceed to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Mr. Leonard, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That Rule 117 be suspended with respect to the Bill C-114, intituled: "An Act to Incorporate United Investment Assurance Company."

Motion agreed to.

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. Leonard moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION

Ceremonies in the presence of

HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

on Parliament Hill, Ottawa.

July 1, 1967

ADDRESS

BY

HONOURABLE SYDNEY J. SMITH,

SPEAKER OF THE SENATE

YOUR MAJESTY:

On this memorable milestone in our history—made more memorable and joyful by your gracious presence—after a century of sun and storm, we beg to tell Your Majesty that our devotion to the Crown has grown in depth and strength, and to speak humbly of our affection for your person.

To express to Your Majesty our loyalty and affection and our gratitude for the presence in Canada of Your Majesty and His Royal Highness the Prince Philip on this historic occasion, the following humble Address has been passed by the Senate and Commons of Canada:

TO HER MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY ELIZABETH THE SECOND,

By the Grace of God of the United Kingdom, Canada and Her other Realms and Territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith:

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN:

We, Your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate and Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, wish humbly to convey to Your Majesty this expression of our deepest loyalty, affection and respect, and of our appreciation of the presence in Canada of Your Majesty and His Royal Highness the Prince Philip at the celebration of the Centenary of Confederation.

We pray that Your Majesty may continue to reign for many years as our gracious and beloved Sovereign.

ADDRESS
BY
HONOURABLE LUCIEN LAMOUREUX, Q.C., M.P.,
SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

YOUR MAJESTY,

We, the Members of the House of Commons of Canada, beg leave to express to Your Majesty, on behalf of the Canadian people, our loyal and affectionate greetings. We extend to Your Majesty and to His Royal Highness the Prince Philip, a most cordial welcome to Ottawa on this day of deep historic significance for all Canadians.

[Translation]

YOUR MAJESTY:

Your visit in this year of the Centennial of Confederation is a great honour and a great joy; we are particularly happy to express our sincere affection and loyalty.

Canadians from sea to sea are represented here to assure Your Majesty of their unfailing devotion to your person as Queen of Canada. Your presence among them confirms in their hearts the special place which the Monarchy holds in our development as a nation; your words contribute to bind our people together, to encourage them in the pursuit of their ideal and to strengthen their will to enrich the Canadian mosaic, reflecting more particularly their dual origins.

The achievement of the Fathers of Confederation therefore deserves to be pursued in accordance with the principles that marked the birth of our country, recognizing now as then that the Crown is the cornerstone of legislative power and that it is also the fount of honour and justice.

[English]

One hundred years ago today, a new Canada was born. The British North America Act of 1867, to which Your Majesty's revered predecessor, Queen Victoria, gave the Royal assent, was an act of faith in the people and in the Parliamentary institutions of the new Canada. The intervening years have witnessed an increasing fulfilment of the hopes and aspirations of those who believed in the destiny of our people and of our land.

27059—26½

In a very real sense, the Canadian experience with unity of political purpose in a rich diversity of cultures provided a meaningful precedent for the evolution of the Commonwealth, and expression of international neighbourhood perhaps unique in the history of man.

The Crown has become the spiritual keeper of the ideals of freedom and equality that bring together the nations of the Commonwealth. We Canadians are proud and grateful to be linked, through Your Majesty, with these sister nations in the pursuit of peace and progress for all mankind.

As we enter the second century of Confederation, may we, in Canada, express our faith and confidence in the future of our country and its continuing development as a member of the Commonwealth of which our Queen is the head.

Therefore, I am proud to tender to Your Majesty the following address of loyalty on behalf of the Canadian House of Commons:

[Translation]

TO HER MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY
ELIZABETH THE SECOND,

By the Grace of God of the United Kingdom, Canada and Her other Realms and Territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith:

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN:

We, Your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the members of the Senate and Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, wish humbly to convey to Your Majesty this expression of our deepest loyalty, affection and respect, and of our appreciation of the presence in Canada of Your Majesty and His Royal Highness the Prince Philip at the celebration of the Centenary of Confederation.

We pray that Your Majesty may continue to reign for many years as our gracious and beloved Sovereign.

ADDRESS BY

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

Mr. Speaker of the Senate

Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons

I thank you both most sincerely for the Loyal Addresses which you have read on behalf of Parliament and for your welcome to my husband and myself.

One hundred years of Confederation; what a simple statement but what a remarkable chapter in Canada's history. It is altogether right and fitting that Sovereign and people should meet together here at the heart and centre of Canadian existence to give thanks on this great occasion.

Canada is a country that has been blest beyond most other countries in this world. Although there have been all the possibilities for human anguish and conflict, the pages of Canada's history during the last hundred years have hardly been stained by serious misfortunes. The problems which faced the statesmen of 1867 and the national problems which have had to be met in the intervening years have been solved, with rare and minor exceptions, through discussion and through an effort of tolerance, goodwill and understanding.

When I visited the scenes of those historic discussions at Charlottetown and Quebec, three years ago, it came to me how quietly this nation had been created by men sitting around a table. Not the least important service rendered by Sir John Macdonald, Sir Georges Etienne Cartier and the other Fathers of the Confederation, was this tradition of calm consultation which they established.

Let no one underestimate the imagination and daring shown by those men one hundred years ago. They created one nation of this great country which reaches from sea to sea, a land rich in the things that man needs for a good life, enough to provide for a varied and growing population and to help meet the world's needs as well. They also created a nation that has grown and prospered in an atmosphere of freedom, where differences are respected, and where the rights of individual men and women to work out their own salvations have never been long denied. These are profound reasons for our thanksgiving.

On this day of celebration it is right that we should remember with gratitude the men and women who have held responsibility and authority—at the time of confederation and down through the years in the National Capital as in the Provinces—for their contribution to the birth and growth of Canada.

I can think of no more valiant and fitting representative of the people I have in mind than the late General Vanier, soldier, patriot and servant of Canada.

I have spoken of the great men, the men whose names have an honoured place in Canada's history, but we must not forget that we owe as much to the unsung work and steadfast lives of great numbers of more humble people. The men and their families who made the clearings and worked the land, and who built the roads, railways and canals. The greatness and stability of this country also rests on these firm foundations. I am thinking of the eager immigrants who came with such high hopes and had to face the dread of cholera; of the early settlers on the prairies struggling through the harsh winters; of the fishermen determined to wring a livelihood in the storm and danger of unfamiliar waters; of the many thousands who went back in two world wars because they believed so strongly in their own freedom. It is these, the ordinary people of Canada, who have given flesh and sinew to the plans of the Fathers of the Confederation.

[Translation]

It is a hundred years of nationhood that we celebrate today. But let us not forget the earlier centuries of arduous labour that came before Confederation. I am not likely to overlook the contributions made by those of British stock who came here from elsewhere in North America or who were settlers from the old world in the new. Even more extended in time, and as deep in impact, have been the contributions made by Canadians of French descent. Ever since Champlain founded his Habitation at Quebec—and planted rose bushes around it—this air has been sweetened with the French tongue and French culture and sharpened with French intelligence and French resources. It is one of the marvels of history that a society planted so precariously in the wilderness should not only have survived but should have flourished so triumphantly, still loyal to its past and open to everything that is new. From all I hear, from everything I know, I am sure that the contributions of French Canada to the life of the country as a whole will prove even ampler in the future than they have been in the years gone by.

Tomorrow I sail down the St. Lawrence to pay a visit to Expo 67. I have no doubt that I will find there a great mirror held up to the future. It will be possible to catch glimpses of what may be expected in the further exploration of space, in new methods of travel and communications, in the growth of new technologies. Such a future clearly holds as large opportunities for imagination and daring as any that have existed up to now. And the qualities that have made this country what it is will also enable Canadians to share in such a future to the full. On the basis of the natural and human resources that are available here, the broad industrial development, the many centres of learning and research, and the skills found here, there should be few limits to what Canada is capable of. Above all, the energy and resourcefulness of Canadians may be relied on to carry them forward successfully whatever the swiftness of the changes that we will witness.

Sustaining a human perspective will be possible, I am inclined to think, only if we have the courage to probe within ourselves as well as into space. And in thinking about the future we must not be too much distracted from the problems that we can see about us in our society today. This country is fortunate and prosperous above most others. But not all of its people are free from want or hardship. There are still wrongs to be righted and suffering to be relieved. There is still a constant effort of accommodation to be made so that all the peoples in this great country may live together in friendship and harmony.

[English]

Confederation has given Canada the economic strength which has made it possible for her to help the needy countries in their economic development; it has made it possible for Canada to provide forces to help keep the peace where it has been threatened, and, above all, it has given increasing power and authority to Canada's voice in world affairs. This power and authority derives from the internal national unity and it can only be sustained and flourish if that national unity prospers.

From the very earliest days, the name of Canada is associated with prodigious voyages; first the voyages of the seamen from Bristol and St. Malo in their tiny ships, then the explorers who went by canoe up the Ottawa to the Great Lakes and along the waterways of the Middle West to the Rockies and beyond. With the beginning of this new century the whole Canadian nation embarks on another great voyage. May it bring peace and prosperity, happiness and harmony and a just reward for the work and endeavour of each one of you.

PROGRAMME

A HUNDRED YEARS AGO today, our ancestors witnessed the birth of a new nation. Now, a century later, some twenty million Canadians share the heritage of freedom and material prosperity for which, on this historic occasion, all will wish to join in thanksgiving to God.

The roots of twentieth century Canada lie deep in the traditions of many peoples. Our society and system of government have evolved through generations of political adjustment and social change. We have sought to take the best from the past and to mould our institutions to meet the demands of today's world. It is fitting that we should recollect and acknowledge our debt to the wisdom and vision of the Fathers of Confederation who set the course for Canada's development. It must be our resolve to preserve and nourish all that is worthy in that inheritance and transmit it to those who will be our heirs.

Throughout this day, people are coming together across the land to celebrate the Centennial of Confederation. In the nation's capital, the Senate and Commons have assembled in the presence of Her Majesty the Queen of Canada. Here, visible to all, is our treasured institution of Parliament, of which the spirit and sinew resides in the people themselves.

The future is charged with excitement and challenge. Let us now, in humility, but with confidence in that future, dedicate ourselves to the task ahead.

Call to Worship

MR. LAVY N. BECKER

Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord, and the people whom He hath chosen for His own inheritance.

O come, let us worship, and bow down, and kneel before the Lord, our Maker. For He is the Lord our God; and we are the people of His pasture, and the sheep of His hand.

O Lord My God (Beethoven)

Prayer of Invocation

RIGHT REV. TIMOTHEOS

O Lord our God, great, eternal, wonderful in glory, who keepest covenant and promise for those that love Thee with their whole heart, who art the life of all, the help of those that flee to Thee, the hope of those that cry unto Thee: Cleanse us from our sins, and from every thought displeasing to Thy goodness. Cleanse our souls and bodies, our hearts and consciences, that with pure heart and a clear mind, with perfect love and the calm hope, we may confidently and fearlessly pray to Thee;

And to Thy Name be the praise for ever. Amen.

Our Father, Who Art in Heaven...

THE RIGHT REV. DR. W. C. LOCKHART

Our Father, who art in heaven,
Hallowed be thy Name;
Thy kingdom come;
Thy will be done on earth
as it is in heaven.
Give us this day our daily bread;
And forgive us our trespasses,
As we forgive those who trespass against us;
And lead us not into temptation,
But deliver us from evil.
For Thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

Clergy: I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help.

Response: My help cometh from the Lord, which made heaven and earth.

Clergy: He will not suffer thy foot to be moved: he that keepeth thee will not slumber.

Response: Behold, he that keepeth thee shall neither slumber nor sleep.

Clergy: The Lord is thy keeper; the Lord is thy shade upon thy right hand.

Response: The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night.

Clergy: The Lord shall preserve thee from all evil; he shall preserve thy soul.

Response: The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in, from this time forth, and even for evermore.

Hymn

All people that on earth do dwell,
Sing to the Lord with cheerful voice,
Him serve with mirth, His praise forth tell
Come ye before Him and rejoice.

Know that the Lord is God indeed;
Without our aid He did us make;
We are His folk, He doth us feed,
And for His sheep He doth us take.

O enter then His gates with praise,
Approach with joy His courts unto;
Praise, laud, and bless His name always,
For it is seemly so to do.

For why the Lord our God is good;
His mercy is for ever sure;
His truth at all times firmly stood,
And shall from age to age endure. Amen.

Scriptural Reading

THE PRIME MINISTER

Be ye all of one mind, having compassion one of another, love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous. Not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing: but contrariwise blessing; knowing that ye are thereunto called, that ye should inherit a blessing. For he that will love life, and see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile. Let him eschew evil, and do good; let him speak peace, and ensue it. For the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears are open unto their prayers; but the face of the Lord is against them that do evil. And who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good? But and if ye suffer for righteousness sake, happy are ye; and be not afraid of their terror, neither be troubled.

The Centennial Anthem

Scriptural Reading

HIS EMINENCE CARDINAL ROY

I entreat you, then—I, a prisoner for the Lord's sake: as God has called you, live up to your calling. Be humble always and gentle, and patient too. Be forbearing with one another and charitable. Spare no effort to make fast with bonds of peace and unity which the Spirit gives. There is one body and one Spirit, as there is also one hope held out in God's call to you; one faith, one baptism: one God and Father of all, who is over all and through all and in all. But each of us has been given his gift, his due portion of Christ's bounty ... to equip God's people for work in His service, to the building up of the body of Christ. So shall we all at last attain to the unity inherent in our faith and our knowledge of the Son of God—to mature manhood, measured by nothing less than the full stature of Christ.

Let us speak the truth in love; so shall we fully grow up into Christ. He is the head, and on Him the whole body depends. Bonded and knit together by every constituent joint, the whole frame grows through the due activity of each part, and builds itself up in love.

The Centennial Hymn

Prayer of Thanksgiving

THE MOST REV. H. H. CLARK

Almighty God, of whose righteous will all things are, and were created; Thou hast gathered our people into a great nation, and sent them to sow beside all waters, and multiply sure dwellings on the earth. Deepen the root of our life in everlasting righteousness. Make us equal to our high trusts, reverent in the use of freedom, just in the exercise of power, generous in the protection of weakness. With all Thy blessings, bless Thy servant Elizabeth, our Queen, with all members of the Royal House. Fill her heart with such loyalty to Thee, that her people may be exalted by their loyalty to her. To our legislators and councillors give insight and faithfulness, that our laws may clearly speak the right, and our judges purely interpret them. May wisdom and knowledge be the stability of our times, and our deepest trust be in Thee, the Lord of nations, and the King of Kings. Amen.

A Litany of Re-Dedication

RABBI S. M. ZAMBROWSKY—THE RIGHT REV. DR. W. C. LOCKHART

Clergy: Remembering our heritage with gratitude and our progress with humility, let us now re-dedicate ourselves to those moral and spiritual principles which have been the foundation of our freedom. O Lord our God, that all our people may live and labour, dream and build, fulfilling their destiny under Thy providence:

Response: We re-dedicate ourselves, O Lord.

Clergy: That all may share a common purpose, striving for unity, honouring our many origins, cultures, and religious faiths:

Response: We re-dedicate ourselves, O Lord.

Clergy: That we may grow in brotherhood, without fear, without arrogance, without servility, in constant pursuit of righteousness:

Response: We re-dedicate ourselves, O Lord.

Clergy: That we may not think of ourselves alone, but of all mankind, acting within the family of nations with understanding and generosity, with patience and wisdom:

Response: We re-dedicate ourselves, O Lord.

Clergy: That in all our earthly tasks we may so order our lives as ever to confess Thy care and rule:

All: Hear us and help us, O Lord our God, and to Thy Name be the glory forever. Amen.

Hymn—Now Thank We All Our God

Now thank we all our God,
With heart, and hands and voices,
Who wondrous things hath done,
In whom His world rejoices;
Who from our mother's arms
Hath blessed us on our way
With countless gifts of love,
And still is ours today.

O may this bounteous God
Through all our life be near us,
With ever joyful hearts
And blessed peace to cheer us
And keep us in His grace,
And guide us when perplexed,
And free us from all ills
In this world and the next.

The Benediction

THE MOST REV. H. H. CLARK

May the God of peace Himself give you peace at all times and in all ways. Those things which you have learned, and received, and heard, and seen do. And the God of peace be with you. Amen.

REPORT OF THE TENTH MEETING OF THE CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

In this Centennial Year of Confederation, it was our privilege and our very great pleasure to have the Tenth Meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group take place in Canada—in Ottawa from May 10th to 12th, and in the Laurentians and at Expo '67 in Montreal from May 12th to 14th.

During the month preceding the meetings, the Canadian delegation held several briefing sessions. Our Parliamentary Associations Branch and the Department of External Affairs organized the briefings of our delegates and the preparation of background papers. Officials from the Departments of External Affairs, Finance, Trade and Commerce, National Defence, External Aid and Energy, Mines and Resources participated in the briefings. We were also fortunate in having the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Finance devote an afternoon to discussing items on the Agenda with members of our delegation.

The Canadian delegation was led jointly by the Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable Sydney J. Smith; and by the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Honourable Lucien Lamoureux. The delegation consisted of the following parliamentarians: from the Senate, Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard (Ontario), Hon. Nelson Rattenbury (New Brunswick), Hon. Paul Desruisseaux (Quebec), Hon. L. P. Beaubien (Quebec), Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary (Ontario), and, from the House of Commons: Mr. James Byrne (British Columbia), Mr. G. Roy McWilliam (New Brunswick). Mr. Herb Gray (Ontario), Mr. Robert Andras (Ontario), Mr. Tom Lefebvre (Quebec), Mr. Paul Langlois (Quebec), Mr. Donald Jamieson (Newfoundland), Hon. Alvin Hamilton, P.C. (Saskatchewan), Mr. Wallace Nesbitt (Ontario), Mr. Jack McIntosh (Saskatchewan), Mr. D. M. Code (Ontario), Mr. J. Paul Beaulieu (Quebec), Mr. Andrew Brewin (Ontario), Mr. David Lewis, Ontario), Mr. Henry Latulippe (Quebec), Mr. Howard Johnston (British Columbia). Mr. Leonard D. Hopkins (Ontario) served as an alternate delegate.

The United States delegation was led jointly by Senator George D. Aiken (Vermont) and Congressman Cornelius E. Gallagher (New Jersey). Other delegates from the United States Congress were: Senators John C. Stennis (Mississippi), Michael J. Mansfield (Montana), William Spong (Virginia), L. B. Jordan (Idaho), Robert P. Griffin (Michigan), Hiram L. Fong (Hawaii); and, from the House of Representatives Mrs. Edna F. Kelly (New York) and Congressmen William T. Murphy (Illinois), Harold T. Johnson (California), Fernand J. St. Germain (Rhode Island), Otis G. Pike (New York), James Kee (West Virginia), Mark Andrews (North Dakota), Robert T. Stafford (Vermont), Vernon W. Thomson (Wisconsin), John J. Duncan (Tennessee), William S. Broomfield (Michigan), Thomas E. Morgan (Pennsylvania), William J. Randall (Missouri), and J. Irving Whalley (Pennsylvania).

Agenda and proceedings

The meetings were formally opened in the Railway Committee Room on Thursday morning, May 11th, when the two Canadian Co-Chairmen officially welcomed the United Stated delegation. They affirmed once again the pleasure and gratitude with which the Canadian Senate and House of Commons received the Concurrent Resolution, adopted earlier in the year by the United States Senate and House of Representatives, extending congratulations and best wishes of the United States Congress to the Canadian Parliament on the occasion of the Centennial of Confederation. Both Senator Aiken and Representative Gallagher replied that they were pleased to join with their Canadian colleagues to discuss questions of mutual interest and were particularly delighted to visit Canada during the Centennial Year.

Following the opening session, the delegates divided themselves into two working committees—one on Trade and Economic Matters, and the other on Defence and Security Matters. Each Committee met three times.

Committee I

The Committee on Trade and Economic Matters met under the joint chairmanship of Senator Aiken and Speaker Smith. Representing the United States Congress were: Senators Griffin and Jordan, and Representatives Kelly, Johnson, St. Germain, Kee, Andrews, Thomson, and Whalley.

Representing Canada were Senators Leonard and Beaubien, and from the House of Commons, the Hon. Alvin Hamilton and Messrs. Byrne, Gray, Code, Beaulieu, Lewis, Latulippe, Johnston and Hopkins.

Joint Communiqué, Committee I

The Committee on Trade and Economic Matters had full and frank discussions concerning both bilateral and multilateral subjects of mutual interest. There was considerable discussion of both United States and Canadian policies relating to United States investments in Canada. Common oil and gas problems were the subject of a full exchange of views, as were possible United States measures which would restrict imports into the United States of Canadian minerals. There was general agreement that both countries should pursue the possibility of working out equitable arrangements pertaining to access to the sea through the Alaska panhandle and the paving of the Alaska Highway. There was also general agreement on the need for action by both countries on common problems in connection with water pollution.

There was an exchange of views concerning the respective balance of payments situations of Canada and the United States and a review of the operation of the automotive agreement with a consensus that the agreement had been generally satisfactory in its operation thus far. The foreign aid programs of both countries were discussed with particular attention to how the aid of both countries could be made more effective in achieving more rapid economic development in the developing nations.

Recent developments in the Kennedy Round of tariff negotiations and Britain's application for membership in the Common Market were discussed at length by both delegations expressing hopes for the successful conclusion of the negotiations. The Committee ended its agenda with a full exchange of views on the various issues involved in the matter of trading with Communist countries.

Committee II

The Committee on Defence and Security was co-chaired by Congressman Gallagher and by Speaker Lamoureux. During sittings of the House of Commons, Mr. Jack McIntosh deputized for Mr. Speaker. Other members of the Committee included: from the United States Congress, Senators Stennis, Mansfield, Fong and Spong, and Representatives Morgan, Murphy, Pike, Stafford, Duncan, Broomfield and Randall. The Canadian Parliament was represented by Senators Rattenbury, O'Leary and Desruisseaux, and from the House of Commons, Messrs. McWilliam, Nesbitt, Andras, Langlois, Lefebvre, Jamieson and Brewin.

Joint Communiqué, Committee II

The Committee on Defense and Security Matters discussed the status of the NATO Alliance and the various ways in which it could be strengthened. Delegates were in agreement that any changes in the Organization should be made only after full consultation among the member states. The delegates were mindful of the many problems and attitudes that entered into any consideration of the future form of NATO and devoted some time to a discussion of the non-military aspects of the Organization.

The Committee explored the changes in military technology and mobility of forces as well as problems involved in the development of an anti-ballistic missile system. Delegates recognized the desirability of reaching agreement which would obviate the necessity of building expensive ABM systems. Hopes were expressed that the close NORAD relationship would continue and Canada's peacemaking role was discussed.

The problems of reaching full agreement on a nuclear non-proliferation treaty were discussed and there was unanimity on the desirability of working toward this goal.

Members of both delegations exchanged views on the current situation in Vietnam. There was an examination of the numerous steps that had been made by the United States to secure a peaceful settlement and the difficulties of bringing representatives of North Vietnam to a conference.

An exploration of the problem of Communist China included an analysis of contacts by both Governments with Communist China, the issue of recognition of that country and its admission into the United Nations.

At a second plenary session on the morning of Friday, May 12th, the delegates were pleased and honoured to have a visit from the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, and an informal address of welcome on behalf of the Canadian Government.

Visit to House of Commons

At the close of the Committee meetings, the United States delegation proceeded to the Speaker's Gallery in the House of Commons for the opening at 11:00 a.m. The following is an excerpt from the Hansard of that day:

Friday, May 12, 1967

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF REPRESENTATIVES OF UNITED STATES CONGRESS

Mr. SPEAKER: May I be permitted to bring to the attention of hon. members the presence in the galleries to my left of a very distinguished group of representatives from the United States Congress.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: These Senators and members of the House of Representatives, accompanied by their wives, are attending the tenth annual meeting in Ottawa of the United States-Canada Interparliamentary Group. On behalf on all hon. members I extend to them very cordial wishes and express the hope that their stay with us will be pleasant, interesting and fruitful.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

The four Co-Chairman held a press conference in the Commonwealth Room at 2:30 P.M., on May 12th, following the close of the working sessions.

Social Program

The United States delegation arrived at the Canadian Forces Base, Uplands, in the late afternoon of Wednesday, May 10th, and were met by their Canadian colleagues. A short reception followed. In the evening, both delegations gathered for a buffet supper and informal evening in the Banquet Room at the Chateau Laurier Hotel.

On May 11th, a luncheon was held in the Railway Committee Room where the guest speaker, the Hon. Arthur Laing, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, spoke to the delegates on resource development in Canada. In the evening, the delegates and their wives were most enjoyably and graciously entertained at a reception given by His Excellency, Walton W. Butterworth, Ambassador of the United States, and Mrs. Butterworth at their residence in Rockcliffe Park. This was followed by a dinner in the Confederation Room, West Block, given in honour of the Tenth Canada-United States Interparliamentary Meeting by the Honourable Paul Martin, Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Their Excellencies, the Right Honourable Roland Michener, Governor-General of Canada, and Mrs. Michener, received the delegates and their wives at Government House at noon, on May 12th. This was of special interest to the delegates in that His Excellency was one of the founding Co-Chairmen of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group during his term of office as Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons from 1957 to 1962. As a Co-Chairman and an active participant in the first six meetings of the Group, His Excellency was pleased to have this opportunity of greeting friends of long standing on the United States delegation, and of meeting new ones.

Ladies Program

While their husbands attended meetings, the wives of American delegates were escorted on sightseeing tours by their Canadian counterparts. Mme Lamoureux entertained the visiting ladies at a luncheon at the Country Club and at tea at "The Farm", Kingsmere, following a tour of the Gatineau Parkway. The ladies also visited the National Gallery for a tour of the Exhibition "Three Hundred Years of Canadian Art".

Mont Gabriel Lodge

On Friday afternoon both delegations travelled by bus from Ottawa to Mont Gabriel Lodge in the Laurentians. Delegates relaxed at an informal reception and dinner at the Lodge that evening, and enjoyed a special program of Canadian folk songs presented by two oustanding Canadian folklorists, Mme Hélène Baillargeon and Mr. Alan Mills of Montreal.

Expo '67

Everyone started out for Montreal early Saturday morning, travelling by bus to Ile Charron. From there, the delegations were taken by Hovercraft to Cité du Havre and then by tractor train on a tour of the Expo site prior to arrival at the United States Pavilion before 10:00 A.M. Delegates were greeted by officials of the pavilion and Mr. Leonard Marks, Director of the United States Information Agency, described the concept and planning which resulted in the pavilion and its exhibits. He explained that the planners felt that the world was already well aware of the technological leadership of the United States and that the guiding principle was to portray the other America, not just for Americans, but for all visitors to this important World's Fair. Delegates had an opportunity to see the excellent film before touring the United States Pavilion.

After making their way to Place d'Accueil and a light lunch in the St. John's Room, the delegates visited the Pavilion of the U.S.S.R. and other exhibits of their choice before arriving at the Canadian Pavilion for a guided tour.

Following this, Mr. H. Leslie Brown, Commissioner-General of the Canadian Pavilion, entertained the delegates and wives at a reception prior to dinner at the Hélène de Champlain Restaurant given by Ambassador Stanley R. Tupper, United States Commissioner-General at Expo '67. After dinner, delegates were free to return to Mont Gabriel Lodge or linger at Expo. On Sunday, some delegates returned to Expo, while others relaxed or toured the Laurentians in the vicinity of Mont Gabriel.

After lunch on Sunday, May 14th, both delegations journeyed to Montreal International Airport, where planes awaited to take the United States delegates back to Washington. The Canadian delegation then returned to Ottawa.

Before concluding this Report of the Tenth Canada-United States Interparliamentary Meeting, we wish to record our sincere appreciation for the support and assistance given by the staffs of the Senate and House of Commons, the United States Division of the Department of External Affairs and the translations staff of the Department of the Secretary of State throughout the Ottawa portion of the program. As usual, the Department of National Defence provided excellent support in transporting the delegates and their baggage efficiently both in Ottawa and on tour. The visit to Expo '67 was all the more enjoyable and stimulating as a result of the wonderful co-operation and assistance of the staffs of the pavilions visited and particularly the hardworking staff of the Expo '67 Protocol Section.

Sydney J. Smith,
Speaker of the Senate.
Lucien Lamoureux,
Speaker of the House of Commons.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 31, 1967

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

HON. JOHN J. CONNOLLY, P.C.

BIRTHDAY FELICITATIONS

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, before this chamber commences to transact its business this evening I should like to underline the fact that today one of our young members is celebrating his sixty-first birthday. I refer, of course, to our good friend, the honourable Leader of the Government.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION IN THE SENATE

CONGRATULATIONS TO HON. JACQUES FLYNN, P.C., ON HIS APPOINTMENT, AND TRIBUTES TO HON. A. J. BROOKS, P.C., ON HIS RETIREMENT

[Translation]

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, first of all tonight, when the Senate meets again after the summer recess, I want to address a warm welcome to the new Leader of the Opposition, the honourable Senator Jacques Flynn.

To express these feelings, in which I am sure all my colleagues join with me, I shall use the senator's mother tongue; even if I do not express myself perfectly, I want him to know that I am sincere. I spoke of Senator Flynn's mother tongue because four or five generations ago perhaps, the household language on the father's side, in the Flynn and the Connolly families, was "Gaelic". In these circumstances, the honourable senator and myself would have a real problem tonight.

Since his appointment to the Senate, Senator Flynn has been an active, intelligent and able colleague. In the House of Commons he was Deputy Speaker and Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. It is always a pleasure to hear his speeches, so clear, so sensible.

He is the distinguished grandson of a grandfather who made a name for himself in the life of his province and his country; his father would be very proud of his son's achievements.

Again I extend to the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate my co-operation and my sincere congratulations.

[English]

Honourable senators, in congratulating Senator Flynn on his appointment, may I at the same time have the privilege of referring to the retirement of Senator Brooks as Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. We can all understand, I am sure, his desire at this time to shed the responsibility he has carried. He richly deserves the privilege and the right to do so.

Senator Brooks has been a distinguished parliamentarian in Canada for many years. He has served as a member of the New Brunswick Legislature, as a member of the House of Commons through eight general elections, as Minister of Veterans Affairs, and as Leader of the Government in the Senate in 1962 and Leader of the Opposition since 1963. He has had a parliamentary career of great distinction and of unquestioned integrity.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): His career has been coloured by his early life in the army, by his life as a lawyer, and by the splendid Maritime education that he received at the University of New Brunswick.

This is no time for a eulogy. Senator Brooks is, happily, to continue with us, although at the moment he is slightly indisposed, and we all wish him a very early return to this chamber. It is appropriate at this time that we should express collectively our deep appreciation of the great contribution that he has made to the best objectives of the Senate. He has indeed been an outstanding senator, and—speaking I am sure for Senator Ross Macdonald, who was leader with him here, as well as for myself—I would like to say how deeply I appreciated the co-operation without compromise that he has always given, the consideration and patience that he has shown without deviation from the work at hand. As I said once before, we will always deem it an honour to have had Senator Brooks in this chamber with us as a colleague.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I would add one further word.

We are delighted that Senator Choquette will continue as Deputy Leader of the Opposition. I was concerned when he rose earlier this evening, because normally the Leader of the Government is seen by the Speaker first. I am sorry the honourable Speaker did not make him observe the rules, as I wish to forget what he mentioned.

Senator Choquette and I have been associated personally for a long time: in school, in sports, and in practise at the same Bar. He has been a good senator and an able deputy leader. I will tell the Senate something about Senator Choquette that very few know, that while the Bar got a fine ornament when he decided to become a lawyer, the stage lost a very talented actor. This I know from our university days.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I hope you do not expect a long speech from me this evening, for this is an occasion which instead of loosening the tongue rather grips and keeps one from expressing his feelings.

First of all, I should like to tell my colleagues, those of you who are here this evening and who this afternoon showed outstanding confidence in me, how much I appreciate their gesture. I told them, and I repeat it again, that I should never have accepted those responsibilities had I not felt that I could depend on the co-operation of all. I know I can depend on that co-operation. That is why I accepted the heavy responsibility of being Leader of the Opposition.

The Leader of the Government, through his compliment, did not make my present task any easier. He has always been extremely kind to me. His kindness reflects the sympathy and co-operation I have always had from all the senators in this house, whether they sit on the Government side or the side of the Opposition.

To you all, honourable senators, on both sides of this house, I say thank you for the sympathy and understanding you have shown me. I beg of you to bear with me while I learn to fulfil the duties of Leader of the Opposition. I cannot promise, as I told my colleagues this afternoon, to be anyone but myself. There is much room for improvement, but I must say I have always tried to improve myself—without much success perhaps, but I shall continue to try just the same, I can assure you.

[English]

Honourable senators, I need not repeat my remarks of gratitude for the confidence that my colleagues around me have shown in choosing me as their leader, nor the assurance that I have given them that I will discharge the responsibilities of this office to the best of my ability, but counting, of course, on the co-operation they have promised me.

I am most grateful to all members of this house for the sympathy and the understanding they have always shown me. I will try to do whatever is required of me in the new duties that I now assume.

Senator Connolly has mentioned the sadness that we all feel because Senator Brooks has decided that he should resign from his position as leader. This sadness is increased by the fact that his health is not the best, but, as has been mentioned by the Leader of the Government, he is away only for a few days and we count on his return early next week to be with us and to make this house and all of us the beneficiaries of his vast experience. Former leaders in this chamber are great assets to this body—I am referring, of course, to Senator Aseltine and Senator Ross Macdonald. We are pleased that they, with Senator Brooks, will continue to give the Senate the benefit of their experience.

I have nothing further to say at this time, except that I wish personally to congratulate again the Leader of the Government on his birthday. I saw the notice in the Gazette this morning. He is young. He looks young. But I may say that he acts even younger than he looks. I refer to the fact that he is such a strong and active debater.

Honourable senators, again I thank you very much for your sympathy and understanding. I look forward to vigorous debates and good exchanges between the parties. As far as I am concerned I shall do all I can to prove that the Senate should continue to play an important role in Canadian affairs.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, at the outset let me express to His Honour the Speaker our very best wishes and tell him how pleased we are about what has happened in the last few months.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien (Bedford): Secondly, let me say how pleasant it is to be back, having been away for two or three months and having missed all the nice old faces on both sides of the house. It is really charming to see now that the old faces have not become any older.

I want to express to the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) our admiration for the way he has run the Senate in the years he has held his office.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I only wish he ran the Government!

Hon. Mr. Beaubien (Bedford): We are, of course, extremely sorry to see Senator Brooks step down from his office, but at the same time we are pleased to see Senator Flynn take it over. I cannot imagine a man better suited to the job he has undertaken. He is a man of good judgment, with the great faculty of being able to get along with everyone. I know he will do a very good job and I wish him every success.

[Translation]

Hon. David Walker: The leader of the Government speaks like a preacher. He is magnificent. If he is such a good speaker, then I must do my bit, too.

It affords me great pleasure to have as our leader such a distinguished person as Senator Jacques Flynn. We are greatly pleased, because we all readily appreciate that he possesses all the qualities of a leader. He is a brilliant lawyer, a deep thinker and a master of parliamentary procedure. Above all, he is a distinguished gentleman, a worthy man and a nice fellow. First of all, how nice to have here a French-Canadian leader and in the other place, an English-speaking leader. A real friendly understanding, is it not? Well, Jacques Flynn is a jolly good fellow!

[English]

May I say a word about our retiring chief, for whom we on this side and, I am bold enough to suggest, all honourable senators have deep affection.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Walker: He is a wonderful man. I served with him in the fifties in the federal cabinet, and I have watched his progress. He became Minister of Veterans Affairs—and rightly so, after his distinguished military career in two world wars—and he had the reputation of giving the veterans a new deal. We have watched him in this house, and he has always been for us a man who puts duty ahead of all else. He is a gentleman of the old school, a kindly man, a good man, a courteous man and, if I may say so in this day and generation, a courtly man. We will miss his leadership tremendously, because we really do appreciate all that he has been and all that he has done.

On behalf of my colleagues, and I am sure all members of this house, we hope that on his reverting to the ranks, with us senators, he may be spared many years with his charming wife, his children and his grandchildren who will now enjoy a great deal more of his company.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I join with the other senators in congratulating Senator Flynn, and tell him that he now fills very large shoes and follows in a tradition of leaders who have made great reputation for themselves. I am sure that he will do well.

Senator Choquette has been a sitting sentry for all these years, always there on the job, looking after the interests of the party, as he is expected to do.

However, my purpose in rising is to say a word about Senator "Alf" Brooks. I am not interested in delivering eulogies on members of the Senate. If the occasion arises, I prefer to tell them what I have to say about them publicly rather than privately. This is such an occasion.

In this house Senator Brooks has been an experienced, knowledgeable parliamentarian; but in his capacity as leader opposite he brought into this chamber something else, a kindness that has helped us get along.

I was elected to the House of Commons in 1945, and he had then been a member for ten years. I saw him sitting across the way, a quiet, concerned, serious man. He did not speak often, but when he rose to speak the house listened, and I listened. I realized that he had served his country in two wars with distinction, that he was a man whom I should know, and I got to know him. The only occasions upon which I ever saw him fervent were when he spoke on a matter that concerned his native province.

Our first task in the Parliament of 1945—and there are honourable senators who were in the house at that time, Senator Ross Macdonald and Senator White among them —was to look after the veterans. It had to be admitted that Parliament had not done a very good job after the First World War, and this was our opportunity. There were 85 of us veterans in the house at that time, and the Government organized a veterans' committee, made up of veteran members. We decided that we should have a charter for the veterans, and we did.

Senator Brooks led the Conservative members and arranged to make whatever contributions needed to be made. We had to deal with pensions, gratuities and rehabilitation, among other vital matters. It was a completely new charter. Senator Brooks helped as much as he could, and when he knew that no more could be done for the time being he sat back and made ready to return another day. He always acted responsibly, and he knew when to call a halt.

Those were ten eventful years that I have never forgotten. I was a member of the veterans' committee from the time I entered the House of Commons until the time I was appointed to this chamber, and I have never forgotten the contribution that Senator Brooks made for the veterans. When he became Minister of Veterans Affairs I took my eyes off the department because I knew that the veterans would be well looked after.

I next fell in with him at the United Nations at a time when he was the chief Canadian delegate. He was in the habit of bringing the delegates from the Senate and the House of Commons together for morning meetings, and having them express their opinions. If any one expressed an opinion, Senator Brooks would receive it as if that person were the world's leading authority on the United Nations.

As honourable senators know, with all the various points of order the proceedings of the United Nations can be very boring, but Senator Brooks was always present and he never neglected looking after members of the Senate and the House of Commons when they went there. He made them welcome and gave them the kind of assignment they could best carry out.

Honourable senators, I have a great admiration for this fine man. He is a credit to Parliament. He has exemplified the very best in our political life, and I rise to make these few remarks because I value his friendship.

[Translation]

Hon. J. M. Dessureault: Honourable senators, as a citizen of Quebec, like honourable Senator Flynn, may I be permitted to add, with the previous speakers, my congratulations to him on his promotion. I should also like to congratulate all his colleagues on the opposition side for the good judgment they have shown in appointing Senator Flynn to the high post of Leader of the Opposition in the Senate.

Without a doubt he will be worthy of the position and will follow in the footsteps of his predecessors.

I will not repeat all the qualities mentioned here tonight in reference to Senator Flynn, but I may say that he is gifted with a sure judgment and I have no doubt that he will be an excellent Leader of the Opposition. However, I do not wish him to go further but I hope that he will continue to act as Leader of the Opposition for many years.

I take this opportunity to say how sorry I am to hear that my good friend, Senator Brooks, is leaving his functions. Fortunately, he will continue to sit among us for many years still, I hope, because he discharged his duties wonderfully well, with tact and wisdom. In one word, he has been an excellent Leader of the Opposition, and I express my regrets at his leaving this office.

[English]

Hon. Harry A. Willis: Honourable senators, before expressing my good wishes to Senator Brooks upon his retirement as Leader of the Opposition in this chamber, I should like to say that I have known Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) for a long time, but I had never realized that his many accomplishments and great charm are due to the fact that he was born on Hallowe'en.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): When the devils walk.

Hon. Mr. Willis: I hope there will be no pranks played upon him tonight.

Honourable senators, I have known Senator Brooks since 1935 when he first became a member of the House of Commons. He has always been a gentleman.

Senator Croll, Senator Walker and other honourable senators have said what I would have said, but I remember Senator Brooks chiefly in October of 1957 when as Minister of Veterans Affairs he accompanied Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II to the Cenotaph for the placing of a wreath. I think that that was the crowning moment of his life. I know very well that he has had other great moments, but on the particular occasion to which I refer I could see the exuberance flowing from his face as he walked with Her Majesty.

We are grateful for the knowledge that he is going to remain with us and, we hope, for a long time.

Before resuming my seat I must say something about my new chief in this house, or I might suffer greatly afterwards.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not think you need worry.

Hon. Mr. Willis: I do welcome him very warmly as our new leader. I know he will conduct the affairs of his office to the best of his ability, and will be a credit to this chamber and, most of all, to the country.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I join with those who have spoken in congratulating Senator Flynn, and in extending best wishes to the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) on this very important day in his life. However, I rise particularly to say a few words about my very warm and intimate friend and associate, Senator Brooks.

Senator Brooks and I reached university together in 1906, and through all the years since we have been very close friends. In those days when Senator Brooks attended the University of New Brunswick he came from a home in very humble circumstances, a fact that I want to emphasize, because what he has got since, he got himself. He is a self-made man in every respect. I hope and pray that he will come back to this chamber and be associated with us for many years.

As a New Brunswicker I am very proud of Senator Brooks, as I know all citizens of New Brunswick are. He has been a great representative of our province.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am in complete accord with all that has been said this evening, and I would not rise at this time were it not for the fact that Senator Brooks and I have been in Parliament for the same length of time. We entered the House of Commons together in 1935. He had served in the First World War as I had. We are from days earlier than those to which Senator Croll referred.

In our day we formed the Old Soldiers' Club. We had as members men from the navy and from the air force, but for some reason or other we called it the Old Soldiers' Club. It was composed of those who had served in the First World War, and we took great interest, apart altogether from politics, in the well-being of those who had served with us.

It was in those days that Alf Brooks and I formed our friendship. The club had to have officers and, if I remember correctly, I was appointed president and Alf Brooks was appointed secretary. Howard Green was treasurer, but he did not have very heavy responsibilities. That friendship of Howard, Alfred and I has continued throughout the years.

I came to the Senate and left Alf Brooks in the House of Commons. Then I became Leader of the Government, was in the Cabinet, Leader of the Opposition and again Leader of the Government, and Alfred followed me in all of those offices. Then I retired as Leader of the Government in the Senate. My dear friend Alfred Brooks continued to be Leader of the Opposition, and he gained the respect, admiration and affection of all honourable senators during those years. He was extremely capable, conscientious and always approachable.

Honourable senators, I am sorry that Senator Brooks has retired as Leader of the Opposition, but I am sure it gives him some satisfaction, as it gives me, to know that we are now humble senators and will be able to continue our friendship as such.

Honourable senators, I will not sit down without congratulating the new Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn). I have sat opposite him for the last few years. I have always thought highly of him and have great respect for his intelligence and his industry. When legislation is before the Senate he examines it carefully, minutely, and you will recall that in many instances he has found errors which might have slipped through but for his close attention. I am sure that under his leadership on the other side this house as a whole will benefit, and I wish him happiness and success.

Hon. Norman McL. Paterson: Honourable senators, it is a third of a year since we met here and a good many things have occurred in that period of time, but one of the most interesting to this house has so far not been mentioned and I think I should call the attention of the house to it.

I was in Vancouver on August 31 at an interesting event, to give my sister away, and I learned that our Speaker was being married that same day. I rise to take the liberty of offering you, sir, our congratulations and very best wishes for health and happiness for many years to come.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sarto Fournier: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted I should like to say a word or two about my impression of what I have heard today concerning the appointment of the honourable Senator Flynn. My thought is this:

[Translation]

If we consider the various forms of government which have existed in the world since the Roman Empire, we notice that the most civilized, the most perfect forms of government involved a second chamber, a senate: the Senate in Rome, the House of Lords in Great Britain, the Senate in France, the Senate in the United States and the Senate in Canada—appointed or elected under different forms—but always a second chamber to give a sober second thought to legislation, to consider a redraft of acts before carrying them out lest they should deprive the citizens of their freedom.

In Canada our Senate evolves and works in conjunction with the House of Commons, according to the British system. Members of the Government and members of the Opposition alike take part in the drafting of our legislation. It is still a very high post, responsible, delicate, personal and public at the same time. Today Senator Brooks must retire because of ill health and we must express to him our respect, our admiration and our gratitude as he is being succeeded by Senator Flynn.

I feel that the most valuable compliment that can be paid to a citizen of our country is to appoint him Leader in the Senate, a post now held by Senator Connolly, or Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. I am very happy about the appointment of Senator Flynn, and I wish him good luck. We hope that he will put up a long and serious fight in Opposition, although that is not easy in view of the quality of the Government which now administers the country's business.

But, if it happened that the Government at a given time should decide to yield to another, I have no hesitation in saying that Senator Flynn could play a more active, more practical and, therefore, more valuable part. But in the meantime, I am happy to say that what has happened to Senator Flynn today —and has happened to Senator Connolly—is, in our parliamentary system and in our present civilization, almost the best that can happen to any citizen, whether he be in Canada, in Italy, in France, in Great Britain or the United States—it does not matter. We are here to think over legislation, correct it, amend it, criticize it and make it perfect.

I wish Senator Flynn with all my heart and also the Leader of the Government, for the good of our country, for the comfort of our people, and their prosperity, useful careers, well filled, complete so that our Canadian people may finally enjoy a prestige and an authority certainly well deserved in history, over the years and all over the world.

[English]

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I do not propose to lengthen these deliberations unnecessarily. However, I should like to join with those who have spoken in appreciation of those two outstanding Irish Canadians who now lead on the Government and Opposition sides of the house.

My purpose in rising is, primarily, as the junior senator for New Brunswick, to pay my small tribute to Senator A. J. Brooks. Senator Brooks is known throughout the whole of New Brunswick as Alfie Brooks—and there is nothing disrespectful in this. He is one of the most respected representatives that New Brunswick has sent to Parliament over many years. His opponents in political affairs, although they have fought battles with him, have felt honoured in the fight, because he has always been an honourable gentleman. Even when the heat of partisan activity was strong, he was still always an honourable gentleman. Perhaps the finest thing I can say about him, as a fellow New Brunswicker, is that he stands high among the many great New Brunswickers that we have sent to Parliament.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Thomas Vien: Honourable senators, I should not let this occasion pass without saying a few words on the subject which has been developed. I knew Senator Brooks in the House of Commons, where we served together, and later in this house. I do not believe that any parliamentarian has deserved more respect from all his colleagues in both Houses of Parliament than has Senator Brooks. I like him very much. Our friendship dates from more than a score years ago. We are sorry that he should have felt obliged to resign from the leadership of the Opposition. We trust that he will be with us for many years and we hope that, being relieved of his heavy burdens as Leader of the Opposition, he will be able to enjoy much more leisure for the rest of his life. He has our warmest good wishes.

Honourable senators, I also take great pleasure in congratulating honourable Senator Flynn upon his accession to the leadership of the Opposition. I know him well; I knew his father; I knew his grandfather. His grandfather was Prime Minister of Quebec, and Leader of the Opposition in the Legislature of Quebec, an eminent legist, a Doctor of Laws and our professor of Roman Law at Laval University. He was a highly respected gentleman and indeed a man of outstanding integrity, dignity and ability.

Senator Flynn's father was one of my friends and a contemporary when I lived in Quebec. I like Senator Flynn, and I trust that he will remain Leader of the Opposition for very many years, and I wish him every possible success in his high functions. I know that he will be extremely conscious of the responsibilities which fall on his shoulders.

In this Upper House, which is composed of senior parliamentarians, we have divested ourselves of some of the aggressiveness of our former partisan opinions. Our first and foremost consideration in the study of those questions that are submitted to us is the public interest, with such light as Divine Providence has given to us. We are not surprised that there be opposite and conflicting views expressed: The shock of opinions brings truth to light! In my own church, in the Council which has developed in Rome we have seen 2,500 bishops in discussion for four years of major questions of great interest to us all. They are all inspired by the Holy Ghost and yet divided in their opinions on various fundamental subjects. It is only natural that we, poor human beings and poor politicians, should sometimes have divergent opinions. What we liked about honourable Senator Brooks was that he always kept the discussion on a high level. I am sure that Senator Flynn will follow his example.

I congratulate Senator Flynn, and I am particularly pleased that he has been chosen Leader of the Opposition. I give him the assurance of our respect and deference.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE LATE HON. WISHART McL. ROBERTSON

RETIREMENT OF HON. THOMAS REID

TRIBUTES

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I regret to change the happy mood of the house. Since we assembled last, one of our former colleagues, the Honourable Wishart Robertson died in Ottawa on August 16.

When he retired from the Senate about two years ago a tribute was paid to him by the late Senator Bouffard and that tribute remains on our records. Senator Robertson was Government Leader of the Senate from 1945 to 1953; he had been Speaker for the duration of a Parliament, and had been the founder and indeed the honorary life president of the NATO parliamentarians association and deserves most of the credit for establishing that body. He came to the Senate in 1943, and before that, like his father, he had been in the Legislature of Nova Scotia as member for Shelburne. For those reasons, it is appropriate that at this time we should pause in respect to his memory. He gave much to his country, to his province and particularly to this chamber as its leader and its Speaker.

Honourable senators, in paying my respects to our late colleague, I wish also to pay tribute to his wife, whose devotion, whose compassion during the years when he was very ill, make her, in all our minds, a person of heroic qualities. As his wife she did everything possible for his comfort in circumstances that were indescribably difficult. To her, who helped so much in the formation and fashioning of his career, we owe much; we owe much for what she did in his declining years when sickness had severely sapped the great powers that he had had in his prime.

Since we last assembled, a friend of all of us from New Westminster, British Columbia, the Honourable Thomas Reid, resigned from the Senate on October 14. There would be little need to say that Tom Reid was a Scot, because whoever saw him or heard him perceived that fact at once. He came to Canada in 1909. His speech always reflected his Scottish ancestry. When the Queen came to Canada in 1957 to preside at the opening of Parliament in this chamber, our dress was formal. On that occasion Tom Reid wore the kilt, which was highly appropriate.

His life for the most part was in public service, but in his early days he had worked in the iron and steel industry, where he rose to become manager of the Pacific Car and Foundry Company in Vancouver.

He was Reeve of the Municipality of Surrey for seven years. He was first elected to the House of Commons in 1930 and served in five consecutive Parliaments until 1949. In the Commons he was at various times Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

He came to the Senate in 1949. His life was Parliament. When he had his health he was assiduous in his attendance here, active on our committees and always pungent in his comment. In fact, he could cross-examine a witness with as much incisiveness as a senior counsel. His Scottish qualities were evidenced in this work, because if he felt that a project needed criticism he could produce as scathing a lashing about mistakes as could anyone in the chamber.

Perhaps the second love of his life was his work as the Chairman of the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission. He talked here many times about the work of that commission, and the efforts that he had made and that the commission was continually making to preserve the great salmon fishery on the Fraser River.

I suppose, honourable senators, that every man and woman in Parliament is an individualist; Tom Reid certainly was. There was a basic kindness in his nature which he displayed on many occasions to many people, in fact to most people. I was not in Parliament in 1930 when he came, but I was around here a good deal in those days, and one of the colourful incidents of parliamentary life then—as it was until almost his last days here—was his playing of the bagpipes. Six o'clock in the evening was the time, and because of this everyone in the building knew that Tom was there. The practice was as much a part of the parliamentary atmosphere as the playing of the carillon or the ringing of the division bells.

Leonard Brockington once said of the bagpipes, "They are an ill wind that nobody blows good." This cannot be said in reference to Tom Reid, because he had the music of the Scots in his soul and he poured it out through those pipes every night.

I am sure that all honourable senators join me in wishing him happiness, contentment and health in his retirement and thank him deeply for his services to his community, to his province and to his country.

Hon. Fred M. Blois: Honourable senators, I would like to associate myself with the remarks made by the Leader of the Government regarding our colleague, the late Honourable Wishart Robertson. Not only do I want to associate myself with what he said but I want to concur in everything he said. My reason for rising is to state that Senator Robertson and I were friends for many years. I first knew him when I was elected to the Nova Scotia Legislature in 1937. There were many problems during those times on which he gave me good advice, and I am very proud of the fact that during all these years we remained very close friends.

Wishart Robertson was a big man. By that I mean that he was big in his views and he respected the views of other people. He was the type of person who preferred to give praise to an opponent rather than criticize him, a characteristic which evidenced itself in this chamber on more than one occasion.

I also recall that when I first came to this honourable chamber about eight years ago, both Senator Robertson and Mrs. Robertson were most kind to me. Not only was I befriended in this chamber but I was invited to their home.

All through the years that I knew him he played a prominent part in the affairs of this country. He was a great Canadian: proud of the fact that he was a Canadian and equally proud that he was a Nova Scotian. His political background in Nova Scotia was excellent. As the Leader of the Government has said, his father before him was interested in politics.

Going back to a point I mentioned earlier, I have heard Senator Robertson criticize governments, which is a natural thing for anyone to do, but I never heard him attempt to criticize in an unfair way any private member, regardless of his politics.

Bearing all these things in mind, it is a great pleasure for me this evening to concur in the remarks that were made by the Leader of the Government. I also wish to express my deepest regrets to Mrs. Robertson and to the family. As has been said, Mrs. Robertson was marvellous in the care and attention she gave her husband during the last few years of his illness. I may say also that the Robertson family is a very fine one, and it is a great pleasure to me to know them and to have known a man of his calibre. I am sure that this chamber is better for having had such a man in its midst.

Hon. John J. Kinley: I wish at this time to associate myself with what has been said about the late Wishart Robertson. As a young man he came to my section of the country and was a supporter of mine in the constituency that I represented in Parliament. Later he ran for the Legislature of Nova Scotia, where he served from 1928 until 1933. He was summoned to the Senate on February 21, 1943. He was elected President of the National Liberal Federation of Canada in 1943 and resigned in 1945. He was appointed Government Leader in the Senate and was Speaker of the Senate from 1953 to 1957.

Honourable senators can appreciate, therefore, that he reached an eminent position in the public life of this country. We regarded him as a fine citizen of our part of the country, where he was considered a great friend by all those who knew him.

Senator Robertson came from a distinguished family. His forebears were very active in the public life of Nova Scotia even before Confederation, and he carried forward the principles and dignity which descended to him as heir of a long-standing family tradition within a community where he could be imbued with the ambient qualities of rural life: the fact that life there was good, the people respected each other and were interested in each other's welfare.

Senator Robertson was young to be so afflicted that he had to leave this chamber. Although in his affliction he became a burden to his wife, nevertheless she loyally supported him in every way and deserves great credit for the splendid contribution she has made.

Our two families were close friends; Mrs. Kinley always admired the way Mrs. Robertson looked after her husband. Now that he has gone I am sure that she is trying to make herself useful, is working to keep her spirits buoyant and enjoy life again as best she can. My sympathy and affection go out to her and her family. We hope she will continue to live the life that they enjoyed, guided by the great principles that they looked up to. His success was due to his work as a young solicitor in the country where he played his part and worked hard for what he got. He will be long remembered in the constituency where he lived and his memory will be revered here too.

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris: Honourable senators, I left Vancouver this morning at nine o'clock, and it is not an easy trip, I can assure you. I do not intend to make one of the long-winded speeches I used to make. I simply want to say that I am glad to be here; I feel inspired by the atmosphere and the expressions of those who have spoken. The Senate is very worthwhile and I am proud to be a senator. I look back on those who are no longer here with appreciation of their great qualities, and I am deeply impressed by the fine speeches I have heard here this evening.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I rise to say a few words about my old and very dear friend Senator Robertson. I regret to say that I did not know until a day or two ago that he had passed to the Great Beyond. It so happened that I was recovering from rather a serious operation myself and after it was over and I began to feel fit again I was coaxed into going to British Columbia on a salmon fishing trip. During the week that Senator Robertson passed away I was fishing for salmon in the Gulf of Georgia—with considerable success, I might add—and was out of touch of radio or newspapers, and that, no doubt, is why I had not heard about his death.

I got to know Senator Robertson and his lovely wife quite intimately during the quarter of a century that he served his country in the Senate. He was one of the most distinguished parliamentarians both provincially and federally that I have ever known. As has been previously stated, he was ably assisted by his gracious and talented wife and with her encouragement and support he quickly reached the top. When he came to the Senate he was well qualified to take a prominent part and, as has been stated so ably by our honourable leader, he gave unstintingly of his time and talents to the work of this chamber.

I remember a very enjoyable trip that my wife and I made with Senator Robertson and his wife. The then Speaker of the Senate and his wife were also in the party. We made a transatlantic passage by ocean liner to Liverpool and thence to London to the Coronation in 1953. At that time Senator Robertson was Leader of the Senate.

I also recall with pleasure another trip which I made with him to Paris when he was Speaker of the Senate. On that occasion we attended the first conference of the NATO Parliamentary Association, which he was largely instrumental in forming and of which he became the first president. I was very proud of the manner in which he conducted the business of the association on that occasion, and I expressed my appreciation to Senator Robertson and his wife.

It is a privilege, honourable senators, to have had contact for 25 years with a man of the type and character of the late Senator Robertson. To his wife and family we extend our deepest sympathy. They will have many happy memories of him to console them in the difficult days that lie ahead.

I want now, honourable senators, to refer to Senator Reid. He was a member of the House of Commons when I first became a senator, and I remember him visiting Senator Taylor who was a room-mate of mine at that time and who also came from British Columbia. This was when Senator Horner, Senator Taylor and I occupied Room 471 which I am pleased to state I am still occupying at the present time. We used to call on Senator Reid occasionally, particularly when he started to play the bagpipes, and we had many a fine visit with him. Later, when he was summoned to the Senate we continued our friendship and we had many discussions about the wonderful salmon fisheries in British Columbia, and his activities in that connection.

When I was Leader of the Government I would look across at Senator Reid when I was anxious to get my Estimates through and on several occasions I sent him a message expressing the hope that he would not raise any objections. Quite frequently he did not say anything and allowed them to go through. This I appreciated very much. I am sorry he will not be with us any more. He gave the Senate the best he had and we will miss him very much.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, there have been many nice things said about so many people tonight, and the time is drawing near when we should adjourn, but I cannot allow this assembly to adjourn without saying something about Tom Reid. My thought is that the Senate chamber is poorer because Tom Reid has left, and I would like him to know that we will miss him here.

We have all listened with rapt attention to his speeches about the salmon of British Columbia. He was a friend of the salmon; he was wrapped up in the salmon fishery, and I suppose he knew more about it than any other man in Canada. What little I know about the subject of salmon and fish in general has been learned from Tom Reid.

Not only was he a splendid critic when he thought criticism justified, with his pungent Scottish accent, his kindly manner, his good fellowship, but he was a fine friend to us all.

We will miss his bagpipes. I do not know anything about bagpipe music but I know I enjoyed Senator Reid's playing, and now when 6 o'clock comes we will miss hearing strain of the pibroch in this building.

I rose only to say—and I hope my words will reach Tom Reid—that we will miss him and will suffer from the fact that he is not here.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I was very sorry to hear from the Leader of the Government this evening that Senator Tom Reid had resigned from the Senate. I will not go over my interesting experiences with him during the last 30 or more years, but as one Scot to another I can say that I greatly appreciated the music of the bagpipes, even if others did not. I am sorry he will not be with us in the future.

I join with those who have wished him a continued happy life. I trust that his health, if not as good as in the past, will still enable him to enjoy life.

Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words about Senator Robertson, and I do not apologize to the house for speaking about him at this time. I feel that a short resume of his association with the NATO Parliamentary Association should be put on the record. My purpose is not to add to what has been so well said of his service to the Senate and to the country as Leader of the Government and, subsequently, as Speaker of the Senate. It is rather to recall to honourable senators the distinction he brought to the Senate through his interest in the NATO Parliamentary Association, which both the Leader of the Government and Senator Aseltine have mentioned this evening.

Honourable senators appointed to this house during the last 20 years know very little of Senator Robertson's part in that organization. Indeed, as has been mentioned, he was Honorary Life President of the association, but he was much more than that. Without Senator Robertson it is doubtful that there would ever have been such an organization; and if any man can be said to have been the founder it was Senator Robertson.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford): Honourable senators will recall that, when the North Atlantic Treaty Organization was formed, great emphasis was placed on the defence and military aspects, but little was heard of the political, economic and cultural—that is, the civil aims of the organization as set out in Article 2 of the treaty. It was with this aspect of the treaty—the political, economic and cultural—that Senator Robertson, encouraged by the Honourable Lester B. Pearson who was then the Secretary of State for External Affairs, became involved. Through correspondence, and later at his own expense by visits abroad, Senator Robertson got in touch with statesmen in Europe, the United Kingdom and the United States of America who were interested in setting up groups of parliamentarians to give serious study to furthering the implementation of Article 2 of the treaty.

Senator Robertson was so encouraged by the interest shown in his proposal that on May 14, 1954, he called a meeting of Canadian parliamentarians and, through his zeal and enthusiasm, the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association was formed.

Having set up the Canadian Association, he then directed his efforts to the formation of an international body. He immediately got in touch with his interested friends in the United Kingdom, Europe and the United States, and he suggested that similar associations should be set up in their countries. To this there was a ready response, with the result that similar associations were set up in Belgium, Denmark, Iceland, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, Norway, and the United Kingdom.

The next step was to convene a general meeting of delegates from these associations. Honourable senators must remember that at that time there was no secretariat, no official organization, no executive to whom he could turn, and no expense account; but he was not to be deterred. He met obstacles which to many would have been insurmountable, but he overcame them all and in May, 1955, on behalf of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association, he sent invitations to all parliamentary groups supporting NATO—and I cannot emphasize too strongly that he did this more as an individual, one who believed in the organization—inviting them to an international conference to be held in Paris in July 1955. One hundred and ninety-seven delegates from these various countries accepted the invitation and attended the conference, and it was there that the NATO International Parliamentary Association came into being, with our own dearly beloved Senator Robertson, whom we mourn today, as its first president.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I desire to table certain documents. The list contains a total of 76 items, and I do not think I should take up the time of the chamber by reading it.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Dispense.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I would simply draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that among these documents is Supplementary Estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1968, which will be the subject matter of a motion to be made a little later in the sitting.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I take it that those supplementary Estimates are negative.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Just about.

I desire also to table messages of congratulations on Canada's Centenary of Confederation which have been sent by some sixteen legislatures in different parts of the world. In addition, I should like to table a list of official visitors to Canada during Centennial Year representing some 58 countries.

(The following documents were tabled)

CONGRATULATORY MESSAGES TO CANADA ON HER ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, I move:

> That the expressions of congratulation and good wishes on the occasion of Canada's Centenary tabled today be printed as an Appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house; and
> That the Honourable the Speaker be authorized to send copies of the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day to the Legislatures concerned as a token of the deep appreciation of the Senate of Canada for their kind and thoughtful messages in Canada's Centennial Year.

Honourable senators, before this motion is adopted I think it appropriate to say a few words about it. First of all, it does speak for itself. We have already acknowledged in this chamber similar messages which have been sent to us, namely, a resolution of the House of Lords and an official message from the Senate of the United States. Now we have some 16 additional messages of a similar character which have come to us, and have come in a year when we all have experienced an immense sense of national pride in the development of our country and in the progress of our people. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that the high point was reached so far as Parliament was concerned on July 1, when on the grounds of Parliament Hill Her Majesty presided, and was present first of all at a most moving ecumenical service and then at a deeply impressive parliamentary gathering.

In addition to the presence of Her Majesty in Canada, some 58 heads of state, either personally or through their personal emisaries, came to Canada to express to the people of this country their feelings about our progress, our development and our position in the world. All of these people have already been officially greeted, officially entertained and officially thanked.

What we are asked to do tonight, which we do with a full heart, is to express our appreciation to the 16 legislative bodies who have seen fit to send these heartfelt expressions of good will to our people. They come from Rajya Sabha, New Delhi, India; the Sejm in Warsaw, Poland; the General Assembly of the State of Iowa; the House of Representatives of Malta; the House of Representatives of New Zealand; the Legislature of the State of Idaho; the National Assembly at Kampala in Uganda; the National Assembly of Kenya; the Premier of the Bahamas; the President of the Senate of Lesotho; the President of the Senate of Malaysia; the Senate and House of Representatives of Jamaica; the Senate of the State of Louisiana; the Speaker of the National Assembly of Malawi; the National Assembly of Botswana and the Senate of Minnesota.

I should also call the attention of the Senate to the fact that on the Clerk's table tonight there is a beautiful piece of furniture, a despatch box with a wood inlay of the map of Jamaica on the top, the inscription inside the box reading as follows:

> From the Government and people of Jamaica to the Government and people of Canada on the attainment of their hundredth anniversary as a nation.

Words are completely inadequate to express the appreciation which the legislature in this country feels to members of the legislatures in these other jurisdictions, some independent, some members of federal states, who have seen fit to send us such warm messages on our hundredth birthday as a nation, and I am sure every member of the Senate would wish to join in endorsing unanimously the motion which I have put and which the Leader of the Opposition (Honourable Mr. Flynn) has so kindly seconded.

Motion agreed to.

For text of messages of congratulation see Appendix "B" pp. 322-31.

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) REFERRED TO FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly moved, with leave of the Senate:

> That the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1968; and
> That the committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records, to print its proceedings upon the said Supplementary Estimates (B) and to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate.

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, before this motion is adopted I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he can tell us when the Appropriation Bill may be here. Some of us have been reading the press and we know that there have been hundreds of millions of dollars of expenditures eliminated, but all that comes to us are new and additional Estimates. I have no objection to these Estimates being referred to the Finance Committee, but as far as advancing the business of Parliament or protecting the taxpayers, I think it is rather a futile gesture.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): To answer the question asked by the honourable senator, my understanding is that the intention in the other place is to take supply, with the exception of Wednesday, until Thursday night, when the supply bill will be passed, and that we will have the supply bill here on Friday afternoon.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Are we sitting Friday afternoon?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, and we will be sitting also on Monday, for reasons which I will explain on a later occasion, because I think it is getting late tonight to do it now.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Would the Leader of the Government explain why we are sitting on Friday afternoon? That will only be November 3.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I can give the explanation now if it is desired but perhaps I could tell the honourable senator personally afterwards, because before the end of the week I intend to announce the program for Monday, November 6, which happens to be the hundredth anniversary of the first meeting of the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Well, that is Monday, not Friday.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is right.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL COMMISSIONS OF INVESTIGATION

INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Mr. Carter inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

> 1. How many royal commissions, commissions or other special investigating bodies has the Federal Government appointed in the last 20 years?

2. What, in each case, is (a) the name, (b) the purpose, (c) the year of the appointment and the year of termination; and (d) the cost to date of such royal commission, commissions or other special investigating bodies?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I have the answer to my honourable friend's inquiry.

For text of inquiry and answer see Appendix "C", p. 332-3.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

STATE OF IOWA

GENERAL ASSEMBLY

House Concurrent Resolution 20

WHEREAS, our good neighbor nation to the north, Canada, is now celebrating one hundred years of dynamic growth and development with a centennial celebration which features an official international exposition, designated "Expo '67", at Montreal, Quebec; and

WHEREAS, the nations of the world have been invited to join their sister nation in this celebration and are honoring her by the presentation at the exposition of exhibits, displays and performances representative of the good things they have and produce; and

WHEREAS, among the groups chosen to represent the United States of America at the exposition are two outstanding high school bands from the State of Iowa, Valley High School of West Des Moines and Pleasant Valley High School of Pleasant Valley, who will give concerts at the International Band Shell on May 31 and June 18 respectively; and

WHEREAS, the marching and concert bands of Valley High School of West Des Moines, Iowa, under the direction of Gerald Kinney, and Pleasant Valley High School of Pleasant Valley, Iowa, under the direction of Charles DCamp, have outstanding records of honors earned for quality of performance which include many Division I or Superior ratings at state contests, have given many guest concerts and have been invited participants in numerous festivals and parades throughout the state and nation; and

WHEREAS, the people of the State of Iowa desire to join in honoring the people of Canada in this centennial celebration; and

WHEREAS, these young people and their directors in their band appearances and concerts will present our finest products, our youth and the fruit of their dedicated and disciplined labors, thus representing their state and nation in a most fitting manner; now therefore,

BE IT RESOLVED by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring, that the members of the Valley High School Band of West Des Moines, Iowa and the Pleasant Valley High School Band of Pleasant Valley, Iowa and their respective directors, Gerald Kinney and Charles DCamp, who have been invited to and will give concerts at the International Band Shell at Expo '67, Montreal, Quebec, Canada be designated official representatives of the State of Iowa and its people and bearers individually and collectively of our congratulations and good wishes to the government and people of Canada on this happy occasion.

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, that the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives be instructed to forward engrossed copies of this concurrent resolution to the presiding officers of the House of Commons and the House of Lords of the Parliament of Canada, to the chairman of the executive committee of Expo '67 and to the superintendents of the West Des Moines Community Schools and the Pleasant Valley Township Schools.

We, Maurice Baringer, Speaker of the House of Iowa, and William R. Kendrick, Chief Clerk of the House hereby certify that the above and foregoing Resolution was adopted by the House of the Sixty-second General Assembly.

William R. Kendrick,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Maurice Baringer,
Speaker of the House.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MALTA

To the Senate of Canada:

We, Members of the House of Representatives of Malta in Parliament assembled, desire to express our sincere congratulations and affectionate greetings to the Senate of Canada on the occasion of the celebration of the first centenary of Confederation. May the voice of freedom which for the last hundred years has echoed from the Parliament of Canada be heard for many more centuries to come.

Passed by the House of Representatives, Malta, at Sitting No. 72 of the 14th June, 1967.

A. Bonnici,
Speaker.

Speaker.

LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF IDAHO—
THIRTY-NINTH SESSION

IN THE SENATE

S. J. M. No. 11

By State Affairs Committee

A JOINT MEMORIAL

To the Prime Minister, the Governor General and the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada:

We, your Memorialists, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Idaho assembled in the Thirty-ninth Session thereof, do respectfully represent that:

WHEREAS, Idaho points with sincere pride to many ties with Canadian enterprise and history dating back to the exploits and achievements of the great men of the Hudson's Bay Company, founders of Fort Boise, which even today gives its name to our state capital, and

WHEREAS, Canada sends Idaho more visitors than do even some of the sister states in our Union and resulting ties have been of great mutual benefit and that numbers of our citizens have served with honor and distinction in Canada's armed forces, and

WHEREAS, the border between Idaho and Canada has always been more of a landmark of mutual understanding than a line dividing our interests and as Dick d'Easum, one of Idaho's most distinguished writers comments, "Canada is an honest neighbor. If she needs a cup of sugar or a potato to help out when company comes, she can borrow it here." And

WHEREAS, July 1st of this year marks the one hundredth birthday of Canada;

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED by the Thirty-ninth Session of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, now in session, the Senate and the House of Representatives concurring, that on behalf of the government and the people of the State of Idaho, we extend our heartiest best wishes to the government and people of Canada, that all the blessings of peace and prosperity may be theirs in a great future in which our nation and our state, too, may share.

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, that the Secretary of State of the State of Idaho be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to immediately forward certified copies of this Resolution to the proper officials of the government of Canada that both government and people may be made aware of the import of this Resolution.

UGANDA

A CONGRATULATORY MESSAGE TO THE PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ON THE OCCASION OF HER CENTENARY OF INDEPENDENCE CELEBRATIONS conveyed by the National Assembly

First Meeting of the Second Session
Tuesday, 4th July, 1967

CONGRATULATORY MESSAGE TO THE CANADIAN PARLIAMENT

THE MINISTER OF PLANNING AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT (Hon. Cuthbert J. Obwangor, M.P.): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the Motion standing in my name in the following terms—

> "That Mr. Speaker be requested to send to the Speaker of the House of Commons and to the Speaker of the Senate of the Parliament of Canada the following message:—
> 'We, the Members of the National Assembly of Uganda in Parliament assembled, do offer our heartfelt congratulations and felicitations to the people of Canada upon the occasion of the celebrations of Canada's Centenary and do reaffirm the cordial relations that exist between our two nations and do further offer our best wishes for your country's prosperity and happiness'." (Hear, Hear!)

Mr. Speaker, this is merely a goodwill and a formal motion and I do not, as is usually with me on some occasions, wish to make a lengthy speech but only to be specific and ad rem. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep and heartfelt warmth that I have to speak on this occasion in order to offer our heartfelt congratulations and felicitations to the people of Canada upon the occasion of the celebrations of Canada's Centenary, and associated with it to re-affirm the cordial relations that exist between our two countries.

In 1965 I had been blessed with an opportunity of visiting that grand country which is one of the symbols of democracies in our modern world. I enjoyed my stay in that country for one thing—the Canadians are people endowed with good attitudes about life.

Equally, I feel privileged on this occasion to move this Motion as Canada and Uganda have certain common things they share in life, namely, that we know or we share certain traditions which we enjoy in common such as parliamentary and representative democracy, and being associates in the Commonwealth of nations. Because we share such noble traditions and way of life which make us brothers, I feel happy that because of common association within such institutions, Canada and Uganda in their close friendship will work together towards maintaining and fostering democratic institutions and ways of life, and that in so working will influence international organisations to ensure that peace obtains throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker, as in my opening remarks I said this was merely a goodwill and formal Motion. It is with these few appropriate words that I beg to move.

HON. ALOYSIUS K. BALINDA, M.P., seconded. Question proposed.

THE MINISTER OF COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY (Hon. W. W. Kalema, M.P.): Mr. Speaker I wish to associate myself with the proposal contained in the Motion to which my Hon. Colleague has referred. He has expressed a number of good reasons and sentiments behind this Motion which is going to the Canadian Parliament with which I have been connected during the past two years as a result of my being Chairman of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. (Hear, Hear!)

Sir, last year I had the opportunity of visiting Canada when Canada was playing host to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. Sir, on this occasion I had a chance to meet a good number of Canadian Parliamentarians, both Senators and M.P.'s., but quite apart from this association I had tremendous opportunities because when delegates were in Canada they were able to see for themselves the country, to meet the people in general and to see the vast potentialities of Canada which stretch for miles and miles from one end of Canada to the other. We were able to see, Sir, the material progress which has been made by Canada and, I am sure, quite apart from their potentialities, all Members here who have known what Canada is doing for the Commonwealth and the world at large, will not fail to appreciate that this House should communicate to Canada our best wishes.

Sir, it is without exaggeration that I submit that Canada plays in the sphere of peace and co-operation a very big part, sometimes far greater in proportion to her size, and I think this goes as a great credit to this country of Canada, which is our sister country in the Commonwealth. During the Conference in Ottawa one of the Senators, Senator Connolly, said that the concept of the Commonwealth was not new. He believed as well as I do that it is as old as man because it presupposed a belief in the dignity and worth of the human being.

Again, Sir, I would like to remind Hon. Members of the part played by Mr. Pearson, the Prime Minister of Canada, together with our President, during last year's Prime Ministers' Conference in London and I would like to remind Members here, Sir, that Mr. Pearson still continues to play that role as we also are doing.

Well, I do not want to speak too much about Canada or to be over-sentimental but I certainly love the country and I am sure that all of us who have been there would like me to say so. Perhaps I should take this opportunity to remind the Hon. Members that Uganda is playing host this year in October to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and I have every hope that all of us will play our part in making our guests happy, and those of us who will take an actual part in the conduct of the Conference will play our part to the fullest.

Sir, I beg to support.

Hon. G. O. B. Oda, M.P.: Mr. Speaker, Sir, it is beyond doubt the Members opposite, the Government Members, will be assured by Members on this side of the House that the Motion is unanimous. In my personal view, if I had my own way, I think this resolution should only be read by one person and only be confirmed and approved by the House and be sent immediately to Canada.

Sir, a nation that worked very hard for their freedom, as Canada did, deserves not only the thanks and a tribute from Uganda but the whole world. (Hear, hear!). Sir, I have not had an opportunity personally to visit or be in person in Canada but I have met Canadians on a number of occasions, not only here in Uganda but elsewhere, particularly recently in the United Kingdom on the Parliamentary Commonwealth visit and, indeed, the gentlemen I met on these occasions showed that the Canadians are very friendly and they have indeed projected a true image of their Government and also their people.

Sir, I would also like to say that we extend our tribute to the Government and people of Canada for the very great part they have played for Uganda. No doubt for the last few years they did work hard to send both missionaries and lay teachers to educate our children. They did not only educate our children but did also educate some of us, including myself. This has given the country an opportunity to go faster in the field of social life, particularly education. (Hear, hear!).

Sir, I would also like to pay tribute to those, particularly to those who were sent here to educate our people, particularly to some of the missionaries who were responsible for recruiting both missionary and lay teachers; the one that I have in mind is now retired, Archbishop Cabana, who was responsible for the recruitment of all these various teachers who gave us this opportunity of having more teachers in this country.

In conclusion, Sir, I would like to say that Long Live Canada and their people and we wish them all prosperity.

THE DEPUTY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE, FORESTRY AND CO-OPERATIVES (Hon. Aloysius K. Balinda, M.P.): Mr. Speaker, Sir, I would like to add my congratulations to the people of Canada on the occasion of the celebrations of the Canadian Centenary and to wish them the best wishes for Canada's prosperity and happiness. (Hear, hear!)

We are all too aware, Sir, that it is overwhelmingly difficult to attain independence and to keep it. Indeed, in 1867, when independence was granted to Canada, it brought them as it did bring to us in 1962, consciousness of greatness and a conviction that what had been achieved in the face of apparently insuperable difficulties had been achieved and could be preserved. Canada, Sir, has now succeeded for the 100th year to preserve her independence, and that, Sir, is no easy feat. To us it is an exhortation, it is a hope, it is a goal to emulate that having achieved we can also retain that elusive thing called independence.

We rejoice, Sir, at Canada's old age but although Canada has grown old it does not mean that it has become antiquated. It now has the advantage of enjoying a combination of both the ancient and the new. The Hon. Members who have spoken before me, Sir, have referred to the good relationship that exists between our country and Canada. We share many things, we meet at various international conferences, but I must not fail, Sir, to mention that our Members who attended the Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference last November were accorded hospitality which we look forward to reciprocating when this Conference takes place here in Uganda. The Uganda Branch, Sir, of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, of which I am Chairman, is looking forward to welcome the opportunity of renewing the contact that was established in November last year.

Sir, once again I wish to join with the other Hon. Members to congratulate Canada during the course of years it has been able to achieve this 100th year of their valued freedom.

Sir, I beg to support.

THE MINISTER OF REGIONAL ADMINISTRATION (Hon. J. S. M. Ochola, M.P.): Mr. Speaker, in supporting the Motion, I would like to associate myself with the sentiments expressed by the Mover of the Motion and by those who have already spoken on the Motion.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, Canada must look back on 100 years of toil, sweat and anxiety with pride and satisfaction.

Mr. Speaker, the recent Commonwealth Parliamentary Association Conference held in Ottawa drew delegations from many parts of the Commonwealth, including Uganda.

I was fortunate, Sir, to be included and not only that but to be given the opportunity to lead Uganda's delegation. It is therefore appropriate that on this occasion I should refresh my memory of what we as delegates saw and witnessed while in this beautiful land. If I am not speaking for all the delegates who went to Canada for the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association Conference, I would like to say that I should be given permission to speak for myself. Mr. Speaker, Sir, Canada, as Hon. Members know, is a vast land. It is probably bigger than the three East African territories put together, yet the population is not as big. I understand that the population is now estimated to be about 25 million people only.

In this vast country you have beautiful and fertile land for the production of wheat. Some parts are suitable for ranching and others are suitable both for the growing of wheat as well as the dairy industry. Yet in Canada you probably have the greatest variety of rich deposits of minerals, including natural gas, oil and several other things which I may not be able to enumerate here.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, the Canadians are very very friendly people. During our month's stay in Canada we had the opportunity or we were given the opportunity to visit all the ten provinces. We were also given an opportunity to visit private families and to stay with them; we had meals with them and we conversed and discussed matters of common interest and we found these meetings very helpful. Mr. Speaker, Sir, the people we visited during our stay in Canada were not prominent people in the nation but were ordinary citizens and, because of this, I personally feel that the Canadians are happy, they are friendly and are people who are ever ready to share their experience with other people, not only of the Commonwealth but of the world at large. Mr. Speaker, Sir, we had the opportunity of seeing almost everything we wanted to see and I can assure the House that I came away with a very good impression, which impression I still hold today, that Canada is a good country to live in and that Canadians are anxious to give all they can and, indeed they are trying to do all they can to assist not only the Commonwealth member countries but other parts of the world that need assistance, and I would like to point out here that we right now have quite a number of Canadians who are engaged in all sorts of development projects, who are trying to assist us to achieve what we are all fighting for. We have technicians, we have got doctors, we have got experts of different types and we shall continue to draw technical assistance from Canada.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, Canadians are very proud of their country and I would like to remind Hon. Members here that although in Canada you have different types of people, that is, people who came from different parts of the world, people belonging to different nationalities in descent, yet you find in Canada a sense of common interest. You find in Canada people determined to put together and build their nation and, indeed, from what we witnessed, they have managed to build their country economically, socially and in all other walks of life. Mr. Speaker, Sir, I would like to refer to one particular matter of interest. When we were in Canada we were given opportunity to study the Canadian Parliamentary system; although a good number of Canadians claim British descent yet the Canadian Parliamentary system cannot and should not be taken as a photostat of the Westminster system.

We had an opportunity to study the Canadian system of Parliamentary democracy by one venerable gentleman—the Hon. Mr. John Connolly who until recently was Chairman of Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and Leader of the Senate and we discovered that the Canadian Parliamentary system is far from being the same type of Parliamentary system that is obtaining in Britain.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, despite some internal difficulties that Canada may have, the country is enjoying confidence, which confidence has managed to wield all different types of people together and are working proudly to achieve economic advancement.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, finally I would like to say this that Canada should look back to the 100 years with pride and satisfaction. I beg to support.

THE MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Hon. S. N. Odaka, M.P.): Sir, the Mover of this Motion stated that this was formal and I wanted to mention this just in case other Members wanted to speak. It was agreed mutually that a set of speakers would speak and that I would wind up the Motion. (Hear, hear!)

Sir, it appears from what I am hearing that Hon. Members would have liked us to talk and talk but if I may wind up—(laughter)—I would say that I entirely associate myself wholeheartedly with words that have been expressed by both Sides of the House. Hon. Members would know that Canada and Uganda have enjoyed diplomatic relations since the very time of the attainment of our Independence. Both Uganda and Canada have High Commissioners accredited to each other and I am proud to say that at the time when I am talking I can see the Canadian High Commissioner seated in the distinguished guests gallery.

Sir, you will recall that yesterday the High Commissioner invited a number of us and a number of Canadians to celebrate the centenary. Although I knew, Sir, that we had a number of Canadians working here in Uganda, I must admit I was overwhelmed by the great number that we have here and I must state categorically that we are very grateful for the work they are doing in every part of this country. Sir, I was also very impressed by another group of Canadians who have been here before even those who came to help us after Independence. I am now referring to the missionaries. Yesterday I had a chance, like most of you, to meet missionaries from as far away as Kasasa, near the Masaka border—and I understand there are some missionaries as far away as Kisoro.

Hon. Members will recall that the last white Archbishop of Rubaga was a Canadian, and I want to say that Uganda has been proud to associate herself with Canadians from all walks of life including missionaries. Sir, Members have said and I agree that our association with Canada both at the United Nations and also in the Commonwealth is cordial and useful. We on our part can assure Canada that we shall maintain and expand this relationship. As a sign of this expansion, Sir, we sent and I received yesterday a telegram from the Minister of Information, Broadcasting and Tourism who is heading the Heartbeat of Africa to Montreal. I understand that they have done, perhaps, more than any other group could have done to show to Canadians and North Americans generally what our cultural heritage is. I understand we took a few crocodiles to Canada.

It is our hope, Sir, that this type of exchange will continue and expand. I therefore take this opportunity, Sir, to express sincere good wishes and prosperity to the Canadian people and hope that that country gives an example to many others and be an example, as the Hon. Mr. Aloysius Balinda said, to those who are trying to have self-determination by way of experimenting on the forms of Government. Sir, I support the Motion. (Hear, hear!)

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

"That Mr. Speaker be requested to send to the Speaker of the House of Commons and to the Speaker of the Senate of the Parliament of Canada the following message:—

> 'We, the Members of the National Assembly of Uganda in Parliament assembled, do offer our heartfelt congratulations and felicitations to the people of Canada upon the occasion of the celebrations of Canada's Centenary and do re-affirm the cordial relations that exist between our two nations and do further offer our best wishes for your country's prosperity and happiness'."

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF KENYA

Tuesday—20th June, 1967

Communication from the Chair—

THE SPEAKER (Mr. Slade): Honourable Members will be interested to note that, on the 1st day of July this year, our sister of the Commonwealth, Canada, celebrates her Centenary.

Only last year, our delegates attended the Annual Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association at Ottawa. They returned with the most glowing reports of the beauty of Canada, the generosity of her hospitality, and the dignity of her Parliament.

From this National Assembly of Kenya, which is only four years old, we send our warm congratulations to the Senate and the House of Representatives of Canada on their achievements during the past hundred years, and on their present exalted status. Both of those Houses have, by their example, made great contributions towards the stability and development of parliamentary institutions throughout the Commonwealth, and doubtless also elsewhere.

I propose to record this message by suitable letters to the Speakers of both of those two Houses.

THE MINISTER OF STATE TO THE PRESIDENT'S OFFICE (Mr. Nyamweya): Mr. Speaker, Sir, the Government of Kenya and I am quite sure the hon. Members of this House, —would like to associate their feelings and sentiment with your Communication from the Chair. We would like at this moment to place on record our heartfelt felicitations and fraternal congratulations to our fellow parliamentarians, the people of Canada, on the occasion of the Centenary celebrations of their Parliament, and for their contribution in the maintenance of parliamentary democracy in the world. Although ours is a young Parliament and growing, likely to be modelled to suit our own country's need, yet we have more than one thing in common, and, more particularly, our firm convictions and beliefs in parliamentary democracy.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, may I ask these feelings, through you, be conveyed to our fellow parliamentarians in Canada.

PREMIER'S OFFICE
P. O. Box 147,
NASSAU, BAHAMAS.

14 July, 1967.

My Dear Prime Minister:

On behalf of the Government and people of the Bahama Islands, I am pleased to have the opportunity of sending cordial greetings to the Government and people of Canada, now celebrating their centenary as a Confederation.

The party of sixteen Bahamian Sea Scouts and Sea Rangers, carrying this message, are visiting Expo '67 as guests of Canadian Sea Scouts and Sea Rangers whom we had the privilege of entertaining in the Bahamas last year.

It is the earnest desire of my Government that the bonds of friendship forged by these young people through the Scout and Guide movements should be representative of the good relations between our countries, and that they should expand to reach our peoples in all walks of life.

As fellow members of the Commonwealth within the Western Hemisphere, we look forward to increasing co-operation in many fields, as discussed at the Commonwealth Caribbean-Canada Conference held in Ottawa in July 1966.

May I add my personal good wishes for the continued success of Expo '67.

Yours sincerely,

Lynden Pindling, Premier.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 1, 1967

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

PRIVATE BILLS

LONDON AND MIDLAND GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY—FIRST READING

Hon. Eric Cook presented Bill S-25, respecting London and Midland General Insurance Company.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Cook moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Monday next.

Motion agreed to.

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES LIMITED—FIRST READING

Hon. Daniel A. Lang presented Bill S-26, respecting Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Lang: Honourable senators, as this is a bill dealing with technical corporate matters, it should be disposed of very readily. Therefore, with leave of the Senate, seconded by Senator Cook, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 231 to 276, inclusive, and moved, with leave of the Senate, that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill S-21, to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am sure you will all recall that this bill was before the Senate only a few short months ago. I apologize for the fact that the bill now before us was distributed to us only a few moments ago, but I can assure you that it is, with one exception with which I will deal later, the identical legislation that we had before us last April and May. It is not my intention to repeat on this occasion the arguments that I presented to you on April 19, 1967 last, as reported in the Senate Debates on page 1793. At that time I came to certain conclusions after considerable study, in which I had help from the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Food and Drug Directorate, and from the enforcement officers of this country. I became convinced that the enforcement officers of our country should be given some additional powers to deal with a new drug that was being distributed illicitly among many hundreds of young people in our country and virtually around the world.

Again I say to you that I am not going to repeat the arguments I presented to you on an earlier occasion. Those senators who are interested can go back and read the report of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Walker: What was the date?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: April 19, 1967, at page 1793 of the Debates of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Would you be good enough to start out by telling us what is the one small change in the new legislation?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I will come to that a little later, if you would not mind, please.

Hon. Mr. Walker: All right.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Not only did I put forth my own arguments at that time, but many senators on both sides of the house, some of whom have had training in the field of medicine, made worthwhile contributions. I want again to compliment them for the arguments they put forward in this chamber and for the part they played when the legislation was before the committee.

Now, what happened to the legislation? I think there was a genuine desire by senators on both sides of the Senate to try to improve the bill that was presented to us. You will recall that when the bill was reported back from committee to this house an amendment was presented in an attempt to provide some penalty for promoting the trafficking or use of LSD. Well, we were not successful. Some members of this chamber opposed the amendment; there was an attempt to move a further amendment and finally the bill died, never having been given third reading by this chamber. As you know, Parliament prorogued on May 8 and the legislation to all intents and purposes died on the Order Paper.

However, I am pleased to have the opportunity to reintroduce it because I do not believe the conditions have changed, and wherein they may have changed they have worsened. I am confident that if you have been reading the newspaper accounts of the use of LSD in Canada and the United States you must be convinced that if this situation has changed at all, it has been for the worse.

Unfortunately some of the press criticism of this chamber was, in my opinion, most unfair. I could refer to several articles in the press, but at this stage perhaps it is better not to do so. It seems to me that many of the producers, editorial writers and others who have been commenting on the actions of this house regarding this piece of legislation have been very ill-informed. Many of the articles that appeared were not in accordance with the facts as placed before us during the debates in this house last April and May. It appears to me that great efforts have been made by some members of the press to contact people inside and outside Canada who are promoters of the use of LSD. That, I suppose, is the business of the press. I am one of those who believe that the press ought to be given the widest possible freedom, but I am also one who believes that freedom carries with it responsibilities, and I think if the press were to do the job that you and I as Canadians expect it to do, in addition to printing and giving support and publicity to the supporters of the use of this drug, they should also give equal coverage to those people who condemn the use of the drug other than for experimental purposes under controlled conditions. I do not believe this has been the case, and I believe that if honourable senators have followed the press reports from April to date they can come to no other conclusion than the one I have just mentioned to you.

I believe this bill should go back to committee, and I am prepared to move that it again be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, if it receives second reading. I would also suggest that when this happens we should invite to the committee all those people who we think can give worthwhile evidence. I think we should have representatives from the Food and Drug Directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Justice, the law enforcement officers, the R.C.M.P. and others. Furthermore, if it should meet with your approval, perhaps it would be wise to invite representatives of the press who have such strong feelings in this matter to make representations to the committee. I think if they had the benefit of listening to some of the professionals who will undoubtedly come to our committee, it would help us to produce a better piece of legislation.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Will the honourable senator permit me a question? When you refer to the press in general, do you not think you should particularize? You are making rather serious charges, and blanket charges at that. Perhaps you would like to indicate what newspapers in particular were so unfair in regard to the Debates of the Senate on this bill.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Thank you for bringing this to my attention. My criticism of the press concerning the responsibilities that come with freedom has been in the nature of a blanket charge. I think the press generally must accept this criticism, as I believe it is fair. With regard to LSD, I think some of the editorials are off base.

I am glad you have brought this point to my attention. I am quite prepared to state that the one newspaper that, in my opinion, has produced an editorial which does not bear any relationship to the facts is the Globe and Mail, in its editorial of Monday, May 1, 1967. If the writer of that article will read it, he will find that he contradicts himself. At one stage he said that the senators had approved legislation. The fact is that the Senate had not approved legislation at all. In the next column of the same editorial he pointed out this fact. The editorial is headed, "Some senatorial fantasies". I think the greatest fantasy was in the mind of the man or woman who produced the editorial, and this is the editorial I have most strongly objected to, and do so again now.

However, I would like to suggest to the Senate that perhaps it would be wise to give the press the opportunity of making representations before our committee, if and when this bill goes to committee. I hope that you will give me your support in this regard, but it is a request upon which you shall make the decision, not I. I appeal to you to give me that support, so that if we do pass this legislation we will have general support throughout Canada for its implementation with a view to gaining some control over the use of LSD and other similar drugs.

As you know, the act makes provision to add, by order in council, similar drugs as they become available to the public in Canada. As I said a moment ago, this can be done by order in council, without the necessity of additional legislation.

Again, I suggest to you that we send the bill to committee and that we have as wide a representation as possible before the committee. If the legislation as it is presently presented is not suitable to the majority of honourable senators, then let us amend it so as to make it suitable. Then our law enforcement officers will be in a position to deal with a drug which I think most Canadians are concerned about at the moment, and justifiably, as we drive past our high schools and universities and see the thousands of young people whose very lives are at stake as long as people are allowed to distribute and peddle this type of drug. I think it is as dangerous as, or perhaps even more dangerous than, some of the narcotic drugs. I hope you will give me your support.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Would the honourable senator agree that it might be well to have repesentatives of the manufacturers of this drug appear before the committee?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: To the best of my knowledge, the drug is only manufactured and distributed by one company in Canada. I presume this would be possible, but I would like to make some inquiries before I commit myself.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Is the honourable senator aware that there are in Canada 100 daily and 300 weekly newspapers? You have quoted from one, and throughout your statement you have criticized "the press." Is one newspaper the spokesman for all newspapers in Canada?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: No, I would not want you to make that interpretation at all.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): That is the only interpretation one can make, the way you put it.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I have defended the freedom of the press—and when I talk of "the press" I mean the radio, television, weekly and daily newspapers, and so on. They have demanded freedom, and I am the first person in the world who would admit that they must have freedom, but freedom brings responsibilities. I am sure each and every one of you agree with that. But I tried to point out that in many cases they only give one side of the story, and I think in the case of LSD it is true that our press media generally have gone out of their way to find people who promote the use of LSD. All I am saying is that if they are going to give coverage to those people, then they should give equal coverage to the other side, because these are people who hold themselves out as experts on both sides of the question.

The only newspaper that I want to refer to directly is the Globe and Mail and its editorial to which I have objected. But I am not objecting to the freedom of the press generally in respect of LSD or, indeed, in respect of anything else. I think our press does a good job, but it can do even better.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Honourable senators, my objection is to the fact that Senator McDonald is arguing from the particular to the general when he speaks of "they". I have some slight connection with the press, and I have not seen one newspaper other than the Globe and Mail take the stand that has been mentioned.

As a matter of fact, so far as I am concerned, and I am sure so far as the majority of newspapers in Canada are concerned, they would in no way link up freedom or promotion of LSD with freedom of the press. It is so nonsensical that I do not think any sensible newspaper would take that position, and I know of none that has taken it. Yet, the honourable senator speaks of "they" and "the press" and "press freedom". This has no more to do with press freedom than has the promotion of incest, or the promotion of rape, or the promotion of any other crime.

I am sorry, honourable senators, but I cannot sit here and hear the whole press of Canada indicted, or hear Senator McDonald use the word "they" constantly when he is able to cite only one out of 100 daily newspapers and 300 weekly newspapers in the country.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, I am very glad I am a doctor, and not a newspaperman or a lawyer.

In rising to speak to this legislation for the second time I shall be brief. What I said on a previous occasion is doubly important today. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics has stated that there has been a rise of 80 per cent this year in narcotic offences.

I have had a chance to look over the new bill, and I notice that it has been changed very little from the previous measure, and I presume it will be discussed thoroughly in committee. However, in section 44, page 3, there have been added three subsections which I understand are inserted in order that there be uniformity with the Narcotic Control Act. Basically, that is a fundamental change.

After I spoke to this legislation previously I felt that there were some erroneous interpretations placed upon my remarks. Therefore, I wish to elucidate a little further on what I consider to be the crux of the whole situation.

I quoted an individual by the name of Leary. Senator Walker told me the next day that he was locked up, which is what I advocated. These so-called prophets of LSD are not prophets; they are traffickers in human bodies and souls. It is against them that should be directed all the force of the law, and not against the poor, deluded disciples. I want that clear.

On that previous occasion I described Canadian scientific medical research, and the contributions it has made on this subject, which were factual in detail, and I stressed the importance of the overriding medical aspects of this problem. I quoted Canadian scientific men such as Hoffer from Saskatchewan, and Lewis with whom I worked at my own hospital, and Dr. Berry and Dr. Baker. All of these names are in the Debates of the Senate of April 19, 1967, pages 1796 to 1798.

Having said that I wish to put on the record some very recent and up-to-date scientific information that has been published since last May. No one knows the prevalence of the use of LSD, but four separate studies suggest that about one per cent or more of young people use it. There is evidence that its use is increasing on the west coast, while it is diminishing in other areas. I should like to quote Dr. Donald B. Lauria, Associate Professor of Medicine at Cornell University Medical College, and President of the New York State Council on Drug Addiction.

> Used promiscuously under uncontrolled circumstances, LSD is extremely dangerous. It is absolutely unpredictable. Of the 114 cases hospitalized at Bellevue during a recent 18-month period, 13 per cent entered the hospital with overwhelming panic. There was uncontrolled violence in 12 per cent. Nearly 9 per cent had attempted either homicide or suicide. Of the 114, almost 14 per cent had to be sent on to long-term mental hospitalization, and half of those had no previous history of underlying psychiatric disorder.
> LSD has another danger not adequately emphasized. A small but growing number of people who take LSD repeatedly withdraw from society. They engage in perpetual introspective orgies, live a totally drug-oriented life, become negativistic and unconstructive. These people are beginning to worry even some of the proponents of LSD—the researchers.
> If the group were to become much larger, it could conceivably be a substantial danger to society as a whole.

When we had the thalidomide tragedy we were not aware of the consequences of that drug until a later date. Now listen to what is cropping up in the utilization of this drug, LSD.

Also, recent data in both experimental animals and man show that LSD can induce chromosomal breaks. What do we mean by that? This raises the specter of physical or mental abnormalities in chronic users or their offspring. That is most important. Experimentally it has now been proved that that will develop. If that is not a reason for legislation, I do not know what is.

I think that the laws concerning LSD—and I speak now as a doctor and not a member of the learned legal profession—concerning LSD should be made tougher, manufacturing or selling it illicitly should be a felony, and illicit possession should be a misdemeanor.

Getting back a little closer home, an expert in legal medicine told a Quebec commission of inquiry into the administration of justice in the province that the drug LSD has no therapeutic effects, despite the claims of some of its proponents. That has been proven recently in a book published on its utilization and the treatment of alcoholism. Dr. Jean-Marie Roussel, director of Quebec's Laboratory of Legal Medicine, says that he agrees entirely with any legislation that proposes severe control over this "miracle drug."

One further word. I think it important to put these two findings on the record. At the pinnacle of all hallucinogens is LSD. Dr. Roussel said that the use and traffic of narcotics and barbiturates is one of the principal causes of criminality; criminals use drugs to calm fear and anxiety and then later make them an excuse for their crimes. In spreading their gospel of chemical faith they say, "Take 250 micrograms of LSD and expand your mind, you see your inner self, find the secret of life itself, discover a truly religious experience and increase your perception." These claims, I am afraid, are falling on receptive ears. How valid are they?

The answer received at a seminar in Washington recently under the auspices of the United States Department of Health was contained in a review of 100 LSD cases in a large psychiatric hospital. It showed that 15 per cent of these patients exhibited uncontrolled aggression, 15 per cent exhibited uncontrolled panic, 7 per cent had suicidal tendencies, 5 per cent had attempted suicide, and over 15 per cent required long-term hospitalization. If this is mind expansion and inner vision, who needs it?

The Dean of Harvard Medical School had this to say to the class of 1970:

> Gentlemen, the Dean's office has been repeatedly pressed by a number of members of the Freshman Class for a statement of the College's administrative position with respect to the use of drugs, including marijuana and LSD. If it will help anyone, I am pleased to clarify our position.
>
> As anyone bright enough to be at Harvard knows perfectly well, possession or distribution of marijuana and LSD are strictly against the law, and taking drugs involves users in psychological dangers and contacts with the criminal underworld. The College is prepared to take serious disciplinary action—

This will have to happen in Canada.

> —up to and including dismissal, against any student found to be involved in the use or distribution of illegal and dangerous drugs.
>
> In sum, if a student is stupid enough to misuse his time here fooling around with illegal and dangerous drugs, our view is that he should leave college and make room for people prepared to take good advantage of the college opportunity.
> May I refer you to the attached medical appraisal by Dr. Farnsworth and Dr. Prout.

Dr. Curtis Prout is Professor of Medicine at Harvard and Dr. Dana L. Farnsworth is Director of Health Services. If the Senate so wishes, I would suggest that this pamphlet be published in my remarks.

> LSD is a far more dangerous drug than marijuana, and in the opinion of many informed persons is a greater menace to users than even the addictive narcotics.

Let that sink in.

> During the earlier years of experimentation with LSD the adverse effects were not considered to be very serious. However, in recent years, numerous cases have been reported of prolonged psychotic reactions from LSD, lasting from a few months up to two years. Hospitals in large cities, particularly New York and Los Angeles, have had many cases of acute psychoses arising from ingestion of this drug.
> LSD differs from most other drugs because its effects occur at varying periods after the ingestion of the drug. What it does, in effect, is to start in motion processes, as yet not understood, which produce effects after the drug itself has left the bloodstream. There may be severe depressions lasting for several months . . .

And reactions of a most untoward nature.

> We know now that long-term subtle psychological damage may result from LSD.

Note "long-term".

> Such damage may be glossed over by the pleasure and enthusiasm engendered by the substance, but we have seen too many cases of psychic breakdown to doubt the serious dangers of the drug. It is even possible that the brain is structurally damaged.

We were not sure of this a year ago. We are sure of it now.

> There is recent evidence that LSD attacks hereditary genes.
>
> In short, our professional medical opinion is that playing with LSD is a > desperately dangerous form of "drug roulette." The medical evidence is clear. Any person taking LSD runs the clear risk of psychotic breakdown and long-run physiological damage—which is permanent.

I do not think this legislation can be passed too soon.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not want to delay the passage of this bill. I merely want to say that I consider the Senate is most fortunate to have an expert as highly qualified as Senator Sullivan. We know the qualifications of Senator Sullivan, but I think we should add to his long list of honours the fact that he took part in the second British Academy Conference of Otolaryngology last summer, where he delivered two scientific papers and was the guest of honour at the banquet at Rhodes House, Oxford, where he addressed the assembly.

Hon. John J. Connolly: On behalf of those on this side of the house, I am glad that Senator Flynn has raised the point about Senator Sullivan's significant contribution to this important conference in England during the summer. I knew about it and I am happy to have the occasion to say a word about it.

Participation by members of this body in organizations of that kind does a tremendous amount of good for Parliament, and particularly for the Senate. This is not the only kind of work in which senators can participate outside the chamber; but this is work which redounds to the value of the Senate. When our members engage in it, then we are all honoured. We were all honoured by Dr. Sullivan.

Hon. Mr. Sullivan: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Referring to the clauses of the bill itself, I am rather sorry about the turn the debate has taken with respect to the press. Frankly, the impression I had at the time, and I stand to be corrected, is that the amendment moved by honourable Senator Molson in the committee had to do with the question of publication. What he was trying to do in effect, as I understood it, was to take such steps as were required to inhibit the promotion of the use of these drugs. It may be that there are segments of the press who would like to come to our committees; because if the Senate's wording on that clause can be improved, I do not think there is any other committee of the Senate more capable of looking at proposals of this kind. That committee and this Chamber does not want to infringe the freedom of the Press. I think the committee had very worthy motives in attempting to do what it could, because of the kind of debate we heard on that occasion and again today, to restrict as much as it is within the power of the law to restrict, the dissemination of information which would and could do much damage to people who use those drugs other than under proper auspices.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: I have one observation to make and I think it is important enough to make it now, although it was made before. I would like to congratulate honourable Senator Sullivan on the presentation he has made here concerning the grave dangers inherent in the use of LSD in particular.

As I said before and say again now, all the educational processes which can be summed up in the statements made by the honourable doctor, concerning the dangers of this drug, are apt to be lost on adolescents who are in a period when experimentation becomes almost compulsory to them. Whereas somebody may suffer from brain damage or psychological damage or gene damage—and this is bound to occur—the individual who is healthy and sound at the moment thinks you must be talking about somebody else and not about him.

This piece of legislation does something which nobody can fail to understand. It makes it clear to the person who may be encouraged, by any manner of means, to indulge what may seem to him like harmless experimentation into an area which may bring in great benefits—it makes it perfectly clear to him that he runs the risk of destroying his future by laying himself open to jail and a penitnetiary sentence which will live with him all the rest of his natural days.

From my experience as a lawyer and as a citizen, and as a person who has dealt with young people, I am convinced that that is one thing they do understand. A great number of fine young men, who might be prepared to make an isolated experiment, convinced that it could not possibly have any lasting damage, are not prepared to gamble their reputation and their future when to make that gamble means that they lay themselves open to detection, trial, conviction and sentence —and that is the important part about this legislation.

We should accept, as I do without qualification, the statements made to us by experts who have no little axes to grind. We should reject those made by persons who wish to become prophets of a great new world by asking people to walk across a bed of fire. When men who have been responsible throughout their lives for the health of our people tell us that this particular kind of action can have serious effects—and they are sure that it will have—then the least we can do is provide the kind of answer to the public that nobody can fail to understand and that nobody can argue about.

Nobody can claim that a period of time in jail or penitentiary is mind-expanding, or good for the psychic, or apt to make a man better than he was before he got into the trouble which put him there.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I had not intended to take part in the debate at this stage, but as has been mentioned, I did propose the amendment in committee. My thought is that before we finish with this bill it would be worthwhile to think back and review what happened last spring in the committee. When this bill was discussed in the committee—and honourable members may read the proceedings of the committee to refresh their memories—it was agreed that its purpose was an effort to provide some control over the use of LSD. In the effort to control it, very heavy penalties were proposed for trafficking, as in the case of other narcotics, and also fairly substantial, perhaps heavy, penalties for using it.

In the discussion, it was brought out that while there are two types of persons commonly associated with all forms of narcotics, namely, traffickers and users, in the case of the young of today in our universities and schools there were other people deeply involved, whose role might be described as that of promoters.

Honourable Senator Sullivan mentioned Timothy Leary in the United States. Leary has built himself a little empire. He has hundreds or thousands of the young worshipping at his feet. He is a vicious man. He is a wicked man. As a matter of fact, anything that could be done to Leary would not be enough. I think he is under sentence at the moment, if I remember correctly, of 30 years. However, I understand he is appealing the sentence and is still out—I am not sure of that point. He has been responsible for thousands and thousands of the young in North America trying these psychedelic experiments, "taking a trip," and, in fact, using other narcotics, other "dope", as it is generally called.

I believe that type of person has no place at large in our society. So far as I am concerned, anybody who tries to build a cult for evil purposes among our young should be locked up, or worse. We do not want him around.

This was the subject under discussion in the committee when an effort was made to include that type of person as an offender under the act, along with the trafficker and the user.

There was never any intention to reduce our basic freedoms; there was never any intention to muzzle the press or reduce its freedoms; there was never any intention to take any of their rights away from other media such as television or radio. There was only the desire to attempt to curtail the activities of those who said to the young, "Get with it! Come on. Take a trip. This is the thing to do", and who proclaimed all the good things it did, when experts like Senator Sullivan know that the good it can do is non-existent but the damage it can do may last for more than one generation.

I hope when we get this measure back in committee we will reconsider this question. It may be that the amendment as it was proposed was not wisely worded. This is quite possible. But surely words can be found to include among the offenders the person who advocates the benefits, the non-existent benefits, of LSD. So far as I am concerned, without any wish to curtail anybody's rights or freedoms, I am anxious to see if we can not do something about that type of person.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Before my friend replies, and I presume he is going to, Mr. Speaker, would he be good enough to answer two questions. First, what are the amendments to the bill and what is the reason for them? Second, in view of my friend's answer to Senator O'Leary (Carleton), knowing that my friend Senator McDonald is not only a very erudite man but a very fair one, and knowing also that this is a chamber of sober second thought, would he not see fit to withdraw the charges that he has made against the press, inasmuch as he himself has only been able to substantiate one statement made by the Globe and Mail? In all fairness, this is not a laughing matter. I am asking this in all sincerity for the benefit of my friend Senator O'Leary.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, I will answer the first question first. I am sorry that I did not answer it before I sat down.

The changes are in Section 44, which is the section dealing with examination. The only alteration in the wording is designed to enhance and to ensure the rights of the accused under cross-examination with respect to the certificates of analysis for the drug. It is only a change in wording, as I say, really to give more assurance to protecting the person who is being cross-examined, and it brings it more in line with the wording under the Narcotic Control Act.

With regard to the statement that a blanket charge was made against the press, I would hope that my honourable friend would not take that interpretation. I had hoped that my explanation to Senator O'Leary would be accepted: that there is no desire to do such a thing. I have been in public life long enough to learn that the public press, be it radio, television or the newspaper, plays one of the greatest services of any responsible organization in a free country. But, as I said to Senator O'Leary, regardless of the functions that they may have performed in the past, I do not think there is a service, including the press, that cannot be improved upon. All I am saying is that this cherished freedom that they possess—and we all know they must retain it—carries with it a great responsibility, even more today than ever before, because of improvements that have come about through the press, radio and television.

All I am asking is that they give even greater consideration to the part that they will perform in our society in the future than they have given in the past, and to air all questions. There are two sides to every question posed, and all I ask is that the press seek out the experts on both sides of a question. When people are producers of editorials—and some of them are great personal friends of mine—I hope that they will be certain of their facts. In respect of the one editorial to which I referred, I do not believe that such was the case. I think the gentleman who produced that editorial just did not do his homework very well, and I hope that he will do better in the future.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I have a question. My friend hopes that they will be more careful in the future. Would he then agree that all he has said really boils down to this: he has no criticism of the press; he only criticizes that one editorial. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: If that is the interpretation you place on it, you are entitled to hold it.

Hon. Mr. Walker: But is that your interpretation?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: No.

Hon. Mr. Walker: All right. If that is not your interpretation, then have you any criticism of the press generally or do you withdraw everything that you have said?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I beg your pardon?

Hon. Mr. Walker: You withdraw, then, all the charges that you made against the general press?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, I made no charges. This is the interpretation placed upon what I said by you, and perhaps by others, but I want to repeat that I make no charge. I give credit for a job well done, but I do say that I think they can do even better in the future.

Hon. Mr. Walker: That is a complete reversal of what you said before.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: It is not at all a reversal of what I said.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must advise honourable senators that Senator McDonald having spoken, it has the effect of closing the debate. I now ask honourable senators whether it is their pleasure to adopt the motion.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES ACT

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved the second reading of Bill S-22, to prohibit the sale and advertising of hazardous substances, to amend the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Criminal Code.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-22 is divided into two parts and, for simplicity, I propose to deal with each part separately.

The main purpose of Part I of the bill can be summarized under six headings as follows: (1) To prohibit the sale and advertising of certain hazardous articles and substances as set forth in Part I of the Schedule on page 8; (2) to prescribe conditions and safeguards under which certain other articles and substances which although declared hazardous may be sold—these include articles for household use and are set forth in Part II to the Schedule; (3) to provide authority for the Governor in Council to declare a substance to be hazardous; (4) to provide authority for authorized persons to enter premises, to examine articles, to seize, detain and to do such things as may be reasonably necessary in the interests of public health in connection with the sale of household substances and articles which are within the scope of this legislation; (5) to provide authority for the Governor in Council to make regulations to prescribe the conditions of sale including information, warnings or cautions of articles listed in part II of the Schedule, and generally to provide authority to make regulations for carrying out the purposes of the provisions of this act; (6) to provide authority for the Governor in Council to add to or delete from either part of the schedule.

Honourable senators, hardly a day goes by without some evidence of the urgent need for this legislation. All too frequently we read in the daily press of the deaths of children from poisoning as a result of ingesting such household items as bleaches and cleaners; of adolescents dying or impairing their health from glue-sniffing or from drugs taken to produce similar experiences; of adults suffering from lead poisoning due to prolonged contact with compounds of lead used in ordinary paint, or of people of all ages who have lost their lives from inhaling fumes from familiar but dangerous substances, while others have been burned to death because of the inflammable nature of certain ingredients in materials used for clothing, decorations, sheets, curtains and other ordinary everyday purposes.

In 1964 there were 720 reported poisoning cases in Canada attributable to a common household bleaching preparation and an additional 217 reported cases attributable to a common household drain and pipe cleaner.

There is need also for protection against hazardous articles and substances that may be brought into this country. Honourable senators may recall that a year or so ago iceballs were imported from Hong Kong. These were plastic balls containing water. They were intended to be frozen and used to cool drinks without diluting them as ice does. The water in the iceballs, however, was found to be contaminated, and these iceballs represented a very serious hazard to the public, particularly if they broke or cracked as frequently happened in the process of freezing. Despite this threat to the public health, there was no federal or provincial authority that could compel their withdrawal from the market or to take any action in this regard.

Some years ago a number of silver polishes appeared on the market which had cyanide as a basic chemical ingredient. These silver polishes were extremely toxic and the fumes could be lethal. This problem was discussed with the provinces, and again it appeared that there was no provincial or federal authority whereby these substances could be prohibited, let alone removed from the market.

On another occasion some toy chickens were brought in and their feathers were found to be contaminated with arsenic. I understand the arsenic was in the dye. Since these toys were intended for small children to play with, there was a very real threat because of the possibility of children licking the toys and putting them in their mouths as children are prone to do. Again there was nc legal action that could be taken to remove them from the market.

Some time ago a shipment of imported blankets became contaminated with Dieldrin which leaked on them during the voyage. Dieldrin is a toxic pesticide, but despite the fact it was a threat to health there was no legal authority to compel removal of the blankets from the market. On another occasion some canape picks were imported which had been made from a nut that was highly poisonous if chewed. Beads made from poisonous beans which were highly toxic if chewed or swallowed have been found at airport shops and other novelty shops. Again, apart from publicity, no legal action could be taken to remove these articles from the market.

Honourable senators might wonder whether these problems could not be met by extending the scope of the Food and Drugs

Act instead of enacting a separate statute. In this connection it must be borne in mind that "hazardous substances" with which this legislation is intended to deal constitute a completely different family of substances which are distinct from foods, drugs, cosmetics or therapeutic devices to which the application of the Food and Drugs Act is confined.

Also the enforcement machinery that has been developed under the Food and Drugs Act is designed to deal specifically with matters pertaining to substances or articles specifically recommended for use as food, or for the treatment of bodily disorders, or which, for aesthetic purposes, are intended to be used or applied to the body. In view of the increasing number and complexity of problems resulting from technological advances, it was felt that widening the scope to include another large and completely different class of commodities would adversely affect the quality of control considered necessary in the field now covered by the Food and Drugs Act.

A study of the individual clauses of the bill will show that the structure of this act is patterned largely after the other pieces of criminal legislation administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare, and I will refer to the main points of similarity to the Food and Drugs Act as we go along.

For example, in section 2 the verb "advertise" is defined as compared with the noun "advertisement" in the Food and Drugs Act but otherwise the definition is the same.

An "analyst" is defined as an analyst under the Food and Drugs Act, and apart from the definition of "hazardous substance" 2 (c), and "inspector" 2 (d), the definitions are all the same as in the Food and Drugs Act. "Inspector", however, is defined differently because he is a different kind of person, requiring different qualifications, training and experience.

Section 3 prohibits the sale or advertisement of substances in Part I of the schedule, authorizes controlled sale of substances in Part II of the schedule and sets forth the penalties for violation and time limits for prosecution. It corresponds very closely to section 3 of the Food and Drugs Act, and the penalties correspond to those provided under section 25 of that Act. It is anticipated that most prosecutions will be by way of summary conviction; but should it appear, as has happened on occasion in the administration of the Food and Drugs Act, that individuals or corporations have not been deterred by the imposition of a fine or, where there has been apparently a flagrant disregard for public safety, prosecution by indictment will be possible.

Section 4 gives the definition of "inspector," to which I have already referred. This is a simpler procedure, because it authorizes the minister to appoint the inspector from his own staff, whereas under the Food and Drugs Act an Order in Council is required.

Section 5 sets forth the authority which may be exercised by inspectors to enter places, to open and examine packages or receptacles, to examine articles and substances, to make seizures, and to examine books, records and documents. This closely parallels the powers provided inspectors under section 21 of the Food and Drugs Act, and is considerably less than the powers provided under Part III of the Food and Drugs Act in relation to controlled drugs, or under the Narcotic Control Act in relation to narcotics.

Section 6 contains provisions similar to those provided in respect of controlled drugs and narcotics, and provides means and procedures whereby persons whose property has been seized under this legislation may make application for an order of restoration and may, in certain circumstances, have the seized commodities restored to them.

Section 7 authorizes the regulations which would provide the administrative machinery, and provides also the authority to impose conditions with respect to the sale and advertising of hazardous substances included in Part II of the schedule.

Section 8 authorizes the Governor in Council to add to, or delete from, either part of the schedule.

Section 9 has no counterpart in the Food and Drugs Act. Hazardous substances occur in new forms all the time. This section provides authority to get all the information that is necessary to determine whether a substance is hazardous or not. However, information disclosed under this section is to be treated as confidential. Authority to enforce the section is included in section 12.

Section 10 contains nothing new. It is, in effect, a re-enactment of sections which have been in effect in respect of the Food and Drug Administration for a considerable time. Section 10 corresponds to section 34 of the Food and Drugs Act, and to section 7 (2) of the Narcotic Control Act. All these sections reflect the established principle of law that statutory exceptions, exemptions, excuses and so forth relating to an alleged offence are for the accused to establish. Here, again, it should be noted that the offence does not lie in the possession of a hazardous substance, but in the advertising or selling of it.

Section 11 corresponds to a section which has been found essential in the administration of food and drug legislation. It enables the certificate of an analyst to be produced as prima facie evidence. It is similar to the provision found in sections 29 and 35 of the Food and Drugs Act and in section 9 of the Narcotic Control Act. The wording of section 11, however, has been improved to provide greater clarity and to ensure adequate protection to the accused in the matter of cross-examination.

Section 12 provides for the enforcement of the regulations made under this act and of the other sections of the act itself, apart from section 3 which provides for its own enforcement.

Section 13 confines the provisions of this act to hazardous substances and avoids overlapping the provisions of the Explosives Act, the Food and Drugs Act, and the Pest Control Products Act.

Section 14 provides for its coming into force.

To facilitate comparison, a table has been prepared listing sections 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 10 and 11 of this act in one column, and in opposite columns listing the corresponding sections of the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act. For the sake of convenience in cross-checking, I would ask permission to have this short table inserted in Hansard at this point.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Comparative Table

Hazardous Substances Act	Food and Drugs Act	Narcotic Control Act
Section 2	Section 2
Section 3	Section 3 Section 25
Section 5	Section 21 Section 36	Section 10
Section 6	Section 22 Section 36(5)	Section 10(5)
Section 7	Section 24 Section 37	Section 12
Section 10	Section 34	Section 7(2)
Section 11	Section 29	Section 9

Hon. Mr. Carter: The schedule requires no explanation. However, with respect to Part II of the schedule, it may be a point of interest to learn that paragraph 1 lists the family of commodities in everyday use for bleaching and cleaning; while paragraph 2 lists the family of commodities commonly used for cleaning pipes and drains. Poisoning from commodities listed in paragraph 3 is usually fatal, because the oily substance usually gets into the lungs, and there is no way of removing it.

I now come to Part II of the act. The purposes of Part II are to amend three other acts. These are: the Food and Drugs Act; the Narcotic Control Act; the Criminal Code.

Of these amendments, the most important are those which will transfer the control of contraceptives from the Criminal Code to the Food and Drugs Act. This is accomplished by means of sections 15, 16 and 17.

Section 15 defines articles and contraceptive devices, and amends section 2 of the Food and Drugs Act by adding to it the new definition. The new definition has also been reworded to eliminate deficiencies that have been found by experience to exist in the present definition.

Section 16 amends section 3 of the Food and Drugs Act by adding to it a new subsection which authorizes the regulation and control of advertising with respect to contraceptive devices and drugs.

Section 17 amends section 24 of the Food and Drugs Act by adding a new paragraph which gives the regulation-making authority power to control the advertising of contraceptive devices and drugs, and prescribes the means by which such control may be effected.

These three sections—15, 16 and 17—have the effect of "legalizing" the controlled sale and controlled advertising of contraceptive devices and drugs, and the dissemination of related information, all of which at the present time is prohibited by section 150 of the Criminal Code.

Section 23, the last section in the bill, repeals paragraph (c) of subsection (2) of section 150 of the Criminal code which contains the present prohibitions, and substitutes a new paragraph which differs from the old wording only by omitting the prohibition of the prevention of conception.

Section 19 amends section 31 of the Food and Drugs Act by enlarging the definition of "controlled drug" to make it possible to include generic substances such as barbiturates and amphetamines. These drugs are now easily available and can be used to produce effects similar to drunkenness. Many cases of impaired driving and irrational behaviour, especially among adolescents, have been found to be the result of improper use of these drugs. Experience with barbiturates and amphetamines has pointed up the need for some control over the basic ingredients or chemicals contained in drugs. For example, lysergic acid, which is used as a starting material in the production of LSD, does not always come within the definition of "drug" provided in the Food and Drugs legislation. This is the case when lysergic acid is not manufactured, sold or represented for use in the diagnosis, treatment, etcetera, of diseases or disorders of the human body; and the same is true of other chemicals as well.

Section 20 repeals subsections (2) and (3) of section 33 of the Food and Drugs Act. The present situation is that these two subsections constitute a defence against a charge of being in possession for trafficking of a controlled drug on the ground that the accused acquired the controlled drug from a person authorized to sell or deal in it. This section substitutes two new subsections which remove this defence.

The three remaining sections, namely, sections 18, 21 and 22, all have to do with the certificate of the analyst.

Honourable senators will recall that when I was dealing with section 11 earlier—which also deals with certificates of analysts in connection with hazardous substances—I pointed out that as compared with the corresponding sections in the Food and Drugs Act the wording of section 11 had been greatly improved so as to achieve greater clarity. Sections 18 and 21 will substitute the wording of section 11 for the prsesent wording of sections 29 and 35 of the Food and Drugs Act, and section 22 will do the same for section 9 of the Narcotic Control Act. So, the related sections in all these three pieces of legislation will be identical.

It should be noted that the new wording of these sections eliminates the necessity of having to identify the analyst and prove his signature.

Honourable senators, I hope I have said enough to demonstrate that this bill merits your support. It is my intention, if this bill receives second reading, to move that it be referred to a committee for further study.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I should like to compliment the honourable senator who has just resumed his seat on the homework he has done in connection with this bill before embarking upon a speech as complicated and difficult as the one he has just delivered.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The honourable senator is a relatively new member of this house, and I was delighted to hear him deliver such a masterly address. I take the liberty of commenting that he has strengthened the debating force of this chamber.

However, I should like also to point out that the house generally has had very little time in which to study this bill and, indeed, to do any homework in respect of it. It was delivered to us only after we arrived in the chamber today, and so it has been very difficult to follow the remarks of Senator Carter.

I should like to ask a question which will perhaps show my ignorance of the bill itself and of the existing legislation. When I turn to the schedule, Parts I and II, I see:

> Bleaches, cleansers and sanitizers for household use containing chlorine or compounds thereof.

But I see no amount stated of chlorine and so on. I am wondering, were I a manufacturer of the substances, or importing and selling them, if there are any means in the department whereby I can submit the material and have it certified as fit for use or not, or be informed whether it contravenes any of the rules. Is there any method by which a dealer in these articles can assure himself that he is not stepping outside the law, and that he is justified in selling any particular article in question?

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Roebuck for the very kind words with which he introduced his question.

In reply to his question I would say that no doubt there is machinery. There is machinery in the Food and Drugs Directorate by which substances can be analyzed, and the chemical formula of these common household substances can be broken down. But, even if it is proved that they contain ingredients in such amounts or concentrations as to be dangerous to health, there is no means of preventing their sale or of preventing their being marketed. That is why this legislation is necessary. These substances will now be declared hazardous substances, and the manufacture, sale, and advertising of the product can be controlled.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That does not answer my question. I should like to know whether it is possible for a manufacturer or dealer in these substances, or similar substances, to obtain a certificate from the department that the particular substance he is selling does not contravene the act.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps the honourable senator would like me to say a word here.

The answer to Senator Roebuck's question lies in section 3 (1) of the bill which prescribes that the hazardous substances set out in Part II of the schedule—and that Part of the schedule can be enlarged—are to be subject to regulation. Section 4 of the bill also provides for inspectors.

So, first of all, the regulations, which will be prescribed in due time, will set out the danger level or the allowable level of the hazardous substance. In the second place, if there is any doubt in the mind of a manufacturer then I am sure that the inspector's staff, in addition to the other chemists to whom Senator Carter has referred and who are on the staff of the department, can provide a solution to any problems which a manufacturer might have.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of this debate, which I intend to do in a moment, I want to emphasize the importance of Senator Roebuck's question, and say I do not think it has been answered. I would suggest that in due course, and before the debate is completed, the honourable sponsor of this bill, Senator Carter, might discuss this matter with the officials of the department.

I make this suggestion for the same reason that prompted Senator Roebuck's question. A manufacturer or an importer of an article that he wants to sell may be somewhat fearful that it may be a substance that would come under the provisions of this bill, and he would like to go to the department in order to find out, from samples he would submit, whether the substance is hazardous.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson, debate adjourned.

[Later:]

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, before the Senate adjourns, I wonder if I may have your indulgence to place on record the answer to Senator Roebuck's question in connection with Bill S-22. I apologize to Senator Roebuck for misunderstanding the import of his question. I can say that any manufacturer may make representations to the minister in respect of any commodity, whether it is on the schedule or not, and it is always up to the Governor in Council to remove a commodity from the schedule if circumstances warrant it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Thank you.

The Senate resumed from Friday, June 30, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux, seconded by Hon. Mr. Nichol, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Clement A. O'Leary: Honourable senators, perhaps some of my remarks will not evoke too much happiness but, at least, I want to begin on such a note. I do so by extending my congratulations and best wishes to His Honour the Speaker, and Mrs. Smith, and assuring them that by their marriage they have added significantly to the many other happy celebrations of our Centennial summer.

I join too with those honourable senators who last evening spoke so well and so warmly in their tributes to Senator Reid following his retirement after some 37 years of distinguished public service in the Parliament of Canada.

Many kind and most deserving eulogies were spoken of the late Senator Wishart Robertson. His years of dedicated service to his native province, to this chamber, and to Canada were nationally recognized, spoken of and written about several years prior to his death. I am very proud to have been one of his friends and I join with all honourable senators in publicly expressing my deepest sympathy to Mrs. Robertson and her family.

The official announcement of the resignation from office of our esteemed past leader on this side of the chamber did not take me completely by surprise, because I appreciated the good and valid reasons why Senator Brooks should wish to take it just a bit easier at this time. As I have already told him, personally, I was very sorry that he found it necessary to make this decision because I—and I know all others—will certainly miss him in that capacity, not only personally, but for the capable, efficient, dignified and constructive manner in which he served here.

When one goes back over the political career of Senator Brooks one finds that even the official record goes back to 1922, followed by ten years in the New Brunswick Legislature, from 1925 to 1935, 25 years in the House of Commons and then seven years in the Senate, which happily will continue. He referred in a recent press statement to having been "forty years on the job". This statement is somewhat inaccurate but that, of course, is typical of his modesty. So, regretting as we all do his stepping down, his intention to remain as a member of the Senate is one to be applauded. This means that as a wise and prudent counsellor, and a diligent worker, he is still available to us.

If the resignation of anyone so affectionately respected as Senator Brooks can have any indirect happy consequences, surely here is an instance where we have just that. I refer to the election of our new leader, Senator Jacques Flynn. For me to pledge him my loyalty and complete co-operation is, of course, a simple matter, and I give him that assurance wholeheartedly and with extreme pleasure. Those of us who sit with him in the Opposition owe him our sincere thanks for having accepted this responsibility and honour. Nor must we lose sight of the fact that we too have accepted the responsibility and obligation of doing much more than simply uttering our loyalty, co-operation and assistance. I am sure that our sincerity will be assessed by our equitable and enthusiastic sharing of the work load, both here and in committee, in proportion, of course, to our abilities and talents. I do believe that in this all important area we will justify the optimism we were all so pleased to see him generate.

Honourable senators, in approximately one week's time it will have been six months since His Excellency the Governor General opened the second and Centennial session of this twenty-seventh Parliament, and read the Speech from the Throne. I understand it is the intention of the Government to conclude this Centennial session before the Christmas recess, provided we have one. I do hope it will be possible to conclude it then. but at this time it would not appear to be too probable if a major portion of the Throne Speech items is to receive attention.

To date 21 honourable senators have spoken to the address in reply, including the mover (Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux) and seconder (Hon. Mr. Nichol). Some very splendid contributions have been made and, of course, I first single out the mover and seconder, who proved that they well merited the honour accorded them.

I have no intention of commenting on the subject matter of even a small number of these presentations, but I think honourable senators will agree it is most interesting to recall or go back and read some of the comments made in May and June and weigh and judge them in the light of present-day circumstances. It is not at all extraordinary to find that in the area of praise as well as in the area of criticism some of both have proven to be justified and some unjustified as well. I guess this shall always be, so long as we mortals cannot acquire 20-20 prophetic vision.

In this Centennial year the majority of Canadians cannot help but feel an increased pride in their country and in its people. The Government leader spoke very well on this very theme last evening. Those few who were so unfortunate as perhaps to have little or no prior pride must surely now have caught a spark of it this summer. I do not see how they could escape, and I am certain that their lives must be the richer for it. Those of us who spent the greater part of the summer here in Ottawa could not help but be appreciative of the fortitude—and I repeat fortitude, because it was an exercise in just that—as well as the never failing courtesy and hospitality of our delegated hosts and their staffs who received and entertained the constant flow of so many distinguished visitors from so many parts of the world. I congratulate them most warmly for a job exceedingly well done.

The highlight of the year was Expo. Again, all Canadians owe a deep debt of gratitude to those whose vision brought it to Montreal, to its planners, its management and staff. Needless to say, the splendid co-operation of all the participating countries was an essential ingredient to its success, as was the enthusiastic participation of all the provinces. In the final analysis its crowning success was achieved by the magnitude of the numbers admitted at Expo, and here of course we must give credit to the millions of Canadians who really set the example.

In addition to Expo there were so many Centennial programs and attractions, varying in size and content but all contribuing something of value and interest, with a distinct appeal to all ages and tastes. One could perhaps single out such things as the Centennial Train and the Centennial Caravans. Of course, by way of a major item certainly the Pan-American Games in Winnipeg was one of the most outstanding attractions of the year. All Manitobans have ample reason to be very proud of the efficiency and success of this international athletic event. I happened to be one of those who enjoyed it in front of my television. I know I missed something by not being there, but I must say that in my humble opinion I thought the television coverage was excellent.

Unfortunately, in the midst of our warranted celebrations, hard and cruel problems, some continuing, some entirely new ones, were facing the Government and the economy. I will not detail them because they are many and all honourable senators are aware of them. As a Nova Scotian, and more particularly as one from the eastern section of that province, I must refer in this chamber to the plight of the some 3,200 steel workers and their families, and the direct and indirect results on the economy of all of Eastern Nova Scotia as a result of DOSCO's sudden announcement on October 13 to cease operations at their Sydney plant.

So far as DOSCO is concerned—or more correctly Hawker Siddeley of Britain, DOSCO's parent company—this is an irrevocable decision, and as I understand it their plans at the moment are to start closing the plant in November, on November 15 to be exact, and to begin curtailing production on January 13, 1968. By April 30, 1968, a skeleton crew of 60 would be left of the present 3,200 staff. This, I presume, would simply amount to a caretaker staff. Senator Macdonald from Cape Breton, and Senator Urquhart can correct me if these figures are not correct. At least they are the best figures obtainable at the moment. All honourable senators, I know, have heard, seen and read of the various forms of discussions that have taken place relating to this problem. Numerous meetings have been held involving federal, provincial and company officials. Both governments have pledged their assistance in an attempt to maintain the industry at a normal operational level until April 30 at least.

Irrespective of whether private or public ownership decides to take over after that date, it would seem logical that only DOSCO could keep the entire present work force employed until that time, and if they agreed to do this, the Government would be obliged to make up the losses during the period from January to the end of April.

One report states that DOSCO is presently having current losses of $1 million per month. Among other conditions laid down by DOSCO—and they are still laying down conditions—according to the latest report, is that, if DOSCO is prevailed upon to continue with its full staff until April 30, the Government of course will pay the losses incurred during that time, so we could interpret that as $4 million. That would be point number one.

Secondly, it is reported that the Government would buy out the plant on April 30 and keep the plant open until April 30, 1969, at least, to supply other DOSCO divisions with steel at a competitive price.

It is a bit difficult, I am sure, for any of us to understand this third condition, in view of the fact that with their decision to close down on April 30 of this year, they did not seem concerned about a supply of steel from Sydney for their other divisions at any price, much less at a competitive price because it just would not be available there.

As all honourable senators are aware, an emergency debate was called for and granted in the other place at the first opportunity following DOSCO's announcement on Friday, October 13. The debate was called for and took place in the afternoon of October 20. During this debate, I am sure it reflects to the credit of all members of all parties who took part in it, that they conducted themselves in a totally restrained and non-partisan atmosphere. Their views were serious and well defined. They knew and appreciated that they were dealing with a crisis. They were unanimous in their condemnation of DOSCO's sudden and cruel decision. They differed somewhat in their views and suggestions as to who should shoulder the responsibility for continued operation of the plant and as to the best methods by which this might be done.

Since that time, and on a continuing basis, both provincial and federal governments have devoted many long hours in their search to accomplish three main objectives, namely, (1) to prevent massive lay-offs between now and April 30, as was DOSCO's plan; (2) to buy time if necessary, and it appears certain it must be bought, to make a thorough examination of the actual financial picture of the operation there, covering such items as markets, present and future, present efficiency and the possibility of its being improved; and (3) with the information obtained from this study and examination, they would be then in a position to judge if the plant should be kept in operation over a long or short-term period; and if an affirmative decision might be hopefully arrived at, the final decision would be the "who" part of the problem as far as future operations were concerned.

At this time, those of us who are deeply concerned, I believe, are fairly optimistic that right and favourable decisions may be reached, even at some considerable expense or cost to the taxpayer. It is neither practical nor possible to wind up this industry on such a short-term basis as the company dictated. Where 3,200 steel workers and over 100,000 lives which are directly affected, left to their fate, the personal and governmental problems resulting would be insurmountable, particularly in an area where unemployment is already too prevalent and incomes for those working are approximately 30 per cent below the national figure.

Honourable senators, if a person had not heard or read the introductory remarks of the last speaker in this debate on June 30, and had simply looked at the main body of his address, I am sure he would conclude that a federal election had been called—because here, undoubtedly, was a first class campaign speech. My honourable friend, Senator Argue, listed in detail every accomplishment and effort of the present administration. I do not believe he missed even an item of the Government's good intentions. His concluding paragraph was really a glowing one and I am sure it warmed the hearts of every member of the Cabinet.

To be fair and accurate, however, we must look back to where he laid the groundwork for this eulogy. He did this by way of indicating his abhorrence for a certain type of journalism that disgraces itself in making unjustifiable attacks on our national political leaders. On this subject I agree with him wholeheartedly. Then he went to the defence of his party leader, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Canada.

Perhaps Senator Argue was trying to convey a message by his words, something for more of us to emulate in coming to the defence of our leaders in time of adversity. Whether or not this chamber is the ideal forum for such a defence is a matter for each one to decide. In any case, I will be the first to admit that my honourable friend did a masterful job of doing exactly what he set out to do.

Honourable senators, this subject gives me an excellent opportunity to conclude my remarks by referring to the ultimate result of a National Centennial Convention held in Toronto in early September. The Honourable Robert L. Stanfield, as the new leader of the Progessive Conservative Party of Canada, has accepted a challenging and onerous role. He has already contributed much by way of invaluable service to his home province of Nova Scotia, in the office of Leader of the Opposition and in the office of Premier. Now there is every reason to believe that he will acquit himself equally well in the national field.

I know all honourable senators wish him well, even though all may not wish him the same degree of success that I do.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aird, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

CO-OPERATIVE TRUST COMPANY LIMITED—SECOND READING

Hon. David A. Croll moved the second reading of Bill S-20, respecting Co-operative Trust Company Limited.

He said: Honourable senators, the Co-operative Trust Company Limited was incorporated by a special act of the Saskatchewan Legislature in March 1952. It was through the efforts of the Co-operative Union of Saskatchewan and many co-operators that the company came into existence.

The founding of such a company was in response to the growing need for co-operative long-term mortgage credit and other trustee services for co-operative and credit union members. In its first year of operation in 1952 it accumulated assets of $250,000.

The company has grown rapidly with assets increasing from $22 million in 1956 to $28 million at the end of 1966; assets at the end of April 1967 have grown to $33,700,000. Part of the growth of the company has resulted from making mortgage loans under Saskatchewan's Family Farm Credit Act. The Government of Saskachewan supplied funds to the company of approximately $4,400,000 for this purpose.

In 1965 the Saskatchewan Government decided there were adequate loan funds available through other sources and no new loans under that act have been made to date. Yet the company continues to grow rapidly but firmly, with a continuing public display of confidence.

The share capital and reserves of the company had grown from $50,000 in 1952 to $1,473,000 at the end of 1966.

The company opened an office in Regina in 1953 which was moved to Saskatoon in 1956. The company now has offices in Saskatoon, Regina, Melfort and Swift Current.

Initially the company operated under a board of directors through caretaker management facilities. In 1956 the operation of the company had grown sufficienly to warrant the appointment of a full-time management. The shareholders as of April 30, 1967 are as follows:

Credit Unions	257
Provincial Co-operative	35
Central Co-operatives as listed below:	11
Canadian Co-operative Implements Limited
Co-operative Fire and Casualty Company
Co-operative Hail Insurance Company
Co-operative Life Insurance Company
Credit Union League of Saskatchewan
Credit Union Mutual Aid Board
Federated Co-operatives Limited
Interprovincial Co-operatives Limited
Co-operative Creameries
Saskatchewan Co-operative Credit Society
Saskatchewan Wheat Pool
	303

The total is 303 shares.

The need which brought about the incorporation of the company in 1952 for co-operative long-term mortgage credit and trustee services for co-operative and credit union members has been evident and pressing for some time in other provinces. The boards of central co-operatives and credit unions in these provinces have requested that the Co-operative Trust Company expand its operations in order that these trust company services may be offered to their members on a co-operative basis.

If you look at Section 7 of the bill you will see there the term "co-operative basis". This means that the shares of the proposed company can only be held by credit unions, co-operative associations and companies which operate on a co-operative basis. Members of the board of directors can also hold the number of shares required by the Trust Companies Act, but they are not entitled to any of the privileges of these shares other than that of being a director. All transfers or purchases of shares are subject to the approval of the board of directors.

Each member, or shareholder, will be entitled to one vote only, regardless of the number of shares held. Members will be allowed to vote only through their representatives at general meetings.

The company will be allowed to redeem or buy back shares of the company from its members so long as such redemptions will not reduce the share capital of the company below the amount outstanding on January 1 of the year in which the redemptions were made.

One of the most important reasons for federal incorporation is that provincial boundaries are too restrictive in this age of mobility when so many people change their residences so often. It is felt that the expansion of an existing trust company is a more economical proposition than incorporating a trust company in each province.

The existing Co-operative Trust Company Limited has gained considerable experience in the trust company business which would be unnecessarily duplicated by the formation of additional companies. The economics and expertise which accrue through experience, know-how and size would be enjoyed by one federally-incorporated trust company to a greater extent than they could be by a number of smaller provincially-incorporated trust companies.

For the information of the Senate, I may say the Province of Saskatchewan has consented to this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Croll, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

CURRENCY, MINT AND EXCHANGE FUND ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 5:

Hon. Douglas D. Everett moved the second reading of Bill S-23, to amend the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act and the Criminal Code.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to express my thanks for the permission given to me to have this bill taken as the first item of business.

This is a bill to amend the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act and the Criminal Code. Its main purpose is to give effect to the announcement made by the Minister of Finance on December 23, 1966 that it was his intention to change the coinage of Canada from silver to pure nickel. This change has been caused by a worldwide shortage of silver. The history of that shortage starts with the American Government commencing to stockpile silver some years ago. That stockpile eventually achieved an aggregate total of 2 billion ounces and was so large that the American Government was capable of maintaining a ceiling price on silver of $1.29 per ounce. However, more recently there has been an enormous increase in the demand for silver, but this has not been matched or even closely matched by an increase in its production.

It might be interesting to note that while we remove from the coinage of the realm each year those coins that are defaced or worn, this amounts to very little coinage and virtually the entire production of the Mint is to increase the amount of coinage within the country.

This depletion accelerated over the last three years to the point where the United States lifted the ceiling on the price of silver, and as a result silver became uneconomic as a medium of coinage. In 1965 the United States discontinued the use of silver in its coinage following the route taken by many other countries. Also as a result of this, on August 18, 1966, Canada reduced the silver content of its coinage from 80 per cent to 50 per cent, with 50 per cent copper.

What are the main problems in transferring to non-silver coinage? There are problems which have to do with debasing the coinage and counterfeiting, but they are not really important when talking about coinage but are more appropriate to paper currency.

There are two main problems with regard to coinage. The first is the problem of the vending machine. There are over 500,000 vending machines in Canada, and this does not include the unsophisticated type of vending machine such as the parking meter. The problem with the sophisticated vending machine is what the Mint terms the slugging problem. That is the act by someone of taking a piece of metal the size of a dime or a 25-cent piece and feeding it into a machine in such a way that the machine is activated as it would be by actual legal tender. The sophisticated vending machines have a mechanism called a coin selector. Most of these selectors have two magnets, and as the coin goes into the vending machine it is sized, and if it is sized correctly it then drops between the two magnets. If it is a copper coin it is not accepted by the magnets, but drops straight through the selector and into the reject portion of the machine. If it is a non-silver coin it is deflected to one side by the magnets and drops into the reject part of the machine. But if it is a silver coin, it is deflected the other way and goes into the mechanism which causes the machine to operate.

It is clear that if we change to non-silver coinage we will require new selectors for every vending machine presently installed in Canada. Clearly, if that is to be the case, it is going to take time to develop a new method of coin selection because they will be dealing with new metals. It will also take time to install the new selectors, and they will cost money. That is the first major problem with which we have to deal in changing the coinage of the country.

The second problem lies in the attractiveness of the metal. Certain metals, I am told, do not mint well. They do not receive the impression from the presses in the way other metals like silver do. Also, when you are dealing with a metal you must make sure it has the weight we are used to. In this regard aluminum would not be suitable. The metal must have a brightness, and above all it must have a durability, otherwise the coinage will wear out very quickly.

How did the United States solve these problems when they moved to a non-silver coinage? In looking at their solution we have to remember that they were influenced, to a large extent, by the vending industry in the United States. They went to a laminated coin. They took a piece of copper and they sandwiched it between two pieces of cupronickel. They did this because a coin so made had the same effect on their vending machine selectors as a silver coin. So, there was no need in the United States to make any change in the vending machines.

They have now discovered that this coin, while it works in the vending machines, is not as attractive as the old coin. It is sharp at the edges. It tends to rip materials, and to tear trouser pockets and the linings of ladies' purses. It tends to grow dark with use. The people in the United States Mint are disappointed with the unattractiveness of their coinage, and they have now found, to their dismay, that while the coins work like silver coins in the vending machine selectors it is possible to take a piece of copper and put a little piece of solder on it and, if it is the same size as, say, a quarter, it will go right through the selector and react in the same way as a legal quarter. The machines now can be extremely easily slugged.

As a result of this experience and the guidelines that have been set, Canada proposes to use pure nickel for the following reasons: Nickel mints extremely well. Its weight is 90 per cent of the weight of silver. Anybody who pulls a silver coin and a nickel coin out of his pocket will see that the nickel coin retains its brightness extremely well—in fact, far better than the silver coin. Nickel is actually harder wearing than silver.

This morning the Master of the Mint brought two or three of the new 25-cent and 10-cent nickel coins up to my office, and I thank him for doing so We dropped them on the table for 15 or 20 minutes, and we found that the ring of the new coin is not unlike the ring of the silver coin.

The other reason Canada chose nickel as its coinage material is that nickel is identified with Canada. We are one of the world's major producers of that commodity, and we hope that many other countries will use nickel in their coinage so that we may derive export benefits therefrom.

But, if we use nickel it is going to create special problems for our vending industries, because immediately nickel is used in the coinage the selectors in our vending machines will have to be changed. They have to be able to accept nickel coinage and the existing Canadian silver coinage, for that is not going to be withdrawn, and in the interests of the tourist trade they will have to be able to accept American silver coinage and the new American laminated coinage. That is why the Minister of Finance has announced the intention to transfer our coinage to nickel so early. He wanted to give the vending machine industry an opportunity to work out the problems associated with the new coinage. The vending machine industry, the Department of Finance, and the Mint have been working on this problem, and I am given to understand that the National Research Council has worked out an invention based on electrical conductivity, which is ten years ahead of its time and which determines as between nickel coinage and silver coinage and slugs. However, at the present time it is too expensive for general use. It would appear that the vendors today intend to use a selector system that will size the coin and will measure the size of the serrations around the edge of the coin as a means of selecting or rejecting coins. In any event, whatever the result is, I am informed that the manufacture of these selectors will for the first time take place in Canada.

I am given to understand also that we will start to issue the new nickel coinage sometime in 1968 and at that time the vending machine industry will be in a position to proceed with whatever new selector system is necessary.

If the vending machine industry does have this problem—and I am informed it is a real problem—then, how can the Government help in this changeover? First of all, it has done just that in giving the industry time, and in working with them to determine how the new selectors can be manufactured and installed. Secondly, it seems to me that the Mint could help. It may surprise you, and it did me, that the Mint is a money-making operation—in other words, it shows a profit. It is in the business of buying metal and selling coinage and for a number of years now the Mint has shown a substantial profit.

When the silver content of the coinage was reduced from 80 per cent to 50 per cent, the Mint made more money. When you reduce the content of the coinage from silver to nickel, the Mint makes a great deal of money. As a result, they have received representations from the vending machine industry that perhaps some of this profit could be used to offset the costs of the vending machine industry in changing over their selectors to take the new coinage.

Honourable senators, I would like to make on or two other observations regarding the Mint. I understand that our Canadian Mint has probably the finest reputation for quality work anywhere in the world.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Everett: However, it has been in the same place and the same location in Ottawa since 1908, its machinery is old and its quarters are extremely cramped. Therefore, this bill creates conditions in which it will be possible to relocate and to build a new Mint. It will also permit the Mint for the first time to manufacture coins for other countries in other currencies.

Before I leave the problem of coinage, I would like to mention just one special problem regarding the 50-cent and dollar coins. Generally, they are not used in commerce. People find them too bulky and heavy, and for the most part they are used for numismatic purposes. The Mint has been concerned with the need for the use of these larger denominations so they have developed a smaller 50-cent piece and a smaller one-dollar piece made of pure nickel. They intend, even while they are producing these coins to continue to produce the 50-cent silver piece and the one-dollar coin in their original sizes, again for numismatic purposes only.

Since this is a short bill, I would like to deal with it clause by clause very quickly.

Clause 1 authorizes the Governor in Council to mint either nickel or silver coinage.

Clause 2 authorizes the Governor in Council to increase or diminish the remedy allowance. The remedy allowance is the amount by which coinage can vary from the standards laid out in the schedules to the bill and still remain legal tender. Previously, under the old act, the Governor in Council was permitted only to diminish the remedy allowance.

Clause 3 prohibits the melting of coinage which is legal tender. Under the act itself, that prohibition extends only to gold coins. As far as other coinage which is legal tender is concerned, the Criminal Code prohibition against defacing of coinage protects against that action. This amendment extends the provisions of the Currency, Mint, and Exchange Fund Act to all coinage and prohibits all melting down.

Clause 4 deals with the problem I mentioned earlier, that the Mint is confined to Ottawa and can mint only Canadian currency. This amendment says that the Mint can be located anywhere in the national capital region and can mint coins of foreign currencies.

I shall return to clauses 5 and 6 in just a moment.

Clause 7 amends the schedules to the existing act, and the new schedules will be found at the back of the present bill. They set out the standard for the 50 per cent silver coinage and for the pure nickel coinage and also of course refer to the bronze coin, the penny.

Clauses 8, 9 and 10 are amendments to the Criminal Code which extend the provisions pertaining to silver coinage to nickel in reference to counterfeiting, uttering and defacing.

Clause 11 deals purely with the coming into force of certain provisions of the bill referring to nickel coinage only.

Finally honourable senators, I would like to deal with clauses 5 and 6. They are amendments to Part III of the act which deals with the Exchange Fund. The Exchange Fund is a fund which holds the foreign exchange assets of Canada.

Clause 6 is purely a technical clause. The present act permits transfers from the Exchange Fund to the Consolidated Revenue Fund of interest and discount on the securities held in the portfolio of the Exchange Fund. But the Exchange Fund has other incomes. It derives incomes from its trading operations and from the revaluation of its assets from time to time.

The Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee suggested some time ago that these other incomes be carried into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The authority was provided by the supplementary Estimates for the year ended March 31, 1968, to carry into income these other revenues from 1964 onwards. This amendment is designed to bring the Currency, the Mint, and the Exchange Fund Act into line with the authority granted under the supplementary Estimates.

Finally, I come to clause 5. The Exchange Fund may purchase with its assets certain items and obligations It may purchase gold; it may purchase United States currency or bank deposits in United States currency; it may purchase United States treasury bills and United States Government obligations; it may purchase currency and bank deposits that are transferrable and freely convertible into United States dollars and gold; it may purchase securities guaranteed by the Government of Canada, and it may purchase securities of the International Monetary Fund maturing five years after issue.

This amendment proposes that, in addition to all those rights to purchase, the Exchange Fund be permitted to purchase the securities of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development that mature within two years after date of issue.

If this amending bill receives assent, the Fund expects to purchase from the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development an issue known as Central Bank Bonds. They were first brought into being in 1964; they are saleable to the central bank and government institutions only. They are denominated in United States currency. They are offered every six months for a period of two years from the date of issue and the last loan was at 5¾ per cent interest. I am informed that such an investment, in international terms, is extremely attractive; but more than that, that this is an opportunity for Canada to assist the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, which has been extremely effective in economic development throughout the world.

If Canada wants to be a great nation, then it is going to have to be constantly outward looking and certainly it will have to more than fulfill its obligations to others, and this is, albeit a quiet means, nevertheless one means of being able to do so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the honourable gentleman who has just sat down? Before doing so, however, may I congratulate him on the remarkable address he has just made, for its clarity and its interest. It was an interesting address on an interesting subject.

I would like to ask him whether he can give us any assurance with regard to the new coinage. One of the difficulties which our people are meeting is the constant falling of the purchasing power of our money, and our friend now proposes to change the intrinsic value of the coins to some material of lesser value. That will mean more profit, he says, to the Mint, which is very satisfactory. What is a Mint for if it is not to make money? But can he give us some assurance as to the purchasing power? I am not suggesting that the change in content will be one thing or the other, but will it, when you have reduced the intrinsic value of the coin, also tend to reduce its purchasing power?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: What is the intrinsic value of a paper dollar?

Hon. Mr. Everett: Honourable senators, the point is well taken. I suggest to you that this is a matter which must have concerned legislators many years ago, for it is the very matter that concerned paper currency. At that point when we developed the whole concept of paper currency we removed the inherent value of currency from the currency itself. Currency is really nothing more than an obligation of the Government. I am afraid that I can give you no undertaking that when the intrinsic value of the coinage is reduced there will not be a change in value in it, or a reduction in its purchasing power.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Does the sponsor of the bill know what percentage of silver the Mint is now using in its production of coins? Furthermore, if we stop using silver how many silver mines in Canada will be forced to close down? Can the honourable senator answer those two questions?

Hon. Mr. Everett: Yes. At the present time the dime and the quarter are 50 per cent silver and 50 per cent copper. The 50-cent piece and the silver dollar, while they are not being made at the present time, are 80 per cent silver and the remainder copper.

The price of silver has gone from the controlled price of $1.29 per ounce to the present price of $2.08 an ounce, I believe. This is an expression of the enormous demand for silver. While I am not in a position to assure the honourable senator what will happen to the production of mines, it seems to me that if the increase in price has been from $1.29 to $2.08, and if the United States Government has found it necessary to take its coinage off the silver standard, there is no possibility that mines will close because of moving to a nickel coinage.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I realize that, in this discussion, other economic factors are involved. The fact that the price of silver increased from $1.29 to about $2 per ounce has given rise, a few weeks ago, to speculation in some quarters that it might be useful for a foreign country, for instance, to purchase coins from a country where the silver content is 80 per cent, then to convert it into pure silver and resell it on the market. I think this is perhaps one of the main reasons for considering at this time a change in the metal used in coinage.

There is also the fact that we are one of the last countries in the world to use silver coins such as we have now.

Moreover, I understand that our present coins have one of the highest silver content. This works against us, economically speaking. I submit that this contributes to the disappearing of our silver, because it is being bought by other countries to be melted down, and we must then, as a country, buy silver on the open market at over $2 per ounce. I believe this is one of the reasons for the change proposed now.

PUBLICATION OF STATUTES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 9:

The Senate resumed from Friday, June 30, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) for the second reading of Bill S-18, to amend the Publication of Statutes Act.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I am sorry if I seem to be arranging the business of the house. All I wish to say on this matter is that I have no comment, on the understanding that the bill is going to committee. Is that not correct, Mr. Leader?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Thank you very much.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West), bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, November 3, 1967, at 11 o'clock in the morning.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE (HATE PROPAGANDA)

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE RESCINDED

Hon. John J. Connolly moved:

> That the motion of the Honourable Senator Connolly, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C., for the appointment of a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons to study and report upon amendments to the Criminal Code relating to the dissemination of varieties of "hate propaganda" in Canada as set out in Bill S-5, intituled: "An act to amend the Criminal Code," which was adopted by the Senate on June 29, 1967, be rescinded; and
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

He said: Honourable senators, perhaps I should say a word about this motion.

Honourable senators will remember that during the last session this bill, which is on our Order Paper now, was debated at great length. It was introduced and explained by the honourable Senator Roebuck on November 9, 1966, and the debate on second reading concluded on March 20, 1967. In the meantime there had been ten contributions from both sides of the house, with criticism of the measure by some honourable senators and support on the part of others.

We were concerned at that time too about the reference to a committee. So, when the bill was reintroduced at the opening of this session it was thought that it should be referred, as had been the case at the previous session, to a joint committee of the Senate and House. Much discussion has been generated by this bill, and I think ample study should be given it. Although the practice we followed earlier in this session was to establish the committee to which the bill could be referred after the debate, if any, on second reading, I think that this should be done before the debate begins.

I also feel—and perhaps in this I am joined by all senators—that probably there would be a better opportunity to give the kind of consideration this bill deserves if it were referred to a Senate committee rather than to a joint committee of both houses. There has been a royal commission on this subject, and it is now proposed that not only should some of the people be called, but, in addition, other interested parties. I think it was generally felt that the Senate is a more appropriate forum for a discussion of this kind, and I do not downgrade joint committees when I say that. The fact of the matter is that there are a great many committees sitting on the other side, and a Senate committee could sit more frequently and give this bill more thoroughgoing consideration than could a joint committee.

Therefore, it is for this reason that this motion is being made to rescind the former order of this house to establish a joint committee. If this motion passes, another motion will be made immediately, to set up a Senate committee.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I merely want to say it is obvious that the resolution we adopted on June 29, 1967, cannot serve its purpose. Therefore, no other course is open than to agree with the motion now made by the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Before this motion is adopted, I wish to say I am surprised at this procedure; it is quite unusual. The bill was debated by the Senate last year and submitted to a joint committee for consideration. Now the bill is coming before us again in another form, for discussion before a committee of the Senate.

There might be elsewhere the hate propaganda which is mentioned in the extensive report that has been published, but I do not see the use of giving people the impression that hate propaganda exists on a large scale in this country. If it happened, it was an exception, and if we insist on the hate propaganda story, people will be given a false impression about the feelings of our fellow Canadians; they are very friendly towards every race in Canada, and at the present time a feeling of friendship exists throughout the country. There is not now such animosity as was noticed in years gone by. The people seem to be more charitable and more inclined to support each other.

Besides that, I have another reason to object to this kind of legislation. It is that we have much work to do. Our parliamentary work is very extensive, and it takes most of our time. Very often we have to neglect our correspondence and other pressing duties that we are expected to perform in order to attend sittings of committees, caucuses, and especially the sittings of this chamber. The members of the Senate, as well as those of the House of Commons, are working very hard.

The other day in the proper place I complained strongly about something that had been said by a member of the House of Commons, to the effect that the members of the House of Commons were paid $18,000 a year to do nothing. I have the excerpt here, and I was shocked when I read it. If we discuss matters like this hate propaganda bill, much time will be wasted by the members of the committee.

The quotation that I have in mind is from the Montreal Gazette of October 20, 1967. It is a "Front Page Challenge," and I quote:

> $18,000 a year is not enough to pay a man who is doing absolutely nothing and is asked nothing.

That was said by a member of the House of Commons; it refers to the House of Commons. However, I believe that there must be a certain solidarity between the members of the two houses and as one of you, honourable colleagues, I am greatly impressed by the work that is done by you. You study legislation with great care in committee, and you are punctual, much more punctual than our colleagues in the House of Lords in England, and the attendance of the Senate is striking. We have only to look at the first page of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate to see that you are faithful to your duties in attending the sittings of this chamber, and the same applies with regard to the sittings of committees. You attend and you ask pertinent questions which require a study of such works as the Estimates and the reports of departments. You receive an enormous quantity of reading material from all the branches of Government, and you are accused of doing nothing. It was not you who were accused; it was the member of the House of Commons, but I was truly shocked, because I know it is untrue. A member who speaks that way should not be allowed to sit in the House of Commons.

Coming back to this legislation, honourable senators, I find it futile, uncalled for, and untimely. I regret that it has been brought before us again, and I will have to oppose it. My reason for opposing it is not because I am not sympathetic with what it is hoped to accomplish, but because the question of hate does not apply to Canada. In a report that was published, and probably at very high cost, there is mention of concentration camps in Germany and other parts of the world. There are no concentration camps in Canada at the present time, and we do not live under a military regime. Our people are free. Besides that, there is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, a force that does its work very well, the provincial police forces, and the municipal police forces. The members of those forces deserve great credit for the way in which they have stopped agitations and such nonsense when they have occurred in this country.

For those particular reasons I hope that the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) will reconsider his sponsorship of this bill on second reading. I hope he will leave it at that, and let it die its ultimate death on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: No.

Motion agreed to, on division.

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) with leave, moved:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to study and report upon amendments to the Criminal Code relating to the dissemination of varieties of "hate propaganda" in Canada as set out in Bill S-5, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code"; and

That the committee have power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee, and to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish only to say that in my opinion this motion speaks for itself. I have on the previous occasion explained the purpose, namely, to set up a committee of the Senate.

May I say to Senator Pouliot who spoke on the other motion that the bill happens to be a Government bill and, if for no other reason than that of cabinet solidarity, I am obliged, as a member of the Government, to sponsor this bill and to support it.

I quite understand any honourable senator having serious objections to parts, or even the whole of the bill, but there will be ample opportunity, particularly in committee, for the making of whatever objections there are to any part of this bill and to have them considered by the committee.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: If I am permitted, honourable senators, I should like to say that some Government bills are not always good legislation.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): With that I agree.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has summed up the situation very well. There are contrary opinions as to this bill, but I agree that the best way of trying to resolve them, if that is at all possible, is to consider them in committee.

Therefore, in order that all views may be expressed freely—and not only the views of the members of this house but those of people elsewhere—this motion should be supported.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS TO COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motion:

Hon. John J. Connolly moved, with leave:

That the Special Committee of the Senate appointed to study and report upon amendments to the Criminal Code relating to the dissemination of varieties of "hate propaganda" in Canada as set out in Bill S-5, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code", be composed of the Honourable Senators Boucher, Bourque,

Carter, Choquette, Croll, Fergusson, Gouin, Hollett, Inman, Laird, Lang, Lefrançois, Methot, O'Leary (Carleton), Prowse, Roebuck, Thorvaldson and Walker.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: On division.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Honourable senators, I should like to say that I did not know my name was on the list of members of that committee. As I am very much opposed to this bill, I do not think it fair that I should act as a member of this committee.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps the honourable senator would speak to the Whip on his side, because his name was among those given me as members of the committee from the opposite side of the house.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I submit that we need people who are opposed to this bill as members of the committee, in order that all views of this house be reflected.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I hope the honourable senator will reconsider his objection.

Motion agreed to, on division.

EXTERNAL AID

COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO MAKE INQUIRY

Leave having been given to revert to Motions:

Hon. John J. Connolly moved:

That the Standing Committee on External Relations be authorized to examine and report upon the Report of the Department of External Affairs for the year ended December 31, 1966, tabled in the Senate on March 22, 1967, with particular reference to that portion thereof which deals with External Aid; and

That the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records.

He said: Honourable senators, it seems to me that this is a particularly appropriate kind of motion to have before this house. Canadians generally, I think, have developed a special interest in the developing countries, and this has become more apparent since the end of the last war. Many countries in Southeast Asia, Africa, and the Caribbean area, have acquired independence in that period. Curiously, most of the so-called emerging or developing countries are in the tropics or the sub-tropics.

There is a genuine interest on the part of Canadians in the problems of these developing countries. I think this is because not too long ago Canada itself was a developing country. Had it not been for the work of the early explorers and the missionaries this country might not have developed as it has.

It seems to me that this house has a special capacity for dealing with problems and matters of the kind proposed in this motion. The members of the Senate of Canada have been very active in the work of the United Nations, NATO, the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, and the International Parliamentary Union. They have shown a special capacity for dealing with foreign affairs, and this is in that category. Public opinion in Canada is in sympathy with the kind of work that is being done in this field. I think the more that is known of policies, programs, and costs, and the way in which these policies are carried out, the more effective and useful will be the policies for the people they are designed to help.

The Director of the External Aid Office, Mr. Maurice Strong, who joined the Government service about a year or so ago, was formerly with Power Corporation and is extremely dedicated to this work. Of course, he will be available to the committee. Honourable Senator Thorvaldson, chairman of the committee, will no doubt be dealing with this matter in an urgent way; there will likely be a steering committee, and a thoroughly good forum will be provided for study and deeper understanding of the problems involved. It seems to me that not only should the people in the department concerned be consulted, but other agencies in Canada, both public and private, like CUSO, should be called. Also, some of the church organizations which do a good deal of work particularly in the developing countries and which in some cases preceded both the sectarian and governmental organizations, in trying to help underprivileged people, might very well be called before such a committee. In this way a full assessment can be made of the contribution by Canada as a whole in the field of external aid.

For this and other reasons I have great pleasure in commending the passage of this motion to the Senate.

Hon. Norman A. MacKenzie: Honourable senators, I would like briefly to say a few words in support of this motion. I do so for two reasons. First, the Government and people of Canada at the present time are spending over $300 million annually on external aid. I think it in order that a committee of this Senate should study the ways in which this money is spent, to ensure to the best of our ability that it is being spent in the most efficient way. Also, I know there are some who wonder about the need or the wisdom or the responsibility of Canada spending moneys of this amount on work of this kind, particularly in a period when there seem to be deficits in our own budgets, very high interest rates, and the possibility of increased taxes. For these reasons, this matter deserves and requires study and consideration.

The other reason is a more fundamental one. The world's population at present is about 3.3 billion. About one-third of that population have an average annual income per capita of less than $100; and another one-third have an average annual income which does not exceed $250 per year. This compares with $3,000 per capita per annum in the United States and over $2,000 per annum in Canada. This means that the bulk of the world's population lives at what is barely a susbsistence level, or even below it. This unhappy situation is made more serious by the fact that the world's population is increasing with great rapidity and is expected by the year 2000 to have risen from the present 3.3 billion people to something like 7 billion people, an increase of 130 per cent.

The world's food supply is increasing, but with much less rapidity than its population. The result is that the gap between population and adequate food supplies is widening rather than narrowing. This is an age of rapid and worldwide communications, and human beings are unlikely to accept the condition of being at the starvation level when there are more fortunate peoples like those of us in Canada who have not only enough for themselves but surpluses as well.

For these basic reasons I feel it is in order for the Senate Standing Committee on External Relations to investigate this matter and the policy and actions of the Government of Canada.

In many respects, we the people of Canada have been engaging in a variety of forms of external aid throughout our history. I say this because external aid does and should include the contributions made by private bodies, organizations and individuals as well as by governments. In some respects the trade we have carried on with other countries and our business activities in those countries, and the contribution made by private citizens of Canada who have gone abroad and worked in other countries, in so far as these have contributed to the development of the other countries, are forms of external aid.

Probably the first of these were our sailors who put out in sailing ships from many of the ports and harbours along our Atlantic shores, not only to the West Indies, Portugal, Spain and the Mediterranean, but in such numbers and to such an extent to other countries, that the fame and reputation of Bluenose skippers, mates and sailing ships were known across the Seven Seas and in practically every country in the world.

Later on, our missionaries, who were and still are genuinely concerned with very important aspects of external aid, travelled to practically every corner of the globe and contributed in a variety of ways to improving the conditions of the peoples among whom they lived and worked. In many cases, this was done with great sacrifice on the part of those going and little, if any, reward other than the satisfaction of involvement in work that they believed to be of major importance.

My father's oldest brother, Dr. John William MacKenzie, went off as a young man to one of the islands in the New Hebrides in the South Pacific. Some others on neighbouring islands, notably Eromanga, "the Martyr Isle," a little earlier had been killed by the natives who were, at that time, uncivilized people engaging in frequent local wars and resorting on occasion to cannibalism. My uncle's young wife and three of his small children are buried on the coral beaches of that island Efate where he and his wife were the only white human beings.

Then there were our banks which helped to develop the West Indies and, to a lesser extent, certain of the countries in South America. Business concerns, insurance companies, engineering firms and the like also engaged in business activities in these areas. But it has only been since the end of World War II that external aid has become recognized as a responsibility of the important and fortunate nations and has been engaging, to an increasing extent, the attention of Canada and of many other western and prosperous nations of the world.

I have already indicated in terms of dollars the extent of external aid, but a few other facts should be included in this brief review. The first concerns the number of countries assisted. Canada gives aid directly to 69 countries and territories and indirectly to 17 countries in Latin America who are eligible to receive aid through the Latin American Development Bank to which Canada gives $10 million per year.

The report of the Department of External Affairs on External Aid gives a most interesting account of the many ways in which we have helped and are helping, through the Colombo Plan with its 18 member countries; in the West Indies and the Commonwealth countries in Africa; the French language countries in Africa; in Viet Nam, Laos and others of the countries of South and Southeast Asia.

As of September of this year there were something in the order of 860 individuals under CUSO—the Canadian University Service Overseas—serving abroad, and it is expected that by the end of the year this number will be increased to at least 1,000.

A similar program in the French-speaking countries of Africa has been developed and this year some 218 Canadian teachers are serving in these countries, and 137 trainees from those countries are studying in Canada.

Concerning other private organizations, the Overseas Institute of Canada has been in operation for the past six years, and has helped and is helping to achieve effective cooperation among and between various private organizations in Canada working in the fields of external aid. The list of their membership is very impressive. This year they had some 46 institutional and corporate members and some 2,500 individual members here and abroad. In 1966 they were responsible for sending over one million books to 550 centres in 54 different countries.

But more of this information, which is both important and interesting, can better be brought out and recorded by our committee in the course of its study of this question.

There is just one other point that I want to mention. In my view, in the long run, the only sensible way of dealing with this problem is to help those nations and peoples concerned to help themselves. In times of emergency—famines and the like—outright gifts, charity if you like, are both essential and desirable.

No doubt, assistance in the construction of hydro dams, nuclear power plants and railways is important, but I am convinced that the making available of our skills, our techniques and our know-how to the young citizens of these countries should head the list of priorities. If enough of these can be trained and educated soon enough, then with our continuing assistance in more practical forms, there is some hope that there may be some balance brought about between the increase in population and food production, and some hope too that their other problems can be solved.

Here may I say that I have a great interest in and a high regard for the private agencies that are working in this field. I could list them and give you details about many of them, but I only propose to do that in respect of one or two. The World University Service has had a long and distinguished record of achievement, dating back under various names to the aftermath of World War I.

Then there is the Cody Institute at St. Francis Xavier University in Antigonish. It brings to Antigonish each year for periods of six or nine months, groups of appropriate and outstanding individuals from a variety of countries throughout the world. They get, while they are at the Cody Institute, the special experience in adult education extension work for which St. Francis Xavier is famous and in which it has given a lead to this continent and to the world.

They have done this out of their own resources and without Government assistance. I suggest that in view of the amounts of money that our Government is contributing —over $300 million annually—some of this money might very well be invested in private projects of this kind. This would ensure that the initiative, the experience and the abilities of private citizens, organizations and institutons can be made to effectively assist the Government and co-operate with it in the future.

These, honourable senators, are some of the reasons why I am delighted that the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Connolly, has moved that this very important matter be sent to our Standing Committee on External Relations.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I have very little to add to the remarks that have already been made in regard to this motion, except first to commend the Leader of the Government for presenting the motion to this house.

Senator MacKenzie has given a thumbnail sketch, and a very accurate one, of the need for external aid to which Canada, among other countries, contributes quite generously. He has also indicated in a general way what is done with the moneys that are invested in this objective. The moneys are invested in an extremely large number of fields as he has said; for example, feeding people in the underdeveloped countries, providing industrial know-how, industrial equipment, and helping to build electric power plants; helping in such projects as the Mekong Delta Plan in South-East Asia—which in itself is a tremendous development—helping in the field of education and with many other projects and needs.

We have sent many teachers to the developing countries and in return we are host to a large number of students who come from them. There are innumerable other fields where our internal aid funds are used.

I want to say a word particularly in regard to the new head of the External Aid office, Mr. Maurice F. Strong. Mr. Strong is a truly dedicated Canadian. He was born and brought up in western Canada. At a very early age he became one of the leading businessmen and entrepreneurs of that part of our country. Later he became the executive head of one of the great corporations of this country, based in Montreal. He was on the way, as everyone who knew him was aware, to the very highest offices of our nation in a business way. However, he felt a dedication to public service of a kind which would be of help to suffering humanity. Consequently at obvious personal sacrifice, he offered his services to the Government of Canada as Director General of External Aid.

I had hoped that we might start our inquiry next week, but I find that Mr. Strong will be out of the city for the next few days. Consequently, we will commence our sittings about ten days from now.

Again, I want to say that I believe this will be an excellent objective for the Senate committee on External Relations and for this body.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I have reported to this house on some of our external aid programs on other occasions, and perhaps I should make a few remarks on the bill that is now before the Senate.

In particular, I hope that the work of this committee will not be a re-examination of the policy as laid down over the years for our external aid program, nor a mere recounting of the useful and important things that the Canadian external aid program has done. I would hope that this would be a critical examination of the Canadian external aid program. In saying that, I should add that I completely support the program and the objective set by our Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Martin, of a level of Canadian aid approximating one per cent of our gross national income by 1970. As Senator MacKenzie pointed out in the Finance Committee this morning, that might mean a total expenditure on external aid by 1970 of possibly $500 million dollars, or maybe $600 million, instead of the present level of $300 million. I say I am in favour of our meeting that objective, but I hope the committee will examine that objective in relative and comparable terms.

Much nonsense has been published by people who should know better about Canada's position in regard to external aid. I would hope that the committee would carefully examine the claims of other countries, and compare them with what Canada is actually doing. I think the committee would perform a great service if it would come forward with exact amounts that would, in international terms, bring us to 75 per cent or 100 per cent of this objective in any given year. I say that because at the present time the figures we have from other countries include private as well as Government investment. They lump them together and say that they have 1 per cent or some such proportion of it. It so happens that Canada's investment in the private sector in these countries is very high. There are reasons for that situation. Some countries include in their aid the normal payments they are obligated to make to former colonies, so the figures that we are given today are not properly comparable.

Therefore, I would recommend to the chairman of the committee that he call the necessary witnesses to let us have some realistic figures so that we, as Canadians, will not be subjected to unfair comparisons and to the kind of statements that are made from time to time by heads of international agencies who compare our effort to those of other countries.

A second subject that might concern the committee is our position in a world in which the large donor countries are today decreasing their foreign aid. This is true of the United States; it is true of Great Britain. Canada has increased its foreign aid on a per capita or income basis; so has Japan and so has Australia. But, as I say, the large donor countries are cutting back. I think this is something the committee might well examine and see where we stand in relation to this situation. One wonders whether it makes sense to increase our aid to these countries if we are merely replacing money or investment withdrawn by some of the larger countries.

I would hope the committee would examine the nature of our aid. Here again, inaccurate comparisons are being made. For example, Canada pioneered in the soft, soft loan. Two years ago we introduced the type of loan which is, in effect, interest free. In fact we even abolished the very small service charge on these loans. Great Britain followed suit a year later, and I heard a prominent British statesman rise and say that Britain had pioneered this, when it was in fact Canada. There is no sense trying to compare lump-sum figures. There is no sense comparing, as is done today, a commercial investment or a commercial loan in one of these developing countries with a 30-year soft, soft loan from Canada. It is just not the same kind of money, and should not be compared in the same table of figures.

I would hope the committee would examine the distribution of our aid by countries. Traditionally, because our aid program arose out of the Colombo Plan, it has gone largely to India and Pakistan. There is no question but that these are probably the two countries in the world most in need of aid from the developed countries, but there are other areas closer to home. Personally, in the committee, I will seek to get a commitment from Mr. Strong or the policy-makers that we begin to divert a larger percentage of our total aid program to our closest neighbours among the developing countries, namely, the countries of the Caribbean, because the much greater impact of Canadian aid on the economies of those countries must be quite obvious, compared to that of, say, India or Pakistan. I hope I will not be misunderstood as suggesting that we cut back our aid to India and Pakistan. I am merely suggesting that, as we raise the total level, a greater proportion should go to help our closest neighbours in the Commonwealth who are developing countries.

I am sure that the committee will be a successful one under the chairmanship of Senator Thorvaldson. I know that he has given a great deal of time and thought to this particular problem. I hope the committee will meet soon and that it will meet often, and that it will be possible to bring before it some businessmen who are actually engaged in external aid. There are criticisms; there are problems; there are questions that businessmen are raising about the method by which this or that firm is chosen to be the vehicle for our aid. I am not suggesting that there is anything amiss in this, but I merely say that questions are being raised, because the conditions under which the opportunities are given to Canadian firms are not clear to everyone.

Having said that, honourable senators, I wholeheartedly support the motion and wish the committee very great success.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I too wholeheartedly support this motion, and I am very glad that the Leader of the Government has sponsored it. I am a member of the External Relations Committee, and I appreciate the able and competent chairmanship of Senator Thorvaldson. He is fair when questions are asked, and he does not need to protect the witnesses, because they are very well received by the committee.

There are two points that interest me. I have already asked a question that has not been answered. It was about the interest-free loans that are made to some countries. I would like to know in due course from the witnesses who will come before the committee how many such interest-free loans have been granted by Canada to any developing country, at what time, and for how much money. I asked that question for the reason that if Canadians cannot have interest-free loans I do not see why other countries can get them.

My second question is about the fabulous so-called pensions that are paid to the Rajahs and Maharajahs of India and Asia. Some newspaper articles were published that informed us there was a group on that continent who were working towards the cancellation of those pensions, which amount to millions of dollars. Is it not your opinion, honourable senators, that before we send any more money to India, or any other part of the world where such pensions are paid, those pensions should be cancelled and the money spent on the relief of hunger and famine amongst the peoples of those countries? It is a sad thought that in this world of plenty there are people who die of hunger. Everyone in this chamber, and I presume everybody in Canada, is willing to do his best, but it is important to know where the aid goes, and if those who need it get the full benefit of it.

In due time I will have an opportunity of asking these questions, and when I ask questions like these I want them to be answered. The witnesses from the Department of External Affairs who will come before the committee will have to be ready to answer those questions, for I will not be willing to wait for an eternity to get a complete and satisfactory reply to each one of them.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL SCIENTIFIC POLICY

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne moved, pursuant to notice:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report on the scientific policy of the federal Government with the object of appraising its priorities, its budget and its efficiency in the light of the experience of other industrialized countries and of the requirements of the new scientific age and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to inquire into and report upon the following:

(a) recent trends in research and development expenditures in Canada as compared with those in other industrialized countries;

(b) research and development activities carried out by the Federal Government in the fields of physical, life and human sciences;

(c) federal assistance to research and development activities carried out by individuals, universities, industry and other groups in the three scientific fields mentioned above; and

(d) the broad principles, the long-term financial requirements and the structural organization of a dynamic and efficient scientific policy for Canada.

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical and clerical personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry; and

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to report from time to time.

He said: Honourable senators, all those who listened to or read my maiden speech in this chamber on June 29 last will readily understand why I am moving this motion today. I intend to add just a few comments.

[Translation]

In my speech on June 29 last I wanted first of all to draw the attention of the honourable members to the vital necessity, especially for an industrialized country, to have a dynamic, well-balanced and efficient scientific policy in order to be able to meet the challenges of permanent revolution and perpetual change which we will have to face from now on.

Moreover, I think I demonstrated that the efforts of Canada in the research field lacked intensity, that the level of expenditures devoted to that purpose was inadequate, compared to that of other developed countries and to the requirements of our total growth and national independence. I also tried to prove that our scientific effort lacked quality and efficiency, that it was too much scattered, and resulted in undesirable gaps and duplications. To conclude, I stated that it was time to conduct a general study on Canada's scientific effort and on the federal Government's scientific policy, and I suggested that such a study should be made by the Senate.

[English]

The motion which is now before us is designed to accomplish this very purpose. I do hope that it will receive the unanimous approval of this chamber without undue delay and that the investigation will begin as soon as possible.

The proposed terms of reference are wide in scope. They are intended to cover all aspects of Canada's scientific effort, and of the federal Government's scientific policy. They involve a review and an appraisal of organization and programs concerning research and development in the fields of the physical sciences, the life sciences and the human sciences, in the public as well as in the private sectors. They require that our research effort be judged in comparison with that of other industrialized countries, and in the light of the requirements of the new scientific age. Thus, the proposed investigation represents a complex but also a challenging task.

Our work, however, would be greatly facilitated by what has already been done by such international agencies as O.E.C.D. and the Science Policy Division of UNESCO. We would also, I am sure, receive valuable assistance from the Science Secretariat located as we all know, in the office of the Privy Council; from the Science Council of Canada and the Canada Council, which are now engaged in a joint study which would be most useful to us. All federal research agencies should be asked, of course, to submit their views and proposals. Finally, I would expect that provincial and private research institutions, including universities, industry, professional groups and even individual researchers, would be invited to describe their activities, their problems and their needs. I am convinced that, with such assistance and co-operation, the proposed committee would be in a position to do a thorough and most effective job.

This chamber now has a wonderful opportunity to render a great service to our country. A dynamic, balanced and effective scientific effort is rapidly becoming the main foundation of the overall development of industrialized countries. Canada, however, is lagging more and more in the international scientific race. Canadians have the right to be informed of this situation and of its long-run implications for their well-being and their independence. When they have been informed, they will be prepared, I am sure, to give a higher priority to a more active and more effective research effort, provided they are shown how it should be organized and strengthened. This is the major task that we can fulfil, this is the national challenge that we can meet, if we adopt the motion which is now before us.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Flynn, for Hon. Mr. Phillips, debate adjourned.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill C-159, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a very simple bill. It proposes to change the name of the electoral constituency of Peel-Dufferin to the name Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe. This is to be accomplished by amending paragraph 53 of the schedule to the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. The schedule is contained in the proclamation issued pursuant to Section 23 of that act. The proclamation is to be found in the issue of the Canada Gazette of June 25, 1966 at page 2024, and the paragraph of the schedule which this bill seeks to amend is to be found on page 2041 of the Canada Gazette of that day.

The only way in which the designation can be changed, because of the provisions of section 23 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, which is chapter 31 of the Statutes of 1964, is by an act of this kind. The reason for that is that section 23 provides that the Schedule to the Proclamation issued pursuant to that section is the law, and if the law is to be amended, then a new statute is required.

Having said that, honourable senators, if I speak for just a moment about the district itself, it will give a little background about the situation in this particular part of Ontario.

Under the British North America Act there was established an electoral district known as Peel. There were two electoral districts established, the north riding of Simcoe and the south riding of Simcoe. These ridings remained until the legislation was changed in 1903. At that time, there were established electoral districts of Peel, Dufferin, and of Simcoe, corresponding perhaps actually to the boundaries of the counties which bore those names.

In 1924, due to population shifts and so on, the ridings of Dufferin and Simcoe were combined into a single riding of Dufferin-Simcoe, while the riding of Peel remained as it had been previously designated since Confederation.

The present sitting member of the area to be affected is Mr. J. E. Madill. I understand that half of the County of Simcoe is in the riding designated in the schedule as Peel-Dufferin, the other half being in a new riding called York-Simcoe. Dufferin-Simcoe of course is an historic riding. Certainly, it is historic from the point of view of gentlemen opposite, because for eleven general elections it was an area represented by the honourable Earl Rowe, who also succeeded in winning a by-election there at the beginning.

It was represented from 1873 and for two general elections thereafter by the honourable Thomas White who was one time Minister of Finance. The Peel riding was represented between 1935 and 1953 by a friend of people on all sides of the house, the honourable Gordon Graydon, who won it in five general elections. It is represented now by Mr. Bruce Beer.

Dufferin-Simcoe certainly is not considered to be a swing constituency in any sense of the word, and since this is a matter which primarily concerns the people in the area, more particularly the people who know the local situation best, this is a bill to which the Senate should give its consent quite readily.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the honourable leader has given all the good reasons why on this side of the house we should support this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read a second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when should this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill C-165, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

He said: Honourable senators, at this time I need not repeat what I have said with reference to Bill C-159, which has just been passed, at least in respect of that part of it which lays before honourable senators reasons for legislation of this kind to change the provisions of the Proclamation in the Canada Gazette of June 25, 1966.

The purpose of this bill is to change the riding designation in the Schedule to the Proclamation as the riding of Oshawa to the name Oshawa-Whitby.

Both Oshawa and Whitby are incorporated municipalities within the riding described in the proclamation as that of Oshawa. Whitby, in fact, is the county seat. Oshawa, of course, is a large and important industrial city in Ontario. Whitby, being the county seat, is the centre of the judicial and municipal activity in the area.

In the British North America Act, in the Redistribution Act, 1892 and in the Redistribution Act, 1903, the area was in a district designated as Ontario South. From 1924 until the present time the area was designated as the riding of Ontario.

The present member of the riding is the Honourable Michael Starr, P.C., the acting Leader of the Opposition in the other house. He has won Ontario in six general elections and was elected once in a by-election.

It has not always been a Tory riding. Mr. W. H. Moore was a member there from 1930 to 1945. Mr. W. E. N. Sinclair at one time sat for it, and he was a Liberal. The C.C.F. won the by-election there in 1948. Therefore, I would not wish to describe it as a swinging seat, but the pendulum did vary from time to time, but rather slowly, and perhaps paused at one side for a little while and then moved over to the other side.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It is now stuck.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I remember the late W. H. Moore in particular because during the war I had occasion to go to Oshawa with the Honourable Angus Macdonald, then Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, in connection with a bond drive. There had been some trouble at a prisoner-of-war camp at Bowmanville, which is nearby, and Bill Moore and I drove over with the Minister, who wanted to see the commandant of the camp. Bill Moore ever after referred to me as the person with whom he had spent a night at a prisoner-of-war camp!

Honourable senators, the area is well known to all Ontarians, and the proposal to designate the riding as Oshawa-Whitby, for the reasons I have given, is a worthy one, and I feel that the wishes of the sitting member in this respect, and of the people there, should commend themselves to the favourable attention of this house.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, the constituency to which this bill refers is the general area of my territorial designation. The bill was introduced, as the Leader of the Government has said, by the Honourable Michael Starr, the Acting Leader of the official Opposition in the other place.

This bill is a tribute to him in that, unlike most private bills, it was passed through the various stages in the House of Commons in record time. As the sponsor of the bill has said, it changes the name of the riding from Ontario riding, as it was previously known, to Oshawa-Whitby. It thus honours a thriving, picturesque town along the shore of Lake Ontario between Oshawa and Toronto.

Incidentally, Whitby is one of a number of Yorkshire town names, others being Pickering and Scarborough, which commemorate the nostalgia of the early pioneers there for their original homes.

I should perhaps add, too, that Whitby is one part of the Honourable Michael Starr's constituency, which consistently approves of the representation he gives to the constituency in the House of Commons—which may or may not be a reason for his introducing this bill in the other place.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): With leave, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES LIMITED—
SECOND READING

Hon. Daniel A. Lang moved the second reading of Bill S-26, respecting Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill has to do with a company with which we are all familiar. In fact, its history seems to be carried pretty consistently on the journals of this Parliament. Despite the way in which politicians have tried to affect this company over the years, it seems to have flourished. In fact, it is interesting to note that since its incorporation in 1951 the natural gas product it transmits by pipe line has increased from 3 per cent to 18 per cent of the total energy consumption of Canada. Similarly, the dollar sales volume of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines during the period from 1960 to date has risen from $29 million to $154 million.

As I mentioned, the company was incorporated in 1951 and certain provisions of the original act passed at that time were amended in 1954. The amendment at that time was in connection with its preferred share structure, and since that time, which was prior to the commencement of construction of the company's pipe line, there have been no amendments to the act of incorporation.

During the intervening period of over 13 years the company has constructed natural gas pipe line facilities which now stretch from Alberta to the Quebec-Vermont border. The company has also constructed and installed, annually, extensions and improvements to its initial system, including pipe line looping and additional compressor stations.

During the six years down to December 31, 1966 the company's gross investment in gas transmission pipe lines has increased from approximately $287 million to over $617 million.

Honourable senators will appreciate that in view of this extensive increase in capital investment the authorized capital initially provided for in the act of incorporation in 1951 is no longer adequate. You will appreciate that the requirements for additional expansion of the company's system in the years ahead will make it necessary to increase the authorized capital of the company.

The bill now before Parliament provides for this specific increase in capital. One of the principal provisions of the bill increases the company's authorized capital from 10 million common shares to 25 million common shares and from one million preferred shares to five million preferred shares.

The bill also provides for certain other amendments to the company's special act dealing with the methods of creating and issuing preferred shares, of varying preferred share provisions and of subdividing and consolidating shares, and with the redemption and purchase of preferred shares and payment of stock dividends.

I might add that these provisions are generally in line with the provisions now accorded to companies generally under the Canada Corporations Act.

Also included is a minor amendment to the company's power in dealing with the electronic communications system used in connection with its pipe line.

Honourable senators, if this bill receives second reading now, it is my intention to refer it o the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Lang, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these resolutions be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Baird: Honourable senators, I move that these resolutions be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Would the honourable Leader of the Government indicate what is likely to be the business before us tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes. We will have the Appropriation Bill for consideration tomorrow. I understand that under the rules it must be disposed of tonight by the other place, so we will have it for consideration when we meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning. That bill will, of course, come by way of message, and I hope we will be able to proceed with the debate on second reading tomorrow. Then, if there is time we might consider some of the items on the Order Paper, in the order in which they appear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No new item is likely to appear tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I know of none.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, November 3, 1967

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 7, 1967

FIRST READING

The Hon. The Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-180, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1968.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-180 is known as Appropriation Act No. 7. I understand that copies of the bill already have been distributed to honourable senators, along with a financial sheet showing the total figures of the main Estimates, and Supplementary Estimates (A) and (B), for the fiscal year 1967-68.

Honourable senators, I think I can sum up in a few words the general provisions of the bill by saying that we are being asked to grant the balance of the main Estimates for 1967-68, plus the balance of Supplementary Estimates (A), the portion not yet voted, and the whole of Supplementary Estimates (B).

In order to facilitate a better comprehension of the bill, I think I should mention briefly the various appropriation acts we have passed so far during the fiscal year.

Honourable senators will remember that on March 23, by Appropriation Act No. 3, interim supply was granted for the month of April, representing one-twelfth generally of the main Estimates, for a total of $583.6 million.

Appropriation Act No. 4 was passed on May 8, and it granted interim supply for two months, May and June, 1967, representing an additional two-twelfths supply of the main Estimates. The total amount granted by Appropriation Act. No. 4 was $1.03 billion.

At the beginning of last July, by Appropriation Act No. 5, full supply of the main Estimates for eleven departments was granted. These departments have been enumerated, but I think for the purpose of the record today I should mention them. They were Atomic Energy, Defence Production, Energy, Mines and Resources, Fisheries, National Defence, National Health and Welfare, National Revenue, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Post Office, Solicitor General, and Transport. The total amount granted by Appropriation Act No. 5, being full supply for those eleven departments, amounted, as far as budgetary expenditures are concerned, to $2.4 billion.

On July 6, before we adjourned for the summer recess, Appropriation Act. No. 6 was passed—this was the last one that was before this house—which granted supply for the four months of July, August, September and October, 1967, representing an additional four-twelfths of the main Estimates and Supplementary Estimates (A).

Appropriation Bill No. 6 represents an amount of $965.3 million. It means, therefore, that up to now we have already granted full supply for eleven departments. As far as the remaining departments are concerned, we have granted generally, apart from a few exceptional cases, seven-twelfths of the expenditures for these departments, based on the main Estimates; and also seven-twelfths of the Supplementary Estimates (A) for these departments.

As I said earlier, we are now asked to grant, for those remaining departments which have not been voted in full, the balance portion or five-twelfths, which amounts to $1.01 billion, of the main Estimates.

We are being asked also to grant as Supplementary Estimates (A) the same remaining proportion, five-twelfths, which amounts to $35.3 million. We are also being asked by this bill to grant the whole of the Supplementary Estimates (B), which amounts to $81.2 million.

Now, as to the total figure of budgetary expenditures for the present fiscal year 1967-68—and I know that this is of great interest to senators on both sides of the house—you will find at page 4 of the Blue Book, at the bottom of the third column, the total expenditure for the year 1967-68, of $9.5 billion. This is the main Estimates; that is, the estimated expenditure for the present fiscal year, $9.5 billion. We must add to this, of course, the budgetary expenditures covered by Supplementary Estimates (A), for an additional $49.5 million, which brings the total to $9.55 billion. If we add now the total covered by Supplementary Estimates (B) we arrive for the present fiscal year at a total of $9.6 billion.

I must say that this does not include loans, investments and advances, which are separately dealt with, nor payments from the Old Age Security Fund or some other accounts which are handled on an extra-budgetary basis.

Honourable senators will recall that the Minister of Finance in his budget speech on June 1, 1967, forecast for the year an expenditure figure of $9.7 billion. Some time in October, I think it was on October 4, in a speech he made in the other place, he forecast an additional expenditure figure for this year in the order of 1½ per cent above that $9.7 billion. I did not make any calculation but, roughly, I think it would represent about $150 million to be added to the $9.7 billion before the end of March, 1968, when, as honourable senators know, most of the remaining bills for the fiscal year are piling in and are paid.

I must say here that if it is true the Minister of Finance has forecast an additional portion of expenditures, he has also forecast an increase in the revenues by 1½ per cent over the original forecast revenue. I think that both forecasts, the increase in expenditures and the increase in revenues, nearly balance, so the Minister does not expect that his original forecast of a $740 million deficit would be changed.

Honourable senators will recall that after the Blue Book was tabled, that is, the main Estimates—which I think was on March 12 or 13 last—it was immediately referred to the Standing Committee on Finance for analysis and study. Before any appropriation bills or acts were passed by the Senate, the Finance Committee had the opportunity to deal with it, and I think this would be an appropriate occasion to express to Dr. George Davidson and his colleague from the Treasury Board, Mr. G. J. Glashan, our appreciation of their great help in our studies of these Estimates.

Yesterday morning we had another interesting meeting of the Finance Committee when honourable senators had what I think was a good opportunity to deal with the new votes of Supplementary Estimates (B), which in fact are the only new items in the present bill. I say this with the purpose of preventing certain criticisms that we are being asked to pass millions of dollars of Estimates after only a few hours discussion. I wish to put on record that at least on four occasions during the present fiscal year we had an opportunity in committee and in the Senate to debate the votes of the main Estimates as well as the Supplementary Estimates (A), and even after the passage of the present bill, if honourable senators agree, I can assure the house that the main Estimates as well as the Supplementaries (A) and (B) will remain under the scrutiny of the Finance Committee for any further inquiry, should an honourable senator wish to get further explanations on any of these votes.

As I said yesterday at the beginning of our deliberations in committee, it is my intention to call a steering committee meeting next week, and we might examine the possibility of having in the future some officials of the department from whom we would like to get additional information.

Now, since the beginning of my remarks, especially when I was mentioning the impressive amounts of expenditures referred to, I had in mind certain remarks and comments raised by honourable senators in the course of past debates on appropriation acts, having to do with the size of these expenditures and their impact on the present conditions of the economy. I gave some thought to this and I would therefore like to comment briefly, not only on these specific amounts of expenditures but also on their relation to other sets of figures, in order that when we talk about expenditures we will be able to put them in their true perspective and proper light. I think it would permit us to draw from the comparison between various sets of figures a more valid conclusion than when we consider only a wide range of budgetary expenditures.

I shall refer first to some figures, being the total amounts of budgetary expenditures since 1960. The totals for the intervening years are as follows:

Year	Amount in billions
1960	$5.9
1961	6.5
1962	6.5
1963	6.8
1964	7.2
1965	7.7
1966	8.7
1967	9.8

The 1967 figure was forecast in the last speech by the Minister of Finance on October 4.

If we examine the Gross National Product by calendar years, starting with 1960, we see the following figures:

Year	Amount in billions
1960	$36.2
1961	37.4
1962	40.5
1963	43.4
1964	47.4
1965	52.1
1966	57.7
1967	61.8

Honourable senators, if we compare these two sets of figures we can draw at least a first impression, that from 1960 to 1967 the budgetary expenditures have increased from $5.9 billion to $9.8 billion, while during the same period of time the Gross National Product, which is the total of goods and services produced by Canadians, has increased from $36.2 billion in 1960 to $61.8 billion in 1967. We can make an interesting comparison. If we compare on a percentage basis for each corresponding year the budgetary expenditures to the Gross National Product, it gives the following percentages. For example a comparison of budgetary expenditures to the Gross National Product from 1960 to date is as follows:

Year	Percentage
1960	16.4
1961	17.4
1962	16.1
1963	15.8
1964	15.2
1965	14.8
1966	15.2
1967	15.9

Honourable senators will note that there is quite a steady percentage between the Gross National Product and the budgetary expenditures. And if, in light of these figures, any conclusion is to be drawn, there is one that is surely inescapable. In the present calendar year the budgetary expenditures represented 15.9 per cent of the Gross National Product, while for a given year, 1962 for example, the budgetary expenditures represented 16.1 per cent of the Gross National Product.

When we consider the item of expenditures, I submit it is also fair to have a look at the revenues column. We can give to figures many interpretations, but I think that if for a given year we compare budgetary expenditures with revenues, it would give a better understanding of these expenditures and their purposes.

The revenues, starting with the fiscal year 1960-61, are as follows:

Year	Revenue in billions
1960-61	$5.6
1961-62	5.7
1962-63	5.8
1963-64	6.2
1964-65	7.1
1965-66	7.6
1966-67	8.3
1967-68	9.09 (forecast)

Honourable senators, in mentioning these figures I hope I do not give the impression that I am not concerned about the upward trend of our budgetary expenditures, nor that I am not conscious of the impact of inflation on all Canadians, and especially on those living on fixed and low incomes. It is certainly not the case. But since I am asking you today to grant huge sums of budgetary expenditures, I thought it would be irresponsible on my part to do so without placing these expenditures in their true perspective.

I received the bill only this morning, and I did not have time to go very deeply into an analysis of these buudgetary expenditures, but I would like to bring to your attention the fact that in many instances the federal Government is collecting huge sums of money which on the books appear in the accounts of the federal Government, while the money is actually being spent by the provinces. Of course, the cost of these joint federal-provincial programs—and I have no official figures which would show the total amount I have referred to—is a substantial sum of money. Take for example, the Fiscal Arrangements Act. In this case it shows the transfer of funds collected by the federal Government, which funds have gone up from $300 million in 1964-65 to $600 million in the present fiscal year.

These again are funds collected by the federal Government by way of tax revenue and, in fact, spent by the provinces. It would perhaps be interesting to have an accurate compilation of such transfer of funds from the federal treasury to the provinces. I think it would undoubtedly reduce substantially the total amount of budgetary expenditures charged to the federal treasury. But, of course—and there is no illusion about this—the money comes from the same source, the Canadian taxpayer.

Honourable senators, we are aware also—and I think I should say a word about this in submitting this bill to you for your approval—that proper steps are being taken by the Government to bring the national accounts into balance in 1968-69.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: It is a little late.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: My honourable friend, Senator McCutcheon, says it is a little too late. Well, this at least is a matter for argument—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The Economic Council of Canada also says it is too late.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: —and we might in the course of the debate meet this criticism. I think Senator McCutcheon will agree with me when I say that if he was at the head of a government he would rather deal with problems resulting from expansion and inflation than problems resulting from deflation and unemployment, for example.

Again, I do not want to give the impression that I minimize at all the problems of inflation presently confronting the federal Government, but there is a point I should like to make. I cannot see how the federal Government alone can readjust the economy as far as inflation especially is concerned when we know that if we add together the expenditures made by the provinces and those made by the municipalities we would not be surprised to discover that in total they amount to more than the expenditures of the federal Government.

I would think also that if there is an anti-inflation drive it has to be supported by all the provincial governments and the municipalities, and backed by the Canadian people as well.

Let us hope that fiscal policies can be streamlined at the three levels of government. It is my feeling that the federal-provincial conference of ministers of finance which will be held here in Ottawa on, I think, November 16 and 17, will be an important step towards a common goal.

There is another aspect of inflation that I would like to touch upon very briefly: inflation is not purely a Canadian disease; this is a problem facing all governments of the Western world. I read a few weeks ago that the French Government has a very serious problem in this respect. There is always the fact that when we talk about remedies for a situation in the field of economy we must never forget that we are living in the shadow of the greatest and richest country in the world. As honourable senators know, if money is available to a government there is no problem about that, but at what rate of interest? There is, surely, the fact that at the present time the commitments of the United States Government resulting from its activities in South Vietnam, and other commitments all over the world, will always put the Canadian Government in an uneasy situation on the money market.

Honourable senators, I think that all in all we have to take very seriously the warnings that the Minister of Finance has expressed from time to time and, more recently, the warnings of the Governor of the Bank of Canada. However, it is my view that we are fortunate in living in a privileged country.

At this point I might express a personal opinion, if you will permit me. This engages only my personal responsibility. I am not an economist; far from it. But, if some honourable senators—and I would not blame them for doing so—decide to make a case for reproaching the Government or the Minister of Finance for not having taken some steps months before in respect to an anti-inflation drive, I am not ready to agree with them, because this is a very dangerous matter to deal with. We had some bad experiences in the past. I was in the Commons in 1957, as were many other senators, when we had a huge surplus of about $750 million.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: $500 million.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Thank you, Senator Bourget.

Then, due to some pressure resulting from the beginning of unemployment and deflation, some measures were taken with the result—and this is my personal opinion—that the ill which we were trying to cure, by the measures the Government took at the time, brought more problems. This is why I said a few minutes ago, if I were at the head of the Government I would welcome dealing with the problems confronting us today—though the problem is not one in my view which results from the acts of the Canadian Government alone. As I said before, inflation is not only a Canadian disease.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You did not finish the sentence—you would welcome, what? Suggestions?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I would like to have—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You started a sentence, that if you were at the head of the Government you would welcome—and then you put in a parenthesis and I did not get the remainder of your sentence.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: A Government is always confronted with problems, there is no doubt about that, and I would welcome being confronted with the problems facing the Canadian Government today, resulting from expansion, prosperity and full employment. Of course, some measures should be taken so that the expansion would be more steady than it has been, jumping too much in one year and then declining. This is I think the goal which the next federal-provincial conference should reach, because this is not only the affair of the federal Government but also a responsibility to be exercised by all provincial and municipal governments.

Honourable senators, I said at the beginning of my remarks that Supplementary Estimates (B) are the only new votes. All the other votes, regarding the balance portion of Supplementary Estimates (A) and the balance portion we have to vote for the main Estimates, are items we have dealt with in previous months.

I thought I should not go into specific details for all the items in Supplementary Estimates (B), but I can assure honourable senators that if there is any question, or if any particulars are required regarding especially the Supplementary Estimates (B), I have on hand information from which I will try to supply the information requested.

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, first let me congratulate the Deputy Leader of the Government on making the best of a bad case. He is very persuasive, and he has quoted many statistics to support the position that he has taken. I jotted down the figures he gave. Of course the frightening thing is not what may have happened over a period of eight years, commencing with the fiscal year 1960. Averages are very misleading things. What should concern him and what should concern the members of this house is that, in the last two years particularly, the budgetary expenditures have increased percentagewise more than the Gross National Product.

We have an increase of a billion dollars between 1965 and 1966; an increase of another billion dollars between 1966 and 1967; and we can anticipate another increase of one billion dollars this year, relying on the figures that the Deputy Leader gave us, quoting from a speech made by the Minister of Finance in the other place on October 4.

At the same time, the Minister of Finance also predicted that his revenues would go up and that his estimated deficit, which he defended as being proper, of some $740 million, would not be exceeded. There are some of us who entertain doubts as to his optimism that revenues are going to increase during the balance of the fiscal year.

One need but look to the reports of corporate profits and the record of the corporate taxes that have been collected this year, to feel that there may be some further shortfall and that the deficit ultimately may be closer to one billion dollars than to the $740 million originally estimated.

It is really difficult to know where to begin in this matter. The deputy leader referred to the four meetings of the Finance Committee held during the current fiscal year. Dr. Davidson has given us a very lucid, interesting description of various items in the Estimates, as to what they really mean, how they arise; but we have never gone into, with Dr. Davidson, whether or not a particular estimate or whether a whole departmental estimate was justified, because, of course that would be a most improper thing to do and it would be equally improper to do it with the civil servants whom the deputy leader suggests will be brought before us from other departments.

When Dr. Davidson yesterday suggested that we might get more information if we had representatives of other departments there, I said, "They are in the Cabinet." He replied that the civil servants were not in the Cabinet. Then I said, "It is not the civil servants who can answer the kind of questions we really want answered if we are going to assess this."

Despite the persuasive argument of the deputy leader, the position in which we find ourselves today is that we have a very rapidly rising cost of living, with interest rates at an all-time high, all the elements of tight money, and this at the end of a period during which the money supply has increased by nearly double the percentage of increase in the Gross National Product. I say that the reason for that can be laid directly at the doorstep of the federal Government. This is not the typical inflation that we are in; this is not an inflation of too many dollars chasing too few goods; this is a cost-push type of inflation.

The first step that was taken to result in the position in which we find ourselves was when the Prime Minister intervened and settled the Seaway strike for a 30 per cent increase. As many honourable senators know, with the announcement of that strike the railway negotiations ceased, because the members of the railway unions then knew what the Government's yardsticks were. I said it before in this house and I will say it again, that the Prime Minister cannot avoid the responsibility for that settlement, even though he has at times attempted to place the load on the shoulders of my friend Senator MacKenzie.

That was one of the first steps that started this entirely new type of inflation. It is not the classic type of inflation at all. The second step was the expenditure policies of the Government which resulted in the Government's going to the market for excessive sums of money, having regard to the ability of the market to provide that money, notwithstanding the fact that the money supply in Canada has gone up some $3 billion in the last 12 months and notwithstanding the fact that a great deal of the Government debt has been, in effect, monetized.

Where do we stand? A number of the ministers are quoted in the press as saying that our situation is not unique, that other countries are experiencing these difficulties, that high interest rates are prevalent throughout the world. It is true, they are. But high interest rates were prevalent in Europe at a time when we had modest interest rates, and when people could afford to buy homes and pay a reasonable rate of interest on their mortgages. It is not traditional for our interest rates to be the same as European countries. And it is true that other countries have inflationary problems, but the fact is that the rate at which prices are escalating in Canada today is double the rate at which they are rising in the United States. The United States is fighting what, by any ordinary standards, would be regarded as a full-fledged war, but at the same time the percentage of the Gross National Product which it takes from its people is less than the percentage of the Gross National Product which the governments in total take in Canada.

It is no use, therefore, to try to lay the blame for this on somebody else's doorstep. There is no use saying that if Mr. Johnson had got through his surcharge on taxes he would have dampened down his inflationary trend somewhat and that, of course, would have helped us. The fact is that our record has not been a good one for some time.

The Third Annual Review of the Economic Council shows that in rate of growth of productivity for the 10-year period from 1955 to 1965 Canada ranked 14th among the 14 industrial nations of the western world who were examined. It had the lowest increase in true Gross National Product per person employed—which of course is the real measure of productivity—of those same 14 countries.

The Economic Council estimated that this measure of productivity in Canada would continue to be lower than that of the other nations during the period 1965 to 1970. Since that report we have had the report of the Governor of the Bank of Canada in which he stresses the seriousness of this lack of a greater increase in productivity, because in this country inflation coupled with a lack of productivity is far more important to us than it would be to the United States if the same conditions existed there.

If we have not already lost all the benefit of the re-evaluation of the external value of the dollar in 1962, we have come very close to using it all up. That was the primary factor on which our growth and prosperity was based, commencing from 1961, when the dollar started to decline, until 1962 when the value was fixed.

Professor H. C. Eastman of the University of Toronto has commented on this in an evaluation of the Council's Review for the Canadian Trade Committee. Professor Eastman says that the striking thing is that the increase of income per capita in Canada is the lowest of all the industrialized countries, and that the Economic Council does not expect this rank for Canada to alter in the period that is to come.

Figures like Gross National Product and averages are very misleading. The Gross National Product does not mean anything to the individual whose own disposable income is going up at a very low rate, indeed at the lowest rate of the 14 industrialized countries listed by the Economic Council. Thus, Professor Eastman goes on to say that we have had a period of rapid population growth during which international conditions were especially favourable to the growth of international trade. He says that the world demand for our exports of food is increasing rapidly. The economy remains flexible owing to full employment and our improved comparative position in manufacturing, and yet this favourable period did not cause an increase in the welfare of the Canadian citizens relative to that of foreigners, but indeed allowed it to slip behind. Even the United Kingdom had an adequate economy from the standpoint of economic growth. The G.N.P. per employed person for the past 10 years increased 2.6 per cent as against the 2 per cent rate in Canada.

The Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, O.E.C.D., says that the rate of growth of productivity has been relatively low in recent years, even lower than in the United States, Canada's most important competitor in both domestic and foreign markets. It probably fell lower in 1966. Well, of course, now we know that it did. The O.E.C.D. went on to say that an important objective of economic policies in 1967 will be to arrest the increase in prices and wage rates and to maintain a satisfactory rate of growth.

With the example that the federal Government set, starting with the Seaway settlement, the longshoremen settlement, and so on, we have not been able to arrest the price and wage rise, and thus we have this unorthodox type of inflation, if I may call it that.

Concerning the expenditure side, the Government has exercised no restraint whatever. It is all very well to say that there have been increased transfer payments made to the provinces. There have been increased transfer payments made to the provinces, but they represent but a fraction of the total budgetary increases, and in some cases they represent a relief from the federal treasury for expenditures which they formerly undertook.

Now, I have spoken about the next matter before, but I am going to do so again. I want to put some figures on record. Referring to the estimates for the year 1967-68, and looking at page 599, Public Service Employment, and I see that on October 1, 1965 there were 225,551 persons in the Public Service, including the employees of a number of Crown companies, but not including employees of what I call the commercial companies such as Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, Eldorado Mining, Canadian National Railways and Air Canada.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: How many, not including those, Senator?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: The total is 225,551. Now, the establishment for the year 1965-66 was 242,097 man-years. If you have two people working six months each, they constitute one man-year, so the man-years are always less than the actual number of bodies on the payroll. The actual increase between October 1, 1965 and October 1, 1966 was more than 10,000 people. On October 1, 1966, just over a year ago, the total number of persons was 235,000, but the man-years of the establishment had gone up from 242,000 to 254,000. Then in 1967-68, the man-years of the establishment have gone up to 269,000. So that on October 1, 1966 there were 235,000 bodies on the payroll, and the Government says that we can use 269,000 man-years, or assuming each person works a year, we can add 34,000 people to the payroll.

That is one of the most expensive ways of curing unemployment that I know of and, unfortunately, of course it will not be cured in the areas in which it is required.

I ask the Leader or the Deputy Leader of the Government to explain those figures to me; to tell me where they feel they are going to use those tens of thousands of additional man-years; to agree with me that 10,000 persons added to the Government payroll probably add $100 million, because when fringe benefits, supporting services and other things are taken into consideration I think it is fair to say it costs on the average about $10,000 to put a person on the payroll.

So, we are looking at the statement produced by the Government which says that we have room now for 34,000 more people, and that strikes me as being a potential increase in expenditure of $340 million.

A year ago, when Mr. Sharp spoke in September, 1966 he recognized that the inflationary trend was becoming severe. My remarks this morning may be a little disjointed, but I will come to just what has happened to prices during the period this Government has been in power, and in particular the period of the last 12 months, in a moment or two. The trouble was that all Mr. Sharp did was to exhort. He exhorted everybody; he exhorted the other governments. It is a fact that the other governments spend as much as the federal Government; there is no mystery about that. Also there is no mystery they have the type of responsibility in the fields of education, primarily in the field of welfare, and in other fields that is calling for expenditures far and away beyond the dollar measure of the responsibilities which it was ever thought they would have when the division of powers under the British North America Act was enacted.

Mr. Sharp exhorts labour and he exhorts management, but he offers no example himself. He comes into Parliament on June 1 this year and introduces an estimate of I think the biggest deficit in peacetime history—and if it is not the biggest, then it is the second biggest, and he will probably win out before the end of the year and be in first place.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Who is first now?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I am not sure. I say he is certainly second. He may be the first, even on his estimates.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I did not make a positive statement, Mr. Leader; I kept my options open.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is right.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: But, in any event, he will rank right up with the leaders.

He says—and I have the quote some place, but I am not going to bore you with it; you have probably read it—that there are many people who consider that a smaller deficit and smaller expenditures would be preferable in the budget that he is bringing in; and he said, of course, that would be more orthodox but that the Government—and I am paraphrasing him—believes these expenditures are of the utmost importance and, in any event, is committed to them and there will be no change made this evening. That is a bare paraphrase of his words. Then he says, deprecatingly, that he has a number of colleagues who are very persuasive in promoting good but expensive works.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am sure every Minister of Finance has had that experience.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I guess so, but it is the duty of the Minister of Finance to stand up to those colleagues. That is his duty.

Now Mr. Sharp is telling us that he is cutting expenditures. There was certainly nothing in Supplementary Estimates (B) yesterday to indicate that any expenditures were being cut. We are assured there is going to be at least one additional set of supplementary Estimates at the end of the year, and that is going to bring the expenditures up by the additional 1½ per cent Mr. Sharp said. If Mr. Sharp is cutting expenditures this year, why will he not say where the cuts are? He is quoted in the press as saying that he is going to do it in due course, and "due course" may be a long time away. Then he is quoted as saying he is cutting them next year. They have slashed $650 million off next year's Estimates, he says. Of course that is just shadow boxing; that is a complete sham. Estimates at that stage are the highest figures that the minister of a spending department can bring in for his own department. That is what he brings in to the Treasury Board, and it is with no expectation that they will be approved. They are all added up, and then the minister and the Treasury Board begin taking a look at them. I would like to know what he cut the $650 million from, what the figure was—of course, that figure will never be revealed.

I suggest that if the initial requests are 200 per cent of what they should be and you cut off 30 per cent, which is a large cut, then you end up with something which is 140 per cent of what it should be, or 40 per cent more than it should be. It depends on how high the figures were to start with.

There was an article in The Economist recently which probably sums up what I have been trying to say better than I could say it. I quote from it:

> The bulk of the damage has been done . . . by the inadequacies of Ottawa's fiscal policies. Mr. Mitchell Sharp, Canada's finance minister, is now trying to pick up the pieces of policy. The one thing that he cannot do is curb the excessive spending in the current fiscal year; indeed, he will be lucky to come out of that with his intended (and unjustifiable) deficit of $740 million.

Mr. Sharp has said he is going to cut expenditures to the bone. I want to hear the knife scrape on the bone. That noise has not been apparent yet.

Now Mr. Benson challenges the Opposition to say what expenditures it would cut. Well, I start out by saying that that is not the business of the Opposition. It is the business of the Government. However, I am prepared to make some suggestions as to what might be done.

I would like to see a resolute government freeze the civil service at the number of bodies that are now on the payroll, as was done in June, 1962, and permit no additions without the approval of the Treasury Board.

There will have to be some additions. There are certain persons who will have to be replaced, but let attrition, resignations, marriage, death and superannuation take care of the others. I think the number of bodies in the Civil Service dropped by 6,500 in the six months following June, 1962. The freeze, of course, was taken off immediately the present Government came into office. I have seen this done in business. I know of no other cure when you have a vast, expanding bureaucracy that has been developing over the past few years. I should have obtained the figures for the last ten years so that I could demonstrate what I am saying, but I have them for only two years, and the estimates for a third.

Bureaucracies grow in business just as they do in governments. I know of no other way of tackling the matter than the way I have suggested, and that is one step which I would suggest that Mr. Benson, as Chairman of the Treasury Board, and Mr. Sharp, might take.

Another step which they might take would be the indefinite postponement of Medicare. I have talked about this on a number of occasions. I have said that the Government has got into the habit of blackmailing the provinces with their own money to go into neat, tidy, pre-packaged schemes which bear no relation to the priorities of any particular province, and to use the provinces' own money and the Government's taxing power to blackmail them into it. I have been criticized for using that word "blackmail," but I was interested to read in the press the other day that Mr. Sharp, when talking about speaking to the provincial Finance Ministers, said he was not going to blackmail them into going into Medicare. Mr. Sharp himself used the word "blackmail." He secretly hopes, I think, that none of them will take up his call, but he has not got the courage to say to his colleagues, Mr. Gordon and Mr. MacEachen, that we should postpone this thing. He has not got the courage to read the report—I think it was the first report, or it may be the second report—of the Economic Council in which it said that the growth of welfare in this country is dependent upon a stable price policy and a steady growth. We are not approximating the potential growth, and we have not got anything approaching a steady, stable price policy. Sooner or later the people of Canada have got to realize that you cannot have these schemes unless you have the basic steady growth. A growth of 5 per cent, without an inflationary factor, is the goal of the Economic Council. We have a long distance to go before we reach that, and the Economic Council itself does not believe that we will reach it over the next five years.

Mr. Walter Gordon is quoted in the Gazette this morning under the headline "Medicare Appeal made by Gordon." He may be getting a little nervous as to what his colleague Mr. Sharp is going to propose. He is reported as saying:

> I object when it is suggested that Parliament should put off medicare again for so-called psychological reasons.

I am not suggesting putting if off for psychological reasons. I am suggesting putting it off because we cannot afford to add some hundreds of millions of dollars per annum to the bills of both the federal Government and the collective provincial governments. I have never seen an estimate in the welfare field that was not substantially exceeded. I invite any honourable senator who questions that to look at the estimates of the cost of hospital insurance, and see where they are now, and compare that with the projections that were made when the bill was being discussed ten or eleven years ago.

Mr. Gordon goes on:

> We are told, for instance, that the financial community will not believe the Government means business in its economy drive unless it again postpones or cuts out medicare.
> Well, I was a member of the business community for more than 30 years. During that time it seemed to me members of the financial fraternity were more impressed by facts and balanced budgets than by psychological postulates, promises or protestations.

What he means by that, I do not know, but as someone who has also had some experience in the business community, even during the past five years, I say that there is nothing that frightens the business community more than the proposals of Mr. Walter Gordon. This postponement of Medicare is not for psychological reasons. It is not a postulate, or a promise, or a protestation. It is something that should be done. I offer that suggestion to Mr. Sharp, and Mr. Benson and his colleagues, because what the business community wants is some evidence that the federal Government is serious about this thing. It is tired of being lectured. That is all that has been happening to it over the last 15 months.

I would like to see some of these great stone monuments frozen where they are, or taken off the drawing board. I would like to see some dramatic examples. I asked the minister in a public speech a year ago last September to take some dramatic action to convince the community that he was serious. So far, he has failed to do so.

What has happened to the cost of living while this Government has been in power? Well, between April, 1963 and September, 1967—a period of 41 months—the cost of living index went up by 16.7 points or 12.4 per cent. In the last year Mr. Sharp started discussing inflation. It was in September, 1966 that he really started to express concern, and since that time the cost of living and consumer price index has gone up 5.6 points—of course, it is 5.6 points on a higher base, so it has gone up by 3.8 per cent. Yet, the Economic Council tells us that what is tolerable is a rise of 1.5 per cent.

I want to return to the article in The Economist, because the author is a much more polished writer than I am a speaker. He says:

> "We are determined to wield the knife on everything of low priority," says Mr. Sharp. He may have to go higher in the scale than that. One single act that would convince Canadians and others that the Government really meant business would be to back-track on Medicare—

This is The Economist speaking in England, where they have the National Health Service and where they know something about these things.

> —due to be imposed next July whether the provinces want it or not. Several do not, simply because they cannot afford it. So far Ottawa has insisted that they must have it, or pay their whack towards it even if they refuse.

The most serious thing about Mr. Sharp's budget, and what has probably done more than anything to produce the present result, was the terrific forecast of borrowing $1,600 million. I do not think that received much attention in the other place on the evening of June 1 or the morning of June 2. It was on the morning of June 2, however, that interest rates started to rise and Government bonds started to fall in price, because the financial community knew that the demands were going to be excessive and could not be met.

I said that the Government is afraid to go to the long-term markets. Other people have said it. And Mr. Sharp has rejected that angrily. I predicted—I take no credit for this, other people were predicting it—that it would cost Mr. Sharp more than 6 per cent for the last $525 million worth of bonds that he sold some weeks ago. In the event he is in a position to say that it cost him only 6 per cent, it is because he put on what the financial community call a "kicker" or a "sweetener". There are other terms they use, that I will not use here. It is something in addition.

Mr. Sharp, in effect, said to the Canadian investors: I will sell you a bond with a 6 per cent interest coupon and I will pay it off in four years. If interest rates go up, I will pay you off and then you may buy at higher rates, but for the first three years I will at your option extend the life of your bond for twenty-six years, making it a thirty year bond, so that if interest rates go down you will have all the benefit of the capital gain or the long-term investment at a rate higher than the market.

That, honourable senators, is the typical sweetener; that is, the conversion option in a preferred stock or a debenture. The result was that Mr. Sharp paid only 6 per cent. I suggest it would have been better for him to pay more than that rather than to give an option which may be very expensive.

Honourable senators, where are interest rates today? These are the figures that the Governor of the Bank of Canada gave in his Winnipeg speech the day before yesterday. The average yield on long-term Canadas is in excess of 6.4 per cent, an all-time high. Provinces are paying 7 to 7½ per cent. Corporations are paying 7½ to 8 per cent. Prime conventional mortgages on single family residences in cities like Ottawa and Toronto, not in the smaller places, carry 8½ per cent.

Mr. Sharp has pushed the provinces out of the market, he has pushed himself out of the market, too; and he has pushed the corporations out of the market. He has dried up the mortgage market and put interest rates at unprecedented heights.

Brinco has announced that it has withdrawn its public issue. We need developments like Brinco in this country but the issue has been withdrawn for the time being. There was to be a public issue of shares but it had to be subscribed for privately by the four major shareholders and there was to be a bond issue. Now as far as I understand, discussions even with the underwriters have stopped.

Polymer, that jewel in the diadem of Crown corporations, recently paid something in the order of 7.6 per cent for twenty-year money. Even at that it could not raise the amount of money it wanted; it started out to raise $25 million and it cut the issue to $18 million.

That is the situation that we find ourselves in, and Mr. Sharp is not going to accomplish anything by talking about guidelines and income policies. The only guideline he has laid down for wages is the 30 per cent increase, and as for exercising restraint, he has exercised no restraint at all. It may be that his colleagues are too powerful for him. Either Mr. Sharp should go or he should take certain steps, and take the risks that some of his colleagues go. After the next election, a great many of them will have gone anyway.

Honourable senators, what does The Economist say about this? I quote:

> Perhaps the greatest danger is that discussion about incomes policy absorbs attention and effort that ought to be going into other, more effective, measures of unpleasantness—

That is what this Government does not want, "measures of unpleasantness".

> Mr. Sharp was thought to agree with this a year ago; now, with his back against a fiscal wall, he seems to want to try—even if he fails, as it seems he almost certainly will.

Honourable senators, I could go on at some considerable length, but what I am saying is not new. It has been said by every reputable financial writer over the last six months; it has been said by financial writers outside Canada. People are losing confidence in Canada; Canadians are losing confidence in Canada. We have an outflow of millions of dollars from this country by Canadians who are selling Canadian securities and purchasing American securities, something that is unheard of but has been going on for some time. That is because at least you lose your money through inflation only half as fast in the United States as you are losing it in Canada currently—and there are some other advantages.

I have not lost my confidence in Canada but I have lost my confidence completely in this Government, and I propose to vote against this bill.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, yesterday we had a meeting of the Finance Committee and the witness was Dr. Davidson. I asked him a very simple question: "What has been the cost of the Treasury Board each year since its establishment?" He told me that he could not answer that question. I asked him: "Could you please tell me what has been the cost of the Treasury Board during the last ten years?" He could not answer that question. My third question was: "Dr. Davidson, will you please tell us what has been the cost of the Treasury Board since you have been there as secretary?" He said "It is impossible; you will have to ask Mr. Sharp."

I was dumbfounded. Here was a man who has a salary of $29,160 and he could not answer those questions. He is entitled to a master's degree—a master's degree for evading questions and replies to questions.

Honourable senators, I draw your attention to page 561 of the main Estimates, where you will find the revelation of the excess expenditure of this year over last year. For instance, there was one secretary to the Treasury Board at a salary of $29,160. There is no duplication of the job—there is only one such gentleman to fulfill such a function.

Then there follows: Senior Officer 3, $20,500-$24,750. There were seven last year; there are eight this year—one more. Senior Officer 2, $18,500—$22,750. There were nine last year; there are 14 this year—five more. Senior Officer 1, $16,500—$20,500. There were 20 last year; there are 18 more this year. Senior Officer 1, $16,000—$18,000; there were none last year; there are 39 this year. Senior Officer 1, $14,000—$16,000; there were four last year; there are four this year.

Now, under Administrative and Foreign Service, Financial Administration, Level 8, $17,270—$20,802; there is one this year. It is a new job and it is worthy of consideration and pay.

Under that same heading there are several ranges of salary: at $16,000—$18,000, there were none last year; there are 38 this year. At $14,000—$16,000, there were 38 last year, whereas there are only two this year, but there are 38 who are in a higher bracket this year. They must have received a promotion by statute, because there were no examinations, nothing at all. The bracket was changed from $14,000—$16,000 to $16,000—$18,000, and in the case of the 38 now decreased to two, that is probably where they went, up. I have only the information that I get from the book.

Now, the next one is the $12,000—$14,000 bracket. There were seven last year, there are 22 this year, an increase of 15. In the bracket $10,000—$12,000, there were 46 last year, and 59 this year, an increase of 11; $8,000—$10,000, two more this year; $6,000—$8,000, six last year, two this year, but again they must have been put into higher brackets. The result is that last year there were 212 civil servants or public servants in that department, and this year there are 389, plus three, which makes 392, an actual increase of 180 employees over last year. The amount of money for the continuing establishment was for last year $1,522,030; for this year it is $3,638,600, plus $16,000 for casuals and others.

I am not surprised that Dr. Davidson did not want to give that information, but he referred me to the book; I got the book and read it and I have been telling you what is in it. You may check in the book itself what I have told you.

Do you not think, honourable senators, that the Treasury Board is a useless institution? It is the fifth wheel of the coach. It is used as a screen. It serves no useful purpose. It is a duplication from beginning to end and we may apply to it the old French proverb that: "Un chien n'a pas besoin de deux queues." —"A dog does not need two tails." And that is that.

Some people listen to Dr. Davidson's explanations—his so-called explanations—sitting there listening to what he says with awe, with their mouths wide open, swallowing everything that he says. I cannot do that.

When the Treasury Board was first instituted it was to play the same role that the head office of a bank has with respect to its local branches. If you go to a bank manager to ask for a loan of any amount, he will tell you that he will see what he can do for you. Then if it is possible to grant it, he says, "You know, I had a great deal of trouble with the head office, but I have succeeded in getting your loan." However, when he does not think that the customer should have the loan, he says, "I have not refused it; I was ready to help you, but it was the head office which refused the loan."

It is the same thing with the Treasury Board. If a member of Parliament or a senator asks for something in the public interest, well the minister will say, "I will do what I can for you." The minister then calls the head of the department, or the chief of the branch, and he asks him, "What can you do for this gentleman?" It is very different from the situation that existed at the time of Mr. Cardin and the Right Honourable Mackenzie King. At that time the minister told the civil servant, "Here is Mr. So-and-So who wants such a thing. Do your best to help him and do that for him." At that time the civil servant was not the boss; he was the servant and the minister was the boss. I will not say that it is the same today.

But the role of the Treasury Board has been to create a smoke screen to cloud and hide everything and, under the pretence of economy, to act as a bar or obstacle in the way of certain reforms. It is all right to preach to others to do what is told them, but, for me, the best way to preach anything is to set an example for it. But the Treasury Board is far from giving an example of economy.

The reason why I say it is a duplication is, first—and this is in the reports of the Finance Committee over the last three or four years—there should be regulations for any branch of the Government, and there were none for the Treasury Board for a long time, not until last October.

I asked Dr. Davidson if there was a number set for a quorum for the members of the Treasury Board. There was nothing. He did not know, but he said that as a rule the quorum was three, but, if nobody attended the sitting, members could sign the report of the Treasury Board and it would be just as good as if they had been there. You see, there would be three signatures. It was enough.

Then I asked him this question: "Have you any specialists with the Board to discuss technical matters?" Do you think that those are sensible questions? He replied, "No, we have no specialists". I asked, "What do you do when you have a report from technicians or engineers in a department, and you have no technicians on your Board? How can you control it, discuss it, and check it to decide whether the amount is ridiculous, or exaggerated, or that the item should be cut or dispensed with?" The answer was not very satisfactory.

The only thing I do today is bring the attention of the Government to such a state of things; I am surprised that those people can get as much money as they want from the public treasury, and as much help as they want, when we hear so many sermons about economy.

It seems to me that the thing to do is to use a big axe or a chain saw, and to cut the dead wood. I wonder what you think of it. I heard one of my colleagues not long ago make some suggestions about Medicare. That is his opinion, and I respect it. However, I think that we should take the Estimates in hand, and that we should prune them and cut out the dead wood. Then we would render the greatest service the Government and the country ever had.

I am not going to vote aganist it. My opposition is friendly, just as it was yesterday, when only two of us senators, Senator Hollett and myself, said that Bill S-5 made no sense. We were the only two opposed to it.

I wonder if the duty of the Senate is to exaggerate suavity. You know what the meaning of "suavity" is. It is a nice word. It means: "pleasant; agreeable; always with a smile; a very nice manner." This is not the role of the Senate at all. The role of the Senate is to be a check on public expenditures in order to protect the taxpayer. The Senate's stock was never as high as when we defeated the government bill to dismiss Mr. Coyne from his post of Governor of the Bank of Canada. I insist on that, because what is done by the Senate in defeating Government legislation does not affect the Government at all.

There is a view which has been expressed in this chamber, and in committee, to the effect that the members of the House of Commons are the chosen ones, that they are the elected of the people, and that what comes from the House of Commons is submitted to the Senate by the people of Canada. This is not true at all. Much of the legislation is drafted by bureaucrats and is very difficult to understand.

We have a big book, the most recent issue of the Statutes, which weighs a ton; it is so big that it would need a caravan of camels to carry a whole collection of the Statute books. But you know that our duty in the Senate is to consider everything objectively, not from the point of view of a party, but upon its merit. This is what I have done now, and I have spoken to the caucus to the same effect. I have asked questions in committee, and now I can come before the Senate chamber to remind you that what the Canadian people expect from the Senate is that each one shall express loudly his own opinion on any measure that comes before us.

I will not go as far as to suggest that you all read the legislation. It is so voluminous, so considerable. Today it was impossible to read the bill before us because we received it at the last moment. The bill was tabled here together with a memorandum, and we have not had an opportunity to study it; but we have the Estimates, and what I have mentioned is only about one branch of the Government. It seemed to me that not only the members of the Opposition but also the members on the Government side would render a public service if they took the trouble to divide their work amongst themselves. The Opposition could do so, and perhaps they do—I do not know what happens over there—but here, on this side of the house, we should study the Estimates and check them. Then, if you see something that you do not agree with, you should say so, as it is our duty to protect the interests and the purse of the taxpayers of this country.

I will not keep you any longer, but I hope to have your support in making suggestions like that, which are not unfriendly. In this country, contradiction is not admitted. If you walk with a friend on the street on a perfect day and you tell him what beautiful weather it is, if he answers, "Yes, but don't you see the clouds over there?" You are sorry that he does not agree 100 per cent with you that the weather is nice. This is the feeling in the country. Contradiction is not admitted, and I know contradiction is unpleasant. It is always unpleasant when you find someone who does not agree with you. When you go to the doctor to have a tooth pulled, it is not very pleasant, but you feel much better after it is done. I hope you will take what I have said in the spirit in which I have said it.

I submit we cannot make any progress in the reduction of the Estimates and the expenditures without doing it in particular cases. It will be a long process; it will be painstaking, but it will serve a good purpose.

Hon. Mr. MacKenzie: Honourable senators, I am not going to intervene in the debate, but I would like to make a request of the honourable Senator Deschatelets, and ask him whether he could include in the tables that will be printed in Hansard the real increase in "dollar values" as between 1960 and 1967-68, because inflation does give a misleading picture of the real amounts.

The other question I would like to ask is of Senator McCutcheon. I am not sure whether I understood him or not, but it seems to me that he said there had not been an increase in income in Canada comparable to that in other countries. I was wondering whether an increase in income is related to an increase in wages and salaries.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: If I could answer the second question, what I said was that there had not been, according to the Economic Council—the figures are all there and I cannot tell you whether they are in constant dollars or current dollars—the same percentage increase in Gross National Product per person. That is a little different from income.

Hon. Mr. MacKenzie: It was not income?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: It was not income. It was Gross National Product per person.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I should like to inform Senator MacKenzie that the information he requests will be obtained and put on the record.

Hon. Mr. MacKenzie: Thank you so much.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I do not want to delay the Senate when it is already past one o'clock, but I do want to make one remark in relation to what Senator Pouliot said. I know Senator Pouliot did not mean to say that Dr. Davidson was not on top of his job and did not understand his department thoroughly.

I was present at the meeting of the Standing Committee on Finance that Senator Pouliot referred to, and I do not think I have ever met anybody who, to my mind, had every fact of his difficult department at his fingertips as had Dr. Davidson. I thought also that he expressed himself and explained things extremely well.

When Senator Pouliot asked him to give all the expenditures of the Treasury Board since its inception, Dr. Davidson pointed out, as I understand it, that the Treasury Board ruled on many things, but that they were mainly authorizing expenditures of different departments. I think that if Senator Pouliot reads the transcript of what Dr. Davidson said he will understand that quite clearly.

The only other thing I want to say is this, as we are all talking of economy, that if we are going to ask questions that will cause these different departments to have to go back to the beginning of time in order to obtain details of every expenditure they have made, then it is no wonder that every department is going to want to increase its manpower by threefold. If we are going to ask information from different departments of government then we should do it with a certain amount of discretion.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, perhaps I should say just a word on this particular point brought up by Senator Beaubien (Bedford). I have looked at the transcript of the evidence given at the meeting of the Standing Committee on Finance yesterday, and it seems to me that there was some misunderstanding. According to the transcript that I have Dr. Davidson said:

> Well, we will try to get the approximation of that for you.

That was in reply to Senator Pouliot's remark that he would like information as to what has been spent for the last ten years. Dr. Davidson emphasized that it is only this year that there has been a separate account for the Treasury Board in the Estimates, and that during the ten preceding years the Treasury Board came under the Finance vote.

However, I think I can say to Senator Pouliot that this information, though it will require some time to prepare, will be supplied to him by Dr. Davidson.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: I thank the honourable Deputy Leader of the Government. That is very good news for me. I presumed that Dr. Davidson had said that, but I did not hear him and, by the way, I left before the meeting was over.

I appreciate the fact that I will have some kind of information, but in the meantime I would point out that I cannot understand why Dr. Davidson said that the figures for last year were not available when they are at page 561 of the Estimates, and they are less than one-half the figures for this year. Also, in respect of the other estimates there were two columns, one for the previous year and one for the current year, and it would have been very easy to give those figures. If Dr. Davidson does not give those figures, then I will make them up myself from past copies of the Estimates.

I think that when a man receives such a fat amount of money for his salary, parliamentarians are entitled to ask him questions in order to know what has been spent in his own branch. The reason why he mentioned the Department of Finance was because he is now under the Department of National Revenue. Before that time and up until last year the head of the Treasury Board was the Minister of Finance—that is at the time of Mr. Gordon.

In answer to Senator Beaubien (Bedford), I thank him for what he has said, but nobody could have said that the figures I have mentioned are not accurate and true. What I wanted to do was not so much to offer a suggestion as to put the figures before you, so that you would not have the trouble of checking through the Estimates. If you look at Hansard you will see exactly what is the Estimate.

If you find it is well and good to pay such huge sums of money to so many civil servants who become and become and become more numerous than ever, then that is your own business. The majority rules, and in the democratic spirit I will not insist any more about it. But I feel I must protest sometimes, and it is pretty hard that the protests must come from one member on the Government side and one member on the Opposition, as was the case in respect of the last bill. You know, it is impossible to have any reform if every time we try to have a reform there is somebody who boosts the bureaucracy.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, at this hour I propose to speak briefly, and, like Senator McCutcheon, I am going to eliminate a good many of the things I might otherwise have said.

I do want to say, first of all, that the honourable members opposite had what I consider to be a very successful party meeting in Toronto.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Having had some experience with the conduct of party meetings I should like to commend them, and the people who ran that particular meeting, for the splendid job they did. The meeting did credit not only to them as a party, but to the parliamentary system of the country as a whole.

I had only one regret. I watched the proceedings on television for the most part in my place up in the country. My regret is that I did not hear what I understand was one of the very best speeches made, namely, the speech of Senator McCutcheon. The circumstances were these, that when Mr. Fleming was about a quarter way through his remarks the generator at my cottage went off, and did not come back on again.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: There is no connection between these two happenings, I hope.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not blame it on Senator McCutcheon, and I do not think there is any connection between the failure of the generator and my good friend Donald Fleming.

Of course, we are again indebted to Senator McCutcheon for a very thoughtful and thought-provoking speech on another appropriation bill. If I am permitted to say so, and while everybody in the country knows it because it has been in the press so much, I do hope that somehow or another he can make arrangements and so manage his affairs that he will remain here in the Senate where he is an ornament.

Senator McCutcheon painted a gloomy and dark picture, and I do not think a picture should be thought of as being as gloomy as that, particularly in the Centennial year. I say this not in any carping way, because there is nobody who wants to be more fair than Senator McCutcheon, but I dislike the thought of the Government of which I am a member performing in a way that is a sham, or is shadow-boxing and devoid of courage. That is really a kind of charge of bad faith, and I know that Senator McCutcheon did not intend his statements to have the effect of saying that the Government is in bad faith. I do not think any Government of Canada is ever in bad faith. Senator McCutcheon is perfectly entitled to say that he has lost confidence in this Government. This happens from time to time. I hope that before long the Government will have taken steps to demonstrate that it is not only in good faith but acting effectively, and that Senator McCutcheon's confidence in the Government will be restored—and I use the word "restored" advisedly.

Honourable senators, things are not as bad as perhaps the broad strokes that he has used have indicated. Capital investment for this year, for example, is about the same as it was for 1966; and 1966 was 17 per cent above 1965. I should point out to the Senate that when the Government came into office in 1963 its first priority was the problem of unemployment. The unemployment rate then was approximately 7 to 7½ per cent. By 1966, the unemployment rate had fallen to 3 per cent—3½ per cent, which is virtually full employment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): This was an important aspect of the Government's activity—

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I would like to ask the honourable senator a question—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Well, now, please—

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Will my honourable friend not admit that the unemployment ratios during those years were approximately the same in Canada as in the United States? When the ratios came down, as employment increased in Canada, the figures in the United States went exactly the same way, and for the same reason.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The honourable gentleman may be perfectly right. I am talking now about the problem that faced the Government in 1963, and it does not matter what the situation was in the United States. The Government had to deal with it and what we had to do was try to get the economy rolling.

Perhaps we got it rolling to the point where it rolled too fast and too far. It certainly did become quite heated, and inflationary trends developed. We had an inquiry here in the Senate about inflation and its evils. That was a good committee and I would like to see it continued through. There were some restraints. There has been a slowdown of the economy. The Governor of the Bank of Canada has referred to it, and I would like to speak about that later.

The unemployment rate—and in this I take some satisfaction—has increased only from 3 to 4½ per cent, so that we have virtually full employment still in this country. That is important to the housewife; it is important to the breadwinners all over the country.

Honourable senators, I would like to talk at length about the automotive agreement and the effect this kind of agreement has upon a country like Canada. I think it has produced new job opportunities. It has made provision for greater capital investment, but from my point of view, most of all, it is a step in the direction of freer trade, to opening up the channels of freer exchanges of goods and services with the United States, our first customer and, through the Kennedy Round, a further development of the freer trade idea with countries all over the world.

This is a good trend. It is a trend that parties on both sides of the house would want to support. I do not think any party in this country is a free trade party but we want freer trade; we want the freest possible trade. The automotive agreement has been a step in a good direction. I may say a word about the incentive program—

Hon. Mr. Hollett: May I ask the honourable senator whether he is speaking on this bill before us or whether he is giving a political speech—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Certainly I am—

Hon. Mr. Hollett: He is giving us a political speech. Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am talking now about economic conditions in this country. This is the type of thing Senator McCutcheon talked about, and this is the kind of thing we all want to hear. The ADA incentive program has been another factor in developing growth in the economy. I understand that some 831 applications under that program have been approved, that the new investment amounts to $1,750,000,000, that 95 per cent of the equipment covered by the program must be new equipment; that new or expanded facilities will give additional employment to some 48,000 people; and in order to discourage non-economic units, equity must equal the amount of the grant made to any given industry.

This is a program that was imaginative and will be helpful and will have a substantial effect upon the economy.

Honourable senators, I am as conscious as Senator McCutcheon, perhaps more so, and perhaps more depressed, about the problems he mentioned, such as the rising cost of living, the rising interest rates, and the cost rise in production. I should like to say a word or two about that also. I think we owe a debt of gratitude to Senator McCutcheon for the fact that he has emphasized this so clearly and so forcefully today. He has criticized, too, the kind of expenditures that the Government has continued to make. I would like to deal with this also, because the Minister of Finance and I had a talk about it yesterday. The biggest area of federal expenditures has been, not the social services area but the areas designed to promote industrial development, to retrain the labour force, to improve research facilities and programs to deal with areas that are chronically depressed.

We may take satisfaction from the fact that our unemployment rate is 3 per cent, 3½ per cent, 4 per cent; but we can take no satisfaction from the fact that there are chronically depressed areas and there are new crisis-depressed areas coming into being, particularly in Cape Breton just at this time.

The social security program has been improved and I think it makes Canada a better place in which to live. There is the Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Assistance Plan, aids to universities, the establishment of the Department of Manpower, the ARDA program which the honourable senators opposite between them brought into being. All of these things are improving the quality of Canadian life and I hope that these programs can go on.

I agree that provincial and municipal spending now exceeds the amount of money that is actually spent by the federal Government. I hope that something can be done to restrain spending there, just as I hope our own efforts in the Government to restrain federal spending will be successful.

In Mr. Rasminsky's speech on November 1, which was given in Winnipeg, he spoke first of all about the three great problems: first, the pause in the expansion of the economy from 1961 to 1966. According to his figures, the real output increased 6½ per cent per annum, but since the spring of 1966 the rate has been from 2 to 2½ per cent per annum. This is a real fall. He deplored, too, as another problem the increase in the rates of interest. Provincial government borrowings, as Mr. McCutcheon has already said, are now at 7 to 7½ per cent. Corporations have to pay 7½ to 8 per cent, and for prime mortgages the rate can reach 8½ per cent.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I know where it is 9 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The third problem he pointed to was the poorer cost and price performance that we have been witnessing in Canada; in other words, poorer productivity. Mr. Rasminsky says that not only must monetary policy be involved in trying to effect a cure, but fiscal policy must be involved also; and that to handle these problems, which are extremely serious, we will require the most careful kind of management.

I agree with Senator McCutcheon—and I am sure Mr. Sharp would be the first to agree—that the Government's demands upon the market for money must be reduced. I agree, too, that the federal Government must give the highest priority to reduction in expenditures, even though some of the programs that must be reduced are not only desirable but are urgently required. Nevertheless, it is a question of selectivity. It is a question of deciding what should come first and how much we can afford.

Looking ahead to the next year's Estimates, looking ahead to announcements that I hope will be made within the very near future, I think that there will be evidence given by the Government of its intention to try to take these unpalatable steps in the interests of the well-being of the economy and the well-being of the country, which we all so much desire.

Meetings with the provincial governments scheduled for later this month should also help, I think.

May I simply quote one or two passages from Mr. Rasminsky's speech, and I am not making a selection here of passages that happen to suit my point of view, but he says on page 16 of the speech:

> I believe the only effective way to deal with both these problems—that is the cost rise and the increase in the interest rates—is to break into any inflationary expectations that may exist by making it clear beyond doubt that inflation will not be accepted in Canada as a way of life. I believe that this is the most urgent task of economic policy at the present time.

I say to you, honourable senators, that that is the view of the federal Government and we are going to do everything we can to see that that view prevails.

I quote further from Mr. Rasminsky's speech, where he says on page 19 that:

> Public understanding of the limits of the economy in providing real increases in incomes and public support in restraining money demands within these limits are essential.

I quote further from his concluding remarks, when he says that:

> The central problem we are now faced with in Canada is to break into the circle of rising costs and prices and as part of this process to reduce the demands of governments on financial markets. It is not easy and it will require courage and determination on the part of the public authorities and the active co-operation of the public, employers and employees alike. But the stakes are very great. We have in this country an enormous potential for growth and rising standards of living. This Centennial year has in many ways demonstrated that Canadians are capable of greater achievements than we had realized. We have made remarkable advances in recent years and if we behave sensibly we have good reason to look with renewed confidence to our future.

Honourable senators, I adopt those words as my own. They are better than I could have written myself. I am optimistic for the future of this country, not only in the long run but in the short run, and I am optimistic, too, that the Government will take whatever steps, however unpalatable those steps may be, to manage the affairs of the country as all Canadians would like to see them managed.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I had not intended to speak in this debate, and I had so informed the Leader of the Government, but I have now informed his deputy that, following his speech, I thought it was necessary that there be some reply from this side.

I am not aware of the honourable senator's plans regarding time. Perhaps, in view of the fact that I would speak for 15 or 20 minutes —because there are some very important considerations to be dealt with—it might be wise to adjourn now.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I have no objection to adjourning now, if it is the desire of the Senate. On the other hand, I have no objection to continuing at this time either, if that is the wish of the Senate. We could adjourn now to resume at 2.30. I would be quite agreeable to that.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Why not continue?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would you prefer to continue now?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I think we could finish by 2 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): If the acting leader thinks we should continue, that is satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Then, in view of the hour, I will try to limit myself to 15 minutes.

The honourable Leader of the Government has given us some of the reasons why he believes that the Government made the best possible effort to avoid the very serious situation that faces Canada today. I am going to put on record, if I may, some impartial opinions and judgments of the conduct of the Government and of the relations of the Government's policies and actions to the economic consequences with which we are faced today.

May I start with a quotation from the Winnipeg Free Press, which would not, I think in anybody's judgment, be regarded as a paper normally hostile to the Government. I am quoting Mr. Bruce Hutchison, also one who is generally regarded as a friend of this Government. This quotation is from an article in the Winnipeg Free Press in which Mr. Hutchison says this:

> Whatever happens to the Government and the tortured political system, we shall see during the next few months whether the nation has the wisdom and courage to avoid a "disaster".... Already the time is later than we think. The way things are going now, disaster of some sort looks unavoidable.
>
> The economic facts surely have become clear enough—inflation generated by all our governments, by management, labour unions and the ordinary household; production costs rising fast; interest rates at a dizzy pinnacle; even federal Governments bonds difficult to sell; economists warning us of a recession to celebrate our hundredth birthday next year.
> The psychological facts, however, are more interesting. How, the student of human nature will ask, did we get into this mess? The easy answer is that the politicians bungled our business as, of course, they did; that strong leadership has been lacking, as of course it has. But this is no adequate answer. We must penetrate below the surface of politics to find out what went wrong; then, if we are honest with ourselves, we shall see that all of us are to blame. The politicians' public mistakes represent only our private, collective mistakes writ large.

I emphasize the fact that the responsibility for the present financial situation must lie at the door of this Government. If I may, I will quote from the Financial Post, again an impartial observer of the political financial scene. Again this is Mr. Hutchison speaking, and he says this:

> Ottawa can only blame itself for its present boxed-in position. If its increases in spending had been less exuberant across the board in the past few years, it would now be able to borrow more easily to finance its long-established housing program.

That article goes on to lay the blame for the housing situation again at the door of this Government.

Perhaps an even more impartial source is the Economic Council. Its Fourth Annual Review, recently published, has this to say. This is very interesting in connection with the deputy leader's comparison of accelerating expenditures and accelerating revenues. I think he believes himself that, in general, government expenditures have not outpaced government revenues. The Economic Council, on page 261 of its report says:

> Thus, the accelerated increase in government spending in 1966 and 1967 is outpacing the growth of government revenues at existing tax levels. This necessarily raises troublesome questions about the possibility of increases in tax levels—perhaps of major dimensions if the present very high rate of increase in government spending continues—and of sharper conflicts in competing claims for the use of resources. Such conflicts could lead to sharp rises in prices and costs.
> These developments have led to a growing uneasiness in Canada about the current pace of the over-all advance in government spending. The council shares this uneasiness,

I pause to say it is only fair to add that the council is referring to the expenditures of all governments, not only those of the federal Government; but elsewhere in the report it makes it very clear that the federal Government is not in any way running behind the provincial and municipal governments in excessive spending.

I emphasize that the words used in this context are: "excessive spending", "overspending", "unwise spending." There is no suggestion here that the Government has been forced to spend this money, that it was pressed into it, as was suggested, by agreements with the provinces. As Senator McCutcheon pointed out, the transfer payments to provinces are merely a fraction of the total federal Government expenditures.

Has the Government taken note of this situation? Is it really doing something? The honourable Leader of the Government has given us its assurance that it will, that there are great plans ahead, such as those outlined by Mr. Rasminsky and the Minister of Finance. But the present position, again in the view of the Economic Council, is this. First of all, the council speaks of some of the changes that are being made in the accounting procedures of departments, which have been outlined to us in detail in the Finance Committee. The council then says:

> However, this has not been matched by comparable advances in the development of procedures and machinery for dealing with much larger questions:

I suggest it is with these larger questions that we are dealing today. The council describes them in this way:

> for consistent and comprehensive determination of objectives and priorities; for continuing evaluation of the impact and effectiveness of the growing range and diversity of government programs in relation to their cost; and for increased co-ordination between governments in relation to these matters. It is in these much more important areas that there is now an urgent need for improvement.

Again the council tells us:

> Our primary concern is the need for developing more adequate means to clarify aims of government expenditure programs,

And again:

> But we believe that there are very considerable opportunities for improving government processes of decision-making in this field through greatly reinforced and extended development and application of appropriate techniques,

And the council indicates four specific areas in which this kind of improvement in the Government's decision-making has not been made. I say that, honourable senators, and I am not asking you to take my opinion as to what the present situation is.

There is one famous quotation that I should not fail to bring to the attention of the Senate. This was by Mr. Neil J. McKinnon, Chairman of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. Speaking of the present situation and the responsibility of the Government in this situation, he said:

> It is not too much to say that government deficit spending, combined with a permissive monetary policy that allows continuous inflation really involve a massive swindle—a swindle perpetrated on the great majority of the populace who are least able to protect themselves against the consequences.

Honourable senators, I have a good many other quotations here, but I said I would limit myself to 15 minutes. However, may I comment very briefly? I think it is obvious that something has to be done to improve the decision-making of the federal Government in financial and fiscal matters. I do not relate this particular remark to the present Government. I think it applies to governments in the past, and I think it will apply to governments in the future. If I have any ulterior motive in saying this, it is probably my very earnest wish to be as helpful as I can to the administration which will follow this one, presumably in the not too distant future. They will need the same guidance; they will need the same scrutiny of Estimates and of expenditures.

I want to suggest at this time that the Senate can and should perform an important role in this area. The work of our Finance Committee has been spoken of. I think I have attended every meeting of that committee, and I have only praise for the chairmanship of Senator Leonard and, since his retirement, for that of the present Deputy Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Deschatelets). On the other hand, the work of that committee is not adequate. We meet occasionally, when Estimates are referred to us. We do no systematic examination of the Estimates or of the Public Accounts. I have asked Dr. Davidson publicly if there is a role that the Senate could perform, and his answer was emphatically "yes."

Honourable senators, there is a job for us to do. On another occasion I would be prepared, with your permission, to outline in some detail exactly how we might perform that role. As good a guide as any, as good a reference paper as any, would be the statement in this Fourth Report of the Economic Council. They say: Here is a job to be done. I say that somebody has to do it. Is it going to be done in the other place? It has not been done in the past. Dr. Davidson and others are on record as saying there is not in this country, under the present machinery set up in the other place and here, an adequate examination of the Estimates and expenditures. Dr. Davidson has made the statement that in the other place there was not this year—and I take it this would apply to other years—any consideration of the overall Estimates. The other place is busier than we are. I suggest that in the Senate we have the time, we have the talent. I can say from personal knowledge that we now have young men who are straining at the leash to be allowed an opportunity to make a greater contribution in the public interest here and to earn the pay they are given for their attendance here.

I would urge the honourable Leader of the Government and his deputy to give serious consideration to making the Senate, as Senator Pouliot suggested, an important factor in the control of government spending.

I have referred to Senator Pouliot and I am sorry to see that he has left the chamber. I always hesitate to disagree with Senator Pouliot for two reasons. One reason is that he is my neighbour and friend, and one for whom I have the highest regard. The other reason is, of course, that it is extremely dangerous to disagree with Senator Pouliot, as I shall no doubt find out. However, I must say that my interpretation, or my appraisal, of Dr. Davidson's answer with respect to the matter of the Treasury Board expenditures was different from that of Senator Pouliot. Perhaps Senator Pouliot did not hear the full answer. My understanding was the same as that given by the honourable Deputy Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Deschatelets), namely, that Dr. Davidson did answer the question. I was as surprised as Senator Pouliot to hear that there was no specific record of the costs of Treasury Board operations prior to last year.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: This year.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: This year? I think that was a slip of the tongue on Dr. Davidson's part because, as Senator Pouliot pointed out, if you look at the Estimates you will see an accounting for the Treasury Board for last year.

However, I was surprised by the answer because if it is so then the Treasury Board has been going along and burying its expenses in those of the Department of Finance. It is understandable that that was so in the past, but changes have been made, and the Treasury Board now is a very different board from what it was. It has taken on very different responsibilities and it is, in fact, the Government's manager of its employees. I want to say that I did not obtain the impression that Dr. Davidson was in any way evasive, or in any way attempting to withhold information from Senator Pouliot or the committee.

That is all I have to say at this time, honourable senators. I have kept almost to my time limit, and I thank you for the opportunity of speaking.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the honourable Senator Deschatelets speaks at this time it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I think I should thank all honourable members of this chamber who have taken part in this debate. It was an interesting debate, and the conflicting views that have been expressed are now part of the record.

I am not in a position, of course, to answer the specific questions raised by Senator McCutcheon about the public service staff and Medicare, but I might say we are told that in the near future the Minister of Finance might make some announcement, and I suggest that we wait for this.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I shall wait impatiently.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, it is moved by Honourable Senator Deschatelets, seconded by Honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) that this bill be now read the second time. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, I will keep you for less than three minutes. I regret to say that I left in my office a copy of a newspaper advertisement which I think illustrates the desperation of the Minister of Finance in the position in which he presently finds himself. It is a coloured advertisement, taking up about two-thirds of a page, and it has appeared in all the daily papers. It is in red and yellow, and it advertises Canada Savings Bonds, pointing out that the average rate of interest is the highest that has ever been offered. But, it does more than that. It makes the same sort of claim that certain financial institutions make, that if you leave your money for the full term and do not withdraw your interest, the result of the compounding of the interest will be that you will double your money. The advertisement cries: "Canada Savings Bonds: Double Your Money!" That is very prominent in the advertisement.

I am the last person, as all honourable senators know, to want to see the proliferation of departments. I shall probably speak against the organization or establishment of a department of consumer affairs if a bill setting up such a department comes before this house. On the other hand, should it come, and should it pass, then I think that one of the first things the Registrar General, who it is said will be the minister of the new department, should investigate in the interests of the consumer is that type of advertisement, which leads a person to believe that if he buys a $100 Canada savings bond he will receive $200 in 13 years. The advertisement makes no mention of the fact, not even in small print with an asterisk, that on the following April 30 Mr. Sharp will take a very considerable portion of it back in the form of income tax.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, it is moved by honourable Senator Deschatelets, seconded by honourable Senator Connolly, that this bill be read the third time. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time, on division, and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

6 November 1967

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. J. R. Cartwright, M.C., Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 6th November, at 4.00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,

A. G. Cherrier
Assistant Secretary
to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, in view of the contents of the letter which has just been read by His Honour the Speaker, I suggest that we proceed with the business of the Senate until approximately 3.35, at which time we will recess to enable arrangements to be made so that Royal Assent may take place in this chamber at 4 o'clock as planned. Following Royal Assent, I suggest that we continue with the consideration of the Orders of the Day. I trust this arrangement will be satisfactory to all honourable senators.

NATIONAL AND ROYAL ANTHEMS

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Brand has been substituted for that of Mr. Mandziuk on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the National and Royal Anthems.

SENATE OF CANADA

HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF FIRST SITTING

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, one hundred years ago today, in the thirtieth year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, the Senate of Canada met at this place for the first time.

The British North America Act, passed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom, was sanctioned on May 29, 1867. It authorized the issue of a Proclamation under section 3 of the Act, constituting New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and the provinces of Canada a Dominion under the name of Canada. That Proclamation was duly issued, and it became effective on July 1, 1867.

The centenary of that event was impressively marked in the presence of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II at a ceremony, both religious and civil, on the 1st day of July of this year.

The British North America Act provided specifically for a Senate for the new Dominion, for the appointment of its members, their number, their qualifications, and for the summoning of the first body. I would ask unanimous consent to have incorporated at this point in my remarks a copy of the Proclamation summoning the first body of senators. This Proclamation was issued in Her Majesty's name by Canada's first Governor General, the Right Honourable Charles Stanley, Viscount Monck of Ballytrammon, in the County of Wexford, in the Peerage of Ireland.

I ask also for unanimous consent to place on the record a copy of three pages of the Journals of the Senate for Wednesday, November 6, 1867.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CANADA.

[L. S.] MONCK.

VICTORIA, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, QUEEN, Defender of the Faith, &c., &c., &c.

To Our Beloved and Faithful the Senators of the Dominion of Canada, and the Members elected to serve in the House of Commons of Our said Dominion, summoned and called to a Meeting of the Parliament of Canada, at Our City of Ottawa, on the Second day of the month of November next, to have been commenced and held, and to every of you—GREETING:

A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS the Meeting of Our Parliament of Canada stands prorogued to the Second day of the month of November next, Nevertheless, for certain causes and considerations, We have thought fit further to Prorogue the same to WEDNESDAY, the SIXTH day of the month of NOVEMBER next, so that neither you nor any of you, on the said Second day of November next, at Our City of OTTAWA, to appear are to be held and constrained, for We do will that you and each of you and all others in this behalf interested, that on WEDNESDAY, the SIXTH day of the month of NOVEMBER next, at Our CITY of OTTAWA aforesaid, personally you be and appear for the DESPATCH OF BUSINESS, to treat, do, act and conclude upon those things which in Our said Parliament of Canada, by the Common Council of Our said Dominion, may by the favor of God be ordained.

IN TESTIMONY WHEREOF, we have caused these our Letters to be made Patent, and the Great Seal of Canada to be hereunto affixed: WITNESS, Our Right Trusty and Well-Beloved Cousin, the Right Honorable CHARLES STANLEY, VISCOUNT MONCK, Baron MONCK of Ballytrammon, in the County of Wexford, in the Peerage of Ireland, and Baron MONCK of Ballytrammon, in the County of Wexford, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Governor General of Canada, &c., &c., &c. At Our Government House, in Our City of Ottawa, in Our said Dominion, this Thirtieth day of September, in the year of Our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven, and in the thirty-first year of Our Reign.

By Command,

EDOUARD J. LANGEVIN,
Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, Canada.

To John Fennings Taylor, Esq.,
Clerk of the Senate of Canada, Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): This extract shows that 70 senators had been summoned, made up of 24 from Ontario, 24 from Quebec, 12 from Nova Scotia, and 10 at that time from New Brunswick, and of that number 57 attended the first sitting and had their commissions read.

A reading of their names alone conjures up the memory of events significant of the momentous, courageous step which our political progenitors took a century and more ago. Behind them was the experience of parliamentary deadlock in the Legislature of the old Province of Canada. They had surmounted the difficulties presented, and the reluctance in certain quarters of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to join the new Dominion. The road through the Charlottetown Conference, the Conference at Quebec, the meetings in London, and the drafting of the new federal Constitution had been successfully negotiated.

They had dared to create with their fellow parliamentarians then in the House of Commons a new nationality, a new nation, on the northern half of the North American continent. They were gratified, they were optimistic, they were sanguine that one day their Parliament would have dominion from sea to sea. In the hundred years that have intervened 623 persons have been summoned to the Senate, including nine ladies.

John Fennings Taylor was the first Clerk of the Senate, Rene Kimber was the first Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, and that day the commission appointing the Honourable Joseph Edouard Cauchon to be first Speaker of the Senate was read. His portrait, along with those of his successors, hangs in our corridors.

On the following day, Thursday, November 7, the Speech from the Throne was delivered here by the Governor General, Viscount Monck. It was a short speech and I shall quote from but one paragraph, one which emphasizes the caution with which the first parliamentary steps were taken. He said:

> In a spirit of respect for your privileges, as a free and self-governing people, the Act of Union as adopted by the Imperial Parliament, imposes the duty and confers upon you the right of reducing to practice the system of Government, which it has called into existence, of consolidating its institutions, harmonizing its administrative details, and of making such legislative provisions as will secure to a constitution, in some respects novel, a full, fair and uprejudiced trial.

The motion to adopt the Address was moved on Monday, November 11, by Senator George William Allan, a Toronto lawyer, educated at Upper Canada College, who had been mayor of his native city. He was in the Legislative Council in 1858 and was appointed at the age of 36. He was Speaker of the Senate from 1888 to 1891. He died in 1901 after a life of public service and of wide scholarly interests and attainments. I should like to quote a short portion of the peroration of his speech in which he moved the adoption of the Address. He said in part:

> Peace, quietness and security reign within our borders, and we have a future before us of which any people might be proud. But it rests with ourselves, honourable gentlemen, to make or mar that future. Let a spirit of sectionalism prevail, let party strife grow rampant, and all our brilliant anticipations may end in disappointment. But if we strive to conduct our affairs in a spirit of > moderation and mutual forbearance... we shall render the great work of Union which has been achieved, a blessing to ourselves and our posterity, and a fresh starting point in the moral, political, and material advancement of the people of Canada.

The seconder of the Address was the Honourable Jonathan McCully of Nova Scotia, one of the Fathers of Confederation. In Senator McCully's teaching days in Cumberland county, Charles Tupper, later to be a Prime Minister, was one of his pupils. He practised law in Amherst. Later, he was the Government Leader of the Upper House in Nova Scotia. He was Editor of the Morning Chronicle and Nova Scotian, and he was succeeded in that office by the Honourable Joseph Howe. He remained in the Senate until 1870, when he accepted an appointment to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia.

The only other senator to speak on the Address was Donald McDonald, civil engineer, born in the State of New York, educated at Upper Canada College and who, I am informed, made many of the early maps of Upper Canada. He was a Liberal member of the Assembly for Tecumseh from 1858. He died in 1879.

Senator McDonald, at that first real debate, made some remarks about the role of the Senate, an experimental chamber then, which merit quotation. He said, in part:

> For though we sustain no direct representative relation to defined constituencies, I cannot divest myself on the conviction that, as part of the machinery of the Government, this Chamber is bound to consult the aggregate of the people's will not slavishly, indeed, in the sense of delegates accountable to particular districts, but as distinguished from the idea which in other days attached to a Crown nominated body. We are placed in a position which relieves us from the temptation to surrender our own judgment to the demands of momentary prejudice or passion, but which in my opinion in no degree entitles us to be indifferent to the sober, well-matured requirements of the people... Thus viewed, however, it seems to me that our functions may be exercised most usefully—not as registrars of executive opinion on one hand, nor servile echoes of fleeting popular feeling on the other, but as the balance-wheel of this Government, guiding always, obstructing never, and in all things manifesting a superiority to the promptings of an angry partisanship.

And with those words, the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne was voted in one day, after three speeches.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is the way it should be.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The Leader of the Government in the Senate at that time was Sir Alexander Campbell. He had been Sir John Macdonald's law partner in Kingston; he was Canada's first Postmaster General and he sat in this chamber holding that portfolio. After 1878 he held various portfolios in the Government of his day, five in all, and in 1887 he became Lieutenant Governor of Ontario.

The Leader of the Opposition of that day was the Honourable Peter Mitchell, a man of Scottish descent, from the County of Northumberland, New Brunswick. He was a shipbuilder. He had formed a government in New Brunswick in 1866 with the Honourable R.D. Wilmot. He attended the Quebec meeting on Confederation in 1864, as well as the London Conference in 1866. He resigned from the Senate in 1872, ran for the House of Commons in Northumberland and he was returned in that year by acclamation.

Honourable senators, in this great centennial year we have been reviewing our history, we have been enumerating our achievements, we have been counting our numbers, our wealth and our progress. We have been, indeed, also counting all our blessings.

Today, in a special way, we honour the parliamentary institutions under which our development has been fashioned, the people who have molded those institutions to our Canadian requirements.

Today especially we take a long look back, but we can also take a long look ahead. Let us look ahead in optimism, for our progress, our peace and above all for our unity.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the most important problem facing us today is the question of national unity. We can and should ensure the existence of our national unity for the sake of our prosperity and that of future generations.

Diversity is for us the source of much wealth. This wealth comes to us from various sections of our immense country; the fact is universally recognized. However, what is most important, our greatest wealth comes from the diversity of our people with respect to language, race, creed and culture. It is such differences as I have just mentioned which will ensure the development and progress of our country.

[English]

I have been speaking momentarily about national unity. This unity, honourable senators, we can have—together with all the good things that go with it—for ourselves and for our children. And we shall have it, if tolerance, patience, forbearance and understanding—with all our diversities of language, race, creed, culture, and religion, perhaps our greatest wealth—becomes, under the guiding hand of Divine Providence the hallmark of our national life.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, we are all indebted to the Leader of the Government for having put on the record the circumstances and the names of those who made history at that first sitting of Canadian Parliament, on November 6, 1867. As I said, he mentioned some names and, especially, that of the first Speaker of this house, honourable Senator Joseph Edouard Cauchon, who had the great honour of coming from the old city of Quebec, my home town. A rather unusual thing is that the second Speaker of the Senate, another Quebecker, was the Honourable P. J. O. Chauveau, who had previously been the first Quebec premier at the time of Confederation. Honourable Mr. Cauchon, on the other hand, was later lieutenant governor of Manitoba.

One hundred years is not a long time in the life of a people. Yet, much ground has been covered, many changes have taken place since November 6, 1867 when the first of the 27 parliaments Canada has known in the course of its first century met for the first time. A country barely out of colonialism was taking its first faltering steps.

Today, the Canadian people, six times more numerous, offer the world the picture of a society endowed with all the advantages of scientific progress and which, especially in the last fifty years, has achieved a standard of living second only to that of our neighbours to the south.

We must recognize that we have been lucky since 1867; we have had no revolution, no change in government brought about by force; our territory has not only remained intact but six other provinces have joined the four that formed Canada; we have been unscathed by war, even though we did participate in the last two world conflicts. How many countries, how many nations have had a comparable history? Yes, indeed, let us recognize our good fortune, while being aware, at the same time, of our problems which, for less fortunate countries—and they are in a large majority—may appear as refinements and luxuries, yet remain very real and serious, as far as we are concerned. As we all know, they have arisen mainly from an industrial and scientific revolution within a highly culturally developed and economically prosperous society.

Even the present great constitutional debate, which stresses the problem of relations between our French-speaking and English-speaking fellow citizens, which problem seems to me the most significant today, as pointed out earlier by the Leader of the Government, appears to be the result of the considerable advances of the French-speaking group during recent years, which incite them to strive for their rightful place within our Canadian society, so that they may feel truly at home and fully accepted throughout Canada. Let us acknowledge those problems, and especially this particular one.

[English]

Honourable senators, in his excellent biography of the leading architect of Confederation and Canada's first Prime Minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, Professor Donald Creighton describes the scene on November 7, the day after the opening of Parliament, as follows:

> On Thursday afternoon November 7, 1867, Macdonald, along with the other members of the Commons, stood waiting expectantly and somewhat nervously in the Senate chamber of the Parliament Buildings at Ottawa. The Governor-General, Lord Monck, was reading the Speech from the Throne to the first federal Parliament of Canada. The legislative history of the new Dominion was about to commence. Outside, though the season was far advanced in autumn, the day was fine. Most of the shops in town were shut. A great crowd had pressed behind the rows of regulars and militia which lined the carriage drive up to the > great central door of the building and, inside, in the Senate chamber the galleries were crowded with people. Behind the rows of senators, nearly a hundred ladies, the wives and daughters of the members, gay in crinoline toilettes, watched the ceremony: and, out in front, close to the Governor-General's chair, a little group of seats had been specially reserved for Lady Monck and the wives of the cabinet ministers.

Honourable senators, if we were to look only at this picture, it would appear that the situation has not changed very much in this our first century. We have, of course, and rightly so, preserved some of the best traditions of our parliamentary system. And I feel that Parliament can rightly take pride in the achievements which this country can claim in its first century of history. However, as I have mentioned, because we can be proud of the achievements of our people, of our country and of our system of Government, it does not mean that we should just remain idle today. On this occasion, the hundredth anniversary of the opening of Parliament, we must recognize the very serious problems which are facing us.

As far as the Senate is concerned, let me say a few things. Almost from its inception—and I think it will be found in the excerpts which the Leader has put on Hansard today relating to the first debate of the Senate—the Senate has been the subject of criticism, some valid, some spurious. At the Quebec Conference of 1864 the question of representation in this chamber became one of the main reasons why Canada was deprived of the contribution of Prince Edward Islanders for several years. At the London Conference of 1867 the Senate and the question of its powers and functions almost became the shoal on which the agreement reached at Quebec ran aground.

The Fathers of Confederation were convinced that an Upper Chamber would have a useful function in Canadian parliamentary life. I am convinced—and I have said this frequently—that history has shown that their view was correct and that there is a continuing need for such a body as the Senate. To say this is not to deny that changes in the work performed by the Senate should perhaps be made.

Writing in 1926 Professor Robert A. MacKay, in his book The Unreformed Senate of Canada, said at page 206:

> Probably on no other public question in Canada has there been such unanimity of opinion as on that of the necessity for Senate reform. Opinion has differed, however, as to the means. This difficulty of agreement has been increased because, for the most part, critics have not taken into consideration the actual work which the Senate performs. Neither have they always understood the position which a second chamber can occupy in parliamentary Government nor the position of the Senate as part of the federation compact.

Professor MacKay went on to say in words which are as true today as when he wrote them:

> A thorough analysis of the problem from all three sides is a prerequisite to any satisfactory solution.

Since 1926 many reforms have been carried out. I have said before that it is my conviction that means must be found to increase and diversify the work which we perform. I am still of this view.

Over the years since November 7, 1867, many men of great ability have graced the Upper Chamber and those who are here today are no less capable than their predecessors. It is my belief that, given the opportunity, these talents and abilities can be of use to Canada in our second century of Confederation.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I will simply add this: we are justified in taking pride in the achievements of the past, but we must not, however, refuse to face today's problems. Whatever the credit our parliamentary system can claim for the results which we have achieved during the first century of Canada, we must not, because of that, refuse to accept the required changes, refuse to adjust to today's needs in order better to face this coming second century.

[English]

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Mr. Speaker and honourable colleagues, first let me congratulate the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) and the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn) for the excellent speeches they have made, and in which they have expressed our views about matters of historical and constitutional importance. If the first senators to have been appointed and whose names are included in the Proclamation of Queen Victoria were alive today, they probably would be retired, but they would be proud of their successors. They would realize that the Senate of 1967 is at least as good as the Senate of 1867.

That, honourable senators, is the first point I wish to make. I say this because I hold my colleagues in the chamber in great esteem and admiration, and I never miss an opportunity to express my views about the importance of the Senate.

Naturally, there are some people who would not have refused an appointment to the Senate and who are quite critical about it because they have never received an appointment. This explains the kind of talk of university professors who suggest reforms in a vague manner, without indicating what those reforms should be. It is the easiest thing to call for reform as an abstraction, without crossing the t's or dotting the i's. This is useless talk which is often taken seriously, because those who make that kind of criticism and those suggestions are overrated intellectually and mentally. As I name no one, I cannot offend anyone; but it applies to all of them, without any distinction.

It is a real pleasure for me to know and to notice the accomplishments of the Senate, and they are achieved in an unassuming manner, as a matter of course. I must tell my colleagues today that I have the highest regard for their sense of duty and for the unexaggerated dignity that prevails in this chamber. It is remarkable to think that whenever a member has to leave the chamber for any reason, and misses a speech, he or she excuses himself or herself to the senator who is speaking for not having listened to his speech, which is read afterwards and commented upon as one sees fit.

In spite of any criticism which may come from any quarter, the Senate of Canada will survive, and will survive for ever, because it is a necessary brake on the House of Commons, as was the intention of the Fathers of Confederation. The Senate is composed of members appointed from the various parts of the country, to supervise and control the legislation that comes from the House of Commons, and we do it in this chamber and in the various committees as well. But it was in the minds of the Fathers of Confederation that there should never be any party line or any "China wall" dividing the members appointed by different parties to the Senate; and I do not see any reason why the same fraternity that is admired in the sittings of the committees does not always prevail in the sittings of this chamber. Probably the first senators of 1867 were just as partisan as we may be, although we deny being partisan. Perhaps they were not; they were certainly very good men.

If there is any reform of the Senate needed—and I believe there is—it should not be effected by outsiders; we should perform it ourselves. We sit here and know the Senate much better than any outsider could. I am not going to speak at length because of the ceremonies that are to take place this afternoon, but we do consider all pieces of legislation, check them and correct them, and we are not to take legislation for granted merely because it comes before us. There are wrongs to correct which we can do ourselves, and we can do that superbly.

I have something to say about the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but I will wait until tomorrow.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. John J. Connolly tabled:

Copies of letter, dated October 24, 1967, addressed by the Minister of Finance to provincial Ministers holding similar portfolios with reference to a suggested federal-provincial meeting. (English and French texts).

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada on Co-operative Credit Societies for the year ended December 31, 1966, pursuant to section 56 of the Co-operative Credit Association Act, chapter 28, Statutes of Canada 1952-53. (English and French texts).

REFUND OF FEES

THE WOMAN'S AUXILIARY OF THE ANGLICAN CHURCH OF CANADA

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That the parliamentary fee paid on a proposed bill respecting "The Woman's Auxiliary of The Anglican Church of Canada", be refunded to the petitioners.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Senators: Explain!

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I will be glad to explain the reason for this motion.

The Women's Auxiliary was incorporated in 1908, at the request of the women of the Anglican Church. This act has been amended twice since, and by the last amendment the name was changed to The Women's Auxiliary of the Anglican Church of Canada. In June 1966 a meeting of this group took place in Victoria, British Columbia, and at this time a resolution was passed which provided that this organization shall be called Anglican Church Women. The petition was presented to the Senate asking to have this change of name made. At the time the petition was presented the usual fee of $200 was paid.

It was subsequently ascertained that as a result of a recent amendment to the Corporations Act, which was passed in 1966, this matter should have been dealt with by the Corporations Branch, which is under the Registrar General. This is now being done, and the motion is for the return of the $200 fee paid in error.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, I noted that Senator Fergusson pronounced the name of this organization the "Women's Auxiliary." This seems to me to be correct, although it is written "Woman's"—the singular with an apostrophe "s". I take it that that is correct? There are organizations that have in their names the word "Women's" and not "Woman's".

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: It is "Woman's"; I am sorry.

Motion agreed to.

CORRECTION OF STATEMENT

Hon. P. Desruisseaux: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, for clarification purposes I should like to mention that, when I spoke last Thursday on the matter of currency, with regard to Bill S-23, I was correctly reported, on page 356 of the official report, Hansard as having said:

> —to speculation in some quarters that it might be useful for a foreign country, for instance—

With your permission, honourable senators, I simply want to insert the following words: "for individuals of a foreign country." There is a difference. Due to a slip of the tongue, I only said "foreign country" and for clarification purposes I request that this correction be made.

Some hon. Senators: Agreed.

[English]

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable John Robert Cartwright, M.C. Chief Justice of Canada, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:

>
> I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting and honouring the Honourable John Robert Cartwright, Chief Justice of Canada, his Deputy, to do in His Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by the Clerk.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

> An Act respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.
>
> An Act respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.
> An Act to amend the Canada Corporations Act.

The Honourable Lucien Lamoureux, Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

> The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1968.

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bill.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF FIRST SITTING OF SENATE OF CANADA

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was then pleased to address Parliament with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

We are assembled here today on an historic occasion to participate in an act which is rooted in tradition.

On this day, one hundred years ago, the Parliament of Canada sat for the first time. On the following day the first Governor General of Canada, Viscount Monck, opened the first session of the First Parliament of the newly formed Confederation. The new national capital had witnessed on July 1, 1867, a ceremony which was the culmination of the discussions that had taken place in Charlottetown and Quebec. Deliberations could now begin on bills which, in due course, would become the first statutes of Canada.

Federal union had been accomplished and the members of that First Parliament were called upon to address their attention to the complex problems of nation-building. A century later and in the midst of the Twenty-Seventh Parliament, we reflect with gratitude and with justifiable pride on what has been achieved.

With courage, imagination and brawn, Canadians have come to grips with the challenge of geography and economics. Incredible distances have been spanned and the vast and rich resources of the land have been extensively developed. The problems of environment have obliged us to be pre-occupied during the greater part of the past one hundred years with physical needs, but recent years have witnessed a cultural explosion in Canada, bringing with it a flowering of creative talent.

We have many things to celebrate in this centennial year. Not the least of these is the effectiveness of our form of government. It is our good fortune and our proud boast that we in Canada enjoy a long heritage of freedom. Our democratic process is at once a recognition and a safeguard of the dignity of man.

The origins of Parliament lie far in the past, but the process of law-making as we know it today was not realized at a single stroke. Successive generations struggled to gain a commanding voice in their own affairs and to bring an end to the exercise of arbitrary power. Our forefathers had a lively awareness of that struggle and the determination to preserve what had been so dearly won.
