That interest deduction loophole which exists in the tax system should have been closed. If it had closed these loopholes that in itself would have freed up something like $4 billion to $6 billion in new resources that we could use to get people back to work and to cut taxes, not for corporations but for working people and middle-class people in this country, the people who have been hit so hard by the goods and services tax of which this government boasts.

• (1650)

We could have done something about the family trust loophole about which my colleague, our tax policy critic, has been talking so effectively in the House of Commons. That loophole was supposed to run out as of 1993, but the Conservative government, as usual listening to its rich and wealthy friends, has decided to extend it. The Liberals started it. The Conservatives continued it. Only New Democrats will end it and give us tax fairness.

If we had this kind of tax fairness we would not have the deficit in front of us that we have at the moment. We would not have the number of people out of work that we have at the moment. We would not have the disastrous economic conditions which are damaging people from coast to coast to coast. We could have dealt with tax loopholes. That is one thing the government should have done in this economic statement.

The second thing it should have done was recognize what many countries in the world have come to see. The cold war is over. Having a defence budget for our country that is as large or larger than it was two years ago is simply senseless. We have a defence budget of over $12 billion. There is no way to justify a defence budget that is just as large now as it was when there was a supposed massive military threat from the Warsaw pact and the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union, in case the government has not noticed, has dissolved; the Warsaw pact has broken up. The various countries that we thought of as enemies are now our allies in many cases.

The threat to people in this country is not from the Soviet Union; it is from the government.

We needed to see in this economic statement a cut in defence expenditures which had some seriousness, a cut not of $200 and some million this year and $200 and some million next year but a cut of some $2 billion. That starts to give this country a defence budget of some significance, yes, but of some proportion to our size and what we can contribute in the world. We should have seen that in the economic statement.

We should also have seen a deliberate plan set out to reduce interest rates in Canada. If we had interest rates in Canada which were three percentage points less than they presently are we would free up resources to help with new jobs, to help in tax cuts, of close to $4.5 billion.

If we add these various possibilities—closing tax loopholes, cutting defence expenditures and reducing interest rates—we would have had savings that could have been announced by this government of something on the order of $11 billion to $12 billion. I hardly need to say that $11 billion to $12 billion could have made some real reductions in the deficit. There would have been some money left over to provide tax breaks for people in Canada, some money left over to provide help for those who are out of work. We should have taken that $11 billion to $12 billion and used some of it for deficit reduction but used much of it for a real program of economic recovery.

It could have been a Canadian economic recovery strategy that stressed environmental upgrading for our cities and that stressed social housing for people who are so poorly housed in many cities throughout Canada. It could have been an approach that said: "Let us have some tax cuts as the first step to getting rid of the GST".

We do not need a goods and services tax in Canada. It is an unfair tax. It is a tax that hurts small business. It is a tax we can get rid of if we close some of those tax loopholes and get a fair taxation system.

We should have seen a national investment fund launched by the government, a fund which would do something to see to it that money actually got to small businesses that needed it and could not get it from the banks these days. We should have seen to it that money was available for communities to help keep companies operating which were facing problems and being shut down by their foreign parents in the United States. We could have kept those companies going. We could have kept them active and employing Canadians if we would have had in Canada a national investment fund to provide venture capital and to provide real help on an investment basis, combining both government help and private sector help to see to it that companies were kept operating in Canada instead of being shut down by their parent companies.

Instead of boasting about NAFTA and what North American free trade was going to do for us, the Minister of Finance should have stood today and said: "We suspend all further discussion of NAFTA. We are not going to damage the Canadian economy further in 1992". If we had seen that, we would have seen a chance for people, workers and even many small business people in the country to have felt some sense of security, some sense of potential in their businesses and in their jobs in the future. They would therefore have gone out and spent some money. They would have invested some money and we would have had extra jobs in the country.

We also need a new approach to trade that does not just see our role as a country, our future as a country in tying ourselves to the United States and tying ourselves to Mexico but sees ourselves as an internationally competitive country with a strategy to build up Canadian based operations to be able to export successfully throughout the world and be able to build up jobs in the country for Canadians.

We could have had it stressed in the statement by more examples of Canadian content being put into effect in various sectors of the economy.

• (1700)

For instance, a group appeared before us this morning from McDonnell-Douglas aircraft in Toronto. It said that the government was prepared to help, if it was prepared to give money to Canadian Airlines to stay aflight then: "We are not going to argue with that, but if the government is prepared to provide money to Canadian Airlines", these people for McDonnell-Douglas Canada said to us, "it should be prepared to require Canadian to buy Canadian in terms of the aircraft it uses".

It could have been part of any loan agreement that was established. There are all sorts of other conditions in that loan agreement. It could have been part of the agreement that there would have to be Canadian content in every future aircraft purchase that Canadian Airlines makes.

I fly back and forth to Windsor every weekend in a Brazilian aircraft. I find it interesting. They make good aircraft. Frankly I would rather that aircraft were Canadian and providing jobs to Canadians than providing jobs to Brazil. If we are providing the money to Canadian Airlines, we should be insisting on conditions that mean jobs for Canada and jobs for Canadians, just as is the case in the present auto pact which has been important for my community and for other communities throughout Ontario.

When government itself makes purchases it should insist on making, wherever it can, its purchases of goods and services from Canadians to provide opportunities for Canada, to provide opportunities for some of those 1.6 million people who are out of work in this country to get back to work.

We must also recognize that many people in this country have been hard hit by this government's economic policies. We must see to it that we maintain the values and commitments to support those people that have always been part of the Canadian heritage. Instead of cutting back benefits to unemployment insurance recipients, we should be extending those benefits in this period of high unemployment so that those people have money and the money can be used to help this economy, to help small businesses and to help the rest of the economy as well.

The government has decided on a whole lot of different approaches. It has some measures to help small business. We support those. It is sensible to assist small business. We have been calling for that for many years. I have to say it is a bit unfair when small business owners are told that they will get a premium holiday for new people that they hire as far as unemployment insurance premiums are concerned but the workers who will be hired are told that they will have to pay those premiums even though their employers will not. That is not even-handed and fair.

We have some tax changes to the RRSP system which helped the co-operative movement. My friend from Prince Albert will be particularly pleased to see those. I am pleased to see them too because we have long argued that there should be some fairness, some equity for people who are forming co-operatives.

There are as well some initiatives on infrastructure. It is interesting when we look through the initiatives on infrastructure that there are a lot in different parts of the country but it is very hard to find any in Ontario. I wonder if that could have anything to do with the quarrels about the nature of this infrastructure initiative that have been taking place between the provincial Government of Ontario and the federal government. I wonder if this government is not punishing Ontario for insisting on an infrastructure strategy that would be beneficial to the whole country, not just to parts of the country.

Finally, there are two parts of this package which are especially shameful. There is a reduction in unemployment insurance support at a time when there are more people out of work in this country, more people out of work in Ontario, than we have seen since the 1930s. Yet, what does the government do? It reduces the level of support for people receiving unemployment insurance from 60 per cent of their earnings to 57 per cent of their earnings.

It goes further. It says: "If people are dismissed for misconduct". Who decides what misconduct is? If they are dismissed for misconduct they will not get unemployment insurance. I look forward to various unemployed people coming to the Conservative members of this House and their constituency offices and saying: "I am out of work. My boss says that I was somehow guilty of some misconduct and the result is I cannot get any unemployment insurance".

An hon. member: After you have paid into it.

An hon. member: And the boss does not pay.

Mr. Langdon: After they have paid those insurance premiums for years and years and years.

An hon. member: That is sickening.

Mr. Langdon: Let these Conservative MPs explain to their constituents why they have put such a vicious, nasty hook into the unemployment insurance system.

What is the consequence of all this? The consequence is, believe it or not, an unemployment rate at the end of the next fiscal year which will still be 11 per cent or higher. That is tragic. The Minister of Finance spoke the other day about how we were in an economic recovery. How could he pretend to the people of Canada that this is an economic recovery if there is still going to be 11 per cent unemployment in March 1994? That is not recovery, that is still economic disaster for far too many people in this country.

The Minister of Finance has talked about a gentle nudge forward for the economy as being what he expected to provide with this statement. What he has done is kicked the people of Canada in the stomach with this economic statement. He has given the people of Canada a series of cutbacks that will cost 3,000 to 4,000 jobs in the Public Service and a series of vicious changes to the unemployment insurance system which will make life much harder for those who are out of work.

On top of all of that, he has given us the laughable arithmetic that tells us he has reduced the deficit from the $22.5 billion he projected in February this year to a remarkably miraculous level of $32.6 billion which he now says will be the deficit for next year.

This is a government that has seen its day. It is a government that has got to go. It is a government which for the sake of this country should be gone. It is a government which clearly, in bringing forth a mini budget, has simply presented us with mini ideas, presented us with no plan for the future, no plan for unemployment, and no plan for economic progress for this country.

There is no plan for a trade strategy that will help us to regain our independence, so much of which we have lost with the free trade agreement. This is a government which has given us nothing but pain in this budget.

It has given us nothing but pain and a kind of tragic comic performance as the Minister of Finance tries to persuade us that he is being fiscally responsible when he has created this intolerable recession, hurt millions of people across this country and will leave Canada in far worse shape economically and financially when this government is defeated, as indeed it must be defeated in 1993.

There is an alternative. I have tried to set it out in some detail. It is an alternative which will work and, more important, it is an alternative which will get Canadians back to work. I urge this government to even today withdraw this laughable economic statement.

Tell us: "We are sorry. We apologize to the House for bringing this joke before Parliament. We will bring a new budget to you in December". In the meantime, let us adjourn this House of Commons. Let us let this government go and think for a while.

If it thinks things through right it may even recognize that the proper course of action for it to take is to stand up today and resign as the Government of Canada.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard two sorry responses from the NDP and from the Liberals. There has been lots of bluster, lots of rhetoric, and lots of hand wringing but no new ideas. There were no specifics but only a throw back to the policies of the 1960s and 1970s. They were vintage policies that have not improved with age.

The Liberal critic says he would spend. He gave us some ideas about how he would spend. He gave us some ideas about why he disagreed with the reductions in spending that we have brought in. That is the difference. He has opposed every way that we have proposed as to how we would keep this government's spending on track.

It would be folly to follow the approaches that the Liberals have set out because they would lead to an increase in the deficit, an increase in interest rates, a slam on business confidence and they would kill the economy.

He is saying he wants to have some compassion, some help and some hope but is that going to come for an economy that has been killed by high interest rates, because that is precisely the result of the policies that he is putting forward?

What is needed now is a vision of the future, an understanding of the type of world that we are in today. We need a vision of an economy built on greater training, greater research and development, greater investment, stronger small business and a greater opportunity to expand internationally.

This is what the Minister of Finance has put forward today. We have heard words from the Liberals and we have heard wishes, but we have heard no new ideas. This is a government that is dedicated to action. The Official Opposition is tired, it is devoid of ideas and that is a fundamental difference between the message from the Minister of Finance and the tired statement from the Liberal finance critic.

The response of the New Democratic Party is equally unrealistic. It is following the same policies which the New Democratic Party in Ontario found—

An hon. member: Throw money at it.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My friend opposite does not like me talking about this but the NDP in Ontario found that its policies did not work. Listen to Bob Rae today. He is saying: "I have learned a lot in government. I have learned that we cannot do all the things that maybe we liked to talk about in 15 years in opposition". Now we are seeing the U-turn. We are seeing the NDP in Ontario scrambling to cover its mistakes, cutting hospitals, cutting schools, cutting universities, cutting social programs, having to face reality because it started off on the wrong foot and had a 13 per cent increase in spending in its first year on top of five or six years of 10 per cent increases in spending by the Ontario Liberal Party.

It is no surprise that we are getting these policies from the NDP. They are still living in the past. The Leader of the New Democratic Party has written about this. She has talked in glowing terms about the successes of the Swedish economy, the so-called third way that the New Democratic Party has been championing, but more recently Sweden is coming back to reality as well. It has found that the real world is something that it cannot hide from.

I want to quote from the Economist of November 28: "Many Swedes may now prefer to go back to their old shell", something we just heard now, "That would be a mistake", it says. "Even in a closed economy, a retreat to high taxes and high inflation would only make matters worse. But the world economy is growing ever more integrated: With capital and skills freer to move, Sweden cannot go back to its old ways without seeing both sorts of assets leak abroad. The third way, if it ever really existed, is no longer there".

We have just heard from the NDP about the third way. Both opposition parties simply do not understand what is happening in the world today. This recovery is slow. The Minister of Finance has acknowledged that. But it is slow because there is a significant amount of restructuring going on in the economy today and it is the same the world over as business changes and adjusts to the challenges of the 1990s and beyond. Stimulating the economy today through more spending is not the answer. Encouraging and assisting the change that must occur is the proper role of government and that is what the Minister of Finance has put before the House and the Canadian people today.

I am honoured to be a part of this debate to talk about the government's vision for the Canadian economy in the 1990s and beyond and what is needed to get there. It is a vision of a new vibrantly competitive Canadian economy prospering in the new global economy. It is a vision that focuses on investing in growth for the long term as previous generations of Canadians have done for us, but it also takes account of the fiscal realities and the global competitive realities of the world today.

This is a vision that is shared by Canadians throughout this country. We found that in the 186 communities that the Prosperity Initiative visited over the course of the past year, and we listened to these ideas coming forth from Canadians. These ideas are represented in a large fashion in the message that has been delivered by the Minister of Finance today. This dialogue has resulted in a remarkable consensus about Canadians. Read the Prosperity Initiative. Read the steering group report. It sets out clearly the consensus that Canadians put forth to the steering group and that we have listened very carefully to and have reflected in the message today.

Canadians are telling governments to stop trying to direct the private sector and instead do our traditional jobs better by investing in people and making sure that we get it right so that all Canadians can enjoy the benefit of a high skill economy by creating the right investment climate, by building the public infrastructure that only governments can provide, by opening trading markets internationally so that we can compete and win on a global scale, and by investing in sound monetary and fiscal policies, by remembering that governments exist to serve Canadians and hence rediscovering our clients, the taxpayers, and serving them more efficiently.

Finally, we must stop the incessant quarrelling among our stakeholders and start collaborating, building partnerships, and finding the best way of doing things.

The economic statement we just heard today goes directly to the heart of what governments should be doing to improve the long-term climate for growth in this country. It is not enough for the opposition parties to bluster and wring their hands about weak growth and high unemployment. Those are facts of life in many countries of the world today. What we have to do now is find how we move from here in the most effective way possible because all Canadians and all people on both sides of the House are concerned about these problems.

The debate is about the respective visions that we have for the future of our country. Unlike the NDP and the Liberals today ours is not a vision of an economy that is force-fed by the government. It is a vision of an economy of the future where government motivates productive activity by entrepreneurs, innovators and people building their skills and by business people competing internationally.

This is the economy that we will build in the 1990s and beyond. It is an economy that is totally unknown, unfortunately for our friends opposite. They simply do not understand the reality of the world that we live in.

The prosperity consultations hammered home, hopefully in a way that even the opposition could understand, that there is a need to keep our fiscal house in order and to strive for a tax system that contributes to a dynamic and growing economy. The statement follows a fiscally responsible course because that is the only way we are going to get interest rates down in a way that can serve the development of this economy.

There are no new taxes in this economic statement and this is not the first time. There were no tax increases in the 1991 budget. There were tax reductions in the 1992 budget and again in this economic statement so that Canadians could invest in growth and see this country build.

The tax reductions that were announced by the Minister of Finance today will improve the competitiveness of Canadian companies. However, provincial governments have to build on and not offset these measures if Canadian companies are to adequately grow, prosper and create the high paying, quality jobs that we all want to see in this House. The difference on this side, though, is that we put in a statement the specific actions needed to create those high paying jobs.

It is particularly important for provincial governments to follow the same approach because there is only one taxpayer. As the federal government reduces the tax burden it would be particularly counter-productive for any province to raise its taxes in any form. This is a particularly strong recommendation that comes forward from the prosperity action plan.

Investing in growth has to start with small business. This is a vital sector of the Canadian economy. It has created some 80 per cent of the jobs created since 1984.

To encourage new jobs and expansion the government will pay the unemployment insurance premium costs for new employees for the vast majority of small businesses in 1993. That will save employers some $500 million to expand their employment and their production and to encourage investment and machinery and equipment. These are crucial areas for the competitiveness of small businesses.

There will be a 10 per cent tax credit from now until the end of next year. There will be a new small business financing program to help firms reduce their borrowing costs. That will be extended to the end of 1994. The Small Businesses Loans Act has been expanded in a way that will help these small businesses to expand.

The importance of research and development in the prosperity consultations was another thing that we heard about on an ongoing basis. People recognize that Canada has one of the most generous tax systems for research and development in the world today. However, this has to be put in the context of its importance for our future prosperity by shifting rapidly to high valued-added products either in traditional industries or in new growth sectors.

In the 1992 budget we improved on this tax regime. However, we found since then, based on our consultations, that we could do better here. This is what the Minister of Finance has proposed by earmarking a further $500 million on top of the $230 million in the last budget. It is to improve the tax treatment of equipment like computers that become obsolete quickly due to rapid technological change and some other initiatives.

Innovation based on research and development and technology adoption needs more than just tax incentives. It needs new forms of infrastructure. Building and maintaining infrastructure is one of the government's most essential roles. Here we have some important announcements again from the Minister of Finance. The infrastructure includes roads, bridges and water treatment plants. It also means the new infrastructure that goes beyond physical capital and hardware and includes soft infrastructure like information and research networks.

Funding for the Canadian network for the advancement of research, industry and education, the CANARIE project, will enable the development of a state of the art, high speed, high capacity data communications network to transmit information across this country. It will be a true electronic highway of the future. This is absolutely critical for the research institutions of our country today and one of the recommendations of the prosperity action plan.

In response to the clear message that we heard in the consultations, the adoption and adaptation of technology by Canadian industry has to accelerate. We will extend the Industrial Research Assistance Program, or IRAP, offered by the National Research Council. That currently provides technical advice and counselling to roughly 10,000 firms every year and financial support to about one-third of those firms to introduce technological innovations to their businesses.

This is a particularly important program. We will consolidate the delivery of the government's technology diffusion programs within IRAP. That will go a long way toward the implementation of the vision that we have as a government of a national technology extension system. This is particularly important for the small business community.

There is a commitment to total quality management here that is also important which I want to mention, because this commitment to quality must go hand in hand with the technologically advanced economy.

The response we have given here is consistent with what the prosperity initiative recommended to us. It is a national quality initiative with a Canadian network of total quality institutions. It brings together those people in the business and educational communities, plus the Conference Board of Canada, in a network to encourage the dissemination of these ideas in helping small business adopt these ideas and bring themselves into the world of quality which is absolutely essential to the competitive position of the Canadian economy.

In terms of regulatory reform, not all taxes are transparent or collected. There are other types of taxes and I am talking about the hidden tax burden of regulation. The Minister of Finance has set out very clearly what we have been doing here since his 1992 budget. Two hundred and fifty regulations have been reviewed and 50 per cent will be amended, sunsetted or eliminated.

The review has now been extended to 17 other departments and six agencies. There will be new rules for federal regulators and this will be done in consultation with the private sector in a way that will result in an effective reduction of this burden of regulation.

I will talk about opening markets for Canadian business. Tomorrow, I will be meeting with the provinces to talk about the reduction and elimination of the interprovincial barriers to trade. This is very consistent with what we have been doing in the NAFTA negotiations and the free trade negotiations as we open up our markets into the United States and into Mexico. We have done well under this.

I spoke in the House on Tuesday about how well we have been doing in increasing our business into that market. As the Minister of Finance has pointed out, it is the combination of access to that market and reduction in the costs to our manufacturers—such as the elimination of the federal sales tax and its replacement by the goods and services tax—that has been a very important part of that 10.5 per cent increase in exports that we have seen this year compared to last year. The C. D. Howe Institute has a very good report that I encourage you to read, Mr. Speaker, that shows how we have improved our performance in high value-added exports to the United States. It is those very exports that have been subject to the reduction in tariffs as a result of the free trade agreement.

• (1730)

We just cannot wish that we had high value-added goods and services produced here in Canada, as the Liberal finance critic said. We have to do things and implement policies to bring this about. This is what the free trade agreement and the goods and services tax have provided for us.

In NAFTA we will be able to extend these opportunities further into the Mexican market. That is a high-value, fast-growing market in the future that is going to be important for us.

Let me close with just a few words about my meeting tomorrow, because I am sure the House will be interested in this. We have committed, as the federal government and provincial governments, to eliminate burdens that are costing $6 billion to the Canadian economy, which is the interprovincial barriers to trade. There have been a number of reports on this, but these are not hypothetical things, these are specific impediments to trade: government procurement preferences, local content rules, restrictive hiring and trade practices, predatory business regulations, liquor regulations and other obstacles that hurt our workers and that hurt our businesses.

When we think of all we are doing internationally to open up markets it is particularly ludicrous that we continue to maintain these barriers within Canada and make it easier for some of our companies to do business into Canada from outside Canada, rather than doing it from other provinces where we can keep those jobs here within Canada.

In conclusion, these last few years have been difficult years, not only for Canada but for most industrialized countries. There are no magic solutions. There are no painless answers. The adjustments to the new global realities have been difficult. They will take time, but they are very necessary.

At the same time, we have to build a stronger, more competitive economy. This is what this statement has proposed for us today. It is a statement that is based in large part on the consultations that we have carried out this year that have produced many, many good ideas that have been implemented as a result of the statement today.

However, we must never lose sight of one of the most important messages that we obtained from the prosperity consultations. That is the need to work together as a country. If we are really going to create a stronger economic base and growing business confidence all Canadians need to seek out and build these partnerships in collaborative approaches to the problems that we are facing as a country. In a quickly changing world we have to be nimble, not numb. Adapting quickly to the rapidly changing global economy requires that teamwork

Teamwork and a sense of partnership within this House are what we are calling for so we can address these problems and do so in a way, as the Minister of Finance has pointed out, that will bring us into that new economy of the 1990s and beyond in a strong way. It will be in a way that reflects the wishes of Canadians and produces those good jobs and the security, hope and confidence that we can have in the future.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister about a very specific matter in this economic statement which I find excessively cruel. It is the proposal that unemployment insurance benefits be cut back for those who are unemployed.

One might understand such a measure if there were a lot of jobs out there and the government was trying to encourage or force lazy unemployed persons to leave the unemployment insurance rolls and go out to seek those jobs. However, that is not the case.

In most parts of the country there are no jobs. The jobs that these Canadians need have been completely eliminated. Factories have closed or cut entire programs, which is also the case with businesses with white collar jobs. In many parts of the country there are no jobs to go to.

There are about 1.5 million Canadians unemployed with double digit unemployment rates in almost every province. Yet the government is cutting back the unemployment benefit which is meant to see people through their period of unemployment, to help them pay their rent, to buy their groceries, to pay for the essentials of life, their children's clothing, transportation and so on.

I fail to understand this. Is the government saying that rents will be cut back by a similar percentage and that grocery prices will be cut back, that this cutback on their only income, their unemployment insurance benefit, will be paralleled by cuts in prices in other areas? How does the minister justify this excessively cruel proposal? I guess the other side of it is that the government is going to cut unemployment insurance altogether for those who leave their jobs without just cause or are let go for misconduct.

That would be all right and we would support it if misconduct was so clear or if leaving your job without cause was so clear. However, we all know that because of personality conflicts and all sorts of other reasons people are often forced out of jobs and it is very difficult to decide whether it is just cause or not. The Minister of Employment and Immigration knows that too because he has to deal with that. Who is going to decide what is just cause in leaving employment when a woman is harassed by her boss or when some other similar incident takes place?

I would like the minister to tell us how he, as a long time minister in this government, can justify these two proposals: cutting back on unemployment insurance benefits for people who are unemployed and totally eliminating, without any arbitration or conciliation proposal, unemployment insurance for people who have to leave their jobs?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend will be hearing a fuller explanation of this from my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, in due course.

However, let me just respond directly to the points that my friend has made. We have, over the course of the eight years we have been in government, been fighting to maintain the finances of this government in a way that will get the deficit down, a deficit we inherited that was far too high.

We are not happy to cut these programs but it is a fact of life that if we do not cut them interest rates will go up and that will slow down the growth in the economy. If the economy slows down it is going to make it far harder for the people who are unemployed today to get their jobs back.

The program that we have proposed here is not just a one-sided program. It is a program that maintains the benefit level, the current beneficiaries are grandfathered so they will not be affected by this. The Prime Minister has also announced a $300 million special initiative for displaced workers to help give them the support they need to get back into the work force and get off unemployment insurance.

If my friend looks at the broad motivation here, which is to get the economy moving as quickly as we can through reducing interest rates but also trying to treat unemployed workers fairly by not reducing their benefit but by keeping it level for future years, he will see that this is a balanced approach to a very, very difficult problem.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I was listening with a great deal of interest to the minister's comments. My question is a very simple one. It seems to me that the government is looking for ways that it can cut expenses and at the same time raise revenues. I am just wondering why it did not use the Auditor General's report as a kind of Rand McNally map to economic independence, to gaining revenue and to cutting down a lot of the money that is wasted by this government.

I would just like to ask the minister two questions which are closely related. The first question deals with the GST. Many of my constituents have written to me saying: "Why not simply apply the GST in the financial institutions sector, transactions between stockbrokers and investors and so forth?" I know that the minister comes from that sector. He must have a particularly keen insight into why we do not have GST on those kinds of transactions.

Second, and this comes from the Auditor General's report. Why not look to the creation of 10,000 jobs estimated by the Auditor General through more efficient management of the forest resources on Indian reserves? This is not just speculation. This is what the Auditor General says: "10,000 jobs".

I just asked two specific questions of the minister and I would appreciate two specific answers.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, a general comment in response to the hon. member. Every time the Auditor General's report comes out we study it from start to finish. Every department that is affected by the report is asked for a response. Many of the responses to the Auditor General's recommendations have been implemented. That is one of the reasons why, as the Minister of Finance pointed out, we have been able to reduce the cost of the operations of government by something like 20 per cent after taking into account the effects of inflation.

As for the two specific points that my hon. friend has made. First he asked: "Why not apply the GST to financial institutions?" In a word, because it is too complex to do it. There is no country in the world that applies a sales tax like the goods and services tax to financial institutions.

When I was Minister of Finance and when we were bringing in the GST we looked at a range of ways to do it and we found that they simply did not work. It is no surprise because no other country has been able to find a way to do it either.

On the second point, concerning the question of management of forest resources. As I said, we will be reviewing this as we review every other recommendation of the Auditor General. Either the Minister of Indian Affairs or the Minister of Forestry will be able to provide my friend with a more specific response in due course.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister. Again we have a continuing decline in real salary for employees of the government as well as for members of Parliament, ministers and the Prime Minister. It is fairly easy in our salary range to take a salary freeze for three full years. However, it is not so easy for the tens of thousands of Public Service employees who are earning less than $20,000 a year.

I have these questions for the minister in terms of how much ministers and the Prime Minister are co-operating in this effort. Will ministers now be reversing the step they took a couple of years ago of doubling the number of employees they can take out of their departments and cut back from 40 to 20 to assist their departments in these downsizing and cost-cutting measures.

Will minister's and the Prime Minister's operating budgets, expense accounts and various other means of compensating for a freeze in salary be reduced? Will ministers reduce their draw on the resources of their departments to serve the political purposes of the minister's office, such as advertising, polling and so on?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, these are obviously very detailed questions. The President of the Treasury Board will be speaking to the House during this debate. At that time I encourage my hon. friend to direct those questions to him.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, since there are so many members of the Liberal party who wish to speak in this debate we will be sharing our time. My time will be shared with the hon. member for Algoma.

The economic statement given to us today by the Minister of Finance was the ultimate in doublespeak and cynicism. On the one hand this Conservative minister speaks of compassion and caring. Great buzz words. The government says it wants to stimulate the economy, create jobs, improve productivity, help research and development, economic growth and so on.

The government says those things on the one hand, but on the other hand it continues with the same failed policy. It continues with the same supply-side, trickle-down policy that was just totally rejected in the United States. The policy that it is following, and unfortunately continues to follow, has been carried on for the past few years in this country, in Great Britain and in the United States. It has left nothing but disaster: the closing of plants and businesses all over the place and high and record levels of unemployment and bankruptcies.

The government speaks about giving assistance to certain sectors and it has. It does give some assistance to certain sectors in this economic statement but it is only token assistance and will not do much at all. When the minister speaks about alternative plans and when the minister for trade who just sat down speaks of alternative plans I would urge them to look at the plans and suggestions put forward by the Clinton-Gore team in the United States, which have been publicized for several years by Robert Reich and other American economists.

In fact what it is doing is staying on the same old track when nearly everybody who has something to say about economics has said that it should be on a different track.

I will get to this in a second, but sure, it has said that we are in a recession. However, it blames that recession on everyone else but itself. Instead of adopting policies which would run counter to the recession it is continuing with policies which stimulate and fuel that recession.

In the statement the government blames the recession, the unemployment, the bankruptcies and the terrible economic situation that we are in on world market conditions, on world recessionary trends, and on a whole lot of things except its own policies.

If we look back over the last few years, let us just look at the GST. Economist upon economist and think-tank upon think-tank have said, even those that agreed with the GST, that it was the wrong time to bring in such a massive tax increase and change. These experts said that if the government brought it in at the time it did it would only make any recession that was on the horizon much worse.

In many cases it is the government's policies that have deepened this recession and have made it much worse. Yes, there is a world-wide recession and we would be facing recession in any case. However this government, contrary to the advice that was given to it, not only in this House but from many parts of the country, went ahead with measures which stimulated, deepened and made things even worse than they would otherwise be.

One could say the same thing about the free trade agreement, which is not just a free trade agreement. It is an agreement to export capital and to import investment in this country, to sell out the control of our industry and resources. A real free trade agreement means that we produce goods and services in this country and we sell them to the United States without any tariff or with low tariffs and it does the same with us. It does not mean that we move entire businesses to the United States, that we set up a system in which we move entire businesses to the United States. That is not free trade.

That goes much beyond free trade. A free trade agreement does not mean that we open up our country so that the United States, in this case, can buy out and take control of many of our major businesses, close them down, consolidate them with businesses in the United States, supply Canada from American factories, and only set up and leave warehouses in this country.

The ills and the problems that we face were to a great extent made by this Tory government since it has been in power.

The government talks about a leaner Public Service. Of course, it does so at the expense of extremely bad service. All of us who are members of Parliament are faced with letters and telephone calls from people who telephone day in and day out, let us say to the unemployment insurance office or to the pension office, but they cannot get someone to answer the line because there are not enough employees or because the lines have been cut back. The service in many departments is terrible. There has been a loss of jobs.

Worse still, what this leaner Public Service means for the government is a greater opportunity to contract out to its friends. It spends money. It shows us the numbers in the Public Service and yes, they have been decreased.

However, the government takes the services previously carried out by public servants on a full-time basis and contracts them out. Those services could be cleaning buildings, accounting or whatever. The government contracts them out to its friends and those companies certainly make good profits out of those contracts. The people working for those companies and performing the services are, for the most part, paid at minimum wage, are without unions, have no pensions and no benefits whatsoever. That is the sort of leaner Public Service the government is talking about.

The most disgraceful part of the economic statement today concerned the provisions with respect to unemployment insurance. When the free trade debate was carried on a few years ago we said on this side of the House that this would lead to a harmonizing of American social programs with Canadian social programs. It would lead to a levelling down to what the American social support system was.

In fact, that prediction is taking place in many areas. It is taking place with respect to our pension programs, family support programs and also with respect to unemployment insurance.

The government started on that road when it brought in this massive reform of unemployment insurance a few years ago. It withdrew total government contributions to the fund and put the fund totally on the backs of the workers and employers. It cut back on the benefits and made it more difficult to qualify. It also put a much harsher penalty on those who had quit or those who left for misconduct.

I have no problem with penalizing people who really quit their jobs because they just do not want to work any longer or because they are lazy. I have no problem with penalizing them. I have no problem in penalizing people who truly misbehave. I have no problem when they are truly fired for misconduct.

However, we all know that people quit certain jobs because it is impossible for them to stay in that job. Often it is because of serious personality conflicts with the boss. Sometimes for women it is sexual harassment. Sometimes it is because of other types of harassment and it is the same with misconduct. What one boss will call misconduct an independent arbitration agency may not call misconduct at all.

To leave these people without any unemployment insurance and no improved system to determine whether there is just cause in quitting or whether there was really misconduct or not in being fired is a disgraceful treatment of our unemployed Canadians.

I could talk for a long time about the terrible situation in Montreal but I only have three or four minutes left in this debate. In Canada we face the worst recession since the 1930s with more than 1.5 million Canadians unemployed and 2.3 million on welfare.

Every time the government cuts back on unemployment insurance what does it do? If there were jobs for these people to go to that would be one thing, but when they run out of unemployment insurance and there are no jobs they go on provincial and municipal welfare systems. This government shifts the burden for the unemployed to the provinces and in Ontario and Nova Scotia to the municipalities.

Does that solve the problem? No, it does not. It makes it look good as a government because it says: "We are cutting back programs. We are cutting back staff". In fact the ordinary person in Canada who cannot find a job is shifted from unemployment insurance, which had been in the past a more substantial and a better program, over to provincial welfare schemes.

We still have 2.3 million people on welfare and 3.8 million people living below the poverty line. That includes one million children. We have now in Canada two million people who rely on food banks. Those are the national figures. The figures for Montreal are much worse than the national figures.

In Quebec, for example, the unemployment rate is 11.9 per cent, there are 405,000 people unemployed. Unemployment in Montreal is 11.8 per cent, there are 188,000 people unemployed. Welfare rolls in Quebec are growing at 3,000 persons per month. In Montreal 615,000 people, 15 per cent of the population of greater Montreal, live below the poverty line.

Bankruptcies have hit all-time record highs. The loss of manufacturing jobs and the loss of jobs in transportation and communications, which is a major industry in Montreal, are all at record levels.

I have only a few minutes left and I want to deal with the alternatives. The government asks us: "Well, what are you suggesting in place of what we are doing?" We are saying that we need a mixed economy approach.

This country prospered and the greatest days of prosperity in this country were when we had a wise mix of government action combined with private sector initiative. That was so in the United States.

The philosophy on which this Tory government stands, that the marketplace will take care of everything, has been shown to be a failure. It was shown to be a failure in Britain. It has been a failure in Canada. It has been a failure in the United States. They believe in this trickle-down theory, that if we help the rich, if we help the big businesses, it will trickle down and help the ordinary Canadian. But it has not done that.

The government is cutting jobs right and left, yet it continues on this same track. It will get the same treatment when the election comes that the tired Reagan-Bush bunch got in the United States. Government members will be kicked right out on their fannies because the policies they are adopting and continue to follow are wrong. They are wrong. They have been proven wrong on three continents and they had better get the message soon because people are not going to take it any longer.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, when the minister gave his remarks earlier today he said that he wanted to have the differences in philosophy brought out and that is what we certainly just heard.

Now, there clearly is a difference in philosophy between this side of the House and that side. Listening to my hon. friend from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce I had difficulty telling the difference between his approach and that of his socialist colleagues a little further down the line. He calls it a mixed economy approach. What he left out was the other part of their economic approach which one might call ahead in the sand approach where they hide from the changes that are taking place in the world.

Now, the approach he advocates, which was the approach taken by the government of which he was a minister, was to drive the deficit as far as possible, drive it right up the line and leave the country burdened with a national debt that we are still trying to cope with.

Now we face a situation where the entire world is in recession. It is interesting to note that in 1988 world economic growth was 4.3 per cent. This year it is down to 1 per cent. Yet, what has been the impact of the approach this government has taken? We are looking at a little bit better growth. The most recent growth in the last quarter was 1.4 per cent. We have the lowest inflation rate of all the G-7 countries. Not bad. I would say he ought to be up commending the minister for that.

Productivity is up 2.6 per cent. That is not bad. Look at trade. They hide from trade policy. What has happened since we brought in the FTA that they so love to disparage?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. If the hon. member does not put his question he is not going to get an answer. There is only one minute left.

Mr. McCreath: Very well, Mr. Speaker. The reality is that my friends opposite try to blame the recession on this government and ignore what is going on in the world. Maybe if I were over there I would too, but I think I have more integrity than that.

One of the things going on in the world is changing trade patterns and globalization. I would like to ask my hon. friend what his solution is for dealing with the new reality, the new globalism that forces countries not to go and hide in the sand, but to get out there and compete? How do we compete if we do not allow businesses to grow so that they can do it?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, to begin with, of course there is a great difference in philosophy between that side and this side. There is no doubt about that. The minister asked about it this afternoon and there certainly is a difference.

With respect to the recession, yes, I said in my remarks that there is a world recession. But this Tory government did things which deepened the recession and it did them at the wrong time.

I can recall very well when the government brought in the GST. Even those who supported the GST in principle said that it was absolutely the wrong time to bring it in. It would deepen, broaden and stimulate the recession that was on the horizon, but it ignored that advice. I could refer to report after report after report, all of which said not to bring in the GST, not to add to the burden of ordinary consumers and taxpayers at a time when we were going into a recession.

The hon. member boasts about the inflation rate. There is bound to be a low rate of inflation when over 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed and another overwhelming number are on welfare. They do not have any money to buy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired. I am going to be very difficult here on time because there are a large number of speakers. The next speaker has 10 minutes, plus five minutes questions and comments. If hon. members hope to get any more than one question they should shorten up their comments and put the question.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have a chance to speak in this debate on the supplementary borrowing bill that is for some $8 billion. It is interesting that $8 billion is just about exactly the amount by which the Minister of Finance underestimated his deficit.

Having the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology speak tonight was very appropriate because he really is the architect of the recession we have in Canada today. It is the worst recession since the 1930s and is incredibly much worse than what we suffered in 1981–82. It is a made-in-Canada recession. It is a recession that has been going on now for over 30 months. It is an historic low as far as misery and difficulty for Canadians is concerned.

It was very important to have him here tonight because he went through the same gobbledegook he has been giving us for years with all the placebos the government has been using to talk about the recovery and so on. He described the recovery as being slow. In fact, the recovery is glacial. It really is not occurring at all. Our hope is maybe 1 per cent growth this year. With the growth in the number of people being unemployed it amounts to exactly nothing.

He talks about sound fiscal and monetary policy. Any Minister of Finance who would bring in a free trade deal, then impose the GST, and then hold Canadian interest rates at 4 per cent to 5 per cent above those in the United States and expect Canadian businesses and Canadian manufacturing to be able to cope with that really is living in an Alice in Wonderland world. It is little wonder we have had hundreds and hundreds of thousands of jobs lost during this recessionary period.

It was interesting when the former Minister of Finance spoke about sound fiscal and monetary policy. When this government came to power in the fall of 1984 Canada was launched on the greatest period of expansion in our history with six years of unprecedented growth.

The government loves to talk about deficits and how it has reduced the deficit. In fact, it has brought in 33 new tax measures during the period of 1984 to 1990. That includes the GST which cost almost $2 billion just to implement. Talk about spending money. This government certainly knows how to do it.

In any event, the minister talked about a sound fiscal and monetary policy. Yet during that period 1984 to 1990 the deficit doubled. Of course since 1990 it has been totally downhill. This is the worst recession since the 1930s. Look at the measures the government has put before the House today. Obviously if these measures were of any consequence they should have been brought in at least 18 months ago. It is talking about spending $500 million for a capital works program. It estimates it will create some 5,000 jobs over a two-year period.

In one community in my riding, Elliot Lake, we have lost 3,400 heavy industrial mining jobs. We have lost at least another 1,600, perhaps 2,000. This infrastructure program that the government puts before us will create the equivalent of the number of jobs that have been lost in one relatively small city of 13,000, Elliot Lake in my riding, over the next two years.

Can we imagine? The government suggests that program is going to have any economic impact at all on the country is just about zip, just about equivalent to nothing. Granted there are some projects over the course of the five years of the program but clearly the next two years are the most important because we have to get out of this recession.

I do not think anybody will dispute that northern Ontario has had the brunt of this recession. Whether we are talking about the export tax the government imposed on softwood which has lost thousands of jobs, whether we look at the mining industry where we have lost at least 25 per cent of all the mining jobs in northeastern Ontario during the last three or four years or whether we look at the steel industry in Sault Ste. Marie which has gone from about 12,000 jobs 10 years ago to around 5,000 today, northern Ontario has clearly been hit more drastically than any other place.

As we look through this infrastructure program, we see that the only projects in Ontario are two projects at terminal one and terminal two at Pearson International Airport in Toronto. Clearly Ontario is left out of the whole project. It is not even clear from the data that the Minister of Finance made available today whether any of that money is even government money. It talks about paving the runway. It talks about reconstructing terminal one and terminal two but they are doing it in the private sector. It looks like Ontario, and clearly northern Ontario, gets absolutely nothing out of this infrastructure program.

My leader put forward a billion dollar program for municipal infrastructure, for sewer and water and municipal projects which would be shared three ways. The billion dollars that the federal government would put in would be matched by the provincial and municipal governments. There would be projects in every community.

The most important, active and busiest of buildings perhaps in Canada, Pearson International Airport, is where the money is going for this program.

In 1981 and 1982 we had a massive infrastructure program, a lot of airports, marinas, pipelines and projects throughout the country which really jolted the Canadian economy back into the prosperity which we enjoyed from 1984 to 1990. This program is simply too little and certainly too late by at least a year and a half. It should have been brought in a long time ago.

There are a couple of programs for small business which will be useful such as the 10 per cent investment tax credit. Most of the other projects and programs are extensions of existing programs such as the Small Businesses Loans Act and the small business financing program about which the minister of small business has already said the banks are sitting on their assets and are not really doing that much for Canadians.

This program that has been put forward today will have very little impact on the economy. At the same time, those thousands of people who are living on unemployment insurance are facing a drastic cutback of 3 per cent in their benefits. Others will lose out on their benefits.

It is certainly not a statement that is going to pick up the Canadian economy, put many people back to work, and get us out of this recession that we have been suffering from for the last 30 months.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member's comments and I think he made an unfortunate error. Perhaps it was an oversight, but he did say that our government doubled the deficit since we have been in office. If he thought about that again he would probably want to correct that. That is not correct.

Second, I take it from his comments, and I think I heard him correctly, that he likes the statement but it should have been brought forward earlier. I appreciate his support in that regard. I suppose it is better late than never.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, the statement is so anaemic that the impact in most areas of this country—clearly the infrastructure program will have no effect. There will certainly be no joy in my riding. There will not be one road rebuilt, not be one new sewer line constructed, no town hall built and no people will be put to work there. There is no provision in the program for new direct employment programs such as the massive programs that were provided in the winter of 1982 when we faced the last recession.

Clearly the program is so anaemic that it will have practically no impact, especially in my constituency. We have people who are facing unemployment. We had 1,000 workers laid off last spring. The budget for the employment and immigration department in Elliot Lake in my constituency was cut from $2.5 million last year to some $600,000 this year. The department finally said that it would provide some training for some 75 workers and then it cancelled it and said that the local community had to come up with a quarter of the money, some $200,000, or there would not be any training money.

For the future there are no additional funds. The minister is simply not providing funds that I see will reduce the unemployment in my constituency by any amount this year. When the government was talking about a massive infrastructure program it talked originally of $2 billion and said that this would dip down into every community. In Ontario it is dipping down to provide something, we think, at the Pearson International Airport. For people living in the Algoma riding fixing Pearson International Airport does not have much impact on the unemployed on Manitoulin Island or in the north shore communities.

The recession has been unnecessarily long and deep because the government has had a tight fiscal policy. It has increased taxes with 33 different new taxes, including the GST, during the last eight years. It has kept interest rates so high that we have for the first time a made-in-Canada recession. All economists say that we have borne down so hard on the taxes in this country and the interest rates are so high that although inflation has been lower economic growth is just about zero.

At the same time the Minister of Finance brings in a budget only nine or ten months later and he has miscalculated by 25 per cent. He talked about $28 billion last February and today he is talking about $34 billion. It is little wonder that the deficit of $179 billion in 1984 has skyrocketed to over $400 billion today. The minister is right that the deficit has not just doubled, it has more than doubled during that eight-year period.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a sense of pride and privilege to have the opportunity to participate in this debate.

I think the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance has come into this House today with a great deal of courage and a great sense of responsibility, as is true to his character and his record. He addressed a situation that is extremely difficult. He had to tell this House that the finances of this country have deteriorated from an estimated deficit of $27.5 billion in February of this year to an estimate of close to $35 billion in the coming year and down only slightly in the following year. I wondered how he would do that because it is an extremely difficult task.

The realities are that his estimates in February for 1992-93 and 1993-94 were based on the best information available at the time, based on a world economy we estimated had recovered from the trough of the recession. However, it has continued to lag and linger to the point that economic growth in this fiscal year will be 1 per cent. As one hon. member said earlier, that basically amounts to moving sideways.

Therefore, the budget deficit of $27.5 billion which had been forecast for 1992-93 is going to come in at $34.4 billion. It has resulted almost entirely from a shortage of anticipated revenue. As a matter of fact, the change in that budget position as a result of policy actions announced in February and today is actually a reduction of $700 million, obviously not nearly sufficient to offset the revenue reduction of $8 billion and the other public charges that accrue from that. The same is true for 1993-94 when the estimated deficit is now going to be close to $10 billion more than it was estimated to be in February of this year.

An hon. member: Fire your financial analyst.

Mr. Bird: It is not as the hon. member says so glibly: "Fire your financial analyst". It is a case of dealing with a world in which the financial climate has become very stormy and unpredictable and very difficult to deal with.

I would like to use an analogy. I have had some experience in flying aeroplanes. Sometimes there are storms you just cannot predict and it is important to practice the fundamentals. It is important to keep your eyes on the instruments and keep your destination in mind and fly on the fundamentals. The finance minister and this government have flown well on the fundamentals. One great one has been the rate of inflation. The rate of inflation has been brought to 1.5 per cent, the lowest among all industrialized G-7 countries. That is a fundamental that will stand us in great stead as we commence to emerge from this recession. Another fundamental has been the control of government expenditures. This has been a direction which Canadians have prevailed upon us to take for many years now. This is a demand which the government has addressed and to which it has responded.

In the midst of these dramatically large deficits and constantly growing debt it is hard to keep a perspective on the fundamentals. The facts are that this government and this finance minister and his predecessor for the past eight years have kept the rate of growth in government spending at an average of perhaps only 3.9 per cent. I quote from an article in the Fraser Forum of November 1992 in which the author, Ken Gregory, points out that for the 15 years prior to 1984 governments were spending at a rate of growth on programs of close to 14 per cent. That figure has now been reduced to less than 4 per cent in the past eight years.

The result has been another tremendously important move in the fundamentals. The program operating account of the Government of Canada has been turned from a deficit of close to $16 billion in 1983-84 to a surplus of $10 billion in 1991-92. That is a turnaround of $26 billion in the program operating account.

It means that in the area of discretionary spending the government has exercised management of the fundamentals. Unfortunately the areas of debt, debt service costs and economic contribution of our revenues, the areas that are beyond our control, have come to us in unpredictable turbulence as a result of this stormy and difficult economic world climate. We can only deal with them as responsibly and as well as we can.

As I say, to use the flying analogy, we must keep our eyes glued to the instruments. We must stay the course. We must not ever forget the destination which is ultimately and hopefully in this decade a balanced budget and the beginning of the repayment of our national debt.

Canada's economic progress has been slowed by a stubborn world-wide recession. The pressures of the new global economic insecurity marked by restructuring and job dislocation have made recovery and growth painfully slow. The government's priority is to continue to build confidence, to enhance the beginnings and finally the fulfilment of recovery, and to create jobs. Its priority challenge is to help Canadians adjust to economic change and to take advantage of the opportunity which it brings.

That is why the wide-ranging initiatives announced by the finance minister today are designed to bolster public and private investment in economic growth while also reducing the cost of government. These actions build on the policies I have described which are already increasing Canadian productivity and competitiveness and are producing fundamental stability in the areas that are so important.

I would like to highlight some key actions as outlined by the finance minister this afternoon. He talked about support for small business. Canada's federal tax system for small business is one of the most favourable in the world. The small business sector is under serious financial and competitive pressure. To help spur growth in jobs the government is launching a special small business employment and investment package.

There was a publication in Atlantic Canada by ACOA last week that talked about the importance of small business. While it pointed out that most employment still resides with large companies 90 per cent of new jobs come from small business. If we are to achieve growth and if we are to solve our unemployment problems small business is the area of our economic sector that we simply must address. Under this package announced today most small businesses will be able to add new workers without paying additional unemployment insurance employer premiums in 1993. This will reduce the cost of hiring additional workers by up to $1,600 per worker. Other actions in the small business area include a 10 per cent small business investment tax credit for machinery and eligible equipment purchases.

The rules on investment in small businesses by RRSPs and other funds will be simplified and investment options will be expanded. Programs that provide financial assistance are being expanded or extended.

Second, this afternoon the finance minister has addressed the challenge and the compelling imperative of research and development. Research and development is key to developing the new products and processes that deliver competitive success and growth in a global marketplace. Canada, as a trading nation, must be competitive in that world marketplace.

We offer the most generous tax incentives for business research and development of any major industrialized country and we have now introduced modifications to streamline and improve the system, which were promised in the budget of February 1992. These changes will provide additional support of $230 million over the next five years.

There are still areas where the tax rules could be improved to help business adapt and grow in an era of knowledged-based work and technological change. An example is the tax treatment of equipment such as computers that become obsolete so quickly as new technology emerges.

The government is examining further modifications to the tax system to solve these problems. It has set aside $400 million over the next five years to remove tax-based impediments to innovation and growth. We will also increase funding for the Industrial Research Assistance Program and will extend further the funding for long-term research, which builds on the best of the results achieved under the network of the centres of excellence program.

Another key area addressed by the Minister of Finance this afternoon is that of training and adjustment. It is increasingly necessary in a knowledged-based economy that Canada's economic prospects be bolstered by the skills of our people. The federal government is helping to meet this challenge with its support for worker training and adjustment being increased to $3.8 billion next year. As part of this, funds for developmental training under the UI program will go to $2.2 billion from $1.9 billion last year and just $500 million in 1990.

The government will also help workers and employers make learning and skills upgrading a constant priority. Priority will be placed on developing occupational standards so the training will be relevant to real needs. The government will provide $250 million over five years to help lever a national training effort driven by labour and business. It will develop tax incentives to help defray the costs of training workers to meet these occupational standards.

Another area addressed this afternoon by the finance minister is in the construction and resources sectors. This extends the successful home buyers plan introduced in the February budget where people can use their RRSP savings to help finance a home. This is being extended by another year to end on March 1, 1994.

We have also increased the tax write-off for junior oil and gas companies from 30 per cent to 100 per cent on the first $2 million of Canadian development expenses that are flowed through to investors. The Income Tax Act will be amended to provide more flexibility for oil and gas companies and mining companies to utilize non-capital losses.

One of the most exciting areas announced this afternoon is the new investment in Canada's infrastructure. Certainly for me, and other members of Parliament on both sides of the House from Atlantic Canada, the announcement of direct contributions at the rate of $200 million per year over the next five years to help with Atlantic projects is tremendously encouraging. This will go toward the Atlantic expressway and the completion of engineering and the commencement of construction of the Prince Edward Island fixed link that begins in the spring of next year

The nation's infrastructure, which includes national assets such as our highway system, communications and transportation of all types, can provide an important competitive advantage in the new global economy. Based on savings in other activities the government will commit an additional $500 million to pursue specific strategic investment opportunities across the country over the next five years that will total $2 billion and directly generate 4,000 to 5,000 jobs each year. As well, the Minister of Finance has addressed government efficiency. The government has worked hard in the past, as I have described already, to reduce the costs of government and to streamline its operations. As a result, the real cost of government after inflation is now 20 per cent less than it was in 1984–85.

The minister has also talked about easing the tax burden. The February budget announced cuts in personal income taxes applying to all Canadians. It also included measures to ease the tax burden on the important manufacturing and processing sectors of our economy.

Despite the pressures of the deficit the government will proceed with the second phase of tax cuts planned for 1993. These and other measures, such as the new child tax benefit, will provide some $2 million in economic stimulus next year. The government will also hold 1993 unemployment insurance premium rates for both employees and employers to 1992 levels.

We will continue with action to control the deficit. The deficit is a remarkable and devastating challenge. The key to deficit reduction is spending control. I have already outlined how, over the past eight years, this government has a record of spending control on programs that is three times, perhaps four times, as effective as the predecessor governments of the previous 15 years.

In this statement today the spending control measures announced will save nearly $8 billion over the balance of this fiscal year and the following two years. Here are some of the measures: For two years salaries will be frozen for public servants and Crown corporations will have proportional reductions made in their operating budgets. Salaries will be frozen for two years for the Governor General, the Prime Minister and all members of Parliament. Operating budgets of government departments will be cut by 3 per cent in 1993–94 and combined with the wage freeze federal operating budgets will be 5 per cent lower than planned levels over the next two fiscal years.

Following on the heels of the record of the past eight years that is a remarkable commitment indeed.

I would like to finish by saying that while these are discouraging times Canada really is not a country to be easily discouraged about.

Over the weekend I had the opportunity to take a look at a new book by Peter Newman entitled Canada 1892, Portrait of a Promised Land. In the concluding pages he draws parallels between 1892 and 1992, 100 years later, and they are surprisingly similar. One hundred years ago Canadians felt that the 20th century would belong to them and as we look into the 21st century, despite the difficult challenges we face, I have no doubt that everyone in this House has an even stronger conviction that Canada's time has come.

In 1892, as in 1992, those did not seem like impossible dreams. Yet the country was still very young, as we are now, still very large, still very diverse in both geographic and cultural terms, still an extremely difficult country to govern and still, particularly in current economic times, an extremely difficult country to stimulate economically and to manage financially.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier asked 100 years ago: "How long will the fabric last or will the fabric hold at all?" Yet, as Newman says, in surprising ways Canada has hardly changed in the last 100 years. Most of the concerns animating Canadians in 1892 are still with us and our hope must lie in the fact that however threatening these problems might have been they did not daunt us. We are still here to argue and implement the solutions.

He is right. That is what the finance minister has done with courage and responsibility and foresight this afternoon. He has addressed those problems. They did not daunt our forefathers then. They do not daunt us now. We shall meet the challenges we face. We shall solve the problems that beset us. We shall fulfil the promise that the future offers this great land and we shall do it together.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to start off by saying that I respect the member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury. I listened to his remarks carefully. I do not want to be perceived as being negative in any way, shape or form. We are trying to be responsible here.

I want to focus on that part of his speech that referred to small business. I think that the Minister of Finance did a good thing when he increased the Small Businesses Loans Act from $200,000 to $250,000. I understand that eligibility for this small business loan may go from fixed assets to possibly working capital. That is a gesture of understanding toward the needs of the million-odd small businesses in this country.

I want to say two things. One, we have taken almost a year to pass the legislation on the Small Businesses Loans Act, which all parties in this House supported. I hope that the amendment from $200,000 to $250,000 does not create further delay.

Having said that, my greater concern is the fact that most of the branch offices of the major financial institutions in this country are not aware of the Small Businesses Loans Act and what it means. I hear from many businesses across the country that when they go to their bank managers they are not aware of this legislation. They are not aware of the program.

I am wondering what the government will do to make sure that the intention of this amendment and the basic loans act that the Minister of Finance presented on the floor of the House today to the people of Canada will actually be implemented for the million-odd small businesses in this country.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, that is an excellent question. I think the Minister of Finance this afternoon addressed that in very profound style. First of all, he called upon the banks of this country to get with it, heed the challenge of small business and to support it. He said it explicitly and clearly and I doubt that call could be ignored.

He also talked in his concluding statement about the need for partnerships, not just with the federal government and the provincial governments, but partnerships with business, labour, financial institutions and all Canadians.

We are in this together. This deficit circumstance in which we find ourselves is as a result, as I said, of turbulent economic times over which the world is having difficulty controlling.

In response to the question raised by the hon. member, it is clear that if we are to use the measure, the Small Businesses Loans Act that was amplified this afternoon, bankers have to start taking it seriously, but well beyond that, they have to start taking small business seriously. They have to start investing in the potential that exists. They have to start sharing the risk more fully than they may be prone to do.

I am not in this statement knocking the banks. I am just amplifying the call to partnership that must exist among all Canadians. I think the Minister of Finance has made that call very clearly and very well today.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I hope that the member's statement will come to reality. I am not saying this to be anything other than concerned. So often I have heard the Minister of State for Small Businesses state that this is a problem. I have heard the Minister of Finance state before that he will address this issue.

I hope for the hundreds of thousands of small businesses that really want to use this piece of legislation that his commitment will be lived up to.

My second question concerns that portion of the budget speech that deals with the unemployment insurance amendment. We read in the minister's speech that the unemployment insurance fund is going to be amended so that if someone is fired for what the employer would define as just cause that particular person is not eligible for unemployment insurance, or if someone quits on his or her own volition he or she does not get access to unemployment insurance.

I personally think that is a pretty extreme amendment. I just do not know where the government is coming from on that particular amendment. The member comes from business. I know he is a successful business person. There may be situations that could crop up where people may be put into a position where they either want to leave because they cannot live with the condition or for what is just cause. For these people not to have access to that unemployment insurance fund is a pretty Draconian amendment. I wonder if he could comment on that.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear the hon. member raise this in the context that he does because I share the respect for the hon. member that he has expressed for myself and which I appreciate.

It almost sounds as though he is using this significant element of the minister's statement today as a political crutch. He is talking about the situation as though the glass were half empty instead of half full.

One of the greatest complaints that I hear throughout my constituency and this country is about abuse of the unemployment insurance program, of people quitting jobs because they do not like them, they do not like to work so hard at them or they want to take a holiday and they want to do it on the basis of the unemployment insurance program.

An hon. member: That is true.

Mr. Bird: I know you do not mean that. This afternoon the NDP, and I believe the Liberals as well, talked about patching up the loopholes in the income tax system. There is equally a cry across this country by those who do pay unemployment insurance and support the system to make sure that the system has integrity, that it is used where it is needed and that it does not get misused.

Probably one of the most profound statements the minister made this afternoon was that our wonderful unemployment insurance program, the best in the world, will not be subject to fraud.

An hon. member: No, that is not what we are talking about.

Mr. Bird: That is exactly what he is talking about. As I say, for those who may lean on their crutch and say we are being hard done by, there are ombudsmen and all kinds of ways for fairness to be achieved. There are references to be made.

I must say it was the first thing the entire opposition landed on this afternoon. It did not talk about the growth of the country, it did not talk about the economic circumstance, it did not offer anything positive in the recommendations. It said: "Oh my, someone is liable to lose their unemployment insurance for unfair reasons". That is not what the minister said at all. He said fraud and misuse of the unemployment insurance system will end and I compliment him for that.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join the debate. It comes at a very relevant moment, given the last exchange between the member on our side who well understands the need of the unemployed and the poor in this country and the members on the government side who have been sitting there for just too many months and too many years. They have lost track of what they are supposed to be doing here as a government.

I would like to take us back in time just one week.

One week ago in this House we were raising questions on poverty. The National Council on Welfare brought to our attention the extent to which poverty has grown in this country. It noted that in some job areas, such as the service industry, 60 per cent of the people employed are living below the poverty line. It noted that in Manitoba 173,000 people now live in poverty.

These statistics were from before the recession began. It is now estimated that over 200,000 people in Manitoba are living in poverty.

Just take that report of last week, from a government agency, and then look at this budget. It is a budget. It is a pre-election budget. Does this government spend one minute addressing the issue of the poor and the questions raised only a week ago? No. Instead it built a budget around the prejudices of the people who think that there is such a thing as an undeserving poor.

One of the great arguments the opposition has against the child benefit package, and what annoyed us to no end, is that the government built on the assumption that those who are on social assistance, those who are under CAP, are somehow or other not as deserving of support as those who are working.

No one denies that people who work deserve every break. However, to make the other assumption in the depths of a recession, which in some parts of this country is a depression, that there are people who cannot find work and that they should be treated differently than those who can find work is a perversion of our history of being progressive in social policy.

This government and this minister have to be challenged on this statement today of continuing that distinction. This time it has seeped into the UI program. For the first time the government is saying that those who have quit, have severed from a job, are somehow or other to be treated differently even though they paid into the fund for years and even though we do not know why they separated from a company. Members of this House know that there are 101 reasons why people leave a company. These reasons are never stated. The act right now provides for that to happen in a polite fashion.

Now we are opening up a whole series of problems which have no need to be addressed. This government is making a distinction again between the so-called deserving poor and the undeserving poor. It needs to be challenged on this right here, today, and for the next few weeks over this legislation.

This is perhaps one of the most cynical documents that has been presented by a very cynical government. This was its opportunity, again heading in to a very tough winter, of saying to Canadians: We have finally gotten the message about what sort of situation we are in.

There has been all sorts of chatter in the public and it is no secret that there has been discussion of an infrastructure program. People representing municipalities in this country have come forward with ideas, not wild-eyed schemes, that can be implemented in the short term where the regulatory processes are set up so that they can get people to work over the winter. This government looked at them, turned around and walked away.

Take the example of western Canada. We all know that municipalities in western Canada have asked for a number of different ways to rebuild their infrastructure. We also know that across the country there has been a discussion about a roads program. What does this government say? It said it will provide funding for construction in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia for the Atlantic freeway. In western Canada there has been an enhancement of roads in national parks.

What is really meant when we read through all the documents, is that the Alberta members want to make sure that, to fight off the Reform Party, their roads in the national parks are rebuilt. Manitoba is not even mentioned. The commercial highways across western Canada are not mentioned.

Nothing is being done to rebuild the infrastructure. For example, in Winnipeg, where the core initiative has consistently been presented as a continuation of a first class infrastructure program, the government has ignored it and has pretended it did not exist.

Instead of having an attack on the basic questions of this country, the questions of poverty and of finding work, this government has ducked behind the language of its right wing ghost and wants to resurrect in the public's mind that it is concerned about the deficit. It has single-handedly created more debt in this country than we as a government were able to do in over 100 years. It managed to do that in eight years and then turn around after bankrupting the country and say: "We cannot help the poor; we are bankrupt". The guilt of the world is not upon us; it is upon the government. It deserves to pay the price for the hardship, the agony and the disruption of people's lives by continually undermining the confidence of this country.

This document does not rebuild confidence. It digs us into a deeper hole. As Canadians we have to give this government a message. Obviously what we see today is a government spending hundreds of millions of dollars to buy time. The government is going to start it in motion by punishing public servants as soon as possible by maintaining wage caps. It is then going to start with promises of getting involved with an infrastructure. It will probably tell us in the spring that it does not need a budget right away while it buys more time. As it gets more prepared for an election it will try to spring some other programs on us.

The reality is that the government is not going to be successful in an election. Someone else will come in, and instead of having a program that can be built upon we will have to dismantle all the assumptions of this government, dismantle all the destruction, tear apart the way that it has tried to ruin the infrastructure of this country and start rebuilding. It is going to take a long time before Canadians can look at a government and ask: "Are you really going to help us or are you going to continue to stand in the way of our trying to earn an income?"

There are other notes in this document that have not yet been addressed in the debate. The government discusses in a very ominous tone the Canada Student Loans Program and indicates that its revision, its "new financial arrangement", is expected to lower costs. Whenever I hear the government saying that it is to do more for social justice by lowering costs it just makes me shiver. Any time I have heard that before it has meant tougher conditions and that students somehow or another pay the price.

The government uses wonderful language. It is asking financial institutions to share in the burden of student debt. Has anyone ever met a bank manager when he is sharing the burden? They are wonderful sharers of debt. They sometimes open up their doors and talk at great length but in the end they are not negotiations in the language we have here.

If we look at the details in the economic and fiscal statement on page 15, who is it reducing grants to? In international assistance it is going to claim back $300 million. Does it turn to the richest people in the country, the richest people in the world? No, it turns to the poor people of the world. It is not only the poor in Canada who have to pay the price of this government; it is the poor around the world. Also, through Bill C-91 and what the government is trying to do there it is going to take away their inexpensive drugs and is going to add hundreds of millions of dollars to the world health bill.

What kind of strategy is that? We are almost at the anniversary of that famous day when the Prime Minister went out and patted children on the head and said how concerned he was. Is this the anniversary document? Is this another reference point that he wants to use in his legacy to the country?

It is also cutting back and saving money, $125 million, in regional development. What does that mean for western diversification?

The green plan is going to pay a price. I do not even know whether the green plan has actually ever started, but we know now that the government is going to cut it back. We also know that the government is going to take money away from aboriginal groups. On the one hand, we were congratulating aboriginal leaders in the last year for making such fine progress and being such great builders of the country, and then it turns around and says: "Now that you are not looking we are going to take away $28 million".

The contradictions in this document are endless. It was presented to us in a low key way, pretending that the media would not pay attention to the major changes taking place. But we in this opposition caught on right away. This is a destructive document that we will fight. These last four weeks have seen more destructive pieces of legislation presented to the House of Commons than ever before in our history. If it is a government in preparation for an election, it has a very perverse notion of what this nation is all about, and I can only wish it luck in this presentation.

However, there are alternatives. We have consistently said there are ways of approaching the debt and ways of approaching the infrastructure and ways of rebuilding confidence. There are organizations that have long since worked for social justice in this country. For example, just a few minutes ago I heard from the National Anti-Poverty Organization and it can only declare its disappointment and dissatisfaction with the government for not being willing to deal with the questions of how to feed Canadians and house the homeless.

I end on this note. If you cannot once a year stand up and acknowledge that as a country we no longer feed people and we no longer house them then what has this Parliament come to?

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre deserves to be commended for his excellent speech, which condemned the government's mini budget. As he pointed out, this budget is a disaster, a perversion and anti-Canadian in every sense of the word. The hon. member, who has always shown a keen interest in social welfare issues, saw today that what we have here is a financial catastrophe for the neediest and poorest members of the community.

Take unemployment insurance, for instance. A few months ago the Liberal Party voted against a bill that was passed by the government. The legislation introduced drastic changes in the benefits the unemployed were receiving from the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The government changed the legislation, so that from now on, unemployment insurance premiums will be paid only by the employer and the employee. This means the government is no longer contributing to unemployment insurance benefits.

Today, the government announced that even if employees were now contributing more, without the government's assistance, the UI benefit rate for new beneficiaries would be reduced from 60 per cent to 57 per cent. And we all know that in Canada the number of unemployed is now 1.5 million, and I am referring to those who are receiving unemployment insurance benefits. We also know that 2.3 million Canadians are on welfare. This means that 3.8 million adults in this country, at least most of them, have no jobs and not enough income to survive, to pay the rent, to pay their groceries, to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think the hon. member should put his question, otherwise there will be no time left.

Mr. Bellemare: I would like to ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to expand a little on the welfare aspect because I think this is important, considering the prevailing depression atmosphere as the hon. member said, because this is not just a recession. So could he expand a little on the welfare issue?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester for his comments and his question.

[English]

The reality is that if one looks at the change in the level that a person on unemployment is able to receive, the reduction from 60 per cent to 57 per cent, is a decrease of 3 per cent on paper, but in reality a 5 per cent decrease. We take the poorest people, give them a 5 per cent pay cut and say: "To what extent does that contribute to the stability of a family? How does that make people feel, after working and getting into unusual circumstances they now get a 5 per cent cut?"

The reason we have unemployment insurance is that we make the assumption in this country that most people want to work. I was very interested in the commentary by the member from New Brunswick who made the insinuation that the rules had to be changed because people were quitting UI. It was a very unusual comment he made. I see my time is up.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to speak against the Minister of Finance's mini budget. Yes, I am against this government's budget, and that is what it is. It is a budget put together in a panic when the Minister of Finance realized his earlier projections were way off base.

Regrettably, the actions he proposes in this flawed document today will not position our country for the future. I fear it will continue to lead us further down the path to fiscal disaster. This government has been leading us down that road ever since it decided to stay the course.

Canadians will not be fooled any more by this government. Canadians, including those in my region, have learned that this government cannot be trusted to manage its economic affairs. It certainly is not the government to lead us through the rest of the 1990s.

As an Atlantic Canadian I know the impact this government has had in my own province of Prince Edward Island. I know the people of that province reject out of hand this government's whole economic program.

The tax increases have been unprecedented in magnitude since 1984. The increase in the tax burden in Canada was by far the largest among the G–7 countries, yet our deficit continues to rise. This is a government which took great pride in being competent managers, yet the decline in the economy has meant that despite the massive tax increases the deficit is now out of control.

The only way the government can fight the deficit and bring Canada back to its foremost place among the world economies is to finally set about creating those jobs, jobs, jobs that it has long promised.

Encouraging new jobs through small business is unreal. The cap the minister has just announced on UI premiums will not foster these jobs. The ceiling for loans to small firms under the Small Businesses Loans Act will not help small businesses.

Investing in people is a familiar buzz phrase to all Canadians. Canada's economic prospects depend more and more on the skills of its people and the government should pay heed to that. Where is the retraining, the educational development, the research, the development that has long been promised by this government? Why do we not have a long–term plan to help Canadians gain the competitive edge that this government has long been talking about?

In the interim, what about the long awaited infrastructure program that, while creating much needed jobs in the short term, would give Canada its much needed infrastructure improvement in the long term?

What we received from the government today was another half measure, point one–tenth of a per cent in our Canadian economy. Shame. Shame. The government is not even replacing one–half of the jobs cut at CN Rail with this feeble effort.

Today we hear more political platitudes. We hear again how well the government is doing in fighting the deficit. Today we hear again all those tired old phrases which are designed to convince the people of Canada that the Minister of Finance knows what he is doing.

The people in my part of the country know better. The people in Atlantic Canada have not done well under this government. I stated many times that the deficit cannot be fought on the backs of the poorest regions and the poorest people of this country. We deserve the same access to government programs and services as the rest of Canada and it is time for this government to realize that.

I hope the people of Atlantic Canada realize that all of the good things promised to them have evaporated during the depths of this recession. There seems little in the minister's statement which would give us further hope.

I do congratulate the minister on his announcement concerning engineering and environmental work on the Prince Edward Island fixed–link crossing which is to be undertaken so that the project can go ahead in the spring of 1993. However, the government is still not saying it is definitely a go. One of the bidders was asked tonight on television if they were drinking champagne. They said that no they were not. They do not know yet.

However, I am pleased that the federal government has removed some of the uncertainty which has long surrounded this project. We will now have to carefully examine the details announced by the minister in order to determine that all of the environmental and financial conditions have been met. I am also anxious to see if the conditions outlined by Premier Ghiz have been met.

I caution the minister not to think that if this project goes ahead it will cure all of the ills of that part of the country. We will still be looking for strong government support as we attempt to bring our area up to the economic standards of the rest of Canada.

It is obvious that the favourite whipping boys of this government are the Public Service and public programs. Over the years this government has distinguished itself by beating Canadians over the head with more and more radical spending cuts.

Let me give some of those cuts. The green plan is cut by $172 million, regional and industrial programs are cut by $346 million, native programs are cut by $135 million, and there are cuts in grants and subsidies to most non-profit organizations. There are cuts totalling $1.8 billion.

It seems ironic that this minister is still at war with the government he and his party have led for the last eight years. Ever since this government was elected it has talked about its managerial abilities and the need to reduce the deficit.

Well, the deficit the government inherited has much more than doubled despite dozens of tax increases, including the GST. The deficit projections for the coming year show that its level of management is appalling. Its eight years in power have been marked by an ever decreasing economic performance in this country and its attempts to blame someone else are shameful.

The Minister of Finance and the other members of this government seem to believe that they can somehow convince the Canadian people that prosperity will flow only if they can attack and lay off a few more civil servants and assault the unemployed.

The Minister of Finance has decided that Canadians who lose their jobs will now get reduced unemployment benefits and Canadians who quit their jobs will no longer get unemployment benefits. This is not the answer.

People in all parts of Canada deserve the support that and can only come from a competent, well-trained, dedicated civil service. The people who work for the Government of Canada are second to none. I know that the people of Canada do not find these recurring attacks on our public servants a very suitable way to address the economic problems.

I look upon this financial statement, this mini budget in reality, this budget of my good friend the Minister of Finance with utter and sheer contempt. He comes before this House in a panic because he has been unable to project within $7 billion how much the deficit of this country is going to be.

He, the Prime Minister, and the former Minister of Finance have staked a great deal of their reputations and the reputation of this government on their expertise. The economy of this country is in a shambles. The reputation of the government is in tatters.

I would hope that this government will soon have the courage to face the Canadian people and allow them to pass judgment on this terrible economic record.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member across the way if he understands that with the operating costs of running this government in 1984 when we came into power we inherited $16 billion in the red. That is, we are overpaying by that much. The $16 billion was added onto the debt every year.

Since we have been in power we have reduced that $16 billion. We are down now. We are not in the red; we are in the black. Those are the operating costs of running this government. We are down now to between $6 billion and $8 billion below the line. So we have decreased the cost.

If people running a household are over budget they have to cut their costs. They just do not have that much money to spend, so they cut. It has been done, but every year anything over that which is the interest, compound interest is added to that rising debt which we inherited. It is a devil of a thing to stop its growth. Unfortunately, we have had a bad couple of years of recession, high unemployment and other costs which have added to that. Normally, had it gone on in the way we had anticipated, we would have been able to have stopped the growth of the debt. We are now in a position to do this with this new budget.

I would like to ask the member across the way, because I think this was the first statement today by the Minister of Finance, what would the opposition do in order to help this situation?

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for expressing her concerns and asking me my opinion.

The Conservatives inherited a debt, a debt which has continued to increase over the last eight years. We have seen several tax increases that were supposedly going to reduce this deficit. The debt and the deficit have not been reduced. However, we cannot use this old cliché of reducing the deficit at the cost of the poorer people of this country. I believe and I know this is what has gone on and on and on.

There have been tax increases. There has been the GST. Yet the debt and the deficit continue to rise. Yes, we have to get it under control. There is the financial deficit out there that we need to get under control. But I have heard people say that there is also a moral deficit out there. We have to bring that under control too.

There are more than 1.5 million people unemployed and there are people on welfare. We have to put the country back to work. We as members of Parliament have to give the people of this country the confidence that the government across the way will start this economy rolling again. The infrastructure program that was announced today is not enough.

I assume the government is waiting for the new President of the United States to start its economy rolling and hopefully this one will tag along behind it.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat the question that my colleague has asked him and ask specifically what would he do?

I am very surprised to hear an hon. member and a colleague I respect from Prince Edward Island damn a project of $800 million with faint praise such as he speaks of the fixed-link crossing. Frankly, I thought he would have regarded that as almost a miracle in this budget. There is almost nothing to match it in the way of a financial commitment right across the country. I cannot imagine anything that will have a more profound effect on the economy of the Atlantic region than that project and the similar commitment to the Trans-Canada Highway and the Atlantic expressway.

I heard the hon. member list the expenditure cuts in the Public Service. Most of the constituents I serve, and I am sure most of the constituents that he serves, constantly urge that government be reduced in size and that the federal government particularly gain control of its operations. He has criticized that. He has not proposed new revenue measures that would offset expenditure cuts.

I just have to ask the member and his party what they would do if they would not cut expenditures. They are not really very happy with $800 million capital works projects in their own ridings. They do not have any other revenue areas of contribution to offer. What would they do except wring their hands and criticize?

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join in the debate on the economic and financial statement made by the Minister of Finance today, in economic circumstances that are extremely trying for Canadians.

The Liberal member who just spoke told us that we were doing very little and that this was not the way to deal with Canada's economic problems. However, these problems are due to the fact that we are in a world-wide recession and have only limited resources to fight off its effects. I say limited because Canada has gone into debt, especially since the seventies and the early eighties, to a rather irresponsible extent. Today, they tell us we often use this excuse. Unfortunately we do not have more room to manoeuvre because we spent too much. We have been spending irresponsibly for years, and today, with what resources we have, we are trying to turn around a situation that has gotten out of hand. We have a very high unemployment rate and, I repeat, very little room to manoeuvre.

In his statement, however, the Minister of Finance has offered a way to help Canadians and to restore their confidence in our economy by investing in growth. Of course, our economic progress has been slowed by a stubborn, world-wide recession. Tensions typical of a new world economy weakened by economic restructuring and job displacement have considerably weakened recovery and growth.

The government's priority is to build confidence, enhance recovery, create jobs and help Canadians adjust through this period of transition and take advantage of new opportunities. That is why we have announced a broad range of measures to stimulate public and private investment and economic growth, while cutting back on the cost of government activities. If we want to invest in economic recovery for the sake of growth we cannot afford to raise taxes because we are already overtaxed, and we cannot afford to increase the deficit because it is already far too high. These measures are supported by policies that are already helping to enhance productivity and Canada's ability to compete.

I would also like to emphasize some of the main initiatives described in the minister's economic and financial statement. First of all, support for small business, which is the primary engine of our economy. Canada's federal tax system for small business is one of the most favourable in the world. Compared to the United States, our tax rates are lower. Canadian small businesses enjoy a special deduction that reduces their federal income tax rate to 12.8 per cent, including the 3 per cent surtax, on the first $200,000 of business income. In the United States, federal tax rates for small business range from 15 to 39 per cent in the same bracket.

Canadian small businesses which are incorporated also qualify for the most generous incentives for research and development in the G-7 countries. In particular, let us mention a 35 per cent refundable federal income tax credit, replacing a general 20 per cent credit, that enables small businesses to receive funds directly.

The cumulative capital gains exemption encourages individuals to invest in small businesses. Capital gains of up to $500,000 made when shares in eligible small businesses are sold are exempt. Moreover, only 75 per cent of capital gains above this amount are subject to income tax.

So these are some examples of benefits for our small businesses in Canada. Nevertheless, small business is subject to major financial and competitive pressures. To help promote growth and employment the government is launching a program to stimulate employment and investment in small business. Under this program most companies can hire new workers without paying more employer premiums for unemployment insurance in 1993.

I think that is a considerable help, knowing the needs of small businesses and how little they can afford to hire personnel. This measure will reduce the cost of hiring additional employees by up to $1,600 each.

The other measures include a 10 per cent investment tax credit for small businesses that buy machinery and equipment. We are aware of companies' needs to renew and update their equipment as a result of new technology; the tax measures will give them 10 per cent more purchasing power.

The rules for investments in RRSPs and other funds in small businesses will be simplified and the opportunities for financing expanded. Finally, the financial assistance programs for small business will be enhanced or extended.

We know how important it is to go further in research and development because our small businesses need to discover and develop new products in order to be more competitive. R and D is essential, so the government will help them compete and grow on the world market. Canada is the industrialized country that offers business the most generous R and D tax incentives. We have proposed changes to rationalize and improve the system.

As promised in the February 1992 budget these changes will result in $230 million more aid over the next five years. Nevertheless, the tax rules could be improved in some areas to help companies adapt and grow in this era dominated by knowledge and technological change. For example, the tax system as it applies to computer equipment, in particular, is rapidly becoming obsolete because of technical change.

The government is considering other changes that could be made to the tax system to solve these problems. It has set aside $400 million over five years to eliminate tax obstacles to innovation and growth. We will increase funding for IRAP, the Industrial Research Assistance Program. We will also extend funding for long-term research, based on the best results from the centres of excellence network program.

Of course, there is also labour force training and adjustment. In an increasingly knowledge-based economy Canada's economic prospects depend more and more on the skills of its work force. The federal government is helping to meet this challenge. Its assistance for worker training and adjustment will increase to $3.8 billion next year. As part of this effort, unemployment insurance funds for training and other productive purposes will rise to $2.2 billion. This will help meet the special needs of long-time workers who lose their jobs.

Many other measures have been proposed in the economic statement made by our Minister of Finance but I think that the measures I just listed concerning research and development, training, and small-business assistance will enable our companies to make a greater commitment in those areas, and help reduce unemployment in our country, for the benefit of all Canadians.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, to my colleague, the member for Joliette, I understand that the minister mentioned some changes today in unemployment insurance. I wonder if this is going to pose any particular problem in the member's area? I believe the minister had said this was in order to reduce fraud in that particular branch. Could the member please answer that for me?

Mr. Larrivée: Madam Speaker, my colleague wonders about the impact of these measures on unemployment insurance, since the Minister of Finance indicated, if I understood correctly, that in the future those who quit their job or who lose it almost voluntarily will not be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

In the last few years unemployment insurance has almost become a minimum income for some people. I believe it is absolutely normal in the present context that we make UI what it was meant to be: a plan to help workers who for one reason or another lose their job unexpectedly. The purpose of unemployment insurance, like any other insurance, is to provide reasonable conditions for these people and give them time to find another job.

Therefore, it is quite normal, as I think Canadians will agree, that unemployment insurance revert to its original role, which is to help those who lose their job unexpectedly and not to help those who leave their job or who lose it deliberately.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, there seems to be a misunderstanding developing here. No one in this House condones abuse. We on this side of the House certainly do not condone the abuse of any part of the taxpayer's money.

Our responsibility is not to speak for the advantaged. We are here to speak for the disadvantaged. In a situation such as this, where this act is amended in this way, there is going to be a potential for serious abuse of the person, but not the actual institution. It is our responsibility to point that out. It seems that when we try to be constructive and point out some of the good things in this budget they seem to have a thin skin over there. Is it not our job to point out flaws or mistakes that may be part of this package?

I have to repeat that we are not here to speak for the advantaged people in our country. There are a lot of disadvantaged people and we have to make sure we represent their views.

Mr. Larrivée: It is a pleasure, Madam Speaker, to make the following comment. My colleague says that we should help the disadvantaged and this is precisely what we are doing. These measures are taken precisely to help people get back to work.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, in the past large amounts of money were spent to keep people unemployed. We just kept improving our Unemployment Insurance Program without dealing with the training issue, putting us into debt irresponsibly. Now, some would want us to continue in this way. That is not the way to go. We are acting in the most responsible way, to allow those who want to work to do so. We will take money away from those who do not want to work, those who quit their jobs—when they have a job and decide to quit it is reasonable to assume that they do not want to work—and we will use this money to train those who do want to work. The small businesses will benefit from the actions we are taking. This money will create jobs. We are not abandoning Canadians. Quite the contrary, we are helping the most disadvantaged members of our society.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance today did not have an easy task to perform. No Minister of Finance in any jurisdiction these days does. The task was to try to crash through that invisible wall that confronts all governments, a wall that is made up of the fiscal realities that have imposed themselves on us, the burden of debt that has been accumulated over a number of years, the programs that exist and are committed to have expenditure under them, and the public expectation that all of this can somehow continue even in the face of the need to have spending restraint.

To begin in commenting briefly on a number of the points in his statement this afternoon that caught my eye in particular, I would like to emphasize the important reality that there are no new taxes. That is a fundamental beginning point because this country has had it, Canadians have had it, with being overtaxed. The burden of responsibility has been squarely shouldered today by the Minister of Finance in looking inward to the operations of government to find a way of dealing with the problem and not extending it further on to the taxpayers of the country.

In concert with that, many expenditures have been frozen, from the salary of the Governor General right down through all members of the House, ministers, parliamentarians, judges and the Public Service as well. That principle of freezing has even been continued in the provisions relating to unemployment insurance. The benefits there are frozen as well.

In addition there have been many other areas where spending has been reduced, generally by at least 10 per cent. That would apply to grants or subsidies to organizations and interests groups. They will be cut by 10 per cent in each of the next two years.

That is another point that is very important as we try to ensure in this society that we get a direct link between the people and their elected representatives. Many special interest groups and organizations that have come forward and positioned themselves around the government should find a way of financing themselves rather than look to the government for funding. That is a point of great importance.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I cannot even hear what is being said by the member who has the floor. It must be difficult for other people. I can understand there is an ongoing conversation from one side of the House to the other, but I am told the President of the Treasury Board will be speaking shortly and there will be a period of questions and answers. I am sure the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands will make sure he asks his question then.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I had hoped so but I am going to leave. That is the problem.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I wish a nice evening to the hon. member.

Mr. Boyer: Madam Speaker, I was just emphasizing the importance of this reduction of 10 per cent in grants and subsidies this year and the coming year. I wanted to emphasize a further point, that those reductions have important exemptions to them.

I was quite disturbed to hear in almost a cliché fashion some of the criticism from the Liberal Party spokesmen in the House. They talked about these measures being carried out on the backs of the poor, as if the government was trying to squeeze blood from a stone.

It is very important to recognize that exempted from this is the Old Age Security program. That is very important for seniors in our country. Also exempted are the guaranteed income supplement, the spouses' allowance, programs for the disabled, war veterans' allowances and veterans' disability pensions.

The Government of Canada today made the commitment that we will not be reducing any of our efforts in famine relief around the world. I think that is a real tribute to the Minister of Finance, who in the face of the tremendous difficulties he is facing with the finances of our country still shows that compassion. We can seek efficiency in public funding and public financing but not lose the compassion for the people in our society who do need assistance, who do need some help and support. We have not seen a single cent of that reduced today and I want to pay a special compliment to the Minister of Finance for that.

Just three or four other quick points that are very important. The measures dealing with housing and the stimulus that we have already seen from the last budget relating to both the RRSP possibility for first home buyers and the reduction from 10 per cent to 5 per cent for the down payment have been working successfully. It is important that today that has been continued in terms of the RRSP for home buyers.

Small business, which has been responsible for creating over two million jobs in the Canadian economy within the last decade, also finds new possibilities for higher levels of loans and working capital in today's financial policies announced by the Minister of Finance. This is going to be very important, particularly in areas like my constituency of Etobicoke—Lakeshore where there are a lot of small businesses in manufacturing and service which need that kind of financial assistance now that they are working their way out of the recession.

Another very specific measure that will apply also in our area is the grade separation program with relation to railways. That is something for which we have been looking for a long time and will have direct safety and employment benefit in our community, as will the efforts to upgrade the two terminals at Pearson International Airport.

I single that one out again to make tribute here to the Minister of Finance. What has to be appreciated is the change in the approach to government funding. This upgrading will be done using private financing. In short, we have come to the day where government does not have to row the boat and do everything, as long as government is steering the boat. We can now look for a more intelligent way of using limited dollars to accomplish public work in this country, such as this.

Finally, the point that I wanted to conclude with is on quite a different dimension. It concerns the electronic highway and the measures that were announced today for further funding for this new age. We are now in, the future that is already with us that relates to the information centres being established because of the fact that, computers, faxes, electronic transmission of data, satellites and all the rest of it together make up this electronic highway through which information is transmitted and received and analysed in our new world society. This is something tremendously exciting for a country like Canada, a country that has so much distance that separates us. This will be a great new unifying bond for the country. Again, I am happy to be supporting this measure because that is the way of the future. It is also a way to a far more effective and unified country through the new methods that we are living with currently.

In all these areas, right down to the provisions that have in so much detail been described by other members, this reordering this afternoon by the Minister of Finance of the nation's financial house, putting it in order in these very difficult circumstances, is something that warrants support. I am glad to rise and give my support to it.

• (1940)

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I was listening to my colleague talk about the electronic highway.

[English]

I have a real problem trying to understand how we can have an electronic highway when our government does not seem to have enough money to pay its electric bill. We are practically bankrupt. We are talking about the future. At the same time we are bringing forth a kind of mini budget that targets the most vulnerable people in our society, the unemployed. We are actually right now dealing with the unemployed in a way which is most cruel. Before they had certain benefits under the unemployment insurance scheme, but now they do not have those benefits. They have less.

Also, we have entered into a situation where they will be punished. They will lose the benefits that they have actually paid for if they quit their job or if they are fired or let go for whatever is defined as misconduct.

How can this kind of cruelty to the people who are most vulnerable be defended by a government which says that it is looking forward to the future, a government which says it cares about its citizens? I would especially like to attract my colleagues' attention to the fact that this could be used as a tool against whistle-blowers, people who are not in agreement with their company's policies which may be against the public health or the public good. It could be used as a tool to silence these people and they would never have unemployment insurance.

I am just wondering where is the compassion of this government. While we are talking about an electronic highway why do we not talk about what is real to most Canadians, and that is their unemployment insurance benefits.

[Translation]

Mr. Boyer: Madam Speaker, I would like to take a minute to reply to my colleague who was inquiring about unemployment and unemployment insurance.

First of all, let me tell him that in my riding it is a real problem for small businesses when employees quit their jobs for the sake of taking advantage of a government program. Small businesses are hit hard by this kind of abuse of the system. Today, we are trying to address this problem.

[English]

He puts this also in connection with what I was saying about the electronic highway, as if to compare these two is somehow to deny the reality that we are already existing in a world where information is being transmitted this way. Whether they are changes to the telephone as we have come to know it, and all the transformation about that, through to the new ability to simply scan books and put that right on to computer or what is now being developed with fibre optics which will go straight from the publishing house to the data base in libraries and so on which will completely bypass the printers, the books, the book sellers and all those things that we know. That is not something of the future. That is something that we are currently living in.

It has been a rare day to see it even raised on the floor of the House of Commons. For the past two days there has been a conference going on here in Ottawa at the Congress Centre. I was the only MP who was there. It was on electronic democracy. It was talking about the whole new world that we are living in. It is fundamentally important to see this $600 million project get under way.

The same point I was making about the upgrading of the Pearson airport applies here. This is being done in a partnership with private business. It is not looking to just take public money to put into this.

Mr. Edmonston: How about whistle-blowers?

Mr. Boyer: The hon. member is commenting about whistle-blowers. I do not know what the context of that is. I do want to say again that I support the changes relating to unemployment insurance. They are overdue. I support the approaches being taken with respect to the new world of our electronics society—past the industrial society into the electronics society—that we are living in so much now because it is very forward looking, and many of the other temporal measures that we find in here will fade away over time.

This provision relating to the new age of communication is so far-reaching and fundamental for Canada, a country that because of our distances has always been at the pioneering edge of developing new methods of communication and transportation. We can be proud of that as Canadians because it is an area in which we have excelled. That is why all members on all sides of the House should be looking at that measure with a lot of support and encouragement.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I am going to share my time with the member for Nickel Belt. We are true socialists, we share everything.

There might have been a time, and there probably was, when governments on one side of the aisle would say: "We will just help our friends in big business and somehow they will, on the supply side, solve all of the economic problems of the nation". On the other side of the aisle somebody else would find the phrase: "We are going to kick start the economy". Maybe at some point in our history things were that simple. I do not really believe they are any more.

I regret some of what I have seen and heard in here today because it seems to me to be far too simplistic. I recognize that someone has gone to a great deal of effort to integrate all the politically correct buzzwords into the statements that were made in this Chamber today. All of the genuflexions at the altar of high technology have certainly been acknowledged.

I understand, having been in politics at just about every level there is now, that somehow if we can get somebody to put it on a piece of paper, and certainly if we can put a little logo at the bottom that says "Canada", then it gives it validity no matter what it is. If we can get somebody to draw a chart and put some numbers together, then it simply must be true.

However, I am still struggling with some fundamentals on this. I come from the old school where if we take a deficit from $27.5 billion and get it up to $34.4 billion, then we have not reduced it, you have increased it. I am sorry, but I have been struggling all afternoon with how that reduction occurred and how dramatically it has impacted on us.

I admit that we are talking about billions of dollars. I do not usually deal in billions of dollars. Most Canadians do not have a real good understanding of how high they would have to pile that amount of money on the kitchen floor to get to a billion. I admit that we are into an area of the economy where the amounts we are talking about are staggering to most people. Still I am waiting for someone to explain to me how that could be portrayed as a reduction. Even if it is printed up in a little book, and if the little book is not good enough then it is printed up in another little booklet, and if that little booklet is not good enough then it is printed as a graph.

I admit it has got it all. The government has managed to get it on paper, it has the stamp of the Government of Canada on it and has a graph to boot.

Here are some premises that are important for Canadians to note, just to see at their kitchen table whether there is any truth in this kind of statement at all. It says here that the government is making government leaner and more efficient. Pause on that one for a while. Have we seen that lately?

I just walked in the front door and the leaner and more efficient limousines are circling out there, and if they are not circling the drivers are leaning against them. Where I come from that does not constitute lean and efficient. Where I come from if people are broke and you are out of a job, they are not real worried about how lean and efficient the chauffeur of their limousine really is, and they really do not care people whether he polishes the limo either, because the truth is they have not got a limo to bother about.

It says here that there is tax reform under way in this country. Tax reform. Hold on a minute. Where? For whom? For the vast majority of Canadians who pay the tax when they went to the corner store last night to buy something did someone say: "Tax reform under way here, there is no GST tonight"? When they put gas in their car this morning did somebody say: "Wait a minute, tax reform under way. Governments aren't going to tax gasoline any more"? When it comes to doing their income tax, does that mean there is somebody in this Chamber who actually understands the income tax form?

What I do not fathom at all about this is that when people do not need money everybody wants to lend them money. When they are wealthy, they can use all the investment incentives, those are the polite words, that this government provides to prevent them from having to pay income tax. But if they are poor, if they are struggling with their pay cheque each week just to meet all the obligations that they have as a family there are not any incentives for them.

I come from a part of Canada that was once considered to be the industrial heartland. We are changing our definitions about that these days. People used to refer to the area that I live in as the Golden Horseshoe. There is a lot of rust in the Golden Horseshoe these days. A lot of plants used to be there. It says in these documents that free trade is wonderful. Not where I come from, not in the plants that have closed in my area, not in the incentives that are present in any part of our economy. Our people are struggling very hard to try to turn that around.

It says in these documents that many people are being asked to take no increase. That is tough for all of us, all those in the cabinet, all those in the Senate, all those judges. I am asked to stand pat on $90,000 a year or a pensioner to stand pat on $25,000 a year, let me explain to who got the best of that deal. Not the pensioner. The fact that nothing was taken away from those who do not have anything in the first place is not exactly a noble act in my book. To try to portray that as something wonderful is not exactly fair where I come from.

I find there is a world here on the Hill that never meets the other world in which I live. I know that tonight the television cameras are out front of the doors of this Chamber and the Minister of Finance is out there giving an interview; Mike Duffy is holding forth on the bench on the stairs; and everything is going along pretty normally here.

Where I come from things are not normal and I had anticipated—wrongly again, I should have learned this by now—when I saw the municipalities struggle to get together and identify some things which could be done and should be done, would be productive in municipalities across Canada, that after that much effort this government would respond. It did not.

I saw a provincial government negotiating over the last six months or so with this government to identify things which could be done and should be done, which would be productive. I went through this booklet to find out what is happening in Ontario. Nada.

I phoned my friend Pink Floyd—of course I cannot get through to Pink Floyd anymore—and got through to one of his staff members I know and asked what was going on. He said they were still negotiating but were not sure they had been shut out completely. They were going to give the federal government the benefit of the doubt and see what happens.

It is certainly a strange economic statement, never mind budget, that attempts to do something about Canada's economy. It looks the heartland of our economic structure in the eyeball and says: "I'll tell you what we are doing for you. We are going to redecorate the airport in Toronto".

The Tories missed something there. They really did, especially when one of the three terminals at the airport may not have much business in the near future.

There is a change in this country that defies the old economic rules of what school people went to and what text book they read about economics. The change is that governments are more complicated now than they ever were. It is hard to imagine that governments once functioned in Canada without consultants. Not cutting back, not leaner and meaner—they did not have them. Government once went about its business in Canada without a big advertising campaign to tell everybody it was doing what it was paid to do in the first place.

Imagine my auto workers if they were given the kind of budget the Minister of Finance had. Here is my friend Derek Gandy making trucks today at GM. Look at Derek make trucks. We always felt that was why General Motors always paid Derek. Go down to the south plant and make the trucks, Derek. It does not need an advertising campaign to do that. Just go do it.

There are some remarkable things that have happened in government in Canada in the last little while, not all of which were helpful.

I read the Auditor General's report. I loved the one about the golden handshake where the gold transpired and sometimes the handshake transpired, but the job continued. It seems to me that governments at all levels really ought to take the Auditor General's report and not study it, just do it, without question.

It has already been studied. That is how it got in the Auditor General's report. The Auditor General even sends me a video. I cannot tell my personal reaction to getting a video cassette from the Auditor General of Canada. There are other video cassettes I would rather get than that one. He sends me the book. I can read the book. I really do not need a video.

Somehow in the process of governing this country we have patterns that I find strange and indefensible, particularly when I go home and sit down with some little old lady or some little old guy who is on a fixed income and try to explain at the kitchen table what life is like in Ottawa. It is like an alien planet plunked down here in the Gatineau. They have no concept of what it is like.

None of them have staff people saying: "Boy, you really did a great job today. What a snappy question. Could I write a speech for you?" They can all speak. They certainly do that to me. Somebody was here the other day prattling on about lobbyists' fees and how individuals would have to pay a fee to come to see the local member. Not where I come from. Nobody would have the stupidity to try that one there. They have a right to stop me in the middle of the Miracle Mart or the A & P Store and tell me their economic theories. They do that right by the kettles every time I am fool enough to go in there. They stop me whenever I go to the Canadian Tire and they tell me about the GST. They do not have charts. They do not have videos. They have empty wallets. Those are the facts as they see them.

What saddens me about this statement is that it was an opportunity for governments, instead of having a conference, instead of having a first ministers' meeting, to pick up that magic machine called the telephone without creating an electronic highway to do so, push some buttons and listen to what other people had to say. Governments should work together instead of working in splendid isolation.

I see a missed opportunity here. I do not care how nicely they dress it up, how many new global economies they bring into play, how many wonderful charts they have or how many videos they have. The opportunity was missed. Where I come from we are suffering and this ignores us completely.

I want to close by saying something that I kind of regret but I think should be said. This is all complicated stuff. Sometimes it comes down to something which is simple, a little vignette. I sat in this Chamber this afternoon when the minister announced the change to UI that had people losing their UI benefits if they were fired or if they quit without just cause.

I know how tough it is to establish what is meant by just cause, who is right and who is wrong. That is a tough thing to do. I remember thinking at the moment he announced that change: What difference does that make? Is that not a mean little vindictive thing to do to somebody? It is not going to save the national debt. That is for sure. Beside the Minister of Finance was the Prime Minister himself. He led the applause on that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member. I know he said he was sharing with his colleague from Nickel Belt. I can tell his colleague from Nickel Belt that even though I did try, he will have eight minutes remaining after the five minutes of questions and comments.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I am almost tempted to ask unanimous consent of the House for the hon. member to carry on for another 10 minutes. It was not just eloquent; it was kitchen table-ish. It sounded like sitting down with somebody at the kitchen table and actually getting the goods straight from the individual sitting across the way.

I will relate a story for the hon. member for Oshawa in the simplest of terms. There is someone in my riding who owns a restaurant and is doing pretty well. He wants to expand that restaurant. He wants to make sure the opportunity is there to double the space in his restaurant. He is pretty darn sure he can get a lot more people to come to that restaurant. He went to the bank and asked for the money to expand his business and the bank said: "Sorry, Charlie".

In the document today the Minister of Finance announced measures to help small businesses secure financing. He doubled the ceiling of small business loans from $100,000 to $200,000 and today he added another $50,000 to raise the ceiling to $250,000 on small business loans. What good is it if they cannot get the money even at $100,000?

Does the hon. member for Oshawa have that kind of an experience in his riding?

Mr. Breaugh: Yes.

• (2000)

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Oshawa on his excellent speech. He mentioned that if a person left his job voluntarily he would not be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. I think some people leave their jobs for very good reasons. I imagine there usually is a good reason, and they do not leave because all of a sudden they feel lazy or they want to stop working. Some people leave their jobs because of sexual harassment. Take the woman who is harassed by her boss, has no way to defend herself and does not know where to turn. She has no choice but to: leave her job. Perhaps the hon. member for Oshawa would care to comment on the case of a woman who was a victim of sexual harassment, and had to leave her job but would not be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits.

[English]

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, I would tell her simply that she has become a victim of this government. She ought to get herself into a good union or get a good lawyer really quickly.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I sat here and listened with more than just a casual amount of interest to what I refer to as Brooklyn banter. It was fairly basic kitchen talk. It was so basic that the last question I heard in relation to the last answer I heard obviously told me that neither the questioner, with all due respect, nor the answerer had the essence of the bill that the Minister of Finance related to us today.

Quite simply put, if a person does leave their job because they feel that there was sexual harassment, that does not include them in this measure. They are exempted and as a result would continue to receive their unemployment insurance.

Therefore, there is a lot of misinformation that floats around this Chamber. I simply wanted to bring that to the attention of hon. members. There is a list of excuses or reasons that people can use legitimately to leave their place of employment which does not render them victims of society or, for that matter, victims of this bill. It is a logical bill and I would just hope that the hon. member for Oshawa would apprise himself of that. I just wonder if he has.

Mr. Breaugh: Madam Speaker, I do not mean to try to straighten anybody out on that side but there is no bill before us. What we had was called a statement.

We will take the member's veritable words and the wonderful advice that he just gave. For the person who comes into my office who has been fired and is not a member of a union or another bargaining unit and who has to go through the federal or provincial labour code to try to determine whether the hiring or the firing was justified it will be some comfort for them for the six months it takes to determine whether it was justifiable or not. The hon. member said that I do not understand what is going on here. At the end of the six months he or she will understand, I will understand and I hope the member does.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, I am glad my hon. colleague from Oshawa is not the finance minister. The way he just nickled and dimed me out of two minutes I would hate to see what wonders he would have brought on the economy of Canada today.

Prior to the statement today, the press was carrying a statement that the Minister of Finance was going to give the economy a gentle nudge, a coup de pouce, a petit coup de pouce. I want to say that he looked the economy right in the eye and he did not give it a gentle nudge, he gave it the back of his hand. That is what he did today.

I want to make that point and I want to show how he does that. I looked at page 30 in his paper Investing in Growth. Listen to this. The minister asks this question:

> Are Canadians getting less service for their tax dollars?

Here is the answer. Imagine that the Tories put this answer down:

> Some feel that they are now getting less service for their tax dollar than in the past. They are right.

There is such honesty. He then goes on to say:

> But there is no choice.

This is what he says in the statement on page two under the heading of maintaining responsible, balanced policies:

> The essence of governing is choosing. There are choices to be made

That is right. This minister had choices. He could have made choices. He had to make choices. Unfortunately, he chose his friends. He chose to slap in the face the people who can least defend themselves in this economy.

He cut back the unemployment insurance program. Imagine next year taking $550 million out of the pockets of beneficiaries and in the year after that, $1 billion. Everybody was looking to the consumer to rescue this economy. What kind of cockamamie politics and economics is this? One takes money out of the pockets of the people who are supposed to rescue the economy by opening their wallets and spending. The ones who are least able to defend themselves are the victims of the economic policies of this government.

About four years ago we were running at an inflation rate of about 6 per cent. The governor of the Bank of Canada, John Crow, is cruel and hard-hearted. He embarked on a policy of fighting inflation and wrestling it to zero. He did not care who the victims were. The unemployment went up and up and the the inflation, of course, came down. It did not affect his salary or the salaries of his friends over at the bank. It is easy to fight inflation on the backs of workers by slowing the economy down and turning up the unemployment rate.

What did this government cut back? It cut programs that service the victims. We are talking about the rape crisis centres getting cut back 10 per cent in each year for the next two years. We are talking about all of those centres that service people who have some kind of drug dependency or need co-operative housing. There is a whole host of services cut back, which will mean reduced services to people. The minister says they will get less service for the buck it collects from them. He is absolutely correct. Then he also cut back the spending programs.

I know he is saying: "Well, we have to get this deficit under control, so where were we going to get the money? How could we leave them alone?" I have some suggestions for the minister.

It always makes me wonder what is going on. When Standard Trust went down the tubes the government did not have a billion dollars but it sure as hell got the billion dollars and bailed out the depositors of Standard Trust. It put the taxpayers of Canada on the hook for Central Guaranty Trust to the tune of about $4 billion. If any of them went down the tubes at the Toronto Dominion

Bank where is the government going to get the money to bail them out? It has guaranteed them.

It guaranteed the Westray Mine and the Bank of Nova Scotia collected its $80 million today. If CPA goes down tomorrow, where is it going to get the money to bail it out? Yes, it has choices to make and it has made those choices. Stomp on the families of Canada. Stomp on the unemployed. However, it bailed out its friends in the financial sector. It bails them out all the time. Standard Trust cost us a billion bucks.

An hon. member: It did?

Mr. Rodriguez: It certainly did: $1 billion. There is more to come and it is going to find the money for that.

I could have told him where he could get money. For starters, he could look at the Auditor General's report. Why not close the loopholes he pointed out. Look at the setting up of those offshore shelters for wealthy corporations that make money in this country and do not pay their fair share of taxes. Why do we not start with the family trusts that are worth $70 billion? Since the Liberals set up the shelter for them they have not paid one penny of tax. This government is going to bring in a bill that extends it another 20 years, so that they will never pay one penny of tax. Who pays?

Its friends do not pay, but ordinary Canadians pay. The unemployed pay and the poor pay. Look at that. It is nickel and diming $300 million out of people who quit their jobs. There are some jobs that have to be quit. It then reduces the limit. I have no problem with absorbing the premiums for UI for small businesses for a year. That is a good idea. I think it is also equally a good idea to absorb the premiums for the employees for a year.

It seems to me that we must be even-handed. It does not absorb the premiums for 1993 for the employees. It absorbs it for small businesses, which is a good idea. How about giving the workers a break for a year? They create jobs too when they spend the money they earn. Maybe it is not through the heads of the Conservatives yet but they are probably the best investment, instead of pouring money into all kinds of shysters. In fact, when Northland Bank went down it not only bailed out the insured depositors, but it bailed out everybody, for God's sake.

There are other places the government could find money. I have more suggestions for the government. What about the helicopters? There is $4.4 billion. Put the $4.4 billion off and forget that. Look at interest rates. Most of national debt that we have accumulated is a result of the compound interest. Most of that is compound interest. We are running about 4 per cent higher, in real interest rate terms, than our competitors in the United States. We are double the normal difference. Why would we not lower the interest rates? Why did this government allow the interest rates to rise? Why? It is because it has to keep its international banquiers, or casino players, happy.

You have to feed the lion. When the lion is hungry you have to keep stuffing American dollars into his mouth. I am sorry but I have to stop.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thought the hon. member was going to thank me for giving him the extra two minutes. Questions or comments. The hon. member for Joliette.

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Nickel Belt is very colourful and puts a lot of passion into what he says, and he is even funny. However, I am concerned because we are talking about unemployment and other problems we are experiencing in Canada and he is proposing solutions that would be hard to implement.

He would like to see us beef up our unemployment insurance programs. He would like us to give the unemployed who do not have jobs, for obvious reasons, more generous unemployment insurance benefits. He suggests that the government get the money by taking steps against the industries that are taking advantage of the situation. He never said that industries create jobs. He never said that industries give Canadians a chance to work. No, industries are taking advantage of the situation, and he would like to see us introduce measures to make these industries get up and leave the country and go to places where conditions are more favourable. On the other hand, and this is typical of the New Democrats, they say that we should protect our borders and not have an agreement with our neighbours. It does not make sense, all these contradictions. Today, the Minister of Finance proposed a number of measures to help businesses create jobs and all I have heard from the hon. member is that we should not encourage businesses and we should beef up our unemployment insurance programs.

Does the hon. member for Nickel Belt not have any suggestions for creating jobs at the same time, since that seems to be his main argument, to protect the little guy, with a lot of grand gestures? He says we are crushing the little guy, but we want to create jobs for people who are on unemployment insurance. I would like to know whether he has a more acceptable method for correcting our unemployment problems.

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to respond. First of all let us get something clear. These UI programs—let us understand very clearly, let us put the deck on the table.

The employers and the employees pay for the unemployment insurance program. This government removed itself from participating in the unemployment insurance program so that any benefits which are in the program are paid for by the employers and the employees.

I have no problem at all with industries and with putting a climate in place that encourages industries to invest and expand. However, if I were the finance minister I would not allow industries to take advantage of scams and loopholes in the income tax system to avoid paying their fair share of taxes.

If the hon. member is suggesting to me that because some other country allows its industries to do that sort of thing we should get into the mug's game then where will it end? The looser its tax system becomes with respect to its taxpayers the looser ours should become?

That is reducing the economy to the lowest common denominator not raising it to the highest common factor, if that is the kind of mug's game we want to get into.

Creating jobs, yes. If this document that was read today made creating jobs the focus I would have taken off my hat to the minister. I would have kissed his hand. I would have kissed his knee. I would have stopped there. If it did that I would have applauded him.

In the statement he took great pride in saying we brought inflation down to less than 2 per cent. We never heard in great detail the projections about unemployment. After all of this pain the unemployment rate will be 11 per cent or more; 11 per cent. Imagine the productivity that is lost with over 1.5 million unemployed in our country.

There are things we can do that are investments in the country, such things as an infrastructure and renovations. The best way to go is to train and educate. These are investments. They are expenditures but they mean jobs for the future.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak during this debate on the actions the government has announced to improve the state of public finances and to restore our economy. In doing so I would like to indicate what the government sees as the future of the Public Service in supporting Canada's economic competitiveness.

This government has attempted in each year since 1985 to reduce the cost and increase the efficiency of service delivery. In budget after budget, and often in between, reductions have been imposed on the planned operating expenditures of departments. Today's measures affect programs delivered by public servants as well as transfers to individuals and grants and contributions to organizations and business.

I want to underline the fact that the government could not have made the reductions that were necessary and continued to serve Canadians adequately were it not for the professionalism and dedication of the employees of the Public Service of Canada.

The cost reduction measures outlined in today's economic statement are substantial and, given the cumulative effect of the cuts over the past eight years, represent a major challenge for those who deliver the services.

The 2 per cent reduction in operating budgets for 1992–1993 has been introduced two-thirds of the way through the fiscal year. Many departments are having to impose their own freeze on hiring and virtually all discretionary expenditures to achieve the required savings. The cuts in 1993–1994 and future years amount to approximately 5 per cent of planned expenditures on operations and require even more severe measures.

The economic situation that led to these measures is not unique to the Canadian federal government. The world economy has been weaker than expected and growth projections for most countries have been revised downward. This in turn has reduced revenues and increased pressures on public expenditures.

Fiscal responses have varied but in all cases they took the form of severe expenditure reductions. For example the Governments of Italy, Sweden, and Great Britain have in the past few months all announced fiscal restraint packages, some of which include wage freezes and all of which include program reductions and increased delivery of services by the private sector.

In Canada provinces are also feeling the pressure on their deficits owing mainly to revenue shortfalls. Five provincial governments have announced expenditure reduction measures in the last month alone.

What are the fiscal requirements for limiting wages? The Canadian government program expenditures, other than those for unemployment insurance and transfers to the provinces, have remained well within planned levels. However, the revenues available to the government have declined relative to the projections in the 1992 budget by about 6 per cent in 1992–1993 and 7 per cent in 1993–1994.

The economic statement calls for reductions in the operating costs of government from the levels announced in the last budget of $1 billion in 1993–1994 and $1.4 billion in 1994–1995, exclusive of the special reduction of $250 million in defence spending in 1994–1995.

This requires on average a reduction of about 5 per cent of the operating costs of government below the planned level; about 4.3 per cent in 1993–1994 and 5.5 per cent in 1994–1995.

Approximately two–thirds of operating budgets are devoted to personnel costs. Since in most departments operations and maintenance expenditures have not been increased for inflation since 1985 these non–salary components offer limited scope for further reductions without serious impact on service delivery.

This means that in 1993–94 the over–all wage bill will have to be brought down from planned levels by approximately $800 million on total personnel costs of $19 billion.

The question then becomes that of the best way to achieve the approximately $800 million reduction in the wage bill with the minimum effect on delivery of services and minimal layoffs of public servants.

In weighing the options the government decided that the most effective way of achieving this result would be a combination of a wage freeze and a reduction in planned Public Service employment to a degree that could be achieved mostly through attrition.

Legislation will be introduce to freeze federal public sector wages for some 390,000 persons in total, including all cabinet ministers, MPs, senators and their staffs, employees of the House of Commons, Senate and Library of Parliament, employees of the Public Service, Order in Council appointees and members of Canadian Forces and the RCMP.

Employees of Crown corporations that are dependent on appropriations and that are not in competition with the private sector, such as the museums corporations, will have their wages frozen. Crown corporations that are dependent on appropriations but are in competition with the private sector, such as VIA Rail, will be funded as if their wages were frozen. All other Crown corporations are being asked to keep their wage settlements in line with the wage policy.

One can ask how many jobs will have to be cut. As all departments will be managing under the new operating budget regime next year each will be able to determine the mix of savings between salary and non–salary dollars to best meet their requirements. It is, therefore, not possible to forecast with precision the over–all employment implications. However, some rough estimates can be made at this time.

For the 235,000 employees in the Public Service for whom Treasury Board is the employer, which does not include the military and uniformed RCMP, the required reduction from planned levels in the wage bill is about two–thirds of the $800 million, or just over $500 million. The government had planned for an increase of up to one per cent in employment in each of the next two years so the net reduction in the wage bill for 1993–94 is just over $400 million from the 1992–93 levels.

The savings from the wage freeze on these employees will look after all but about $190 million, which must be found through reductions of 3,000 to 4,000 in employment levels. We believe that most of this can be achieved through attrition. The current rate of attrition, mainly through retirements and resignations, in the Public Service is four per cent, or 8,000 to 9,000 people per year. Most departments were planning for roughly stable employment levels for the next two years but some were already planning for decreases, and a very few were planning for increases to meet significantly greater demands.

Arrangements will be made through the Public Service Commission to facilitate the retraining and transfer of employees to departments that would otherwise be hiring from outside the Public Service. If an over-all reduction of 3,000 to 4,000 in employment levels can be achieved next year then further employment reductions would not be necessary in the second year to reach the target reductions in operating budgets.

[English]

The government recognizes that in freezing salaries it is asking its employees to take a reduction in their real salaries. This creates a reduction in living standards for loyal employees who have no control over declining revenues during a period in which they are continually asked to perform their duties with fewer resources. The government recognizes this and asks Canadians in turn to recognize the contribution its employees are making to help get the country's public finances in order.

• (2030)

Over the next five years, the government will be introducing, in phases, a new job classification system with a gender-neutral evaluation plan. This plan is being designed with extensive input from Public Service unions, the Canadian Human Rights Commission and outside experts to ensure it respects the principles of equal pay for work of equal value.

Once this is completed it will be necessary to find the best way simultaneously to satisfy the equal pay provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act and to negotiate collective agreements that are sensitive to Canadian labour markets.

The Human Rights Commission's equal wages guidelines allow for wage differentials that respond to labour shortages in particular occupations or geographical areas. The government will consult unions and other employers on the fairest and most effective way to meet both objectives during the next round of collective bargaining.

The measures set out in the economic statement were not discussed with the Public Service unions before they were announced. The government carefully considered whether it would be in the public interest to try to negotiate wage levels that were affordable. In light of the experience in the last round of bargaining, which culminated in the strike by the largest Public Service union in September 1991, it was decided that it was not in the interest of the public nor of employees to enter into negotiations facing a fiscal situation that virtually guaranteed the government would be unable to meet union demands. This decision, was not taken lightly.

The government hopes that at the end of the period of extreme fiscal stringency covered by the proposed legislation collective bargaining could resume in a normal way. In the meantime, consultations can continue through the national joint council on non-compensation issues during the period of the wage freeze. As well, I have established a joint committee to undertake a full review of the management of Public Service pensions.

[English]

Reductions of 5 per cent in planned operating costs of government will inevitably have an impact on the level of services that the government can provide to Canadians from their tax dollars. In the short run, it will simply not be possible to do more with less. The Public Service has been successful in achieving effective productivity improvements each year as increasing demands have had to be met with ever more constrained resources.

Since 1985 the government has been providing services to a more diverse population that has grown by 8 per cent with 2.3 per cent fewer employees and operating and maintenance expenditures that, for most departments, have not been increased to take account of inflation. Although there have been some reductions in certain service areas there has been growth in such areas as native programs, the green plan, the drug strategy, AIDS research and immigration. In broad terms, the Public Service has been achieving productivity increases of at least the rate of general productivity growth in the economy. This is an achievement for which Canadians and their Public Service employees can be proud.

While the growth in demand anticipated for the next year will vary from program to program the growth in population is probably the best comprehensive indicator of the change in demand for services. It is projected to be 1.2 per cent annually over the next few years. This increase in demand has to be addressed with fewer employees and reduced operations and maintenance expenditures. Of necessity, some services will suffer. Departments are being asked to find as much as possible of the cost reduction through streamlining of internal administrative processes and to maintain essential services, particularly those pertaining directly to the health and safety of Canadians. However, many departments will have to reduce levels of service in areas that are important but not absolutely essential.

Some rationalization of the delivery systems will be required. This may involve consolidation of offices and alternative forms of delivery, such as greater use of telephone services and new forms of automation.

There will be administrative innovation to achieve the saving in administration processes and support and the government has undertaken a series of initiatives. The operational review of the five government departments and agencies concerned with internal administration have now been completed and savings of at least 5 per cent will be achieved without noticeable effect on service to the public.

The Council on Administrative Renewal, led by the Comptroller General of Canada, is reducing the cost of government administration. It is looking at alternative methods of delivering administrative services, at re-engineering current processes and at possibilities for sharing systems government-wide. This applies to areas such as financial management, materiel and property management, human resources and information management.

There will be some consolidation of administrative support functions between departments. A substantial portion of the federal government's operating costs are devoted to regulatory and enforcement activities. Some savings are anticipated from the extensive regulatory reviews launched in the last budget.

[Translation]

Investing in people and technology, the government believes that to ensure a healthy economy it must maintain an innovative and professional Public Service. While the government has been forced to make hard decisions on wages and operating budgets it will continue to promote improvements to the way in which the Public Service is managed, and encourage innovations in the work place. As an example, the Treasury Board recently announced a pilot policy on telework that will help some employees better balance their work and personal demands. Through Public Service 2000, departments are fostering creative approaches to management that empower employees and create a more open and participative work environment.

[English]

As I said in my opening remarks, the expenditure reduction measures announced by the Minister of Finance are very severe and far-reaching. The government is calling on federal employees to make greater sacrifices in their standard of living than at any time in recent memory. Similarly, we are calling on the Canadian public to understand why there may be reductions in some of the services they have grown accustomed to receiving. The service level may not be all we would like to provide but it will be the best the country can afford.

We will continue to work with our employees and their bargaining agents and consult with client groups to modernize government operations and to provide cost effective service to Canadians. I am confident that we can achieve the changes in government operations required to meet these spending reductions.

As President of the Treasury Board I have been exposed on a daily basis to the ways in which employees have vigorously met the challenges of restraint. I am certain that we can continue to pursue new ways to deliver programs and enable the Public Service of Canada to remain a vital national institution.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I rise to indicate that today's economic and fiscal statement by the hon. Minister of Finance earlier this afternoon lacks a plan of action to eliminate poverty and to attain full employment. In fact, it lacks social conscience. It is a blueprint to penalize the unemployed, the poor on social assistance and the small businesses facing the credit crunch. I again remind this government of the stark social realities: 1.5 million unemployed, 2.3 million on social assistance, 3.8 million are poor, of whom 1 million are children, and 2 million rely on the food banks. Does this government care about them?

I ask the minister to explain how his government can indicate that the average benefits will be frozen and yet the only thing that will happen will be a reduction in benefits. Where is the arithmetic? How can an average figure be frozen when the only thing that will happen is a reduction and there is no suggestion of any increased benefits in any arm of the program? I cannot follow the arithmetic.

Will the minister, who has said public sector employees will be asked to accept a reduction in real take-home pay, not admit that it would be more compassionate and fair to reduce the size of cabinet today?

Would it not be better management to stop the illegal awarding of contracts to political friends to the tune of millions of dollars? As recently reported by the Auditor General, in the health and welfare department alone, 22 out of 23 contracts to the tune of millions of dollars were illegally awarded. Why does the minister not have a budgetary projection of savings by avoidance and cessation of illegal mismanagement by this government?

Mr. Loiselle: Madam Speaker, the hon. member says that this government lacks a plan of action to eliminate poverty. Then he states the numbers that are indeed very worrying: The number of unemployed, the number of people who are in difficult straits. My answer is that we have to provide real solutions for these people. It is very easy to say that there are problems and then to run away from solutions.

The reality is that unless the government puts order in the fiscal situation of Canada, which is threatened by the lack of revenue because of the recession and the slow recovery, all these programs are threatened.

It is not running away from these problems when we deal with that. This is more difficult than being easy and throwing money that we do not have, borrowing more which would cause the debt and the cost of the debt servicing to go up again and prevent us from having the money to help these people. It is precisely because we want to protect these programs that we are taking these very difficult measures.

The hon. member says he does not understand the freezing of UI. He has to understand that UI benefits are given based on the income of the people who lose their employment. The projections are that these incomes will indeed grow and the benefits will be frozen. Therefore, there will be a difference between the two.

He also talked about the size of cabinet. One could discuss this at length. It is possibly an illusion to believe by removing some ministers or many ministers—I will give him his choice—we would have huge savings. There are maybe many ministers to manage an administration which provides air traffic controllers, which provides health inspectors, and we hear the opposition saying there are not enough of them. The number of people will be the same with fewer ministers but we have a saving of a few million dollars and we have billions of dollars of problems. This is an illusion of a solution again.

He talks about contracts referred to by the Auditor General not being given in the proper way. The Auditor General has reported on a budget of $160 billion and he refers to some questions on $5 million. This is again an illusion that the hon. member thinks that these are the solutions to the real problem.

The Canadian government has to manage the economy at a difficult juncture. We have been very proud to be in government during the seven years of highest growth in the history of Canada. There is a difficult world-wide environment.

We are dealing with it by making the necessary adjustment. The government is not the solution to all the problems. It takes money and then redistributes it. We can take more but the member does not want us to raise the taxes so we have to borrow it. We pay our bankers. It costs more money which is not available for the poor people. We have to strike a balance. This is what we are trying to do and it is not easy.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

I believe it was two weeks ago yesterday that the United Nations International Labour Organization criticized the Canadian government for having abandoned true collective bargaining with its employees and urged the Canadian government to get back to the bargaining table with its employees. They were further asking the Canadian government to keep the ILO informed of progress toward the resumption of true collective bargaining.

I wonder if the minister would like to comment on that.

Mr. Loiselle: Madam Speaker, a sub-committee of the ILO did consider that legislating wages as we have done is not the proper way to function in a normal environment. I do not disagree with that at all.

We are taking this difficult measure and we are doing it again, but not because this is the way we would like to do it. It is because we have to solve a problem. If it is not solved it will be our work force that will suffer from it.

The government can let things go until such time as we have to pay $50 billion instead of $41 billion in interest on our debt next year.

Listening to only those proposals made in the last few days on that side of the House, municipal infrastructure for this or for that, I counted about $25 billion. I do not mind spending it. We would be very popular.

However, what would happen? The rate of interest would go up. The government would not be able to find money to finance it. It would be a total disaster. Then we would have to fire hundreds of thousands of civil servants. This is not what the government wants to do. It wants to protect them by managing the affairs of the country in the best possible way.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, there is a lack of measures that I think would reduce government spending, but which have been discussed or debated. I am thinking for example of the administrative agreement with Quebec on manpower which would save between $250 million and $300 million. I also wonder whether we should not implement many of the recommendations made by the Auditor General, who says some practically scandalous things about the way this government manages the taxpayers' money.

I am also thinking about the paid trips for immigration officers to take people who have been denied admission by the immigration department back to their country. Remember that these officers have no jurisdiction outside Canada airspace. Their trip is paid, two per refugee, and I submit that very few refugees think of leaving the plane between take-off and landing. Nevertheless, two people are regularly paid to spend three or four days in Paris, New Delhi and so on.

I am especially thinking of the De Cotret Report which proposed reducing the number of departments and therefore the number of ministers. If I understand correctly, the minister said his colleague's report was an illusion. I would like him to explain his colleague is the victim of an illusion.

Mr. Loiselle: Madam Speaker, I did not say that my colleague's report was an illusion. I said that it is illusory to think that doing away with 10, 15 or 20 ministers will solve Canada's financial problem. It would save several million dollars, but the deficit is $32.6 billion. So it is a useful exercise and I agree with everything that can improve the way the country is run. I will always agree to support such measures but that is not a solution.

Of course the people who are deported cannot leave the plane but they can cause problems on board and that has happened very often. Airlines require that they be accompanied.

Third, on the administrative measures, the hon. member thinks that simplifying the management of manpower programs would save $250 million. That is totally absurd. Do we pay $250 million for administration? No, we give it to the beneficiaries. In any case, it is spent for their benefit. So how could we go about it? By taking it from the beneficiaries? This money certainly does not go to the officials but to the beneficiaries.

Treasury Board did a study of duplication in all governments in Canada, and I suggest that the hon. member read it. There are many examples.

• (2050)

Of course we could combine those programs under one roof. There are some savings to be made. But on the whole, it is like the parks service. The National Parks Service provides some programs and the provincial parks provide other types of programs. They can indeed be combined under one administration and we would save a little, but we still need wardens and people to receive the public. It does nothing to change the costs. Detailed studies have been done with the provinces. I would ask my friend to read them. There are savings, but it is illusory to think that would solve the multi-billion-dollar problems we have. We must not look for solutions in the wrong place. That is what is so tremendously frustrating. We could well cut 20 ministers, but it would do nothing to change Canada's deficit.

[English]

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, the minister in his speech used the words "illusion" and "illusory" at least six times.

What is illusory is the government poor attempt to try to create an image of credibility, of being able to manage this economy and this country responsibly. I say it presents an illusion because its credibility is much it at stake.

What is illusory is its ability to predict, its ability to perform, and its ability to fashion out a vision for this country.

If we can take a look for a moment at its ability to predict, just from February to December of this year, in 10 months the Minister of Finance has indicated that he was off on his predictions of revenue.

First he predicts $132.1 billion but now it is $124 billion. He is off by 7 per cent. He is off on his predictions on the deficit, which he claimed would be only $27.5 billion, but in fact today is $34.4 billion. He is off by 25 per cent. He is wrong on the debt, which is $10 billion more than he predicted it would just last February.

I am limiting myself to just this year because the record of the finance ministers who preceded him over the course of the last seven years has been even worse. Yet he comes to us with a claim that the government is headed in the right direction and even makes some grandiose claims about the value of the GST. Good Lord, I did not know whether I was in the same place or whether the minister had just fallen from the clouds.

If there is a tax that is hated by Canadians everywhere, it is the GSt. It would not be that bad if the government would at least admit that even on its predictions with the GST it made enormous miscalculations.

The government thought it was going to produce in its first year $25.5 billion in revenues to replace the $18.5 billion normally collected by the manufacturers' sales tax. What was collected? This year it was $15.5 billion.

This is a tax that the minister in a bold-faced approach today says is satisfactory to manufacturers. Retailers are vaunting the fact that it has led to a depreciation in prices. I do not know whether the guy ever gets out of his chair. The reason there is a depreciation in prices is because there are no buyers. The buyers that do exist are going across the border to pick up their goods.

The GST has depressed consumer confidence. It has made the government much more intrusive in the affairs of small businesses and the lives of Canadians everywhere. Worse, it has driven a substantial portion of our economy underground.

Yet the minister talks in favourable terms about the direction he is taking this country. He says we are still going to lower the deficit and we do not do that by raising taxes but by controlling spending.

Let us judge the government according to its performance. We do not need to raise taxes. Personal income taxes between 1984 and 1988, in four years and arguably four of the best years from an economic point of view in Canada, went up by 59 per cent. There was a 59 per cent increase in personal income taxes. They went up a further 22.6 per cent between 1988 and 1992.

He talks about easing the tax burden in order to generate some positive confidence in the economy. The man has to be telling an untruth—I was going to say a bold-faced lie, but I cannot say that—of the greatest variety. Total direct taxes were increased between 1984 and 1988 by 46.2 per cent. They went from $49.9 billion to $73.097 billion. In the following two years, 1988 to 1990, they went up an additional 17.5 per cent.

We cannot believe these people any more. They do not even read their own statistics. We are going to judge them on their performance because these are great managers, as the minister just said, and they have to manage the economy in this country responsibly.

Let us take a look at what the Minister for International Trade said with great pride, almost with a sneering condescending attitude, when somebody dared to criticize what he had to say. Let us take a look at the performance of our export market, our international trade, under the great managers opposite.

Between 1984 and 1988 our merchandise trade balance went from $19.8 billion to $10.1 billion. That is a drop of 96 per cent. Great guys. Give them your investment portfolio. You will be penniless before the day is out. From 1988 to 1991, the period following that great advancement on free trade with the United States, what happened to that merchandise trade balance? It went from $10.1 billion to $7.4 billion. Thank the Lord it is still positive. However, the drop is a further 27 per cent. I am being kind.

I could have started with the current account balance. The current account balance under these great directors of the economy went from a plus $3.437 billion in 1984 to, in 1988, after their first term in office, a negative of $13.883 billion. We went into a deficit in four years when this economy was booming by everybody's standards.

What happened after 1988 to that current account balance? We have free trade when the government sold us another bill of goods. In three short years that current account balance went down a further 92.9 per cent to a negative $26.789 billion. Does the Minister for International Trade ever read his own statistics? Or does he just look in the mirror and say he is right and everybody else is wrong?

We are judging them on the basis of their performance in good times. Let us take a look at what they do in bad times because they are fond of comparing a program and performance of the previous government in 1982 in the recession. Yes, in 1982, the worst year of the recession, there were 10,265 bankruptcies in Canada.

In 1991, not yet the worst, there were 12,952 bankruptcies. This under the direction of those who know business like nobody else knows business.

The Minister for International Trade said we do not live in the real world. They do. We saw an increase under their great management in poor times of 26.2 per cent in bankruptcies.

Let us translate that into dollars. In 1982 those bankruptcies represented a loss of $1.9 billion, not an insignificant amount of money. In 1991 the value of those bankruptcies was $4.9 billion, an increase of 257.9 per cent in value to the Canadian economy.

The Minister of Finance, now that he is before us, says the government is going to do great things. His buddy, the guy who sits right beside him, says they know the marketplace, that we do not have a clue. They do not believe in an economy that is force fed by the government—I think I quote him correctly—but they believe in one that is driven by Canadian entrepreneurs free of government interference.

Let us take a look at what they are doing. They have a bill before the House, Bill C-91. What they are going to do with this bill is kill Canadian entrepreneurs dead in their tracks. The generic drug industry, according to government statistics, has 10 per cent of sales in drugs.

An hon. member: Legitimate ones.

Mr. Volpe: The generic drug industry has 25 per cent of the assets. It has built a critical mass of Canadian expertise and Canadian investment opportunities. It is going to advance in the world, but the government says: "No, no, no. We cannot have that. We do not want to interfere in the marketplace so we are going to bring forward legislation that will stop you dead in your tracks and transfer that money that would normally come into the Canadian economy to those who have the patents".

The predictions of these people cannot be believed. On the basis of their performance, these people cannot be believed, and they cannot be believed on the basis of the legislation they put in this House that kills Canadian businesses. Instead of accepting this kind of legislation that is force fed to us we have to defeat it, and if it passes we should rescind it the moment that we throw this bunch out.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, it is with great interest that I listened to this speaker. He spoke with such eloquence.

I wonder whether it is really the Minister of Finance who is responsible for the predictions. If we look back in history we see that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans had predicted Canada's deficit in 1985 would be $2.1 billion. In reality it turned out to be $34 billion.

Mr. MacEachen had said, for instance, that by 1983–84 the deficit would be $7.5 billion and in reality it was $32 billion.

Mr. Lalonde had another prediction. In 1983 Mr. Lalonde predicted that the deficit in 1986–87 would be $17.2 billion. In reality it was $30 billion.

Now we know what the Minister for International Trade said because I sat with him for quite awhile on the other side of the House and he was predicting as well that he would balance the budget, he would reduce the debt of Canada. What happened? We see in this year, for instance, the prediction was that the deficit would be $27.5 billion. In reality it is $34.6 billion.

I wonder whether the ministers, when they make those predictions, look back on the former statements and say it does make sense or it does not make sense because they have a very poor record of predicting budgets.

I think what really happens is the department does the predicting and the minister is that just a trained seal.

An hon. member: Is the word you are looking for a figurehead?

Mr. Kindy: A figurehead. He just reads the speech in the House and everybody seems to be very impressed because he reads a nice speech. He does not address the fundamental problems. The fundamental problem is that Canada is today in a very sad situation.

Canadian Airlines and Air Canada are on the verge of bankruptcy. Air Canada's asset to debt ratio is one to nine. It is a bankrupt company and this government had appointed all the directors of that company. I wonder what the directors were doing? Were they checking whether the company was prospering, were they checking to see whether the company made right decisions, or they were just travelling around the world because they could travel with a pass.

Those directors were appointed by this government and they were friends of the government. The minister should be addressing those problems. He should address the problems with the Royal Bank that tells us today that 67 per cent of its outstanding loans are not being paid; $3.5 billion. Does he address that problem? No. Maybe the hon. member could comment?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry for the hon. member, but surely he expects the answer from the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, you know that what I would do is give an answer that would only be complimentary to the government's record. I am glad he gave me the opportunity to compliment him on having the wisdom to change his position from that taken by that side of the House to that taken by this side of the House. By so doing he recognized the error of the government's ways.

Does the minister and do his other colleagues in cabinet ever take a look at the performance of their predecessors, the predictions of their predecessors, the state of the economy? Do they read the reports of their advisers, their bureaucracy, or even casual historians who have taken the trouble to research the performance of the economy in our country? I guess the answer is no. It is that simple. There is nothing in today's statement that would address the issues concerning the residents of my own city, which pays about 44 per cent of all federal and provincial taxes collected in this country.

Mr. Speaker, do you know what has happened to the economy of my city of Toronto? We can see it in the 240,000 unemployed. Nothing is going to be done in this economic statement for the welfare of those 240,000. That is the size of most major cities in this country. It is not going to do anything for the livelihood of the 680,000 people on welfare rolls in the great engine of Canada's economy.

The hon. member for Calgary asks if the government does its homework. The answer is obvious from its performance and its inability to predict. It is a resounding no.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to respond to the supply bill before us today in the amount of approximately $8 billion, an amount that just by chance is the amount of the additional deficit first reported in February of this year and reported by the Minister of Finance as being almost $34.5 billion this afternoon.

The message that this report gave today is that we are having difficulty controlling our spending, that the economy is beyond our control and that as a government we cannot create the wealth that is so necessary in order to pay for the programs we need.

In addition, it is obvious that the government is having great difficulty creating jobs. That is the main issue. I would like to use the little time I have to speak on this bill to discuss the creation of jobs as it relates to the small business enterprise system.

I would like to say to the Minister of Finance that this is not a partisan issue. This is an issue that is on the minds of the 295 members of this House of Commons. It is an issue on which we should all put our minds together to try to address and combine our efforts to try to come up with a satisfactory solution. Everyone in this House must work toward a solution.

The creation of jobs by small businesses in Canada is a necessity. The Minister of Finance today in his opening remarks, and several times throughout his address, said he was going to be seeking the co-operation and assistance of all members of the House to devote ourselves to this very important function.

He outlined some of the plans he has for small business. I will restrict my remarks to that area. I compliment the minister for starting the thought processes going on that small business area. I must say that I do not think the plans went far enough and that I do not believe they will come close to fulfilling the responsibility we all have.

The facts are simply that we have 1.6 million people unemployed in this country. That number is growing. We take it as a given that large business is creating the problem today rather than helping us solve the problem.

Take a look at CN and its announcement of 10,000 lay-offs. We do not know how many people will be unemployed in the airline industry. Who knows how many people will be lost in the GM empire in the Oshawa area. Take a look at Abitibi, where thousands of people are unemployed and there are more to come.

We also take it as a given that those in governments, quasi-governments, hospitals and educational institutions can no longer afford to create the jobs that are necessary. Therefore, the only prospect for job creation in this country is through the small business enterprise system. If we agree with this premise, and I do not think anyone can disagree with this premise, the question simply is: "What do we do to create a climate for business to help the small businessman and to hire some of those thousands of people who are on the unemployment rolls in Canada today?"

We all know the grease that makes a small business enterprise grow is money. Some of us who were small business before we got to this House know that it is called working capital. The Small Businesses Loans Act that was referred to today by the Minister of Finance is not an operative document. With respect, I say that the increase from $100,000 to $200,000 and now to $250,000 might as well be $5 million because I know very few businessmen in this country who know anything about the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Second, I do not think banks are interested. I think the Minister of Finance alluded to it today. Banks are not interested in advising their clients that small business loans are available for their enterprise. Why do we say this? We say it because in section 15 it spells out that the rate of interest that can be charged under this plan is the prime rate plus 1 per cent. We all know that banks are not interested in granting loans at prime plus 1 per cent, especially to the small business enterprise.

Therefore, that is not a very operative document. Unless this government and this House can get this message out most small business people in Canada will not have any knowledge of this particular plan.

Today the Minister of Finance referred to the regulations and said that the government was embarking on a program to make the regulations more simple and more easily understood. I happen to have all of the regulations relating to small business loans today. There are some 35 to 38 pages here. There are regulations 140, 151, 396, 369, 591, 891 and so on. I agree with the minister when he says that the government must clarify the regulatory system with respect to the small business person and make things understandable for people in that enterprise.

I am a lawyer and I defy anyone to understand all of those regulations and make any sense of them. Therefore, I applaud the effort to make small business loans and all of the regulations pertaining to small business understandable to those who need it, namely the small business people in our community.

After we talked about the small business loan then we got to address the other problem that we are having, which is that we do not have a financial institution in this country that is interested in doing business with the small business person and yet we have the institution in place. We presently call it the Federal Business Development Bank. I am suggesting to the minister that we take this Federal Business Development Bank and rename it the Small Business Bank of Canada. Then as the Small Business Bank of Canada we change its terms of reference and let all small businessmen in this country know that they have a bank they can go to that is willing to support them. The Small Business Bank of Canada will be a bank of first resort for the small business community in this country rather than a bank of last resort, which is what we have today.

I am sure with that added competition within our community and with the chartered banks knowing that there is some competition out there they may open their doors and be more receptive to assisting the small business communities in our country.

Once we have established a climate to make capital available to the small business community, and once we have established that it is profitable, then we can get down to the essence of what we want the small business community in this country to do, which is to hire people.

When we ask the small business community in this country to hire people we are saying in essence: "If you hire someone from the unemployment rolls we understand that naturally you have to train these people and retrain them". Rather than sending them through the formal retraining process at the colleges and universities we will have on the job skill development in the small business he is hired by. He will learn that particular skill in that small business.

In order to do that we have to assist the small business enterprise, either through tax incentives or some other way that says: "We will pay for the skills development". That goes along with the UI benefits that were announced today.

Now we have a small business community that is willing to rehire and hire those people off the unemployment rolls and retrain those people. We all know, those of us who have ever been in small business, that the most valuable thing in small business today is a good faithful employee. There is not a small business person in this country who is willing to give up that valuable asset.

Once we have trained that person—let me just put the numbers together. There are 1.6 million people unemployed. There are 900,000 small businesses in this country. If we could get each small business to hire two people, on average, off the unemployment rolls then we will have not only solved the problem of unemployment but we will be looking for 200,000 more people to fill the job spaces. That would be creating wealth. That is what this government should do.

I know my time is running short but I—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Your time has now expired.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I was really interested in hearing my colleague from Thunder Bay speak about the effects of this kind of mini budget on small and medium-size companies.

One of the comments I have, which is going to be followed by a question, is that one of the major complaints of small business has been the GST. This government has said it would try to make it easy for small business to live with the GST. I know it has not.

The comment I have about the whole question of small business and the GST is that that there are several things that small businesses have complained about. One is that they have to pay GST but financial institutions, stockbrokers, banks and so forth pay nothing. It is perhaps just a coincidence that the Minister of Finance comes from the financial institution sector. It does not pay anything. Small business people, those 900,000 businesses that my hon. colleague was talking about, pay but others do not. That is one thing.

I would like to know how he sees this. Earlier I asked the former Minister of Finance why he did not tax these financial institutions and he said: "I cannot do it. It is too complicated". I have never seen anything too complicated for this government, but that is beside the point.

The other question I would like to raise with my hon. colleague is that his party says that it would renegotiate, that it would rearrange or do something with the GST. Would that something be, or at least would he want that something to be, an imposition of a tax on these financial institutions to make it a fairer tax?

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for that question. Concerning the first issue about the GST, as a result of the imposition of the GST we have 900,000 tax collectors in our country. It is a terrible expense on behalf of the small business community to collect this tax and it is very expensive. What I am suggesting and what I would hope our party would suggest—I am sure we would get a lot of support—is that if you are going to have someone working for you, you should pay them. If you are going to collect the GST, let us reimburse those who are responsible for collecting the GST and let us pay those who are responsible for keeping the GST in a trust account in order that those funds are available whenever they are required by the government.

The banks, stockbrokers, everybody should be paying the GST.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I know that my colleague was interrupted right in the middle of a suggestion with respect to a positive approach to small businesses.

Coming as he does from that great metropolis in northern Ontario, Thunder Bay, that has a history of producing gentlemen and other members who are very proactive when it comes to creating jobs, managing the economy and doing things that are appropriate from the government management point of view, I wonder if my colleague could share with the House some of those suggestions.

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Eglinton—Lawrence. I just wanted to say we had a member of this House who could be used as a model that worked. I happened today to be involved in something else that was very important but I wanted to refer to him. It may answer my colleague's question.

He entered politics from Thunder Bay in 1935 and became a minister of transport and started Trans-Canada Airlines, which became Air Canada. He became the minister of munitions and supplies and took on the task of running Canada's war production. After the war he succeeded brilliantly in working beside a group of businessmen who came to appreciate his efficient and daring conduct on economic affairs. He returned the Canadian economy to a free enterprise system with minimal government controls.

The example the House should follow is that of the great Liberal C. D. Howe who brought this country to its highest point of employment and its highest point of producing wealth. That is the kind of leadership we need. That is the kind of leadership that the Liberal Party has given to this country over many years.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, there are parts of the statement I might agree with and parts I might disagree with. However I would like to repeat at the beginning a couple of the strongest parts of this particular economic statement that need to be heard certainly in my riding of Fraser Valley West and throughout Canada.

"Trade is our lifeblood". It is a generality but it is the truth: 30 per cent of Canada's economic activity and one job in four. My constituents are concerned about jobs. If trade is the place to find those jobs, we want to see that continue to expand and grow.

"The Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement has proved a success", $16 billion. Now $16 billion is a lot of jobs, a lot of taxes and is a lot of hope for Canada. That bears repeating at this time when Canadians are looking for hope.

North American free trade will give us 85 million new consumers, whose lifestyle and life quality are going up already, even without the agreement, and provide more opportunities for Canadians. There are hopes from the GATT and other opportunities.

It is very important that we should see Canada in its global context and its global interconnection around the world as a major issue of this Parliament and the next Parliament of Canada. In particular I would like to see a new Canada in a newly urbanizing global world. The pace of change continues to accelerate exponentially. Canada must see itself and find its place in this new globe. Among the global megatrends that are of concern are population growth, rapid industrialization and urbanization.

It took the world over 2,000 years to get to 1650 and a population of about 500 million people, over 2,000 years from the beginning of our history. But it only took 200 years to double that population, from 1650 to 1850. It took only 100 years to double that, population again, from 1850 to 1950. It took only 40 years, from 1950 to 1990, to double that population again. The next doubling of the world's population of 5.3 billion people may be in 20 years. That is a new world. It is a new world for Canada to find its place and its opportunities in.

However there is another amazing trend. Within the massive population explosion of the world, another major trend is that in 1980, 1.8 billion of the world's people lived in major cities of the world, but by the year 2000 that will have increased from 1.8 billion to 3.2 billion. Over 60 per cent of the world's population is going to live in the large cities of the world.

Canada is no exception. Back in 1851 only 13 per cent of Canadians lived in cities. In 1981 76 per cent, and now over 80 per cent of Canada's population is living in cities. What does this 80 per cent of the population mean? It means that 80 per cent of the people we represent are living in cities. I am wondering if we are giving them 50 per cent, 40 per cent or even 20 per cent of the attention that the rapid growth of cities needs, not just in Canada but throughout the world.

I know what it means to people in the Fraser Valley where I live. It means that 30 years ago when I settled in the Fraser Valley every morning I would get up and see Mount Baker glistening in the sun or across it Golden Ears. If I was driving into town I could drive into Vancouver comfortably in half an hour. Vancouver did not get farther away, but now it is an hour and a half away. It is getting worse and worse.

This means that people who dreamed of this higher quality of life in our cities moved there, as I did and as most people in this Parliament did. They hoped for this better way of life. For the average commuter from my area—the average person commutes into Vancouver and out each day—it is getting longer and it is getting harder. Every time he commutes back and forth he is driving in his car and his car is pumping carbon monoxide into the air. Now by noon we often cannot even see the mountains. It is another kind of Los Angeles.

Our air is getting harder and harder to breathe. The quality of our water and water supplies is threatened. I am embarrassed to say that Victoria is still dumping raw sewage into Puget Sound that floats down to Seattle, the other part of our megacity of 4.5 million people. Whether it is the disposal of waste, the quality of air or the lack of rapid transit, these kinds of things are taking the choice of Canadians for lifestyle and denigrating it.

Have we seen any kind of an emphasis from senior governments in this area? I regret to say in most cases it is a matter of downloading. I am not just speaking about Canada. I am talking about the world. The mayors of the cities of the world met in Curitiba and agreed it was a problem all over. They are getting all the population, all the people, all the growth, without the tax base to improve the infrastructure.

I am very pleased to see in this speech the issue of infrastructure. As a Canadian I certainly want to support infrastructure building wherever it can be done in Canada. I am very pleased to support Prince Edward Island for $800 million where we will connect 130,000 people to the mainland, connect an island to the mainland or an island province to the mainland of Canada.

When we look at priorities there are more people travelling in the morning to work over the Port Mann Bridge than there are in all of P.E.I. There are 1.7 million people on the lower mainland and another 400,000 in the Victoria area. We would like to have a land bridge to connect that too but we do not even ask for it because we see other priorities.

I am pleased that there is a thought of infrastructure here, but I wonder if it might better be spent, or some of it might be better spent, on infrastructure like rapid transit in our cities. That is the kind of thing we have to think about.

I was talking to the Minister of Finance the other day. He grew up in Vegreville, Alberta, and I grew up down the road in Maidstone on the Yellowhead Highway. They were wonderful places to grow up, great towns, great cities—Vegreville is a small city—and good places to live. I have not seen any traffic jams there for a long time, but I live in one every day in my riding and so does everybody else. We need a little help.

The Port Mann Bridge is across the Fraser River. Maybe we need another bridge across there too. There is so much need that I am not even sure that is the correct need. Rapid transit is probably a more important need and a more important use than another bridge because we need to get people out of their cars to sustain the quality of life that we choose in Vancouver and to make sure that pollution does not just keep roaring out the valley. Not only is it coming from that valley but now it is coming from Seattle. It is all one big city. We must work and plan. That area is the fastest growing area of North America, in both Canada and the United States.

We need to work to accept that we cannot stop the doubling of the population over the next 20 years or 30 years. I do not know where it is going to go because we have mountains on one side and the ocean on the other. We have to plan how to sustain that city and that city will be sustained through improvements in infrastructure, communications, transportation, light rapid transit and these kinds of things. But how will it be financed?

We cannot finance every city in Canada but we have to recognize that most people in Canada live in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. These issues are big issues there and we cannot just keep downloading on those systems as do both levels of government not only in Canada but throughout the world.

We will need to find in the Speech from the Throne following this economic statement new ideas and thinking in new ways. We have this fuzzy warm feeling that Canada is a rural nation. Yes, agriculture is terribly important and some people in Canada still live in the rural areas but 80 per cent live in the cities. If we want to keep this warm fuzzy image of rural Canada with rural values which are great values and my values, that is fine; but let us live with the reality that 80 per cent of our people live in cities and let us get on with developing sustainable city programs.

Our Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment showed great leadership at the earth summit in Rio. They recognized in agenda 21 the human settlement problem of cities. They had ideas. They said: "Let us establish a sustainable development commission". While the rest of the world is going to proceed with these kinds of things, where will Canada be in the follow-up to Rio, in the follow-up to how we will sustain these megacities because the world is becoming a series of city states? Just as we must connect the cities of Canada we must connect the city states of the world.

How do we change this thought from rural Canada to urban Canada and then how do we help our Minister of Finance see those needs, recognize them and turn them into programs? I think Canada should demonstrate this to the world. If we have the highest quality of life in the world, and that highest quality of life is found for our people who are living in cities, obviously, then how do we sustain that high quality of life? Can we lead and show the world that Canada knows how to sustain its cities?

Our cities are among the most magnificent. Mayor Doré of Montreal showed great leadership at the United Nations and had a great world conference in his city. Toronto had a similar conference and showed the way. Vancouver had the global parliamentarians conference that so many of us attended, and where a resolution was passed that said: "Urbanization is a world problem. Let us do something about it".

In British Columbia Mike Harcourt talks about his Georgia Basin project. He saw this coming for a long time. We have to take the city in the context of its bioregion. They are working together with Seattle and with the U.S. Congress.

These are the kinds of visionary programs where we look to the way we are and almost all of us are urban dwellers—and then we try to find ways to sustain and improve that quality of life.

I appreciate this economic statement and the need, as I have said, to connect to the world through GATT. We are having successes there. I applaud the government on those things. I applaud it on Rio and the earth summit on the environment.

However, if we cannot breathe the air, drink the water and dispose of wastes in these types of megalopolises and if we cannot move comfortably around them then what are we working for? We need to hold new values and bring them forward as we work toward the Speech from the Throne and toward the next generation of urbanizing ideas.

In addition, we also need to recognize that the power of the world and the power of the world's relationship with Canada is where the power is. The power is in Pacific Asia. In 1984 we looked at Pacific Asia and we gave it a good push. We are developing economic relationships. Japan is the number two trading partner for Canada now. If we look at the top five or six we will find China, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Singapore, Korea and the ASEAN groups. This is the future of Canada. That future is building upon the ideas that are in this statement.

We have a North American free trade agreement. Through APEC this can be expanded to cover the entire Pacific region. It is important that we should not see another bloc in the Pacific, as is being proposed by Malaysia. It would be an Asia-only trade bloc, similar to an Europe only trade bloc. I hope our minister will take the innovations of the North American free trade agreement and expand very soon, perhaps, to South America. However, let us keep going around the rim and keep this concept of one free-trading world.

I quoted the minister's 30 per cent figure, which means one in four jobs and $16 billion in the free trade agreement already. This is where our future lies. Let us not run from crisis to crisis. Let us help in Europe and Somalia. Let us help build the critical, tough areas of the world. I have always supported that and participated in that. Let us not be diverted from the future of Canada in the Pacific Asia region.

I have my concerns that this has diminished in its importance. I urge members to think, between now and the throne speech, once again about the Pacific and the reality of Canada as an urban nation.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed very much the hon. member's address. I noted his comments about the infrastructure issue and how he would foresee that some of these funds would be directed toward mass transit.

The objective here is to essentially invest in strategic infrastructure development that would improve competitiveness and improve the productivity of the Canadian economy.

We have a number of specific proposals or projects in mind, particularly those that fall within federal government ownership. We will be sitting down with the provinces to determine what their priorities are and to try to work out the appropriate sharing arrangements so that we can move ahead on these projects.

While it is not clearly defined in the background documents or in the speech itself, there is provision to ensure that we will open that dialogue with all the provinces to try to see if we can work toward fulfilling some of their goals and objectives that would enhance the economy and productivity and therefore the competitiveness of our country.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for those comments very sincerely. I sense that the minister heard what I said.

I know that the Government of British Columbia is very anxious to talk about their needs on infrastructure. They are not mentioned here in particular, but remember that you said they should be focused on something that relates to making us more competitive.

I am an advocate for parks and tourism and so forth. It is very important, but really we might look at the airport system in Vancouver. That is going to increase our competitiveness. The bridge in P.E.I. is important politically and I am sure it is economical. I am not sure how it will improve our competitiveness, but I can think of three or four other bridges in three major cities of Canada with which we might improve competitiveness.

I certainly want to be for the maritimes and for all of Canada, so wherever we are spending this money on infrastructure, I am in favour of it. I am just saying that we have to watch the priorities.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the member for Fraser Valley West. I know that he is concerned about the environment and about developing Canada to be a prosperous country.

I wonder what his opinion is about transportation somewhat. I see this government has abandoned railways. It has abandoned air traffic because our companies, such as Air Canada and Canadian Airlines, are going bankrupt.

Does he believe that our country should have a railway system. It is efficient and less polluting than cars and trucks, especially since we have a very bad climate. I really feel badly when I think about all those truck drivers going through the Rockies and going across Canada, not on a four-lane highway but on a two-lane highway, burning rubber and fuel. They are naturally are a danger to everybody on the road and to themselves. What are his feelings on this?

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, in order to be competitive, some rail lines are going to become redundant and they should be cut. Some highways will become redundant and we may not need them in the same way. Infrastructure changes continually. This is a review of infrastructure.

It might be more important to put a rail link between Seattle and Vancouver. That is two hours there. You are right. Take the cars off the highways there. What is 4.5 million people now is going to be 10 million in 2010.

Certainly we have to readjust the priorities. They may need an intermodal rail yard in Surrey. There is a very heavy demand for infrastructure. Let us look at any place that can use rail, which is clean, efficient and appropriate. It is particularly good for freight and that kind of thing.

Yes, I would support the improvements for infrastructures on rail, but we have to do it in the context of urbanization and in terms of the context of global interconnection between ports and those kinds of things.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in listening to my colleague tell me this. I agree with him that the infrastructure repairs are not a panacea. It does have its limitations. He wanted to see the government, in addition to dealing with repairing the roads, improving water quality and bridges and other things, also invest in rapid transit. Here is the point I would like to make. A lot of people who listened to this mini budget or statement by the minister today are not totally convinced, I am sure, that the government really has decided to work in their favour or to actually change its direction. It seems to be more of the same.

I would like to ask my hon. colleague this. In addition to urban transit, there is a need for more serious reform in the sense of tax reform and the GST, for example. It could be changed so it is fairer to all Canadians in effect. Is it not evident that this budget that we have had today is not a Cadillac budget? It is not a Chevrolet budget. I am referring to automobiles because I understand the Minister of Finance once was a dealer in automobiles. It is more of a Lada kind of budget. It is there, it is a vehicle, but it is dysfunctional. It does not really respond to our true needs.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, I have been in politics for 27 years and I suppose I have never seen a budget or an economic statement that suits perhaps the priorities as I see them. Certainly the minister and the previous ministers of finance who are now making Canada competitive internationally, are in fact on the right track.

I think this budget is very much on the right track. In 27 years, if there is anything that I have felt supportive of, it is the Mulroney government's economic policies that have brought sanity back and have given opportunities to make Canadians more competitive. That in the long term means more jobs, more opportunities and a higher quality of life for all of us.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the first question is whether this is an economic statement, a mini budget or a maxi budget? What is it?

I suppose one could go to maxi skirts and mini skirts for the parallel. We must ask ourselves what this budget is trying to cover up or reveal. If it is in that particular context, then I would submit that it is a full-blown budget and probably a maxi budget.

We cannot see an awful lot of the government's over-all strategy. Yet we can see a little. We can see some. We can get a glimpse of what the government is up to. I submit to the Minister of Finance who I am delighted to see in the House this evening, that the underlying and double-barrelled premise here, cynical as this sounds and cynical as I believe it is, is that the government has taken a couple of basic political decisions.

First, the poor and the unemployed are never going to vote for this government again. That is not just me saying this as a statement of fact. It is me pretending to be the government coming to that conclusion. The government has said: "We know one thing for sure. The poor and the unemployed are never going to vote for us again, so we need not worry about them".

The second part of the double-barrelled premise concerns the business community that came to the rescue of the Tories in other elections. Given the right circumstances, it can be depended on to vote for this government. That is the double-barrelled premise. First, the poor and unemployed will never, ever again vote for this crowd. If the government came to that conclusion, it is absolutely right. The second part of the premise is that given the right circumstances, some people in the business community with enough plums and incentives and things dangled in front of them could be induced to vote for this government again.

Accept for the moment, at least for the purpose of debate, that those are a couple of parts of a double-barrelled premise on which to build a budget. Just follow through on what this government and the Minister of Finance have done today. He has socked it to the unemployed, to the low-paid worker and the poor and he has dangled a few plums in front of the business community. That is the basic strategy. Everything flows from that. Everything in the budget flows from that basic premise, as cynical as it is.

One of my big disappointments about this budget—I am not completely surprised by it but I am certainly disappointed by it—is the double-talk, the untruth. Listen to this statement on page 12 of the minister's statement today. It states:

> The actions I have announced today will bring the estimated deficit down to $34.4 billion this year.

Bring the deficit down to $34.4 billion. I suppose there is a way in math to state that as a downward trend. What would it be, a minus reduction? We could call it a minus reduction. He has gone all the way down from $27.5 billion to $34.4 billion. That is a drop, a real precipice, an absolute 90 degree cliff. Bang, straight down from $27 billion to $34 billion.

Mrs. Catterall: I call it a 25 per cent increase.

Mr. Simmons: I call it double-talk. I say to my friend from Ottawa West, I call it double-talk.

The same minister, also with a straight face because I sat here and watched him today, also said that the growth next year was going to be 2.5 per cent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask you and I ask the minister who does he expect will take him seriouly when he had trouble predicting six months ahead? Now he is going to tell us what things are going to be like next year, 12 to 18 months from now. In February he was standing here telling us: "Don't worry, folks, we have got it down to $27.5 billion. Don't worry about it". Nine months later he marches into this House, less than a year later, and says: "By the way, I made a slight error. If I cut out another $8 billion from the expenditures, I might have her all the way down from $27 billion to $34 billion".

Therefore one could argue, if we add on the $8 billion that he has cut today in expenditures plus the gap of $6.9 billion, that in nine months his call was $14.9 million out. He was out by $15 billion. Now if you are going to get a crystal-baller, Mr. Speaker, I suggest you not spend your money on the gentleman from Vegreville, the Minister of Finance. He does some things well but one of them is not crystal-balling.

I know the argument that things have changed. I guess they have changed. One of the things that caused them to change was the interest rate policy of this government. Any fool knows that if you keep allowing interest rates to rise, it is going to cost you more to service the public debt and your figures are going to be thrown out of whack. You have heard the lawyers tell us, I am sure, Mr. Speaker. I have a lawyer friend in Newfoundland, not a lot of them but I have one that I still admit to. He happens now to be the Minister of Justice. I used to be in his caucus when he was leader of the party in Newfoundland, Ed Roberts. Ed was known and is known—

An hon. member: A good fellow.

Mr. Simmons: Yes, he is a good fellow I say to my friend from Willowdale. Ed is known for this one. He would often say: "It reminds me of the fellow who had been convicted of murder, having gone out and killed his mother and father and then when he appeared before the judge for sentencing, he pleaded for mercy on the grounds that he was an orphan".

The minister finds himself somewhat in that kind of situation where he has been the perpetrator of the deed. He is a large part of the reason why we have a projected deficit now of $34.4 billion. Do not sit, Sir, on the edge of your chair because that could change at any time. Whether it is $34.4 billion or $25 billion or $60 billion, we will let you know eight or nine months from now, as we have done in this particular case. Between February and now the difference in real terms, as I just demonstrated, is of the order of $15 billion off the mark in effect.

The minister by his policies and the policies of his administration having perpetrated the deed he now comes to this House looking for mercy. He now comes to this House and asks for some understanding. Frankly, we are running short of understanding. When I say we, I speak for many of the people in my particular riding.

I got your signal, Mr. Speaker, and I realize that my time has almost run out but I hope not before I get a chance to address one other issue on this same page, page 12 of the minister's statement.

I would submit to him, to this House and to the people of Canada that by far the most cowardly and at the same time the most dastardly statement ever to appear in a budget speech anywhere at any time has to be the following:

> Persons who voluntarily quit their jobs without just cause, or who lose their jobs because of their own misconduct, will no longer receive UI benefits.

Follow it through. Put aside for the moment that some people quit without cause. They quit because they figured out how to milk the system. I understand one of the things the minister is alluding to. But he uses a sledgehammer to get at a mosquito here, a very terrible sledgehammer. He must understand it. This is something in his budget that he has to go back on. He has to take that statement out in the interest of basic human rights and basic decency. What he has here is hearkening back to the sweat house days of pre-industrial England.

This is what William Booth who started the Salvation Army was talking about in darkest England. This is the kind of thing where the employer was in the driver's seat, where he called all the shots. With this document, this statement, he knows that the employee is not going to quit because he or she will be afraid they will not qualify for UI. He knows that he can ride that employee right into the ground and when he gets them into the ground, he can then fire the employee.

He knows the employee can be fired for misconduct because the minister has said so. Apparently he has intentions to legislate that. The employer knows that employee is already on his knees economically. While he might pursue the question of whether there was cause to charge misconduct he has nobody to buy the groceries in the 12 or 15 months it takes to prove that particular charge. It is a dastardly thing. I see your signal, Mr. Speaker. My time is up.

I appeal to the minister, in the interest of basic sanity and humanity, to get that statement out of there and all it stands for.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the speech of the hon. member. I want to make just a couple of comments. I remember in this House when there were questions asked of the Minister of Finance a couple of months ago. He had extreme difficulty saying that Canada was moving toward a recession.

He could not pronounce the word recession. He said: "Everything is on target. Our budget is on target. We are going to have a deficit of $27.4 billion", and so forth.

Then suddenly he had to admit that we were in a recession and that it was worse than a recession. It was a depression; 500,000 manufacturing jobs were lost in Canada; welfare rolls were increasing. Today I read about 700,000 people in Quebec being on welfare. How many in Ontario? How many in Alberta?

The minister's advisers were telling him that he was on target. He tells us today that he is going to solve the problems. Why should we believe him? I would like to ask the hon. member whether he believes what the Minister of Finance said today, whether this is believable or not?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend for Calgary Northeast. He sat with the Tories on that side until he saw the light. That is another story but we welcome him to this side. I mention that fact because he better than I can really answer his own question.

Do I believe the finance minister? Well, it is not that the finance minister lacks integrity. That is not the issue. I have always regarded him as a man of great integrity. That is not the issue at all. But integrity and competence are two very different things. Is he asking me whether the Minister of Finance is a competent minister? My answer would be, competent to do what? Competent to follow the orders of the gentleman from Baie Comeau? Yes, he is competent to do that.

Private Members' Business

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 10 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order passed on December 10, 1992, the House will now proceed to Private Members' Business as indicated on today's Order Paper.

ELECTIONS

THIRD PARTY ADVERTISING

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved that in the opinion of this House, third party advertising during elections should be restricted to individual Canadians and limits on the amount each person can spend should be established.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I raised this motion which is very important to democracy in this country. In the 1988 election many Canadians were concerned about the amount of money that was spent, especially by those who supported the free trade agreement. There was a feeling in many ridings by many Canadians that the money that was spent by those advocates of the free trade agreement helped to have an undue influence during the election period.

Of course, the problem is that we take away the fairness in our system. In 1975 we had four basic fundamentals about our elections in this country. We required parties and candidates to provide full disclosure of election expenses and full disclosure of income sources. We put limits on total expenses and we required black-out provisions to restrict and limit the influence of paid advertising. Those were requirements that were put in place for all parties and all candidates. It came out of a sense of election fairness to make sure we did not go the route of other countries, notably the United States.

In the United States, it is interesting to note that in the last election many American congressmen and senators and their staff talked about the amount of time they spent raising money for elections. Those of us who pick up a lot of the American channels in our ridings also noticed the types of advertising, the vehemence, the hatred and the anger that was put out by various groups in their paid advertising.

Canadians have been well served by our different approach of disclosure and our approach of limitations. Part and parcel of the limits we put on candidates and political parties is a restriction in the act that has limits on third party advertising.

In 1984 in a lower court in Alberta this provision was struck down on the basis of the charter. Here we are many years later and this Parliament has not introduced new measures in this very important area. As I mentioned earlier, without any real restrictions, we run the risk of another election very similar to what we had in 1988. We do not want to see that happen. We do not want to see completely unlimited spending by special interest groups while at the same time we have severe limits on what political parties and political candidates can spend.

With the types of groups that are forming in various parts of this country that have a lot of money, it is quite possible that the candidate for Thunder Bay—Atikokan or Prince Albert—Churchill River could find out that they are entitled to spend less money in their whole campaign in providing literature, in dealing with all the issues, in making contact with the voters, paid advertisements or whatever other means they have to use to campaign in their ridings. For all of those purposes they could end up being able to spend less money than one single issue group that wants to campaign against it. That is the problem with what is happening in this country at the present time.

We need a strong law that does not completely prevent third party advertising, does not take away the right of freedom of expression, but which puts reasonable limits on money spent in the exercise of those rights. Politicians, political parties and candidates have respected those same limitations on themselves since 1975. What we are saying is that the same thing should apply to other Canadians.

The Lortie royal commission came down with a figure of $1,000 that could be spent by individuals or groups. To make sure that there was no collusion, it also recommended that groups could not combine to make sure that if one person spends $1,000, and somebody else spends $1,000, all of a sudden you find you have $50,000, $60,000, or $80,000 being spent in one riding by what in essence is one special interest group.

We have a law based on fairness but we have a glaring loophole in that law at the present time, a loophole which was, as I said, exercised by those who defended the free trade agreement, those in this country with lots of money. We cannot afford to allow that to happen in the future.

I call upon this government and all parties in this House to ensure that before we have the next election, which must occur within a one-year period, we have reasonable restrictions. We are not asking for a complete outlawing of third party advertising but reasonable limits to make sure that our system is fair, to make sure that those Canadians who are out there working in an election, trying to explain their political philosophy, their dream of where this country should be going and how it should be governed, do not find themselves swamped by those people who have large contributions from all sorts of sources which under the present law are basically secret sources.

We do not know who contributes to the National Citizens' Coalition. We do not know who has contributed to some of the large corporations and some of the front groups that will exist during a federal election campaign. Parties have to list their donors. They have to give the addresses of their donors. They have to make that information public. We should insist that all those who wish to participate in a campaign period should have restrictions in terms of public disclosure as well.

If somebody contributes to the New Democratic Party and it is over a certain amount of money, whether it is $100 or perhaps $250 in the future, we have to make that information public. If someone is campaigning in a riding, or in a province, or in this whole nation on a certain issue, they also should have to make public the sources of their income. We must make our system fair.

We must avoid the excesses of the United States. The only way we can do so is to make sure that we keep restrictions on candidates and parties. If we take that away then we have lost any sense of fairness. We will all end up with the dollar buys the election system of the United States. We also must make sure that for those others who have a legitimate point of view and who choose to work outside of the political parties, there are reasonable limits and that they account publicly for where they raise their money.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to discuss the motion that has been sponsored by my colleague, the member for Churchill.

His motion is to the effect that third party advertising during elections should be restricted to individual Canadians, and limits on the amount each person can spend should be established. This question of spending limits is an important one and is subject to the entire range of public opinion.

As a matter of background the Lortie royal commission on electoral reform was created back in November 1989. It held extensive public hearings across the country and heard hundreds of suggestions for improvements in the electoral process. Indeed, its final report was more than 1,500 pages and contained 267 recommendations.

The research studies produced during the course of the royal commission, which will be assiduously studied by my friend from Kingston and the Islands, and will comprise some 23 volumes at the end of the day.

The job of the parliamentary committee on electoral reform, of which the hon. member for Churchill is a member, as I am, is to review the findings of that royal commission and report to Parliament.

In regard to the question of spending limits, let me mention that there were amendments to the Canada Elections Act in 1974 which prohibited spending during an election campaign by third parties that favoured or opposed a political party or candidate. However, exempt from this prohibition was spending relating to an issue.

In 1983 Bill C-169 removed that exemption and created the current prohibition which prevents any election expense that is not channelled through a candidate or through a registered political party.

However, as things stand today under the Canada Elections Act, as a practical matter there is no limit on third party spending. That is because back in 1984 the Court of Queen's Bench in Alberta rendered a decision called the National Citizens' Coalition case, in which the court struck down the then spending limits on third parties. The court ruled that the provisions of the act prohibiting third party spending were on their face a restriction on freedom of expression. Indeed, the judge stated, and I quote: "Care must be taken to ensure that the freedom of expression as guaranteed by section 2 of the charter is not arbitrarily or unjustifiably limited. Fears or concerns of mischief that may occur are not adequate reasons for imposing a limitation. There should be actual demonstration of harm or a real likelihood of harm to a society value before a limitation can be said to be justified."

The court then went on to conclude that the limitations on freedom of expression were not reasonably justified in a free and democratic society.

In the last federal election in 1988 no spending limit existed to restrict the expenses of individuals or groups other than candidates or registered political parties.

The situation today is this: During an election campaign, while spending limits exist in so far as candidates and political parties are concerned, there is no limit imposed on third parties. Outside of the writ period, there are no limits on anyone, any individual, political party or single or special interest group, to promote any or all issues.

The Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing did hear representations from different interveners on this specific issue, as it did on many others. A number of the interventions reflected dissatisfaction about the involvement of third parties in the 1988 campaign, or concern about the impact of third parties in the democratic process. On the other side, there were substantial arguments about maintaining individual rights and the rights of free speech.

There was substantial support both from those who supported and those who opposed restrictions on third party activities for requiring or reporting of third party spending and disclosure of the source of their contributions. The Canadian Bar Association made a presentation in favour of a principal balance between the rights of free expression and the need for some measure of equality.

The royal commission in the report provided in February of this year recommended that election expenses incurred by any group or individual independent from registered parties and candidates not exceed $1,000. It further recommended that the sponsor be identified on all advertising or distributed promotional material and that there be no pooling of funds.

In coming to this recommendation, the commission stated and I would like to again quote from the royal commission report: "A regulatory approach that seeks to promote the fundamental value of fairness in securing the right of individuals and groups to participate in an election campaign by incurring election expenses must acknowledge that individuals and groups cannot be equated with candidates and political parties in the design of spending limits.

"The regulatory treatment of independent expenditures must respect the essential and primary role of candidates and political parties in elections by recognizing the nature and potential impact of independent expenditures".

The royal commission attempted to strike a balance between the individual freedom of expression and the need for a fair process in so far as the parties and candidates for which spending limits exist. As colleagues know, the four volume report of the royal commission is now in the hands of the parliamentary committee for study. Hearings are going on at the present time and third party spending limits, one of the important and difficult issues that the committee will have to consider as part of the bigger picture, are being considered.

I do not believe it would be advisable for us to deal with this issue in isolation from the other issues raised and dealt with in the report of the royal commission. The Canada Elections Act is a comprehensive piece of legislation, its provisions are interdependent, and there is a danger in dealing with financial provisions of the act in isolation.

Frankly, my personal point of view on this matter at the present time is that the individual's right to free expression, his or her freedom of speech must remain paramount. I have rather an aversion to regulation and am not convinced that there is a legitimate argument for spending limits; notwithstanding the report of the royal commission and the viewpoint of my colleague who posed this motion here this evening.

I remain unconvinced. There were substantial expenditures in the recent election and it is quite evident that money did not rule there. Until I could be satisfied that money and money only is the governing principle in these matters I guess I would want to be on the side of the individual's right to spend as he or she sees fit for whatever cause he or she may choose.

I respect the point of view that my colleague from Churchill has put forward in moving this motion. We have I think an honest and legitimate variation. There are lots of differences of opinion on this particular issue, but above all else it is part and parcel of a number of measures that are presently being dealt with by the special committee on electoral reform, which is holding many hours of discussion and examining in detail the many proposals put forward by the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing.

The special committee was tasked to study the royal commission's report and to make recommendations to the government. In my view it would be appropriate to let this committee carefully study this issue of third party spending in the context of the entire recommendations of the royal commission report and ultimately allow the parliamentary committee to make the appropriate recommendations.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this debate this evening on this very interesting motion put forward by my colleague the hon. member for Churchill.

Like the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, I have been involved in the work in the committee on electoral reform which has been considering this very question. I am concerned that the progress we are making on this particular issue is not entirely in accordance with the report of the royal commission. Nor is it in accordance with the wishes of many of us in this party who believe that third party advertising has been a problem in this country. It is one that should have been dealt with some time ago. It certainly constituted a particular problem during the course of the last election campaign.

The recent American experience indicates that the electorate cannot be bought by fancy, glitzy advertising campaigns. Indeed I am sure many of my friends opposite remember the leadership convention they had in, I believe it was 1976, when the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs was chosen to be the leader of their party. I think I have got the year correct on that.

They will recall that the present Prime Minister engaged in a very glitzy and very expensive advertising campaign. Many commentators suggest the reason he lost the leadership race in 1976 to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs was because of this very glitzy campaign that he mounted for that particular leadership campaign.

I was not at that convention, so far be it for me to say what it was he did wrong. I have only read about it. I would not have been caught dead at such a convention.

Nevertheless, the convention went ahead. The current Prime Minister was defeated in his bid for the leadership of the Tory party. They ended up with the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs who was Prime Minister briefly and then of course got appropriately knifed in the back by the current Prime Minister in a subsequent leadership campaign.

In that campaign he deliberately spent on a less glitzy scale. We suspect that perhaps less money was spent, but of course we do not know that.

Money does not buy everything in politics. Perhaps you, Sir, were at one of those conventions and can tell us a little more about it later. In any event, it does not buy everything in elections. But the fact is that it is perceived by the public to be an indication of tremendous electoral power. It is certainly considered that if the party with the substantial amount of money is able to get its message out more effectively and communicate with more people it is more likely to win the election.

I can say that in my own experience, clearly I won in spite of the expenditures that were made by the other candidates, as well as third parties. My own electoral experience was that the other candidates for the other two major parties in Kingston and the Islands both spent more than I did in the election in 1988.

The fact is there was a substantial amount of advertising by other persons who were not registered parties, who particularly in the last few weeks of the campaign advertised extensively in favour of free trade which was favoured by only one of the candidates in that election. She was the candidate for the governing party and was not successful in spite of this massive expenditure of funds by these third parties.

I cannot help but feel that it is unfair that those parties should participate in the electoral process without any restraint when those of us who are candidates in the election are restricted in what we are allowed to spend.

I know that the Reform Party in its public statements says that it is against any restriction on campaign spending. The wealthiest takes all in the view of the Reform Party. That is not surprising because one has to be well to do to be successful in the Reform Party.

I am sure my friend from Saint-Denis would say it is the same for the Conservative Party. If one is not well to do, one will not be successful in the Conservative Party. I would not want to be so unkind.

There are a few perhaps who have been successful in that party who do not have buckets of cash, but I do not know who they are and I would not want to speculate. I see some hon. members pointing to themselves. That may be accurate, I do not know. It is not for me to judge. Perhaps they can stand up and file a statement of net worth later on.

It is a problem that some people are able to mount extensive campaigns based on the money their friends have available and thereby influence the outcome of the election. It is that third party advertising that this motion is intended to end.

I fully support the motion. I believe that the limits proposed in the motion are fair and reasonable, that there should be limits. It does not say what the figure should be.

The royal commission recommended a limit of $1,000 per person, but it defined persons to include more than individuals. I am surprised that the hon. member for Churchill, a member of the New Democratic Party, is not agreeing with the proposal put forward by the royal commission. It allowed unions and corporations to communicate with their members or shareholders, as the case may be, and that would be exempt from the $1,000 restriction.

A union could send out a mailing to all its members and it would not have to worry about the $1,000 ceiling and similarly a corporation could do the same to its shareholders. Perhaps the fact that shareholders were included scared the hon. member off and he decided that he could do without the limitation for unions. I am sure Bob White would not agree with his position, but who knows because he is not here. I guess he is busy running the province of Ontario, running it into the ground.

What the royal commission recommended is reasonable. In my own view the $1,000 limit is overly generous and should be restricted to something more like $500 which would be plenty. However, I may not reflect the view of all members of the House when I say that a restriction like that is fair and reasonable.

My concern is that we try to get a restriction in place before the next election so that we are not left with a free-for-all on election spending by non-political parties. If there is going to be a fair restriction in place, and I think there is, on the spending by political parties in this country, there has to be a restriction on spending at least during some period during the campaign on the expenditures of other non-political party groups who are involved or wish to participate in the advertising and dissemination of literature in the campaign.

The proposal put forward by the royal commission is generally fair, as is the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Churchill. I hope the chief government Whip who I see is here tonight and of course is in the anomalous position of being chairman of the Special Committee on Electoral Reform will agree to allow for this motion to pass tonight by unanimous consent.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I was just having a private conversation with the member for Churchill who is the sponsor of this motion.

Mr. Prud'homme: You made him an offer he cannot refuse.

Mr. Hawkes: I made him an offer because his motion opened a door that I have been trying to open and get people to deal with sensibly for over 13 years. I am really pleased to see that door opened. The member's motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, third party advertising during elections should be restricted to individual Canadians and limits on the amount each person can spend should be established.

That open door may surprise listeners, but it is the use of the word "advertising". Current Canadian election law limits candidates in its written form, individuals and third parties to spending money during a period of time.

That money could be spent on the rental of a building or rental of a pair of ice skates or buying Chinese meals or some other kind of meals for people. We say that in our wisdom we must restrict the spending of money during an election period, not money specifically for the purpose of advertising.

What the member is trying to do with his motion is put some kind of limitation on the system as he talks about equity and fairness, but that limitation is on spending money directly for the purpose of influence.

We can have a more intelligent discussion and resolution of some of the issues on the table if he means it. If he thinks the evil is advertising then let us talk about advertising and get rid of all the other things that in committee he is constantly telling us should be limited.

That we should limit the capacity to paint the wall, to put something on the floor, to clean the sidewalk, to clean the snow off in the winter time and to spend money on all of these purposes is the view he advances consistently in committee. Yet in public in the House he talks about advertising.

It is like a conversion on the road to Damascus, and most of us who serve on the committee find it to be a welcome relief from past practices. If he means it boy, we are going to have some good discussions in the next 10 days as we work on our draft report. We may be able to break some of the log-jams that have been around for quite awhile.

Let us also examine the issue of the principle of limitations. Let me state clearly and for the record that my personal instincts based on my own experience are that more problems than solutions are created through limitations.

I recognize that is a minority view for most people who are connected to electoral processes. We are all stuck with the notion that to amend the election act, we certainly must have the support of half of the people in this Chamber. It would move forward more smoothly with a better sense for Canadian people if it moves forward unanimously.

We are all stuck in the business of making reasonable compromises that will still respect the integrity of the system. I fully expect that regardless of my attempts to be persuasive to my colleagues I am not going to be able to get the majority of members of this House to say that the best policy position is an unlimited expenditure position, that the truest way and the best way to run a democracy is to let people try to influence each other.

When we look at the system which is in current law there is a limit on expenses that do not really relate in a very direct way to influencing people, but they are in there. The taxpayers are charged with the responsibility of a rebate. People are charged with breaking the law and threatened with losing their seat or having to go to jail or something for breaking them. You begin to see what I mean when I talk about the problems with limits.

If we could talk about a simpler, smaller basket of limits, then the problems are less complex. There are fewer dividing lines or border lines. The resolution at least can be better. That is the compromise I would suggest from my position of no limits and his position of a lot of limits. Can we agree on reasonable limits?

There should be agreement on a smaller basket of things so that there are fewer problems and they are more directly related to the notion of influence. That is really what people who talk about fairness are trying to do something about.

I was interested in listening to my colleague across the way from the Liberal Party pointing out that when there is unlimited spending authority, we can spend ourselves right out of voter approval.

History is full of voting situations where the electorate comes to the conclusion that this particular persuasion, this particular person, this particular group spent too much. They make the judgment that the particular person or group is not the right one to run things because they do not exercise a sense of responsibility adequately. Therefore, they would not be good managers of the country or the economy or anything else.

The minute limits are put on things, that is the minute where we begin to say to the electors that there is something artificial going on here. We are not getting the real picture of where people are and the judgments they would make. We do not give the spendthrifts the opportunity to show people that they are spendthrifts.

That is part of the logic that runs through my mind as to the reason that elections without limits would provide a fairer picture to Canadians of where people were coming from.

Another thing we should look at is the limit today on the period for advertising. We can spend all the money we want until the day a writ is issued. We can spend millions of dollars, if we had it, every day for four years. Then one magic day a writ is issued. All of a sudden, one dime cannot be spent on advertising for example, from the 60th day prior to voting day until the 28th day prior to voting day. Then all of a sudden we can spend, but within limits.

The only time we are blocked from spending money to communicate with electors is the first 30 or 32 days of a writ, the notification of when the election is to occur. There is a kind of absurdity in that too. But I may be forced to swallow that as a principle because it is established. It has been around awhile and members are experienced with it and comfortable with it.

In closing, I would say to the House that we are already seized to the issue. It comes through the electoral reform committee. It comes to us because of court decisions that have struck down sections of the act already. The electoral reform committee will be dealing with it and we will be reporting to the House at the earliest possible opportunity so that we get our conclusions and recommendations to the House and in the public domain as quickly as we can.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by thanking the chairman of the special committee which is now examining the Canada Elections Act, the hon. member for Calgary West, the hon. member for Champlain who is on the committee, the hon. member for Gaspé, whom I see more often, the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, my colleague from Kingston and the Islands and the hon. member for Churchill.

It is a good idea to let Canadians know what we are doing. For hours on end, Mr. Speaker, for what seems like ages, we have been sitting to consider how to update the Canada Elections Act. There is of course a very important issue, and it happens to be the subject of the hon. member's motion, which is about individual Canadians having the right to do third party advertising during elections.

I always like to discuss the historical aspect. There are many ways to learn about the history of Canada. I remember, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure you do, since you were a member of this House, when we produced a bill to restrict election expenses. The legislation is very strict, and I am very glad about that. It gives members like me a certain amount of independence, since I do not have to speak at all kinds of gala evenings to raise funds to pay for my election campaign. We know all about that in Quebec, and it is something the people in my province understand. I hate having my hands tied by lobbies of all kinds, because election campaigns are expensive.

In keeping with the spirit of the time, we created a very modern piece of legislation that is the envy of the United States. Personally, I know senators and members of the House of Representatives who envy us, because they say: We, as members of Congress, instead of looking after the needs of the nation, are almost continuously at the mercy of our fundraisers.

[English]

This is one of the great dangers of the American system. Elected people most of the time belong—I will not say willingly—to lobbies of all kinds. I am going to be nice tonight. I will not mention the most important lobbies. The danger is that they have to raise money all the time in order to get elected. During that time, of course, they are not looking after world affairs. They are not looking after a good social system or medical system because they are raising money. We do not have to do that in Canada. We have a good law.

I am talking directly to Canadians. If they would only understand that by giving $10 or $100 to the party of their choice they could get money back on their income tax, they would participate. Instead of attacking Parliament all the time, they should say: "I am putting my money where my mouth is. I can choose any political party. I will make sure these people are independent and that they limit their expenses".

What happened during the last election? Third parties came in, as my colleague the member for Hamilton East would say, like a Mack truck while my esteemed friend from Kingston and you, Mr. Speaker, and all my colleagues were desperately watching their expenses right to the penny. In my district I spend, on and off, around $40,000. That is according to the law.

Suddenly third party advertising arrives. Powerful lobbies of all kinds spend an unlimited amount of money and in a way have—I hope it is a good word in English—bastardized a beautiful intention of a pure invention of Canada. It is unique in the world. Third party advertising is leading us directly to the Americanization of our political system and I deplore it. It has nothing to do with my friendship with the American citizens, but I do not like their system. I prefer ours.

There must be limits and I know the judges of the Supreme Court are looking into this. It is their job to analyse the intent of the legislator. We do not give instructions to judges. That is also a Canadian virtue. I like the way we appoint judges. In the United States, they are elected. Elect a judge? Imagine. I would hate to campaign against a judge, lose and live in the same district. But in Canada we have a good system and the judges always try to find out what the legislator meant.

I helped draft this legislation under the previous government. I want it to preserve its original intent which was to give members who wanted it, the maximum amount of intellectual freedom. If they don't want it, that is their problem, but for members like me, who want to be a little more independent within our parties, it means we don't get pushed around as much. We can say: "Listen to me." I remember when I was a young parliamentarian and they told me: "If you don't do this or that, you won't get any money from the campaign fund". Now you understand why I get so passionate and emotional about these issues. Once they told me: "You know, if you talk too much, the money from the campaign fund—" Nobody knew exactly what it was. There was a kind of mystery about it but we put a stop to that.

In Quebec they stopped all that, although there is still room for improvement. But at least the tools are available for those who want to use them. I know I am not being partisan tonight and I know my views are shared by many colleagues in all political parties. Even the Bloc Quebecois, which has just joined us, seems to agree with me. Just imagine. Prud'homme and the Bloc. We live practically next door to each other and more or less share the same parishes, but I know its members support that. I know the hon. member for Champlain do and the hon. members for Churchill and Kingston so it will have to be done.

Every time we are ready to pass some good legislation—this is for the judges who interpret the legislation—everybody gets into a panic and says: "Oh, but the charter, the charter". Well, in section 1, as far as I know, the charter provides that when reasonable—and I stand corrected if I am mistaken, because it is late, it is already 10:45—section 1 or 2 and section 3 deal with freedom of expression but only within reasonable limits. I think it is an extraordinary piece of legislation that we should watch like the apple of your eye, as they say, because it is good law. We must not let people from outside come and contaminate a good political system, a good elections act. We are going to update it. We are going to give the franchise to people who are a little farther away than Canada. We listened. We are very much aware of the judgments of the various courts.

I do regret that in one instance in 1984 we did not appeal. It was a judgment handed down by a judge of Queen's Bench of Alberta. We did not appeal and my government was in power. I have never been a member of cabinet, but just to show I am not partisan it was an election campaign and the Liberals were in power. This wasn't being partisan, it was a fact.

We did not appeal. I am convinced that if we had appealed, we would have won. We must preserve this political system and ensure, as the motion says, that third parties are also restricted. I am not in favour of eliminating them totally because they are Canadian citizens—they have to be Canadian citizens—but there has to be a very reasonable limit which can be controlled. If we control the expenses of candidates and members, then we should also control what third parties do.

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to take a few moments to discuss the motion tabled by my colleague from Churchill and support the comments made by several of my colleagues who spoke on the motion from the member of the New Democratic Party. I believe the hon. member for Saint-Denis made quite a remarkable speech on the issue of third-party advertising during elections. I know, after two election campaigns, that the expenses of candidates and political parties are very much controlled. They are controlled to the point that if someone breaks the rules, action can be taken and it can even lead to criminal charges.

I believe that within the electoral reform committee, on which the three main parties in this House are represented, we agreed to discuss this issue. I also think given the situation and the seriousness of the action that could be taken if the limits imposed on the election expenses of candidates and political parties were not respected, this reform should also apply to third parties. At least we should look at it very carefully, because the legitimate right to vote is granted to everybody, at least those allowed to vote under the Canada Elections Act.

Legitimacy or freedom of speech must also take into account the fact that we must not exert undue influence on the debate or the electorate. We saw that during the last electoral campaigns and also during certain activities, where such an influence may have produced what I would call a negative impact because of that attitude toward people and the ability to spend over and above what is prescribed by our legislation. Even if some courts have ruled that this issue could be unconstitutional because of freedom of speech, I believe the Lortie Commission was very wise in presenting its position and in restricting, up to a point, the amounts that third parties may spend on advertising.

In any case, I would like to remind my hon. friends from the other parties that we are examining this issue very closely. I hope the report we table in the House will deal at least with one aspect of the question raised by my colleague, the member for Churchill, in order to bring about some form of control. If we impose some form of control on candidates and political parties I cannot imagine what principle could keep us from imposing one on third parties who pay for advertising. If freedom of speech applies in their case, it must also apply in ours. If political, economical or even criminal restrictions exist for candidates and political parties—because criminal action could be brought against us, the present legislation says so—I cannot fathom logically, and I am not speaking from a partisan standpoint, why a third party could accomplish indirectly what legislation forbids me from doing directly.

That is the fundamental debate in our committee. We are not working from a partisan point of view, our discussions rise well above such things. As members of the Special Committee on electoral reform we hope we can reach a solution which will respect freedom of speech and each Canadian's freedom to express his or her opinion through the candidates, political parties or even advertisements, and which will ensure that each and every one of us is equal, and has an equal right to chose the government. That is fundamental to our legislation. We hope that solution will also ensure we all have equal opportunity to use advertising because advertising will certainly have a more profitable impact if it is better controlled.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary-Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted with this opportunity to speak to this particular subject.

[English]

Third party financing, a motion proposed by the member for Churchill touches a fundamental problem of third party intervention in the election process of members.

There are members of the Special Committee on Electoral Reform here, the chairman was here, the vice-chairman was here and other members of the committee are here. This committee has met on 19 occasions since November 20. On 19 occasions the Special Committee on Electoral Reform has met and only on four occasions has that committee had public hearings. The other meetings were in camera.

An hon. member: No, we were drafting.

Mr. Kindy: I am surprised that there is no input from the public. The public is not able to attend those meetings. I had hoped that this Parliament had learned something from the referendum process that took place here in Canada. The public stated clearly to the members that it did not believe in government from above but in government from the bottom.

This committee has not listened to what the referendum told it. The people who voted in the referendum believed we have to listen to the people. As we are talking about third party financing, this is what really happened. In that referendum the elites, the three parties sitting in this House, all the opposition parties across the provinces, the provincial governments, the newspaper elite and the business elite were all on one side. They were on the yes side on the Charlottetown agreement.

On the other side were the ordinary people. Those ordinary people did not have any financing.

An hon. member: There are more of them.

Mr. Kindy: There were only 14 no committees across Canada. There were over 60 yes committees, and all the money was on the yes sid.

This example shows that money cannot always buy votes. This is the best example we have had in Canada. If the Charlottetown agreement had been a good agreement I am sure it would have passed. It did not pass on its merit. People read the agreement, disagreed, and voted against it in different provinces for different reasons, but they voted against it.

When we talk about third party financing we can see that money is not always the most important factor. What is important is that we have laws that are to the benefit of Canada and candidates who want to work for the benefit of Canada, and I am sure they would get elected. However, what we have been seeing lately, even in this House, is that candidates are being appointed by the leaders. I do not call that democracy.

This is another intervention of our party system. If the leader wants to appoint candidates then we should have a presidential system. The leader should run on a separate ticket and be elected as a president, and then he can appoint his cabinet. There are members here who have been sitting in this House for over 27 years and have never made it to the cabinet. For what reason? For different reasons, not because they were not competent—they are probably much more competent than anybody else—but because they were independent in their thinking.

Our system, and this should be addressed by the Special Committee on Electoral Reform, wants members to be the trained seals who just vote as the party dictates.

I sat on the other side of this House and I remember when the Minister of Finance predicted we would have a balanced budget in a couple of years. What is the result now? We have over $500 billion of national debt, just at the federal level.

We should be doing third party financing, as the member for Saint-Denis said. I think I agree with him on that. In Canada we have a system that allows for members to get elected without a lot of financing. For instance, I spent less than the two candidates for the other parties, the Liberal Party and the NDP and I had the most votes. This limit on third party financing is probably very good in certain circumstances.

A United States congressman, once elected, has to go back to another election in two years. He spends all year trying to get financing for his next campaign and sometimes it goes into millions and millions of dollars. Therefore he belongs to those who finance him. I think our system of financing for candidates is probably a valid one.

On the other hand there is the question of free expression. Somebody mentioned that a court decision in Alberta said third party financing should be allowed. At that time nobody appealed that decision. We had three parties, so it means they all agreed.

An hon. member: That was during the election. We did not have time.

Mr. Kindy: I presume they all agreed to have third party financing. As I said in the beginning, the committee sits in camera and I have the list of those meetings in camera—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1992, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, we in Canada today are in the worst recession we have had since the Great Depression. How did we get here? This is the government that riding a great boom and growth in our economy after 1984 gave us the free trade agreement. At the same time it gave us a high tax, high dollar, high interest rate policy which made it impossible for Canadians to compete. We can see the results.

Today unemployment is at 11.3 per cent. Canada is being deindustrialized. Over the past four years we have lost 375,000, or 18 per cent of our manufacturing jobs.

The government opposite tells us that times are tough all over. If times are tough all over why have the Americans not lost 18 per cent of their manufacturing jobs as we have? They have lost 8 per cent. Things are not as bad down there because they have managed their economy better than has this Tory government.

We see the deindustrialization and unemployment, food banks, people on welfare and over a million Canadian children living in poverty. What is even worse for our future is that we have slipped in the past year from fifth to eleventh in terms of our ability to compete among the industrialized nations. Our high tech deficit in goods traded is a staggering $15 billion, a further symptom of our inability to compete. Our balance of payments deficit, the deficit we have with other countries, what they are taking out of Canada as opposed to what we are giving them, is a staggering $30 billion. All of this is a sign of a very sick, weak economy.

I give the government credit. I think it is finally starting to realize that it could not stay the course, that its economic policies have been a disaster for our country. What did it do? To give it credit it made some modest moves to try to recognize some of the problems that exist.

In terms of unemployment it said: "We have a plan to get unemployment down to 11 per cent over two years from 11.3 per cent today". It is going to create 5,000 new jobs through its infrastructure programs. These are small expenditures, politically motivated, that will create only half the jobs that Canadian National this week announced it was going to lay off.

The government announced some expenditures in R and D. We were told by the World Economic Forum that our research and development, which is falling is less than half of world standards. No wonder it said we cannot compete. What has this government done? It has finally, having paid lip service to R and D over all these years, said it will spend $400 million more on R and D over the next five years. A pittance. It will hardly boost our rate of R and D by 0.1 per cent.

I give it credit because it has finally recognized that it is not just big business, the big foreign multinationals, that is important. It has finally started to recognize small business and has made some modest moves here—too late. They are not very significant moves but it has at least finally paid lip service to small business.

What it did not deal with in this economic statement were some of the real fundamentals. It made no great commitment to higher levels of education, more people taking science or more people training in the technologies. It did not make a brand new commitment to give us a scientific culture here in Canada. It did not deal with the complex problem of how to get companies into the areas of high tech in which our deficit is growing every year under them. Did they deal with the 30 per cent of our students who drop out of high schools? Did they deal with the 20 per cent of Canadians who are functionally illiterate or the 40 per cent who do not know enough mathematics to get by?

At best, the Conservatives are starting to recognize some of the problems. Their approaches have been nothing but minimalist in dealing with them. They did not tell us where the people who are unemployed today are going to get their jobs tomorrow. They did not tell us where our children are going to find gainful employment here in Canada five and ten years from now. They did not give us a vision of how Canada, as a high wage, resource rich country is going to be able to compete for the value added jobs with low wage countries such as the southern United States and Mexico.

The Conservatives have their heads in the sand. They did not deal with the industries of the future that globally we know are so critical to giving Canadians the high incomes we need in order to sustain our way of life. They did not deal here with a vision for environmental technologies, new materials, bio-technologies, the new medical sciences, communications, transport or aerospace. They did not tell us they are trying to have this country more and more dominated by foreign multinationals which have their best jobs in their foreign headquarters.

This government refuses to support and wants to kill our generic drug industry. The generic drug industry is one of the fastest rising, Canadian based multinationals, value added, profits, jobs here in Canada with the profits being reinvested here. Canadian based multinationals are the types of industries we should be supporting.

With Bill C-91 this government not only wants to impose a tremendous new increase in costs for drugs on Canadians, but it wants to drive this burgeoning new set of industries out of Canada.

This government has tried to stay the course, the Reagan course, but it has not been able to. The evidence is finally overwhelming that its policies have not been working. Therefore, the recognition of its failure is in this mini budget. It has said it has to change the course. It has to do some other things. However, why did it not have the courage to admit how bad things really are? Why did it not have the courage to bite the bullet and make sure that it was going to be investing in the things today that will produce those jobs tomorrow and 10 years from now?

The Conservatives did not have the intellectual integrity or vision to know what was needed. It is very disappointing that this government has had to wait until the eve of an election in order to finally recognize what it is doing to the hopes and aspirations of so many unemployed Canadians, so many young Canadians who are in school but see no jobs waiting for them out there, so many people who say: "I now believe that it will be impossible for my children to enjoy the things that we have enjoyed during our lives".

This is frightening because we as a country have more potential than any other in the world. We have resources. They alone cannot create wealth but were we good stewards of what we have received from the land, and the water around us? We would be able to transform those goods into value added products that we could be selling on world markets. It requires vision. It requires investment. It requires the best trained people in the world. We cannot be content to give our raw materials, as we have in the past, to other countries and buy back the finished goods, exporting our jobs with them.

We are going to have to transform our economy. This government has not had the courage to do it. It has not had the wisdom to do it. It is a tired government that can only respond. It cannot lead.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to an order made Tuesday, December 1, 1992, and under Standing Order 74, the 10-minute maximum after five hours of debate referred to is now in order. These will be 10-minute speeches, no questions or comments.

The hon. member for Willowdale has five minutes questions or comments if there is somebody who wants to ask him a question.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the hon. member a question. He listened, I think, with attention today to the economic and fiscal statement delivered by the Minister of Finance and he probably made a judgment call which I am sure is not very favourable.

I look at the departments of the federal government and see that National Revenue employs over 34,000 individuals. I remember when we were debating the GST the government said it was going to create more exports, it would be easier on the consumer and so on and so forth. Since that time we have lost about half a million manufacturing jobs and the federal government had to hire about 4,000 employees.

My question is, if his party was elected as the government, how would he deal with the GST? Would his party continue that process, or as it has created havoc in the country, would his party take another approach?

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, the GST has been a real disappointment to this government. It thought the GST was going to be the salvation of our competitiveness.

Yes, it has helped the manufacturers to a certain extent in their exporting but the manufacturers have been losing jobs hand over fist at more than twice the rate of the Americans.

Has it really helped our manufacturers that much? What has it done to small business? The costs of implementing this tax to the private sector alone were estimated by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business to be $9.5 billion. That was more than half of what the government expected to take in from the GST in the first year.

Then we have conflicting statements from this government about the GST. It said the GST was going to be as real revenue-raiser and we needed it in order to increase our revenues and get the deficit down. What did the government find out? Sadly the Minister of Finance had to admit today in his statement that the GST has not produced more revenues than the previous manufacturers' sales tax. This is a tax which in theory may be okay in certain ways, but it is highly regressive so it really penalizes the poor people. Is that okay? I am not sure it is. It told us we needed a VAT, a value added tax, because many other countries had it. Except our major competitor, the United States, does not have it. How stupid can it be? Why is there so much more cross-border shopping?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are no more questions or comments. We are now into 10-minute speeches and the hon. member for Rosemont has the floor.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, all Quebecers are trying tonight to assess the finance minister's economic statement and are wondering whether the decisions announced today can help get the economy out of the deep recession we are in and create jobs for our hundreds of thousands of unemployed people.

Because the recession is so long, we know the unemployed have lost confidence, consumers have lost confidence and investors have lost confidence. The finance minister's statement should therefore have tried to restore confidence among all these participants in the economy.

Now what do we find in the finance minister's economic and fiscal statement? Instead of decisions to restore confidence, we find a savage attack on the unemployed, an insignificant increase in job creating investments and a deficit for next year that is $10 billion more than forecast. To add insult to injury, the Minister of Finance takes pride in an inflation fighting monetary policy that has led us to the economic disaster we know.

Mr. Speaker, in the space of a few minutes, the Minister of Finance has managed to dismay workers, consumers and the unemployed, increase the mistrust of investors and financial markets and convince everyone that he is completely abdicating his fundamental role of helping the economic recovery.

Let us look at the measures for the unemployed. The minister announced $2.45 billion over two years in cuts to unemployment benefits and gave back $600 million in training, for a net cut of $1.85 billion. Clearly, the government is attacking the unemployed rather than unemployment.

What about the promised investment in infrastructure which the Prime Minister announced at fund raising dinners of the Progressive Conservative Party in recent weeks? Well, these promises only lasted as long as it took to help sell tickets at $500 a plate. After hinting at investments of $24 billion, then $12 billion, today they tell us that $485 million will be invested in infrastructure over two years. This is a completely marginal effort that will have no impact on employment and lets the deterioration of our infrastructure continue.

Let us look at the deficit forecasts. There the Minister of Finance loses all his remaining credibility. Nine months ago, on February 25, 1992, the Minister of Finance announced that the deficit for 1991-92—and there was only one month to go, since that year ended in March 1992—would be $31.4 billion. Now, after all the bills are in, we are told that the actual deficit is $34.5 billion; it was off $3.1 billion with a month to go. That's not all. For the current year, the Minister of Finance announced a $27.5 billion deficit and now nine months later we are told that the forecast has changed; it is $34.4 billion, a difference of almost $7 billion in nine months.

But hold on. For next year, he had announced a $22.5-billion deficit. Today, he just told us his current forecast, which is not the last, is $32.6 billion; a $10 billion error in nine months. If the vice-president of finance of any private company—and the government always talks to us about private enterprise—had such a forecasting record, he would be thrown out before he finished his speech. That is obvious. In less than a year, this Minister of Finance has lost all credibility, although this credibility is essential to stabilize the Canadian dollar and bring about lower interest rates, which are the best thing for economic recovery.

This government has missed a great chance to restore the confidence of the unemployed, the consumers and the investors because of its lack of courage and imagination. For instance, it has decided to freeze all salaries and cut operating expenses by 5 percent in all departments. As such, it is not a tragedy but it goes to show how inept it is at making choices. It has made $385 million-worth of cuts in national defence when nothing threatens our security any more. That is ridiculous. It would be possible to cut $3, $4 or even $5 billions in DND.

How do you expect the people of Quebec to see that we are going through difficult times economically when the government of Canada just had an embassy built in Japan on a piece of land worth over $1 billion? We spend to show off while cutting back on unemployment benefits.

Let us look at the restructuring of the Public Service and the departments. This a hot topic these days. We know that the Bélanger-Campeau commission estimated at about $3 billion the cost of duplication between departments and ministries in Ottawa and Quebec. We were met with a blunt refusal here in Ottawa. It was out of the question to do away with duplication. Just in labour costs, savings would be in the order of $300 millions.

This government's inability to make choices is obvious. It would much rather cut an even 2 or 3 per cent across the line in the estimates. As I said, it is not a tragedy as such. There are so many people out of work that we take the cuts. However, with a minimum of political guts many more billions of dollars that are no longer spent usefully in some areas could have been saved.

Our only source of comfort is to think that this government has only a few month to go. In fact, before long, the electorate will decide. As far as the people of Quebec are concerned, I am sure they will go for a thorough restructuring of their relationship with the Canadian government. There is no doubt about it, the price of Canadian federalism is too high indeed.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on the financial statement which the Minister of Finance presented today. I am pleased that the minister is one of the few of us in the House at this hour of the night. Hopefully he is listening carefully to what the representatives from the different parts of Canada have to say.

In spite of the fact that he is in attendance and in spite of my respect for the minister, his statement today can only be described as a bit of a joke and a financial hoax. If I did not see him fully clothed, I would say it reminds me of the old tale of the emperor having no clothes, with the exception of a little fig leaf which I will come to later.

The reason I say that is the two fundamental questions we are dealing with, unemployment and the deficit, are not addressed in this paper in any kind of fundamental way. When we look at what is projected, in 1994 we will still have 11 per cent unemployment, the same level we have today, and we will have a $32 billion deficit, $10 billion more than what was projected in the minister's estimates just last February.

Somehow he has been able to ignore the fact that there are 1.6 million unemployed people. Those statistics are not just numbers. They represent real misery and real people. There are 2.5 million people on welfare experiencing the indignity of having to live on handouts from the state when they would like to make a living. There are 4 million in poverty in this rich country, 1 million of whom are children.

Certainly it does not reflect the need that I see in my constituency of Prince Albert—Churchill River. In many of the northern communities we have 70 per cent to 80 per cent unemployment. We have a farm community that is sinking to the abyss. We have more farmers who are over 70 than under 30, an appalling statistic when we look at the future of that industry. Even in the city of Prince Albert, a relatively wealthy city, there are a great number of professional, well educated people, who have done everything right in their lives but cannot find work.

What does the minister persist in talking about? He keeps talking about the fundamentals. What are the fundamentals? Surely one is being able to pay the bills, and cover the debts. Ever since the Liberals introduced a budget in this House in 1974 that started giving tax breaks to the wealthy to the extent that the government was no longer able to pay its debts, its bills, we have seen a constant erosion of the financial situation of this country to the point where today the debt is indeed crippling and something we have to deal with. It is something that in eight years this government has not been able to come to terms with.

Surely another one of the fundamentals is stability so that people can know from one day to the next, from one year to the next, from one generation to the next what their lives are going to be like, what kind of circumstances they will live in.

Looking at my occupation of agriculture, do we see stability or any move toward stability? No, we do not. We have seen the trade wars, the bankruptcies and the loss of hope. What do we see at a time when we need stability? We see this government introducing measures to do away with the Crow rate, the fundamental transportation structure of this country, particularly in western Canada.

We see the government further undermining the Canadian Wheat Board by threatening to take barley out from under its jurisdiction. When it comes to the country at large, we see the free trade kind of philosophy, the NAFTA agreement and the patent drug act, all of which cause more instability in the lives of people.

Surely there is nothing more fundamentally important than a job, nothing more fundamental than the ability of an economy to be able to accommodate the needs and wishes of people to be able to earn their living, to pay for the food on their table, the roof over their heads, their clothes and their kids' education. Surely that is the fundamental that we should all be striving for, but it is one which this government has lost sight of.

What did we see in this statement? Did we see tax fairness? No, we did not. We see a continuation of those big loopholes that the Auditor General pointed out such as family trusts that allow wealthy families in this country to concentrate ever more wealth in their own hands to the point where this country has the greatest concentration of wealth in the world.

We see the offshore tax havens continue. We see loopholes like the entertainment tax credit which costs us $2 billion a year continue. We see in this statement that revenues are short. It is not surprising when so many people are unemployed, not paying taxes and absorbing services from the government. Certainly it is no surprise that revenues are going to be short. The government should have known that.

In my own constituency the welfare and unemployment bill amounts to $126 million a year, an appalling statistic. Surely that is where the waste of money is as well as the shortfall in revenues. We see a continuation of expenditures like the $4.4 billion on helicopters that cannot land on the boats they are designed for and cannot carry out the auxiliary functions that people had hoped they would.

What have we seen to deal with unemployment? We had great promise of an infrastructure program. I must say that the Minister of Finance and his officials have laboured mightily and produced a mouse. There is very little there for any part of the country, but the further west you go the less there is. When you get to western Canada you get a few roads and the national parks.

The minister talks about UI reform. Rather than putting people back to work in new and creative ways, what do we see? We see a situation where people who quit their jobs are not going to be eligible for unemployment insurance, no matter under what circumstances they quit.

In an era where sexual harassment on the job site, unsafe working conditions and so on are at the top of the agenda, people who respond to that will be told: "Sorry, you are out of luck. You did the wrong thing, there is nothing for you". We see cuts in programs that could lead to value added production, that could lead to investment in new industries like Western Diversification and the green plan.

In the two minutes I have left I would like to spend one minute dealing with the fig leaf, the incentive that we see for investment in small business which is, after all, the major job creator in this country. The changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act, the unemployment insurance holiday, the 10 per cent tax credit are all matters which I think members would generally applaud.

Personally, as the critic for co-operative and community development, I would congratulate the minister for finally taking some action with regard to the unfair treatment that co-ops often experience by making it possible for people forming worker co-ops or other kinds of co-operatives to be able to use RRSP money or RRIF money in order to stimulate co-operative investment. This is a long overdue measure and I congratulate the minister on it.

What could the government have done? It could have brought in some real tax reform. It could have instituted a national investment fund to create value added opportunities, to invest in the knowledge industries, the industries of the future. It could have invested in the economic infrastructure by empowering communities through community economic development corporations, economic development authorities and other institutions like that to take their economic destiny into their own hands in a very low cost effective kind of way. We have not seen that.

What we have seen instead apart from the fig leaf is more GST, more free trade and more of the corporate agenda. With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I think this is an indication, and I say that somewhat sadly, that at a time when we need creative government action, we have a government that seems to be politically bankrupt in many ways and morally bankrupt. I think when we look at the direction that this paper takes us, it is also intellectually bankrupt.

Canadians are looking for change. This was an opportunity to create some real change, but it was not taken. Therefore, I must submit that we will not see the kind of change Canadians are looking for until we see an election, until we see a change in government, until we see a change in the fundamental direction in which this country is going so that once again Canadians can be proud to earn a living in their own country.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, Christmas season is fast approaching. It is the time when we think of sharing some happy times with family and friends, sharing the bounties of the work that we have done throughout the year and enjoying the fruits of our labour.

This statement today reminds me of a Christmas story that I have heard since I was a little girl. I think it bears repeating here. It symbolizes the trickle-down economics that this government continues to believe in, that continues to enrich those who have the most and impoverish those who have the least.

It is the story of The Little Match Girl, who on a freezing Christmas Eve stood outside the rich people's house and looked inside at the fire in the fireplace, the decorations on the Christmas tree, the toys under the Christmas tree, the big fat turkey on the table, the people in all their finery and hoped just that they might come outside and pay a penny for her matches. As she stood there and waited for the rich people to come out and pay a penny for her matches, she started lighting her matches to keep her hands from freezing. Before they were finished their dinner she had burned up all her matches. Before Christmas Eve was over she had frozen to death in the snow.

This is trickle-down economics. Those who have the least get the least and get poorer and those who have the most get the most and get richer. The principle was repeated here in the minister's statement this afternoon. Those who can compete will prosper; those who cannot will stagnate.

We have a continuation of the policies that have impoverished 3.6 million Canadians, including one million children. We had a proud statement by the minister this afternoon that we will continue to invest in policies to make our economy work better.

This government has brought us the made-in-Canada recession and is telling us that its policies have made this economy work better. Tell that to 1.6 million Canadians who are out of work. Tell that to the children who line up at food banks every day in this country.

We will continue to invest in sound monetary and fiscal policies. I do not think there is anybody but the handful of people on the other side of this House who pretend to govern this country, who believe that their monetary and fiscal policies have been sound. Certainly, it is not the people in this country who wonder if they have a job today or whether they will have a job tomorrow.

This is about scraps from the table of the rich, hopefully falling down and allowing the poor to eat. What we need is economic recovery from the ground up. Even in this, the national capital, one of the wealthiest communities in this country, we have 100,000 people on some form of public assistance or unemployment insurance. That is what is costing us $22,000 for every unemployed person in this country. Right here in the nation's capital, on the Ontario side of the capital, we have welfare up by nearly 25 per cent in the last 12 months.

We have a plan here that is not going to solve the problems of people who wonder whether they are going to have a roof over their head and a meal on the table a month from now. We have a plan here that continues the mistakes of the past, that repeats the unfulfilled promises of eight consecutive budgets that we will reduce the debt and reduce the deficit. What do we have? A steadily rising debt and a steadily rising deficit.

We have an infrastucture program here that is going to invest again in short-term make-work projects. There is no vision of investing in an infrastructure that is going to strengthen the economy of this country in the long term.

The Minister of Supply and Services sits over there. Small towns in his community cannot expand economically because they are under an environmental order not to add any further development. They have wooden sewers that go back into the last century and are not safe or sanitary. Do I see anything in here about improving the water supply for Canadians, treating the water supply of Canadians to stop polluting our rivers, lakes and oceans? Not at all. The rhetoric of Rio that came so freely from the Prime Minister's mouth less than six months ago is totally lost in our commitment of creating jobs. We see an even further cut from what has already been done in this year's budget to the green plan.

Then we turn around and we see that we paid $22 billion last year in interest to foreign lenders. That is only the tip of the iceberg. That $22 billion at a 50 per cent tax rate means $11 billion in lost tax revenue. One-third of this year's deficit is being lost because this government has not figured out how to get Canadians to invest in their own country and their own future, how to keep that money in Canada that we are paying out in interest to the tune of $22 billion a year, and how to collect income taxes on that income in Canada rather than allow foreign countries to collect income tax on money that we are paying out of the pockets of Canadian taxpayers.

I note with irony a statement on page 11 of the minister's Economic and Fiscal Statement this afternoon indicating that the more we can leave in people's pockets the better it will be for our economy. If the government truly believes that leaving money in people's pockets and letting people purchase goods and services that produce jobs for other Canadians is good economic policy then why is it as the largest single employer in the country, with the largest single work force, insisting on cutting the purchasing power of its own employees and insisting on further reducing jobs when it is time to encourage the private sector to create jobs?

We have a double-whammy of three years of no job increases for tens of thousands of people who are earning incomes below the poverty level working for the Government of Canada. How are they going to pay for food, clothes and education for their children?

We had cutbacks in government spending in the budget this year. We had another 2 per cent cutback in June. Now we have a 2 per cent cutback in the last quarter which is equivalent to an 8 per cent cutback in services to the public. We heard two things from Canadians during the referendum campaign. The first was to stop fiddling with the Constitution and get back to fixing the economy and the major problems that confront this country. The second thing was that they wanted a strong federal government capable of taking leadership, building partnerships and solving the problems of this country. What do we have now? We have a government that is destroying the ability of the Government of Canada to govern on behalf of Canadians.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, we know that we are in a transition period from one type of economy relying on heavy industry and the exploitation of natural resources to another based on knowledge, information, high technologies and services. We know this and what we are saying to Canadians in this debate is that we would do much better in using the levers of government. We would not be obsessed with deficit cutting as the government is because first we would want to look after the social fabric of Canada. We would want to kick-start economic growth in partnership, if you like, with the provinces, municipalities, labour and business. We would probably pay attention to water quality. We would pay attention to sewage treatment plants.

We would engage resources in pollution prevention, in the rehabilitation of our rivers and the removal of health-endangering chemicals. That is where we would hopefully put our taxpayers' resources and not in mega-projects, such as tar sands or the construction of a link to Prince Edward Island. That is a very costly and divisive project. Water is a very precious resource and is badly neglected. Water would receive attention at this time by an enlightened government.

Let me tell you what we would not do. We would not fight unemployment on the backs of the unemployed by reducing benefits as the government announced it would. Believe me, it is no fun to be without income for the first two weeks and then have to make ends meet on 60 per cent of one's previous income. To reduce unemployment insurance benefits below 60 per cent is really a disgrace. If that was not bad enough, this government now wants to penalize those who quit their employment by depriving them entirely of their benefits, whether they qualified with contributions or not.

This afternoon I was shocked to see the Prime Minister applaud when the finance minister announced this measure. I was almost embarrassed. I asked myself whether the Prime Minister realized what he was doing when this measure was announced. This measure gives the employer greater power than ever. It makes it virtually impossible for the employee to quit if the employee is harassed, sexually or otherwise, in the workplace or decides that the workplace has become unsafe.

Through these measures we see the ugly face of the Conservative government. We see its heartless face that is taking away from the weak in the name of cutting the deficit. What a shame.

I will move on to the freeze on the income of parliamentarians. It seems rather curious that this is being done without looking at the size of cabinet. Why stop at parliamentarians? Would anyone in Canada have suffered if cabinet had been cut by 25 per cent, or even 50 per cent? Would anyone have noticed?

Would any Canadian have noticed the disappearance of eminent ministers such as the minister of multiculturalism, the minister of forests, the minister for constitutional affairs—who disappeared anyway from the political map after October 26—the minister of state for the environment, the minister of state for financial affairs. These are just a few.

It seems rather peculiar that this government would find the courage to inflict penalties on the unemployed but not on cabinet itself.

It seems to me that this government is retreating from governing. It is not rebuilding the economy of this country. It has axed the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council of Canada, the Law Reform Commission, and the Institute for International Peace and Security. It has eliminated the Court Challenges Program. You name it.

In addition to that wilful action, in the private sector every day there are plant closures and people laid off by the hundreds. The social and economic costs of these lay-offs are immense, yet there are no adjustment programs.

There is no improvement in the direction for those who are laid off. There are no initiatives for those searching for their first job, for instance. There are no extensions of benefits for those who are running out of unemployment insurance benefits, thus increasing the tax burden on municipalities.

What a hard-nosed, heartless way of governing, certainly not in the name of social fairness but in the name of cutting deficits.

If this government were guided by social fairness principles, then it would have wanted, with this measure today, to close the many tax loopholes identified by the Auditor General in his report. Or it would have imposed a tax increase on those making, say, more than $50,000 a year. Or it would have eliminated some of the major tax privileges such as tax-free expense accounts. You name it. We know and I am sure the Minister of Finance knows where to find his lost sources of revenue.

To attack the unemployed and introduce these measures really is offensive. It is very sad because it is not in the political tradition and culture of Canada in difficult times to go after the weaker elements in society. This has not been our tradition so far. I regret that.

I would have thought that in this particular time the Government of Canada would have removed this illusive pursuit of reducing the deficit, which has plagued this government and preceding governments.

At this time with high unemployment and large numbers of people on welfare, I thought it would have decided that this was the time to move by giving priority to the social fabric of the nation, to the cohesion of our communities where high unemployment has such a devastating effect. We are not giving the individual that sense of dignity, not giving Canadians in large and small communities that sense of dignity that is so badly sought in difficult times. Our youth is crying for attention in terms of their first employment. Our middle aged workforce is going through a crisis at the very moment that it is without employment. Our elderly workers are very dissatisfied with early retirement adjustment programs and tonight they have very little to be happy about, very little. We are very distressed.

• (2350)

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I talk about this economic and fiscal statement of the Minister of Finance.

He certainly does not have an easy task. He has been appointed Minister of Finance when things are really bad so we cannot blame him personally for what is happening to this country.

As Minister of Transport, when I was still on the other side, the minister was hard working and certainly competent within this sphere.

What has happened? He has been appointed Minister of Finance and given the task to defend the previous eight years of this government. He has not addressed the fundamental problems of why in Canada we have a creeping problem of bad forecasting by the Minister of Finance. I would like to quote Jeffrey Simpson of The Globe and Mail on December 2 in an editorial: "It is a new singer but it is the same old song, the Red Ink Blues".

It is true. Every finance minister since the early 1970s has been making forecasts but always the wrong forecasts. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans when he was finance minister in 1979 said that by 1985 the national annual deficit would drop to $2.1 billion, but in reality in 1985 we had a deficit of $34 billion.

Alan MacEachen said, when he became Minister of Finance in the year 1983–1984, that because of his administration the deficit would be only $7.5 billion. In reality, in the year 1983–1984 the deficit was $32 billion.

The same thing happened with Marc Lalonde, another Minister of Finance.

We know the story of the former Minister of Finance, presently the industry minister. I remember when I was in caucus and he presented his first budget, he said that after four years of his administration there would not be a deficit.

I asked him a question. I said: "Mr. Wilson, Mr. Crosbie had made predictions. Mr. MacEachen had made predictions, and you are making predictions. How can you be that sure you are going to be different?"

As I said in the beginning, we do not address the fundamental problems of the taxation system in Canada. We reward that formation but we do not reward capital formation.

This is why we read in today's edition of The Ottawa Citizen that the Royal Bank said that 67 per cent of its loans were not performing. This means that they are not paying what is due to the bank, and this is $3.5 billion. Of that Olympia & York and Bramalea alone owe to the Royal Bank $780 million. Those companies are bankrupt.

Who is going to pay for that? It is you, Mr. Speaker. It is other members. It is the small person, the middle class, the worker who puts a little bit of money in the bank. The bank raises interest rates and makes money to pay for Olympia & York, Bramalea and others that have borrowed and spent money outside this country buying properties in the United States and building in London, England. Our taxpayers have to pay for those mistakes.

The fundamental problems have not been addressed to reward capital formation. If companies are badly run we reward them. We reward them: they can borrow money. They can borrow money from the banks and money from the state. We give grants, but there is no reward for people who really work hard.

We are always talking about Japan, Hong Kong and Taiwan. In Taiwan the maximum tax is 16 per cent. That is a flat tax, whether one makes $1 million or $100 million, with no exemptions. Its corporations have to pay taxes like everybody. In our system the individual pays most of the taxes. Our government collects personal taxes and very little corporate taxes. Corporations are always exempted. They do not have to pay and they should be paying.

As time goes by I would like to say that the Minister of Finance in his statement does not resolve Canada's problems. He has been wrong in his forecasting. He was telling us six or seven months ago that we were not going into a recession. He could not even pronounce the word recession. After a while he said: "Yes, we are moving into a recession".

Today we are in a depression. Canada has lost 500,000 manufacturing jobs; jobs that have moved and will never come back to Canada. The government brings in the free trade agreement and now NAFTA, the North-American free trade agreement, that is going to siphon away jobs from Canada. This is not acceptable to Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being twelve o'clock midnight, pursuant to the order made Tuesday, December 1, 1992, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at ten o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PRESENTATION OF 1993 EXPENDITURE PLAN

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the 1993 Expenditure Plan for the Unemployment Insurance Developmental Uses Program.

[English]

Ms. Black: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wonder if I could inquire of the parliamentary secretary to the House leader if he could tell us when we could expect the government response to the status of women subcommittee report on breast cancer.

It is over three weeks late now. There are women who are waiting anxiously to hear what the government action will be in terms of that report and its 49 recommendations.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I take my hon. friend's question seriously. I will make the appropriate inquiries and endeavour to get back to her as soon as is practically possible.

Mr. Edmonston: Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order dealing with late reports. Two reports of another committee, the consumer and corporate affairs committee, are also late, approximately one month late. One deals with trademarks and the other deals with consumer protection and credit card interest rates.

If my hon. colleague would take cognizance of our demand as well we would appreciate it.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, with reference to the two reports mentioned I think I can indicate to my friend that they will be forthcoming before we rise.

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Porter (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the chairman of the standing committee I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the third report of the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-380, an act to amend the Criminal Code (firearms).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Reimer: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to send a powerful message of deterrence to anyone thinking of taking a gun along on the commission of a crime.

This bill would significantly toughen section 85 of the Criminal Code, the section which makes it an offence to use a firearm while committing a crime. The minimum mandatory sentence would be increased from one year to five years for first offence and three years to eight years for any subsequent offence.

Under this bill there would be no eligibility for parole during that five or eight year period. The bill would also specifically prevent a mandatory sentence from having any impact on the sentence imposed for the other offence committed.

The bill specifically requires the written consent of the provincial attorney general before any section 85 charge could be withdrawn or plea bargained away.

The idea is not new. It was proposed by the former Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker. It is also supported by police chiefs right across Canada and by the Canadian Police Association.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Reimer moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is an honour to present a number of petitions today from Northwest Territories, Yukon, Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

The petitioners say that they are residents of Canada and they wish to designate a day for the recognition of Canada's original inhabitants, to honour our native cultures, and that June 21 is the most appropriate day to recognize these First Nations.

Therefore they are calling upon Parliament to enact Bill C-268, an act respecting a national solidarity day for the First Nations of Canada.

FRESHWATER EXPORTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, on another topic, again the petitioners are by and large from British Columbia.

They point out their opposition to any notion of selling water to the United States and Mexico as a result of the North American free trade agreement.

They are asking the Government of Canada to state categorically through legislation that our rivers are not for sale.

VIOLENCE ON TELEVISION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would like to table a petition from residents of Val-d'Or, Amos, Vassan, Sullivan, Val-Senneville and Saint-Edmond-d'Abitibi, stating that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and unacceptable because they encourage further violence.

They also point out that all toys that are an incentive to violent games are unacceptable and that production of such toys should be banned. Freedom of the press should be restricted when reporting acts of violence. The repeated reporting of acts of violence on all television channels and on radio may encourage similar acts of violence.

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass legislation dealing with the above, to wipe out violence in our society, protect our children and guarantee everyone in this country a better quality of life.

KILLER CARDS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 36 I have the honour to present

175 duly certified petitions containing 51,000 signatures of citizens from Burlington, Hamilton, Ancaster, Dundas, Stoney Creek, Milton, Oakville, eastern Ontario, the Niagara Peninsula, and western Ontario.

The petitioners support Mrs. Debbie Mahaffy in her efforts to have the importation of killer cards into Canada stopped and note with concern that three more manufactures of killer cards are in production. They applaud the efforts of the Minister of National Revenue for his action and his statements of support.

The petitioners request Parliament to amend the law to prohibit the importation, distribution, sale and manufacture of killer cards.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed mainly by residents of my constituency with respect to the drug RU-486.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have many thousands of signatures on petitions. These signatures are supporting the over 600,000 signatures that we already have. All these signatories are supporting the parents of Nina de Villiers.

They feel that there are serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system. There are many vulnerable persons who have little protection under the current system. Women, children and disabled persons are at particular risk.

They ask that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society. They also ask the government to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act, 1972, and the Parole Act accordingly.

THREE GORGES DAM

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Huron—Bruce): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present. The first petition is from a group of people in Goderich and surrounding area.

They ask that Parliament pass the necessary legislation to prevent any further involvement by the Government of Canada in the Three Gorges dam project in China.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Huron—Bruce): Madam Speaker, the second petition is from the Port Elgin—Southampton area.

These petitioners are asking us to think of being proud Canadians, to enter into a project that would give us an opportunity to nurture our positive life-long relationship with our heritage and our flag, to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles, and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Bob Porter (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, this petition represents the signatures of approximately 16,000 of my constituents.

It calls for the Government of Canada to revise the Young Offenders Act to allow for a clear definition of the powers and procedures of investigating authorities in respect to their duties in questioning young offenders, to supply a remedy to give more protection to the public against repeated and serious crimes committed by young offenders and to raise the offenders to adult court automatically.

These signatures were collected by one constituent, Mr. Bill Swanson. They are indicative of the grave concern in the public domain over the present act governing young offenders.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I have a petition which I would like to present from various people across the country. They call upon the House of Commons because Canadians wish to designate a day of recognition for Canada's original inhabitants so as to honour native cultures. They suggest that June 21 be named as an appropriate day to recognize our First Nations.

They therefore ask that the House of Commons enact Bill C-268, an act respecting a national solidarity day for the First Nations of Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed from Wednesday, December 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1992, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would ask for the indulgence of the House to see whether there would be unanimous consent to permit the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration to speak for 20 minutes, with the understanding of course that the speakers following him for the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party would have the same privilege extended to them.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, there are many issues in the economic statement we heard yesterday but one of the most critical issues concerns the changes to unemployment insurance.

The minister is here this morning and it is important that we hear him. Perhaps at the end of his 20-minute presentation we might even have a chance to ask a question or two if he would permit that. If there is a sleeper in this whole issue, it has to be the provisions surrounding the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

On behalf of the New Democratic Party, we would like to give the minister that opportunity and again to have a chance to ask a question or two at the end of his presentation.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, I saw the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader converse with some of the other House leaders. I thought this was going to be the request and I wish he had spoken to me.

Obviously we want to hear what the minister of immigration and unemployment insurance says because that is one of the many facets in that statement last night.

I will give my consent on the condition that I talk to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. I intend to stay here and put my time in, but I am not going to give my consent unless I can work out an arrangement with the government House leader and the other House leaders that I can get on in some reasonable time. I understand the status of independent members, but this is one of the little things that we have left in these reformed rules.

In view of the interest all over the country to the statement last night I will give my consent because I do want to hear the minister.

I am prepared to sit here until 12 o'clock tonight and I am going to itemize every speaker. If the Chair is using some type of magic that is only referring to members from recognized parties, then at some time later today I am going to rise and cause a little procedural problem.

That might be eliminated if I can get the consent of the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader that he and I can work out when I may have some idea to be recognized by the Chair in a rotation. If I have that from him now in the House I will give my consent.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I am sure we would not want to set a precedent for negotiating or bargaining on the floor of the House. I do not want to do that.

I am always prepared to talk to my friend from Annapolis Valley—Hants. I will of course converse with him today, but I believe it is the Speaker's discretion that decides the order of participants in the debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I was about to ask of the loyal opposition if there was unanimous consent.

Mr. Milliken: Ask the full House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands says I should ask the full House. The only reason I said I would be asking the hon. member representing the opposition was that there seemed to be consent from the government side and from the members of the New Democratic Party so I was coming to the loyal opposition and to the independents. I think this is only a fair way to look at it.

Maybe I should have put the question to the House but people rose on points of order before I had a chance to put the question to the House.

As far as the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants is concerned, yes, it is the Speaker's privilege and normally independent members are recognized. I do not see why at 10 o'clock in the morning he would already be worried that he has not been recognized. Nobody has been recognized yet today.

I understand there is not unanimous consent to give the extra time to the Minister of Employment of Immigration. I will recognize him for the 10 minutes.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, first of all, I am not surprised to see Liberal members trying to prevent us from explaining to Canadians.

This is just one more instance of their lack of courtesy toward the person who has the floor. It is typical of the Liberals, and I suppose they just want to show how little they care about the problems facing Canadians today.

[English]

It is typical of the Liberal Party. Put your head in the sand and continue. Canadians value very much that kind of attitude.

Madam Speaker, could we have order in the House?

[Translation]

Could we have some order in the House? I realize the Liberal Party is anxious to hide the facts from Canadians.

[English]

Over many years this Chamber has been no stranger to hot and heavy debates on economic issues, especially on the numerous occasions over the last 30 years or more when the world was in a recession or, as it is today, emerging from the global downturn.

Those in this House who have lived through the many cycles of our economy since the downturn of the early 1960s and on, or those who have studied our economic history know better than most that there are two certainties.

First, recessions will come, but recessions will most assuredly pass. Each downturn in the economy will often be greeted as if it were the first in history, a sudden apparition demanding to be cleanly and surgically removed, never to return again.

Second, as we emerge from a downturn we each must resist the siren song which would delude us into believing that quick fixes will remove the pain, creating illusions of growth. The only responsible and enduring policy response which is effective is to manage our national economy as if it were our very own personal economy.

Those who have been around here for a while know full well that regardless of the heat of the debate or the degree of the righteous indignation expressed at any moment, and certainly the walls of this Chamber have heard it all before, there have been precious few governments before that focus on the fundamental principles so consistently to serve the long-term interests of all Canadians.

In the aftermath of yesterday's statement by my colleague, the Minister of Finance, the opposition parties would like to underline their perceptions and what they want Canadians to perceive for cheap political reasons.

I see that in the NDP member there. Those who have a corner on virtue, the socialist magpies there, will they stand up and ask the president of the New Democratic Party to withdraw and retract her untrue statements to Canadians yesterday that the changes mean that sexually harassed women in Canada no longer get protection under the UI act?

That was the statement of the president of their party. It is an untrue statement and it is one which I expect the righteous, truthful, honest, socialists to demand that their president withdraw and retract because it is a falsehood to Canadian women. I hope that they do it.

The announcement made yesterday showed clearly that this government has made human resource development the top priority of the economic policy of this government.

In answer to the tens of thousands of Canadians from all regions of Canada who have participated in the community talks under the prosperity initiatives, yes, those members over on the other side, their absence was noted at those community talks with the the real people, the workers, the bosses, the employers, the educators. The message from coast to coast to coast was the same: Invest in human resources because this is the key to our development.

No one has heard any of those great members over on the other side underlining the fact that the cuts announced yesterday by the Minister of Finance were necessary. We know it is not nice to cut programs, but we had no choice. We as a country and we as a people must pay our way.

Why should newborn babies in this country not have the right to start with a clean slate like anybody else? Unfortunately, from day one they are stuck with a debt they will carry with them for the rest of their lives. Today, in a consistent and coherent manner, thanks to the Labour Force Development Board—

—we have made investment in people a top priority.

What about those displaced workers? Those members on the other side who pretend to care, why do they not look at the strong measures taken in the statement by the government yesterday to invest in people?

A special $300 million program will be targeted to long-term employed people who are permanently displaced because of restructuring. They will have special counselling and special enhancement training programs tailor-made to their needs. There are over 100,000 Canadians with long-time attachment to work who will benefit from this measure.

[Translation]

For instance, what about the decision to freeze employer premiums for small businesses? It is a fact that the contribution of small business to the Canadian economy is very substantial, and this positive measure will inject almost $500 million more into our economy to create jobs. Of course, they would rather not mention that measure because it is a positive one.

What really makes me sick, if you will pardon the expression, is the way they seem to use other people's misery to score political points.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: For the sake of scoring minor political points with other people's misery, they object to the responsible measures the government is introducing in order to invest in human resources and get employers and unions to work together to meet the challenges facing every industrialized country on this planet.

These people seem to think that Canada is a self-contained unit, a small island isolated from the rest of the world, where we can ignore the realities of a global economy. So what happens to 70 per cent of our production? We are an exporting country, and the key to Canada's economic success is a highly trained work force.

[English]

Those measures in there are taken in a revolutionary way. This measure, this central partnership initiative, and history will record it, I predict to you, will change forever the way we do business in Canada. Oh yes, I see the strange faces on the other side.

This government has fostered partnership. It has brought special equity groups, the labour movement and the business sector together at one table called the Labour Force Development Board, to put forward measures to help Canadians face the challenge of human resource development.

No one will talk about the great program my colleague, the Minister of Finance, announced yesterday and which I call the program to prevent unemployment.

For the first time in a major way—I know I am being cut by time and of course Liberals do not want Canadians to get the good news. Canadians will still get the good news because, fortunately for Canada, it is not only this place that we can use to bring the message to Canadians. We shall bring it because it is a message that Canadians must understand and must get in order to get Canada growing again, which I know will be a political disadvantage for these cheap politically-minded people.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I rise to see if there would be unanimous consent for the hon. minister to continue for another 10 minutes, with the understanding that the Liberals and the New Democrats would have a parallel opportunity for each of their speakers who would follow.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Consent has not been given.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I had been inclined to give the hon. minister consent before the speech began but it was a sorry, disgraceful display which demonstrates why this government is in such trouble and why the people of Canada are in trouble.

That was an incredibly bad speech from a minister who owed a duty to the millions of Canadians who are going to suffer as a result of the statement made yesterday and the legislation that this government proposes to introduce. He owes the duty—are you going to interrupt me?

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may answer the question of the hon. member for Victoria. Yes, the hon. member for Essex—Windsor has been seeking the floor on a point of order I imagine.

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, I just wanted to ask the Speaker if there is not a 10-minute question and answer period after the minister's speech.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We have gone past the first five hours of debate. Now it is strictly 10-minute speeches with no period of questions and comments. The hon. member might want to look on the Projected Order of Business. It is written in black and white.

[Translation]

Mr. Edmonston: Madam Speaker, the House was just asked for unanimous consent so that an independent member could speak. I think that what the minister had to say is also important. Could we not agree unanimously to let the minister finish his speech and we could then ask questions?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question was raised. It took unanimous consent to change the rule that at this point in the debate, after five hours of debate, there are only 10-minute periods that are not followed by 10 or 5 minutes for questions and comments, only 10-minute speeches.

Unanimous consent was sought to let the minister speak for 20 minutes instead of 10, and some wanted it to be followed with a question period. But the House did not give unanimous consent. Therefore we return automatically to the Standing Order which says that only 10-minute speeches are acceptable, unless at some point the House agrees unanimously to change it.

[English]

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, in the past few months Canadians have made it absolutely clear that they are looking to this government and to all members of Parliament for some real leadership on the issue of jobs and the economy. I made a survey in my riding of all of the households in Victoria. We got a tremendous response from the people of Victoria to that householder. It became very clear again that the people of Victoria, and I know this is typical of all communities in Canada, want top priority given to achieving full employment in Canada within a reasonable period of time. By a 73 per cent majority, the respondents said the federal government has to work toward a goal of full employment.

They want working people and their unions to have a more active role in administering and designing training needs. They feel very strongly that the North American free trade agreement will do little to increase employment in Canada. In fact, 70 per cent believe it will increase unemployment in this country.

What is true in Victoria is true across this country. The reaction of the people of Canada as they begin to absorb the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Finance will be deep disappointment and, indeed, anger everywhere, except in the boardrooms of the financial institutions of this country. There is anger at the arrogance, complacency, meanness and incompetence of this government in the area of the economy.

In Victoria the public service cutbacks and wage freeze will slow down the recovery that had begun to take place and will impose new burdens on people who can ill afford it. The tragedy is that the approach the Minister of Finance took yesterday and this government has taken over the last number of years is economically unnecessary. In fact, the Conservative policy is really not an economic policy, it is a choice which is driven by ideology and upper middle class complacency about the state of affairs in this country.

The member for Ontario across the way laughs at that. There are 1.6 million Canadians who are out of work. This is not simply the result of the policies of this government, and we on all sides should understand and concede that. It is in part because of the global recession. However, it is also in part because of the policies of this government and the underlying weaknesses in the Canadian economy.

The real people in Canada are the ones who will be hurt by the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Finance. This government had choices. By cutting the unemployment insurance benefits to try to save some money with this budget, the government is imposing a new hardship on those who will be going through the trauma of unemployment, often for the first time. People will have to look at trying to survive at the poverty line, which is what most people have to do on UI.

The government will be imposing this economic problem at a time when it has already previously imposed further delays in UI and unconscionable problems in the delivery of the UI system, problems which all members of Parliament become familiar with through the case work and constituency work they do.

Further, and this I think is the most venal provision in the statement made yesterday, the withdrawal of UI from those who quit or are terminated, apparently for cause, is completely fraught with difficulty and will produce these results. First, there will be terrible pressures imposed on those on the front line in Canada Employment Centres who have to make the initial decision as to whether the party is entitled to UI or not. It will produce a huge increase in appeals. It will encourage lying and cheating by either employers or employees who are seeking unemployment insurance and have no ready alternatives. It will produce new pressures on social assistance and on welfare, yet another pass-through of this government's financial problems on to the provinces and municipalities across Canada. It will add stress to the lives of those who are already under stress as a result of the termination of their employment.

The minister of unemployment, as he was called at one point by my hon. friend from Annapolis Valley—Hants, took after my leader for suggesting that those who are sexually harassed would now lose employment. It should be absolutely understood, and I would have thought members opposite would understand, how the reality is going to take place.

When an employee suffers sexual harassment, as has been documented in case after case after case, it takes an enormous amount of courage to step forward and call the employer or the third party who is engaged in the sexual harassment. There will be case after case where people quit because they cannot stand the sexual harassment but are still afraid to raise the issue, or having raised it, cannot prove it within the time available before some official in UI.

While the minister is technically correct, that termination because of sexual harassment would entitle the individual to unemployment insurance, the minister fails to understand in I think a complacent and arrogant way, and so do the members opposite who will be supporting this legislation, that the reality will not permit that to be said and done and properly and fairly judged.

In fact, there is no reasonable system in place even to judge whether the sexual harassment has occurred or not. The reality is going to be that there will be hundreds of thousands of women who will lose their jobs because of sexual harassment and who will now not for practical purposes be entitled to unemployment insurance, again imposing this government's rigid ideology on the weaker members of our society.

The changes in the UI provisions in respect of quitting or termination also break a contractual commitment that this Parliament has essentially made to those who have contributed to UI over the years, an understanding of the basis of their commitment.

This originally started as an unemployment insurance program and thus had the elements of a commitment between this Parliament and the people who were making payments. For the government to retroactively change that, albeit it will not apply to claims presently in progress, but those who have been contributing over the years and have a new claim, will now find it governed by changes of rules imposed retroactively by the government.

I said the tragedy is that this is not economically necessary. The Globe and Mail in an editorial yesterday gave the government three options: holding the line, modest cuts or deep cuts. This editorial points out very clearly that within a reasonable period of time, by simply holding the line on spending, but not deep cuts in public spending, the government could achieve the objective of reducing the deficit.

I would like to add that if the government would also take its responsibilities in the area of defence and policing defence expenditures seriously, including ending this ridiculous expenditure of $4.4 billion on helicopters, but in addition imposes a rigorous policing of expenditures, it could save the Canadian taxpayers billions of dollars and accelerate the reduction of the deficit which we all want.

This was a mean-spirited and difficult statement made by the Minister of Finance. I call upon the people of Canada to rise up and require and force the government to change the direction it has gone in the time that it has left in office, a brief time.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure and an honour for me this morning to speak on a document and a speech made by the Minister of Finance yesterday. To begin, let me emphasize the presence of the Minister of Finance who in his speech yesterday said to the opposition, "I am making my speech. I await your comments and your suggestions. I have a budget coming in March and I am waiting for you to give me your comments and suggestions in a non-partisan way for the good of Canada". That is what the Minister of Finance said yesterday in this House.

The Minister of Finance made his speech at 3.15 p.m. He was here in this House from 3.15 to midnight when the House adjourned. He was here to listen to the opposition's suggestions and I commend him for that. We know the work and the importance of the department he leads. As well as being Deputy Prime Minister, he took the time and he is still taking the time today to be here to listen to suggestions.

At midnight I was talking with him and unfortunately we came to the conclusion that no one on the other side of the House up to midnight had made a suggestion for the good of Canada, not 25 suggestions, but one valid suggestion for the good of Canada.

I was interviewed by the media in Trois-Rivières a few minutes ago and they told me that everyone was criticizing this morning and the opposition was critical of us. I said to them, "Yes, but what suggestions or ideas has the opposition put forward?" It is easy to criticize; just about anybody can do it. You do not even have to be an opposition member. But the Minister of Finance is the one who has proposed interesting, intelligent and practical solutions to ensure the well-being of our country.

Allow me to go over the speech made yesterday by the minister. You will hear people criticize from the point of view of small business, and you have heard various comments on that by different people. The Minister of Finance also heard these comments and yesterday he took action to help small-business people.

The Minister of Finance listened to Canadians because he knows that 80 per cent of all jobs in Canada are created by the small business sector. I hope that the opposition will also listen to Canadians. Madam Speaker, the support for small businesses is significant. This help is important to Canada's economic activity.

The minister did not mention any increase in unemployment insurance premiums for small businesses next year. He actually went further than that. Indeed, any small business which will be created in 1993, or that did not exist in 1992, and which will increase the number of its employees in 1993, will incur no additional UI premium costs, which translates into a subsidy of about $1,600 per employee for the year. Madam Speaker, I did not hear a lot of complaints about this measure. It is a good measure so people do not criticize it. But I did not hear many people from the other side congratulate the minister either, Madam Speaker. I did not hear them congratulate him even once.

Madam Speaker, he introduced a 10 per cent investment tax credit. Once again, the buyer of any new machinery or equipment will be entitled to that credit.

That is important. It often provides whatever little help the small business needed to upgrade its equipment, its machinery, but was somewhat reluctant to buy. Now they have this additional 10 percent tax credit.

The Small Businesses Loans Act had been mentioned, and the minister made an effort in that area in his 1992 budget and again yesterday, raising the ceiling to $250,000. That is great news for the people in the riding of Trois-Rivières. They are many who have taken advantage of this particular act and I am convinced there will be even more following this further increase.

In addition, from now on, employees will be allowed to use their RRSPs to buy shares. That too is important and is in keeping with the private enterprise concept this government has put forward and has been trying to pursue for eight years now, the principle that jobs are created by the private sector in this country. Let us stop entertaining the belief that spending astronomical amounts can help. The Liberals did just that during three or four months in 1981-1982 without any specific direction regarding employment nor any kind of rhyme or reason for such spending. They called that job creation programs where people would do construction, repairs or paint jobs, just about anything for four months, just to find themselves back on unemployment at the end of these four months. Billions were spent on that, billions that are now painfully lacking and form the monstrous debt we inherited back in 1984 and that we also have to pay interest on. In spite of this heritage from the Liberals, the Minister of Finance managed to announce positive measures to support the Canadian economy and that of Quebec.

He has extended the home buyers' plan. Why? Again, because he has been listening to the Canadian people. He introduced this project and it has produced very positive results. As Minister of Finance he had choices to make. Again he has chosen to listen to the Canadian people. He must be given credit for that.

The issue of the two-year wage freeze will certainly be raised. It is never very exciting to announce a wage freeze or a 3 per cent cut in government spending and throughout departments. And it is not very exciting either to tell all government agencies except a few that they will get a 10 per cent cut over two years. But a minister or a government who want to act responsibly have to look after our future. And they also have to live with the legacy left to them.

Opposition parties will spend the whole day repeating that the finance minister did not get his budget projections right. I should like to remind you, Madam Speaker, that the IMF and the OECD were also wrong in their projections for 1992. The banks did not fare any better. All economists failed in their projections, because the economic situation changed not only in Canada but also in the whole world so that all the figures were altered. That is why everybody failed to gauge the real state of the economy. If you compare with all those fine experts, Madam Speaker, you will realize that our finance minister is not any worse. He was not that far off the mark but, just like everybody else, he has to take the international situation into account.

I still have a lot to say, Madam Speaker, but unfortunately, I see you are indicating that my time is almost up. To conclude, all I am asking of the opposition in this second day of debate is that they at least put forward suggestions and ideas for the well-being of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I cannot say that I am pleased to be participating in this budget debate today. The debate is born out of a profound sense of disappointment for many members of Parliament, a profound sense of frustration and of anger that today rather than debating an economic plan that would begin the process of restoring confidence in Canada's economy in putting the unemployed back to work; instead, we are forced to examine a document that is bereft of any imagination, bereft of any confidence, bereft of any compassion, bereft of any ideas about how to put this country, Canada, with all of its potential, back on the road to prosperity.

Perhaps it is not ironic that the Minister of Finance comes from the great province of Alberta. Albertans have expertise in a great many areas and one of the areas in which they have expertise is in the whole question of fossils; indeed, Alberta can be said to be the fossil centre of this country. This economic statement, this budget—because that is what it is—really is the work of a dinosaur, of a political party about to disappear from the face of Canada. Like a dinosaur that knows it is dying, this dinosaur with this document is attempting to leave its fossilized footprints behind long after it is gone.

We had a Conservative Party that had two choices, a party that confronted two paths, a party that has been in power for the last eight years. One path represented change, an acknowledgement that the course that has been followed for the last eight years has not produced prosperity in this country, an acknowledgement that Canada needed a change in its current fiscal and monetary course. That was one path.

The other path was the path of stubbornness, the path of pig-headedness, the path that said: "We shall never surrender before our blind ideological beliefs; we shall never admit we were wrong; and we would rather go down and disappear politically off the face of Canada rather than admit that we have led Canada to a course of ruin and destruction economically".

The minister chose the latter course. He is like the doctor who tired of fighting the disease that laid his patients low in the hospital ward, turned away from fighting the disease and began to kill off the patients. He is the Minister of Finance who refused to declare war on unemployment but instead declared war on the unemployed. He is the Minister of Finance who refused to declare war on poverty but instead attacks those who are poorest among us. Because, Madam Speaker, when you wipe away and swish away all the smoke, get rid of all the mirrors in this budget document, and it is a budget, right from its initial inception it is deceptive. It is not a mini-statement. It is not an economic statement. It is a full budget.

What do we have? We have over three fiscal years projected by this Minister of Finance $8 billion—count them—in the words of Joey Smallwood, not $1, not $2, not $5, not $7, but $8 billion dollars in cuts, and over the same corresponding period of time we have less than $2.2 billion in stimulation.

You do not have to be a genius to know that if you cut $8 billion and you only spend $2 billion in the grip of a recession, you are taking away, you are hauling out, you are draining away, you are pumping from the body politic, the body economic structure of this country, $6 billion at a time when the nation is in the grip of a recession.

That is bad enough, but who are those billions being taken from? Which Canadians are going to pay? Are the large, multinational Canadian corporations, who the Auditor General just said last week are sheltering their profits in the Bahamas in offshore companies, going to pay? The Auditor General told this Minister of Finance that large, Canadian corporations are hiding their profits in the Bahamas. They are using loopholes to avoid taxes on billions. Does the Minister of Finance collect the few billions he raises or the cuts from those people? No, there is not a measure in this budget to take $1 in tax out of the pockets of those who are experts in avoiding paying their taxes.

Does this budget document take one dollar or one dime out of the richest 1 per cent or 2 per cent that avoid paying tax? Not a single dime.

Who does it take money from? We look to the minister's own budget statement, page 15, Economic and Fiscal Statement. The minister announced in a grand fashion that the wages of members of Parliament will be frozen, he says with a stiff upper lip. We have all had our wages frozen. Ministers of the Crown have had their wages frozen. Oh, what good soldiers are we in the face of a recession. We have frozen our wages. Are we not brave?

However, what have we done to the unemployed? We have taken $2.5 billion out of the pockets of the unemployed. We have not frozen the wages of the unemployed. We have not told them they would not get a raise. We have not treated the unemployed the way we have treated members of Parliament, frozen their wages. We have cut their wages. We have said that they will go from 60 per cent to 57 per cent of their former salaries.

What more cowardly measure ever in the history of this place has been introduced by a Minister of Finance? A minister would say it is simply good enough to freeze the salaries of members of Parliament but appropriate to cut the salaries of those who have least among us.

This budget lacks not only imagination, lacks not only an acknowledgement of reality, but it lacks compassion. It is the work of a tired government, an old government, a government that knows not where to go and not where to turn.

The unemployed the minister has chosen to attack, those who live in poverty that the minister has chosen to attack, who are they? They are the urban poor whose life is a job ghetto, bounced around from one low-paying job to another. They are the rural poor whose lives have been the cycle of seasonal employment, whose livelihood depends upon the forestry if it is healthy, the mining sector if it is functioning, the fishery if there are fish, and the agricultural sector if our farmers can sell around the world. Those are the people who are targeted.

An hon. member: Families with children.

Mr. Tobin: Families with children. Those are the people who are targeted to be bounced off the unemployment insurance program.

Do not buy for one second this line by the minister that only bad people who get themselves fired are going to be hurt and only those lazy people who quit these good paying jobs that are out there are going to be hurt and if anybody who is decent, fair or honest finds they have been treated badly we will have an appeal process and we will look after them. Nobody is going to be hurt.

How can the minister say that when next year alone he has already budgeted nearly $1 billion in cuts. That money has to be found. The year after another $1.5 billion in cuts. Where are these people going to go? Are they going to disappear or vaporize off the face of the earth? Are they going to be beamed up off the planet by the starship Enterprise, never to be seen or heard from again? No, they are going to go down to the local welfare office.

The Government of Canada by sleight of hand has transferred $2.5 billion worth of the cost out of the federal coffers and on to the backs of hard-pressed provincial governments.

Which governments will bear the largest burden? Those governments whose economy is in the greatest crisis, the Government of Newfoundland, the Government of Saskatchewan, the Government of Manitoba, and, yes, the Government of Ontario. Those are the governments that will have the burden of bearing this transfer of poverty out of federal coffers to provincial coffers.

I want to say to my friend, the Minister of Finance, that I understand this government is tired. I understand he is tired. I understand that perhaps this is the best that can be squeezed out of the collective brain power of that tired troop across the way.

However, I know there remains just a shred of integrity and dignity and a modicum of courage on the benches opposite. I know my friend, the Minister of Finance, and this is the best he can do with the crowd he sits with. I know he will do the honourable thing and put this package to the people of Canada in a national referendum called an election. Let the people of Canada say yes or no to this economic prescription for a country that is in crisis.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I could hardly wait to take part this morning in the debate on the economic statement made by the hon. Minister of Finance in this House yesterday.

I would say without hesitation that the statement by the hon. Minister of Finance is really a big step toward economic recovery in Canada.

Yesterday, the Minister of Finance suggested two options to the Canadian people. The first one favours an economic recovery based on the participation of the private sector and strongly supported by various interventions aimed at stimulating investment and job creation. The second one clearly indicates this government's commitment to the continued reduction of government spending.

That is a clear message which shows Canadians the objectives that our government has been pursuing from the start. I think it is important to refer to the comments made by the Minister of Finance in the introduction to the economic statement tabled in the House yesterday. I will quote directly from the statement made by the Minister yesterday.

> Our economic policy is to build confidence, enhance growth, create jobs, and help Canadians adjust to this period of transition and take advantage of new opportunities.
> All of our efforts have been directed at investing in growth through sound monetary and fiscal policies, the opening up of markets, streamlining government, building the skills of Canadians, and encouraging private sector enterprise and initiative as the basis for economic progress.

That is why the series of measures announced in the economic and fiscal statement, particularly with regards to small businesses, represent one aspect, one of the major elements that will contribute to our reaching our objectives. That is why I will talk during the next few minutes, about these important measures proposed in the economic and fiscal statement for Canadian small businesses.

I would like to remind you that small businesses play a major role in the Canadian economy at two fundamental levels, employment and investment.

Businesses with 50 employees or fewer represent 95 per cent of all Canadian businesses and account for about 45 per cent of private sector employment. During the last few years, they have been responsible for most of the job creation, that is more than 2 million new jobs. Furthermore, small businesses account for nearly half of the private sector investments during the same period.

I would also like to stress the fact that the current fiscal regime for small businesses recognizes the importance of that sector's contribution to the Canadian economy.

Madam Speaker, here are a few examples illustrating this point. First of all Canadian small businesses enjoy a special deduction bringing down their federal income tax rate from 28.8 to 12.8 per cent. In the United States small businesses pay much higher taxes, with federal rates ranging from 15 to 39 per cent for the same income bracket.

Second, the lifetime capital gains exemption provides an incentive for individuals to invest in small businesses. Capital gains resulting from the disposition of qualified small business shares are eligible for a $500,000 exemption. In addition, only 75 per cent of capital gains over and above the exemption are subject to income tax. Also, small businesses qualify for the most generous incentives for research and development in all of the G-7 countries.

On the other hand, small businesses are presently subject to strong financial and competitive pressures, and these are largely due to the need for federal and provincial governments to better co-ordinate their efforts whether when dealing with the GST or other taxes, with public spending or with establishing regulations. In other words, despite the benefits of the present taxation system, several small businesses consider that, overall, the tax and regulatory context south of the border is more inviting.

To help change and improve that situation yesterday's economic statement has put in place, or rather suggests to put in place, the components of a program to help the small business sector develop and create yet more jobs. I would like to list a few of these components, Madam Speaker.

The statement provides that most small businesses increasing employment next year will be able to do so with no increase in unemployment insurance premiums. Any new business whose employer share of UI premiums was less than $60,000 in 1992 will be eligible for a benefit under this program.

This means that for most small businesses, UI premium costs will be capped at their 1992 level. Similarly, most new businesses starting up in 1993 will pay no UI premiums in that year. This assistance will reduce the cost of additional employees by up to $1,600 each.

We also want to encourage investment. As an incentive for small businesses to accelerate investment spending, a 10 per cent investment tax credit for small business will apply, for one year, to investments in machinery and equipment for small businesses engaged in manufacturing, construction, farming, fishing, mining, oil and gas and long-haul transportation. These are very active sectors of our economy, Madam Speaker, with a very substantial potential for expansion and job creation. The credit will apply to investments made before 1994.

The proposed measures will also help small businesses obtain the financing they need. The rules for investments in small business by RRSPs and Labour-Sponsored Venture Capital funds will be simplified and expanded.

• (1120)

For instance, individuals will be permitted to hold unrestricted amounts of qualifying small business investments in their RRSPs, while preferred shares will be added to the list of eligible investments for LSVCCs. That is very important.

Furthermore, the loan limit allowed under the Small Businesses Loans Act will be raised from $50,000 to $250,000.

The Small Business Financing Program will be extended to the end of 1994. This will permit small businesses to refinance loans at interest rates below normal commercial market rates.

This series of measures should encourage Canada's small businesses to make the investments they have been planning for some time and thus create new jobs.

Finally, I would like to mention that part of the minister's economic statement which deals with major investments in the transportation sector.

I am very pleased to see the economic statement mentions the possibility of entering into agreements with the provinces, including my own province of Quebec, so that we can start a number of major highway projects in Quebec and bring them to completion especially in my own riding where road inprovements are badly needed. We know some sections of Highway 138 east of Havre-Saint-Pierre are not yet finished, and I am pleased to see the economic statement addresses this problem. The Government of Quebec will now be able to sign an agreement with our government to finance the completion of these projects.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, I think we seldom take the time, here in the House, to consider what was said in the past.

In March this year when I spoke in the debate on the budget I mentioned the lack of concrete measures to improve the economy and help Canadians who were suffering as a result of Tory policies.

From what we have heard about the new budget, I was right. Once again their financial policies are doing nothing to improve the economy of this country. The government keeps harping on global economic restructuring and the international recession. I agree that these issues are important, but I certainly do not agree with their approach to all the problems facing our economy.

The government prefers to wait and see what will happen. The Minister of Finance himself said that he was waiting to see what the Americans would do after the U.S. election before doing anything at all.

They had another alternative. They could at least have tried to reduce the serious unemployment problem in this country. They could have tried to find jobs for those who have none. They could have done something for Canadians living below the poverty line.

But let us be fair. The government is making some progress. But why is it only because of the Liberal policies they adopted? During the budget debate last March we noticed that the government decided to adopt a Liberal proposal for using RRSPs for the first-time purchase of a home. Once again the government borrows concepts from the Liberals to boost the economy.

[English]

The government's attitude has had a devastating impact in my riding of Restigouche—Chaleur. The government's economic policies have wreaked havoc in the forestry sector in my riding, leading to 300 lay-offs at the Atholville Pulp Mill, 500 lay-offs at the Dalhousie mill and a number of other related lay-offs throughout the riding. Nevertheless the government stubbornly maintains many of its disastrous policies.

We cannot forget the companies that have laid off people. We cannot forget these individuals who are laid off and presently without work.

We have heard a lot yesterday and today about unemployment. In my riding the level is at 16 per cent. This figure is unacceptable.

It does not include those individuals who have given up looking for work.

Small businesses in the riding are suffering. The federal government expects them to carry the economic recovery yet it continues to tax them to death. All the while the large multinational corporations continue to operate paying little or no taxes.

This government's unwillingness to stand up to multinationals is clearly outlined in last week's Auditor General's report and Bill C-91 which is presently being studied by a committee. Small business, in my mind, is the engine of today's economy and it is going to need a boost. I must in all fairness say to the minister some of the announcements yesterday were a step in the right direction, a very small step.

The government keeps telling us of the importance of education and the need to have a well-educated workforce to compete in the world's economy. Meanwhile the government is mercilessly slashing education and training budgets. Since 1986 it has continually reduced its contributions to post-secondary education. The maximum level for the Canada Student Loans Program has not risen since 1984.

The government has put a tax, the GST, on books and other learning resources. It has finally implemented cuts to the summer employment experience program, therefore diminishing students' abilities to support themselves through their educational careers.

Spending on education, research and development are investments in the future of our country. We must get back on the right track.

With regard to student loans, collection agencies are presently hounding students who are unemployed. They are hounding their families who are unemployed. This has to stop. I heard earlier one of the members from the opposite side was looking for a suggestion. I suggest the minister review the Canada Student Loans Program completely with a view to searching out those who are unemployed who cannot make their payments. Maybe they could work for the state, or a municipality to repay their debts. When we look at this idea, we see that criminals are sometimes better treated than our students. It is about time government start looking at that aspect.

People in my riding met to organize conferences on the economy. The Nepisiguit economic conference submitted its report nearly a year ago. A second conference, the Restigouche economic conference, is now under way in another part of my riding. These two conferences bring together community people who care about the situation in their region. The purpose of this regional strategic analysis is to take charge of the region's economy in order to make it better. These groups realize the region's problems but are also ready to find solutions.

Another committee was formed to consider the possibility of reopening the Atholville Pulp Mill and to look at the problems of the forestry industry in general. Other groups, like the Restigouche and Chaleur industrial commission, the business men and women of St. Quentin, the CDCs of Kedgwick, Dalhousie and Campbellton, the chamber of commerce in Beresford, are also working to solve some of the region's problems. They are trying to find innovative solutions to improve the economy and promote development.

The lack of leadership from the federal government makes more work for these committees, but their power is limited. The government must show leadership and initiative to help them. For this, the government should immediately start investing in the present infrastructure of Restigouche—Chaleur.

The ports of Belledune and Dalhousie are still looking for a strategic plan. Since the federal government still does not promote them a plan is necessary.

[English]

The ports of Belledune and Dalhousie in my riding have to be developed. There is a lot of potential.

Dredging is needed for the docks in the communities of Pointe-Verte and Petit-Rocher.

[English]

The wharf at New Mills has to be expanded for our fishermen. Emphasis has to be put on tourism, not only in my riding but right across Canada. The tourism potential of Restigouche—Chaleur must be assisted and expanded. We have a good base to start with but it takes a little bit of help from the federal government.

• (1130)

We have a network of outdoor centres in Restigouche-West. We have museums, we have the Park Sugarloaf. We have the Chaleur Phantom, Recreaplex, Chaleur Park, and the Eel River Bar development that is in the works. There are parks in the Jacquet River area and we have a major new park that has just been developed——Atlas Park. It is very important to have more money to improve tourism facilities in our riding.

[English]

There are other projects under way such as la plage de Beresford, un terrain de golf. It is very important the message gets out that tourism and small business are probably the best answers to some of our problems. We have to start making sure they are part of the solution.

I must also say we have to look at the transportation system. I am happy to say the minister looked at the transportation system somewhat in his proposals yesterday. I also believe there has to be more emphasis put on roads, airports and ports. I hope some of the announcements that were made yesterday with regard to roads, airports and ports are going to apply to all ridings in Canada and not just a select few.

The time has come for governments at all levels to enter into a new partnership. The municipalities, the provinces and the federal government must begin to priorize their plans and make decisions on this basis.

In wrapping up, I would like to say Canadians need a government with initiative. They need a government willing to provide leadership and get Canada working again. In short, I believe we need a new government.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I would like to focus on just a couple of issues in the economic statement of yesterday.

I listened to the various comments yesterday both in the House and in the media about the measures announced with regard to unemployment insurance benefit rates. A lot of simplistic phrases were thrown out that are totally incorrect. One was that we are fighting the deficit on the backs of the unemployed.

I would like to be specific on that and I hope the hon. member will listen rather than speaking from the seat of his pants over there.

Let me just go through the details. The unemployment insurance benefit rate is being reduced from 60 per cent of previous earnings up to the maximum insurable earnings to 57 per cent for new claims starting April 1, 1993. Current beneficiaries are all grandfathered. The net result of the benefit rate reduction from 60 per cent to 57 per cent, which so many are playing upon, is a freeze in unemployment insurance benefits in keeping with the government's restraint across all policy sectors. It will counteract the growth in earnings that would otherwise cause average benefits to increase. How in the world can one say if you move from 60 per cent to 57 per cent that it is not a cut? Well, we have to remember that the 57 per cent is based on a higher number. When you base it on a higher industrial base rate number, the net effect of the change is no change and it continues at a flat or freeze position.

I wish hon. members opposite would do justice to what is exactly happening here. The net effect of this change is to freeze the benefits as opposed to reducing the benefits. That is the first point I would like to make. We heard a lot of comments from the media last night and even some from the opposition here in the House that it is totally unfair to disentitle voluntary quitters.

Let us look at the facts. The effective date of the proclamation of the necessary amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act for persons who voluntarily leave their jobs without just cause or lose their jobs through their own misconduct will no longer be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. The measure is to be permanent.

Let us put this in context. Those persons are already subject to administrative penalties which delay the start of benefits from seven to twelve weeks and are paid benefits at a lower rate of 50 per cent. That is already happening. What the economic statement adds is that those who leave their jobs without just cause will lose their benefits.

Let us look at just cause. What does just cause include? It includes sexual or other harassment. That is the first one. The second is obligation to accompany a spouse or dependent child to another residence; third—

Madam Speaker, these people continue to speak over there. They refuse to listen. Let us get the facts on the table. The first just cause was sexual or other harassment. No one will be penalized if that is the reason they must leave; second, obligation to accompany a spouse or dependent child to another residence; third, discrimination on a prohibited ground of discrimination as contained in the Canadian Human Rights Act; fourth, working conditions that constitute a danger to health; and fifth, an obligation to care for a child.

It is totally false to say that anyone is going to be cut off benefits because of those reasons. We must remember there is an adjudication process and an appeal process to deal with that should someone be unfairly let go or fired.

Madam Speaker, let us look at the facts first. Once we have the facts then let us start looking at whether the process will work and will the process work fairly. That is the intent of this.

Let us go on to another part of the statement. To encourage small business to expand and to hire new employees, the government will pay any increase in the unemployment insurance premiums in 1993 over 1992 up to a maximum of $30,000 per firm. In effect, for most small businesses, UI premium costs will be capped at their 1992 levels. In fact most start-up businesses will have a UI premium holiday for 1993.

Any incorporated or unincorporated business whose employer share of UI premiums in 1992 was less than $60,000 will be eligible for a benefit under the program. For those businesses which had between zero and $30,000 of UI employer premiums, the maximum will be $30,000. For those which pay between $30,000 and $60,000, the maximum benefit will be phased down on a dollar for dollar basis.

This is very good news for our small business sector which we know creates the vast majority of jobs in Canada. This will help them greatly because the net effect upon a small business will be to reduce their hiring costs for an additional worker up to about $1,600 per additional new worker.

Other actions for small business will include a 10 per cent small business investment tax credit for machinery and equipment purchases. Rules on investments in small businesses by RRSPs and other funds will be simplified and investment options expanded. Programs that provide financial assistance are being expanded or extended, all to help small businesses hire more people as we begin to move to a higher growth rate than what we have seen in the last five quarters. All of this is very encouraging and it is important that we get the facts on the table.

There are some very tough measures that were announced in the economic statement. One of them is a freeze on public servants and their salaries. I want to pay tribute to the civil servants who work in my riding. We have several offices in my riding, immigration, employment, retraining, pension, Revenue Canada and customs offices. I can say without any equivocation for myself and for my staff that we have received excellent service from the vast majority of those public servants.

Their task is not simple; they carry out programs where they have no say about the content on most occasions. Sometimes they know the programs could even be improved, but they have to administer them as they are given to them. They do that for people who are often very angry, very frustrated, do not know what is going on and are very impatient.

I want to commend the vast majority of public servants right across Canada, and particularly in my riding, for their professionalism and the way in which they carry out their tasks.

I am also disappointed that in this budget—or this economic statement, I am sorry—that the deficit is not going to be lower than it is. Here we are, after eight budgets, two economic statements at least and every single one has cut spending. When we began in 1984–85 we started to cut spending. Every single budget from 1985 on has cut spending.

When we started in 1984 the annual deficit was in the $38.3 billion to $38.5 billion range; now we are coming down to $34.4. We have only reduced it by about $4 billion. To me, that is one of the tremendous disappointments that this statement brings to us as Canadians and members in this House. After eight years of cutting we still have only made $4 billion worth of progress.

Let us remember why we are not making much progress. We were making a lot of progress prior to the recession and it looked very encouraging, but we did not go up in that deficit because of renewed spending. We continued to cut spending. The reason it went up is because of reduced revenues. That is totally contrary and totally different than what happened in the early eighties when the annual deficit continued to rise, due both to reduced revenue but also in large measure to increased spending. We have to keep that in mind.

I am also disappointed that we did not cut off all advocacy groups. We have reduced them in this statement 10 per cent now and 10 per cent next year. I think most of those should have been cut to zero. I know that in some cases people will say we discriminate. Well, we discriminate now. The National Action Committee is only being cut 10 per cent and 10 per cent, yet REAL Women get zero. So we are discriminating right now. I think all advocacy groups should get zero and that is our target except for organizations such as the CNIB or Red Cross which we should continue to fund.

In conclusion I am pleased that at least we are going to take some action on eliminating interprovincial trade barriers. Those have to go because it will create jobs that will eliminate much of the lack of competitiveness we now have in comparison to the rest of the world and that will help Canada both to create jobs and to be more competitive.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, yesterday was one of the saddest days that I have witnessed in this House of Commons. It was a sad day because I think there were still some Canadians who looked to this government and the mini budget to help ease the terrible toll that Tory government policies have brought to our country.

I believe there were some people out there who clung to the thought that the government, even a Tory government, would see the devastation and see the error of their ways, realize that things just are not right, realize the human suffering that their policies have caused, and act with compassion. Some look to the government for, at the very least, hope, plain and simple hope. Sadly, yesterday that hope was finally extinguished.

Yesterday this government admitted it could do nothing to correct the ills of its own policies and the policies of the Liberals before it. Yesterday in this Chamber the finance minister and the minister of trade all but admitted that they were impotent, impotent to do anything in the face of world market forces, unable to create any Canadian solutions to our problems, unable to help ordinary Canadians.

What does it mean to be a Canadian? For the government it seems to mean that it rolls over and plays dead in the heat of the market forces' cauldron.

Can you imagine, Madam Speaker, the Japanese, the Germans or the Americans, who also rely on trade, standing before the people and saying: "We cannot do anything to help; we have to wait for other countries to get better, then we will too." Can we imagine that happening? That is exactly what we heard in this Chamber last night. Unfortunately that is not where yesterday's story ends. The story gets even worse.

Yesterday we also received another lesson in the priorities of the government. It is bad enough that the government usually sticks to increasing the burden carried by average working people, the ordinary Canadians who work the hardest and pay the most. Yesterday the government went a step further. It managed to increase the burden of the unemployed. The government has revictimized those unable to work or who cannot find work. It managed to kick someone who was already down.

At this difficult time when the country has seen record unemployment thanks to the government's policies—a slavish pursuit of deficit reduction, a slavish pursuit of opening up Canada, selling it to the lowest bidder and shipping our jobs away—instead of choosing to help the unemployed the government has cut UI benefits and limited the numbers eligible.

Now when a man quits work because of appalling conditions, unreasonable demands, concerns about health and safety, he could potentially no longer receive UI benefits. When a woman quits work because she is sexually harassed she could potentially no longer receive UI benefits. At the very least there could be a brand new bureaucracy at UIC, a star chamber deciding who should receive UI and who should not.

I listened carefully to the previous speaker. What he does not understand is that before yesterday's announcement a woman who was sexually harassed on the job would at least know if she quit her job she would serve the penalization period for so-called voluntarily quitting and then be eligible for UI benefits. Now she will no longer be able to do this. This will result in women staying in situations where they are being sexually harassed. For some women this will mean if they leave they will not get benefits, not be able to feed their children and will have to turn to the welfare roll.

The government seems to forget that all working people pay into the UIC. It is not a charity. Is it not ironic that at the very time the government is again attacking the Public Service it now seems to be creating a new bureaucracy at UIC to judge who it deems to be deserving and undeserving recipients?

The government insists it is making tough decisions to help all Canadians. Let us look at how successful its policies have been. On deficit reduction in only nine months it appears the projections of the finance minister were off by a mere $11.9 billion. On free trade deals 500,000 jobs have been lost, mostly in the manufacturing sector, but the trade minister boasts they have been replaced with service jobs at fast food restaurants.

The only other area where there has been a real job growth is for volunteers in the increasing food banks across the country. As for retraining for the new demand for the global economy, the government is taking $300 million from existing UI funds for training. No new funds, no new strategy.

This is not a government making the tough decisions for the betterment of Canada. This is not a government adapting to changes in a restructured global economy. This is a government which keeps tripping over its own ideology and unfortunately it keeps landing with a thud on average Canadians.

This is a government not even following its own advice. It is not reducing the deficit. It is not retraining and adapting. Only now is the government talking about the needs of a service economy, the needs of R and D. That advice was given to the government years ago by the Economic Council which it has also axed.

The government's obsession is with its fight against inflation, its tight monetary policy. The publication Canadian Business Economics concludes that easing the anti-inflation fight would have saved jobs and led to a dramatic improvement in the deficit and trade. The saddest part of the Conservative policies is that they do not even make economic sense.

Canadians realize that politics is often an adversarial process, but Canadians also realize there is a time to put aside dogmatism, a time to put aside political ideology. Canadians realize there is a time when the government must do what is right to help its people regardless of its political ideology.

Unfortunately government members who sit across from me are the only Canadians who do not seem to realize that very simple message. Instead the government insists on pursuing the same policies which over eight years have been successful only in increasing the deficit and increasing the number of unemployed Canadians.

It is not good enough to stand here and criticize. That is what the Liberals do. They criticize. They do not offer solutions. They hold their breath hoping to be the next government. It is the responsibility of opposition parties to present alternatives. The New Democrats have done so.

Last night my colleague from Essex—Windsor spoke eloquently and passionately on this very matter. He spoke of alternatives that would take into consideration the plight of 1.5 million unemployed Canadians. He spoke of the choices the government had.

To quote from the document which the finance minister released yesterday: "The essence of governing is choosing. There are choices to be made and we are prepared to make them in the best interest of Canadians".

New Democrats would not have chosen to spend, as did the government, $4.5 billion on military helicopters before they launched a serious campaign to rebuild Canada's infrastructure and provide necessary jobs. The best social policy is a full employment policy.

New Democrats would not have chosen, as did the government, to allow tax avoidance for wealthy individuals and profitable corporations before they helped retrain Canadians to adapt to the changes in this world.

New Democrats would not have allowed, as the government has, wealthy individuals to hide their fortunes in private trust loopholes while ordinary Canadians pay more than their full share of taxes and then some.

Unlike this government, New Democrats would have ended the capital gains tax exemption rather than forcing sexually harassed women to stay at a job for fear of not receiving UI benefits.

Unlike this government, we would have eliminated the business entertainment and meal subsidies and instead helped get hungry children away from dependency on food banks and given them some real hope for the future.

New Democrats would not be trying to extend multinational drug company patents, extensions which even the government itself admits are going to cost provincial health care and average Canadians hundreds of millions of dollars. Unlike this government, New Democrats would not be extending these patents instead of fulfilling promises to provide child care so we can maximize the potential of our human resources.

When all the world's armies are downsizing, New Democrats would not allow, as the government has, our basis in the defence budget to bloat instead of continuing and increasing green initiatives that would provide jobs and are so important to our future.

New Democrats would not have panicked and signed an ill conceived and sweeping document like the trade deal with the U.S. or NAFTA which will again make us drawers of water and hewers of wood.

There were choices. There were new ideas. Sadly only the Conservatives stick dogmatically to trickle down economic theories that have failed everywhere else in the world.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I too rise with mixed thoughts on the speech of the Minister of Finance yesterday.

I am going to say a couple of things in the brief time here that have caused me concern. Then in the last few minutes of this 10-minute contribution I do have two very specific proposals on policy that I think obviously cannot be implemented in this economic document but certainly may be considered hopefully before the minister brings in presumably another budget in the spring.

In a very general way, with all the facts and figures and all the tables and charts ,I think the minister would agree with me that unless there is confidence in the community outside this hall from coast to coast, unless there are very specific tax policies with stimulation, we are not going to get the recovery that we all desire and want so much for the Canadians we serve. The minister wants that as much as any speaker in this House.

In the few minutes I have I want to express in a general way my disappointment. I appreciate the parameters were very limited for manoeuvring by the minister. It was either fish or cut bait or try to pump it up or else chop more. As other speakers have said, I do not really see where he could chop much more, although I will have a few proposals there. Certainly tax increases were absolutely verboten as far as the public was concerned.

However, without getting into analysis of the speech yesterday, the smoke and mirrors, the Alice in Wonderland aspect of this whole document is right in the speech which appears in Hansard. At page 12 of the statement, after talking about some of the measures that he announced to get some money to try to get the deficit down, which includes the salary freeze, he stated:

> The actions I have announced today will bring the estimated deficit down to $34.4 billion this year and $32.6 billion next year.

When I heard that last night I thought of Alice in Wonderland and doublespeak. We knew before last night that the deficit was supposed to be 27 point something billion. He said that with a smile last night.

I do not know if the opposition will ask the question today in Question Period, but I certainly hope the question is answered. If the minister had not included these measures that are enumerated on page 12 of his printed speech, what was to be the estimate for the deficit? If, in the minister's words, he was just bringing it down to $34.4 billion and next year it is going to be $32.6 billion, what was the amount of the deficit? That as I say, illustrates the smoke and mirrors and the doublespeak in so much of this document that I do not have the time to analyse fully.

The other part which is a little more sensitive is the question of confidence. I know the minister well. As I say, it is a little unfortunate in terms of the confidence of Canadians out there who have either lost their jobs or are concerned about their jobs. I will not get into the speech by the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte. He mentioned in effect that we have frozen our salaries, but we have not frozen the payout to the unemployed who are actually going to have a 3 per cent cut from 60 per cent to 57 per cent. One could really make a whole speech on that point.

There is just something wrong. One of the top public servants of the land led the bureaucracy in the federal Public Service and brought in PS 2000. He was very involved in constitutional discussions and is now the president of the CNR. I am referring to Mr. Paul Tellier. In his very first meeting with management he informs them that they have problems on the railway and 10,000 employees are going to have to go.

This is a man who has given good public service to Canada. Undoubtedly he has certain pension qualifications, yet he is hand-picked without any railway experience to go into an area that we all know has serious problems. We worry about the rationalization of the air, but I think anyone involved in transportation knows that the rationalization of the rail is going to confront us very seriously within the next five years. A man with a very solid pay has been put into position. He has made contributions and has done his work for Canada. He has been put into that area, hand-picked by the Prime Minister to run the CN with no experience. He told them that 10,000 of them were going to lose their jobs.

That is something that everyone in the barber shops and the garages can understand. Just what is going on when a top public servant comes around and in his first meeting says: "Hey, I have been looked after. I have a new job and one of my jobs is to tell you that you are going to be out of a job?"

My friend across the way is the second most powerful political person on the federal scene and he disappointed me. He could have stopped the transfer of the immigration data processing office to Vegreville.

He knows that that type of move was complained about when he was in opposition when it was done for such rank political purposes. Again it is the type of thing that in terms of John and Jane Q. Public out there it just causes real concern about what can be believed about these people.

Those members complained about certain things when they were in opposition. Then they get in power and, with those two things, not to mention Bill C-91, they do it just as badly as the Liberal government did it.

We will have a chance to talk about Bill C-91 next week after another allocation of time order so that we can get on with the report stage and the third reading. It does not help Canadians. It may help the multinationals, but I thought this government had learned after the referendum that it is not good enough to have business on your side. The people have to be on your side. The real concern out there has been that this government has lost touch with the people.

In terms of the negatives of this budget there is the business of the immigration centre in Vegreville and Paul Tellier running the railway as sort of a hobby after he has been a professional public servant. He was hand-picked by the Prime Minister to run CN when we know all railways run into serious trouble. This is something that shakes the very confidence of Canadians.

Frankly, another budget in the spring is not even going to do enough to help restore the basic confidence of Canadians who see these things. They do not have to be economic wizards to know that there is something wrong when they are unemployed.

Talk to the fishermen, both the unemployed and those who are going to be unemployed. Talk to the airline workers who wonder about their jobs. Talk to people in areas in my part of the country where there is going be more base closures and more job losses. They are concerned for their families.

However, they pick up the papers and see someone who has been well looked after getting another premium job in the railways. Then they see the minister putting the immigration office in Vegreville. If the survey shows that this is an economic way to have immigration processing far distant from where the real immigration cases are, why then put it there instead of in some other area where there is loss of employment and futures. People understand that.

That is why the confidence of the people is shaken. I really thought that the vote we had on October 26 would have told some of the leaders of the land how upset people were, but I do not think it did.

That is the negative side that I have mentioned. There is so much more on the negative side I could say but I really do not want to go too far in order to conform to the time limit which is very short.

The minister has asked for positive and concrete proposals to improve the economy. As an Independent Conservative member of the House, I do not have the resources and staff to produce detailed studies. However, after several years in politics and with eyes and ears open to the community and input from voters I have a couple of suggestions which in the future will go a long way in helping the economy.

The first is to encourage small and new business. I know the minister intends to do that through tax credits. The trouble with tax credits is that they are no good unless the business is making money. New businesses are not making money and most small businesses are not making money today.

I agree small businesses are the major creators of jobs. In the critical growth stages most of them benefit very little, if at all, from tax credits on tax deductible expense allowances. They need stable, long-term funding at low interest rates rather than the roller-coaster pattern in rates and availability offered by the government, the Bank of Canada and paranoid bankers.

I propose that small businesses be permitted to borrow funds for terms of 10 years or more at fixed rates on the basis that interest is not a tax deductible expense for the borrower and not a taxable income for the lender.

Some of the proposals could be massaged but in effect this means small businesses when they first open will most likely not have any taxable income for a few years and more than likely will show losses. There should not be that much impact.

Such loans should be included as eligible with limits from the Small Businesses Loans Act. Perhaps the maximum of such non tax deductible loans to any business should be limited to perhaps $5 million. It may also be necessary to permit the pooling of such loans where they can be sold through security dealers. This will create an ample supply of funds at significantly lower rates than presently available with positive long-term tax consequences.

In conclusion my second proposal is somewhat the same thing but even shorter. It is similar but is directed to the home market and housing industry. It is designed to make quality housing more affordable. It will increase the value of existing homes and thus people's net worth. It helps to get equity back into the system. This is what we need. It will increase the value of existing homes—

Madam Deputy Speaker: In fairness to all colleagues, the hon. member has gone past his time and I must be fair.

Mr. Nowlan: I was trying to give a positive proposal.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I realize that but there might be other ways to do it.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Madam Speaker, thank you for giving me a few moments to speak as have my other colleagues. Of course, I recognize the good faith and good will of all hon. members who in turn share their varying perceptions of a reality on which everyone agrees. But I see that these very diverse solutions lack common vision and realism. Of course that is the reason for political options, partisanship and divisions among parliamentarians and managers.

Madam Speaker, I would therefore tell you that in my mind this economic statement that the hon. Minister of Finance submitted in the House is not a budget in itself. It is very important not to consider it or perceive it as a budget. It follows on a budget that was presented more than six months ago in February. Given the mishaps along the way, the continuing recession, the high interest rates, inflation which was high then too, all these factors affected the budget which needs to be reviewed.

With this in mind the hon. minister and our government decided by common agreement to make a course correction. So you must not think that this is a new budget that would cut or eliminate departments. We will deal with that in a future budget. The idea was to seize the opportunity of the present circumstances, some terrible and some exceptional, in order not only to correct some of the occasional errors but also to modify our course according to some new positive elements that were emerging such as the inflation rate which has been brought under control and is now the lowest in all of the G-7 countries, and interest rates which were increasing constantly during the last two or three years and are now at one of the lowest levels ever.

Therefore it was timely and appropriate for the minister and for our government to take these measures in order to rectify the situation in a context of confidence because Canada enjoys an enviable reputation worldwide. We had to take advantage of the exceptional confidence we enjoy, of the low interest rate we now have, of the lowered rate of inflation. We had to seize this opportunity seven months after presentation of the 1992 budget, to redress the situation.

What did we do? The statement by the Minister of Finance, has several objectives besides raising confidence and increasing participation. The first was to have the government set an example. We had to make cutbacks, as we did over the last eight years, hoping to control and eventually eliminate the deficit. I agree it did not happen so far but it is the recession and the benefits we must provide to our citizens, the protection we must give them, which have prevented us from pursuing the lowering of the deficit and eventually the debt.

Besides further spending cuts the economic statement provides for the continuation of the privatization policy, a policy which will end government spending on those operations which could obviously be run by the private sector. We have frozen salaries, from the prime minister, cabinet ministers and members of Parliament on down through the public service, Parliament and Crown corporations.

Then there is a second objective which I regard as most important. We will relieve the financial burden of the Canadian people. How? By restoring confidence. In that new and encouraging climate I referred to earlier families and consumers will have money to spend again. They will start consuming again, and if they spend more the industry will produce more and jobs will be created.

How will consumers and families benefit from that extra cash? May I remind you that the 1992 budget introduced and promised a tax rate cut. This measure will be pursued in 1993. In addition families, the head of the family, mother or father, will receive increased allowances in the form of benefits which means they will have more cash available to spend. In turn production and job creation will increase.

That is the second factor that ought to be taken into consideration and this change in course is a positive one. There is also the growth assistance initiative to promote the establishment of new businesses, thereby creating new jobs. So research and development will be increased and support will be provided to small business.

This brings me to this last objective, which deals with jobs and investments in small and medium-sized businesses. Nearly 80 percent of businesses in Canada fall in that category. They are the bigger employer in our country. And these are the ones that have been—how can I say?—made vulnerable, weakened, shaken by the economic and financial situation to say nothing of the monetary situation. Interest rates made them vulnerable and, of course, inflation prevented consumers from spending because prices were on the rise. These businesses therefore produced less and less.

So small and medium-sized businesses' participation will be enhanced and these will be given a better start in the seventh month on this new course. Of course, assistance will be provided to them in various way. Allow me to look at this area in particular.

As I was saying, small businesses play a vital and major role in the Canadian economy. Did you know that between 1979 and 1990 they created more than two million new full time jobs? Those are fantastic investments in the private sector.

Canada's federal tax system for small businesses is one of the most favourable in the world. This is all the more reason to take advantage of the favourable situation that prevails right now with low interest rates, an inflation rate that is under control and the new confidence shown by the rest of the world toward Canada. It is important to take advantage of these circumstances so that small businesses which are the major employers in the country can again produce and hire people.

Let me give you an example of the tax incentives which we and they benefit from. Did you know that our tax rates are lower than those in the U.S.? Few people know that. For instance, Canadian small businesses which are incorporated can take advantage of a special deduction which lowers the federal income tax rate to 12.8 per cent, including the 3 per cent surtax; that is 12.8 per cent on the first $200,000 in revenue from an active business. What is that rate in the U.S.? Is it 10 per cent, 12 per cent, 14 per cent? No, Madam Speaker. In the United States the federal tax rates for small businesses range from 15 per cent to 39 per cent. You can see that there is a favourable climate in Canada for renewed growth in the small business sector and the creation of new jobs.

Let me give you another example. Canadian small businesses which are incorporated are also entitled to the most generous R and D incentives not only compared to the U.S. but to all other G–7 countries. I should mention the refundable federal tax credit of 35 per cent which enables small businesses to receive funds directly without delay. Here is another example to illustrate those favourable conditions. There is a cumulative exemption, strictly for capital gains, which enables small businesses to invest again and again. This exemption can reach $500,000. This is another interesting incentive which should not be overlooked. This is precisely what awaits us tomorrow. Those privileges, those favourable conditions that we introduced for small businesses will continue to exist.

Do you want another example? Small businesses increasing employment will have no increase in unemployment insurance payments; some will even be exempted from paying the employer's premiums. These are important measures for small businesses that will enjoy a new boom.

I just wanted to tell you that small businesses will greatly develop as a result of the various measures taken to boost confidence, improve our monetary and interest rate policies and stimulate investments.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, the banner headline in the minister's own backyard really put it aptly when it read: "Mulroney's Tories run out of gas". If you look at the opening paragraph in The Globe and Mail Jeffery Simpson once again put it very aptly when he said: "Finance Minister, Don Mazankowski's economic statement yesterday displayed all the hallmarks of a government running on an intellectual fuel tank marked empty".

Yesterday's economic statement or mini budget or whatever you want to call it by any measure was a depressing and pathetic response to the economic woes that challenge our country and Canadians. I say it is pathetic and depressing because I used two principal measures to look at how good this economic statement will be for Canada's economy.

There were two overriding options. The first was to change course and seek a new direction on a road that was clearly not working versus staying the course, business as usual, head in the sand and let us hope the economy will improve naturally. That was the first challenge.

The second challenge was whether to apply an approach that cut, restricted and withdrew from the economy or an approach prepared to stimulate a serious, comprehensive job creation program. For me and many of the constituents I have the honour of representing those were the two major challenges in terms of delineating an approach and providing a clear indicator of whether this government was serious about attacking those economic woes. Having opted to stay the course and restrict rather than expand the economy this Conservative government, in my opinion, has selected the wrong remedy. It has failed to inject confidence as a necessary variable to achieve any kind of recovery. It has shown it has been mismanaging because its projections have been wildly off the mark.

For instance this minister had projected a deficit figure $7 billion lower than it is. He then had to find another $8 billion in cuts which means he was $15 billion off. Not only has it done all those things but by selecting a "stay the course, don't worry, trust us" approach, it has demonstrated how disconnected this government has become from the reality that stares every average Canadian in the face every single day of the week. The government is clearly out of touch, out of tune and needs to be put out of its misery.

If we take the experiment to the south of us, through their election, it is startling how similar the two governments are. The Americans' incumbent president selected the same approach we witnessed yesterday in the economic statement. He said: "We are going to be getting out of this recession sooner or later. I do not want to interfere. I do not want to interject. I do not want to intervene". But the incumbent president was also a captive and a prisoner of a White House and he had no idea of what was going on in small town or big town America.

The Americans clearly selected a new course of economic management a few weeks ago despite the pros and cons on either side. The economy is clearly issue number one for Americans as it is for Canadians. One would have thought if the government did not learn the lesson in the referendum campaign about the disenchantment and disenfranchised perhaps it would have learned the lesson about some of the economic management decisions that have been made to the south of us, but that is not the case.

We can look at my own region of Toronto in the province of Ontario. Unemployment in Toronto is at 12.3 per cent which is higher than the national average. Last month alone 1,000 new families were added to the welfare rolls pushing the case-load up to over 108,000 families in Toronto who have to survive on welfare. That is a 14 per cent increase over last year. If we add the record numbers of people at food banks or under the poverty line the message is quite clear. In Ontario .5 million people are unemployed in what is and was one of the key economic engines or pistons of the national economy.

The government withdrew $300 million through UI cuts which removed $300 million of disposable income or $300 million from that economy. Eighty per cent of all lost manufacturing jobs are in Ontario. The construction and trades industries are as dead as door nails.

What did this government do for Toronto? What did it do for Ontario? What did it do to address the manufacturing drought, the economic malaise that has inflicted one of the major centres of economic activity? In some other regions of the country the Minister of Finance at least sugar-coated the bitter pill. In Toronto and Ontario there is precious little.

I know the minister from Brampton will probably say: "Look what we are doing with Pearson airport". They do not tell you when the construction jobs will come on stream. It will certainly not be this winter. Probably by the time they come on stream this government will be long gone. A lot of Canadians also say selling the most profitable airport in the country to private interests is not good business to start with.

I ask myself as a member of Parliament from the region of metropolitan Toronto, where the metro chairman identified close to $9 billion worth of projects that are on the shelf, if all three levels of government participated in a good many of the projects would that not stimulate and serve to inflict confidence in the economy? It would put some oxygen into the economy instead of putting a lid on it as this government has opted to do.

Councillor Norm Gardner from metro asked and I quote: "Many ministers in Toronto have paid lip-service to metro's economic woes. I would really like to know where they think their bacon lies".

I would like to know as well. There was a time when metro was represented by a half dozen ministers who were active and progressive in defending the interests of Toronto. Right now Toronto is not even on the map of the government's agenda. Perhaps it has written it off.

What should constituents in my riding or in the ridings of my neighbouring members of Parliament and colleagues be told in terms of how yesterday's statement relates to the everyday challenges facing them? We have very little to tell them.

I simply wish to say the Minister of Finance said yesterday governing means choosing. Well it is the same for democracy. Democracy means choosing as well. Yesterday's statement made it a lot easier and certainly a lot more certain why this government cannot, will not, and should not ever earn the trust of Canadians again and certainly not in the next election.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance on his presentation yesterday to the House of Commons and to the country. I believe it was a well thought out, well presented, and a very good statement for the times we are in.

The hon. member who just sat down said in politics we have to make tough decisions and that is very true. You have to take a look at a country's position and financial situation. You have to look at the world economy, at the pressures on your dollar and on interest rates and so on when you put together a very important economic statement like my hon. friend did.

I have been sitting here listening to some of the speeches. I have read some of the speeches and I have watched some of them on television. To date, just like the last speaker, all we heard was moaning and groaning and complaining, and not one new idea that fits the economic times we are in. There has not been one new idea that would not add to the deficit or add to higher taxes. Not one.

Yet the opposition members are telling the Canadian public "put us in there and we will take care of everything". I do not think the Canadian public can be hoodwinked like that. I think the Canadian public wants to hear what they to have to offer. The airy-fairy suggestions that were presented and the hyperbole of the finance critic of the Liberal Party yesterday made it very obvious there was not a good idea given in the whole place. That includes my friend from Windsor who stood up and pontificated and said how terrible things are. We know how tough things are in Canada and that is exactly why the Minister of Finance brought in an economic statement that is going to do this country good.

I believe the biggest single expenditure now in the Government of Canada is the unemployment insurance. It is huge. Time after time people have said to us we have to get a handle on the unemployment insurance system. We have to make sure people who are collecting unemployment insurance are the right people collecting it the people who deserve it. We have been told that time after time. In these tough times when you are making huge expenditures like that you have to make sure the unemployment system is doing the proper thing.

I listened to the NDP members standing in this House saying there are going to be cuts in unemployment insurance when that is not factual. The Unemployment Insurance Program would be frozen at its current level.

One of the things they must understand is that next year the base rises. In order to freeze the level when the base rises we must decrease the benefits from 60 to 57 per cent to make it even. Therefore it is not a cut it is a freeze. It is a freeze and that should be understood by everyone. It is not a cut.

I listened to the New Democratic Party today. It talks about job creation. It says: "We need jobs in this country". Yet in the same breath it says to cancel the helicopter order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would be delighted to recognize all hon. members one after the other but it is rather difficult when everyone speaks at the same time.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, I do not mind, they can heckle all they want. I am going to keep going anyway. Do not worry about them. I am not. I am not worried about them at all.

As I was saying, the New Democratic Party talks about jobs and job creation. Then it turns around and says to cancel the helicopter project. I was at a plant in Nova Scotia, I.M.P. to be exact. I toured the plant recently and visited with the workers and management. Do you know what? It is doing the outfitting for all these helicopters. This plant will do all the intricate wiring and put in all the instrumentation and so on. These are important jobs for Nova Scotia, very important jobs for Nova Scotia. As a matter of fact in my riding of Brampton I received two letters from companies that said to make sure the contract goes through because they provide this instrument or that instrument for the helicopter. The same is true in Mississauga. There are plants there that will provide supplies for those helicopters. Those are jobs in Canada. Those are important jobs.

If we cancel those kinds of contracts, like the NDP want us to do, those jobs will be lost. Let it then explain to its friends why that was cancelled and why their jobs were lost because of an action like that.

This is a very important contract as all our contracts are very important for the creation and preservation of jobs in our country.

I heard my hon. friend talk about the United States, about the President of the United States and the economy in the United States. It is too bad that the good numbers came out just a couple of weeks after the election but the economy is improving in the United States. That is a hopeful sign for us in Canada because we trade with it.

I want to remind this House that its deficit this year will probably be $400 billion per capita far higher than Canada's and it is growing. If the president-elect does what he says he is going to do we will see a deficit that will be beyond belief in the United States. It has major problems with that.

Our Minister of Finance, our government, has come to grips with this. We are fighting the deficit. We have to fight the deficit. We cannot let it get out of control like the NDP and its friends in the Canadian Labour Congress suggest—the Canadian Labour Congress came out the other day with two ideas, actually it was seven ideas but I just costed two of them. One was to extend unemployment insurance for an extra 26 weeks and the other was to cut the GST to 5 per cent. Those two things alone in one year would cost $10 billion. Did Bob White come up with an idea of where we could find $10 billion? No. It would either be added to the deficit or there would be increased taxes.

We cannot have it that way. We are not in a position to do those types of things. We cannot afford those types of things. The Canadian people understand that and I believe most sincerely that the Canadian people will support the Minister of Finance and this statement. They understand the tough row he has to hoe. They understand the situation that not only Canada is in but that countries around the world are in. They are all experiencing phenomenal problems.

I have not heard anybody from the NDP in the last little while stand up, like they used to, and talk about Sweden. What a wonderful model Sweden is with 500 per cent interest rates this year because it had to get things under control. Things were totally out of control in that country. Unemployment in Sweden is rising at a rate unseen anywhere right now.

The socialist ways do not work. God bless the people in Sweden. They saw the light and finally elected a conservative government which has to come in, as all conservative governments do, and clean up the mess that was left behind. That is exactly what is happening in Sweden today, and that is not the model. We understand the tough decisions that have to be made.

The Minister of Finance is a tough guy. He does not like making the decisions he has to make. There is nothing easier for a politician to do than throw money at a problem, to say: "Here, here is some money. Go away".

This minister is not doing that. This minister is putting scarce resources where they are needed. This minister is cutting back on expenditures because, quite simply, we cannot afford to go on spending the way we have. We cannot afford it. The buck stops somewhere. Once that credit card gets to its limit we have to start paying it back before we get any more credit. That is what we have to do and that is what this Minister of Finance has done. He is to be congratulated. I know he will have the support of the Canadian people.

[Translation]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, government members seem obsessed by the national debt. It reminds me of the movie Fatal Attraction. That is the only thing they talk about. Unfortunately, this time, Canadians were expecting much more than what they got.

Look at how things are going in Canada right now: the recession is the worst our country has seen since the 1930s; 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed; 2.3 million are on welfare and 3.8 million are living below the poverty level. Moreover, there are more than one million children living below the poverty line and more than two million Canadians lining up at food banks.

I ask the Minister of Finance and the government what they have done for those people in their last budget? What have they done? That last budget did not do much for anyone, neither for the debt and the deficit, nor for the Canadian people and the Canadian businesses. Finally the government did not deliver an economic statement as it called it, but a purely political statement. It simply took away $8 billion from the Canadian economy and put $2 billion back into it. That implies a net deficit of $6 billion for the Canadian economy.

The hon. minister was speaking of deficit control but what have we seen so far? Year after year the deficit keeps rising steadily. In the end the fact is that this government is selling the furniture to be able to pay the rent, to be able to go on. That is what they are doing; they sell the furniture to pay the rent and that is not fair.

This budget is an assault against the Canadian infrastructure, be it from the point of view of the Canadian people or in the literal sense. Here are a few examples from the budget. It speaks of supporting the growth of small businesses. Even the government recognizes that here in Canada it is the small businesses that have created the majority of jobs in the 1980s and 1990s.

Finally, more than 80 per cent of Canadian jobs have been created by small businesses. We can read in the minister's budget that the ceiling for loans to small businesses under the Small Businesses Loans Act will be increased to $250,000. But that hardly helps new businesses since all new firms do not become profitable overnight and, hence, do not go knocking on the bank's door. Even if they did we must recognize that the banks do not come to their rescue.

The minister also proposes to help small businesses by exempting them temporarily from the payment of UI premiums. But again, if there are no profits small businesses will not hire people.

Instead of attacking the problem of unemployment this budget attacks the unemployed. We have seen in the statement made yesterday by the minister that unemployed Canadians are the ones who will be paying the price. This government will continue its attack on them and on the Canadian people.

We can also see in this budget an attack on the public sector. Government employees who provide services to Canadians will be affected. They have done their fair share these past few years. Their salaries have decreased following a wage control; their salaries have been frozen. Of course, taking into account the rate of inflation it is obvious there has been a decline.

With regard to investing in public infrastructure the proposal is far from adequate. Let me tell you why. The government expects to create some 5,000 jobs over the next few years. In the last analysis this means very little when you consider that approximately 10,000 jobs have disappeared at Canadian National at one swoop. The government's $5 million commitment in this bill will not help much. It is a start but it will not solve Canada's economic problems.

Another important point is that this government asks us for suggestions. Our leader already submitted to the federal government a pretty concrete and efficient proposal concerning investments in infrastructures. The federal government could enter into a partnership with provinces and municipalities. These three levels of government could contribute one-third each. Then we could really create jobs in order to help Canadians.

I do not understand why the federal government would make such a statement and say it is an economic statement since it does not contain much to help the Canadian economy.

In closing the federal government in this statement really did nothing to help the Canadian economy. It is much more of an attack against the unemployed, against Canadians.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, yesterday's economic statement by the finance minister was made during the most serious job crisis in this country's history. One in four Canadians is either unemployed or under-employed, plants are closing throughout the country, and farms continue to go bankrupt. We have unfair taxes, worsening inequality and a sky-rocketing federal deficit.

In the face of all this, the finance minister yesterday delivered to this House a mini budget, a document, that will create an over-all net job loss in this country when unemployment is well over 11 per cent. This government saw Canadians drowning and instead of throwing them a line, it threw them an anchor. That is the bad news.

The good news is this government will not be around long enough to implement most of the harmful measures it has brought in.

Canadians everywhere were looking for two things from this statement.

[Translation]

They wanted a change. They wanted the government to acknowledge the failure of the old and outdated policies. They wanted new ideas to turn things around. Last, they wanted a message that would give them hope. They wanted to know that the government in Ottawa is willing to take whatever emergency measures are necessary to create jobs and put Canadians back to work.

On both counts, the economic statement can only be described as a monumental failure. There is not the faintest glimmer of hope in that statement. The unemployment rate is going to stay at 11 per cent all through next year. The deficit will be almost twice as much as anticipated.

Not one single canadian family can now hope for 1993 to be a better year. There is nothing in that statement to justify such hope.

[English]

Rather than take bold action to help Canadians who have lost their jobs this government has chosen a 3-D approach: deny the problem, delegate the cost and dump on those who are hurting the most.

The cuts announced to unemployment insurance rank among the most mean-spirited economic actions ever taken by a Canadian government. These do nothing to solve unemployment. They will not generate a single job. They simply transfer costs to provincial, municipal and territorial governments as more and more Canadians are forced to turn to social assistance. The costs of unemployment insurance have gone up because of unemployment, not because of the unemployed. All the minister can do in response to this is punish the victims. This is not acceptable.

Leaving a job is not something that is taken lightly at any time in one's life. There are many reasons why people voluntarily leave their jobs such as harassment, discrimination and unsafe conditions. With a single move the federal government has put enormous power into the hands of employers. Unless employees can prove they were harassed, discriminated against or placed in danger they will not see a cent from an insurance program they have paid into. This is unacceptable.

Madam Speaker, put yourself in the position of a construction worker who is working in a situation under unsafe conditions and feels he or she must quit for health and safety reasons. I would put myself in the shoes of a woman who is being sexually harassed or discriminated against in the work place. Where does she turn now with UI denied if she leaves her job? How does she pay the bills if she cannot prove the harassment and discrimination happened? We do not move into the 21st century by returning to the employment policies of the 19th century.

There is one thing the Minister of Finance said yesterday with which I whole-heartedly agree and I quote: "Governing is about making choices". Absolutely. The government could have chosen to eliminate the business entertainment tax deduction. That is a $1 million saving to the taxpayer right there. It could have chosen to cancel the $4.4 billion helicopter program designed to fight a country that no longer exists. It could have taken that $4.4 billion and invested in a country that does exist, Canada. The government had a choice. The government could have chosen to cancel the $1 billion tax break to the wealthy owners of private trusts. But, no, this government would rather close hospitals than close tax loopholes.

[Translation]

The government has decided to single out those who are least to blame for the present recession and to make scapegoats of them; I mean the unemployed, native Indians, the poor in the third world and the generations to come that will pay for the cuts affecting the environment.

• (1250)

We in our party would have made a different choice. We would have chosen a full employment economy, an economy where the government's first priority would be to create decent, lasting, well-paid jobs for everyone.

[English]

We must be prepared to commit to a full employment economy. We must be prepared for an all-out attack on unemployment and not an attack on the unemployed. We do not do that with bad trade deals like NAFTA and the FTA that destroy jobs. We do not do that by unfair taxes like the GST that hit hardest at those who can afford them the least. We do not do that with high interest rates that inflate the dollar and choke the economy.

A full employment economy means investing in Canadians. It means generating jobs and doing the work we so badly need such as rebuilding our social, municipal and environmental infrastructures. It means directed research, enriched education and a skilled and talented work force ready to take on the world.

For the past year we on this side have said to the government: "Take a fresh approach or move over for someone who will". Today we know that fresh approach is simply not possible from this government. What we heard yesterday was not a mini budget, an economic statement or a fiscal plan. It was a signed declaration of bankruptcy, morally, intellectually and politically.

We heard much in the minister's statement about the deficit. There is a federal government deficit all right. It is a deficit of ideas, a deficit of imagination and a deficit of compassion for the people who have been so badly harmed by the policies of this government.

We in the New Democratic Party have an alternative. We have a vision. It is time for a change. Since this government has no vision and offers no hope, I say get out of the way for someone who does.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Madam Speaker, thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak on the economic statement made yesterday by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance.

It is not pleasant for us as members of Parliament to look at our country's economic situation and see the different measures that the government must take; we must analyze these measures and see whether they are what Canadians want and whether they are the right choice in the present economic situation.

This morning, I talked with the staff in my riding office in Jonquière, Lise Dumont, M. France Paradis and Marie-Thérèse Ferland, and asked them whether the office had received any calls. "What are the people saying?"

The first thing people in our ridings bring up is unemployment insurance. They ask us why the government cut their future benefits from 60 to 57 per cent. Why is the government going after the unemployed in particular? Also, public servants call and ask us why the government froze their salaries. They point out that they had no increase last year and 3 per cent this year, if I recall correctly, and now for the next two years they will have to live with no pay increase.

Those issues affect people and also us as members. It is no fun to see that our salaries will not go up, even though we are better paid than many people in our society. But besides that, there are some positive elements and others which are less good. We talked about some of the tougher measures, such as those I just mentioned. What are the positive ones in yesterday's economic statement? First, there is no tax increase next year. Since income tax is supposed to go down by 1 per cent in 1993 that means some $2 billion more in the Canadian economy. That is an important point. Generally speaking when people have more money we can expect some economic recovery.

Second, we have the amounts that will be allocated to manpower training. We are talking about a total of $2.2 billion, an increase of $300 million over last year. This is another step in the right direction.

In the small business sector, and I will talk about this in more detail later on, we now have 700,000 small businesses with fewer than five employees. We have 900,000 with fewer than 50 employees. This means they are eligible for small business loans of up to $250,000. Incidentally, when the banks grant these loans 85 per cent of the loan is guaranteed so that if a business is in financial difficulty the bank has some protection. By the same token, small businesses that need money for investment purposes have some assurance that the money will be available through the bank.

There are other ways in which we can help small businesses. For instance we can now tell them: if you hire new employees, next year you won't have to pay their unemployment insurance premiums which may save you as much as $1,600 per employee.

When we look at these measures and consider what we will have to do as a government to reactivate the economy I wish we were able to do more. This morning I would like to say that since there will be a new budget in March, perhaps the government should give the following some serious thought. We have $20 billion in the unemployment insurance fund. It is "pro-passive": $20 billion which is being used to pay people who stay home because they are out of work when they would much rather have a job. They do not want to stay home doing nothing. They want jobs.

As a government, we managed to take part of this money which is still in the unemployment insurance fund and invest it in manpower training. People say training is important. The challenge is that we have to create hundreds of thousands of jobs. We want to create 300,000 this year. It is a first step but we need a lot more. We have 1.6 million people who are unemployed. So we need hundreds of thousands of jobs. Why not take the UI fund and give it to small businesses?

Let me give you an example, let us say a weekly salary of $400. Small businesses would hire someone and we would pay three-quarters of that person's salary for so many weeks. Small businesses and employers would wake up and decide to expand or activate production and start hiring people. The UI fund just sits there. It is passive. Why not make it pro-active? The only difference is that I would take the money and offer it to small businesses so that they could hire people. I have to assume, of course, that after a number of weeks these companies will decide to keep the people they hired and that the wheels will keep on turning. The money is there.

It is a suggestion. If we have to change the legislation, well let us do it! That is our job. We are already using the money for manpower training so I suggest the next budget should consider using the fund to activate the economy even more since people want to work. The Minister of Finance has taken a few steps in the right direction but he will have to take more later on.

Madam Speaker, I realize my time has almost run out and perhaps I may tell listeners that we, their elected representatives, understand them and are aware of their problems. However, there are certain budgetary measures we have to take because the government has less revenue. It is not spending more but less money is coming in. We are trying to do our best and we will keep trying to examine the various alternatives for accelerating economic activity and creating jobs.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, in Canada a sexual assault is committed every 17 minutes and 90 per cent of the victims are women. Ever since 14 women died at the hands of Marc Lepine on December 6, 1989, we can no longer ignore the violent epidemic which is poisoning us all.

It is a fact that the majority of women in Canada are now afraid to walk their own neighbourhoods at night. In fact one woman from my riding says she will no longer use her own bank machine after she was recently harassed in broad daylight. My constituent was able to elude her attacker but for many women there is no escape from violence, especially in the home.

We were all shocked by the tragic murder last summer of 18-year old Carrie Lynn Pinard. Carrie never saw the face of the man who took her life. It was also not so long ago that three year-old Kayla Klaudusz disappeared and was later found dead in Lake Ontario.

We must stop this epidemic. It is time for all men to speak out against violence against women.

DRUG PATENT LAWS

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, the media and the opposition seem determined to mislead the Canadian people regarding the effects of the past and the pending legislation affecting drug patent laws.

We keep hearing that drug prices have gone up because of legislation providing increased patent protection. However what we do not hear is that patented drugs account for approximately 3 per cent of the entire pharmaceutical industry and of the over-all increase in drug prices, patented drugs have risen only 2.9 per cent since 1984, while the remaining amount of the over-all increase has been in the non-patented line of drugs.

I think it is important to note that there are approximately 19,000 drugs that can be legally sold of which approximately 652 are patented drugs. That leaves over 18,000 non-patented drugs that are not even affected by patent legislation.

The opposition and the media are also dramatically silent about the increase in research and development in Canada sponsored by the pharmaceutical companies since 1984, Ontario being a key beneficiary.

I would love to list just some of the advantages Canadians realize from our patent protection legislation but unfortunately time does not permit me to do so.

HEALTH

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, twice this week Canadians saw the Tory government put the interests of large, powerful corporations over those of Canadians and their health.

First the government's pathetic response to the foetal alcohol syndrome report showed the government buckling to the dictates of the liquor industry. The government refused to take leadership in initiating health warning labels on alcoholic beverages setting out the dangers of drinking during pregnancy.

Next we saw the government at the direction of the multinational drug companies move forward with its drug policy which will result in higher drug costs for families, seniors and provincial drug plans.

Canadians now know that this government is serving the interests of powerful corporations, not the interests of Canadians and their health.

PUBLIC SERVICE SALARIES

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I do not envy the challenge that the world recession has created for our Minister of Finance. Life would be ever so much easier if only we had the financial resources to spend.

Yesterday's economic statement caused great concern among many, not the least of whom are our public servants. I understand that yesterday's statement does not affect their earned salary increments. It is my understanding that the government assured the Public Service of two consecutive annual increases of 3 per cent. The Public Service received the first 3 per cent increase last July. They will not receive the next.

I know that everyone has some awareness of our tough fiscal situation and is understanding. However I wonder what happened to that commitment.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, December 2, 1992, will long stand as one of the darkest days in Canadian history. For one fleeting moment yesterday Canadians held their collective breath in hopes that the contents of the finance minister's economic statement would help answer their prayers. Instead, the minister's proposals created new nightmares for all Canadians.

The finance minister has completely forgotten about northern Ontario. He has done nothing to stimulate the stagnant economy and create jobs in northern Ontario. Indeed, he has decided to cut spending by 10 per cent on programs such as FEDNOR which are designed specifically to attract new business and industry to northern Ontario.

The government has also shown cowardice in cutting UI benefits. Rather than making the tough decisions it should have, it chose to stay the course and make those who could least afford it bear the brunt of the government's fiscal mismanagement. Over the past year there has been an increase of almost 30 per cent in the number of business and consumer bankruptcies in my riding of Nipissing. All of this may be attributed to the devastating economic policies of the present government which has laid claim to being the fiscal saviour of Canada. It has shown all the signs of a tired and feeble government. The only statement which should be forthcoming from this government now is the call for an election.

AETERNA LABORATORIES

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out the initiative taken by Aeterna Laboratories, a company in my riding, which has made a name for itself in the health field. Aeterna has been dynamic and shown initiative. For example, this young company has developed the Natcel food supplement, which took four years of research.

Besides encouraging research in Canada, this product is available from 1,000 therapists in Quebec and will soon be sold throughout North America.

Canadian private companies must be increasingly innovative and competitive. As markets become global we must continue to give our constituents the tools they need to bring about the economic growth from which everyone benefits.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the Tory government's budget statement once again highlights a government out of touch with the people of this country and totally inept at managing our economy. If an accountant of a business in Northumberland misjudged the company's budgeting as badly as this government did its deficit, the business would be bankrupt or the accountant would be fired.

This tired government is out of touch and disconnected from economic realities faced by business and consumers, Canadians. Unemployment is chronically high. Welfare rolls are soaring. In Northumberland alone it is estimated that 2,000 more citizens will be on welfare in the next month, many of them youth. Food banks and soup kitchens across the country are the growth phenomenon.

People need jobs. Northumberland needs harbours, water, sewage treatment, infrastructure which would create jobs, assist welfare-swamped municipalities and taxpayers. Instead, the government cuts jobs.

Where is the justice? Where is the vision? Where is the competence? Not in this tired old Tory government. Let us elect the Tories out of business now.

SALARY FREEZE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, further to the economic and fiscal statement presented yesterday, December 2, 1992, I want to say that I do not agree with freezing public servants' salaries. Our public servants in Abitibi do an excellent job in representing the Canadian government properly and serving the people and I think that we must respect our previous commitments to them.

WESTRAY MINE DISASTER

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, the Westray mine explosion took 26 lives almost seven months ago. Yet the people in the area and in the rest of Nova Scotia have been denied the right to answers that would help the families who lost loved ones in the disaster to understand what went wrong.

There have been four formal requests of the Prime Minister and this government to hold hearings as to what happened. The federal government put a lot of money into this mine. It seems only proper that it would like to know the answers as to why this tragedy took place at the Westray mine.

As a Nova Scotian and as a representative in this House I am ashamed of the lack of leadership that this government has shown in this tragedy. I call upon this government and the Prime Minister, who came to this House because of the people of Pictou County, to hold a hearing into the reasons why 26 lives were lost last May in the Westray mine.

INTERNATIONAL DAY OF THE DISABLED

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, today we celebrate the United Nations International Day of the Disabled. This is a unique opportunity to step up our efforts so that equality for the disabled throughout the world is not an abstract concept but a reality.

Canada defends human rights at home and abroad and is proud that the world has such a day for the disabled. Nevertheless, we must extend our activity beyond our own borders. Following the international conference of ministers responsible for the disabled, a working group will consider how to establish a permanent mechanism for exchanging information and technology among all countries.

The goal is the full integration of the disabled in all communities of the world. Canadians and citizens of all other countries can work together for equality, a basic right that we must never cease to defend.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, this is a compilation of press comments on the mini budget. It is uninspiring, unimaginative, as bad as the Liberal statements in the early 1980s. Canadians have been scrooged by a mini budget which is too little, too late, too Tory, a terrible exercise. The Tories did not know what the right thing was for the last eight years and still do not. This is a mini budget, heartless and brainless, a brazen attack on the nation's most vulnerable citizens. As Tories run out of gas, this has been a government running on an intellectual fuel tank marked empty. I quote from La Presse: Le remède de Mazankowski est une boîte de Q-Tips.

But there is also hope from the same source. It is la fin du règne.

FIREARMS CONTROL

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, last July legislation was passed to tighten the control of firearms. However, one important measure to reduce the illegal use of firearms was not addressed. I am referring to the need to amend the Criminal Code to introduce a law that would have a minimum mandatory prison sentence whenever an individual, including a young offender, commits a crime using a firearm.

Many law enforcement officers are supportive of this idea. Chief Bryan Cousineau of the York Regional Police agrees. He is adamant that even first-time offenders committing a crime while carrying a firearm should be given a mandatory jail sentence.

It is time for us to get tougher with those who threaten the lives of our citizens. We should not tolerate people who use guns to commit crimes. There should be no plea bargaining, only mandatory jail sentences for such actions.

NATIONAL HIGHWAY PROGRAM

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the Tory government has a responsibility to develop a national highway program and it has failed utterly to meet that obligation.

The program that the minister announced yesterday is not a national one. It does nothing to meet the transportation needs of much of Canada, in particular northern Ontario.

The Ontario Auditor General has found that it will take $20 billion to bring that province's highway system to a satisfactory level. Provinces and municipalities throughout Canada have been hard hit by the Tory recession so the federal government must participate in a shared program of infrastructure reconstruction.

The federal government should identify all federal transportation responsibilities that require upgrading, including VIA Rail, CN, CP, marine facilities and funding for provincial transportation services.

Federal investment in Canada's infrastructure is long overdue and would assist Canada's economic recovery while creating desperately needed jobs. The projects that would result would also make many of our highways safer.

The finance minister's economic statement yesterday was bad news for transportation in Canada and bad news for the economy. It is a shameful product of a Tory government that has lost the right to govern.

INTERNATIONAL DAY OF DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, the United Nations has declared today, December 3, as the International Day of Disabled Persons.

Canada must invest in all her citizens, including persons with disabilities, if we are to ensure that the Canada of tomorrow will be strong and competitive. Such a commitment has been clearly demonstrated in recent years by our annual National Access Awareness Week and the current five-year National Strategy for the Integration of Persons Disabilities.

Canada is recognized as a world leader in integrating disabled persons into the community.

Earlier this year we hosted Independence '92 in Vancouver. In October the Secretary of State, the minister responsible for the status of disabled persons hosted the first ever International Conference of Ministers Responsible for Persons with Disabilities in Montreal. A few days later he addressed the UN General Assembly in special session to mark the end of the Decade of Disabled Persons.

Today, as we recognize the International Day of Disabled Persons, I congratulate the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for their vision, energy and leadership in working for equality of opportunity for persons with disabilities, both in Canada and around the world.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, farm producers in supply managed sectors are concerned about the GATT trade talks. For five years Canada and about 100 other countries have been negotiating a new trade agreement. Today the talks are deadlocked and some countries are threatening to impose tariffs.

Canadian farmers have been well served by GATT article XI. They want it to be maintained. The government must help them now and give them the assurance that article XI will be kept.

ECONOMIC RECOVERY MEASURES

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I must say I welcome the economic recovery measures announced by the Minister of Finance. First of all, the government is maintaining a sound and responsible economic policy. Second, the government is introducing measures to help small businesses.

We all know that small business is the primary engine of our economy and the prime creator of jobs. The government's measures include an exemption from unemployment insurance premiums for new businesses starting up in 1993.

Furthermore, a 10 per cent investment tax credit will be offered to small businesses. Finally, the ceiling for loans to individual businesses under the Small Businesses Loans Act will be raised from $200,000 to $250,000.

Mr. Speaker, I am confident that these support measures for small business will stimulate economic recovery and help Canadians who are seeking jobs.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, now that Canadians have had a chance to look at the statement of the Minister of Finance it is evident that the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the cabinet just do not get it.

There is absolutely nothing in it for the unemployed. They are not attacking unemployment; they are attacking the people who are not working. There is nothing in this budget that will create jobs and create growth. That is very evident and we have made some suggestions to the government.

Why has the Minister of Finance not taken the suggestion of the opposition to plug the loopholes referred to by the Auditor General last week when he said that hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars are placed abroad by big corporations which are avoiding taxes in Canada?

That money could be used to create a program for infrastructure as demanded by the municipalities. The government could create jobs immediately. For every dollar invested by the federal government it could have had $3 of success.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first and foremost, there was a very sensible and affordable infrastructure program advanced in the economic plan I introduced yesterday.

With respect to the closing of loopholes, for example, financial institutions were paying $150 million a year in tax in 1984. We introduced the large corporations tax and the capital tax on large financial institutions. Last year financial institutions paid $1 billion in income tax.

In 1985, we introduced a minimum tax regime for high-income individuals. We eliminated income splitting among family members through the use of interest-free loans. We removed tax shelters based on investments in yachts, recreational vehicles and other similar properties. We terminated the scientific research tax and credit measure. We stopped the so-called carve-out transactions in oil and gas. We prevented the use of trusts and market securities issued in such a way that the capital returns to investors were distributed tax free.

I could go on to 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990 to cite more.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): What a great speech. While the government did that, it produced a deficit of $30 billion every year.

Now the Auditor General tells the government there are some loopholes and it is not moving on them.

[Translation]

Yesterday the Government of Quebec, using the limited resources at its disposal, tabled a program that may create jobs. We suggested a program to the federal government. This summer I travelled across Canada. I spoke to the mayors of Montreal, Laval and a number of other municipalities, and they are all ready to create jobs immediately.

Why does the government not do something? Is it because when they give money to municipalities they cannot play the patronage game themselves?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the economic plan I outlined yesterday takes steps to encourage investment in growth, investment in people, investment in infrastructure, investment in trade, encouraging partnerships and takes action with respect to costs.

• (1420)

The infrastructure program announced yesterday is something that can go forward very quickly. Discussions with a number of provinces are at an advanced stage. We want to transform the commitment for these infrastructure undertakings into action as soon as we possibly can so there can be jobs created and a spin-off benefit can occur. That will not only stimulate economic activity. It will also improve the competitiveness and productive capacity of our country.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is something in the minister's budget that is worrying a lot of Canadians. That is the new rule forcing those who quit their jobs voluntarily out of the unemployment benefit scheme.

We have received many telephone calls today from women's organizations telling us there are a lot of people who are obliged to quit their jobs because of sexual harassment. In order to keep their privacy they are willing to take a penalty of 12 weeks but still benefit from the plan to which they have made contributions for many weeks or months.

Is it fair to oblige them now to make a case for their situation if they want to draw what they have invested in an insurance program?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a very serious question. The hon. member mentions receiving calls from women's organizations. Looking at the irresponsible and false statements made yesterday by Judy Rebick and Nancy Riche, the president of the NDP, no wonder those people are concerned out there.

Some people have interpreted this measure as meaning that sexually harassed people in Canada can no longer receive UI benefits. This is a falsehood. This is a false statement.

Sexually harassed persons are still protected. They were yesterday. They are today. They will be tomorrow. For those who are yelling on that side of the House, look at section 28 of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment. The problem is that this government has given the women of Canada a terrific choice. They can work with sexual harassers or they can quit voluntarily and go through a long and costly battle to prove their case.

Why has the minister created this mess? When will he give a clear definition of sexual harassment as just cause for voluntary quitters for a change?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have to understand the stratagem of those petty leaders out there. This is a complete falsehood.

Sexual harassment is a just cause for any Canadian to quit his or her job. Yes, we have people who say that we should keep it under a lid, that we should not expose the harasser and we should let the woman suffer sexual harassment. This government is saying no to that. In Canada, a sexually harassed woman or man can quit his or her job and receive UI benefits. This has not changed.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I spent four years as the chair of the Unemployment Insurance Appeal Board. I know what it takes to prove just cause.

This government is forcing Canadian women to sacrifice privacy if, in their poverty, they can afford it. Why is the minister targeting women and worsening the nightmare of sexual harassment? It is a nightmare.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is sincere about her preoccupation, stop spreading the lie that women will not be protected under the act. They will have protection. They have protection and that provision of the Unemployment Insurance Act has not changed.

Mr. Speaker: I listened very carefully to what the hon. minister said. He said that she should stop spreading that lie. I want the hon. minister to make it quite clear that he was not suggesting that the hon. member was lying.

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, you are exactly correct. I did not say that she was lying but that she was spreading what Rebick and Riche said yesterday.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, an analysis of the Minister of Finance's economic statement yesterday indicates that there will be a net loss of 62,000 jobs because of the measures the government has introduced. The minister's statement is a failure by every measurement.

The first reaction today is that a manufacturing plant in Quebec has filed for bankruptcy putting 400 workers out of work. The General Motors plant in St. Catharines is looking at selling off or closing down and another 800 workers will be affected.

This country cannot afford more job losses. The Minister of Finance's economic statement creates a net job loss. Will the minister do the right thing and withdraw this economic statement before further harm is done to this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no. It is a responsible and affordable approach. If the hon. member wants to get the economy of Ontario going perhaps she could speak to her friend, Premier Rae.

A headline in the November 14 Toronto Star read: "NDP is blamed for job losses. Ontario's economy, particularly the manufacturing sector, continues to be racked by massive job losses and Queen's Park is being blamed". Another quote: "The Ontario NDP government with a vicious high tax punch to the solar plexus: It knocked Ontario businessmen to their knees, then it smashed its labour legislation over business' head. Now as business lies dazed and bleeding on the floor Premier Bob Rae's government is prepared to deliver—"

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the sign of a truly bankrupt government is when it cannot defend its own policies and has to put the blame on someone else.

The Minister of Finance in his statement yesterday said that he had some choices. I would suggest the minister had many choices but this government chose that it would prefer to close hospitals rather than tax loopholes.

The minister had another choice. For instance, a 3 per cent drop in Canada's interest rates would have saved almost the same amount of money that was slashed from programs through the minister's economic statement. A 3 per cent drop in interest rates would also have created 120,000 jobs.

The minister knows very well that the government's policies influence interest rates in this country. Why did he choose to penalize the victims of this recession rather than take positive steps toward lowering interest rates?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, again we see the bankruptcy of ideas coming from over there. I presented a plan on behalf of the federal Government of Canada. Where is the NDP's plan?

We know what the Ontario government has done to exacerbate the unemployment problem in Ontario.

The hon. member talks about a 3 per cent drop in the interest rate. What kind of fiscal and monetary policy would she propose to bring a reduction of 3 percentage points in the interest rate? You cannot just dial a phone and get a reduction of 3 per cent in interest rates.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the government has chosen a policy along with the Bank of Canada to focus solely on the reduction of inflation and not the creation of employment. It has resulted in gross unemployment and an increased deficit.

[Translation]

I have another question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The most inhumane thing that was announced in yesterday's budget is perhaps the change in the unemployment insurance program. It is an assault on workers who will be forced to hang on to any kind of job, no matter how unbearable. It will put an end to labour mobility and cost taxpayers, provinces and territories alike, hundreds of billions of dollars. The minister claims that such a change is justified.

• (1430)

I would like to ask the minister the following question. The government must do away with this new policy. Is it going to do it now?

[English]

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, will the leader of the NDP ask the president of the NDP, Nancy Riche, to retract the false statement she made yesterday, misleading Canadians?

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

First, I want to say to him that the vicious plan of his to make culprits of all those who quit or who are fired is a throwback to the sweat shops of pre-industrial England. It stacks the odds so ruthlessly in favour of the employer and puts women in particular at risk in terms of sexual harassment.

The minister says they will have their day in court. Yes, and who pays the bills and who buys the groceries in the meantime? I ask the minister why is he, by this measure, aiding and abetting sexual harassment in the workplace?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have to wonder. Yesterday in the statement of the finance minister there was not one iota of reference to the nature of what is a just cause for quitting a job in Canada, not one word.

I want Canadians to know that the only issue is that voluntary quitters, people who quit a job for no good reason, can no longer expect hardworking Canadian workers and employers to pay them benefits for having quit a job for no just cause.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, can the minister not get it through his head that establishing just cause takes time and you have to buy the groceries while that time goes on.

The minister will be aware that Newfoundland has the highest unemployment rate in Canada. He will be aware that two-thirds of the country's lowest income earners are women. The minister's decision to target those who quit or who are fired is a sinister, cowardly assault on the poor regions and on women. I say to him that it is those regions and those women who will be compromised.

Can the minister give us one good reason why he persists in this madness? Or does he get his jollies out of kicking people while they are down?

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I think on both sides for the rest of this Question Period I want some concentration on making sure that there are no personal affronts thrown across the floor of the House.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to reflect on his question he is talking about a process under the Unemployment Insurance Act that was not raised at all in the statement of the finance minister yesterday.

Canadians have a right to know this. This department has dealt with the issue of just cause for 42 years. There is a process in place. The instructions to the officers are to give the benefit of the doubt to the applicant. That is why this unemployment insurance fund costs workers and employers in Canada $21 billion this year.

Surely Canadians will support the screening out of a person who quits his or her job for the purpose of sitting at home and drawing UI while there are people who work hard to pay those premiums. This is about justice and fairness to the workers of Canada.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Hundred of thousands of unemployed and poor Quebecers were expecting the government to finally break its silence and choose the real priorities in its budget. Fixing two bridges, Mr. Speaker, is hardly enough.

My question is this: how long does the government think it can keep on fooling Quebecers and the Canadian people with its amateurish policies and its total lack of vision to stimulate growth?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am quite surprised at the hon. member's question. Quite frankly, we laid out an economic plan yesterday that deals, in a very comprehensive way, with investment and growth, improvements in the small business sector, R and D and transforming into a new economy, investment in people through enhanced and improved training programs, and an infrastructure program that can be started and expedited very quickly, with emphasis on the Atlantic region, the province of Quebec, and Ontario and in all regions of the country to deal with some of the bottle-necks in transportation that are under the jurisdiction of the federal government. That applies to bridges, roads and parks.

We also outlined our steps to invest and enhance our trading opportunities and to promote partnerships not only with other governments but with the private sector, and then, of course, very comprehensive action with respect to the containment of costs. It is a blueprint that deals with the problems that we face today and the problems of the future.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): It is a blueprint for poverty and for unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, the government's training programs do not meet one-third of the current demand. The government talks about pharmaceutical research but it has cut research grants to universities and it has decimated Canada's ability to develop environmental technologies.

Montreal has the highest unemployment rate and the highest poverty rate of any major city in Canada. Does the government really think that cutting unemployment benefits or repairing two bridges is going to turn that around?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, not to a casual observer, but to any serious observer of the economic statement of yesterday, anyone who cares to look at it must conclude that the top priority which comes out of this statement is investing in human resources.

We have increased the money for training unemployed Canadians by 450 per cent, from $400 million three years ago to $2.221 billion yesterday. Furthermore, we have increased the spending under the Consolidated Revenue Fund to further train Canadians.

As I have heard the member say, if the key to Canada's competitiveness is investment in human resources, he should applaud the Minister of Finance for what he did yesterday.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, it is clear from his comments that the Minister of Employment and Immigration does not understand the reality of the workplace for women or for visible minorities.

Racial and sexual discrimination cases take two years even through the Human Rights Commission. How does he think that his department and his tribunals will be either better or faster? Employees cannot go without income for months and years and women will be forced to stay in abusive situations.

Will the minister please, please come to his senses and reverse this decision that penalizes the victims of discrimination?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have a lot of respect for the hon. member but I would hope that she would talk with the president of her party. Yesterday, Nancy Riche, made that statement—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: This is serious for the women of Canada. If there is one woman in this country who is sexually harassed and because of the statement made yesterday by the president of the NDP, stays in place and continues to be sexually harassed, you have not rendered a service to that Canadian woman. The fact is that person should quit her job, expose the harasser and she will be protected.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that this minister does not understand what is happening right across this country to people who are being pressed by economic circumstance and are facing discrimination and harassment. He should understand it.

• (1440)

I want to ask the Minister of Finance this. This morning we discovered that the four U.S. states of Michigan, New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania have this same policy, of cutting off unemployment benefits from those who are fired or who quit.

Will the Minister of Finance admit that this mean new policy that he has brought in is to harmonize this Canadian social policy with supporting policies of United States' states and to forget about the values that Canadians hold dear?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the proposed UI changes have nothing to do with the social programs of our trading partners.

We are making these changes because they are the right thing to do at this time of our fiscal situation. Canadians know that our social programs will continue to provide, by world standards, very generous benefits to unemployed Canadians.

Maybe the hon. member will not admit it but the treatment of an unemployed person in Canada is still better than in France, in Japan and even in the United States of America.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Yesterday's shocking and heartless statement by the Minister of Finance was a vicious assault on the unemployed. The minister boasts about a $300 million training program. However, the minister fails to tell Canadians about the $2.4 billion he robbed from the unemployed.

Why are the unemployed paying for this government's economic incompetence?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member understands that when we are under extreme fiscal pressure a number of measures have to be taken—

Mr. Peterson: Because of your incompetence.

Mr. Mazankowski: He says because of my incompetence, Mr. Speaker. The current Leader of the Opposition, when he was finance minister back in 1978, brought in a budget that reduced the weekly benefits from 66–2/3 per cent to 60 per cent of weekly insurable earnings. Furthermore, at that point in time the costs of the unemployment insurance program were $4 billion. What did the then Minister of Finance take out of the unemployment insurance program; $935 million to take effect in 1980 and 1981.

There comes a time when finance ministers and governments have to make tough decisions. We have made some very difficult decisions but we have not been as heartless as the current Leader of the Opposition, the former Minister of Finance.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, this country does not want researchers. What we want is leadership by this government.

It is clear that this government is out of touch with reality. There are 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed; 2.2 million live on welfare; 400,000 young people are unemployed and this government has decided to stay the course, the course that has brought on this economic recession. It is time for change.

Will the minister introduce a serious economic plan that will put Canadians back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when the Leader of the Opposition was the finance minister he cut one million Canadians and inflation was running at 9 per cent at that particular time.

What we have in this economic plan is clearly a plan for the future: investing in people, investing in plant and equipment, investing in infrastructure, investing in partnerships, enhancing trade, adjusting to the new realities, adjusting to the realities of a newly emerging economy. That is leadership.

You cannot adopt policies for a world as you think you would like it to be; you have to adopt policies for the world as it is.

TORONTO ECONOMY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance.

Last month in Toronto alone 1,000 additional families were added to the welfare rolls, bringing the total number of recipients to a record 108,000 families and costing over $1.5 billion. These figures are surely to rise after the minister's mini budget yesterday.

Rather than attacking the unemployed and their benefits as he squarely did yesterday, which will only push more families on to the welfare rolls, why did the government refuse to stimulate the Toronto centred economy seriously in order to create and emphasize job fare rather than more welfare?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the statement yesterday was to create jobs and take people off unemployment and take people off welfare. That is the over-all objective, building upon the initiatives taken in the February budget which really zeroed in on the economy of Ontario.

In the manufacturing and processing sectors we took a number of positive steps to improve the capital cost allowance. We took steps to reduce the burden of taxes. Yesterday we announced no new taxes. As a matter of fact we froze UI premiums. We provided incentives for people to go out and hire new people. We provided further incentives to the small business sector because that generates 80 per cent of the jobs.

Insofar as what the hon. member is suggesting about overlooking Ontario, some $230 million are allocated for Ontario in terms of infrastructure, to improve the rail initiatives and the runways.

We will be sitting down very soon with each of the provincial governments to work out the kinds of sharing arrangements that are reasonable so that we can get these projects going very quickly and that the provinces will have some input and some say into the priorities they wish us to proceed with.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): The minister says that in due course they will be sitting down. Mr. Speaker, this province has been waiting for eight years for some concrete proposals to put Canadians back to work and it is still waiting.

Since the minister talked about Ontario, given that the province of Ontario has suffered 80 per cent of all lost manufacturing jobs in the country, that its housing industry remains terribly weak at best, and that its construction and trade sectors are absolutely flat, how can the government be so disconnected and out of touch with reality to be able to ignore the urgent need to stimulate seriously—not the pap we have had—the Ontario economy which happens to be one of the major engines of economic growth in this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member. The economy of Ontario is a very major engine of economic activity accounting for about 40 per cent of the economic activity in Canada.

With respect to the infrastructure proposals I can assure the hon. member that starting today—and this would be a continuation of some earlier discussions we have had with the provinces—we will go to work to get these infrastructure projects on the road.

The hon. member talks about housing. There has been a very impressive pick-up in housing due to the policies that we announced. Yesterday I announced the extension of the RRSP program.

The hon. member has further comments about what we should be doing to assist the economy of Ontario. I read this headline: "NDP blamed for job losses in Ontario". I am sure the hon. member would agree with that. You cannot have a government that is anti-business and expect them to create jobs. That is something that we—

Mr. Speaker: I think we will have to move on.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the announced massive cuts in Canada's development assistance which will not only affect aid-related jobs in Canada but which will have a devastating impact on our commitment to the global fight against poverty, AIDS and environmental destruction.

At a time when 40,000 children are dying each day of preventable disease and hunger, how can this government defend these inhumane cuts while spending over $4 billion on attack helicopters? Will the minister at the very least assure the House that these savage cuts will exempt not only famine relief but also support for NGOs and aid for meeting basic human needs, particularly those of women and children?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, since 1984 this government has certainly made it clear that it was committed to pursue programs in aid of third world countries.

Of course, our international concerns and domestic concerns are interrelated. If Canada is ever to provide more assistance it has to start by putting its fiscal house in order. Only then will it be in a position to increase its foreign aid budget. That is what we are doing by continuing to discharge our commitments towards the poorest of the poor, the women and children in the third world.

[English]

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who seems to be running the environment department these days.

Yesterday's Tory blueprint clearly made it a black day for the green plan. This government's failed commitment to the environment took another step back with the third cut to the green plan. This will mean cuts to the Fraser River Management Plan, Tree Plan Canada, and the clean-up of the St. Lawrence River and the Great Lakes. No opportunity was taken to develop new and innovative jobs in the environment.

When will the government finally defend the environment instead of trashing it all the time?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, it is incumbent upon us personally and collectively to curtail further deficit increases. Under the green plan there will be a reduction of $60 million this year, with a reduction in the following two years of 10 per cent. Given that, there will be an increase of some 30 per cent in spending on the green plan even after those cuts are done.

In terms of priorizing the aspects of the plan the hon. member has mentioned, those decisions have not been taken yet and they will be taken collectively by the cabinet of this government.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday's economic statement includes a measure concerning flow-through shares to promote investment in junior oil and gas companies. It provides for yearly write-offs totalling nearly $10 million to finance exploration.

I would like to know why the mining industry is excluded from this measure affecting small companies starting up in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what we did yesterday for small explorers and oil companies was to bring the policy in line with the mining sector because they currently have those provisions.

What I did indicate was that the Income Tax Act would be amended to provide more flexibility to the mining sector to utilize its non-capital losses in the same way as it utilizes its capital losses.

SEXUAL OFFENDERS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Last week Wray Budreo, a sexual deviant with a 30-year history of molesting children, was scheduled to be released from prison after serving only four of a six-year sentence.

It seems to have taken public outrage to force a last minute delay in his release, preventing this paedophile from going back on the streets where undoubtedly he would have continued his record of attacking children.

What is the Canadian government going to do to prevent the release of dangerous offenders such as Wray Budreo? Surely such a person should be put away for life.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the House will know that Bill C-36 came into effect recently. That considerably tightened up the regulations and the law with respect to sexual offenders.

There is a concern remaining with respect to high risk repeat sexual offenders. We are presently reviewing three possibilities: first, broadening the use of dangerous offender applications; second, reviewing the definition of the words serious harm to make sure that it is appropriate; and, third, working within present mental health laws rather than criminal laws to detain high risk repeat sexual offenders beyond the conviction for which they are serving time.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In the highlights from yesterday's economic statement we will find many charts but none that mention unemployment. Perhaps the minister is ashamed that Canada has the highest unemployment rate in the G-7.

I ask the minister to rise to the challenge of the highest unemployment in the G-7 and put an end to this episode of "Maz" misery.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge that the unemployment levels are too high. There has been some improvement in employment generation over the last five or six months. I think I was quite honest with the House and with the Canadian people that one of our biggest problems is the fact that the growth that is generated is insufficient to generate the kind of job potential we need.

Hopefully, with the pick-up in the U.S. economy and with the initiatives we took yesterday, the specific initiatives with respect to infrastructure and the other incentives, we will have a pick-up. We are expecting 300,000 new jobs to be created in 1993. I wish it were better but this is one of the problems we are facing as we go through this period of transition.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the minister keeps telling us that Santa Claus is coming but all his elves are out of work.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. The minister has pledged to give new businesses a break by forgiving their UI premiums for 1993. The minister's plan may be nothing more than a disguised first step in dumping the entire UI burden on to the backs of workers.

I ask the minister if his plan to dismantle the UI system is also the beginning of a new tax on the working class.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's observation is absolute nonsense. When she talks about the difficulties Canada has I would remind her that in terms of the G-7 community the unemployment figures have risen from 18 million in 1990 to 23 million in 1992. It is not only Canada that is having this employment problem. Other countries are having similar problems.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday the minister continued to ignore tax shelters for the very rich identified by the Auditor General. He continues to attack low and middle-income Canadians.

Will he tell us precisely how his 10 per cent cuts will apply to regional development, transportation, western diversification, ACOA, agriculture and native programs?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question allows me an opportunity to complete an answer I started in the earlier part of Question Period. I outlined all the tightening of loopholes we undertook in 1985.

In 1986 we introduced the at risk rules to restrict the tax credit and business loss claims of investors in limited partnerships. We removed the tax advantage of salary deferral arrangements. We restricted the ability of corporations to engage in after tax financing through preferred shares. We prevented the use of commercial trusts to avoid tax in a manner unintended by the law.

In 1987 we the government introduced a phased reduction in the extent of the acceleration in capital cost allowances. We reduced the reserves claimed by financial institutions.

An hon. member: Right.

Mr. Mazankowski: We imposed a creditable capital tax on large deposit taking institutions and we introduced the general anti-avoidance rule. In 1989 we constrained the ability of corporations to transfer the benefits of accelerated capital cost allowance through leasing.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, he does not tell us about the 34 or 37 tax increases for middle and low-income Canadians. Will the minister tell us why he is reducing the Crow benefit by $73 million next year and $104 million the year after? Does he not know that some of our prairie producers have big problems? Does he know what this is going to do to increase the cost of moving grain across the prairies?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is an expert on the Crow. I have seen some articles he has written. He would also be interested in knowing that under the GWTA in excess of $800 million is being paid out by the federal government.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the government House leader could indicate to the House the business for tomorrow, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of next week.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, at this point it would be my intention to call Bill C-93, the government organizations bill, at second reading for tomorrow.

I would like to formally designate Monday as an allotted day, the final allotted day of this period. On Tuesday we anticipate starting report stage of Bill C-91, the Patent Act. I will be talking to the opposition House leaders in respect of further business until adjournment or until we come back after we adjourn.

Ms. Clancy: Question of privilege.

Some hon. members: Point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Halifax. A minister and a member have risen on a point of order. I have indicated that I should hear the question of privilege first.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege arising from the response of the minister of employment to my question earlier. The minister accused me of spreading lies. He then said he did not call me a liar. He did however say I was spreading lies. As far as I am concerned, that allegation not only impugns my integrity but it also impugns by intelligence.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised a matter which came up during Question Period. Hon. members will remember I did rise and I did ask the hon. minister to make it very clear that he was not calling the hon. member a liar or imputing lies to her.

The minister responded and at the time I thought that was adequate. I have listened to the hon. member but I think the matter is closed. However, the hon. member's further intervention on this matter, making it necessary for me to rise again, indicates to all hon. members how careful we must be when we are describing motives of less than honour to any member on either side of the Chair. I thank the hon. member for the intervention.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to belabour the point in terms of your ruling. I would merely point out that we have been accused today in Question Period of attacking the poor, being heartless, being out of touch and all of those things and frequently we get shouted down when we address the House. If those things were a point of privilege, I am afraid we would spend all day discussing points of privilege.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 83(1) I wish to table a notice of Ways and Means motion to amend the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Criminal Code and a related act, and I ask that an Order of the Day be designated for consideration of the motion.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order of which I have given notice to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and yourself. It is related to the matter on which the member for Halifax rose.

During Question Period today the Minister of Employment and Immigration very clearly accused two individuals, who are not members of this House, of being liars. The traditions of Parliament provide for free speech in this House and that members who say things in here are immune from any prosecution or any action because of their comments.

However, in Beauchesne's sixth edition on page 22 under the section "Freedom of Speech", it states:

> 77. Freedom of speech does not mean that Members have an unlimited or unrestrained right to speak on every issue. The rules of the House impose limits on the participation of Members and it is the duty of the Speaker to restrain those who abuse the rules.

I would argue that had the Minister of Employment and Immigration said the same words outside of this House the two individuals, Judy Rebick and Nancy Riche, who were named by the minister repeatedly, would have the right to seek legal remedies.

I would suggest that the minister has crossed the fine line in this House, has used his position to abuse two individuals who spoke what they believe to be true and we believe to be true. I think, Mr. Speaker, you should ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration to withdraw those accusations against Ms. Rebick and Ms. Nancy Riche and apologize to them as well.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): We will spare the hon. member the protection of the House. I made that statement last night outside as soon as I heard it. It is on the record. If they want to sue me, be my guest.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan has raised a matter with reference to the text on the rules. I would ask him to let me examine carefully Hansard and I will come back to the House.

RULING ON QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the Chair could provide guidance to the House with respect to your ruling with regard to the point of privilege which has been raised by my colleague, the member for Halifax. Perhaps while the Chair is reflecting, he could indicate to the House as to what really is the difference between calling someone a liar and saying someone is spreading lies.

Mr. Speaker: I will try to be as helpful as I can. The Chair is in the position of having to make rulings sometimes very quickly. I made a ruling. I have asked the House to accept it. I do not now intend to discuss it further.

I have thanked the hon. member for raising the matter. I have asked the House to keep in mind that when statements are made that get either close to the line or over the line, it causes further statements along the same way.

I cannot be put in the position of re-examining a ruling that I made in the heat of debate and then discussing it further. That is asking more of the Chair than I think is appropriate.

Mr. Dingwall: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I was not questioning or reflecting upon your ruling. In point of fact, we accept the ruling of the Chair.

I seek the guidance of the Chair to try to provide some direction to members of this House in terms of the particular dispute that was in question. I would hope that the Chair would reflect upon my request because I believe it to be a very serious thing that has happened here today.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will reflect upon it but I am just asking hon. members please do not put the Chair in the position where many minutes later, after a decision has to be made as I said in the heat of conflict, to get into a philosophic discussion about the very matter upon which the Speaker has ruled.

If the hon. member or any other hon. member wishes to come to my office and discuss this matter, I of course will hear them. I am trying as much as is possible, and I am sure that all hon. members are very supportive of this, to try to maintain proper decorum in the Chamber. That is why of course I rose some time ago and said that I hoped that everyone would constrain themselves for the rest of Question Period and not make statements which are personal affronts on other members whether it comes from either side of the House. I recognize the point of my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, and I will reflect on the matter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I tried to get the attention of the Speaker going back to the questions raised by the House leader of the opposition to the House leader of the government about the work of the House over the next several days.

As you will know, he mentioned that Bill C-91 was coming forward. I was going to ask him whether he would make an undertaking that in view of the use of time allocation on the second reading of the bill and in view of the fact that the committee hearings have been very much shortened that this House at report stage would have an opportunity for a full and thorough debate of the bill without an attempt to close off the bill by either time allocation or closure motion.

Mr. Speaker: First of all in response let me say that I apologize to the hon. member for Surrey North. There were a number of members rising and I did not realize that the hon. member was on the usual Thursday afternoon question raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. Therefore, I ask the hon. member to accept my apologies.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I was seeking the floor on another matter and I accept your response on the question of the C-91 intervention.

If I may, while I am on my feet, I would like to respond to a question of privilege raised last Monday by the hon. member for Essex—Kent.

Mr. Speaker: Let us not get ahead of ourselves. The hon. member for Surrey North has raised a matter. The government may want to respond or it may want to discuss it with the hon. member. If there is no response then I am going to go ahead.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I certainly recognize that the oversight by the Speaker was not intentional and I do not take any affront from that. However, I do think that it is very important that that question be answered by the government, if not by the House leader then the House leader's parliamentary secretary.

We have a major piece of legislation that we have to plan for and to have some understanding on. The significance to the Canadian public and to provincial governments is great. We need some commitment from this government that it is not going to use time allocation again or closure to ram that bill through this House.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I just want to draw to the hon. member's attention that there was an all-party agreement in committee on this particular bill—

An hon. member: No, there was not.

Mr. Edwards: —in which 22 hours of witnesses were scheduled. There was also by consent an order whereby the clause by clause study was to be finished by five o'clock today and it was to be reported back to the House tomorrow.

I just point out that was done by consent not by time allocation, just to make sure that the record is very clear.

I cannot anticipate precisely how Bill C-91 will be dealt with when it is reported back to the House. We all try to be prophets and seers in this business but I think it would be foolhardy for anyone to try and put any kind of such speculation on the record.

When the bill is reported back I expect that it will be called for debate as the hon. House leader indicated. Beyond that I cannot speculate.

Mr. Speaker: I will just point out that the hon. member for Surrey North has made his point and this is not a place for debate.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, just to correct the record, we were informed that the government would proceed and report that bill back to the House without any witnesses or debate and based on that we agreed on division to allow the government to put forward a motion that was passed on division.

Mr. Speaker: I think we had better move on.

REMARKS DURING DEBATE ON BILL C-98

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, yesterday evening during an orderly debate on Bill C-98, I raised a question of the ILO of the UN criticizing the Canadian government's handling of its own employees.

I said it was the ILO that reached this decision. The minister in his response suggested that it was a subcommittee of the ILO as reported on page 14473 of Hansard. I sent him some material today but unfortunately he had to leave before we could get to this point.

I wanted to give him an opportunity to either change the record and agree with me that it was the ILO, the full governing committee, or else argue with me.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the hon. member's diligence, but I do have to point out that is getting into debate.

The hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants on a point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might help clarify the situation raised by the hon. member for Surrey North.

I was going to ask a question anyway but the matter was raised by the hon. member and the point of privilege got mixed up with the points or order.

My question in terms of government—

Mr. Speaker: No, the point of privilege was put ahead of the points of order.

I perhaps failed to see the hon. member rising. The reason we proceeded was because I had to take the question of privilege.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, because I now have the floor I ask a question to help clarify the matter.

Is it the intention of the government to conclude in this Chamber debate on Bill C-91 before the House rises, as it is expected to, for the Christmas recess on December 11?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there always are fondly held objectives by the government as we approach a break of season.

It is a fondly held objective of the government to complete debate on Bill C-91, if that is at all possible. What I will not speculate on and I cannot speculate on is whether any extraordinary parliamentary practice might be used to expedite that. That would be anticipating. We do not at this stage know fully what the prospects for passage of the bill may be and we have to, in good faith, expect that there will be the usual co-operation from all sides of the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has a further point?

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, we are not getting into debate. That is not what I was trying to do. I said that it was the governing body of the ILO. The minister said it was a subcommittee. I want to give him an opportunity to correct himself.

Mr. Speaker: I understand perfectly well the point the hon. member is making. Often members do rise on a quick point of order to add some clarification to debate. That is really what it amounts to. The minister may or may not respond.

In any event, the hon. member has made his point.

PRIVILEGE

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, November 30, the hon. member for Essex—Kent rose on a point of privilege to make certain claims about the practices of Canada Post Corporation.

I have had an opportunity to make some inquiries and I am happy to report to the House and to my hon. friend some of the facts in the matter.

This is by way of support of the government position. What the hon. member has raised is not properly a question of privilege.

As I understand the hon. member for Essex—Kent, he was suggesting that a certain written communication by Canada Post Corporation from its government relations section seemed to indicate that there was some sort of discrimination or restriction on the flow of information about Canada Post retail outlets to certain members of Parliament. That constituted a breach of privilege.

The facts of the matter, as I understand them, are that there has been a rather elaborate restructuring of the retail network of Canada Post Corporation. I believe there has been a net increase of some 4,000 retail outlets and considerable turnover as there are many retailers seeking these outlets to build traffic for their conventional businesses.

It is true that Canada Post Corporation does brief selected members of Parliament on upcoming postal changes in their ridings. But this is regardless of political affiliation. The House will recall that when the Crown corporation was created in 1981–82 it was mandated by all parties and was to operate free of political interference and that of course is still the case today.

I am informed that in certain cases, when members of Parliament have shown a keen interest in postal changes in their ridings, understandably the corporation's government relations function extends best efforts to keep those members of Parliament fully informed.

With the turnover in these postal outlets not all ridings are affected at any given time and it is quite possible that certain ridings would not be affected at all. But the fact remains, and I am assured that this is the case, that whenever a given member of Parliament, regardless of party has exhibited an interest in postal matters, that member is flagged as having such an interest and a full effort is made to brief the member on upcoming changes.

If the hon. member had some specific information about a specific member of Parliament and a specific situation I am sure that the corporation and my colleague, the minister, would be very pleased to respond to it. However, I believe that these facts bear out that there has not been a widespread or even a specific breach of privilege due to the particular corporate communications policy of this Crown corporation.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the point that has been brought forward here. However, it is important to review why the breach of privilege has been brought up.

There is a memo which I submitted. I confirmed with representatives in Canada Post that it was the Canada Post memo in question. It talked about changes in retail postal outlets and it also talked about retail postal closures. It stated very clearly emphasizing in brackets in advance that the corporation would choose to notify people when closures occur; whether it notified people or not notified people was really up to the Canada Post Corporation.

The problem enters the picture when a member of Parliament attempts to do his job. As Canada Post critic I must know what is happening in order to work on behalf of constituents or members of this country where their postal services are being altered, changed or taken away.

In this case the management of Canada Post clearly emphasized the point in advance and therefore is holding back information which would help me operate in my role as critic.

The same argument comes forward from every member in this House because if members have several retail postal counters closing in their ridings and are not notified in advance they do not have the opportunity to ask the proper questions of the government, to question why these closures are occurring, and be able to transmit that information to their constituents and answer questions about it.

Whether it is on the government side or whether it is on the opposition side is not the question in this case. The question is that proper communication of information is being stopped by an open memo in Canada Post which I believe affects the operations of members in this place and their right to take information to their constituents and citizens across this country.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I understand very well, having been a member of Parliament for some years, as the hon. member has and other hon. members here. I understand very well the point that the hon. member is making. The question is: Is it a question of privilege?

First of all, clearly, as the parliamentary secretary stated, whatever the policy of Canada Post is in this particular case, it is conceded that it is not something which the government of the day has created.

The hon. member has raised a matter which is of importance. I think we would all hope that Canada Post is made aware of this exchange, the hon. member's intervention a few days ago, the response by the parliamentary secretary, and my own comments.

I have to find under the circumstances that it falls short of privilege although it is a matter of concern. I hope that the hon. member by raising it will have corrected the problem as he and others may see it.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I was trying to catch your eye before you rose but I did not have the opportunity. I know it was not by any oversight on your part.

On the same issue I have also read that document and am very concerned about the implementation and implications of that document. I understand that the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader has looked at the document and has given his understanding of what the document meant.

However, yesterday during Question Period the member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and myself both asked questions on that document to the minister responsible for Canada Post who also happens to be the government House leader.

He denied in his answers any knowledge of this document.

I think it is incumbent on the minister responsible for Canada Post—and I am sure his parliamentary secretary can tell him about the document, show him that document, look at that document, talk to Canada Post, and make sure that all members of Parliament are treated equally by that Crown corporation.

Mr. Speaker: The member has made a point. I have made the ruling with respect to the application and I am sure the hon. members will have noted the exchange and the interventions and I thank hon. members.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1992, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, when I taught at the University of British Columbia I was known by my students as "old motor mouth". I could give a 15–minute lecture in 10 minutes if pressed, but I will try to spare the translators the agony of keeping up with that pace.

I am delighted to have an opportunity to participate in this discussion of the Minister of Finance's statement and the motions coming from it. I would like very briefly to say a few things from my perspective as a minister who participated in the cabinet committee that advised the minister and as a senior minister from British Columbia.

I want to say first of all that in dealing with the problems we are trying to address, the deficit and the debt, the whole exercise of dealing with budget cuts is a very difficult one. I think that all of us who come here to be members of Parliament, and those of us who serve in the government, are anxious to do constructive things, to build things. Budget cuts are not the task that we welcome, that we think of as part of our job.

To say that it is a soul-destroying exercise is in many ways an understatement.

It is important to understand the responsibility that we have to future generations. In my participation in cabinet committees dealing with the issues of fiscal responsibility and budgets I have often pressed our officials from the Department of Finance as to whether there are any demographic changes or shifts that might suggest that a couple of years down the line some of the pressures we are addressing would be eased and it seems that the light at the end of the tunnel is always an oncoming train. We have an unavoidable responsibility to try to ensure that we get our deficit and debt situation under some kind of control.

At the same time we are experiencing an international economic slowdown, one that has affected some of our major markets. As a trading country that affects us enormously. Until just last year Ontario was the United States largest trading partner, not just Canada but Ontario alone.

We can see in Ontario the impact on its industries when the purchasing power of its major market has been seriously lowered as a result of an economic recession and very slow growth. We recognize the need to try to find some balance between fiscal responsibility and the need to stimulate and provide opportunity for businesses to get back on their feet and create the jobs people need, not just to create consumer confidence and a mood of optimism but to create a genuinely robust economy down the line.

This has been the exercise we have been involved in. The question of productivity is a serious one. I read in the Minister of Finance's background paper that between 1963 and 1978 we had a level of productivity in Canada that enabled a worker to expect the actual doubling of real wages within 26 years. In other words, real wages, real purchasing power, correcting for inflation, would double for the average member of the Canadian work force in 26 years. Therefore, we could actually expect to become wealthier as we got older.

At the rate of productivity we have that is an expectation that would take 70 years to fulfil. That is a very frightening statistic. Most of us do not spend 70 years in the work force. To have that doubling of our real wages would require more than our own working lifetime. That means that we have a very serious problem to address in Canadian society, our productivity, our ability to produce more effectively and efficiently. That is the other issue we have been trying to address as a government.

Doing that means not only getting our fiscal house in order but trying to rationalize our taxation system to try to ensure that Canadians have the skills they need to produce, not just to work harder but to work smarter, to make sure we have the kind of infrastructure in this country, and the capability, to maximize the creativity and abilities of a very talented and committed work force.

One thing that is going to be very valuable for my own province of British Columbia is the commitment to support the electronic highway, the system called CANARIE. I forget all the things the acronym means. The Minister of Finance also had some problems with it yesterday.

This morning on the CBC I heard a Canadian scientific adviser to the National Science Foundation in Washington commenting on this particular initiative of the government. He said that this is something that is necessary to keep Canada in the first world, that it is of enormous significance.

In British Columbia this is going to have a very positive impact. This particular expert said that not only was this a way of giving our industries and businesses of all kinds access to the most enormous reserves of information and data, which would enable them to do their jobs effectively, but it is also an enormous opportunity for the computer software industry because once there is this network then providing the devices to use it and providing ways to access it becomes in and of itself a very important part of industrial development.

Members of this House may not know that British Columbia has become one of the centres of software development in North America. In fact we talk about the evergreen triangle between Washington State, southern Vancouver Island and the lower mainland proper as one of the major centres of creative software development in North America. Therefore, for British Columbians this opportunity to continue to diversify our economy, to get us away from dependence on resource industries is going to be enormously helpful.

We also know that small business is the creator of 97 per cent of the new jobs in Canada. It is an area that is extremely important in my own province as we diversify our economy and get more into value-added even in our resource industries.

A number of provisions in the finance minister's statement addressed this creative area of the economy. It is important to recognize that government will never have the creativity or entrepreneurship that is found in the private sector. We cannot have bureaucrats sitting in Ottawa trying to think up great ideas for business. That is not the role of government. The role of government is to empower those who have the ideas, the people who are building the better mousetrap so to speak, to be able to do their job and exploit the potential their own creativity has begun to unlock.

In that respect I think that the 10 per cent investment tax credit for new machinery and equipment is going to be extremely important. Getting back to this question of productivity one of the things that enables people to be more productive is the level of technical equipment they have in carrying out their business, whether it is computers, small manufacturing devices in a small urban business or new equipment for farmers or new equipment in the mining industry, new equipment for the small forestry operators in British Columbia.

All of these are extremely important businesses. They are businesses in which investment in new technical equipment can increase productivity. For those businesses there will now be an incentive to purchase that equipment because there will be a 10 per cent tax credit. As we all know a tax credit is a deduction right against the tax payable. It is the maximum kind of benefit that we can give to businesses.

In addition, the attempt to stimulate hiring in the small business sector through the proposal that would have the government pay the employers' portion of the unemployment insurance premium for new employees is another way of trying to encourage businesses to expand their work force at this time. This could mean as much as $1,600 per new employee for a small business. It could very much make the difference between the decision to hire and not to hire. Remember that this hiring is important not simply for providing employment but also for providing training for people.

There are so many people who are trying to break into the employment world. Until they can get that first job they do not have the resume. They do not have the experience that puts them fully fledged into the employment stream. They are always knocking on that door or pressing their nose against the glass.

In addition, the ceiling for loans for small firms under the Small Businesses Loans Act will be increased to $250,000. Members on the other side of the House have quite rightly pointed out that does not guarantee that the funds will be made available by the banks. We do have an obligation to pursue that as well.

In my own part of the country availability of capital has been a very important part of our economic concern, particularly since over the years it seemed that the chartered banks were headquartered in central Canada and very often seemed to pull the plug on businesses far from that centre with devastating effects. That was certainly the experience in the last recession. As a lawyer who was practising commercial litigation in the wake of that recession I can say that was a story that I heard over and over again.

This is an optimistic statement. It is a statement that accepts the responsibility of trying to get our fiscal house in order while recognizing that it is difficult, that there are no happy cuts to make in the budget, that because we have managed to get inflation down so low, we can have a freeze on government expenditures and on wages without seriously cutting back on people's spending power. That is the value, that is the dividend, of a low inflation level. It is something that we are getting used to in this country.

I think of the days when inflation was double digit. When I was chairman of the Vancouver school board we had wage increases of 16 per cent in one year. What kind of incredible out of control economic dynamic that was. What a dreadful tax inflation at those ridiculous levels was on people with fixed incomes.

We are optimistic about getting our fiscal house in order, stimulating those areas of the economy that will produce jobs, and stimulating the development of productivity, which is the long-term guarantee of continued economic prosperity for all Canadians. We owe it to our children and our grandchildren to keep to that line of attack. For that reason I am very pleased to support the motion moved by the hon. Minister of Finance and his approach that he took in his statement to this House yesterday.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I am happy to be able to participate in this debate. In view of the limited time that I have I want to make some general comments and then some direct comments concerning how it affects my constituency, in particular, how inadequate, how disastrous this economic statement really is for the people whom I represent.

I would have thought that the Minister of Finance would have showed some courage. I thought he had something in his fibre whereby he could have come to the House of Commons and demonstrated to Canadians that this was a Minister of Finance who was going to change the ways of the previous administrations and get on with tackling the real problems facing Canadians.

We did not get that from the Minister of Finance. This Minister of Finance is not tough. He is not courageous. In my constituency they would say: "He's got no guts". The reason he has no guts is that he has allowed billions of dollars in tax loopholes to continue. There is not one sentence or reference with regard to tax loopholes or filling those tax loopholes. This was reported to us by the Auditor General.

The minister knows the interest rates are quite different between Canada and the United States which affects the competitiveness between Canadian business and American business. He is very much aware of the $4 billion program announced for helicopters. He did not do anything with that.

This minister would like the Canadian people to believe he is tough and courageous. He was really tough was he not, when he picked on those individuals who are least able to look after themselves: the unemployed, those on welfare and those in the poorer regions of this country. I wish ministers of the Crown would accept their responsibilities and be tough. They should be tough on those individuals who are more able to afford it as opposed to those who cannot.

This is an economic statement and in fact it is a budget statement. This Minister of Finance has attacked and knifed the unemployed in this country. He and the government opposite will pay dearly for this particular mistake.

In my own constituency the policies of this administration have caused a proliferation of taxes over the last number of years and massive cutbacks have occurred. Passenger rail service is gone. Our radar base for the Armed Forces is gone and our airport service in terms of jet service is gone. The Cape Breton Development Corporation has reduced its employees to approximately 2,000 when there were 3,500. Our Sydney Steel Corporation has gone from well over 1,200 employees down to approximately 500. The cuts go on and on and on and on.

In 1990 the unemployment rate in my constituency was reported as 16.3. The Tories did better in 1991 when it was 18.8. In 1992 of October of this year they did even better than that. They had it up to 19.5.

My constituents and I ask of this government: What is it doing to try to facilitate economic development on the island of Cape Breton and put people back to work?

This economic statement, this budget by the Minister of Finance has once again knifed those Canadians who live in this poorer region of the country. How has the government done that? It has taken the unemployment insurance and it is going to cut off those individuals who quit their jobs. The point was raised in Question Period today. What happens in a particular situation if a woman has to leave her job because of sexual harassment? We all know the leaps and bounds that particular individual must take. She will have to go before a tribunal and the onus of proof will be on her. It is not fair at all.

Benefits to UIC recipients will be reduced and the Government of Canada will save $2.4 billion. The Minister of Employment and Immigration had the unmitigated gall to come before this particular Chamber and say to the people of Canada: "But I am going to provide $300 million in training". How much of that training is will go to Ontario? How much will go to Newfoundland? How much will go to Nova Scotia? How much is going to go to my constituency and the adjoining constituencies?

Mr. Mifflin: What are they training for?

Mr. Dingwall: That is right. What are they training for? Everybody is out of work. There are no economic opportunities. The Minister of Finance stands in his place, eyes the camera, and says: "I want to be tough. I want to stay the course. I am going to help the people of Canada". In the very same breath he has done absolutely nothing about tax loopholes.

The monetary policies are absolutely dismal because he is only fighting one cause of our problems and that is inflation. He is not taking a balanced approach to correcting these difficulties.

There is no stimulus in this budget. It is all smoke and mirrors. He has given in to the Premier of Nova Scotia, Donald Cameron. I will say on the floor of the House of Commons, I will say outside this House of Commons and I have said in my constituency, Donald Cameron has been anti-Cape Breton since he assumed the office of premier of the province of Nova Scotia.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Dingwall: What is the government going to do? It is going to build a four-lane highway in Nova Scotia going to New Brunswick. I said this morning on Newsworld and I say in this Chamber, that is wrong. It is not a bad project but there are more effective ways to create jobs throughout the entire province of Nova Scotia.

What about the Annapolis Valley? What about Pictou county? What about Cape Breton county, Cumberland county and Halifax county? Thousands of projects are ready to go under the municipal infrastructure which would join the municipalities with the provincial and federal governments. What has this government done? It is playing to the political agenda of one premier in the province of Nova Scotia, namely Donald Cameron. That is not fair. That is not just.

If this Minister of Finance wants to be known as someone who is tough, someone who has guts as they say in my district, why does he not stand up to those individuals who are taking millions and millions of dollars out of this country for tax benefits? Why does he not do that?

Why does he not do something about the interest rates spread between Canada and the United States? Why does he not do something on monetary policy? Why does he not chop these prosperity agenda programs? Why does he not chop the advertising budgets of all of the various departments of the Government of Canada? Why does he not stop feeding the political hacks of the Tory party?

We in Nova Scotia are fed up with the administration of this government. We are fed up with the provincial administration as led by one Donald Cameron. I can assure you the people of my province will respond in great numbers to the challenge should the Tories opposite ever get the intestinal fortitude to call a federal election. They will respond to that challenge and they will vote overwhelmingly against the administration opposite us and the provincial administration of Donald Cameron.

In conclusion, if I had more time I would itemize the way this government has knifed the people of my province, my district and my island. I assure you, Madam Speaker, as you sit there and I stand here we shall never forget one Donald Cameron, the premier of our province. We shall never forget the Tory administration, whether it is Brian Mulroney Kim Campbell, Perrin Beatty or whomever. We shall never forget.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, speaking on the same topic but coming from a different perspective I want to share some of my thoughts on the statement given yesterday by the finance minister.

There is a certain reality you have to face when you form a government. I think the minister was very forthcoming yesterday and addressed those glaring realities. One of the comforts I take from the minister's speech yesterday is the fact we have done that.

• (1550)

We have acknowledged there is going to be an $8 billion shortfall in terms of government revenue and we have cut expenses to meet that lack of revenue. We have not gone on a spending spree to kick-start the economy which is the term the opposition often uses.

We have accepted the reality that borrowing in the past has not eliminated the problem. In fact, some of the problems we experience in this country today are simply because in the past we have fallen into that habit of borrowing. That habit of borrowing is costing us dearly in this country to the extent that 30 cents out of every tax dollar of revenue coming in to Ottawa goes to pay interest on that debt.

The old ways of doing it do not work. We have proven that. The only way we are going to move beyond where we presently are to a healthier Canadian economy is by doing the things Canadian people are demanding of us. They are telling the government: do not borrow any more, accept reality and move on from where you are.

Some of what the minister announced yesterday will do that. We have to remember there are 950,000 small businesses in Canada. We have taken the route of increasing the ceiling on loans through the Small Business Loans Act. We have gone from $50,000 announced earlier this year to $200,000 and now we have increased that to $250,000.

The encouraging thing I find in that announcement, among others, is the fact for the first time small businesses can use that $250,000 for operating capital, obviously with some restrictions.

In the past we could only use that $200,000 which used to be only $50,000 and is now $250,000, for the purchase of machinery or capital investments.

That is encouraging. Another of the things the minister mentioned yesterday is he is going to put some pressure on the banks to achieve this. Many of my constituents, and I am sure this is the same on both sides of the House, have gone to the banks to trigger that small business loan only to find out the banks were not there to do business with them. They either knew little about it or could not care less about it.

The minister has told us publicly and privately he is going to do all he can to make sure the banks respond to this. That will be encouraging to every one of those 950,000 small businesses out there.

The RRSP home buyers' plan is going to be extended. That has been a phenomenal success throughout the country, particularly in my home province of New Brunswick.

We also had the announcement yesterday by the finance minister of the government's commitment to highway building in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to the tune of $200 million. That is something we have been working on for a long time in the province of New Brunswick because our highways are inadequate, particularly the trans-Canada highway. That is good news for the province of New Brunswick.

Question Period today seemed to focus on the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I want to explain that because it is very important the Canadian people understand what is happening. The minister did a good job today in Question Period responding to some of those questions. We have to continue to clarify what is happening there.

One change to the Unemployment Insurance Act is simply that individuals who voluntarily leave their jobs will no longer be eligible for unemployment insurance premiums. It is important to point out that we are not talking about people who leave their jobs for a particular legitimate reason. We still recognize those legitimate reasons but only legitimate reasons.

I could go through the act and I think I will so that people can understand clearly that we are not changing it. I brought a copy of the act with me so that we could step through section 4 of the UI act in particular. It clearly states the reasons individuals can leave their jobs or places of employment and still be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. It is very clear in that regard. I wanted to point this out simply because the reasons that were brought out in Question Period today have no legitimacy at all.

Some of the comments that were made in reference to sexual harassment were inaccurate. That has not changed. If anyone is being sexual harassed on the job it is a legitimate reason to leave the job. Any changes brought in yesterday do not change that. In other words, sexual or other harassment as identified and stated in the act are legitimate reasons. The obligation to accompany a spouse or dependent child to another residence is also a legitimate reason to leave, or discrimination on a prohibited ground of discrimination within the meaning of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

It is important to put that on record. I do not want people misunderstanding what happened yesterday in the House. It is very clear that some people are attempting to make political hay of the issue but let us not be fooled by it.

There are other areas we have to talk about as well in terms of government expenses. All government operating budgets will be reduced by 3 per cent in 1993–94. Average unemployment insurance benefits will be frozen. Grants and subsidies to most organizations and interest groups will be cut by 10 per cent in each of the next two years.

In terms of training programs which are very important for a changing country and work force like Canada, funding of an additional $250 million will be committed over the next five years in support of those programs and an additional $300 million will be provided in 1993 for job training for displaced workers.

In balance the statement yesterday was as good as we could expect given the times. As I mentioned earlier, when government revenues are down there are really only two things we can do. We can increase taxes or we can cut back on spending.

One of the things I think most of us in this House realize is that there is zero tolerance out there in terms of the ability of the government to tax more. People simply do not want more taxes. What they want is more efficiency from government. I think the minister has produced that in his economic statement.

If our economy continues to grow as we predict it will, and I am confident it will, we will have the revenues we need to carry on with our programs and reduce the debt. We are giving businesses, particularly small businesses, the encouragement they need to make the investments necessary to create the jobs we want to see.

I am confident that will happen. I am confident the government is on the right road. We have done it all without borrowing more money.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Madam Speaker, I come from a small riding in southwestern Ontario, Essex—Kent. They are two counties in Canada that are highly productive agriculturally. As well they have a tremendous amount of manufacturing jobs, or may I say they had a tremendous amount of manufacturing jobs.

• (1600)

However in the last couple of years, just to give a quick example of what has happened to the manufacturing jobs and the agricultural jobs, in my riding Delta 70, a fairly large manufacturing plant closed; Olinda Foods closed; Freedlands closed; Sheller-Globe closed; Nabisco closed; Standard Tube closed; Campbell Foods is leaving; Hunt-Wesson closed; Duomatic Olsen closed; and Meridian Mould closed. They were fairly large companies.

In my riding right now we are talking about 8,500 people being on unemployment. Jobs in my riding are very hard to come by. The Minister of Finance stands and says he can see improvements, lights on the horizon. He can see a positive move forward in the last year or so. I have to point out that in Kent county the cases of people on welfare have cost approximately $7,000 in the year 1990. In 1991 they cost $13.5 million and in 1992, almost $17 million. Welfare has tripled in the Kent county area of my riding in the last three years. In the Essex part of my riding the welfare costs in 1990 were approximately $9 million; in 1991, $16 million; and today, 1992, $21.5 million.

We are talking about changes therefore in welfare costs in both counties from $15 million to right now about $36 million. They have risen in the area of 140 per cent.

People are looking for jobs. They are looking for some answers. They are looking for some help. I failed to see one job, one effort on behalf of this government to help southwestern Ontario. I see programs put in place for the maritime provinces and Quebec. I see programs suggested in the west but not one penny moves toward southwestern Ontario.

I must also admit that the farm community in my area was looking for a bit of help. Well over one-third of the farming community is in financial trouble at this point. It has had very tough years with extremely low commodity prices. I really thought the Minister of Finance was very aware of that due to his former position. However, I have seen no movement in helping those who are really in need in my riding or helping Canadians in general.

I know dollars will be lost in my community through cuts in the UI program. I also know small business was looking for a glimmer of hope because of the huge loss of funds in my area. Nothing seemed to come about. The economic statement in my riding of Essex—Kent is very disastrous. I am afraid the bill put forward by the minister has done nothing to resolve the problems.

Business people, the farm community and labour forces have suggested the major cause of our tough economic times right now. Everyone believes the free trade agreement has had a tremendous impact on my region. Added to that, the recent imposition of taxes has certainly caused a tremendous difficulty. I believe the GST alone drove a very large portion of the people who normally worked and supported the businesses in my riding across the border. They refused to pay the GST whenever they could. I believe the underground economy has been much developed. As a result our business community is suffering added burdens, not only the loss of revenues that have accompanied bad government policies but the more difficult situation it is in now with no help in sight.

As I walk down the streets people in my riding are asking: "When is there going to be an election? We need to get rid of the policies that have been put in place". Certainly cynicism toward government is very much felt by the people in my riding.

When I stop to think about the move the Minister of Finance and the minister of immigration made to put an immigration centre in the riding of the Minister of Finance to shelter those people from the economic impacts in this country and leave other people like the ones I represent out in the cold, it is a real shame. Certainly there is no logical reason for that centre to be located in the riding of the Minister of Finance, outside the fact that he may need some extra support when the election finally comes along.

I also found a tremendous problem yesterday when the new economic plan was introduced. I found a problem with the arrogant way it was put forward: here is a plan that is moving toward prosperity. I do not believe there is any movement toward prosperity when the suggestion in this plan was that $8 billion would be cut. Those cuts are not this year; they are next year, the year after and the year after that. They are several years in the future.

If the government were serious about cuts and getting cuts done, it would have made them under this year's budget and not looked to future governments to make those cuts. However, the $8 billion is there as cuts for future governments, not for today. I think the Canadian public should be aware of that.

Another point is very clear and I have a real problem dealing with it. Here we are with a $34 billion deficit for the Canadian public this year. It is an increase of $7 billion from nine months ago. The problem is that the government is suggesting it is holding things down, being tight-fisted with the budget and controlling expenditures. In fact that is not true at all. It is overspending by an additional $7 billion to what was projected just nine months ago. Next year's budget follows the same line. It will be spending $10 billion more next year than proposed just nine months ago.

When I stop to look at it, in the history of Canada it is probably the worst financial manager of a budget that any government has been. It prided itself on being a good fiscal manager. That is untrue. I see program after program altered, changed and cut. At the same time I see taxes increased, increased, increased. Yesterday was not a good example. There have been increases of $55 billion annually in revenue since this government came into office, but it is going further into debt by $35 billion this year.

The government is not only putting expenses on Canadian people and raising tax levels to the ultimate. It has also mismanaged the economy and has given us a tremendous deficit annually and a huge debt of $420 billion. I am appalled at anyone who can think this government has been financially responsible, has done a favour to Canadians. It has put us behind the eight ball for the next 20 years.

Only a change of government can resolve that problem. Get rid of those terrible, boring, difficult policies for Canadians. Those policies hack down the little guy, put people out of work and destroy our nation. We need a change. We need progressive, liberal policies.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Kemano Project; the hon. member for Don Valley East, Small Business; the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys, Westray Coal Mine; the hon. member for Vancouver East, Employment Equity; the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, Report of the Auditor General.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak about the initiatives announced by our finance minister yesterday.

Where was the Liberal member for Essex—Kent when we were in a recession the last time? I was in a small business struggling with interest rates. Every day I would get a slip indicating that interest rates were rising a point every other day. I kept the last one for historical reasons because interest rates had reached 22 per cent. I never want to see it again. I wonder where he was and what he was telling his government, the Liberal government of the day, when we had that situation.

Coupled with that was a staggering 9 per cent inflation rate. If you wanted to kill business you certainly were doing it. Only through a lot of scraping and scrimping did we make it through that dastardly time. I want him to reflect on that when he starts deriding this government.

Certainly it is not the easiest of times for small and medium-sized businesses although we have low inflationary rates. Inflation is an absolute creepy, silent killer of business. Prices go up and people will not buy. Costs escalate at 8 and 9 per cent. Talk about putting businesses under. That is something that will do it. With its measures this government is working to keep inflation at the rate we have.

There is a different mentality out there now as well. The astronomical 15 and 17 per cent wage increases we went through at that same period in time are long gone. We have established a sensible attitude in this country. The leadership this government took in establishing reasonable wage increases for the public sector set a standard in Canada and the provinces followed. We have taken a lead and the private sector is now following along. There has been tremendous leadership shown by this government in that area.

Interest rates are moderating to the point where people can borrow money. We need to work more with the financial institutions so that those low interest rates turn into dollars available for small business.

We can do that by changing the Small Businesses Loans Act which is in the works. Also, an important announcement which seems to have been overlooked by those opposite who are looking for negative reactions is that under the Small Businesses Loans Act small business will be able to get loan money for operating capital. That was something which was asked for.

I was going to ask my friend opposite from southwestern Ontario what letters and suggestions he sent to the finance minister. I spent a good long time studying how small businesses could have more money available to them in loans. I did a study. I canvassed my constituents and sent him a number of suggestions of how he and the small business minister could change the Small Businesses Loans Act so that it would make capital more available to our small business people.

I know a number of those initiatives are going to end up being in the amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act. The real important one, however, was noted by the finance minister. That is that capital now would be able to be used for operating under the Small Businesses Loans Act.

There is a process here. There is a plan and we are working to the plan.

I noted The Financial Post said: "Finance Minister Don Mazankowski may have given an economy already showing signs of modest growth the kind of push needed to keep it moving in the right direction". That is right, a gentle push moving it in the right direction.

Certainly a lot of that emphasis is on small business. It is in the area of making available to small business the opportunity and availability of having expanded use and availability of RRSPs to be invested by employees, which is important.

It certainly also is going to allow for a 10 per cent tax credit investment on purchasing of equipment. That is important to our small business people and is something they have been asking for.

It is is based upon something we forget has been done in Canada. That is that our small business people enjoy a very special tax rate as it is. It is an income tax rate of about 12.8 per cent which is substantially lower than the small business rate in the United States. That is important when we look at the competitive situation we have there. The U.S. rates are a lot higher.

Of course small businesses also qualify for the research and development credits which are as good or better than most of the G-7 nations and that is important. It is a 35 per cent refundable federal tax credit. That is important to small businesses.

As I mentioned earlier, small businesses have the opportunity of having capital gains exemption available and that is important.

We needed to add to that and we have by some of the areas I mentioned. But we are also going to give them the opportunity and incentive to hire. That is something which was passed on to me by the small business people. They said: "You want us to hire and train people. Then give us an incentive to do that". That would be helpful and important.

We have done that in this announcement. They will have a forgiveness on UI premiums. That is an incentive. That is on top of the training programs and the training incentives we have where we will be directing more money under this budget. That is important to small business.

There are programs where they not only would not be paying UI premiums as an incentive but also they will be able to bring people on and have their on the job training portion done under a training allowance and training moneys. That is important so that they can have them trained. They will be subsidized and then they will be able to take them on in a graduated way to work for them. That is certainly important.

I did mention the 10 per cent investment tax credit which was announced. That would be for buying and enhancing their businesses.

I just talked to a business person the other day. The business is a printing company doing specialized photography that is then used in printing brochures and that sort of thing. The cash flow was a little bit tight.

To make itself competitive and to gain business in the United States it needed the combination of a Small Businesses Loans Act, banking institutions that were more interested, and a finance minister who was certainly going to be having constant conversations with the Canadian Bankers Association.

On top of that, this company needed $10,000 to purchase a computerized system which would make the business 50 per cent more efficient. It needed the combination of a tax credit, which we are going to do now, and an opportunity of having money instantly made available to it that had not been forthcoming as readily as it will be when we change the Small Businesses Loans Act. The combination is there.

In the statement by our finance minister, the government is sending strong signals to members of the Canadian Bankers Association wanting them to be much more liberal with their moneys and their investments with small business.

I laud the finance minister for taking heed of the suggestions which have been made and for his interest in small businesses knowing that their growth will energize our country and make jobs. That is what people are looking for.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, I really must contain myself. My constituency office has been confronted with an onslaught of telephone calls from irate, angry constituents who are aware of the contents of this mini budget which I heard the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte moments ago describe as balanced.

If there is one thing that seems clear beyond all others, it is that this government seems to assume an economic rebound in the United States will likely have far more effect in Canada than any initiative taken here. It is curious to see the basis for that rebound in the United States.

I have in my hand Bill Clinton's campaign program. It is entitled "Putting People First". Now that is curious is it not? The United States which has been the symbol of neo-conservative politics and the model for this government has turned its back on the very ideology this government continues to pursue. What are the elements of that "Putting People First" initiative in the United States?

First of all, it is a kick-start investment in infrastructure not just to create empty jobs but to reconstruct the infrastructure for transportation, education, social programs, research and development and all of those things that will set the pattern for permanent growth later.

The second element of it is a vast investment in people, training, and education. It is an electronic highway that will not just go to educators and scientists in business and government but one which by the year 2015 will provide access to the kind of information that is necessary for education and technical information in every single household in the United States. Clearly it is an initiative that is intended to empower people in a new economy in ways which are most important in terms of education.

Third is a new partnership between government and private enterprise over the long term to invest in those innovative high technological initiatives necessary for the United States economy to thrive.

What do we have here? In this country the people come last. We adhere to the trickle down theory incurably. Let us put this in context. Bob Rae some years ago was a good deal more delicate. He asked the question: Have you been trickled on lately? It is clear. If we look in the dictionary, there is another word that would substitute for it. It is clear that the Canadian people are being pissed on now by this government.

An hon. member: Is that in the dictionary?

Mr. McCurdy: Yes, it is in the dictionary.

They are talking about balance. They are talking about sacrifice. What kind of sacrifices will those who are well-to-do going to make in all this? We have thousands of Canadians, millions of Canadians, lining up at food banks while business people are using taxpayers' money to have luxury lunches at noon hour.

We have cuts in the surcharges for the best paid people in this country. What are the poor going to get out of that? We have family trusts worth at least $70 billion that could yield anywhere from $2.5 billion to $5 billion in new tax revenue for this government. Is that going to happen? Is that going to be taxed? No, this government has introduced legislation to ensure that it will not be taxed.

The ordinary fellow, the ordinary man or woman, the ordinary family, is still paying the GST. We have the wealthy going to billion dollar tax havens in the Bahamas, but the little guy cannot escape paying his tax or her tax.

Talk about fairness and talk about balance. We have here an economic statement that in its viciousness toward the people is not even being matched now in the United States: $2.5 billion was taken out the pockets of the people who are unemployed and have been made unemployed by this government.

I have heard a lot of talk today about the cuts in unemployment insurance expenditures. Part of it is going to result from a decrease in the percentage of wages that go into unemployment insurance payments, from 60 per cent of wages to 57 per cent of wages. We have the sophistry on the other side of the Chamber that says that is not really a cut. That is a freeze. The people calling up my office every minute of the day see it as a cut. Then we have the other bit of sophistry.

We heard the hon. member over there saying that there was nothing new in the fact that people who leave their jobs voluntarily or are fired for just cause will lose their benefits altogether, that nothing has changed. I am saying what has changed. They are saying that they are going to have tribunals to make sure this is administered in accordance with due process. What kind of due process?

Suppose a woman quits because of sexual harassment. Suppose a minority member quits because of racism. Suppose somebody is fired because she is a woman and will not concede to sexual advance. What about a minority member who was fired because of colour or religious practices? Are these tribunals the minister is to have in place going to take care of it? Are they going to work faster than the Human Rights Commission? It takes two years to have any one of those kinds of complaints heard. It is outrageous it has even been suggested that it is possible for the Department of Employment and Immigration to be able to handle any such thing in that way.

What we have is a deliberate attack on those most affected by the actions of this government in destroying the Canadian economy and in destroying the social network in this country. They are going to get it again.

Where is the infrastructure investment that we expected? People come last. What about infrastructure to put them to work immediately? We have $500 million in expenditures over five years, $2 billion altogether including private investment. This is called an infrastructure investment program.

A close examination of where that money is going shows quite clearly that it is a pork-barrel program, as is the establishment of the immigration centre in Vegreville. Look at how much money is going into Alberta. When we see that the first thing that occurs to me is the Reform Party. If anything shines through this mini budget it is the Reform Party. In the future they are going to call themselves the progressive reform conservatives because that is what they are trying to do.

If there is one thing that is clear in putting people first it is that they must have income support when they are unemployed, and whether unemployed or in jobs that are going to change they must have training, and education must be available to every Canadian. We must have the research and development and the technology development that will permit our economy to compete in the internationalized, global, high valued-added economy that we confront.

The government talks about increases in R and D. It is going to add $250 million to research and development over five years. Oh, that is big news. Oh, that is going to make a big impression. What we have to understand is that in the meantime, in addition to all the other hits that the university system has taken, the government is now also going to cut the 4 per cent increase that it promised to the granting councils. What is the net result? The result is no further increase in investment in R and D.

My God, Madam Speaker, I know that if you could have had an opportunity to call my office and complain about this mini budget, surely you would have done so because you are a sensible person. The Canadian people are going to rise up in anger and throw these devils out. That is what they deserve. It is unconscionable what they have done to this country. It is unconscionable what they are doing now. They will come to account for their failure of conscience.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As a very sensible person, I would hope that while rereading the "blues" of this exposé in the House the hon. member, who does have a very extensive vocabulary at his disposal, might realize that there are many words which may be found in a dictionary that are not necessarily to be used as a parliamentarian. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Simcoe Centre.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak in today's debate on the future course of Canada's economic policy.

Hon. members heard the Minister of Finance give this House an update on Canada's economic and fiscal situation. He announced a number of measures to assist economic recovery and to invest in economic growth.

Since coming to office in 1984 the goal of the government's economic policies has always been greater economic security and opportunity for all Canadians. Complementary to this the government's economic plan has also been aimed at trying to improve our competitive position in the world. At the same time, the government has had to respond first to the effects of the rising debt of the 1970s and the spending excesses of the 1980s, and then to the emerging global economy and intense pressures to compete of the 1990s.

If Canada is to continue to grow and prosper Canada has to compete. It is that simple. The government has solid economic measures in place. For example, sound monetary and fiscal policies are in place. Markets have been opened up. Government has been streamlined. The tax system has been reformed and private sector initiative has been encouraged as the only solid basis for economic progress. However, more is required.

As a result of the fact that the world economy has not unfolded as the world expected there have been set-backs. Most of these set-backs have been beyond our control, such as the ongoing weakness of our trading partners.

The Minister of Finance stated, however, that the government is not prepared to sacrifice steady, responsible progress for quick fixes today that we will pay for tomorrow.

What the government is prepared to do is to continue to work to put in place the initiatives needed to ensure a sound fiscal structure and to address the issues of productivity and competitiveness.

On Wednesday the minister stressed the importance of productivity and investment in Canada's future. The key to greater competitiveness is greater productivity. The key to greater productivity is increasing investment in people, plant and technology.

Let me take a few moments to talk about the importance of investing in people. We must all remember that our people are our future. To be competitive Canada and its people must be capable of using capital efficiently and of developing and using new technologies.

Competitive firms in the global economy are demanding a more skilled and flexible work force. For Canada to attract investors we need skilled workers capable of adapting to a changing world environment.

As the minister said in his statement: "In a world where capital, information, goods and even services flow easily across national borders, a nation's competitive advantage is increasingly being found in the skills of its people".

Despite spending one of the highest shares of GDP in the industrialized economies on education Canada is still criticized for the results its educational system produces. Our high school drop-out rate is over 30 per cent. We still have Canadians who cannot read or handle figures well enough to meet everyday requirements. Our drop-out rate is such that 137,000 students leave the educational system each year ill-prepared to meet the challenges of our labour market, which increasingly needs well-educated and trainable workers.

Private sector spending in Canada on training and education is well below that of our major competitors.

In a recent study by the Conference Board of Canada almost three-quarters of the companies surveyed believed they had a significant problem with functional illiteracy somewhere in their organization. However, only 24 per cent of these companies had developed a policy to deal with this problem, even though it slowed the adoption of new technologies.

In the decades ahead older Canadians will make up a larger proportion of the labour force. Most of these people are in the labour force now and many are sure to need retraining or on-the-job training to meet the changing needs of Canadian firms.

In 1990, as part of the Labour Force Development Strategy, the government took action in skill development and training. Until that time, for example, Canada was funding passive income support programs while many of our major competitors were directing resources to active programs, such as apprenticeship and training programs.

The Canadian Labour Force Development Board was established to review and make recommendations on all labour market matters, including strategies for using unemployment insurance funds for training Canada's unemployed.

The direction of part of the unemployment insurance system was changed from passive income support to active skill-building support for the unemployed. We made it harder to qualify for UI benefits—especially for people who quit their jobs—and decreased the duration of some benefits. Most of the savings from these changes have been redirected into developmental programs which help retrain workers and upgrade skills.

The government is now proposing to build further on the Labour Force Development Strategy. We are increasing funds for active developmental purposes under the Unemployment Insurance Developmental Uses Fund from $1.95 billion to $2.2 billion in 1993. This fund invests in people by helping them to upgrade their skills.

This program is a real success story. This year 450,000 people will benefit from the program. This number will increase to more than 500,000 next year. The additional funds will be used to provide special services to workers who lose their jobs after a long-term attachment to the labour force.

To lay the foundation for a stronger training culture in this country we need the joint commitment of employers and workers to develop training strategies. To facilitate this, the government will make funding available to help create permanent skills councils in particular sectors of the economy. Priority will be placed on the important task of developing occupational standards so that training will be relevant to industry needs.

Government funding of $250 million over five years will be used strategically to lever a private sector-driven training effort. At the same time the government will develop tax incentives to help defray the costs of training workers, particularly to meet these occupational standards.

The provinces can also help by emphasizing retraining for those on social assistance who need new skills to get good jobs. The welfare reform experiments currently supported by the federal government and the Governments of New Brunswick and B.C., which provide earnings supplements to low income, one-earner families, are a first step in this direction.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, if I rise today it is certainly not to praise the economic statement made yesterday by the Minister of Finance. Unfortunately, the Conservative government, which claims to have been trying for eight years to lead this country to prosperity, seems to keep leading it to bankruptcy and for many straight to hell.

Unemployment is still on the rise and nothing seems to indicate that this trend will change soon. Of course, the government has an explanation. It always has an explanation: It is always the others' fault, or it is worse elsewhere. This is small consolation for the thousands of Canadians who are unemployed and see no change on the horizon. And what about the poverty level?

[English]

The people that the Conservatives are punishing with this economic statement are the ones who have lost their jobs because of the recession initiated, perpetuated and made worse by this government. It has lowered unemployment insurance benefits for those who really need it by 3 per cent. The unemployed have already paid for this government's economic mismanagement with their jobs. Now they are being bled a second time.

[Translation]

This government which takes unemployment insurance benefits away from those who lose their job because of misconduct is simply giving employers a very dangerous weapon. An employee could be fired for a silly thing, have no recourse and, more importantly, have no income, to the joy of some employers. The door is open to all kinds of abuse as well as to blackmail. An employee will no longer be able to complain about questionable behaviour for fear of being fired. Even if there is only one such case of abuse it will be one too many.

Canadians deserve more respect.

[English]

Instead of helping the unemployed with a social safety net the government is shoving them through the cracks.

The Conservatives are making it difficult for people who have been discriminated against in the work place. Victims of racism or sexual harassment might be reluctant to issue complaints for fear of being denied access to UI benefits. They have made it difficult to fight these serious problems.

Canada is still in the worst economic recession in 60 years. More than 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed and another 2.5 million live on welfare. Close to four million Canadians are existing below the poverty line. All this Minister of Finance can do is talk about increases in the trade balance with the United States, which incidentally cost us many thousands of jobs.

It is time to face reality. How in concrete terms will the proposals announced yesterday help the 600,000 people on social assistance in my province of Quebec get off welfare?

How will these proposals help 130,000 young Quebecers find the work they need for their future and the future of their province and their country? Simply repairing a few bridges in Montreal is certainly not the way to a brighter tomorrow.

[English]

My party has proposed a comprehensive infrastructure program that will create real jobs. The government expects to create under 5,000 jobs with the program it is proposing. In my riding, Saint-Laurent—Cartierville, we have already lost more than that number of jobs. This government hopes to create 5,000 jobs. I hope it is right, but that is half the number of jobs that is being cut at CN rail. The $500 million the government has promised to spend on infrastructure amounts to less than one quarter of the $2.4 billion it is taking from the unemployed and none of these funds will be spent on desperately needed local community projects.

As Liberals, we want to stimulate growth through policies that will create jobs and encourage the private sector to spend. By getting the economy moving again, people will be working and will be spending money in Canada. They will be paying taxes and that is what we need to get the deficit under control. The infrastructure program we recommended would stimulate even more spin-off jobs that will get Canada working again.

Liberals would use initiatives like those we proposed last January in the form of our five point emergency economic program to invest in people and in Canada. For us, the top priorities are growth and job creation. Canadians cannot afford inaction. Each unemployed Canadian costs the taxpayer nearly $15,000 in unemployment benefits and welfare and $7,000 in lost tax revenues. This year, because of the depth of the recession and the government's refusal to act, the deficit will be nearly $5 billion more than it projected. That is nearly 20 per cent more. All this government is doing is passing the buck to the provinces and municipalities.

This government also missed the opportunity to improve the status of race relations in this country. It could have taken the opportunity to announce the establishment of the Race Relations Foundation, something that all members of this House endorsed almost three years ago. It could have taken the opportunity to restore the Court Challenges Program. Thousands upon thousands of Canadians have urged this government over the past few months to reinstate real access to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This government could have shown its good faith by bringing back this integral program.

The rights of Canadians are not worth 10 cents per person to this government.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, what did this government decide to do? Well, as ridiculous as it may seem, it concluded that cutting funds was the best approach. You understood correctly: To appease the reformed Conservatives, the government cut its assistance to community groups by 10 per cent although these groups are essential in times of crisis.

Would it be a way to punish the groups that dared to question the government's bad policies? Who knows? And they tell us about justice and equity!

[English]

If this government was really serious about cutting back on government excess it should have scaled back military spending even more. It should ease up on all the polling contracts it gives to former Tory back-room boys. It should cancel the plan to move the immigration processing unit to Vegreville in the Minister of Finance's own riding.

Unfortunately this government's definition of cutting waste does not include refraining from the type of pork-barrelling and patronage it has grown accustomed to.

I do not want to seem overly negative. I do approve of the extension of the home buyers plan that we Liberals proposed in January. It will help thousands of people get into the housing market. I also support the proposal to increase funding under the industrial research program.

On the whole this government still does not get the message that people are hurting. People are without work throughout the country and they are looking to us to help them. We need to generate a fiscal environment that is favourable to the development of Canadian business and to the creation of jobs. This economic statement by the Minister of Finance continues the disastrous economic policies of the government that have led to millions unemployed and millions more on welfare. This economic statement does not address the real problem of the deficit. We cannot trust the economic projections of this government. Every single one of its projections over the past four years has been wrong.

• (1650)

It is high time for the government to be accountable. Canadians from all across the country can no longer put up with economic statements like the one presented yesterday and they never could.

The time has come and the government must call an election now, not tomorrow, so that it can face the consequences of what it has done.

The Canadian people need a leader and a party that have a vision for this country. Canadians need to be heard. They need a party that thinks of the country, its growth and the welfare of its people.

They do not want a party with a limited vision like the Bloc that sees only Quebec or the Reform Party that sees only the English-speaking community. Canadians do not want fragmentation but harmony in prosperity for everyone. That is what the Liberal Party wants and that is what the country needs.

[English]

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to stand today to make a few comments and to thank the hon. Minister of Finance for being courageous and honest with Canadians.

I think the time has come, not only in this House but across the country, to realize that we can no longer continue on the road of disaster and spend, spend, spend with no direction and no thought for the future.

I believe that Canadians are tired of hearing all kinds of promises of going back into the 1970s, the 1950s, and the 1940s, rather than dealing with the decade of the 1990s and into the 2000s.

As I stand here today I want to say that the move made by the finance minister in investing in people is the correct way. It is what we are looking at.

There is nobody who can say more than I can right now about the riding of Timiskaming in northern Ontario, a riding that has been hit in many directions in regard to resources, whether it is mining, forestry, agriculture or the fur industry. Over the last five years because of the changing direction, we have faced depleting resources, environmental pressures, you name it.

As I stand here today I am not by any means proud to see so many of my constituents who have lost jobs, but I want to say thank you to the Minister of Finance, the minister in charge of employment and immigration, and the minister in charge of FEDNOR. A little over a year and a half ago they saw a vision, an opportunity, a new direction that could start in Timiskaming. I am talking about a training centre. A lot of my constituents and many across this country always felt they would have a full-time job, that education and having a diploma was not really necessary, that their grandfathers, their fathers and themselves would be able to have full employment until they retired.

The riding of Timiskaming has faced it and faced it very severely.

With the support of the federal government we have training programs set up in adult educational centres. I am very proud to say today that over 200 individuals have had the opportunity to go back and start again, maybe as low as grade two. Somebody missing only three or four credits for a grade 12 education now has the opportunity, because of the foresight of this government, to obtain a diploma, to move forward into training on the apprenticeship side or return to college. Section 26 and the dollars that have been put forward by this government have given 50 individuals that opportunity. That is why I am so pleased to see the increase in those dollars. We are dealing with the individual problems of people.

We are not making this a charade whereby we are going to give dollars for painting fences, cutting grass or cutting trees. Those days are gone. It does not work. What we have to deal with is the problem, labour adjustment. That is what we are doing, whether we are looking at the contribution of $2.2 billion or a total package of $3.5 billion, whether we are looking at the set-up of a new opportunity for labour adjustment with both unions and companies working together for $500 million over the next five years, or whether we are going to start to train and to ensure that new technologies and opportunities to be competitive in a new marketplace are there for Canadians.

I do not see why individuals on the other side of the House do not realize that those are the moves we have to make. It is the vision of the finance minister and this government to ensure that these workers are going to have that opportunity.

I spent many years in small business. I say that there is one way we are going to stimulate the economy. It is through the small business side of it and the move that was made in yesterday's announcement of $250,000 being set aside now for loan guarantees. There is a sector out there that has got to wake up and start dealing with it in a manner to help individuals and to help small business. That is the banking system.

Government can do only so much. When banks are going to cut back with regard to the cash flow, there is nothing that a government can do. I know that with the move that was made in this statement yesterday, with the combination of the $250,000 in loan guarantees and capital cost that is going to be looked at, it is going to be very beneficial to small business.

In talking about small business, I should talk for a moment about FEDNOR. Earlier today there were comments made about the cutbacks in FEDNOR. We just renewed FEDNOR. The previous five-year program was $40 million and it created 3,000 jobs in northern Ontario. The renewal of FEDNOR came in at $60 million over the next five years. Yes, there has been a partial cut. Those cuts are across the board in all agencies and government departments. This leaves after the cut $52 million. That is an increase of $12 million from the previous program which will be there for programs for northern Ontario.

I believe that FEDNOR will continue to serve northern Ontario. I congratulate the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister because, prior to 1984, northern Ontario was lumped into one fund for Ontario. When applications were sent from Kirkland Lake, Sudbury or Thunder Bay, they had to go through the whole process of going through Toronto before coming to Ottawa to be looked after.

Under this government in 1984, we made certain that northern Ontario was recognized in the sense that we have a board made up of northern Ontario representatives from each riding in northern Ontario, a board which deals with the problems of northern Ontario in northern Ontario, not in southern Ontario or here in Ottawa.

That is what I believe is the correct way of doing it. That is why my good friend, the finance minister, in his statement yesterday was dealing with individual problems, ensuring that training for example is dealt with on an individual basis. That is how we are going to get this country working again.

I do not care how big government is. I do not care how big the bag of money is. Until we start dealing with the reality that Canadians have to be trained or retrained into a new society that is challenging the world, we cannot hide here in Ottawa, northern Ontario, or Vancouver and think that no matter what price it is, somebody is going to buy it. It does not work that way.

It does not work that way in regard to the quality. No one will buy a piece of goods if the quality is not there and if the price is not right. That is what this government is dealing with, the reality that there is a major adjustment taking place around the world.

We are not the only ones facing this. Every country is facing it. Every individual around the world is facing it, but we have a safety net here. That is what we do not hear from the other side of the House.

I was in Russia earlier this year. I saw a plant of 3,500 individuals that literally had no opportunity for any type of adjustment. I could go on for hours talking about the areas we are dealing with. It hurts me when I see somebody in my own riding not working, but if we deal with the fundamentals and ensure they have the opportunities for training and more education it is going to work well.

INTERNATIONAL LAW OF THE SEA

RATIFICATION OF CONVENTION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Caccia:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should, for the benefit of Canadian fisheries, urgently take the necessary steps to ratify the International Law of the Sea, and urge other nations to do so in order to reach the 60 signatures required for the Law of the Sea to come into force.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on this private members' motion which calls for the government to urgently take steps to ratify the 1982 United Nations Law of the Sea Convention, and urge other countries to do likewise so the 60 ratifications required for the convention's entry into force can be achieved. The reason given by the hon. member is this would benefit Canadian fisheries.

The fisheries provisions of the Law of the Sea Convention are among its most important provisions. Canada played a key role along with a number of other coastal states in developing the principles that underlie the 200-mile economic zone.

Through state practice all the coastal states now enjoy the benefits of their sovereign rights over all the fish stocks located 200 miles from their coasts. We have these benefits now even though Canada has not yet ratified the convention and it is not yet in force.

I would like to explain why Canadian ratification at this time would not provide an immediate benefit for our Canadian fisheries' interests, while continued active international action can. The 1982 United Nations Law of the Sea Convention was negotiated to be the definitive international legal instrument governing all uses of ocean space. It deals in a comprehensive way with all aspects of maritime jurisdiction, navigation rights, boundary delineation, exploration, exploitation of resources, environmental protection and conflict resolution.

With the longest coastline in the world and important ocean interests, Canada regards the convention as a major contribution to world security and the sustainable exploitation of ocean space. Canada was one of the most active participants in the negotiations of the convention, and benefits directly from many of its provisions in addition to those related to fishery.

Those benefits include the 12-mile territorial sea; the 200-mile exclusive economic zone including pollution prevention and control over scientific research; protection of Canadian salmon; sovereign rights over resources over the greater part of the continental shelf including sedentary living resources; enhanced jurisdiction for the protection of marine pollution, and especially special measures for Arctic waters. As many of these are widely considered to be demonstrative of customary international law, Canada already enjoys their provisions.

With all these benefits you can well ask why Canada and indeed the rest of the international community has not brought the Law of the Sea Convention into force.

Of the 159 signatories including Canada, why have only 52 of the required 60 countries ratified the convention? Of these 52 countries, why is Iceland the only industrialized country to have done so?

The answer lies in the problems industrialized states have with the convention's deep sea mining regime. It provides that the resources of the deep sea bed outside national jurisdiction under the high seas are the common heritage of mankind. Part of the proceeds from the mining of these resources are to be shared among all countries, especially developing states. This is one of the key elements of the package deal that comprised the Law of the Sea Convention and continues to be supported by Canada and most industrialized countries.

The basic objection, however, is since the 1970s we have come to realize seabed mining will not provide the economic benefits we once thought it would. Changed economic circumstances mean parts of the regime run up against market-oriented, commercial principles and the costs to be borne by the parties to the convention are unclear and potentially onerous. Like other industrialized countries and especially as a potential seabed mining state, Canada recognizes only an economically viable seabed mining regime can benefit the international community.

Furthermore, there are a number of costs related to the implementation of the convention seabed mining provisions, which would be quite onerous and at this stage unnecessary for state parties.

Should Canada ratify without the other industrialized countries we would end up shouldering the majority of these yet to be determined costs. It is a further possible financial consideration that in exchange for coastal state jurisdiction over the continental shelf outside 200 miles, the convention specifies a royalty be paid on mineral or hydrocarbon exploitation in that area. It has not yet been determined whether there are such resources on Canada's continental shelf outside the 200 miles.

You also ask what have we done to overcome these obstacles to the coming into force of a convention with so many obvious benefits to Canada. Canada has been playing a key role in consultations held under the auspices of the UN Secretary General, who is trying at the present time to solve the problems of the seabed mining regime that are preventing the universal acceptability of the convention.

We consider that both the future of the convention and Canadian interests are best served through a universally acceptable convention, rather than by pressuring a convention into force with outdated, unacceptable provisions.

The only thing that will give Canada more than it now has is a universally accepted convention. That is what we are after.

I not think we will have to wait very long for the results of our hard work. The Secretary-General's consultations have now entered their second phase and are showing great promise. There is a possible solution in sight in the next 12 months through proposed modifications to the seabed mining provisions.

The prudent course for Canada is to see the UN Secretary General's initiative through, before making a final decision on ratification.

In addition to the above reasons, as this House is aware, Canada has pursued an initiative at the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development to help resolve the problems caused by overfishing of straddling stocks off our east coast. The Rio summit has issued a call for a UN conference to put in place agreed rules for the management and conservation of these stocks. While these rules will build on the existing provisions of the convention, this exercise is independent of its entry into force.

Canada already enjoys a good part of the benefits that could be accorded through ratification. Many of the elements of the convention are generally considered to be demonstrative of customary international law by much of the international community. This is particularly true of the parts of the convention dealing with fisheries.

In short, given all these reasons it is better for the present to continue to pursue the resolution of high-seas fisheries problems through the multilateral conference we have succeeded in placing on the international agenda. Through our continued active bilateral and international efforts that are beginning to pay off, consideration of ratification of the Law of the Sea Convention should await the results of the Secretary-General's consultation.

Therefore, this private member's motion is not in the best interest of either Canadian fisheries or Canada's over-all objectives in the Law of the Sea Convention.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise in support of the motion of my colleague from Davenport that Canada should ratify the Law of the Sea. This convention, approved in late 1982, may be more important to Canada than to any other nation. We are a nation that defines itself by its relationship to the oceans. How often have we said over and over in this House "a nation from sea to sea to sea"? Yet, 10 years after the adoption of the convention on the Law of the Sea, Canada, as one of the countries that signed the convention, has still not ratified it. We have benefited from its provisions because other countries in the world are living by it, yet we have failed to take the step to commit ourselves to abide by it.

How we treat this convention becomes an even more important matter of principle now that we have signed two additional environmental conventions arising from the earth summit in Rio in June. We have signed two conventions on biodiversity and on climate change. Regrettably, to some extent, the public attention on those two issues, urgent and important as they are, has taken attention away from the state of our oceans and how important they are to the survival of life on this planet.

We agreed with Agenda 21 adopted at the UN earth summit in June. We have agreed with everything in there about protecting water bodies and the life in those bodies. We have agreed with their importance to humanity.

These issues and others are being increasingly recognized as areas where developed countries and developing countries have substantially different interests.

I have just returned from another follow-up conference of parliamentarians last week. We were looking very concretely at implementing the results of the earth summit in Rio. One strong issue is that the developing countries with so little and so much poverty feel we, the developed countries, the richest countries in the world are trying to put the burden of solving the environmental problems for the world on them when we have created the damage with our industrialization and consumerism.

It is ironic to look at the Law of the Sea Convention which Canada signed but has not yet ratified and note that, except for Iceland, the 53 countries that have ratified the Law of the Sea Convention and committed themselves to live by it are not the wealthy nations who are contaminating the soils, the air and the waters of the planet.

The seas of the world are vitally important to the survival of human life. This is not a matter we can put off for another decade. We know the dangers of contamination of coastal areas of the world and what that is doing to the oceans. We know its impact on food supplies for the developing countries particularly. Canadians have benefited from this. It has allowed us to extend our territorial zone. It has allowed us to claim 1.3 million additional square miles. It has allowed us to have more control over our straddling stocks and control foreign fishing on a greater area of Canada's coastline.

We are missing other benefits of the Law of the Sea that we should be enjoying. We are particularly missing the opportunity for Canada to be an important partner in protecting our ocean resources and everything they mean to our health and survival.

The prevention of marine pollution is a crucial issue. It is one that has not been dealt with yet. The disposal of radioactive waste at sea is one that has not been dealt with nor has the transportation of hazardous goods on our oceans.

All those are important reasons that Canada should sign this convention and should urge the additional six nations that are needed to do so to make sure that this convention comes into force and effect.

It would allow us to go further in the sustainable development of fishing stocks. I do not need to tell anybody in this House about the perilous condition of our northern cod and the terrible impact this first environmental crisis that this nation has had to deal with is having on hundreds of thousands of people's lives and what it is doing to poverty and unemployment among our fellow Canadians.

We need to be concerned about protecting other marine resources. We need to be concerned about ecologically sound fishing practices if we truly want to preserve the resources of the world, not only for this fishing season or the next fishing season, but also for the next generation and the generations to come.

At the preparatory conferences for the earth summit back in April, Canada with 40 other countries put forward wonderful words on the importance of preserving the oceans of the world. I have to ask myself why are we not ratifying a convention that was approved nearly a decade ago. Is it that we are better at rhetoric than we are at action? Certainly that is part of it.

We know that sustainable development means integrating our decisions about the economy, the environment and humanity. We often forget the third one but it is also part of the concept of sustainable development.

However, the main reason for not ratifying this seems to be economic sea mining interests that may or may not materialize 20 years from now. Meanwhile, we continue withholding our consent to a convention that is vital not only to us, but also to all nations of the world.

I look at the NAFTA and we have had more than one minister in the House talk about the protection that the NAFTA provides. The NAFTA provides environmental protection in areas where conventions have been ratified internationally and are in effect and therefore are binding on Mexico, Canada and the United States.

Here is one convention that could be covered under the NAFTA to protect the seas of the world and we are still refusing to sign it. The fact that conventions are covered in the NAFTA does not mean anything until we have ratified conventions.

Looking at the economic statement from yesterday, I note that we have cut grants and subsidies to environmental technology firms which receive grants for the development and demonstration of commercially viable environmental technologies. That does not make any sense when we have just had a report from the steering committee on prosperity that tells us our environmental technology is one of the major growth opportunities for Canada in the world.

We seem to have contradictory things here. We have statements in the House. We have statements on international platforms. We have statements in Brazil. However, we do not have the ratification of a convention.

The Minister of the Environment has indicated his intention to ratify by Order in Council before the end of this year the Rio conventions on biodiversity and climate change.

I ask him to give the world a good New Year's present and add the Law of the Sea convention to that parcel of conventions which are to be ratified.

• (1720)

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to outline for members of this House some of the other steps this government has taken to promote sustainable development of the ocean resources, including our activities within the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, or to use its acronym, NAFO.

Since declaring its 200-mile limit in 1977, Canada has controlled the management of fish stocks within that limit. Fisheries outside the Canadian 200-mile limit are managed by NAFO.

NAFO was successful in maintaining and rebuilding stocks until 1986 when Spain and Portugal joined the European Community and the European Community began overfishing.

Using a provision in the NAFO convention the EC began adopting its own quota for NAFO stocks. Between 1986 and 1991, the EC reported catches of straddling stocks were 420,000 tonnes above NAFO quotas. Moreover, vessels from several countries that are members of NAFO began to fish routinely in the NAFO areas despite having no quotas.

In 1990, however, the EC accepted eight of its ten NAFO quotas for 1991 but did not respect the NAFO moratorium on northern cod in division 3L. In 1991 the EC caught an estimated 49,000 tonnes of northern cod. In 1992 the EC again accepted eight of eleven NAFO decisions but maintained its objections to the EC moratorium on 3L cod.

The EC has taken important steps to control its fishery in 1992. However, an EC patrol vessel spent 10 months in the NAFO area. The EC passed regulations to close most of its fisheries in the NAFO regulatory area as the quotas were taken including, in the case of division 3L, cod.

At this year's meeting of NAFO in September all NAFO members, including the EC, unanimously adopted a ban on fishing of northern cod outside the 200-mile zone. The EC also took a major positive step by agreeing to all its NAFO quotas.

The EC ministers responsible for fisheries will decide this fall on revisions of the EC common fisheries policy which, if they are adopted as proposed by Commissioner Marin and effectively implemented, will constitute a major step toward effective control of EC fishing vessels in the northwest Atlantic.

Since 1989, we have pursued diplomatic, legal, environmental and public information activities working in every possible international forum to put an end to foreign overfishing. Our efforts are bearing fruit.

At the beginning of this year, for example, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced a stepped up Canadian campaign to save the northwest Atlantic fish stocks.

On January 10, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans spoke at a conference in London sponsored by the Royal Institute on International Affairs. He warned that time was running out for fishing communities that depend on fisheries resources on the high seas. He stated that tangible progress must be made in 1992. One week later, he delivered a similar message to industry and government representatives in Tokyo.

In April, the minister visited Panama and secured the agreement of the Panamanian government to take enforcement action against vessels under its registry, reflagged Spanish, Portuguese and Korean vessels, that fish contrary to NAFO conservation decisions.

The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have asked their counterparts in the Government of Korea for their co-operation to end fishing by their vessels in the northwest Atlantic.

The issue of overfishing was the leading item on the agenda when the Prime Minister met on April 23 with the President of the European Commission, Jacques Delors, and Prime Minister Silva of Portugal. President Delors made a number of commitments that helped set the tone for the positive developments that followed.

At Cancun in May an international fisheries conference adopted a resolution supporting many of the conservation principles Canada has been promoting.

Later that month the Organization of American States also adopted a resolution at Canada's instigation calling on the earth summit to convene an international conference on high seas fishing. As the members of this House know the 188 countries at the earth summit agreed to convene such a conference.

At Canada's request a special meeting of the NAFO Fisheries Commission was held in May on the need for more effective international control in the NAFO area through such measures as an observer program and minimum mesh size.

At its annual meeting in September NAFO did approve several new surveillance and control measures. A pilot project will begin in January 1993 to place observers on vessels from each contracting party for 10 per cent of fishing days.

NAFO also adopted measures to control harvesting of small fish including new minimum sizes for cod and flounder as well as a new minimum mesh size.

Other measures will improve the effectiveness of inspections at sea by patrol vessels from Canada and other NAFO contracting parties.

The public information campaign has also been in high gear. Teams of journalists from EC member states, notably Spain and Portugal, and from other NAFO member countries were invited to Newfoundland for briefing on the state of the stocks and on surveillance and control measures in place in the Canadian zone. They were able to see for themselves the impact of stock declines on Newfoundland communities.

In May, teams of union representatives and colleagues in this House travelled to Europe to register Canadian concerns and to seek co-operation. Support from Portuguese fishermen was particularly striking. Efforts of other non-governmental organizations and churches were also supportive.

These are some of the ways we are working to end foreign overfishing on the high seas. We are using every available avenue open to us within international law and diplomacy to bring about an effective solution.

The best news is that we are making progress and I hope we will keep on.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, as a student of agriculture at the University of British Columbia between 1946 and 1949, I was told by one professor after another of the importance of saving agricultural land in the province of British Columbia.

I was told that 3.5 per cent of the province was arable and we were rapidly losing the best of that land to other uses. It was being paved for parking lots, for roads. It was being built on for shopping centres, houses, all kinds of buildings. Anybody who wanted a piece of land looked first to the agricultural land because it was the easiest to develop.

I became Minister of Agriculture in September 1972 and within six months I introduced legislation to save agricultural land.

That legislation attracted so much attention that the Tories in the legislature at that time—and there were some—went so far as to move a want of confidence against the Minister of Agriculture for daring to bring in that kind of legislation. The Liberals opposed it just as loudly and just as forcefully. The Socreds opposed it. None of them proposed anything but they all said we were moving too quickly.

I did not think we were moving quickly enough. I had waited 24 years, from 1949 until 1973, to introduce that legislation and in the meantime some half a million acres of the best land for food production in the province, some of it the best land in the world, had been lost to agriculture. We had not moved quickly enough.

I was reminded of that this evening when the hon. member for Delta on behalf of the government said: "We are making progress so let us not ratify right now. Let us continue the progress we have been making all this time and some day we will get to ratification".

The Law of the Sea Convention was approved 10 years ago and all we can talk about is making progress. Ten years. Fifty-two nations have signed as ratifying it. We need eight more. We do not have any of the major sea-faring nations. We do not have Canada. We do not have the U.S. We do not have Great Britain. We do not have Germany. But we do have 52 and we need eight more.

If one nation, one among the ones I have named, had the intestinal fortitude to ratify that treaty, then perhaps others would come on board and we would be getting somewhere other than simply making progress.

At the rate we are making progress what is going to happen? We have already, dare I say, lost the North Atlantic cod fishery. Some will say: "No, we have a two-year moratorium". It takes six years for a cod to become mature enough to start reproducing. It is a two-year moratorium, but it is two years because it is saleable right now. If that moratorium is to achieve any useful purpose, and we do not know that it will, we do not know that there is still time for the species to survive, it is not going to last two years. It is going to be more like 10 years before we can start fishing cod again.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has said that the salmon are in good shape on the west coast, that there is no problem there. We know that the salmon on the west coast are being pirated. We know that the steelhead are being pirated and we do not have control. We do not have the control that was offered to us in the Law of the Sea Convention. One of the reasons we do not have it is that the convention has yet to be ratified. It is in our hands. We are responsible as is every other nation.

The previous speaker said that we like to talk about our three seas, about being bounded by oceans on the east, on the west and on the north. We have more oceanic coastline than any other nation in the world. It is more important to us than to any other nation. Certainly, there are problems. There are discussions that have yet to take place, agreements that have to be reached. We know that mining the seabed is one of them.

There is no reason on earth that we could not go on talking about things like that after we have ratified the treaty. That need not be the end of it. There can be changes. There can be new looks at it to improve it in many ways. That can still go on. There is some pressure on people to come to agreements earlier once we have ratified the treaty.

The Secretary-General, as another government spokesman has said, has been making progress. We know that and we appreciate the progress that has been made. For example, the United States which had been opposing the ratification, voting against it, finally abstained at the UN meeting last year. That is progress. It is sort of half way. All they have to do is make one more step and the U.S. will be ratifying the treaty. For it to ratify the treaty ahead of us would put us to shame. We have more at stake, more to lose, and more need of it, yet we are not prepared to lead the nations that need to be led to sign this treaty.

It is not just the cod on the east coast. It is not just the straddling stocks. One speaker said we had made progress with respect to the straddling stocks. The only progress we have made is that we have persuaded other nations that they too must refrain from fishing cod for a period until we can tell what will happen, until we know whether the stocks will recover in a reasonable length of time. We do not know that yet. We are still hoping. At least we are going to give the remaining survivors, to the extent that there are survivors, an opportunity to try to recover the species. That is happening.

On the west coast the problem is not as obvious or serious yet. However, only two years ago we did not know how serious the situation was with respect to the Atlantic cod. I can recall the then Minister for International Trade, now the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, saying that he was not going to agree to a drastic reduction in quota, a reduction recommended by the experts, by Professor Harris. He was not prepared to agree to a quota of 120,000 tonnes a year because it would be hard on the people working in the industry—the fishing people, the processing people, the companies. It would be hard on all of them.

I argued at the time that we should accept short-term pain for long-term gain but his position was firm. He was not going to agree to the quota being set where the experts said it should be set. He would rather gamble on the future.

As a result of his gambling there is now a two-year moratorium on fishing cod in extensive areas and a further moratorium being considered. Now the same person, which gives me very little confidence, tells us that the west coast salmon are not in trouble.

We are going to hear more about that on Monday. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said that he would have a press conference on the west coast on Monday.

He will be talking about an inquiry that was made about the alleged disappearance of 1.2 million sockeye that came into the river but did not arrive at the spawning grounds. Nobody was supposed to be fishing them in between except by permit and a fixed number but the fish did not get to the spawning ground. We have been trying to rebuild the Stuart Lake run for 16 years and have made real progress. Those fish came into the mouth of the Fraser River but they did not get up to Stuart Lake. This is the minister who reassures us and says that everything is okay.

It is the same with the Law of the Sea Convention. We need not hurry. We can take our time. Let us keep trying to get agreement on mining the seabed.

We all know there are substantial resources there. Whether they are economic or not we do not know. We do not know how to share the proceeds or the costs. These are all issues with which we can deal after we have ratified the treaty. There is nothing so binding in it that it cannot be changed. There is nothing that cannot be negotiated further and nothing that cannot be improved if we are confident that we are going to make improvements.

Let us get on with Canadian ratification of the Law of the Sea Convention because that will lead others to do it. I believe that with a Canadian lead we will get the 60 we need and then we will start saving some of the species we are in danger of losing on both the west and east coasts and the Arctic coast as well. Let us move forward.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to join this debate on the Law of the Sea and address it from the problem of overfishing on the high seas and the Canadian legal initiative that responds to this crisis.

This is a global problem that has a severe impact on fisheries subject to the jurisdiction of coastal states through the harvesting of both straddling and highly migratory stocks on the high seas.

Although the overfishing of straddling stocks on the high seas has caused particular concern to Canada, this cannot be dismissed as merely a local problem. It is world-wide. It affects groundfish stocks like hake in the southwest Atlantic on Argentina's Patagonian Shelf, the orange roughy stocks on the Challenger Plateau off New Zealand, the blue whiting and jack mackerel in the east central and southeast Pacific off Chile and Peru, and the pollock in the so-called donut hole in the central Bering Sea between Russia and the United States and the pollock in the so-called peanut hole in the centre of the Sea of Okhotsk off Russia's Pacific coast.

The problem of overfishing on the high seas is increasingly being recognized by the international community as an important environmental issue that threatens ecological disaster, both on the high seas and in waters subject to national jurisdiction.

For example, the 1987 report of the World Commission on Environment and Development warned of the threat to living marine resources posed by over-exploitation, pollution and land-based development.

More recently, in 1991, the heads of government of the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Japan, Italy and Canada met in London as the G-7, and at Canada's insistence issued a declaration urging compliance with the regimes established by regional fisheries organizations through effective monitoring and enforcement measures.

In a report that was released in 1991 the Secretary-General of the United Nations underlined in eloquent terms the dimension of the problem of overfishing by distant water fishing fleets. I quote from that report:

> The elaboration of the Law of the Sea regime for the rational management and conservation of high seas living resources is now firmly inscribed in the international agenda. While this may be in large part attributable to the large-scale drift-net fishing issue, it is to be emphasized that this issue is but one symptom of the larger problems confronting world fisheries, within national jurisdiction and beyond. Another symptom is the report of problems of overfishing by distant water fishing fleets in the proximity of EEZs.

Again, in a report issued last May, entitled World Fisheries Situation, the United Nations Food and Agricultural Organization said:

> Legal aspects of high seas fishing are not addressed comprehensively in the Law of the Sea Convention and where high seas fishing issues are concerned there is a general lack of clarity with respect to important matters such as enforcement of conservation and management measures. There is a pressing need for these issues to be considered further and conceptually developed so that a framework for international management of high seas fisheries might be agreed.

• (1740)

The United Nations General Assembly took up this issue for the first time in 1989 when, in response to the problem of overfishing in the northwest Atlantic outside Canada's 200-mile limit, it expressed concern regarding the use of fishing methods and practices on the high seas that could have an adverse impact on the conservation and management of the living resources of the marine environment.

The concern was elaborated on by the General Assembly in a resolution adopted in 1990.

Canada and like-minded countries built on these resolutions at the 1991 session of the General Assembly. As a result of these efforts the General Assembly adopted a resolution that:

(1) criticized fishing methods and practices, such as vessel reflagging and inadequate surveillance, control and enforcement, aimed at evading the regulation and control of high seas fishing;

(2) recognized that the measures now in place to conserve and manage the living resources of the high seas are not effective and that they do not adequately implement the provisions of the Law of the Sea Convention;

(3) called on states to prohibit fishing methods and practices which can have an adverse impact on the conservation and management of the living resources of the high seas, and to take the measures required to give full effect to the applicable provisions of the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention; and

(4) called on states to comply with the regimes established by regional fisheries organizations through effective monitoring and enforcement measures.

It is against this background of developing international concern with respect to problems caused by overfishing by distant water fleets that Canada launched its legal initiative to resolve the problem of overfishing on the high seas.

The Canadian initiative sought to develop specific principles and measures consistent with the Law of the Sea Convention with a view to giving full implementation to the provisions of that convention, strengthening regional organizations and ensuring the recognition of the special interest of coastal states with respect to straddling stocks.

This would provide an effective legal regime governing activities on the high seas.

The first steps in the elaboration of the principles and measures were taken at a conference held in St. John's, Newfoundland in September 1990. The conference recognized the need for such measures and agreed on a set of conclusions reflecting an increasingly shared view on how the rules of international law should be interpreted and applied.

This document was further developed at a meeting of Latin American states, New Zealand and Canada in May in Santiago, Chile. The document, dubbed "the Santiago paper", set the guidelines for participation by Canada and like-minded states at three major international conferences in the first half of 1992. The first was the International Conference on Responsible Fishing, held in Cancun, Mexico in May. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans led that Canadian delegation.

At the urging of Canada and like-minded countries, the 66 participants at Cancun declared that:

(1) states should co-operate on bilateral, regional and multilateral levels to establish, reinforce and implement effective means and mechanisms to ensure responsible fishing on the high seas, in accordance with relevant provisions of the Law of the Sea Convention;

(2) the freedom of states to fish on the high seas must be balanced with the obligation to co-operate with other states to ensure conservation and rational management of living resources, in accordance with relevant provisions of the Law of the Sea Convention; and

(3) states should take effective action, consistent with international law, to deter reflagging of vessels as a means of avoiding compliance with applicable conservation and management rules for fishing activities on the high seas.

Also in May, the Organization of American States met and unanimously adopted a strong resolution on the protection of fisheries. The Secretary of State for External Affairs led that Canadian delegation. The resolution expressed alarm at the environmental degradation caused by overfishing on the high seas, particularly in the waters adjacent to the areas subject to the national jurisdiction of American states.

It also for the first time supported the convening, on an urgent basis, of an inter-governmental conference, under the auspices of the United Nations, following the Rio summit to deal with high seas fishing problems through the effective conservation and management of high seas fish stocks. The most important conference that took place in this period was the UN Conference on the Environment and Development convened in Rio de Janeiro at the head of government level at the beginning of June. The Prime Minister led the Canadian delegation and made the management of straddling stocks on the high seas a priority.

The conference adopted a number of measures of great importance to Canada. One could go on and list several of these but my time is running out. I should conclude by saying that Canada intends to work closely with like-minded states to ensure that the conference adopts rules to protect straddling and highly migratory stocks from being harmed by overfishing on the high seas.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has already announced that representatives of like-minded states will be invited to meet in St. John's in January to review developments and co-ordinate strategy. We are determined to bring overfishing of straddling stocks off Canada's 200-mile zone to an end and to do so quickly.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak to the most important motion put forward by my colleague from Davenport. He has for a long time demonstrated his total commitment to the environment. I am sure he would join with me in expressing our disappointment upon hearing the news yesterday that the government in its economic statement had cut $172 million from its much touted green plan. That is the third cut for a total of 10 per cent in cuts since the plan was unveiled two years ago, further noting that less than one-third of the money the government promised for the green plan will probably not even get spent before the next election anyway.

I am here to speak to my colleague's motion which simply states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should, for the benefit of Canadian fisheries, urgently take the necessary steps to ratify the International Law of the Sea, and urge other nations to do so in order to reach the 60 signatories required for the Law of the Sea to come into force.

In 1982, after 15 years of global negotiations, Canada signed the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. This is quite a unique document of immense scope. It has been described as the constitution of the oceans which encompass over 70 per cent of our planet.

One expert has written that the convention goes further than most national constitutions or even the UN charter in the elaboration of rules, the development of regimes and the creation of institutions, guidelines and procedures. In short, the convention represents the indispensable legal framework for almost all future activities at sea.

The convention principles are the foundation of essentially every international coastal boundary dispute. Canada has greatly benefited both directly and indirectly in many ways from this convention. For example there is now a 12-mile territorial zone around our coast. The 200-mile limit gives Canada the right to declare sovereignty over 1.3 million square nautical miles off our coast.

Canada now has the right to regulate fisheries in the exclusive economic zone by deciding the total catch permitted. Article 66 of the convention protects Canada's salmon stocks. Articles 63 and 64 of the Law of the Sea convention address the issues of management and conservation of straddling stocks and migratory species.

The convention strengthens Canadian jurisdiction for the prevention of marine pollution and also special provisions for Arctic waters. The convention sets a precedent for international conventions by seeking to protect our environment and by promoting sustainable development of fisheries, fishery stocks and other marine resources. The convention also gives Canada control over fishing, oil and mineral exploration as a result of the convention.

Ratifying the convention would further enhance Canada's right to protect and conserve fish species. The Halifax Chronicle Herald has written that the convention has served the Atlantic provinces well. It would serve it even better if this government finally ratified the convention.

I think the most frustrating thing about this whole issue is that Canada signed the convention but has refused to take the second step and ratify it. Instead the government has chosen not to do so and in avoiding its responsibility is compromising Canada's international credibility.

The question that obviously arises is: why is the Conservative government afraid to ratify the Law of the Sea? The answer is hard for me to find. Ratification of this convention would certainly help Canada. It would ensure the high seas fisheries would follow ecologically sound practices, including the use of drift-net catching practices. We know what this has done off the coast of Newfoundland.

It would certainly strengthen the maintenance of ecological marine systems in the oceans. It would complete the protection of fish stocks within the 200-mile exclusive economic zone. It would furnish the signatories with a relevant mechanism to implement these laws at the earliest possible opportunity.

It would also provide impetus for the implementation of the recommendations of the Harris report which include: "The management of all fish stocks indigenous to the Canadian Continental Shelf and that extend beyond the 200-mile limit and the right of Canada to deny authorization for foreign fishing fleets to fish within its exclusive economic zone".

The benefits are numerous, yet this government continues to avoid ratifying the accord for reasons that are very difficult for me to understand. I understand that a number of international and Canadian mining corporate interests have lobbied this government not to ratify the convention until revisions are made to the seabed mining provisions. As my colleague from Davenport has said in this House: "There is a public interest at stake that is much broader and much deeper and much more consequential in the long term than that of the mining industry and that of the private sector. There is a public interest at stake here".

It is unfortunate that this government has been more concerned with addressing these remote concerns than with the concerns of the fishermen, the environment and the long-term viability of the communities affected.

The Convention on the Law of the Sea must be ratified; 53 countries have thus far ratified it. A total of 60 are needed in order for the convention to be put into effect. Canada should become one of those seven countries. This is a vital convention and we cannot afford to wait around for it any longer. We have been waiting long enough. This government should do the right thing and ratify the Law of the Sea.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to have an opportunity to speak to my colleague's private member's motion which is asking the Canadian government to ratify the international Law of the Sea immediately. There has been an urgent need for ratification of this important international instrument for 10 years now. It is very worrisome to hear this government constantly speak the words, have the rhetoric, but not follow through with the action that is required.

I would like to take a few quotes from our Prime Minister's speech at the earth summit in Rio de Janeiro in Brazil in June of this year. He referred to Canada and said:

> We are the custodians of 20 per cent of the world's fresh water. And we are the guardians of the longest coastline in the world.

The international Law of the Sea would protect not only this longest coastline in the world. It would be in the interest of not only Canada to ratify this convention. There are many many other maritime nations in the world, third world nations I am thinking of in particular, that would derive great benefit from the ratification of the Law of the Sea.

As my colleague said just before me, we are pausing, wondering why it is that this government will not carry forward with immediate ratification. In my estimation there is no excuse for waiting to see if something better might come along that we might sign. It really does appear that our government has been far too influenced once again by national and international corporate interests that at the expense of the common good of all of us—and I think particularly of our thousands of unemployed fishermen in this country at the moment—would have their own interests in the mining of the seabed put first.

Our Prime Minister in Rio went on to say:

> For Canada, sustainable development is not a slogan; it is a prerequisite of our prosperity and a safeguard of our identity. It is also the standard of our responsibility to humanity.

The fishermen on the east coast of this great country of Canada, the best country in the world, would wonder by this government not ratifying this convention now what its responsibility is to them as humanity. I once again remind the House that it is very important for a lot of other humanity in this world for which we should take some responsibility.

The Prime Minister went on to say:

> Canada also supports the strengthening of international environmental law to prevent overfishing on the high seas. In Atlantic Canada overfishing beyond our 200-mile zone has created an ecological crisis. This is why for Canada a global agreement to prevent overfishing is quite simply crucial.

Those are the words of our Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has the power and the responsibility to ratify this international Law of the Sea and yet does not do so.

Just yesterday this government's Economic and Fiscal Statement opened with comments from our Minister of Finance to the effect that he wanted members of the opposition to have a full discussion of his statement. He wanted any suggestions possible to come from the opposition as to what we might do. We have just very recently suggested that the government take measures to close the loopholes whereby enormous amounts of revenue are slipping out of the Canadian government coffers, according to the Auditor General's report.

We on this side have been pressing for months for municipal infrastructure development projects to create jobs. It would not cost the government anything to ratify the convention on the Law of the Sea. It would be good for our fish stocks and our maritime communities that derive their living from the oceans. Because we have not had the international legal instrument to protect our fish stocks and our fishing industry in this country, thousands of direct jobs have been lost in the Atlantic provinces due to the deletion of the cod stocks, to say nothing of the thousands more of indirect job losses which are crippling our maritime regions.

I believe many other species are endangered that could be protected by ratification of the Law of the Sea. Important initiatives can be carried through.

Why is ratification important? I believe ratification is important because it puts into the hands of the global community an instrument which authorizes international monitoring and a reaction to illegal measures that are pursued by national or private interests.

The Secretary-General of the United Nations has put forward what is called an agenda for peace in which he talks about ways that we can bring about a better world with more peace and security for all. He suggests that one of the measures that must be looked at in that context is an improvement of our international court. We must have an international court that has increased international legitimacy and a mandate that must be strengthened.

Although at this moment we do not have an international court that has the full support we would want, I do not believe that is any excuse not to go forward with the ratification of this convention at this time. This convention would bring about many advantages to Canada, none the least would be that the Law of the Sea convention maintains Canada's right to complete sovereignty over our northwest passage, something that is very important to all Canadians.

Finally, the convention represents a precedent setting international convention which seeks to protect our environment and which promotes sustainable development of fisheries, fisheries stocks and other marine resources not only for Canada but for maritime nations around the world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

• (1800)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

KEMANO PROJECT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter into a very brief debate tonight.

On November 27 I asked the Minister of the Environment a very important question on the controversial Alcan Kemano project in northern British Columbia in my riding. It related directly to a number of documents that have seen the light of day related to this project. They indicated that at the time this whole project was being reviewed by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, there was considerable controversy within the department. The department's own scientists then were questioning the senior staff within the department and indeed the political direction of the department to allow the project to proceed without a full environmental review.

Included in those documents, among other things, was one particular memorandum from a public employee that suggested he had been asked by his superiors to change his expert witness testimony at a time when this particular case was proceeding to court.

It has been very clear over the number of years that this issue has been discussed in public that there is a clear mood in northern British Columbia and, indeed, throughout the province to have a full public environmental review of this project, not to speak of all the excellent work of community groups in my riding in communities like Fort Fraser, Fraser Lake, Vanderhoof, Prince George and other areas. I think there is an obligation on the part of the government to have a full review. The point in my question to the minister that day is that we have learned from the department's own freedom of information officer that there are some 83,000 pages of information on this project which the department refuses to release.

We have been advised by officials in the department in Ottawa that where the proponent, the Alcan Aluminum Company, has provided information to the government that the company has instructed the government not to release any of the documentation.

I say to the Government of Canada, why not release these documents. If the project is so good, why can it not stand on its own feet and have the public information available to people.

I also pursued the question with the minister at the same time, knowing that in British Columbia the new government there thankfully has taken a different approach on this issue. The Minister of the Environment of B.C. will be releasing all of the documents that the B.C. government has produced on this over time and we will get a chance to see the involvement of the Social Credit government of the day. The settlement agreement, as it is called, that governs the flow in this river was signed in secret in 1987. I called on the Minister of the Environment to approach the minister in British Columbia to have a full joint review of this project. Tonight I hope that the person responding from the government side will encourage the minister to do just that. Let us have a full public review of the Kemano project.

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the government has acted responsibly in this review of the Kemano Completion Project. The 1987 settlement agreement reached between the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, British Columbia and Alcan provided fisheries protection through mitigation requirements for the Nechako River system, and furthermore removed the pristine Nanika River from further development by Alcan.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans conducted considerable analysis of the potential impacts of the proposed Kemano Completion Project to determine protection requirements for fish and fish habitat and also undertook public consultation in 1984.

An out of court settlement agreement was reached with British Columbia and Alcan in 1987 after an independent review panel chaired by Dr. David Strangway, the then president of the University of British Columbia, advised that fisheries experts agreed that the potentially negative impacts on fisheries from the Kemano Completion Project could be mitigated.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans applied the principles of its policy for the management of fish habitat, providing for no net loss of fish habitat and responsible resource management. The agreement formalized the release of flows to protect fisheries, and required Alcan to provide measures to mitigate the potential impacts on fish and fish habitat, thus securing longer term protection for the fish stocks.

In summary, the settlement agreement was entered into with extensive consideration for potential impacts on fisheries and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans took the appropriate steps to ensure the necessary protection for fish and fish habitat.

SMALL BUSINESS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, tonight I want to introduce you to four small business people from Toronto. There is Jim Frangos, who is a fur coat manufacturer, Nick Piras who is a restaurateur, Will Molson and Susan Bellan, who are retailers.

What do they all have in common? They are all being forced out of business because they cannot get a bank loan. Jim Frangos, the fur coat manufacturer, has been in business for many years. He built up a good business. He has borrowed money from the banks over the years numerous times, and always paid his bills. Right now the banks will not lend him any money. He is in peril of losing his home and in peril of losing his business.

Fur coats, however, are actually selling again. It is interesting to note that right now Canadian furs are being shipped to Greece. They are manufacturing fur coats in Greece and shipping them back to Canada to sell here and elsewhere around the world. There are all sorts of fur coats being sold, but the banks will not lend a fur coat manufacturer in Canada any money to stay in business.

Nick Piras, a restaurateur, has a fine high-class restaurant in Toronto. He has been in business for many years. He has built up a good business. He has borrowed money from the banks. Again, he has never missed a payment, but the banks will not lend him any money. I have a letter from his banker right here which states: "Dear Nick: This is to confirm that the bank is not prepared to provide additional financing for your business".

Will Molson and Susan Bellan, who are retailers, have been in business for 12 years now. They borrowed money in the past. They have never missed a payment and they cannot get a bank loan.

A few years ago it was an entirely different story. One could go into a bank and ask for a loan and they would say: "How much?" In fact, if one asked for a certain amount of money they would say: "Won't you take some more?" Not any more.

Mr. Speaker, as you know and I know, the story is entirely different. A small business person cannot get a bank loan. In fact, I have been told that the banks, all of them, want to clear off their books about 25 per cent of bank loans that are outstanding.

We know that the Minister of State for Small Businesses and the Minister of Finance are most sympathetic with this situation. They have been trying to help. In fact, in the February budget there were some things for small business in it. In the economic and fiscal statement yesterday there were some things for small business. The legislation to implement those things that were in the budget last February still has not been passed. In fact, we had a debate on second reading of a bill a few days ago. Still we do not have this legislation through.

The banks themselves are not being outstanding either. We know the Minister of State for Small Businesses has met with them numerous times and pleaded with them to do something. Yesterday the Minister of Finance in his statement stated: "I am serving notice to Canada's banks that I expect them to make a special effort to play a constructive role in ensuring the success of this program". Those are great words, but there still is not any action.

Jim Frangos just cannot wait. Nick Piras cannot wait. Will Molson and Susan Bellan cannot wait and thousands of other small business people cannot wait.

I want to ask the minister tonight just what am I going to tell them.

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I hope you will give me the chance to respond because there is much good news in the highlights of the Minister of Finance's economic statement given yesterday in the House.

A significant part of the statement by the Minister of Finance was devoted to small business and to new and improved ways of helping this very important sector of our Canadian economy. I would like to highlight a few of them.

The Small Businesses Loans Act program which assists small business in obtaining access to financing will be made even more effective by the increase in maximum loan size to $250,000. This higher limit will permit larger program loans for all eligible businesses, including firms investing in technology, to improve their competitiveness. A number of other improvements are being made to the program and these will be made public tomorrow when the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism tables a bill to amend the act.

As indicated in the economic statement, the government is also working to broaden the implication of the program to include some forms of working capital loans. The Small Business Financing Program, aimed at helping financially troubled businesses lower their cost of debt, is being extended to December 31, 1994.

The revitalization of our manufacturing industry is of a high priority and this process will be helped by the introduction of an investment tax credit on the purchase of machinery and equipment. This two-year program will lower cost and promote investment in modernization and technology. Large amounts of capital from Canadians in all walks of life are presently held in RRSPs and RRIFs. In order to direct some of these funds to investment in small businesses the rules for self-directed RRSPs and RRIFs are being simplified together with the reporting requirements of trustees of these types of plans. The simplified regulations should result in an increased flow of capital to small businesses which is what the hon. member is looking for.

The statement gives recognition to the importance of technology today by improving and simplifying R and D rules for small businesses. These will eliminate confusion and uncertainty among business persons and allow them to proceed with projects knowing that their expenditures do indeed qualify for tax credits and other benefits.

We will be mentioning in passing other initiatives in the economic statement designed to help small business continue in its vital role, improvements to the industrial research program, a reduction of the regulatory burden and a holiday from unemployment insurance premiums for new employees of small businesses.

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I am here concerning my question of May 22 of this year regarding the Westray mine.

I asked the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism about the safety of this mine and all we got were vague generalities. I want to know, and the people of Nova Scotia and Canada want to know, about the role of the government, particularly his and that of the Prime Minister regarding the safety of this mine.

In his response to my supplementary: "What the Prime Minister was talking about is that this is over all an economic or business decision for the Government of Canada and not a safety decision; in fact, the Devco report of 1987 emphasized almost entirely nothing but business questions. That is what he was talking about".

The Devco report did relate to safety decisions. The government supposedly, with the statements of the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, had independent inquiries coming from experts on the safety of the Westray mine. The fact is that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources was concerned with safety.

The problem is that nothing was acted upon regarding safety. In fact the minister of energy would not even answer a question in this House that was put to him on the question of safety.

The fact of the matter is that we in Atlantic Canada are in a desperate economic situation but not desperate enough to forego the safety factors on job opportunities. The people of Pictou county are no exception. The people want to work. It is not a question, as my colleague from Cape Breton—East Richmond and I have stated, of Cape Bretoners feeling that Pictou county coal was going to be a competition. The question is the safety of people.

In fact in Cape Breton right now we have had a very serious problem with regard to flooding of the Lingan mine, to the extent that the Lingan mine has now been closed four months ahead of schedule. It has also put at risk the Lingan–Phalen mine which employs another 700 people and is the sole source right now of metallurgical coal that is blended with the higher sulphur coal that gives the Cape Breton Development Corporation coal its readily accessible markets.

The problem, of course, is if we lose the Lingan–Phalen mine, then Devco and industrial Cape Breton is in even more of a difficult situation.

The fact of the matter is management at Devco closed Lingan–Phalen until they could be absolutely sure there was not going to be any flooding. That will be closed for months and it will mean severe economic hardship. The fact is the safety of the people came first.

We want to know what safety factors were not considered by this government. We want to know what fell down, who fell down, in this regard. It is not a big question. We want some answers and the fact is we are not getting them. The most incredible thing relating to the inquiry set up by the province of Nova Scotia into this terrible disaster was that the wording of the inquiry was found to contravene the rights of the officers of the Curragh Resources to be able to get a fair hearing in a criminal action.

It is almost impossible to believe that the province of Nova Scotia, the Attorney General, the whole Department of the Attorney General, would not know how to word an inquiry so it would not run foul of that concern, particularly when it had the precedent from Ontario just a few years before. There is a lot of skulduggery here. We were not allowed to have this heard in the standing committee on industry. The families are agonizing over unanswered questions and I feel it is only fair that the government do more to provide those answers.

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity today to clear up the hon. member's confusion surrounding the reports of the independent mining consultants regarding the development of the Westray mine.

As the responsible minister said in this House on many occasions, reputable independent mining consultants were engaged by the lender to ensure that the mine was in compliance with provincial regulations. As guarantor of the loan to Westray, we reviewed these reports in order to ensure that the interests of the Canadian taxpayer were safeguarded.

According to the report submitted by Associated Mining Consultants Incorporated, at no time was the Westray mine not in full compliance with the regulations governing mining operations in the province of Nova Scotia.

The government has released thousands of pages of documentation relating to this file and has answered fully literally dozens of questions in the House in this regard. Given this fact, it is understandable that the hon. member might have misunderstood various responses to certain questions, but I can assure him that at no time did the government offer conflicting information as indicated by the hon. member in his question of May 22, 1992.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on June 8 I asked the Minister of Justice to extend the mandate of the Canadian Human Rights Commission in order to enforce employment equity under the Canada Public Service Act as well as within federal agencies. I expressed concerns that victims of racism and discrimination often have to wait two to three years—in the case of Chander Grover I think it has been six years—to have their cases dealt with because of inadequate resources.

The minister in response to my question refused to even recognize that there was a problem.

The Canadian Human Rights Commission needs adequate funding to deal with both systemic discrimination as well as individual complaints. Because of inadequate resources, as I said, complainants often have to wait far too long to have their cases processed. Yet instead of increasing funding, this year $347,000 was cut from the commission's budget.

In addition, termination of the Court Challenges Program by the federal government in the last budget was another serious blow to equality rights for women and minorities. This means that disadvantaged persons no longer have legal funds for test cases and equality cases under the charter, cases that are so important in interpreting and sometimes in changing our laws.

We also found in that budget that the government refused absolutely to fund a race relations foundation which had been promised as part of redress for Japanese Canadians. This was another betrayal.

This week we learn that advocacy groups have had 10 per cent per year cuts in their grants under the mini budget. These groups are essential to fight for disadvantaged and powerless Canadians. This 10 per cent per year cut has to be added to very dramatic cuts they have had that have accumulated over the last three years. In some cases it must bring it up to 60 per cent or 70 per cent cuts which essentially will destroy many very important organizations.

I am ashamed that our government as an employer itself practises systemic discrimination. It has not increased the hiring of visible minorities over the past four years. The 3.6 per cent participation rate in the Public Service compares very poorly with 7 per cent racial minorities in the general work force.

In June the minister told us the review of the Employment Equity Act would provide a better context for understanding what needs to be done, but nothing has been done. The parliamentary committee asked for direct enforcement by the Human Rights Commission and the commissioner himself has for years advocated several reforms in this direction.

By the year 2001, 80 per cent of new entrants into the labour force in Canada will be women, visible minorities, aboriginals and persons with disabilities. Canada must protect their rights to equality and must open opportunities for their advancement. The government must act now to renew and review the Canadian Human Rights Commission and amend the Canadian Human Rights Act so that we can achieve real equality in Canada.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the comments of the hon. member.

First of all, the Employment Equity Act was reviewed over the past several months by a special committee of Parliament chaired by the hon. member for Don Valley East. That report has been tabled in Parliament and the government is having a look at it. We have 150 days in which to respond to the committee's report.

The Minister of State for Employment and Immigration is also examining the report in consultation with the Minister of Justice and other interested ministers, and the role of the Canadian Human Rights Commission is obviously an issue that is being considered fully.

I should point out to the House that the Government of Canada itself has had employment programs and in fact considerable progress has been made.

You have heard, Mr. Speaker, that somehow the Canadian Human Rights Commission has not been getting any money but in fact I point out that since the fiscal year 1987–88 the budget of the Canadian Human Rights Commission has increased by 66 per cent as well as a 27 per cent increase in person-year allotment. There are a lot of government departments that would like to have had that in the last five years. The hon. member should point that out.

The Canadian Human Rights Commission is independent of the government. The commission is responsible for the enforcement and administration of the Canadian Human Rights Act. The way in which it administers the act and allocates its resources is a matter which the commission must decide. However, I understand the commission has taken a number of steps to speed up the processing and resolution of complaints.

REPORT OF THE AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on November 25 I put a question to the minister responsible for small business concerning the Westray coal disaster. At that time I called on the government to conduct a federal inquiry into matters surrounding that particular place of operation. Unfortunately the government has not seen fit to instruct its officials to hold a parliamentary inquiry.

I want to remind the parliamentary secretary to the minister responsible that this is one of the most serious and tragic events that has happened in the history of Nova Scotia and for this federal government to turn its face away from the people and particularly the widows and family members of those deceased miners is despicable.

The Auditor General pointed out in his report that only $9.9 million in fees were paid to the management. Not a bad day's pay. The government gave a guarantee of 103 per cent of pre-production costs. That is what the Westray promoters got. Not a bad day at all for them.

I want to remind the parliamentary secretary again that the people of Canada, the people of Pictou county and the people of Nova Scotia deserve as a minimum a parliamentary inquiry to discover all of the facts surrounding this tragic event.

It is not sufficient for the government to say that it will let the province do it because we know what the province of Nova Scotia under the leadership of Donald Cameron has done with that particular issue. We know about the safety concerns at this particular mine which is regulated by the province of Nova Scotia. It is an absolute and utter disgrace, as the charges which have been evidenced to date will indicate.

I want to remind the parliamentary secretary that in my own district as of today the Lingan colliery has shut down and the Phalen colliery is shut down. For many safety reasons I would advise workers not to go back to the Phalen mine. In point of fact on Saturday of this week I will be meeting with mining representatives to discuss that very issue.

On the Westray issue this government was drunk with stupidity, falling over itself to provide money, $9.9 million in management fees to the promoters, 103 per cent loan guarantee on pre-production costs.

It would be appropriate and morally responsible for the Government of Canada to conduct a parliamentary inquiry in order to give the officials that the government has been protecting for the last number of months an opportunity to come forward, put their case before the Canadian people and account for their omissions or, indeed, have them account for the nice little goose egg they made with the Tory administration in Ottawa.

The parliamentary secretary, whom I know to be a respectable man in this Chamber, should urge his ministers and his colleagues to have the appropriate committee examine in detail all of the information which is there for everyone to see, except the people of Canada who do not have an opportunity to question those in authority.

I urge the parliamentary secretary to do that on behalf of the people in Pictou county who are calling upon the Prime Minister and the government to order a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to respond to the suggestion made in the Auditor General's report and also by the hon. member that the government provided assistance to Westray that amounted to 103 per cent of the net pre-production costs.

The company was required to provide $15 million in cash during the pre-production period, plus share in the loan insurance risk, with possible tax benefit credits, principally in future years. The total financing by Curragh totalled $30 million, consisting of $9 million in cash, $6 million in deferred management fees, and $15 million which represents 15 per cent of the bank loan guarantee. They were also fully responsible for any cost overruns that occurred.

The Auditor General's report offsets the $30 million of company financing with $34.2 million of potential tax benefits. It could be easy to misinterpret the manner in which the potential tax benefits are reported without also realizing that tax benefits are potential and are realized only if there are profits against which they can be applied.

In this instance these benefits did not all materialize as Curragh suffered losses subsequent to the start-up of the Westray mine.

The Auditor General's exhibit 13-7 does not represent actual cash flow or actual costs but simply what might have occurred had Curragh been more profitable than it was and had been able to take advantage of the tax concessions. In actual fact all of the tax concessions were not available to Curragh and the Westray mine is reported to have cost Curragh in excess of $28.5 million.

One must realize that the purpose of loan insurance is to encourage financial institutions to loan money to projects which, by their nature, would not normally be financed by these institutions or only at extremely high rates of interest. We were satisfied that Curragh shared a significant portion of the risk as demonstrated by the size of their reported loss on this project.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Order made Tuesday, December 1, 1992, the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been withdrawn.

Pursuant to Order made Tuesday, December 1, 1992, the House will resume debate on the motion for second reading of Bill C-98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1992.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1992, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say I am delighted to rise in this debate, but I am afraid that would not be true. I am inured to rise in this debate because of what the government perpetrated upon the people of Canada yesterday. I am most particularly upset, as are the vast majority of women in this country, with regard to one particular aspect of yesterday's so-called economic statement.

Others more eloquent than I have talked about the attack by this government on the unemployed but I want to talk particularly about the attack on women in this country. I refer of course to the utterly despicable decision by this government to refuse unemployment insurance benefits to people who quit their jobs voluntarily. This isolates thousands of women, possibly more than thousands in this country, who will quit their jobs because of sexual harassment.

I had a lot of things thrown at me in this Chamber today but I heard ministers of the Crown stand and say: "Nothing to worry about. Sexual harassment will be just cause". Well let me explain the concept of just cause within the concept of the Unemployment Insurance Appeal Board and within the concept of the woman applying for benefits after she has quit her job because she has been sexually harassed.

First of all let us look at the process and the time. I am giving you times that are 8 to 12 years old because I chaired the Unemployment Insurance Appeal Board from 1980 to 1984. My knowledge of time spans comes from that time. I can only say if those time spans have not lengthened considerably then it is the only place within the entire legal system where they have not.

What happens? I will tell you what happens. A woman leaves her job because sexual harassment is intolerable and unbearable. She does the standard thing and goes to the employment office with her documents to apply for unemployment insurance. She explains she quit her job because of sexual harassment. Without fail, in my experience and in the experience of my colleagues knowledgeable in this area, she will be disqualified. Under the old rules that meant she bore a penalty period of approximately eight weeks. For most women then, in spite of the penalty period that was enforced, there was the knowledge the remainder of the claim would be available. Many of them would bring forward an appeal to the Unemployment Insurance Appeal Board. Some of them, having lost there, would then take the appeal to the umpire, a judge of the Federal Court.

I will quote my colleague, the member for Gander—Grand Falls, who is one of the most knowledgeable people in this House when it comes to representing his constituents before Unemployment Insurance Appeal Boards. In Newfoundland you would be looking at about eight weeks from disqualification to appeal. You would be looking at at least another week to knowledge of the decision on your appeal board but you could be looking at as long as two years before the Federal Court judge came to Newfoundland to hear the appeals from the decisions of the appeal board. By that time who would care? What would have become of the person who had been disqualified?

As I say, under the old rules a woman in that position could at least look forward to the remainder of her claim. Now she can look forward to nothing.

I heard over and over again sexual harassment is just cause. Well it certainly is, but little has been shown by this government that it believes it.

I rose three times in this House last week and once this week on different issues of sexual harassment. There are two women from the Public Service in Halifax who are currently at home collecting UI benefits. They are lucky they are still under the old rules. The Public Service of Canada in two separate investigations found sexual harassment against these two women yet they are at home without jobs, collecting UI benefits. Their harassers who are known to the Public Service Commission are in their jobs. According to a report someone in that very office is highly amused the member of Parliament for Halifax has brought forward this complaint and these women have gone public in the press. I promise that sometime before I die people will be laughing from the other sides of their faces.

There are other incidents of sexual harassment in the Public Service of Canada. I have an incident of a woman who was at managerial level in another Public Service branch who is also at home collecting unemployment insurance benefits because she dared to complain.

I have another incident of a woman who was on contract and was told by a minister of this very House the report she made would not be left on her file. She is also currently unemployed.

We have a report from the advisory body on the status of women to the Associate Minister of National Defence that was published last week. I raised it in the House yesterday and it says: "The Armed Forces of Canada: Complaints rise from every base in this country on sexual harassment".

Does this sound like a government that has a policy that would consider sexual harassment just cause for leaving your employment? If it does to you, Mr. Speaker, I can only say it does not to the women of Canada, and the women of Canada are upset.

We are not going to sit back and allow a whole series of Anita Hills to be pilloried in this country the way they were in the United States. This makes us angry and it is not just women parliamentarians, women lawyers and those of us who have a voice and an arena in which to speak who are angry. It is women across the board in this country. It is store clerks, secretaries, clerks in government departments, people all over the place who work for low wages and have glass ceilings keeping them from advancement. They are angry and they have a right to be angry.

This government has changed the rules in UI so if these women are sexually harassed and quit their jobs they have to prove their cases. They are going to have to hire lawyers to do it. I would like to know where the government, and in particular the Minister of Employment and Immigration, thinks they are going to get the money to do this. By accidents of birth, education, and personality a number of us can combat this kind of behaviour and cut it off where it deserves to be cut off.

The woman who can barely afford bus fare, to quote one of my hon. colleagues in the other place this afternoon, does not have that luxury. She does not have that kind of money. In this economy where this government has cut so much to so many groups, there is not a legal aid office that can afford to take on cases like that.

I know my hon. colleague, the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and our critic for justice, knows that as well. Legal aid lawyers are too busy with security of the person cases to have time to represent these.

Not all members of Parliament are committed as the member for Gander—Grand Falls to representing constituents in these situations.

What happens to these women? I will tell you what happens to them. They quit their jobs. They do not have the money for legal representation. They know the "cubs" as they are called, which are the reports of the umpire, show unequivocally that sexual harassment has not been found to be just cause. So what happens to these women? They go on welfare. They go on social assistance. They walk away because they cannot sacrifice what little money they have for lawyers' fees and they do not have enough to cover them anyway. There is no legal aid and there sure is no recourse from their government in Ottawa. The government in Ottawa, through its senior public servants, its minions, the supposed personnel officers for this government, says sexual harassment complaints are childish. They say sexual harassment is something women have to learn to live with. We will not and we are not going to put up with it.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise this evening to support the important and progressive economic program tabled yesterday by my colleague, the Minister of Finance. I will talk more specifically about the measures in this program that deal with transport.

Over all, the measures that were announced will significantly affect every Canadian. Some have said that it is strong medicine and too extreme. Based on my own experience as a businessman and a politician at the municipal and federal levels I can only applaud the strategy developed by my colleague to reduce expenses and, at the same time, to apply the economic stimulus that is so necessary to our country in the present circumstances.

[English]

Transportation cannot be immune from such a balancing exercise. Belt tightening has to be shared by all Canadians.

As the Minister of Finance said in his statement, the government will commit $500 million in new federal spending during the next two years to a strategic investment program. I am pleased to note a considerable portion of these funds has been earmarked for transportation infrastructure.

The federal initiative comprises two parts. First, the federal government will invest up to $255 million in federally owned highway infrastructure which is key to economic development. Among other things funds will be allocated to the maintenance of the federal bridges in Montreal, namely the Champlain and Jacques Cartier bridges. These bridges have reached their full capacity and handle some 80 million vehicles a year. At this rate the rapidity with which these bridge facilities are deteriorating cannot be overstated. Given their strategic importance for the Montreal region as major national and international arteries, it is our responsibility to ensure these links are maintained in safe and usable conditions.

[Translation]

A second important federal intervention concerns the Trans-Canada Highway in the national parks located in Newfoundland, Alberta and British Columbia. More than 200 kilometres of the Trans-Canada Highway belong to the federal government and major sections of that highway no longer meet safety standards.

Provincial highways have aged in spite of the efforts made by provinces. If we want to meet present needs and promote economic growth for tomorrow it is essential to do these repairs and to expand our whole highway system. Without interfering in provincial jurisdiction the federal government has now announced its intention to invest jointly with the provinces in some provincial road projects that are national priorities in terms of security and economic growth.

Consequently, the federal government will invest over $400 million in upgrading provincial highways across the country. We believe that the provinces will be pleased with this unprecedented federal effort and will participate with us in implementing this ambitious highway investment program. We will very soon discuss with the provinces the specific projects to be undertaken as well as the provinces' financial involvement. We hope that construction can begin as early as next spring thus speeding the economic recovery. It is estimated that these projects will generate approximately 11,000 person-years of employment over the next five years.

[English]

In addition to upgrading existing highways and bridges it is also time to begin the construction of new strategic infrastructures. Consequently the federal government will commit to the construction of a fixed crossing to P.E.I. provided the province agrees to recognize the facility meets Canada's constitutional obligations to the province. To demonstrate this commitment the government will allow advanced engineering and environmental work to proceed.

Assuming provincial agreements and successful negotiations with the private developer, project construction could begin next spring. The project is expected to generate up to 3,500 person- years of employment over a five-year construction period. Roughly 70 per cent of the estimated $800 million to $900 million project cost will be spent in Atlantic Canada.

Surface transportation has many interdependent links. For an integrated approach it is vital we ensure improvements are undertaken which strengthen the transportation system as a whole.

At this time I am pleased to be able to inform this House of developments in two other areas of transport activity. On the port side, Canada Ports Corporation has a key role to play in ensuring that our ports make the necessary key commercial investments needed to meet the competitive challenge of global markets.

I understand that Canada Ports Corporation has given high priority consideration to strategic capital investments in a number of areas, including a major new container facility for the port of Vancouver at Roberts Bank and an expansion of existing container facilities, as well as rail network improvements, in the port of Montreal.

The government will be exploring similar non-budget financing opportunities in other areas as further strategic infrastructure projects with clear and direct commercial potential are identified.

On the rail side the government is prepared to make available new funding for the development of a more efficient rail system in high-traffic areas. Works will include new grade separations and other improvements with high safety and efficiency pay-offs.

Let me now turn to another vital element of our transportation infrastructure, namely our airports. The initiative provides for airport capital projects based on commercial arrangements, arrangements which will not require new government spending.

Airports in particular can make a strong contribution to the economic life of their communities as independent commercial entities. The transfer of a number of federal airports to local operating authorities with independent financing capabilities is already facilitating productive new investments such as the development of a major new runway facility for Vancouver.

Similarly, pending consideration of the report of the environmental panel, it is anticipated that any new runways at Pearson International will be constructed and funded on the basis of a commercial approach. The importance of Pearson cannot be overstated. The airport now generates more than 56,000 direct and indirect jobs, which in turn generate $1.9 billion a year in personal income and $4 billion in direct revenue for local businesses and the tourist industry.

Modern facilities at Pearson are vital to the economic and social development of metropolitan Toronto, southern Ontario and all of Canada. In the case of terminal 3 it was the first time that government asked the private sector to provide a terminal building and operate it without government funding. The opening of terminal 3 in early 1991 and the improvements completed to terminal 2 in 1990 provided the additional terminal capacity to meet the short-term needs of Pearson Airport.

The government is committed to expanding Pearson's terminal capacity to provide better service to an increasing number of users. Development must however proceed in a responsible manner within established guidelines.

[Translation]

Members know very well that the environment is changing for all airline companies of the world and Canada is no exception. Our two main carriers have undertaken an organizational realignment in order to try to meet the challenge they are faced with.

Last March the government issued a request for proposals for the retrofitting and operation of terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson airport.

As the Minister of Finance said, we are ready to launch the project for terminals 1 and 2 in Toronto if we can get private funding. The project will be carried out in such a way as not to disturb these companies in their efforts to remain cost-effective. It should allow for the creation of 2,000 to 3,000 jobs each year during construction. I will be in a position to give you more information on this initiative in the near future.

[English]

During the next five years I envisage an expenditure of up to $20 million on airports north of 60. In our modern technological age the concept of infrastructure embraces more than roads, bridges and runways. High technology infrastructure has an important place in our modern transportation system.

For example International Civil Aviation is moving to microwave landing systems as the standard for instrument landing with a 1998 target for implementation. Therefore, there is a need to prepare Canadian airports for this development.

In the context of this initiative the money we are allocating to the MLS project will allow for an early start in applying the latest technology to air navigation.

MLS provides an opportunity for development of advanced technology within Canada which will both answer our own immediate operational needs and give us a product with considerable export potential.

This key economic sector will also gain from many of the other initiatives announced by my hon. colleague in his statement.

• (1850)

In the coming weeks we will be working diligently to finalize agreements with our partners in the various components of this initiative and we will commence work as soon as it is feasible to do so.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): I am not particularly happy to participate in this debate today on the Minister of Finance's economic statement that he delivered before the House yesterday. I say that because I think it was one of the saddest documents I have had the misfortune to listen to and read in this Chamber. However, do not just take my word for it.

The Minister of Finance today was quoting various articles from the Toronto Star to reinforce his arguments in response to questions during Question Period. I would like bring to the House's attention Carol Goar's article in today's Toronto Star. It is headlined: "A brazen attack on the weakest". That headline is referring to the minister's economic statement of yesterday. In the first paragraph she writes:

> A government that would cut unemployment insurance benefits at a time like this is not just heartless. It is dangerously out of touch with the people it purports to serve.
> By reaching into the pockets of the unemployed yesterday, finance minister Don Mazankowski transformed a mid-course economic correction into a brazen attack on the nation's most vulnerable citizens.

Many speakers on this side of the House have drawn attention to the absolute unfairness of the economic statement which was in fact a budget for the next fiscal year. It is not surprising that a Conservative government that still holds to the old ideology of the trickle-down theory of economics, that if we make it richer for the people at the top they will spend money and invest money and it will somehow trickle down to the middle and lower income groups, a government that still adheres to that kind of economic philosophy is so out of whack, so out of date with the present reality that it no longer deserves to hold power in this country and to be in government.

After all the Americans discovered in the past year or two just how Reaganomics had destroyed their economy over the previous 10 years and they took action. They took action the democratic way and threw out a Republican conservative president of their country. That is exactly what the people of this country are going to do in the next seven or eight months when this government gets up enough nerve to call an election.

In the limited time that I have this evening I want to zero in on two aspects of that budget. The first aspect concerns the changes to the unemployment insurance system.

I do not know why the Minister of Finance would pick the weakest in our economy, the weakest in our society, to fight the deficit on. I really do not understand it. These are the people who are unemployed. These are the people who have been in and out of work for the past two or three years. Some of them have been out of work completely for the last two or three years. Yet this is the group the Conservative government of the day has targeted, on whose backs it has decided to fight the deficit and the debt.

The measures taken by the government are nothing short of Draconian. I do not think there is any question about that.

The initiative says that those who quit their jobs without just cause and those fired for insubordination will simply not get unemployment insurance benefits, period. I did not think that I would be in this Chamber long enough to witness any government taking that kind of extreme and unfair action, particularly at a time of severe economic depression in this country.

Who says, for example, what a just cause is? How do we know whether the applicant quit because he or she did not care or because he or she was working for an abusive boss? These tribunals, this appeal process, is really not a court process.

They are not the rules of evidence. They are not the protections for those who are innocent. I suggest that when some of these cases get to the umpire, and the backlog builds up year after year after year, that these tribunals will be emotionally charged to the point where I doubt very much whether natural justice will have its day in court.

I suggest that the Minister of Finance go back to the blueprint, go back to his drawing board, and in the name of decency withdraw that Draconian measure which he introduced yesterday in his budget.

Whose decision will it be to say whether the applicant had a reason to quit? Is it the employer's word against the applicant's? If that is the case we all know whose side this government will be on.

What about workers who quit because they are breathing in toxic fumes and the company refuses to clean up its act? What about the woman who is forced to quit her job because her husband gets a transfer to another city? Is that going to be considered just cause? After all she has paid into unemployment insurance for many months, or many years in most cases. Should she be deprived of benefits simply because, through no fault of her own, she has to quit and remove herself to another city or another province?

Does anyone on the government side really appreciate just how long these appeals take? Can the House imagine an employee going to his employer and saying: "I am not working in that paint shop another minute. It is killing me. The toxic fumes are so intense I cannot breathe". Can the House imagine how long an environmental investigation assessment would take? It would take not weeks or months but possibly two or three years.

In the meantime the employee could be adjudicated as having not exercised just cause in quitting his job and therefore be denied unemployment insurance because the tribunal at that point, or the umpire, would not have the scientific evidence at its disposal in order to come to a decision in favour of the employee who has quit.

This is extremely unfair. It is going to open the whole process to even more abuse, this time particularly on the part of the employers. If we are talking about sexual harassment—and the hon. member for Halifax went into a great deal of detail in her remarks, and I agreed with everything she said—it is going to be extremely unfair to women who are victims of sexual harassment, not necessarily physical harassment but verbal harassment. How do people prove that unless they walk around with some kind of a concealed microphone or tape recorder on their person? Do members see how this is going to bring so much tension, strife and conflict within the work place?

The government is reducing its costs of unemployment insurance but little does it realize that by withdrawing money or reducing money within the unemployment insurance envelope it is actually going to hurt small business in an economic downturn, in a severe recession.

In my riding of Brant there are many small businesses, small retail shops, which without welfare cheques from their customers and without unemployment insurance cheques from their customers would not make it during a recession. A lot of them do not want to admit it but it is the absolute truth. When people receive unemployment insurance they do not take that money and sock it into some luxury condominium in the Cayman Islands. They spend all that money and they spend it at home. They spend it on groceries, clothes, gasoline, car repairs, you name it. It goes directly back into the local economy.

Cutting back $550 million in unemployment insurance benefits means that there is so much less money to go back into the local economies across this country.

In cutting back on unemployment insurance, in tackling the poor in this country, the disadvantaged and the unemployed I noticed that the Minister of Finance once again very conveniently side-stepped the big issue of taxing family trusts. There is over $50 billion in family trusts, controlled by fewer than 100 families, in this country. It will now go untaxed for another 50 or 75 years until the last child living today dies. That could be 80 years. It is estimated that there will be accumulated tax losses of close to $100 billion over the next 50 to 75 years.

Even in one year alone, if those family trusts were taxed—and I am talking now about the Westons, the Bronfmans, the very wealthy people in this country—it is estimated that we could get $35 billion in taxes—billions of dollars, not millions—from that source. These people would be forced to pay their fair share of taxes. That is equal to one year's annual budgetary deficit.

That is how serious this government is about making the tax system fair in this country. It is an absolute shame that this government allows the very rich and powerful in this country to get away without paying their fair share of taxes. At the same time it goes after those on unemployment insurance to cut back on their benefits. In my view, this government has become an absolute national disgrace.

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to address members tonight concerning the economic statement recently brought down in the House of Commons.

The theme of investing in growth, investing in people, investing in our infrastructure are the themes I have heard in my own community of Scarborough Centre.

Scarborough Centre is a riding in metropolitan Toronto which has many small businesses. The heart and soul of every community and, indeed, the Canadian economy, is small business.

When businesses expand communities prosper and the Canadian economy grows. Businesses with 50 or fewer employees account for about 45 per cent of private sector employment in Canada. They have been responsible for most private sector job creation in recent years.

Between 1979 and 1990 small business has created more than two million new full-time jobs for Canadians. This is more than 80 per cent of the total jobs it created during that period. I am very proud of the vibrant small businesses we have in Scarborough Centre.

A business, however, is more than just a business to those who start it. It is a symbol of pride and fulfilment of a lifelong dream, the fruition of an idea, the result of tireless hard work and determination to make that idea come to life. The Government of Canada is working very hard to preserve and foster this sense of pride and to keep the dreams of every small business person alive in Canada.

Yesterday in the House of Commons my hon. colleague, the Minister of Finance, set out a plan to encourage the creation of more small businesses in Canada and the retention of existing ones.

The RRSP home buyers plan has been extended by another year and the Small Business Financing Program by another two years. He also introduced a one-year 10 per cent small business investment tax credit for purchases of machinery and equipment. That is going to be very good news indeed for Scarborough Centre and all of metro Toronto.

As well, he outlined plans to provide most new and existing small businesses in Canada with relief in the area of unemployment insurance premiums for 1993.

To encourage small businesses to expand and to hire new employees the government will, in effect, pay any increase in unemployment insurance employer premiums over the 1990 levels up to a maximum of $30,000. Therefore, any incorporated or unincorporated businesses whose employer's share of unemployment insurance premiums in 1992 was less than $60,000 will be eligible to benefit under this program.

These innovative measures will allow small and medium-sized businesses in Canada to continue to grow, to modernize, to create jobs in communities across this great nation of ours.

I know the benefits to a community of a prosperous local business sector. In my own community of Scarborough there are numerous examples of small businesses that are doing well. Some small businesses have now grown to medium and large-sized ones.

When it comes to unemployment insurance, we have talked to our constituents across Canada and we have heard of the costly abuses of unemployment insurance. We can all cite examples. That is why a very important aspect of this economic statement has been incorporated to deal with these abuses.

It was announced that some persons who voluntarily quit their jobs without just cause or who lose their jobs because of their own misconduct will not be eligible for unemployment insurance.

Let me hasten to say that just cause has already been defined as reasons of health, safety concerns, transfer of a spouse to another region of the country, and harassment. I feel confident those abuses which have taken place will indeed be curtailed because of the inclusion of this just cause provision in this economic statement.

Now let me turn to the environmental aspects of the statement. Many companies in Scarborough and across Canada have demonstrated a commitment to the production of environmentally friendly products and environmentally sensitive production processes. This is very important since the environment is one of Canada's and the world's fastest growing industries.

Yesterday's economic statement has in no way reduced our government's commitment to protecting Canada's environment.

Although the green plan's budget has been reduced, funding for green plan initiatives will continue to grow significantly on a year to year basis at a time when expenditures on most programs will decline or be frozen. In fact, spending under our green plan program will continue to increase by some 30 per cent each year in the next three years.

As well, there is very good news for our national parks. In British Columbia and Alberta the national parks and roads will be improved as will the national park in Newfoundland. That will improve safety and make it far more accessible for visitors in our magnificent national parks.

The green plan's budget however should not be taken as a measure of its success or its failure, not the budget alone. The green plan's mandate is to improve decision making and decision-making processes and to change people's attitudes relating to the environment. Its accomplishments can only be judged by its ability to achieve its all-important goals, and this goes to the heart of the green plan and what it is all about.

There is good news concerning the expansion of environmental industries. The world market for environmental products in 1990 was approximately $200 billion U.S. By the year 2000 it is expected to grow to some $375 billion U.S. currency.

In Canada the market for environmental products is estimated to be some $7 billion. This $7 billion of environmental industries creates another $13 billion in indirect economic activity for a total of over $20 billion.

Some 150,000 Canadians work in this rapidly growing sector of our economy. It is growing steadily and is the real growth industry in Canada. I am so very proud to hear about the number of students enrolled in those environmental studies in order to go into these industries, to begin new industries, begin those new businesses that are being talked about in this economic statement.

Our government also believes that one of the keys to economic prosperity for Canada is the reduction of Canada's national debt. The hon. finance minister's economic statement yesterday reflects this position.

• (1910)

Individually and collectively, it is incumbent on us to curtail further deficit increases. Debt load leaves countries vulnerable. It is money which cannot be used to help our small businesses or develop our economy.

Our government has reversed the Government of Canada's operating deficit of some $16 billion in 1984 to an operating surplus. This economic statement further assists in this respect.

All Canadians have a responsibility to do their part in helping to reduce our country's burden of debt. That is why I fully support my colleagues announcement of a two-year freeze in the salaries of the Governor General, the Lieutenant-Governor, the Prime Minister, all ministers and indeed, each of us in the House of Commons, as well as on salaries of the public servants of the Crown.

The measures announced by my colleague yesterday in his economic statement demonstrate the Government of Canada's commitment to fostering the success of small businesses in communities throughout this magnificent country of ours.

As well, it sends a positive message to all Canadians. It is a message that this government is serious about fostering the entrepreneurial spirit of Canada's small business men and women.

This government is serious about preserving the heart and soul of the Canadian economy, the small business sector, in order that our children and indeed our grandchildren will have opportunities and will be the beneficiaries of our responsible actions and decisions.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to speak on the economic statement delivered yesterday by the Minister of Finance.

I have quite a few concerns about the economic statement. I will relate them to the Minister of Finance who is in the House. I appreciate his presence. First of all, because he is here, I have to give credit where credit is due.

For a long time we have been trying to promote an industry on Cape Breton Island that made microwave landing systems. I have spoken to the Minister of Finance on this in the past. He has been very supportive to the extent that the government has awarded a contract to this company.

It is going to be of tremendous importance to my riding which has terrible unemployment. Not only that, but it is also going to enable us to get away from the older stereotyped industries of coal and steel. It will get us into a technological type of industry in which Cape Bretoners can develop a track record. They will be able to get the news of this track record across the country and thereby attract other important sophisticated research and development and technological industries to my riding.

There will be those who say: "Well, he really did not do anything. The government really did not do anything. This contract was announced awhile ago". But with the cost cutting, with the concern we have had on reduction, there has been this problem hanging over our heads that this contract was going to disappear. In fact the Minister of Transport, who is in the House, will know that this was scratched from the list as recently as August but put back on for which I am very grateful. Now we have it secured. That is tremendously important.

I also want to say to the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Finance and indeed to the government that our problems do not end in Cape Breton. There is the problem of what we are to do, how we are to employ those coming out of the steel plants and the mines having lost their jobs over the last number of years. We have an unemployment rate of about 30 per cent. It is really difficult. There are no easy answers and I recognize that.

I also want to say that twinning of highways is not an answer for Cape Breton. Going from Halifax to Sydney there is a good deal of traffic between Halifax and New Glasgow. Then after New Glasgow and Antigonish, the traffic reduces somewhat. It reduces even more getting to the Strait of Canso. Then when one gets to Cape Breton, the traffic is drastically reduced. When you get on to Cape Breton Island, not only is the traffic drastically reduced but there are two roads from the causeway to Sydney. There are twice the number of ways for you to get from the Strait of Canso to Sydney. We really do not need highways. But we do need help. We need help with infrastructure because unemployment and welfare has drained our municipalities something fierce.

We have had increased welfare costs in some of our communities of as much as 300 per cent. They cannot repair the infrastructure. They just cannot do it. The money is not there. Through the catch-22 situation that exists, we have to be able to upgrade our communities to make them attractive. Although we were starting to attract, hopefully, the nucleus of new technology, we want to have people who want to live in our communities. For that reason we do need a lot of help in that regard.

I am very pleased there is assistance for the parks in western Canada. Having travelled in western Canada, the national parks in that part of the country are absolutely gorgeous. They are a national treasure and should be upgraded and maintained. The federal government has said that federal roads and roadworks in western Canada's national parks will be upgraded and I think that is very important.

I would also say that on Cape Breton we have the Cape Breton Highlands National Park which needs some help because it is the flagship, so to speak, of the tourist industry on Cape Breton Island. Not only Cape Breton Island benefits but the whole province benefits because it brings tourists through the province to the park. With some seed money we can develop that park to benefit the whole province of Nova Scotia. As well, we can give much-needed jobs to people who are having a very difficult winter mainly because of the problems we had last year in our tourist industry and the problems we are enduring through the fishing industry on Cape Breton Island.

I would ask the government, and particularly the Minister of Finance, if he would please consider this.

I would say too that it is important when you take things away. People in Canada understand that at times you have to tighten your belt, you have to reduce the benefits sometimes and the incomes that have been forwarded and provided to the people of Canada. But it is very important at the same time to give the people an idea of where it is going to end, to develop a program that tells the people you are preparing to contribute to the reduction of your aspirations and benefits, but this will lead to a specific conclusion. We do not have that in this economic statement. We do not know where it is going to end.

The Minister of Finance mentioned that the net foreign debt is far higher for Canada than any other of the G-7 countries. He also said that Canadians paid more than $22 billion in interest last year to foreign lenders. These figures are alarming. The fact is that we have to be able to deal with that.

The Minister of Finance in his budget last year targeted the repatriation of foreign debt. I think it is very important for the Minister of Finance to tell us where we are going to go. His deficit expectations for this year were not met because the revenues were not as high as the government expected.

However, this question of foreign debt is vital, particularly when we are dependent upon the sale of our treasury bonds to be able to pay the interest on this debt as it occurs. So the treasury bonds are not being sold to Canadians; more and more they are being sold to foreigners, particularly to Americans, which is requiring us to keep our interest rates high to make those bonds attractive.

We also have to keep our dollar high so that we are not paying an increasing amount to foreign countries in currency exchange. I realize that. The fact of the matter is that we have to deal with it. The fact of the matter is that we have not dealt with it. People need to know, they have to be able to see where we are going. People do not want to see their benefits that they have worked so hard to obtain, the better standard of living we have, our health care programs, our increased allowance for pensions, eroded without any idea as to where it is going to end. That will only cause further dissatisfaction, further uncertainty, and a tremendous amount of fear. We have to know what the government's plans are for bringing this slide to a halt.

Certainly there may be fat in the system, but there are a lot of poor middle-income Canadians who do not have any fat to give to the government, that there is real need in this country which we cannot ignore. We cannot continually take away from these people. We cannot take away from the regions.

Perhaps we can modify what we are going to give on a short-term basis. People have to know. If they do not know, then they cannot accept this. They just cannot see that it is ever going to end. They are going to see the work and the development over the last few years and the accumulated improvements in the standard of living gradually disappear at their expense.

That is not going to work, I am afraid, in areas of high unemployment where the government is not being forthcoming with a plan. We are going to have a great deal of dissension, a great deal of hardship and a great deal of unhappiness and lack of confidence in the system. I am afraid that we have to deal with this. We have to deal with the people in need. We have got to address where this country is going.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I was just talking to the Minister of Finance and I do not think that the members of my Mount Royal riding are going to be particularly happy, as I told him, with this budget.

I can only hope that the end result will in the long run somehow repair the dramatic damage that has been done to our country through the poor public policy and particularly the financial policies undertaken by this government.

As I stand here to speak for the constituents of Mount Royal, believe me it is not to applaud this government, but to address the failures as they have impacted on my own riding and the people who live there.

It is quite obvious that the new economic statement continues the faulty economic policies. Many of my constituents in Hampstead, Côte St. Luc, Snowdon, Côte des Neiges and the town of Mount Royal keep telling me that this government is simply out of touch with the real people and they have not addressed their concerns. There is nothing positive in a really constructive way in this budget that makes them feel comfortable and feel hopeful.

It does not matter what their background, what their economic status, the level of their education, their mother tongue, their country of origin, where they live in my riding, whether it is in a home, whether it is in an apartment and in the worst case some in the street, this government has ceased really to represent their needs and this budget simply confirms it.

I am talking about Mount Royal riding's population of 90,000 that includes a significant immigrant population from the world over: the Caribbean, East Africa, East Asia, Europe, the Middle East, eastern Europe, South America, from seniors who I am always proud to say make up over 20 per cent of my riding to single parent families, two parent families, the under employed to the unemployed, are all anxious for a more stable economic future, yet gained little hope from yesterday's declaration by the Conservative government.

Do not lose hope is my message to them. Do not lose your spirit. I know that you walk through the streets in my riding and you see all those empty store windows and all those endless for rent signs. We say that M. À Louer owns an awful lot of property in Mount Royal.

Thousands of jobs have been lost under the government's policies, particularly in textile, in clothing, in the food processing industry, in small business and in sales and services. When you add the youth job losses because of the cuts this government has brought in, particularly this past summer under the federal youth employment programs, the problem gets even worse.

Let us consider the Adjustment Training Program. I had a large number of young people who were quite excited about being admitted for re-education and training, if you would care to put it that way, but then the government reneged in the middle of all this and cut their opportunity at the third term, in mid-stream. Many of them have lost hope. I say to all of them, do not lose hope. I know that you have been very unhappy with the government. Obviously Tories do not know how to look at this world through proper glasses. They use those rose-coloured glasses that are not answering the needs.

I see in the community centres I visit, at the line-ups at the food banks, the images of the tremendous social needs out there. Children are going to school hungry, yes, in Mount Royal riding. People are living in dwellings that need upgrading. Our youth need training and skills. Again in yesterday's budget, this government has failed to be the compassionate and caring government it would like to pretend it is.

The story of poverty in my riding might shock some members of this House. Thousands of people live below the poverty line, from the working poor to those on social assistance, from the single mothers to the single elderly who rely on sponsored, in-home health care, meals on wheels and the food bank because their needs exceed their means. Yet they too receive little hope from the Prime Minister's trickle-down budget and the made-in-Canada recession. We have had the wrong policies at the wrong time. We have the GST and free trade instead of freer trade which would be good for all of us. It is not "any deal at any price" but a proper deal, a fair deal that we as Liberals have always believed in.

One could lose hope, but do not. Go out and help a neighbour. Go out and work as a volunteer. Do something. Do not get depressed because I know that it could be depressing when you know that Montreal is the capital urban city of the unemployed in Canada. I worry about the one in five unemployed. Perhaps now it might fall to one in four, although not yet I think, of our population who is without a job.

I worry for those who need better skills to find jobs. I share the concern of parents whose children have grown, become well-educated and yet still cannot find work. I worry about the 70 per cent of English speaking students who have said that they plan to leave upon graduation from college and university. I say, stay. You will find the way despite this government.

What do we get from the Conservatives? "Stay the course," they say. "Watch the deficit," they say. "We just cannot afford to help any more," they say. I say in response, we cannot afford not to help. Luckily the people in this riding are strong willed and still hold out hope with or without the care or help or caring of a national government.

Conditions in the riding and across the country prove that we need a change of course and yesterday's economic statement was really the last straw. This government has failed to meet the historic Canadian test of compassion, fairness, balance, putting people first, of giving Canadians the tools they need to win, the economic competition and simply giving hope.

I fear that we have become a country of little more than balance sheets and deficits as the only priorities. We simply cannot ignore the human debt and deficit in the name of financial debt and deficits, for doing so means we give up the social priorities that made us the great nation we are, that has made us different and has made us the envy of the world.

It is not too late to hold on to caring and compassion and, yes, competitive Canada. These are not mutually exclusive goals. In fact, they are inherently Canadian goals and they make sense for the country we wish to build, particularly when we hear the echo of that early Haida saying: "We have not inherited this land from our grandparents. We have simply borrowed it from our grandchildren".

In the last moments I would like to address the communications and cultural issues which are my responsibility in this House. Once again, Canada's arts and cultural community have felt the lash of the Tories. In their first economic statement in 1984 culture was cut by $122.5 million and in what we all hope is their last economic statement, there will be a further cut of $80 million over the next two years, this coming just two weeks after the sector suffered a 2 per cent blow to the tune of $11.8 million.

Let us for a moment look at this government's support to culture since 1984 when it took office. These numbers are based upon the government's own spending estimates. From 1984 to 1992 there has been a 24 per cent cut in direct and indirect federal cultural spending in real terms. This is a drastic, unconscionable cut, if we truly believe in nation building.

It is also interesting to compare the trends in cultural spending and the federal defence budget. Federal defence spending increased 38.6 per cent during the same period. The notion of a proud and independent Canada seems to have faded in the interest of the war games and war toys.

Culture is the very essence of our national identity and the bedrock of our national sovereignty and national pride. It gives meaning to the lives of every Canadian and enriches the country socially, politically and economically. It gives us pride in our country.

A cultural defence for Canada is what we need. As we look at what this government has done, as we look at the Auditor General's statement on some of the unnecessary spending that has gone on, I sincerely hope the government will stop and give priority where it counts, to people, to people and work, to people and the social world in which they live, and to people and the expression of culture, the ultimate expression of a country in this great world in which are privileged to live.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to enter into the debate and discussion tonight on the finance minister's mini budget yesterday.

There was certainly a great deal of hype and anticipation, as there always is around a statement that a finance minister is going to make. There was a great deal of that around this particular statement, given the current state of our economy and the general direction or lack of direction of the government. There was a great deal of anticipation about what the government was going to do. Some of that anticipation surrounded the thought that there would be a significant and large infrastructure program across the country. Even in the hour or two before the introduction of the mini statement there were some discussions and thought that the government would try to address and deal with the whole question of the goods and services tax and the impact it has had on the economy.

I would like to make a few points on the general situation we find ourselves in now and to concentrate ever so briefly on two areas of particular importance and interest to my constituents.

I want to congratulate my colleague, the member for Essex—Windsor, on the comments he made yesterday in his initial response to the Minister of Finance. He laid out pretty clearly some of the desperate straits this government has got us into.

When we take a look at some of the evidence and information we see the kind of challenge we have before us. We are talking about 11.3 per cent unemployment. A recent report came out saying that there are 3.8 million Canadians in poverty, the worst it has ever been. By the government's own statistics there are some 2.5 million people on welfare. There is 11 per cent unemployed.

There was discussion surrounding the inability of the government and the finance minister to predict accurately the budgetary situation in relation to what the deficit would be. According to previous estimates of the government, at one point the deficit for 1993–1994 would be $22.5 billion. Of course we now have the report that it is around $32.6 billion for next year. At one point it even suggested that in two years it would be down to $5 billion.

I find interesting the comments of some commentators on television. They seem to have forgotten many of the comments they and others made on the previous estimates of where the budget deficit would be. They seem to have forgotten and have quickly and easily rewritten history as far as the predictions of the government go.

I would like to move to two areas that were not included in the financial statement. The first point I want to pursue briefly is the question of the green plan which was discussed today in Question Period. I appreciated the honesty of the minister who responded when she said that the third cut to the green plan would be reviewed by cabinet. It would review some of the current programs under that plan to see the nature of the programs and how they would be operating in the near future.

There are three components of the green plan that I am particularly concerned about. First is the Fraser River Basin Management Plan in British Columbia where the Fraser River starts. It starts at one end of my riding nice and clean. When it turns south in Prince George it starts to get a little dirty.

Mrs. Browes: The plan will be saved.

Mr. Gardiner: The minister says that it will be saved. I hope she is as honest in the debate now as she was in Question Period when she says that the Fraser River plan will be saved.

Turning to the the other programs, maybe we will get the minister to respond as well. I am concerned about the Model Forest Plan and Tree Plan Canada. Let us hope the minister can give the same assurance. She is not doing that now. I am pleased about the Fraser River but we will hear—

Mrs. Browes: It is a very important program.

Mr. Gardiner: They are very important programs. I know we will hear from the government later. Let us hope they do not get the same treatment as some of the other programs have.

Most people have seen in the documents the minister brought forward some specific mention of a number of infrastructure programs in Atlantic Canada. Of course they are needed. There are some projects in national parks in British Columbia and Alberta—I think about Jasper near my riding and the Alaska Highway—that are needed.

The government has now had two years to take a look at a very important infrastructure program for northern British Columbia, the Yellowhead Highway Program, to upgrade and improve that particular highway. It was there before. It was cancelled by the former Social Credit government. The current government has not given us a great signal that it intends to proceed with that program.

Yesterday I wrote to the provincial minister, the member for Kamloops, the Hon. Art Charbonneau, and our federal transport minister to remind them of that program. It would be an excellent opportunity for us to improve the program. If I am not mistaken, the Yellowhead Highway goes through the riding of the Minister of Finance. I see him smiling. I would hope that means good luck for a Yellowhead program in the near future.

I have my Fraser River Program and I will get my Yellowhead Highway Program from the Minister of Finance tonight. However, I encourage the government to look at the program because it is important for northern British Columbia. I would strongly encourage the government and the minister to take a look at that particular highway because of its need. It is part of the national highways network. Of the $300 million that has been set aside for other initiatives with the provinces, I encourage this government to take a close look at that particular highway, to include it and to build in a program that would improve the Yellowhead Highway in some areas, bring it up to some standard. We are not talking about a lot of work.

I would like to conclude with those two comments on the importance of these programs. There is a need to protect the investment we have there and to suggest to the government that when it says it had some choices to make in this economic statement it was right. It made a number of wrong choices. It could have taken the opportunity to close some tax loopholes. It could have given Canadians an opportunity to have a consumer led recovery by scrapping the GST and bringing in a fair tax system.

Those are the kinds of messages I hope the government will listen to so that we can try to put Canada's economy back on the road again.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Thank you, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to speak tonight on this debate regarding the financial statement tabled in the House yesterday by the Minister of Finance which we should really refer to as a budget.

I am very concerned about various aspects of this budget, the fact that it zeros in on the people who can least afford it, the people who need help most. Certainly at this time of the year as we enter into the festive season, rather than giving a message of hope and inspiration it is ensuring us of increased and enduring hardship as we go into the new year. So much for a happy new year.

I could not help but notice in one of the documents yesterday an error that I think should be corrected because a lot of people may see it and take it to be fact. On page 66 of the document Investing In Growth, tabled December 2, 1992, it speaks about trade barriers within Canada and says "marketing boards, pricing and distribution of policies of provincially regulated marketing boards (pork products for example) can reduce interprovincial trade".

I am sure it is an oversight on the part of the minister. As a former Minister of Agriculture I am sure he is well aware that there are no interprovincial barriers to pork production. If there was to be a barrier to interprovincial movement it would have to be a federal barrier. The federal government, under the British North American Act, has jurisdiction over interprovincial trade and export trade. Only provincial governments can trade within the provinces. At the present time we do not have a national pork marketing agency. They are individual provincial marketing boards. Consequently that is an error. I draw it to the attention of the Minister of Finance. I am sure he will want to correct that statement.

I also want to point out that I am deeply alarmed by the cuts that took place in Agriculture Canada's budget. As I look at the chart that we have from the National Council of Welfare, property rates by occupation, 1990, it shows that in the heads of families the second highest is in farming, fishing and forestry. Here we have very little if any help for those industries except the 10 per cent investment tax credit made available to them. Of what use is that to the fisheries industry at the present time with the cutbacks it has had to face? How many farmers, with the incomes they have had, can use that tax credit?

I am very disturbed because farm income has utterly failed to keep pace with the Canadian average family income. About three years ago the government started referring to farm family income that included the wages of a spouse who was teaching school or nursing or if the husband was off driving a truck to supplement the farm income.

While that total family farm income for 1990 was $37,958, $21,251 of that came from sources that are not connected to the farm, such as the off-farm income I referred to. To go further than that, it left them a net of a little over $15,000 coming from the actual farm operation. Of that $8,091 came from government subsidies, either federal or provincial, but they were combined. That left a net figure of $7,615 coming from the farming operation itself. That is a national disgrace. It cannot continue. If these trends continue Canadian agriculture as we know it today will be completely destroyed.

There are some other things I want to touch on here. I am not an economist but common sense tells me as we look at what has been happening over the last 10 years. Our merchandise trade over the last 10 years has dropped from $17.6 billion in 1982 to $7.3 billion in 1992. The merchandise trade surplus has dropped by over $10 billion in those 10 years.

I also want to point out the current account deficit in Canada has gone from a surplus position in that same period of over $2 billion a year in 1982 to a deficit of $26.7 billion in 1991. That is money flowing out of Canada in either interest payments, dividends or as we heard today in Question Period, through loopholes in the tax system.

Canada cannot afford such haemorrhaging. We have done nothing to stop it and it is getting worse each year. As that continues to get worse then of course we are going to face increased hardships and further attacks on the unemployed and those people in society who can least afford it.

I am deeply concerned because one of our prominent economists, Arthur Donar argues that for each $20 billion in current account deficit, 500,000 jobs are lost and the government is allowing that to happen.

One very large food distribution and retailing firm operating in western Canada sent $538.7 million in dividends out of this country in 1990 to its parent company in the U.S. It borrowed over $400 million to do that. Guess who is going to pay back the amount in excess of $400 million? It is going to be the Canadian consumers and that money has gone out of Canada. Those dividends are part of that current account deficit. This sort of thing has to be arrested.

I am further disturbed about the closures of food processing plants. I will give you the Ontario figures first. From 1989 to 1992 a lot of plants closed. In the province of Ontario alone there were 59 closures. We keep a close check on what has been happening across Canada and some of these figures are available from Agriculture Canada, Statistics Canada, the Department of Labour as well as press reports. We find there have been over 100 closures.

As those plants close, Canadian producers lose a marketing alternative. When they lose those alternatives, we have to import those products. In that regard it adds to our current account deficit.

I am disturbed the government did not include some facts and figures on the current account deficit in the financial statement given yesterday. That is vitally important to this nation if we are going to continue to prosper and keep this social safety network that has served this country so well for so many years.

This country is built on the understanding of the needs of those less fortunate. It is built on the principle of care and compassion for the less fortunate. There has to be a dramatic turn around in policy or else there will be a lot of needy people here in Canada who are even worse off than they are now.

I am deeply concerned also about what is happening in other countries in terms of the concentration in the food production processing industry.

• (1950)

I have some facts here which come out of the sociology department of the University of Missouri. They point out that in the United States four firms control 69 per cent of the beef processing. Four firms control the same percentage of beef cattle feed lots.

I could go on and on because I have the firms listed here. The same firms are involved in production and processing. As those firms move to Canada in a big way, they will continue to erode and destroy the food producing and processing sectors in Canada.

I am deeply concerned. I do not often speak in this House on such issues as we have at the present time. I am really disturbed about this budget that was brought down. It is going to impact so viciously on so many people who can least afford it.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I rise with pleasure to participate in this debate today. I want to start off by saying to the minister of revenue I cannot give him three cheers for the particular statement he gave in the House yesterday, but I will give him two and one-half for sure. I will explain slightly why I would not give him the other half although he was certainly going in the right direction.

There are a lot of very good things in this budget. I want to compliment the minister on the fact that during this whole process as he was preparing for this particular statement, he listened, asked for and received advice from numerous people including your humble servant who is now speaking.

I am happy to say some of the things I recommended to the minister as being very appropriate to include in this statement are in fact there. They were not just hair-brained ideas I came up with to give to the minister.

In fact during the summer recess when we were back in our ridings I certainly took advantage of the opportunity to meet with numerous business people. I met with a group in conjunction with a meeting organized by the mayor of Whitby, the Durham Regional Manufacturer's Association, the Whitby Chamber of Commerce and the Whitby Junior Jaycees.

We came together with several vice-presidents of banks, I might add, to talk about the financing problems that exist for small businesses. In that meeting the issue was raised that the Small Businesses Loans Act existed, but it was there for people who wanted to invest in such things as new equipment. They appreciated the minister raised the amount from $100,000 to $200,000, but they were concerned it could not be used to assist them in their cash flow requirements on a daily basis.

I am happy to report in the minister's statement there is a clear indication there may be some assistance in those areas which were requested by the business community, the people who create jobs in the town of Whitby, the town of Ajax and the town of Pickering. I think that is a very positive step and I congratulate the minister for it.

Again, it was not my idea. It was an idea brought to me by the business community I met with during the summer. I thank the minister for that.

But he went a little further because there are businesses that are very successful and are experiencing good economic activity. They want to buy some new equipment. Not only has he improved the financing opportunity for that equipment, he has improved the tax credits for them to be able to afford to buy that equipment. That creates jobs. That equipment is manufactured in whole or in part in many areas of Canada and that creates economic activity everywhere.

There are some other things I was asked to deal with by the people I met. Unemployment insurance was of concern, not only to the business community but to my constituents who were on unemployment insurance and wanted to find jobs. Unlike some stories, I do believe and most of my constituents indicate, they want jobs. They do not want to sit at home and collect unemployment insurance. They do not want to sit at home and collect welfare. They want to find jobs.

The minister has put some very positive things in here. The first is for those businesses that want to hire the people who are on unemployment insurance. They do not face an increase in premiums because they are hiring some people. My riding has many small businesses. The minister, with full credit to him, has said to these small businesses: "We will not charge you more in the way of unemployment insurance premiums if you hire new people and get them working for you". That is very positive.

On the other side many of my small business people have said when they do hire somebody they work their 20 or 22 weeks and then for whatever reason they can come up with they quit. They say they invest all this time, money and effort in training these people and lo and behold they qualify for unemployment insurance, they get their 20 weeks and quit. I can tell you the small business community has commented to me about that.

As a member of Parliament who represents one of the largest ridings in Canada, I can tell you many of my constituents tell me they are tired of these people who quit their jobs and go on unemployment insurance because they think they are entitled to it.

I want to congratulate the minister for that very bold step of telling people if they have jobs not to quit just to go on unemployment insurance because they are not going to get it. I congratulate the minister fully on that particular step.

I also congratulate the minister on another very appropriate step that relates to the unemployment insurance scheme. My constituents have faced very difficult times in the last few years and will not be getting salary increases. In fact many of them, if not most of them, are working for less money now than two or three years ago. But lo and behold if you go on unemployment insurance you are going to get an automatic raise in April of some 3 per cent or whatever.

I congratulate the minister for telling those on unemployment insurance they are not getting a raise next year. He did not say their unemployment benefits would be cut. He said they would not be raised. The raise that would have taken place next year of some 3 per cent is being cancelled. I congratulate the minister for that.

I also congratulate the minister for the salary freeze. You do not often like to admit these things but I was one of those who in fact encouraged it to happen. I encouraged it to happen in the Public Service and throughout the various government corporations that are affected. I encouraged it to happen for senators and I know that will just cause them to have another reason to have their thoughts about me. I also encouraged it to happen for members of Parliament.

I would have liked a raise, but I have 185,000 constituents and many of them are not getting raises. I think it is about time we in this collective Chamber decide we have to live within the means. Someday in the future when this Parliament and our budget systems in Canada are much more in line with the economic realities, maybe we can afford to give members of Parliament a raise. A two year freeze on MPs' salaries and all those others affected certainly does not bother me in the least. I can tell you I was one of those who recommended this and I have no hesitation in supporting that particular activity.

I think the minister was very wise in his statement relating to the infrastructure problem. We have unemployed people across Canada, there is no doubt about that. One of the easiest and quickest things we can do to get some people back to work is to put some money into building roads, bridges, highways and all those kinds of things.

First, they are very locally oriented so if you are going to build a bridge in Ajax, the construction workers of Ajax are probably going to be working on it. Across Canada, construction workers probably have one of the highest rates of unemployment. Lo and behold the Minister of Finance in his economic statement has said the government is going to put some money into infrastructure development.

It will be good for Atlantic Canada. It will be good for western Canada with highways through the national parks. It will be good for southern Ontario because money is going to be put into level crossings at railroads where a safety factor often has to be addressed. Those are very high concentrations of employment creation and I commend the minister for making those steps.

I also commend the minister for his commitment to getting on with the job of building the fixed link to Prince Edward Island. As someone from Ontario, you might question why I would even care about that. Those kinds of projects are important to the over-all structure of Canada. There is the whole highway aspect of eastern Canada and the maritimes. Part of the problem in this country is you must have the transportation systems in place to have economic activity. You have to make it possible for people and business to locate in regions of Canada and yet get to other parts of Canada. It is a very good economic decision.

I travelled extensively throughout the United States in my previous career. I was always amazed at how easy it was to get into some very rural parts of the United States. There would be large industries and maybe one industry towns. Manufacturing industries were located there for many reasons. One of them was the transportation systems were in place to allow industry to get its products to market. The best thing we can do for the maritimes and other regions of Canada is put in place a transportation system to allow industry to locate there without having to get a government grant. Government grants to locate industry are not the best thing.

I talked about some of the other things. I am really running short of time. I like the cuts in grants to organizations of 10 per cent across the board. However, this is where I miss out on my half a per cent. I had some in mind that I recommended should be cut totally and I am sorry they were not; the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, the Canadian Labour Congress and some business groups that get grants. There is a whole bunch I would like to cut off totally. Recognizing them may be difficult to do.

In very short order, I just want to put the minister on notice that I will be back for his February or March budget telling him about the groups I am ready to cut. I will also be back to tell him how I think we ought to adjust the MPs' pension plan and finally and certainly not least of all, I will be telling him how I think we have to address the deficit even further than we have already done.

I give the minister a good mark for effort on this. I cannot quite give him three cheers. However, it is probably one of the best statements I have heard the minister give and I give him full marks for that.

Mrs. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to speak about the economic situation in the north and generally in Canada.

Canadians in every region of this country have suffered in this recession, northern Canadians included. In fact, northerners must cope with additional economic difficulties due to their geographic location from the main economic corridors of the country. As a result, the cost of living in the north is 60 per cent higher than in the south. Major transportation routes and infrastructures remain basically incomplete.

A serious housing shortage threatens many northern communities. There is, I believe, a backlog of 3,500 units. The number of housing units, as has been announced, has been cut in half. This is something that is intolerable and unacceptable with the kinds of conditions northerners live in.

A lack of financial support threatens important aboriginal programs and organizations such as Indigenous Survival International, the fur industry defence program. There was no announcement for a commitment to those particular efforts that are much needed by the traditional harvesters of Canada.

With regard to public infrastructure, the NWT highway development, yesterday's economic statement outlined the government's commitment to undertake regional infrastructure projects to strengthen our national transportation system and communications network. Improving transportation in the north is crucial. Transportation is essentially the lifeline of the north due to the vast distances and the isolation which exists between communities. Transportation costs in the NWT are the highest in Canada. Economic development in the north cannot proceed without proper roads.

Never mind roads, if we lose Canadian Airlines as one of our carriers in the Northwest Territories, we will have a monopoly that will drive prices to a rate that would be intolerable and I think unconstitutional and unfair to people in the region who essentially will not have any other choice. They do not have a highway system.

The GNWT has identified the need of $3 billion for development. The government leader, Nellie Cournoyea, has raised this issue with federal leaders at various meetings. I believe this was an issue that was profiled at the economic meetings among the premiers of the country. New roads are the constitutional and legal responsibility of the federal government. It has to be noted that only existing roads were transferred to the Northwest Territories, not any new initiatives.

I guess gone is the dream of Roads to Resources that Mr. Diefenbaker implemented. That certainly is not a Tory goal at this stage of the game.

The Kitikmeot region in the NWT is very mineral rich but cannot develop without a transportation network. The Mackenzie Valley highway extension from Fort Wrigley to Inuvik is 804 kilometres and will cost $500 million. This is something that northerners have supported. I put forward a petition to the House just recently about this.

GNWT cannot afford to build any new roads without the federal government contribution. While the government will spend approximately $5.25 million in the 1993-94 fiscal year, the needs are great and the north simply cannot be developed without transportation infrastructure. There is a great need in the north for new roads and ports, but $3 billion is needed and so is the initiative of the federal government where the responsibility lies squarely.

Yesterday's economic statement outlines that federal roads and roadworks in western Canada's national parks will be upgraded. We as westerners from the north, of course, assume that this includes the Wood Buffalo National Park, one of the outstanding parks in the world. Wood Buffalo National Park is one of Canada's most precious prizes in terms of parks.

The superintendent of Wood Buffalo National Park has announced that the park can no longer operate the winter road between Fort Chipewyan, Alberta, and Fort Smith, Northwest Territories. We need to extricate a definite commitment from the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Finance that this indeed includes the initiative that was announced yesterday. The amount that they are asking for is a meagre $76,000 to keep these communities connected by a winter road. The 130 kilometre winter road provides winter-only access between Fort Smith, a population of 2,500, and Fort Chipewyan, a population of 1,300.

This other community outside of my riding borders the community of the hon. member for Athabasca. He also has an interest in seeing that this particular goal is achieved.

The road is open for four months a year approximately. This is the only means of access and transportation link between the isolated communities during winter months. The average cost to operate the road for four months is $60,000. I said $76,000; it is $60,000.

Clearly, as far as developing regional infrastructure projects, the federal government must consider a permanent road through Wood Buffalo National Park and a policy funding initiative whereby the cost of maintaining and continuing the Fort Smith winter road would be guaranteed, possibly through cost-sharing initiatives split between the province, territories and federal government.

Another issue that came up yesterday was that there would be an improvement in the airports in the north. The federal government has different levels of airports for which it has maintained support. The federal government must provide the desperately needed funding that would enable the GNWT to meet the existing needs and requirements for the improvements and upgrading of a number of community airports in the Northwest Territories in light of the fact that northern residents rely upon air transportation more than any other means of transportation. This critical and basic need is also an issue of safety.

The responsibility that the federal government had for the grassroots community is no longer there. It has transferred that responsibility to the GNWT. Those communities have real need. If no further resources are going to be allocated to the government of the Northwest Territories, we are not going to be able to deal with these specific needs.

I can think specifically off the top of my head of two instances where safety is an issue. In the community of Fort Franklin we had a very major accident in the last 15 years. We did not have the requirements met and there was an accident which resulted in the loss of life. The community is very concerned in that the airport runway is situated so that aeroplanes fly right over a schoolyard so the community wants the airport relocated.

In the community of Trout Lake, Northwest Territories, which is also a priority listed under the GNWT's airport plan, the community experiences severe cross-winds, extremely dangerous because it is not a sometimes thing. It is a constant problem for people going in and out of that community.

Regarding the home buyers plan and the Northwest Territories housing needs, the Minister of Finance said the RRSP program for first time home buyers would be extended for one more year. This is good news. Unfortunately, there are virtually no private housing markets outside of Yellowknife. This means a lack of affordable housing alternatives in most communities.

The federal government's decision to reduce the NWT housing budget will mean 200 fewer low-cost shared social housing units which will be built in the Northwest Territories in 1993. This comes at a time when the need for housing in the Northwest Territories has risen by 14 per cent over the last two years, in spite of the GNWT providing 800 units during this two year period. The NWT housing unit needs are unique. Severe climate isolated communities make construction and maintenance of housing unit costs five times higher than in the south. A higher percentage of residents in the north rely on social housing assistance as compared to the south.

The federal Department of Indian and Northern Affairs and Development does not contribute funding specifically for native housing in the NWT as it does in other jurisdictions. The birth rate in the Northwest Territories is more than twice the national average.

The federal reductions will have a definite impact: increased numbers of families in need of housing assistance, overcrowding and inadequate conditions will increase social and health-related problems, and loss of construction and other jobs in the private sector. The government needs to reinstate social housing funding to the NWT to the 1991 level. This is being recommended to the aboriginal affairs committee in the housing study they are doing. Hopefully we will be able to get some redress there.

Program cuts are of particular interest to natives and interest groups. I really resent the way in which interest groups or advocacy groups are being labelled by the government.

I might end by quoting one of the people who has written to me on this particular issue. What has happened over the last couple of years is that advocacy groups are being referred to in a very negative way. They pick up where the government has left off and I think that they do very good work.

I would like to quote one of the people from my riding who has indicated to me concern about the kind of situation that will be created by the reduction. Lynn Brooks with the NWT status of women has indicated the situation for women and children living in some of the northern communities is virtually explosive. In order to help and to have resources available, there needs to be funding. Women, children and seniors always fall at the bottom of this list.

In closing, I have to say that these cuts are very detrimental to the other community programs that we have, specifically the friendship centres. The Tree of Peace Friendship Centre in the Northwest Territories which offers very important programs like kindergarten, adult education, native outreach, drug and alcohol abuse programs and a camp for children in the summer is very important to our community. It cannot endure this 10 per cent cut.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, Bill C-98, Borrowing Authority Act 1992-93, No. 2. The statement of the minister yesterday in speaking on this bill of course was an admission of failure. The minister kept talking about what the deficit is going to be this year, what it is going to be next year and the year after. For four years I have heard ministers of finance tell us quite confidently what the deficit is going to be five years from now and then estimate what it will be this year and perhaps next year.

Madam Speaker, I am sure you have had occasion in your career, or in your home life at least, to have used a funnel. There is a small hole at one end and a big hole at the other. As you pour material into the large hole, you can direct the flow through the small hole. Everything works out fine as long as you do it that way.

But, Madam Speaker, it would not occur to you to turn the funnel upside down and do it the other way around, trying to pour something into the wrong end of the funnel. That is what the Minister of Finance has been doing in trying to get the economy going. He is trying to pour the medicine into the wrong end of the funnel. In the process of doing that, of course a lot of it is being wasted. It misses the small hole and as it comes out the large hole, it is spread around and does not do any good.

The process has failed for two years now. This is not the first time they have tried it. Each time we get a new budget or a statement such as we had yesterday, the minister is trying to deal with the problem by going backward, pouring the medicine through the small hole and letting it come out the large hole and losing the effect.

Other members have talked about 1.5 million people unemployed in this country. They have talked about 2.5 million on social welfare, a total of four million people. That is a serious problem. It is very serious for the people involved. The talk so far has been about them and the harm this is causing them and what they are doing without.

There is another way of looking at those people. They are all potential customers. They all want to purchase something but they do not have the wherewithal to purchase it. What does the government do? The government says: "We will help small businesses produce more stuff. We are going to give them breaks on their depreciation allowance so that they can claim more depreciation for small businesses". This is the case after it was introduced in the budget this spring.

That will not help small businesses. It will not help them if they cannot produce anything and they cannot produce if they cannot sell. They cannot sell if there are not customers out there wanting to buy and able to buy, with the wherewithal to buy. That is the problem.

The government is going to increase the loan limit. What is the point in saying to the prospective borrower and to the lender that if this business person can produce financial statements that show that he or she can produce at a profit, and that unless they can do that the bank is not going to lend any money at whatever rate or whatever limit? If that business person could come to the prospective lender and say: "Here are my projections. I know that this business is out there waiting to buy if I produce this item. Will you lend to me knowing that I can make a profit on selling these items", then that prospective borrower has a much better chance of getting that loan.

What the government should be doing, instead of taking away from the unemployed and taking away from the people who do not have money, is giving the money directly to them, pouring the medicine through the small end of the funnel rather than through the large end, directing it to the people who need it most.

The Minister of Finance has been listening to a lot of advice since we started this debate at about 3.15 yesterday afternoon until midnight last night and probably until midnight again tonight. I have some sympathy for him. He is listening to a bunch of his own members tell him what a great job he has done, and he is listening to opposition members tell him what a terrible job he has done and, as I did, to say that it is an admission of failure when he comes in with the statement he made yesterday.

I am not sure if he would not like to consider for one moment what I have been talking about, which is that he should work it the other way around: put the money where the prospective customers are and make the purchasing power available to the four million people who are on social welfare and who are unemployed. Then small business will have the opportunity that it needs to expand.

That will create employment. That will get the economy going. As for giving the money directly to the small business people, if they are already making a profit, so be it, they will get a little more. If they are not making a profit it is not going to help them. They are not going to be able to borrow. They are not going to be able to do anything. It might slow down the time it takes them to go bankrupt as businesses are doing at a great rate in this country.

There is a way. It is not new. There is nothing new about it at all. This government has not tried it. There should be more money spent on education. The government has cut back on the money going to the provinces to help them with their educational programs. The government did not produce the training programs that were promised as part of the free trade deal. There are things like that that could and should be done that would get things moving in Canada.

More than anything else the thing that the government can do right now that would be most impressive would be to put money in the hands of the people that we know would spend it in Canada on goods that are being produced in Canada, not on goods that are being imported, especially with the dollar going down. That is good. That means that people are going to be buying more Canadian produce and more Canadian articles because it is more expensive to buy the imports. It helps us sell in outside markets.

Interest is something that does have to be paid. To the extent that it is interest on borrowed money we have to export to be able to pay that interest.

• (2020)

To the extent that it is interest paid on money borrowed within Canada then that is simply redistributing income within Canada, shifting the income within Canada. That is not as serious a problem.

That advice was given by a finance minister in the province of British Columbia in the early 1940s, incidentally another Tory, the hon. Herbert Anscomb. He said: "A government should never borrow but in the event that it has to borrow in bad times to maintain its public service then it should never borrow externally. It should do its borrowing internally".

That, too, is not new. We did that during the war, and we prospered. We borrowed internally because there was nowhere else to borrow. Everybody was busy doing their own thing. Everybody was busy expanding their own industries in their own countries. We borrowed it all internally. We piled up a tremendous debt during the war doing that, and we paid it off afterwards because we kept the money circulating within Canada. It is only when we started borrowing from abroad that we started to run into trouble.

However, the immediate answer for now is simply to put this money where it will do the most good. Instead of giving it to people and saying: "Go out and hire somebody, it does not matter what you do, just hire somebody", and then not being able to police it anyway, instead of giving them increased depreciation allowances that will let them write off their taxes faster put the money in the hands of the unemployed, put the money in the hands of the people who are on social welfare, and they will create a genuine business boom that will start the economy of Canada moving again.

We have gone down the wrong road. We have cut back on education and cut back on training. We are giving money to companies. I have no real quarrel with taxing corporations or not taxing them. As a matter of fact, I would be inclined to look at the Carter report again if I really wanted to get things going. Carter went so far as to recommend no corporation tax but said to make sure that we get it from the individuals who are profiting from the business activities of those corporations. Of course, that would mean a total change in the tax structure and I do not recommend doing that all in one fell swoop. That is something that would have to be done gradually.

To return to what I was talking about, the funnel analogy, put the medicine in the right end of the funnel, let it spread around and let it be picked up by people who would benefit from it and who would then benefit the whole economy by spending that money within the economy.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to enter the debate on this economic statement presented by the former Minister of Transport with whom I had a lot of memorable days and years when he was the critic for transport and I was a parliamentary secretary. He says those days are over. Yes, but I thought he had learned something over the years and judging from his economic statement he has not learned very much.

My constituents of Parkdale—High Park are pleased to hear that the home buyers' plan, which we had recommended for the last two years now, has been extended by one year. However the problem in my riding is that most of them cannot afford to buy a home right now and therefore the real estate economy is down. Even if some of my constituents of Parkdale—High Park could afford a home they may not buy one for fear of losing their job in this new economic order cooked up by this Conservative government.

If people lose their jobs under this new regime they may no longer qualify for unemployment insurance. This is the kind of thing that makes the blood boil in most Canadians. It creates a national anger that is growing and spreading across this land. I have never seen such frustration, such anger as we have in our country right now.

For those who have paid UI premiums for years the safety net has now been removed. If they are fired or if they leave their job voluntarily they no longer qualify for UI benefits. Tell me, how many Canadians does this government intend to force onto the welfare rolls? How many women have been forced to leave their jobs because of sexual harassment? Without at least the UI option this government simply expects women to grin and bear it. The Minister of Employment and Immigration rose in the House today and provided no reassurance to women. The minister's only response was: "Trust me". Canadians are through trusting this government, especially this Minister of Employment and Immigration and the last two finance ministers.

My daughter, who is in her second year of university, did for one of her projects a study of projections made by finance ministers over the last eight years. She was horrified. She came to me and said: "Dad, those ministers lied". I said: "No, no, Elaine, we do not use that word. That is not parliamentary". However, this young Canadian starting university was shocked that she cannot trust the finance ministers who are setting the economy for this country.

This government told Canadians that the first priority was jobs, jobs, jobs. Instead, what do we have? Higher taxes, taxes, taxes. The reality of the situation is that the national unemployment rate is 11.3 per cent. In metro Toronto the unemployment rate is a full percentage point higher than the national average, 12.3 per cent. Toronto and Montreal were cities of opportunities. I remember people from Saskatchewan and Manitoba coming to Toronto, people from Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island coming to Montreal or Toronto to find jobs because that is where the jobs were. Now the people from Toronto, people from my riding, are looking to go to other provinces, but there are no jobs there either. For young people aged 18 to 24 that rate may be as high as 23 per cent.

My constituency office is becoming an employment office. It is very sad to see students with masters degrees and Ph.D.s begging: "Mr. Flis, can you help us find a job?" They are that desperate. People who were self-employed, architects and project managers in engineering who have worked for 15 or 20 years, are now coming embarrassed to their member of Parliament saying: "Mr. Flis, maybe through your contacts you can help me find a job". They are too embarrassed to go on the welfare rolls. They are too embarrassed to go on the UI rolls, but they are forced to do this. How can the minister look Canadians straight in the eye and say: "Trust me"? No one trusts this government any more.

Let us look at the small business employment and investment package. It says that the ceiling for loans to small firms under the Small Businesses Loans Act will be increased to $250,000. That sounds great but the problem is that the banks are not willing to invest in small firms during this recession. Twice nothing is still nothing.

Small business people come to my office and explain to me that they have a payroll to meet, they have to pay income tax to Revenue Canada, and because of a low cash flow they cannot pay it that month. Revenue Canada penalizes them 20 per cent. Representatives from one firm came to me owing $80,000 to Revenue Canada, and Revenue Canada is insisting that this be paid immediately. The firm is saying: "If we pay this $80,000 we go bankrupt. We employ 10 people. If Revenue Canada would forego this penalty the firm agrees to pay the interest but if Revenue Canada could forgive the penalty for at least the duration of the recession then I could maybe survive".

Representatives from another business came to me owing Revenue Canada $40,000. They said: "Mr. Flis, it means going under. If we are forced to pay this, it means going under". I did refer them to Revenue Canada because I understand that there is a plan to help small businesses that are being threatened with bankruptcy to somehow negotiate with Revenue Canada to save these businesses. Mr. Minister, this is a good plan but why are you not advertising it? Why do not more small businesses that are going bankrupt know about this? To announce that the small business loan has increased to $250,000 does not mean a darn thing because they go to the bank and they cannot get $40,000.

They cannot get a $50,000 loan. They are kicked in the rear by Revenue Canada and they are kicked from the front by the banks.

Instead of the banks being good corporate citizens, what they are doing is deteriorating the state of the economy of this country. Together with Revenue Canada and the banks, the small entrepreneurs, the businesses, are not getting much help today.

No one has confidence in this government any more. The money lenders do not have confidence. Entrepreneurs do not have confidence. Consumers do not have confidence—nobody; as the Russians would say, nada.

Look at the deficit fighting program of this government. It represents a litany of unrealistic and failed promises in the billions. Where cost savings have been realized, the government takes a bow. These savings are usually at the expense of the provinces which in turn must pass along the burden to the municipalities. My leader pointed out in his debate that he met with the mayor of Montreal. The mayor is very concerned how the city cannot bear carrying the welfare payments for the unemployed.

I happened to be on a Liberal task force crossing Ontario. We talked to the chairman of metropolitan Toronto, Alan Tonks. He has the same concern. The people are exhausting their UI benefits. They are forced to go on the welfare rolls and the big and smaller cities cannot afford the tab.

The minister stands up here and says look what a great job we are doing because we are cutting back. It makes the federal government look good but who ends up picking up the tab? Provinces are not picking up the tab. The poor municipalities end up picking up the tab. They end up becoming the fall guy.

This government professes that governments should be run on the same principles as business in the private sector. If that is so, the Minister of Finance would have been fired a long time ago. He did a better job in transport. I recommend that he go back there.

What if the minister then tries to apply for UI benefits? He would soon find out that he is not eligible for benefits through his own misconduct.

Let us look at the record of financial management of this government, this so-called deficit fighting government. In 1984 the national debt stood at $170 billion. By the end of this fiscal year it is $420 billion. When we turned over the reins at $170 billion, we at least borrowed money in Canada from pension plans and so on. This government, no. It is the big shot. It went on the foreign markets. No wonder we have a $420 billion public debt. No wonder we are in the mess that we are in.

I know my time is up, I will close. I am pleased the Minister of Finance is sitting here. I hope that he will listen to the people of Parkdale—High Park. I am just their servant. I am their spokesman but I say to the minister times are tough across Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in the debate following the recent economic statement made by the Minister of Finance. He gave us a good description of our economic future and of how we will reach our goals.

We will continue to follow sound monetary and fiscal policies. We will continue to increase the efficiency of the public sector. We will continue to open our markets while improving our productivity and our competitiveness in order to meet the competition challenge. We will invest more in our human resources and in our infrastructure in partnership with Canadians and other jurisdictions in order to promote growth.

Many Canadians, including my colleagues opposite, have trouble dealing with the globalization phenomenon which started in the 1990s. Some would have liked things to remain the way they were and Canadians to have a false sense of security thanks to an imaginary protection against the outside world.

Mr. Speaker, we must still face contemporary economic realities. We can no longer live turned in on ourselves and looking towards the past. We must have a forward-looking vision. The last thing we want is for the Canadian economy to fall into a permanent slump. The new initiatives and maintenance of the policies announced by the minister will help us enter the 21st century on the right foot.

I do not pretend for a moment that the changes and restructuring that we have gone through and continue to undergo have been easy for anyone, including the federal government.

Nevertheless, since 1984 we have pursued an economic program to give all Canadians a more secure future with better economic opportunities and we now see the result of it. For example, Canada has the lowest inflation rate among the seven largest industrial countries, the G-7, namely 1.4 per cent this year. Productivity growth is now 2.6 per cent and our trade efforts abroad are starting to give results. Canada's merchandise balance of trade, a key to reducing the current account deficit, is up nearly $2 billion over last year.

Consumer confidence is being restored. Employment has started to grow, domestic demand has strengthened and real exports are rising. The improvements are slight but undeniable. But that is not enough. Our economy is slow to come out of the recent recession. One of the factors holding us back is the low growth in all the G-7 countries, our trading partners. They have the same problems we do.

In his statement on Canada's economic future the Minister of Finance reiterated and strengthened the government's commitment to continue working to expand our markets. The importance of permanently expanding our trade potential internationally was a highlight of the statement. I would like to spend a few minutes on this subject.

International trade is vital for the Canadian economy. Canada depends more on foreign trade than any of the G-7 countries except Germany. You see, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian market is relatively small. If we want Canadians to keep the standard of living to which they are accustomed we need international trade.

Canada exports more than a quarter of its domestic production and one job in four depends on our country's exports. Exports create jobs and help companies reduce their production costs, while imports offer consumers a wide choice of low-priced goods and services.

One way to stimulate foreign trade is to improve access to markets through clear and equitable trade rules. Trade barriers hurt Canada much more than they hurt nations with a large domestic market and our country is also more vulnerable to trade instability. These problems can only be solved by negotiating trade agreements. The trade agreements offer new opportunities to businesses that want to be competitive worldwide by improving their products and lowering their costs. The agreements also provide dispute settlement mechanisms which make trade relations surer and more stable.

Since foreign trade is so important to maintaining and improving our welfare, Canada has been a leader in the effort to liberalize world trade since the end of the Second World War.

As part of a two-pronged trade liberalization strategy, Canada has worked for freer international trade through the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, GATT, and free trade agreements with its regional partners.

As a result of successive GATT negotiations, customs duties on our imports have been reduced and our access to foreign markets has improved. For example, Canadian import duties have fallen from over 10 per cent in 1955 to less than 4 per cent in 1990.

On Wednesday, the minister reiterated that the government will work to bring the Uruguay round negotiations to a conclusion. The success of these negotiations would have a major impact on Canada and the rest of the world and would avoid an escalation in costly trade conflicts.

Canada has also concluded regional trade agreements in accordance with GATT rules. The first important agreement was the auto pact with the United States in 1965.

• (2040)

The 1989 Canada-U.S. free trade agreement falls directly in line with this strategy. In spite of the recent recession FTA has had positive results. Canada has markedly increased the volume and the balance of its trade with the United States since the introduction of FTA. Under the agreement, tariff and non-tariff barriers have been lowered and a dispute settlement mechanism put in place, giving us a more stable access to our biggest export market.

Canadian exports to the United States are up $16 billion since the free trade agreement. Also, FTA has attracted more investments to Canada. Foreign investments in the manufacturing sector increased from $1.3 billion in 1989 to $3.1 billion in 1991.

Investments are just as important as foreign trade to ensure economic prosperity. They increase productivity and allow for the creation of more highly paid jobs requiring higher skills. FTA has made Canada more attractive to foreign investors.

The North American free trade agreement is another step in the ongoing strategy followed by Canada to liberalize exchanges. The minister spoke of our commitment to ratify NAFTA.

The North American free trade zone will be the largest in the world with a population of 361 million and a gross domestic product of $7 billion.

Thanks to NAFTA, Canada has made major gains which will improve our economic future and open new opportunities to Canadian businesses.

NAFTA will give us better access to an ever increasing Mexican market. It will protect and improve important FTA gains. Finally, it will protect Canadian interests on the American market and will make Canada more attractive to foreign investors. If Canada had stayed out of NAFTA negotiations, the United States would have been the main winners since they would have been the only country to have privileged access to both the Mexican and the Canadian markets.

By staying the course on trade liberalization through NAFTA, Canada will improve its competitiveness, create new jobs and stimulate economic growth.

Trade liberalization will increase Canada's competitiveness and its ability to ensure a high standard of living for its citizens. Competitiveness and a high standard of living will mean more jobs, better security and increased prosperity for every Canadian, which is one of the main goals of the government.

Therefore, I urge all the members of this House to support these initiatives.

[English]

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, it was interesting last week. I had a constituent visit and we were talking about the monetary and fiscal policies of the government and at that time my constituent, Dale MacLean from Penticton, British Columbia, presented me with a tie and he asked me to wear that tie in the House tonight to point out the Mickey Mouse policies of this government.

He talked about the three frontbenchers, Huey, Dewey and Louie sitting there forming the policies of this government and how he felt that the government was in fantasy land because it simply did not face realities.

When I looked at what was in the particular economic and fiscal statement of the minister there were two things that occurred to me that fit the theme of this beautiful tie that he presented me with. One was that with Christmas coming it appeared that Scrooge McDuck had something to say about this. With taking away the 3 per cent from the unemployed, putting the rest of the economic situation on to the provinces, the government was not acting very well prior to Christmas, and that the Minister of Finance was acting like Scrooge. I thought that was a rather Goofy policy.

Looking at what the media has said since, I was listening to a number of speeches today by members of the government who were quoting The Financial Times and others. I got a number of clippings from various newspapers. One dates back to November 24 in the Edmonton Journal in the Minister of Finance's own back yard of Vegreville. It was interesting because the headline was "Mulroney's Tories run out of gas". In one of the paragraphs it states: "A mini-budget from finance minister Don Mazankowski is unlikely to make a big difference. The bottom line is this: Brian Mulroney has had eight years to create the jobs and prosperity he promised in 1984 and he has failed". How prophetic.

We can look at a number of others. In The Globe and Mail, Jeffrey Simpson states: "Finance Minister Don Mazankowski's economic statement yesterday displayed all the hallmarks of a government running on an intellectual fuel tank marked empty". He goes on to say further: "By its non-choice, it revealed itself to be tired by the exertions of the past seven years, timid in the face of increasingly painful choices, and too far along in its mandate to make the bold policy choices the country's economic and fiscal problems require".

In The Ottawa Citizen it states that the economic statement is too little, too late, too Tory. It says that instead of broad bold policies "Canadians get Reaganism in aspic".

Hugh Winsor in the December 3 The Globe and Mail states:

> Tories could have done something about the rapidly accumulating debt in 1987 and 1988 when the economy was on the boil. Instead, they gave everybody a pre-election income tax rebate while pushing up spending in politically sensitive areas.
> In their zeal to slay the inflation dragon after winning the 1988 election, they also killed off hope and economic confidence, which is why yesterday's statement is such a confused effort.
> When in doubt, tinker, and yesterday's statement did a lot of that.

The Ottawa Sun headline says: "Snow clouds?" The article said: "If there is snow on the ground this morning, was finance minister Don Mazankowski responsible?" Further on it states: "The reason some snow jobs work after all is that details are often covered up by whatever has fallen from the sky—the hows and the wherefroms being obscured by the wish to believe that there will finally be some magical solution to ease their burden".

It appears that the finance minister aimed and he shot, but he missed the mark. He did not have anything new to tell us. He went through the same old Reagan economics, the same old Thatcherite economics and he fell well short.

It is unfortunate in the aftermath of the policies set out by this government that there are 1.6 million unemployed and that the poverty rate has increased substantially.

Looking at the Christmas season and what we have to look forward to in Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and the Boundary country, I spoke to a number of food banks over the last few days.

In the small community of Merritt, 60 people, 40 per cent of whom are children and 10 per cent employed use the food banks in Merritt. The Boundary country unfortunately does not have enough food for all of the people lining up at the food banks. In Penticton they get 180 people per month and over 40 per cent of those are children. In Oliver, British Columbia, a community of some 4,500 to 5,000 people, 100 people a month line up, 40 per cent of whom are children.

Nationally, there are 1.2 million Canadian kids living in poverty. In 1990 it was estimated there were 3.8 million Canadians living in poverty, an increase of 12 per cent over 1989. Over the year we know that poverty statement has increased. Half of these are considered working poor.

The Canadian Association of Food Banks says there were two million people including 700,000 children who visited a food bank at least once in 1991.

If we look at what has happened with the income tax situation we know and the figures show that the average Canadian family will pay $1,894 more now than what they did in 1984 when this government came into power.

We have pedalled backward instead of moving forward. We have already had a number of people come up and make their speeches and suggest a number of alternatives.

It is important in looking at what is happening in Canada to emphasize the position that when food banks were created in 1981 they were created as a temporary solution to the problem of hunger in our country and in our society. Now there are over 400 of those food banks in Canada and they have so many people lining up that they cannot feed them all.

We look at the situation with seniors. We know once again that so many of our seniors live below the poverty line. Of those seniors, a majority of them are single women.

I looked at the financial statement from the perspectives of British Columbia, western Canada, and Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and the Boundary country. I wondered what was in there that was going to help the people in those areas.

I looked at it from the perspective of seniors. Well, luckily guaranteed income supplement and old age pension were not touched. But the government cut across the board 10 per cent on grants. If the New Horizons grants are cut 10 per cent I will say that in my riding and I am certain in many of the ridings across Canada, those grants have become a necessary part of increasing the education of seniors, increasing seniors helping seniors, wellness programs, increasing the availability of hospice programs, it goes on and on with respect to seniors and I hate to see those cut.

If we look at it from the perspective of the young, I am concerned about some of the cuts in unemployment insurance. We have the situation where we have cut back the mobility of some of these young people who move from job to job but need some time within which to move. They quit and they move on. These are not people who abuse the system. They are people who are trying to do better things. So they quit a $5.50 an hour job, look around and maybe move on to a $7 an hour job. They have been substantially injured in the ability to do that by the cutbacks.

There are so many things in this statement that we could talk about. Agriculture has been cut back. I end by simply saying that the monetary policies of this government have not been cured by this. The fiscal policies have not been cured. The unemployment rate runs rampant. People are hurting out there. We have not created those jobs.

Madam Speaker, this is a Mickey Mouse government with a Mickey Mouse policy.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this important debate on the Canadian economy and the future course of our economic policy.

We are looking at investing in economic policies designed to increase and permanently establish prosperity for all Canadians. To achieve this our government suggests that we should improve our productivity if we are to compete on the global market which is becoming increasingly competitive at the turn of the century and beyond.

One of our main priorities is to encourage increased productivity in Canada. This is absolutely necessary if we are to meet the challenge of an increasingly competitive global economy.

This increased productivity will provide a broader scope of options for all Canadians. It will improve our standard of living by making real wages higher and allowing us to buy more goods and services, while having more time at our disposal for leisure and hobbies.

In other words, by working smarter and more efficiently, we will raise our standard of living and our quality of life across the country.

Unfortunately, Canada's productivity performance has deteriorated since the late 1970s. Many people believe our productivity has gone down because of rising inflation, uncertainty about public policy and government intervention in the economy. Whatever the reason, the fact is that the slowing down of total factor productivity since the 1970s is reflected in weaker growth of labour productivity and real wages.

This drop in productivity growth must be reversed. To achieve this, we must invest more in technologies, physical capital and human resources. However, this will only occur if the economic environment is favourable to productivity-enhancing investment. This requires macroeconomic stability as reflected in low inflation, fiscal prudence and appropriate fiscal policies that expand the opportunities for people to work, invest and innovate.

Madam Speaker, this is exactly the kind of economic climate our government has tried to put in place since it came to power. However, changes of the kind we had to bring about cannot be achieved overnight. The world recession has also postponed many of the positive spinoffs that would now be felt if the world economy were in better shape. However, the International Monetary Fund and the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development are of the opinion that next year Canada will experience the strongest rate of economic growth of any industrialized country. I think that the best way the government can help improve productivity in this country is to stay the course.

For instance we must continue to cut public spending. We have legislated annual spending ceilings through the Spending Control Act. We must also continue to privatize Crown corporations, restructure federal activities and keep public service wage settlements in line. The economic and financial statement presented by the Minister of Finance reinforces the government's commitment to spending restrictions. Thanks to the measures announced by the minister, spending will be cut by nearly $8 billion over the next two fiscal years.

Spending cutbacks allow us to pursue our efforts to reduce borrowing requirements, and, together with a sound monetary policy, have made it possible to keep inflation and interest rates at levels that support instead of undermining productive investment. In fact, I am proud to say that Canada had the lowest rate of inflation, an average of 1.5 per cent over the first ten months of 1992, of all G-7 countries.

Low inflation protects people's purchasing power and reduces capital costs for business. It also leads to lower interest rates. In spite of recent increases, the lower interest rates since 1990 have helped stimulate productive investments and made Canadian goods and services more affordable on both the domestic and the foreign market.

The government must also continue to invest in structural policies that will help productive investments recover. For example, we must realize that we need a skilled labour force to increase our international competitiveness and our productivity. That is why we have invested in human resources by redirecting unemployment insurance from passive income support to active skills acquisition. That is why spending on worker training and adjustment has increased from $1.2 billion to $3.5 billion in the past two years. That is also why the Minister of Finance announced more aid in his economic and fiscal statement.

We have also invested in economic growth by reforming Canada's tax system. In particular we eliminated the manufacturers' sales tax which cost Canadians jobs and replaced it with the goods and services tax. The GST makes an important contribution to our international competitiveness by reducing the tax included in Canadian exports. Since it came into effect Canadian exporters have saved over $3.5 billion.

To achieve economic prosperity we must continue to invest in the small business sector which is the primary engine of employment growth in this country. Today, thanks to special tax provisions, small businesses enjoy assistance totalling $3 billion annually.

The Minister of Finance has proposed a small business employment and investment package to help small businesses and create new jobs. The measures announced by the minister include capping the employer share of unemployment insurance premiums for one year, a one-year investment tax credit for small businesses and an extension of the Small Business Financing Program.

We must continue to invest actively in research and development. R and D is essential in developing new products and processes which are the key to success and growth in a global economy.

Since we came to power we have introduced the most generous tax incentives for R and D of any major industrialized country. For instance the February budget provided for additional assistance totalling $230 million over five years to support Canadian companies undertaking research and development.

Furthermore, in his economic statement the Minister of Finance announced changes to allow the tax rules to better reflect how R and D is actually performed in the business community. We must continue to invest in broadening trade opportunities. As the global economy becomes increasingly competitive, countries and companies that try to ignore this fact will see their share of world trade deteriorate and their economies decline.

That is why we are doing our best to bring about a positive conclusion to the Uruguay round, the series of multilateral trade talks held under the GATT. We are trying to improve our trade relations with east Asian countries, including Korea, Thailand and Singapore.

In 1988 we negotiated and successfully implemented the free trade agreement with the United States, our most important trading partner.

Madam Speaker, as you know the FTA has paid off. Since it came into effect our exports to the United States have increased by more than $16 billion. This represents about 200,000 jobs. The FTA also gave us the power to review any measures taken by the United States including countervail and anti-dumping, while providing for an open process in which arbitrators fairly selected by both parties are able to quash decisions that are unfair.

The North American free trade agreement is a logical extension of the FTA. There is a very real potential for growth in sales of Canadian products and services to Mexico. It is also a fact that the United States plan to enter into some kind of free trade agreement with Mexico, with or without the participation of Canada.

If we had not been at the negotiating table any increase in trade with and international investment in Mexico would have gone to the United States.

In concluding, perhaps I may recapitulate. Further improving our standard of living will require strengthening the rate of productivity growth in this country. What the government can and must do is invest in macroeconomic stability and appropriate structural policies that expand the opportunities for people to work, invest and innovate.

That is what the government has done and will keep on doing.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I have sat in the House all day and listened to presentations from both sides of the House and different parties. I have been amazed by the different approaches that we have had.

As I sat here, as I am sure the Minister of Finance has done for some time, I have really tried to reflect on why we got ourselves into the position that we are in today. What I hear from the other side of the House—and I really do not believe that it believes this—is that it blames it on a policy that happened eight years ago, going on to nine years now, that it was left with a massive debt by the Liberal Party.

I really don't think it does believe that. It is certainly more than that. I think to put in perspective what we are looking at today and the mini budget that came out yesterday, we really need to look at why in the name of the Lord we are where we are today.

There are a number of things that happened. In the last eight and a half years I reckon that about five of them have been reasonably good years, kind of boomish. There has been an opportunity to create jobs and to reduce government spending, the things that the government is trying to do right now. When it takes eight years to get into the rather difficult situation the government has found itself in, it is very difficult to be able with a stroke of a pen and with one budget and perhaps one more main one to go before the next election to really want a policy that is counter to something that has taken eight years to achieve and have it disappear in a short time.

I will grant that the Minister of Finance had very little manoeuvring room. In that sense I would commiserate with him to try and produce a policy that was acceptable to his colleagues and the country, including the opposition.

However, in those eight and half years, and I will use that term even though it is a little less, government spending increased an average of about 4 per cent a year and that was higher than inflation. That was not a good move to begin with. I believe it could have done something about it.

The second thing, the interest payments on the debt, which now represent 26 per cent of all government expenditure, were growing at 9 per cent a year. When you have 9 per cent a year, the interest on the deficit and the national debt and government program spending increasing by 4 per cent a year, it is very difficult to be able to do anything to change it. This has gone on essentially on average for the last 8 years.

There are other things that have caused us to have little manoeuvring room. The finance minister's projections have been off. I have made projections in my lifetime and it is very difficult with the world situation for the projections beyond plus or minus 10 per cent or 15 per cent. However, the projections have been very far off and I am sure the minister is embarrassed that they are so far off.

He gets advice from his colleagues and I am sure there is a desire to make it look good for each budget, but we are now at the ninth budget, I believe, and we are hearing the same stories and we are seeing the same projects that essentially leave us with the same deficit we had 8 years ago. A lot of Canadians have trouble understanding that.

On top of the other things that I mentioned, the growth in government spending and the 9 per cent increase on financing the debt, in that period of time there have been 32 tax increases which make it very difficult for the government now to use taxing measures to help it get out of this funny situation that it is in, this disastrous situation that it is in.

The deficit is about $34.5 billion. The government will be taking $122.2 billion and will be spending $156.7 billion. I may be out by $.1 billion. However, when I look at where the revenue comes from, the $122.2 billion, I see a large percentage of that being paid by the middle class. Fifty per cent alone of that comes from income tax. We all know in this House that income tax falls mostly on the middle class.

Twelve per cent on top of that 50 per cent comes from the GST. We know that the GST falls more heavily on the middle class because it spends proportionately more on consumer products. Thirteen per cent comes from the UI contributions of which more than half are paid by the middle class. Seven per cent comes from what are called in the finance department others, made up of cigarettes, alcohol and gas tax, again falling on the middle class.

I do not have to use much imagination nor be accused of exaggeration to say that when I add all this up I am looking at about 75 per cent to 85 per cent falling very much on the middle class. Corporation tax accounts for 8 per cent on the figures produced a couple of days ago.

It was not too long ago that instead of being 8 per cent and 50 per cent, without the GST which makes it 8 per cent and 62 per cent, it was more along the lines of maybe 20 per cent and 30 per cent. I am going back a few years before this government took power, but certainly in 1984 the ratio was much different. The middle class paid less income tax as individuals and corporations paid a lot more.

The situation is that the government has found itself in a position where it cannot manoeuvre, so what does it do? I tend not to expect good projections, but I did have expectations as to what was going to happen. I was in my riding last night when I heard what the minister's measures were and I really honestly believed that I had missed something. It was not until this morning when I saw some of the national newspapers that I realized unfortunately I had not missed anything.

On the main point that concerns me in my riding—and I have heard practically every second speaker today speak on it—I have seen something happen that I never really thought would happen, even with this government. With the choice and with the difficult areas of high unemployment, a staggering deficit and a staggering national debt, there were choices. But the choices that were made in my opinion and in the opinion essentially of most people on this side of the House was that neither one thing nor another was done. With unemployment being the main problem as I see it right now—it certainly is in my riding and in my province—instead of doing something for those who were unemployed they were hit. There were measures that could have been taken to stimulate the economy, infrastructure being one of them that we have been advocating for the last 12 months.

Essentially I believe what the finance minister did was look at the unemployment problem through the wrong end of the telescope and penalize those who need help the most. As one of the members said here today, it was like a doctor trying to diagnose a disease and when he could not find the problem he killed the patient.

I still believe that this was not meant to happen because it is an incredible policy. Whether it is called staying the course, whether it is called a sick budget—I do not care what it is called—this has to be a record decision by a government to do something good at a time when the economy is in rough shape. I know my phone has not stopped ringing today. I have heard other members say as well that they have been inundated with phone calls.

Another aspect of this which bothers me is one that many of my colleagues spoke on today. It is the idea of cutting off unemployment insurance for those who voluntarily quit their jobs. I will be honest. I will tell the finance minister that I can understand him having difficulties finding money for those people who just decide they want to quit and collect unemployment insurance. I can understand cutting them off unemployment insurance. One could argue for that policy. But for people who quit their jobs or feel they are in an untenable position and have to leave their jobs because of things like sexual harassment and uncomfortable working conditions that border on sexual harassment, I think we need to look at this policy again. I believe it particularly discriminates against women, but there are people of the other sex who could be in a similar situation.

Unfortunately I do not give many points for the measures that were taken. The $8 billion expenditure reduction from the government was surely only meant for the international markets because most of the money we owe is owed to foreigners, certainly I believe more than 50 per cent. With that $8 billion, as the minister knows, there is no saving this year. That is for future years, for future governments. If the Liberals form the government we will have to do something about that. I am not impressed with that aspect.

To conclude, it has been to me and many of my colleagues a disappointing mini budget. I am sure the finance minister is disappointed too because I have not seen one media clipping that said a lot of good things or had anything good to say about this particular statement.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I greatly appreciate the opportunity to be able to comment on the mini budget presented by the Minister of Finance. I must add that I am flattered that the Minister of Finance is here this evening to listen to my speech. I find that he has a lot of patience and I would like him to pay some attention to the comments I will make.

Like everyone else, I know very well that this budget is his Christmas card to Canadians. A few days before Christmas, he is saying to all Canadians: Merry Christmas, Merry Christmas to all. Merry Christmas and Joyeux Noël to the public servants and Merry Christmas to Canada's unemployed. Again he attacks public servants.

Two years ago public servants went on strike, the first big strike of public servants. It was a disaster for service to Canadians and a disaster for public servants themselves who pleaded with the government for fair treatment. Later, the federal government passed the new Public Service Act, Bill C-26, where it turned management of the public service inside out. In November it cut 2 per cent from the public service budget, resulting in cuts in service to the public.

I find it quite wrong for an employer to mistreat its own employees constantly. Without saying so, it is also mistreating all Canadians, because public servants are there to help the general public. Public servants check to see whether food is spoiled or not. They control airport traffic. They inspect health products, pharmaceuticals, the transportation industry and just about every imaginable industry in Canada in order to protect us. They enforce the laws that protect the general public and they are being treated badly. Ironically, many public servants collect taxes. I find it quite ridiculous for the government to show such contempt for its employees. They were told a year ago that they would have no salary increase for one year and 3 per cent for each of the next two years. Now the Minister of Finance has changed his mind; it is no longer 0-3-3 but 0-0-0. That is his way of wishing his own employees merry Christmas a few days before the holidays. Merry Christmas to those who are there to help the general public, to help the unemployed, to those who look after immigration and customs. That is unfair.

Another big injustice is that instead of attacking unemployment, the government is attacking the unemployed. We know that the Unemployment Insurance Act was amended last year. Before, there was a partnership. The Government of Canada contributed a third and employees and employers each contributed a third. The government managed to unload its contribution of one third and put all the responsibility for unemployment insurance premiums on employees and employers. It said that was the right way to go. All of a sudden we see in the budget that the minister is cutting benefits for the newly unemployed from 60 to 57 per cent. The unemployed should be given a hand, not a kick. At present there are 1.5 million unemployed Canadians who receive unemployment benefits. We often forget to say that another 2.3 million Canadians are on welfare. This means that 3.8 million adults are out of work. Not to mention the low wage earners, those who do have a job but are paid peanuts. All they can get are short term minimum wage jobs. You find mostly women in those jobs. More often than not these single parents who have to provide for a family with their menial jobs are the ones hardest hit. Jobs must be created because jobs are the mainspring of the economy, our livelihood. Let us not repeat the mistake the government made in 1988-89 with the free trade agreement.

The free trade agreement was supposed to create jobs. It did not create jobs. It was supposed to help us in exporting our goods. It did not help us in exporting goods. Instead of exporting goods, it has been exporting jobs.

We are supposed to be helping small business. The government says that it is going to encourage the banks to raise the ceiling from $100,000 to $250,000 on loans for small businesses. If you are an MP, owners of small businesses are coming to your office constantly to see you. As we all know there are in Canada 932,396 small businesses and they create 80 per cent of the jobs.

Eighty-one per cent of these small businesses have less than 50 employees. They are the organizations that create jobs. These same people will tell MPs that they cannot get loans. The banks are nervous. These same people cannot borrow on their investment. They cannot borrow on the investment of their business. They have to put up their own personal home for loans. That is a catastrophe.

What is the government doing to help small industry? I know the government is doing a great deal for big business and the super rich but what it is doing for the middle class, the upper middle class? Absolutely nothing. It is trampling the smaller people.

What is it doing at the Department of National Defence, for example. Were there any cuts there? I did not see any cuts but it is certainly spending billions and billions of dollars for helicopters. One wonders if they are really essential at this particular time. Should we not give these purchases a second look if we are going to make savings? Why not look at that type of project?

We have not created jobs through infrastructure. The municipalities need to renew, to fix their infrastructure. Things are breaking up. Everything is going badly. Our leader at the beginning of the year made some very valid suggestions on how we could help out the economy.

[Translation]

For instance he suggested a partnership between the federal, provincial and municipal governments for urban infrastructure projects.

Last summer, I had the opportunity to attend a convention of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities.

[English]

The members of the federation came and asked and begged the Minister of Transport to help out, to ask the federal government to help out in an infrastructure program and they would become partners. I was astounded when publicly, in front of the whole crowd, he refused to participate in this partnership.

Where is the partnership?

For four years I have been sitting on the public accounts committee. If this government wants to save money it can save tens of millions of dollars. It should read the reports from the public accounts committee. It should read the annual reports of the Auditor General. That is a must. There is waste to the point that we know the RCMP is investigating the botched job that has been done in computer purchases.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I rise tonight to speak in response to the Minister of Finance's mini budget of December 2 and in response to the government bill before us tonight, Bill C-98, requesting further borrowing authority.

These are troubled times. These are times when few Canadians feel optimistic about their future, when few Canadians feel secure in their lives, when few Canadians express confidence and trust in their government.

These are troubled times because the economy is unable to support the population. Ours is an economy that allows 11 per cent or more of our people to be unemployed. Ours is an economy that keeps 2.5 million people on welfare, that forces farmers and small business owners into bankruptcy, allows in just three years one in six of our manufacturing jobs to disappear.

Ours is not a healthy economy and the job of the finance minister and of the government is to provide leadership that will keep people working, that will create jobs for those who are not, and will build a capable and confident economic base on which to secure a reasonable quality of life, accessible to most residents of Canada.

However, the finance minister and the Conservative government have clearly failed just as they have failed since they were first elected in 1984. In my province, Saskatchewan, we clearly see the mistakes of this government. The agricultural economy has never been worse. The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool is projecting a shortfall of $800 million this year. The problem is a combination of many things, but they are compounded by this year's drought, frost and snow which has succeeded in reducing crop yields in some cases to absolutely zero.

If ever there was a time for federal government support to the agricultural community, this is it. Three weeks ago the Canada Grains Council reported that Canadian wheat farmers lost $2.5 billion U.S. to U.S. government export policies between 1985 and 1990. In a late October report the wheat pool reported that Saskatchewan farmers have each lost a total of $109,220 over the last nine years because of the international grain war.

We have been behind the eight-ball for years but we have never seen anything like what is happening out there now. In my own area where there were approximately 5,000 crops planted this year the crop insurance office has taken in about 3,500 claims. This will not be a year that farmers will soon forget.

In response to the farm community's plea for support, the Minister of Agriculture last week said no. He said the government's finances were worse than those of the farmers. Yesterday the Minister of Finance brought out a mini budget which showed an increase in the year's projected deficit from $22 billion to $34 billion. Despite cuts and decreases in spending, this government's policies continue to expand the debt. The Saskatchewan farm community says it does not like to see this federal debt growing. Indeed, every farmer on the prairies has a piece of a growing national debt of their own, a farm debt that has built to $24 billion.

These are the most difficult times that farmers and their communities have faced. If it is this government's policy, as it is mine, to keep prairie farms producing and to keep farmers on the land, then this is clearly not the year to abandon them.

If it is the government's intention to drive the deficit up further, as the Minister of Finance said yesterday, then the farm community of western Canada must have a piece of it. At least then we will have something to show for our efforts. We will have farmers farming and we will have a more stable economic base in rural communities, where we continue to rely heavily on the health of the farm economy for survival.

At present the federal deficit is rising but we have nothing to show for it except higher unemployment, more bankruptcies, more people on welfare and long line-ups at the food banks.

• (2130)

We have been through this before in Saskatchewan. From 1982 to 1991 the Conservative Party governed our province with cutbacks in government programs, increases in taxes and the privatization of revenue generating Crown corporations. In the end we were left with no increase in the quality of life, nothing to show for the activity and a huge deficit that will take years to handle adequately.

If it is a Conservative Party policy to run up huge deficits without leaving anything behind then I want none of it. At least when farmers, small business owners or home owners incur a debt they have a tractor, a building or a house to show for it when it is done.

It is time for this government to show some real leadership on farm and rural issues, take the bull by the horns, so to speak, and develop a long-term policy for agriculture that takes into account revenue and yield shortfalls. It is time to have a full-fledged serious debate in this Chamber about the future of agriculture in Canada.

This means we have to throw out the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, GRIP to us on the prairies, and start over. GRIP is clearly an inadequate program with administrative hassles, headaches and costs that do not have to be there. We need a program that looks at incomes. We need a program that takes into account the cost of production on the farm. Both these matters have been put on the table for discussion by New Democrats for years.

It is time the federal government got serious. It is time the federal government took its responsibilities seriously, recognized that this is a matter of federal jurisdiction, and acted in the interests of western Canada and therefore in the long-term interests of all of Canada.

In response to the minister's mini budget, delegates attending the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool meeting today passed the following motion that I would like to read into the record:

> THAT the federal government immediately address the crisis economic situation facing Saskatchewan agriculture in the following ways:
> a) stop downloading their responsibilities upon the province and farmers
> b) provide third line of defence funding
> c) cancel their plans of changes to the WGTA and their planned reductions in the Crow benefit amount of $726 million as outlined in the Economic and Fiscal Statement of December 2.

That motion was carried by 100 per cent of the delegates at the convention today, and I agree 100 per cent with them.

Financing disaster shortfalls has always been a federal government responsibility. Any farmer who had to participate in and endure the drought program of three years ago knows full well that Ottawa was responsible for that mess no matter how essential the revenue was for farmers.

We also know that the federal government promised farmers who were not interested in joining the most recent farm income programs, GRIP and NISA, that they would be excluded from other programs if they did not join. Farmers were promised the third line of defence by the federal government so they joined the GRIP and NISA programs. And now when they need it the most there is no third line of defence payment. This is truly unfair.

We in Saskatchewan know that we have 40 per cent of the farms and 4 per cent of the population. We cannot solve the agricultural crisis on our own. We can no longer accept any more federal government offloading of its debt or its responsibilities on to the backs of the provincial government and the producers of the province.

The Minister of Finance was recently Minister of Agriculture. He knows the seriousness of the crisis on the prairies. Therefore, if he will not act today, we can only assume that he does not want to act. He does not need to be told how a loss of another 10,000 farmers from the land in western Canada will affect our communities and our economy.

He knows investment in the industry during its most troubling, most distressing times can be a life saver. He knows the value of agriculture to the health of the entire country. Frankly I am disturbed he did not take this opportunity to secure the future of this essential industry in the past two days.

Obviously the challenge of the next federal government will be to get this country working again and that includes establishing a viable and productive farm sector. I am looking forward to the upcoming federal election when all Canadians can debate the national economy and individual Canadians like those in the farm communities that I represent and others across the west can hold this government accountable for its lack of action on these and other issues.

There is an alternative economic vision in this country and New Democrats are proud that our alternative strategy includes a long-term plan for agricultural producers and Canadians in rural communities everywhere. Things have to change in Canada, and if this government will not change them then Canadians have no choice but to change the government.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I am happy for a chance to speak on Bill C-98, authority to borrow money, because this financial statement, this mini budget by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, is the clearest example of wrong-headedness that I have seen in my 11 years in Parliament.

For eight years this government has been talking about making Canada prosperous by raising taxes on the majority of Canadians, people employed by others, people self-employed or the jobless. It is giving the surplus in tax breaks to employers and owners of capital.

What are the results? In eight years this government has taken Canada to 1.5 million jobless. That is not counting the ones that it does not count. We know there is at least a million more, probably a million and a half more, who are either discouraged from working or working much too short a time to make a living because there is nothing else for them to do. But on the official figures, this government has just taken us back to where we were 10 or 11 years ago.

The only difference is that most of the factories where several hundred thousand jobs have been lost are closed and the machinery has been sold and nobody is going back there to work, ever.

This government has also doubled or more than doubled the federal government's national debt. It may satisfy some that there are wealthy Tory supporters who grow richer as owners of a good part of that debt, but they are making most Canadians poorer and this government pretends to care about most Canadians.

Let us look at the finance minister's statement. In table 1, the expenditure reduction, the first to be cut is the people at the bottom of the ladder, the jobless. Instead of 60 per cent of their UI benefits, they will get 57 per cent and the government will save $1.5 billion on that in two and a quarter years.

Then there are the quits or the fired. They can argue as to whether they had reason to quit or whether the employer had reason to fire them, but they have to argue without anything to eat. It is going to be hard. The government will save almost $2.5 billion on those during these two and a quarter years.

Then there will be cuts in science and technology. Those are mostly salaries.

There are cuts in the native program, some of the poorest people in the country, perhaps in some ways poorer than the urban jobless, a $160 million cut.

Grants, international assistance, $642 million cut in these two and a quarter years.

Canadian regional subsidies, industrial subsidies, transportation subsidies, cut $523 million. Again that means cuts primarily on people employed by others, self-employed or some of the very smallest employers.

The green plan, the third cut in two years, $172 million.

Agriculture, we have just heard from my colleague from Saskatchewan what is happening to the farmers. We know that 20,000 farm families have lost their farms in the last five years and their income was down this year 30 per cent. But the government will cut $80 million from their support grants.

Culture, a good many struggling artists and authors such as those in Trinity—Spadina, the cuts there are $80 million.

Defence, there is a cut of nearly a billion over these three years, but that is only in the operating account. There are no cuts in the capital account. We will come to that.

• (2140)

The departments generally will partly reduce service to the public and partly steal the wage raise that this government contracted to give to the employees as one of the terms of settlement of its union dispute and settlement of the strike. All in all, the governments says it will save $7.815 billion in the next two and a quarter years.

What will the government do with it? It plans to spend a little over $2 billion on what it calls investing in growth. Who will it invest it in? Small business employment, investment program, unemployment insurance relief program for new jobs. About $.5 billion will be spent by this government paying the unemployment insurance premiums that small business employers will not have to pay for new business start-ups or for new employees. The employees will pay but the owners will not.

Temporary small business investment tax credit, small business financing program, changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act and incentives for investments, investing in prosperity, future initiatives and so on, assistance to small oil and gas companies, tariff reductions, about $400 million, which is not very much. I do not begrudge it to small business, provided the workers are being treated equally and fairly. It is small even to the small business community, which has the highest rate of bankruptcy that we have known in Canada.

There are program measures, infrastructure. Half a billion over two and a quarter years will build a few roads and bridges and so on. It will make a few contractors wealthy and it will pay a few wages.

Sectoral training initiatives total about $80 million over those two years and developmental uses plan, $600 million, which is a total of $2.2 billion, a long way short of the $7.8 billion that they are cutting mainly, as I said, from people on wages, on salaries or on no wage, no salary but less unemployment insurance or perhaps no unemployment insurance and perhaps no welfare, considering how the government is cutting its share of the welfare contributions.

What is it doing? Is it lowering the deficit? We have got this strange situation where just last February the government predicted that at the end of this year the deficit would be $27.5 billion, reduced. Now it is going to be $34 billion. Next year, instead of $22 billion it will be $32 billion, $10 billion higher. Why, when the expenditures are cut mainly from the lowest workers, is the government falling short?

It is because its trickle-down theory does not work. Taking it from the poorest, pouring it into the top, so that a little wee bit comes back to the poorest some day, is not working. Money taken from the poorest means they buy less food, less clothing, less housing. They spend less on everything. The stores go broke, the factories close, the service industries go broke, the unemployed cannot pay much taxes and the government loses its revenue. That is where it is losing because of its own stupid trickle-down policies.

The money given to the owners of capital is supposed to make jobs. That is the fairy tale we have been hearing. It does not do it, clearly, or we would not have reverted to 1.5 million officially unemployed. Some of it goes offshore to tax shelters and tax loopholes. Some of it goes to high return overseas investments, but does not make jobs in Canada. Some of it goes to land speculation, boosting the price of housing and industry and commerce in Toronto and cities like that. Some of it goes to expensive military equipment. We have all heard about the Pentagon's $400 hammers and $500 toilet seats. It is not quite so high in Canada but it is still very high.

What should we do instead? Instead of those cuts we should be cutting $1 billion from the tax loopholes that the Auditor General identified in the offshore tax havens.

We should be cutting the billion dollars from unjustified capital gains tax; not from farmers, home owners or small business, but from people earning more than $100,000 a year who do not need that. We could cut a billion dollars from the entertainment tax credit. We could perhaps cut $4 billion from interest deduction loopholes and $2 billion from defence, not from operating but from the capital, from those helicopters, frigates and the low-level air defence system that we do not need because the Russians are not coming. Probably around $4 billion could be cut by lowering the interest rates by 3 per cent instead of jacking them up in order to make the United States government happy by reducing Canadian imports to the United States.

With that we could pay down some of the deficit. We could also pay decent unemployment insurance, welfare and training allowances instead of asking women to go to training when they have no money for car fare and no money for child care.

We could let manufacturing grow again for the domestic market instead of forcing people to buy imports. We could let the retail sales and the service industries grow again. We could let the jobless get jobs which they want. Government would even get its taxes and would be able to balance its budget.

It would have to do things in a completely different way than what it has been doing for the last eight years. It is high time it either exercised some common sense or quit.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I too want to intervene in this debate tonight. I want to start out in an unusual manner, particularly given the tone of the debate. I want to compliment the Minister of Finance. Although I disagree fundamentally with what he has done in his budget, I respect the fact that he is one of the few ministers of the Crown who will sit through the debate and listen to the comments from all members of the House. I congratulate him for that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Angus: Having said that, I want to say that in my years in this House and my 17 years in elected life—at least attempted elected life in some cases—I find this particular financial statement is one of the meanest, one of the cruelest and one of the worst that Canadians have ever seen.

The attacks are on those who are the weakest in society, the people who have, not through any fault of their own, found themselves on the scrap heap of not having a job to go to, particularly those who will lose their job once this budget is in place, finding themselves being eligible for less money, a smaller percentage of what they were earning before. If it is a woman in a work place who is being sexually harassed, or a person of colour who is being discriminated against, or someone who is prepared to stand up to the employer and blow the whistle on environmental matters, on health and safety matters and is fired by their employer, they will not get any compensation whatsoever. They will not get any return from the premiums they have paid, in some cases for many years. They will get no insurance. They will be cut off entirely.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration gets up in this House and says they will be given the benefit of the doubt. A lot of the women who are sexually harassed do not want to reopen the wounds. They are not going to go to someone who is a stranger and say they were sexually harassed and here is chapter and verse. They are not even going to say that. We know from experience that women who have been sexually abused on the job do not want anybody to know about it. They are uncertain about their ability to prove it even though they know what is happening to them. By turning the clock back 21 years, we have done a disservice to those women. We have made them open season as we have made people of colour, gays, lesbians, any group in society that can be discriminated against because of who they are or what they stand for.

In that sense, it is a very unfair budget. There was lots of promise out there.

The Minister of Finance, himself having been Minister of Transport on a couple of occasions as well as being the critic for his party for many years, knows how people were looking forward to the national highway program. That program would take the Trans-Canada Highway in particular and bring it up to today's standards. It would take it out of the 1950s and 1960s which a lot of the highway is particularly in New Brunswick and northern Ontario where it is still two lanes.

The ministers of transport of all the provinces and the territories and the federal government have worked hard over the last five years to develop a strategy. The Minister of Finance could have said yes to that strategy. It was not perfect but it was there. We knew what the costs were.

There was an agreed-upon standard of four lanes that could have assisted in highway safety. It could have assisted in the rebuilding of the economies of a number of areas in the country, not just by the construction jobs which would have been created. There would be economic spin-offs to communities such as Thunder Bay, Sault Ste. Marie or Sudbury, by having much better highways for commerce to travel on. The government had that opportunity. They were ready but it failed to act.

There is another area where the government has not even touched ever since the winter works program was killed by the Liberals a number of years ago. The Canadian Federation of Municipalities, the NDP and the Liberals have been asking for a municipal infrastructure program.

Mrs. Finestone: What did we kill? We totally rebuilt them.

Mr. Angus: What you killed was the winter works program that used to provide money to cities to rebuild themselves.

The government had the opportunity to provide funds which not only would have rebuilt the cities, but more important would also have provided the assistance to municipalities to provide the needed sewage treatment facilities. Not just in Victoria, which has been in the news lately, not just in Thunder Bay, which only has primary sewage, but in the province of Quebec where a lot of the sewage goes into the St. Lawrence River untreated.

We could have invested in the environment as well as investing in jobs. But this government failed to respond.

Where the government did respond was with cuts. At a time when for the last five or six years, we have been concerned about the viability of our farmers in western Canada what does this government do? It cuts the Western Grain Transportation Act by somewhere around $70 to $80 million.

That grain will still have to be moved, whether it is to Vancouver or Prince Rupert or Churchill or Thunder Bay, and through Thunder Bay down the seaway. Who is going to pick up the extra cost? The people who can least afford it, the farmers who are already hurting. It probably means that more farmers are going to go out of business. I think that is a real shame.

The other decision was to freeze the wages of public employees for the next two years, for another two years in addition to the year that we have now. While everybody loves to bash the people who work for the government, we forget that those people are consumers.

Those people do not just live here in Ottawa, although a lot of them do. They live in cities and towns and villages throughout this country. They shop at the corner store. They shop at the supermarket. They shop at the hardware store. If their consumption power is eroded because this government has frozen their wages, that means that there is going to be less money circulating back into the community.

My sense is that for every dollar we spend employing people, that much and more comes back to the treasury.

Most of these changes are self-defeating. Look at the cuts to FEDNOR, an excellent program in northern Ontario which provides assistance to existing businesses. It provides assistance to new businesses and has just been renewed after a comprehensive review. What does this government do? It cuts the funds that are available to stimulate the economy in northern Ontario, as it has done with Atlantic Canada and the Western Opportunities Agency. These cuts are counter-productive.

Earlier today my leader pointed out that the change as a result of this mini budget is a net loss of 61,879 jobs. A total of 55,000 jobs will be created by the changes but 117,000 jobs will be lost.

Just go through it. The wage cut will cost 9,200 jobs; the operating budget cut will mean the elimination of 43,000 jobs; the UI benefit cut will affect almost 30,000 people; science and technology, 2,900 jobs; the selective native programs, 1,500 jobs; international assistance—we always think of our assistance overseas as money going away from this country—there are almost 1,400 jobs tied into those cuts; regional and industrial cuts, 8,400 jobs; and the green plan cuts will eliminate 5,200 jobs. If the government had gone forward with the green plan and added to it we could have created many more.

As for the transportation subsidy, a week after CN announces that 10,000 jobs will be gone over the next five years this government comes up with a program that is going to cut another 3,200.

This government has no business governing this country. It is bankrupt of ideas. The morality of this budget is under question. It should not go forward and we certainly will do what we can to make sure it does not.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, as I listened to the conclusion of the remarks by the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, I could only think of crocodile tears. I could only think that if he had been speaking in the Ontario legislature he would have made exactly the same speech.

Mr. Angus: No, I would not.

Mr. Milliken: Exactly, almost word for word the same. He has a Minister of Finance in Ontario, Pink Floyd, and a premier that we are saddled with—I happen to be from Ontario as he knows. They are doing exactly the same thing to the people of Ontario as this Minister of Finance is doing to everybody in Canada. He has introduced budget cuts affecting the poor and the disabled and has taken money away from the disabled.

An hon. member: And students.

Mr. Milliken: And students. This member talks about fairness and he sheds crocodile tears on behalf of the unemployed. Yet his premier is doing it to the same voiceless crowd that this government is doing it to, and he knows it. He should be ashamed of himself and he should have mentioned the disgust and revulsion he feels at the way the premier of Ontario is treating the people of that province after all his la-di-da promises that are so typical of the New Democratic Party.

However, I do not want to dwell just on him because that is bad enough. I know it is something about which I could go on at length, but I have colleagues in the Ontario legislature who are fighting for truth and justice there. Therefore I will turn my remarks instead to the minister across the way.

As my colleagues indicated by their applause a few minutes ago, I want to congratulate the minister on staying in for the debate. It is a rare thing on the Conservative front bench.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Milliken: Having said that I would like to go back to some history which I thought would be of interest to the minister. I wish his colleague, the former Minister of Finance and now the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, was here because I am sure he would enjoy these quotes. He likes it when I quote him. I did the other day and I know he was pleased.

I have a quote now from page 98 of Hansard on November 8, 1984. This was an economic statement. It is similar to what we have had for the last day or two in debate.

Mr. Mazankowski: It was a good statement.

Mr. Milliken: The minister says it was a good statement. I would like to read part of it. It was a great statement. It was sort of the beginning of the end for the Conservative Party. It says:

> In our centennial year the net federal debt was $18 billion; by the end of the fiscal year it will be about ten times higher, $190 billion; by 1990, if there are no changes, it could approach $410 billion.

Of course we know it approached it and it exceeded it by miles. The minister himself is predicting that it will be, I think, $490 billion by the end of the next fiscal year. He went on:

• (2200)

> Let me put this in more personal terms. In 1967 this debt represented about $4,000 per family; this year it represents about $24,000 per family. And by 1990, if we do not take action, it will be the equivalent of about $54,000 for every Canadian family.

Well, they took action. They took all kinds of action. They cut and slashed all over the place, to hear the minister in all the budget speeches, yet it has exceeded $54,000 per family. Perhaps the minister can give us an up to date figure, but my guess is that it is around $70,000 per family now. That is as a result of their actions. They took action.

We have seen some evidence of the action in the economic statement put forward by the minister. It is action that has shown incompetence and inability to deal with the crucial, fundamental economic questions that are besetting this country.

They say they inherited this problem in 1984 and they moaned and groaned and complained about it. I could go on and on with quotes from this famous statement of November 8, 1984, but I only have ten minutes so I do not have time to do it. I would love to quote more because there was all kinds of hogwash in the statement.

Let us turn to his first budget, this famous Minister of Finance who sat so long in his position until he was finally relieved of his responsibilities, thank goodness. However, I am not sure we traded up.

I want to turn to page 5014 of Hansard, May 23, 1985. This was the first budget speech of the new Tory administration as it then was. Of course it is not new now, it is old and tired. He said in his budget speech:

> The impact of these actions, and those taken in November, will continue to grow. Our actions will directly reduce the annual deficit by the end of the decade by more than $20 billion. Between now and then, our actions will cut a total of $75 billion from the projected increase in the public debt.

By the end of the decade there would be $20 billion off the deficit. He did not mean the year 2000. He meant 1990. He was speaking in 1985 when he said these words and the decade he referred to was the 1980s, unless he was talking through his hat.

The deficit that year, according to his projections, was to be $33.8 billion. Subtract $20 billion and that puts it to $18.8 billion. Where is that $18.8 billion figure? We have never come close. It never got anywhere near it at any time in the 1980s, in a term of what the government called unprecedented growth in Canada. It claimed it was creating jobs like billy-o. The economy was just booming, thanks to their wonderful policies, but the deficit kept going up and up and up. Now it is back up at $34 billion. The Tories claimed they had all the answers. It was $34 billion when he made this budget speech in 1985. His cuts were going to save Canadians so much money they would not know what to do with it. It did not happen. The deficit kept going up and up—financial mismanagement on a most impressive scale.

Let me turn to what else he said in this same budget speech, at page 5021 of Hansard:

> The measures I announced in November and today will ensure that the annual deficit is more than $20 billion lower than it would otherwise have been by the end of the decade. About 80 per cent of that reduction will be on the expenditure side. Most importantly, these measures will cut $75 billion from the projected debt over the same period.

He actually had the nerve to suggest to the House that 80 per cent of the cuts were on the expenditure side. We know perfectly well that no government has increased taxes as often and as significantly as the government sitting opposite here today. This minister, although I can give him some credit because he does not appear to increase taxes in this budget, knows what is going on.

I see my friends on my left have flown the coop. They are so embarrassed. Every time he gives us a tax break, Bobby Rae gives us a tax hike and takes all the money back. We got a tax break from this government in July. We are supposed to get another one, I think, in January if I am not mistaken, and Bob Rae has hiked all the taxes in Ontario to take all that money back and then some.

Some of the other premiers have done the same but it is particularly pernicious when the major province of this country, which is supposed to benefit from these tax breaks, as a stimulus to the economy takes all the money back out so the economy is not stimulated. That is what is going on. The NDP premier of Ontario is almost in league with this Minister of Finance. They have twin policies that are parallel. One is supposed to be a socialist government, one is supposed to be a Conservative government but the two of them seem to behave as though they were one party. It is unbelievable. It is like the Bobbsey twins.

I do not know whether my colleague across the way, the Minister of Finance, feels like Pink Floyd, but he sure acts like him and the cuts are just the same.

These statements in these past budgets indicate an incredible inability to control the Government of Canada and its expenditures. This government has absolutely, completely failed Canadians on this point. In 1984 in the election campaign they boasted about their ability to manage. In 1988, throughout the campaign the slogan of the Conservative Party was "managing change". That was the slogan they pushed to all the Canadian people. We have seen how they manage change. It is change for the worse because the deficit has kept going up and up. The government has been unable to deal with the financial crisis that it is faced with, much of which is its own doing.

Instead of pursuing expansionist policies that might have created jobs, reduced dependence on unemployment insurance, reduced dependence on welfare, all of which are funded by the government, instead of pursuing that kind of policy and then increasing tax revenue as a result of that, the government has relied on cuts and increased taxes. It has been obsessed with lowering inflation to zero. It has been obsessed with that and it has thrown thousands of Canadians out of work. Now it has a provincial government in Ontario that follows exactly the same policies. It is a double whammy for our province and it is a double whammy for Canada.

If Ontario is supposed to be the engine that runs the Canadian economy, how can it do it when it has a government in Ottawa that keeps trying to put the brakes on and when it has a government in Ontario that does not know how to get the brakes off. Instead of trying to stimulate the economy in Ontario by getting rid of these silly labour laws that the minister in Ontario is introducing and so on, things that would attract business and make the province grow a little bit, the premier of Ontario seems bent for leather on changing things around to make it an unpleasant economic environment in that province that will not stimulate business.

The Minister of Finance comes along and says he is stimulating business with a few paltry handouts and then he admittedly makes a genuine attempt with a tax reduction which the premier of Ontario then steals away. How are Ontario citizens supposed to prosper in that environment? How are people coming into Ontario supposed to feel that they can participate and grow in Ontario? Ontario used to be a place to stand and a place to grow. It is not any more. The reason it is not is because of the policies pursued by the minister and the policies pursued by the New Democratic Party government in that province. It is a sad state of affairs, a very sad state of affairs.

If the minister will accept some very sound advice, I would suggest he go to the Prime Minister right away and urge the Prime Minister to go to the Governor General, get a dissolution of this House, and allow the Canadian people to express their views on how the minister and his colleagues have been administering the Government of Canada for the last eight years. I am sure when they get the chance, it will be thumbs down and we will get a new government in this country that can do something about the problems that this government has created.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to order made on Tuesday, December 1, 1992, the question on the motion is deemed put and a recorded division is deemed requested and deemed deferred until six o'clock p.m. on Monday, December 7, 1992.

PRIVILEGE

SUB-COMMITTEE ON RECODIFICATION OF THE GENERAL PART OF THE CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring a matter of privilege to the attention of the House.

It is my contention that my privileges and those of the House have been breached and that the actions of another person are in contempt of Parliament. I will deviate from the House to a committee for only a very brief moment. With the indulgence of Mr. Speaker, I will demonstrate how the issue affects the House as a whole.

In November of this year, in my capacity as a member of Parliament, I requested that the clerk of the sub-committee on justice reviewing the Criminal Code, Mr. Richard Dupuis, invite Mrs. Sheryl Eckstein of Vancouver to testify before the committee. Mrs. Eckstein did testify before that committee on November 24, I believe it was. It is about that issue I now wish to speak.

After her testimony, Mrs. Eckstein was intimidated by a person at the employ of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The individual in question, Mrs. Kelly Crichton of the CBC, contacted Mrs. Eckstein yesterday to inform her that the issue of her testimony had been referred to the legal department of the CBC to be looked into. The implication was that there would be a lawsuit or a threat of a lawsuit against the individual for her testimony before the committee.

I do not wish to discuss the merits of the testimony of the individual although of course I could. That is not at issue here. The issue is whether or not this Parliament has a right to listen to any witness without the intimidation of anyone else. I do believe that right is ours.

I will make my summation brief because the bill before us today is one on which many of my colleagues wish to speak, but I do want to remind the Speaker of a few citations. Erskine May's 20th edition, page 116, states:

• (1010)

> —all witnesses summoned to attend before either House of Parliament, or before parliamentary committees, and to others in personal attendance upon the business of Parliament, in coming, staying, and returning——to the House enjoy the same privileges as members of the House of Commons. In other words, they cannot be sued for anything they say or bring to the attention of the committee.

I also want to mention two other definitions. One of them involves Mr. Maingot's Parliamentary Privilege in Canada. That has to do with obstructing or interfering with a person other than a member, a person who wants to testify before either a committee or the House. I quote:

> All persons who have business with the House of Commons receive the temporary protection of the House during the time they are en route to the House of Commons or to the place of the parliamentary proceedings with which they have business, while they are involved and taking part in the parliamentary proceeding and while they are returning from the parliamentary proceeding. This includes witnesses who appear before committees, whether summoned or invited, counsel to witnesses, petitioners delivering petitions to members of Parliament, and persons involved in advancing the cause of a private bill to be discussed.

I cite the following as well:

> For example, whether contempt of the House had been committed by tampering with a witness would depend on the facts in each case.

In other words, Mr. Maingot says that there are, in fact, cases where this can be deemed to be contempt of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I want to remind you as well of Beauchesne's citation 853:

> Every witness appearing before the House or any committee thereof may claim the protection of the House—

—not the committee, of the House—

> —in respect to the evidence to be given.

Citation 865 says that:

> To tamper with a witness in regard to the evidence to be given before the House or any committee or to endeavour, directly or indirectly, to deter or hinder any person from appearing or giving evidence is a breach of privilege.

Mr. Speaker, the case I bring before you is quite clear. For someone to have contacted a witness who appeared before a parliamentary committee and to have threatened that witness is not an offence to be brought strictly before the committee. It is an offence against the House because of course the allegation or the threat was not made in committee. It was made completely outside of the House of Commons but in relation to the proceedings of a committee of this House.

Furthermore, I want to present the argument that were such threats to go on unchallenged, they can and would undoubtedly be repeated, that individuals from now on would no longer enjoy the security they have had from time immemorial to testify before Parliament without the threat of being sued or intimidated by anyone. That, Mr. Speaker, is far more important than anything else.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to your attention in the unlikely event that you would be tempted to rule that this matter should be dealt with at committee, that in fact the committees are in the process of winding down for the Christmas period.

This evidence was brought before a sub-committee which has terminated its proceedings for the next few months. Therefore, the evidence on this could only be heard before committee in a number of months from now at the earliest, if at all, in the event of a prorogation of Parliament later. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I submit to you and to all my colleagues in the House that we must address this issue as an institution.

I wish also to indicate to you, Mr. Speaker, that were you to find that there is a prima facie case of privilege, as I claim there is, I am prepared to move the appropriate motion in order that this most important issue of the testimony of and the threat against Mrs. Sheryl Eckstein be referred to the parliamentary committee on procedure, privileges and elections.

Mr. Speaker, in closing I want to indicate to you that the CBC individual in question has confirmed her phone call with Mrs. Eckstein before the media in an article today by Mr. Peter Stockland of the Sun chain of newspapers. In fact she has confirmed having made the communication to Mrs. Eckstein. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is independent verification of the fact the communication actually took place.

I wish to thank you, Mr. Speaker, and all my colleagues for listening to what I believe is an issue that could affect the privileges of all of us.

Finally, let us remember that the actions in question go far beyond our privileges. In my view, the actions of the individual are contemptuous of this great institution, and that is an issue which I hope you will address.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with my colleague in bringing this issue before you and before the House. I would expect it is a matter of concern to all members of the House.

In addition to the references given by the member, I would like to refer to page 132 of Erskine May's 21st edition where it seems to be very clear that it is a breach of privilege to attempt by persuasion or solicitations of any kind to induce a witness not to attend or to give false evidence.

Without repeating the arguments, I would just like to make a couple of quick points. First, it may be relevant to your consideration that the alleged offence occurred after the witness gave evidence to the committee. In my submission that does not affect the question of the privileges of this House because the affect of the threat to sue would be chilling on future witnesses before committees or before this House. It is therefore relevant that you examine whether the threat to sue in these circumstances is a prima facie breach of privilege.

The CBC has said the basis of its concern was that the material was used out of context. That of course gets to the substance of the issue, but be that as it may a threat to sue for use of CBC material surely goes far beyond an expression of some concern of the context. That issue could have and should have been raised directly with the committee.

Finally, let me say I agree with the member that this should simply referred back to the committee. It is important for this House to establish and reaffirm the privileges that it has in hearing witnesses and having them freed from a threat of suit which as the member indicated is not likely to have had any force or substance given the rules of this House.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell for bringing this matter to the attention of the House. I appreciate the argument that my friend from Victoria has made as well about the "after the fact" alleged threat and its possible chill effect.

I have just had handed to me by my friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell a copy of the Ottawa Sun article from this morning and a quick glance at it seems to suggest there may be an issue of copyright involved in this. It is not for us to judge that at this point. I think that and other issues raised by my friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell would properly be the subject of the committee on privileges and elections.

It seems to me there is a prima facie case here and I would support, if you should so rule, Sir, the referral of the matter to that committee.

• (1020)

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: First of all I thank the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell for bringing this matter to the House, the hon. member for Victoria who has made a helpful intervention, and the parliamentary secretary on behalf of the government.

Some mention has been made that this matter arose in a committee and hon. members will have heard me say many times that usually matters should be put back to committee. My own feeling is that under the circumstances which have been explained to me that is not the convenient or appropriate thing to do at this time.

I have listened carefully to what was said. I think this is an appropriate case for the Chair to rule that there is a prima facie case for privilege. I would ask the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell to move his motion.

Point of Order

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the matter of the threats by Miss Kelly Crichton against Miss Sheryl Eckstein, a witness before a parliamentary committee, be referred to the Standing Committee on House Management.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is the House in agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning Bill C-93, an omnibus bill which is to be debated under House orders in a few moments. I want to take this occasion to put some procedural arguments before the Chair.

Six sitting days ago Bill C-93 was first tabled in the House. We are here today and the government wishes to proceed with second reading, which I suggest to the Chair is the most important aspect of a bill. This is where the principles are ascertained, promoted and debated quite vigorously.

In the budget of last February the government announced that for reasons of economy it planned to fold a number of agencies into other agencies or departments doing similar work.

Bill C-93 is intended to give legislative authority to the government's announcement with regard to 10 agencies performing distinctive functions. The long title of Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, is intended to mask the real complexities of the bill.

It puts forward the fiction that the bill is merely a cost cutting measure eliminating a bunch of redundant or archaic agencies. In fact an examination of the bill reveals that while it does not wind up some agencies thereby saving some money, it also makes major changes to public policy with regard to the role of government. The bill amends or repeals no fewer than 27 existing statutes and enacts one completely new statute.

If properly drafted the long title would indicate its purpose of terminating specific agencies by name. This would of course uncover the real purpose of the bill in the guise of cutting costs and eliminating some redundant bodies to eliminate a number of government agencies that in the course of effectively carrying out their responsibilities have become thorns in the government's side.

Superficially the principle of the bill, the government purports, is to reduce the cost of government. In reality, however, it raises the principles of maintaining—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment, the hon. parliamentary secretary is rising.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to what my hon. friend was saying. It seems to me that if there is a point of order to be made it ought to be made with expedition.

What my friend is doing is anticipating debate under Government Orders and we have not got to that yet. He is in fact beginning a debate that has not yet been called.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary for his intervention.

I am listening very carefully to the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. I think he is reaching his point and I know that he will be as concise as he always is.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I am happy for the intervention of the parliamentary secretary. Perhaps I might be able to facilitate the process whereby Bill C-93 in its present form would not come forward.

I wish to remind the House of Beauchesne's 6th edition dealing with this particular matter in the following citation 634:

> Speakers have expressed deep concern about the use of omnibus bills, and have suggested that there must be "a point where we go beyond what is acceptable from a strictly parliamentary standpoint". Nevertheless, the practice of using one bill to demand one decision on a number of quite different, although related subjects, while a matter of concern, is an issue on which the Speaker will not intervene to divide the bill.

Citation 635 states:

> In the case of an omnibus bill, the Speaker has encouraged the use of motions to delete a clause at the report stage, pursuant to Standing Order 76(2) to permit the House to decide a specific issue contained in an omnibus bill, even though the motion might offend the principle of the bill.

In support of my argument I would like to quote from Hansard of March 1, 1982 when the hon. member for Calgary Centre said in the House, as reported at page 15479, with regard to an energy bill which had been tabled at that time:

> That is the title of an omnibus bill with a capital O and a capital B. Indeed, I would argue that it would be more accurately described as an "omnifarious bill", meaning of all sorts, or perhaps an "omnific" bill, meaning all-creating. Certainly there has never before in the history of Parliament been included in one proposed bill such an incredible hodge-podge and mish-mash of such disparate items.

Furthermore, in the final quote given to the Chair, the same hon. member went on to quote from the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux, as reported in the House of Commons Journals for January 26, 1971, at page 284:

> However, where do we stop? Where is the point of no return? The honourable member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I believe the honourable member for Edmonton West, said that we might reach the point where we would have only one bill, a bill at the start of the session for the improvement of the quality of life in Canada which would include every single proposed piece of legislation for the session. That would be an omnibus bill with a capital O and a capital B. But would it be acceptable legislation? There must be a point where we go beyond what is acceptable from a strictly parliamentary standpoint.

I suggest in conclusion that this particular bill because of its width, because of the various agencies that it affects, because of the way in which it changes public policy in this country, ought to be sent back to the drafters and divided accordingly and then brought back to this House.

As Bill C-93 stands as an omnibus bill, I hope the Chair would take my arguments into consideration and send this bill back to the drafters.

I raise this point now, in response to the parliamentary secretary, because there were indications that we would be proceeding with second reading today. Maybe that is not the case. If that is not the case, that indeed gives further comfort and further ease to the government to take the bill back to the drafters and do so appropriately.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have a sense of having been here before. I think this whole argument has been gone through as recently as March 30 of this year. The budget of course was approved last March 11 and an issue was raised by other members, I think the member for Kamloops and the member for North Island—Powell River. Indeed it was triggered by our friend from Cape Breton—East Richmond on March 30.

The arguments made by my predecessor, the hon. member for Peace River, ought to guide us in looking at the point of the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond in this particular case.

The umbrella of this particular legislation was made very clear in the budget. It indicated very clearly that the government planned to dissolve or terminate a number of corporations and other bodies for a central theme. That is the ability to cut government expenditures and, therefore, as much as possible relieve the burden on the Canadian taxpayer and to reduce the stress and pressure of this very difficult debt situation we are faced with in this country. That, said my colleague, the member for Peace River, is the umbrella. The term umbrella was used advisedly because it is found in Beauchesne's sixth edition, page 192, citation 626:

> (1) Although there is no specific set of rules or guidelines governing the content of a bill, there should be a theme of relevancy amongst the contents of a bill. They must be relevant to and subject to the umbrella which is raised by the terminology of the long title of the bill.

We might refer in this particular case to the debates of June 8, 1988, page 16255 of Hansard. The Chair at that time agreed with the best definition. You, Sir, agreed with the hon. member for Windsor West in his quotation from page 15880 of Hansard for May 30, 1988:

> The essential defence of an omnibus procedure is that the Bill in question, although it may seek to create or to amend many disparate statutes, in effect has one basic principle or purpose which ties together all the proposed enactments and thereby renders the Bill intelligible for parliamentary purposes.

You, Sir, at that time said that the Chair was grateful to the member for Windsor West for those words and that they had assisted you greatly in arriving at your decision. I would submit that the facts of the point my friend has raised are virtually four square with the points raised on June 8, 1988 and again in the point of order raised by this same member on March 30, 1992 and that it should not be difficult for you to make the same decision on this occasion so that the business of the House might proceed.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know what the government is going to call. I am going to take a few minutes to consider the representations that have been made to me and the government can make its own decision as to whether it is calling this particular bill. I do not intend to hold up the commencement of the debate but I do want to consider my position for a few minutes.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATIONS) ACT, 1992

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Shirley Martin (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you would find it appropriate to move the adjournment of the House. The appropriate ministers are not here.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member should know that he cannot move the adjournment of the House under a point of order.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to begin debate on Bill C-93, an act that will help restructure and streamline the operations of government in order to improve both efficiency and service to Canadians.

Part of the reason I am pleased to begin this debate is that certainly one of my concerns prior to my election to Parliament back in 1988 was the whole business of how government delivered service and programs and how did we best provide to the people of Canada the things that were of value to them. I believe that this bill goes a long way in that direction.

As proposed in the February 1992 budget, passage of legislation before us today will allow for a number of government operations to be consolidated or merged with other operations of government. The 1992 budget reflected the advice received by the Minister of Finance during his extensive pre-budget consultations with Canadians from all walks of life and from all regions of the country. While he heard many differing views on how best to meet the economic challenges faced by Canada, he heard one particular view over and over again. Put simply, it was that the structure of government did not yet reflect the realities of the new global economy.

We are reminded on a daily basis that the world economy has changed dramatically in the past decade, in particular accelerating technological advancements have extended competition beyond national boundaries. In the process international markets and customers we once considered secure are now up for grabs. To be competitive and preserve our markets, Canadian firms have had to be more efficient. They have had to face the challenge of cutting costs without sacrificing quality in order to provide superior goods and services at lower prices than our competitors.

Despite the hardships of an international economic slowdown, there are indications that Canadian businesses and their employees are succeeding. An array of recent statistics points to the fact that the international competitiveness of Canadian industry is on the rise. For example, the growth in unit labour costs in Canada has dropped from about 8 per cent in early 1991 to 1.5 per cent in the first half of this year. Only the U.S. has a better 1992 record among the G-7 countries. Not coincidentally, Canadian exports rose 9.5 per cent in the first half, reaching a record of $13 billion in August. Certainly in my constituency I can confirm that businesses are saying it is still continuing so there is good news there.

However, the need to restructure to increase our international competitiveness is not exclusive to the private sector. Government must also become leaner, more efficient and more productive. Where services are duplicated they must be merged. Where programs are obsolete they must be eliminated. Where savings can be achieved, particularly in administrative overhead, they must be realised.

In effect, governments must continue to serve their constituents effectively but they must do so with less resources. In so doing, governments will be taking the kind of actions that the private sector is having to take and has been taking for quite some time. They will demonstrate to Canadians that they are not insulated from the real world and that they are responding to the same competitive pressures that are buffeting the private sector.

On a practical level, reducing expenditures will help to control the deficit and the national debt which in turn will lead to lower interest rates and a reduced tax burden for Canadians and Canadian businesses.

We on this side of the House have worked to reduce the size and cost of the federal government. We have restrained federal spending, including public sector wages. On Wednesday of this week there were some additional actions announced that were most important in that direction. We have implemented the Spending Control Act and the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account to ensure that fiscal responsibility is a matter of law. By privatizing over 20 Crown corporations we have reduced the public payroll by some 50,000 employees.

Nevertheless we realize, as do Canadians, that the task of streamlining the federal government and making it more efficient is not yet complete. Bill C-93 is another step in that direction.

The budget implementation government organizations bill is the second of a series of omnibus bills designed to give effect to the government's streamlining measures announced in the 1992 budget. The purpose of the bill is to reduce government overhead and to provide services to Canadians more efficiently.

• (1040)

The bill includes the necessary amendments required to give full effect to the budget decisions affecting 15 different organizations. I want to consider now the specific organizations addressed in Bill C-93.

I would note that any pulic servants affected by the reorganizations in this bill will be covered by the government's work force adjustment policy. The policy provides for notice of layoff, opportunities for alterntive employment and arrangements for termination of employment.

The legislation provides for the winding up of the Agricultural Products Board. Over the years the board has provided an important service in stabilizing markets for agricultural commodities. However, the function can be exercised more efficiently on the basis of an amended Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act with the support of the Department of Agriculture.

Along similar lines, the positive features of Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will be retained after the corporation is folded into the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. In particular, financial assistance will continue to be available for new and existing businesses that are likely to make a substantial contribution to industrial development and employment opportunities in Cape Breton Island outside of the coal producing and steel industries. ACOA's new statutory powers will be restricted to Cape Breton Island and a portion of mainland Nova Scotia around the town of Mulgrave.

Dissolving the ECBC and carrying over its specific statutory powers to ACOA will eliminate a duplication in program delivery and the administrative overlap which that duplication entails. For example, the post-merger staff complement of ACOA's Cape Breton office is projected to be reduced by 23 person-years from 72 to 40. ACOA clients in Cape Breton will be the beneficiaries of increased efficiency in promotion, financial assistance and development of industry on the island.

Passage of Bill C-93 will result in the creation of a new, single cultural agency by combining the Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. I want to emphasize that despite fiscal pressures, our government has continued to provide significant levels of funding for the arts and the humanities. We believe that Canadian culture has a vital role in fostering a vigorous and unified nation.

The new agency will deal with a full range of cultural matters, including international cultural programs and international academic relations currently under the auspices of the Department of External Affairs. Under the provisions of the act, the new council will be required to take Canada's foreign policy into account in fulfilling its mandate.

The merger will result in increased efficiency in the delivery of programs and services such as grants to artists, promotion of the arts and the provision of scholarships in the social sciences and humanities. As a result, we will enhance our capacity to project our national personality and the expression of our culture abroad.

To realize savings in administrative overhead, the government proposes to fold the Canadian Commercial Corporation into the Department of Supply and Services. However, given the nature of the CCC's function, its dissolution will be phased in. Nevertheless, administrative savings of $1 million have already been identified from the corporation's 1992-93 appropriation of $14.9 million.

The CCC facilitates exports by Canadian suppliers, particularly defence products to foreign governments. Last year, the total value of orders obtained by the corporation on behalf of some 500 Canadian suppliers totalled $678 million. Moreover, the CCC's business involves more than 2,000 ongoing contracts in a least 50 countries. Therefore, we propose a gradual dissolution of the CCC until the Minister of Supply and Services is satisfied that there will be no detrimental effects on our exports and our trade relations with other countries. In the interim, the CCC will remain a corporate entity.

The government also proposes that Emergency Preparedness Canada be folded back into the Department of National Defence. This is an appropriate action given that Emergency Preparedness Canada was housed within the Department of National Defence prior to 1988 and still reports to the Minister of National Defence.

The budget papers did note that EPC's functions in relation to planning and co-ordinating civil emergency preparedness remain essential. However, its separate organizational status is not necessary for the effective fulfilment of that mandate. Moreover, folding EPC back into the Department of National Defence will allow for its functions to be continued at a lower cost in administrative overhead.

Bill C-93 additionally provides for the amalgamation of the RCMP External Review Committee and the RCMP Public Complaints Commission into a single body entitled the Independent Review Commission for the RCMP.

As was the case with the agencies being replaced, the new body will be independent from the RCMP. It will deal with public complaints concerning the conduct of RCMP officers and review appeals and grievances for members of the RCMP.

Consolidating these two similar agencies will achieve savings in administrative overhead, eliminate duplication of services and allow for increased efficiency and program delivery. This action will result in the reduction of seven person-years and one Governor in Council appointment and annual saving of about $1 million.

Efficiency gains will also be realized by merging the Copyright Board, the Trade Marks Opposition Board and the Patent Appeal Board to form the new intellectual property tribunal. Its duties will include the fixing of royalties which the performing rights societies may collect in return for granting licences for the performance of dramatic or musical works. The tribunal will also decide on how royalties should be divided, including those generated by the retransmission of television and radio signals. The intellectual property tribunal will arbitrate dispute on copyright royalties and decide opposition and cancellation procedures arising under the Trade Marks Act.

As recommended by an independent report, the tribunal will bring together an expanded wealth of intellectual property law and expertise into one organization. Industry sectors involved in the use of intellectual property will benefit through improved service and greater expertise among board members. Given that the tribunal at times will rule on government decisions it will be independent of the government.

The legislation also provides for the merger of the Procurement Review Board and the Canadian International Trade Tribunal. Following the merger, the new organization will be named the international trade and procurement tribunal and report to Parliament through the Minister of Finance.

Amalgamating the PRB and the CITT is a logical course of action. As members will know, these two entities provide similar services pertaining to complaints from Canadian and American suppliers about unfair trading practices. While the PRB's authority is limited to government procurement decisions within the scope of the free trade agreement, both bodies conduct investigations, hold hearings, uphold or dismiss complaints and if necessary determine remedies.

The new entity will provide increased administrative efficiencies from the sharing of personnel and overhead. For those who fear that the expertise accumulated by the PRB will be lost in the merger, I want to assure them this is not the case. As the new name implies, the international trade and procurement tribunal will have a separate division that will deal solely with matters of government procurement.

The government also intends to wind up the Petroleum Monitoring Agency. Its functions will be assumed in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. For those who are unfamiliar with the PMA, the agency publishes semi-annual and annual ownership surveys of the petroleum industry as well as other specific reports as requested by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to whom the PMA currently reports.

This streamlining action builds upon the efficiency gains that the PMA has achieved over the years which have already allowed for a steady decline of its size and budget. It also reflects the fact that administratively an independent agency with 10 person-years and a part-time chairman is not the most effective manner in which to perform the monitoring function. Monitoring the petroleum industry within EMR will result in annual savings of $300,000 over the PMA's 1991-92 budget and will require two less person-years.

Finally, the Veteran's Land Administration will be wound up and its function and responsibility will be transferred directly to the Department of Veterans Affairs. This merging of VLA operations with those of the department will allow greater economies while ensuring that the interests of veterans are fully protected.

I want to emphasize that the VLA program is not being abolished. Rather, the legislation merely reflects the fact the program is in its final phase. Established during the Second World War, the VLA program provides loans and other assistance to veterans purchasing property for farms and homes. However, no new loans have been made since 1977 and as of April 1, 1992 there were 10,603 loans outstanding as opposed to 144,000, 20 years ago. Given the declining VLA workload, it is appropriate that its separate agency status be terminated.

As I have described, Bill C-93 will result in significant administrative savings and increased efficiency in the delivery of government programs and services to Canadians.

• (1050)

It reflects the government's commitment to ensure that tax dollars are not wasted on funding duplicated services or excessive administration. The bill makes sensible changes in a reasonable way while ensuring that the national interest is served. Accordingly I would urge my hon. colleagues to ensure speedy passage of this most important piece of legislation.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I want to participate in this debate. I am anticipating that the Chair will rule in favour of my suggestion that the bill ought to be sent back to the drafters in order that it be brought back in its appropriate form.

Nevertheless, I wish to direct my comments to one aspect of Bill C-93 and that has to do with the amendments to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. In this particular bill, as has been referred to by the hon. member opposite, the Government of Canada will be shutting down Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. This was an agency put in place to facilitate and enhance economic development on the island of Cape Breton. That was part and parcel of Bill C-103 which was introduced back in 1987.

For the benefit of the House and those who are viewing our proceedings, I wish to share with the hon. members opposite as well as other members in the Chamber the historical significance that individuals in Cape Breton believe Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation could play now and in the future.

Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation was supposed to assume the role and responsibilities of the industrial development division of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. History is important, for in studying history we can learn what we have done well and what we have done not so well.

In 1967 the Government of Canada at the behest of the then member for Cape Breton—Highlands—Canso, who now sits in the other place, presented a piece of legislation before the House of Commons to create the Cape Breton Development Corporation. At that time the coal industry was in massive difficulty. Unemployment was rampant on the island. Economic opportunities were practically non-existent.

As a measure of goodwill and to try to enhance real opportunities the government of the day and particularly that member who was a minister of the Crown introduced the Cape Breton Development Corporation. It had two divisions. One was the coal division, the second was the industrial development division.

The purpose of the bill I would like to read into the record. At that time it was succinctly defined by the hon. Allan J. MacEachen in the House of Commons when he spoke on the motion introducing the corporation's enabling legislation: "To acquire, reorganize and rehabilitate certain coal mining works and undertakings on Cape Breton Island, to conduct coal mining operations in the Sydney coal fields and to promote and assist the development of industry on Cape Breton Island to provide employment outside the coal producing industry and to broaden the base of the island's economy".

It had two divisions with its own president, its own board of directors and its own mandate. It is important to remember this for the purposes of debate. Devco has had some successes and it has had some failures. I do not think anyone in this Chamber would doubt that. Having the two divisions enabled those individuals who are involved in the coal mining sector to have some sense of security for their future and some hope as to where we might go.

Since we are specifically talking about industrial development, I want to share with members what my colleague, Senator Graham, said in the upper House on May 26, 1988 from the Hansard of the Senate, page 3500. He talks about the industrial development division:

> The industrial development division continues to fulfil its mandate by doing what the coal division cannot do in many of those communities whose history and economy are deeply rooted in coal. Among other things, the industrial development division provides urban and industrial infrastructure, supports the entrepreneurial development programs and supports local self help organization. We must underline and emphasize that the corporation is not two separate divisions with two mutually exclusive mandates; in reality, the mandate and the direction are the same, to modernize and diversify the Cape Breton economy.
> The corporate mandate may be protected in legislation, but it is corporate policy that determines the results. The Cape Breton > Development Corporation has, through the policy decision, chosen to be socially responsible to the people of Cape Breton Island.

That was the essence of the corporation and that was in essence the work of the Industrial Developoment Division. The former chairman of the board of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, Dr. Theresa MacNeil, said in part:

> The social conscience of the Cape Breton Development Corporation has long been possible by the work it assigned to the Industrial Development Division. It is possible through program retention to duplicate the current activities of the Industrial Development Division. That is not a problem. However, in doing so, the essence of the Cape Breton Development Corporation is being lost.

I share that with members of the House because historically we had the Cape Breton Development Corporation which was to do a number of things, as I have indicated, and the government comes along in October of 1986 and creates the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. That is in part I of the bill. In part II of the bill it did away with the Industrial Development Division and created what we now have, Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, which the government now wishes to do away with.

In the Speech from the Throne on October 1, 1986 the Conservative government announced its intention to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency in order to "facilitate and co-ordinate all federal development initiatives in that area".

That was October 1, 1986. This announcement was made by the Prime Minister on June 6, 1987 in Saint John with unbelievable fanfare. There was a huge press conference, a big news release, and a big reception. So vital was this new program that a mere six months later, a mere 14 months after the original announcement in the Speech from the Throne, the implementing legislation was finally introduced in the House of Commons in December of 1987.

The government's hypocrisy is rather breathtaking. It tells Atlantic Canadians that they are the real decision makers behind ACOA, which we know is not correct, and then warns them that they will be held culpable if ACOA fails.

The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency was given a budget of $1.05 billion. All the wonderful press people and the writers in The Globe and Mail and The Toronto Star and The Montreal Gazette and The Vancouver Sun used to say my goodness, what an unbelievable amount of money for Atlantic Canada.

I know my time is coming to an end, but I just want to close with this and then I can continue the debate afterwards.

That was $1.05 billion over five years, roughly $200 million a year for four individual provinces. It amounted roughly to $86.96 per person. That is what the announcement then made with regard to ACOA.

• (1100)

I see my time is up, but I hope to continue the debate after Routine Proceedings.

FRENCH IN THE ARMED FORCES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, today La Presse reported the following, and I quote:

> Minister of Defence Marcel Masse has decided to take concrete steps to ensure that francophones are able to work and advance within the armed forces in their own mother tongue.
> "The Chief of Staff and the Minister of Defence have decided it is imperative that all courses (basic occupational) shall be offered in French starting September 1993", the minister announced when he appeared yesterday before parliament's official languages committee.
> In doing so, Mr. Masse wants to remedy a major deficiency in the department and the Armed Forces which was pointed out by a departmental official languages committee.
> According to a report published on November 15 this year, 41 per cent of the basic courses for various occupations are still not available in French. Basic technical training for officers is given in French in only 10 per cent of the cases.
> "This is a situation we cannot tolerate, and changes must be made as soon as possible", said Mr. Masse. He added that in five years' time, all basic technical training courses should be available in both languages, for all branches of the service and all occupations.

MULGRAVE, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, a David and Goliath battle is shaping up in eastern Nova Scotia.

David is the town of Mulgrave, population of 951. Incorporated in 1923, Mulgrave is a proud town with a proud past. In recent years it has struggled against difficult odds to attract jobs for its residents. Unemployment in the town is between 23 per cent and upwards of 50 per cent depending on the measure one uses.

Goliath is the Royal Bank of Canada, the country's largest bank with assets of $132 billion and profits of $983 million in fiscal 1991.

The Royal Bank has decided to close its branch in Mulgrave which has been there for 81 years and consolidate its operations across the Strait of Canso in Port Hawkesbury. As a result, Mulgrave residents will lose the only bank in their community. They will have to travel a minimum of 28 kilometres round trip to obtain basic banking services.

This may be a small matter to the Royal Bank of Canada more accustomed to handling big accounts like Olympia and York, but it is no small matter to the residents of Mulgrave.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but the hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Elgin—Norfolk.

CORN AND SOYBEAN PRODUCERS

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, corn and soybean producers in Ontario have suffered a devastating harvest.

A cold, wet growing season has produced one of the worst harvests in memory. As well, continued wet conditions this fall have prevented many farmers from harvesting their crops. Moisture levels in the crops that have been harvested are incredibly high.

Farmers are spending precious funds to dry corn that may only be suitable for animal feed. Many producers are finding that corn and soybean standing in the fields are moulding and will be unsuitable even for animal feed.

I am pleased the Minister of Agriculture is providing assistance to these producers who are unable to harvest their crops. Farmers are devastated by this crop loss. I appreciate the Minister of Agriculture responding so quickly to the needs of the producers in Ontario.

SHELTERED WORKSHOPS

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, once again the NDP is showing that its pretence to be the conscience of the nation and the protector of the disadvantaged vanishes the minute it holds power and has its hands on the purse-strings.

In a cruel blow without warning, the NDP government in Ontario cut $5 million from sheltered workshops for mentally disabled individuals. Further cuts of up to $1 billion in social services may mean the complete elimination of sheltered workshops. In this region alone 200 individuals are on the waiting list and 200 more may soon be out on the streets.

Yesterday, on the International Day of the Disabled, 700 participants, parents, care workers and volunteers, rallied to protest the inhumanity of the NDP government.

I plead with the NDP members in this House. Talk to your colleagues in Toronto. Tell them to stop harassing, punishing and depriving our most vulnerable citizens.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, a constituent in my riding left her job in a home for mentally handicapped persons because of the mistreatment of the residents. She reported the information to the licensing board and the mental health officials and applied for UI. She was disqualified from UI for 12 weeks for quitting her job.

Now, a year later, the licensing body having investigated the home has cancelled its licence and removed the residents.

Under the government's new proposals, not only would she have been disqualified for 12 weeks but she would also have been denied any UI.

We should be congratulating this woman for standing up for the rights of the disadvantaged, not punishing her by denying her unemployment insurance.

With the threat of no unemployment insurance, others may not be so courageous putting the health and safety of group home residents at risk.

SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise to applaud the small business employment and investment package announced on Wednesday.

To encourage small business to expand and hire new employees, UI premium costs will be capped at 1992 levels. New enterprises will have a UI premium holiday for 1993.

Rules on investments in small business by RRSPs and labour-sponsored venture capital funds will be simplified and financing options expanded.

As well, a one year 10 per cent investment tax credit will be available for purchases of new machinery and equipment by small business in farming, fishing, mining, oil and gas, manufacturing, construction and long-haul transportation.

These measures will help those 800,000 private sector small business enterprises which are the engine of economic growth and the major source of job creation in this country.

VIMY BAND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, in an attempt to reduce costs, the Department of National Defence is considering relocating the historic Vimy Band currently stationed at CFB Kingston to CFB Borden.

Moving the Vimy Band would require the transfer of 35 military personnel at an estimated cost of $409,500. By comparison, relocating to Kingston the CFB Borden staff would require the expected transfer of eight personnel at a total cost of $96,300. This makes no sense.

Since its founding in 1952, the Vimy Band has been stationed in Kingston. Its ties with the community are very important for Kingston area residents and for the members of this great group of musicians.

If the department is serious about cost savings, look elsewhere. This scheme is ill-founded, ill-conceived and a major upset to the lives of 35 talented and competent musical soldiers.

I urge the department to re-examine this issue very carefully.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, when the government was bringing in free trade, the opposition parties declared their full support for GATT, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. They said that we should enhance trade through multilateral negotiations.

The Liberal and NDP love GATT except when politics intervene. When it comes to complying with GATT on patent protection for brand name pharmaceuticals bringing our patent protection to the international standard of 20 years, then the opposition is against GATT.

Are the Liberals and the NDP in favour of GATT or not? How would they negotiate complex trade agreements? Will they be for or against GATT next spring when it concludes?

I look forward to learning of their positions.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, on Sunday, November 6, the National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence Against Women, we will remember the Montreal massacre and I will remember the many women in my riding who have been murdered on the streets and officially forgotten.

What action has the government taken for women facing violence? The mini budget provided no job creation, no shelters, and no child care to help women escape violent situations.

Instead, it victimized women with punitive new unemployment insurance restrictions. It announced a 10 per cent cut per year in funds for organizations fighting violence. It cut $136 million from native communities dealing with the pain of violence. These escalating cuts are added to previous $1 million cuts to programs for immigrant, native and poor women.

It is not enough to have more research into violence. It is not enough for government members to wear white ribbons. They must stop hurting women.

NEW BRUNSWICK YOUTH STRATEGY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Five years ago in November 1988 an experimental project was initiated between the federal government and the Government of New Brunswick to assist young people in the frequently difficult transition from a school environment to the permanent workplace.

The program was intended to address both those who drop out of school as well as those who were graduating but unable to find a working career path.

The New Brunswick strategy was concentrated through store-front access centres for youth throughout the province where ease of contact would be followed by individual assessment counselling and direction. These new initiatives were designed to complement current labour market training and educational activities.

Through the youth strategy, government at all levels in New Brunswick, the private sector, labour, educators and youth groups worked together to strengthen the links between education and the world of work.

• (1110)

In March 1993 this pilot program will be completing its fifth full year with considerable evidence of success. It represents a combined federal and provincial investment of more than $120 million. Hopefully—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, the hon member's time has expired. The hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk.

YOUTH

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the unemployment figures came out today and the news is not very good. The national figure rose to 11.8 per cent for November but the numbers are even more disturbing for the youth of this country.

The youth unemployment figures released today indicate that 438,000 young people do not have jobs. That is 18.4 per cent of Canada's youth. In October 406,000 young people were out of work. In other words, 32,000 more young Canadians have joined the ranks of the unemployed.

Canada's young people have lost confidence. They have lost confidence in what their futures hold and certainly lost confidence in what this government will be doing for them.

The recent Tory economic statement illustrates the government's lack of commitment to Canadian youth who are hoping for some action and a plan for economic growth. Unfortunately Canada's youth see no relief in sight and they have lost hope.

We need to address the problems of youth. We need to make youth issues a priority. In other words, we need a government which can give Canada's young people opportunity—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Peterborough.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I am going to read a quotation from a female author involved in a project funded by the Department of National Health and Welfare: "I have a vision. My vision is of a time where women are respected and treated as equals. It is a time where women feel safe in their homes, on the streets and in their places of work. As a mother, it frightens me to think that my daughters, like all women, are vulnerable to abuse and violence by men".

Unfortunately, her vision is far from reality. The Montreal massacre of 1989 showed that violence against women is pervasive.

As we approach the second National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence Against Women, let us pause to reflect on the damage violence has inflicted upon Canadian women, their families, and society as a whole. Let us resolve today to work toward that vision of true equality because anything less is unacceptable.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, few of us will forget the pain and horror we felt three years ago on December 6, 1989 when 14 young women's lives were taken in the brutal massacre at l'École Polytechnique.

Our nation grieved and from our grief emerged determination not just to remember but to act, to act to put an end to violence against women and to improve the status of women in our society.

Each year in Canada 100 women are killed in domestic violence. Thousands more are abused physically and mentally. A recent survey showed that over 50 per cent of Canadian women are afraid to walk in the streets of their own neighbourhoods at night and that is a fear many of us understand.

[Translation]

We must act. Every one of us must act. We must put an end to fear and to these horrifying statistics. The government must show leadership. That is why I ask the government to reverse this decision to cut grants to women's groups. I ask the government to bring back the Court Challenges Program.

[English]

Violence is everyone's responsibility, men and women, in every community in this country.

NATIVE STUDENTS

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, on November 29, 1991, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development appeared before the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and stated that self-fulfilment of the aspirations and the destiny of aboriginal persons in this country required many things including opportunity and encouragement, but education was the most important ingredient of all.

The Minister of Finance's economic statement did not exempt post-secondary education funding for native students. This area is already seriously underfunded.

The Blood tribe of Alberta will be forced to defer 358 native students who are eligible for funding this year alone. This is just one example.

Native students across this country are being denied the opportunity to build a future for themselves.

SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, we all know small business is one of the major areas where employment creation can occur in Canada. I want to congratulate the government in its statement the other day recognizing the important role that small business can play.

I am quite pleased with the increase to $250,000 in the limit for the Small Businesses Loans Act and particularly the inclusion of a provision that allows for some of that funding to be used for working capital requirements.

That is an excellent step. I congratulate the government for including a waiver of UI premiums for additional employees hired by small business and also for the tax credits for the purchase of capital equipment so important to the modernization and improvement of the competitiveness of business.

This government knows how important small business is to Canada. It has proven it by its statements in the House in the last few days.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, the government's latest budget once again gives the largest cut, proportionately speaking, to our International Development Assistance Program.

The primary objective of our overseas International Development Assistance Program is poverty alleviation. Mass starvation, low health and education achievements, devastating agricultural practices of four–fifth's of the world's poor contribute directly to the degradation of our global environment.

At the earth summit in Rio this year, our Prime Minister preened, and uttered the following: "Sustainable development is not a slogan; it is a prerequisite of our prosperity and a safeguard of our identity. It is also a standard of our responsibility to humanity". This government's standard of responsibility is abysmal.

This Prime Minister has no credibility. This government has no credibility. At a minimum, let the government acknowledge that effective poverty alleviation and sustainable development are achieved through our non–government organizations.

Respond to the Auditor General's concern about our support to institutions such as the World Bank and Regional Development Banks. Assure no cuts to the budget of our NGOs. Put some credibility into the Rio words of our Prime Minister.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance.

On Wednesday afternoon when I was listening to the minister, I kept telling myself, these guys just do not get it. I have the proof today: the big increase in unemployment during the month of November. Every working day 4,000 people are added to the unemployment list in Canada; 4,000 persons for every working day.

To face that problem, the minister came in with a public works program of infrastructure that will create 4,000 jobs, not every day of the month, but over a period of two years. We made suggestions regarding the policies of this government of high interest rates, a high dollar, high deficit, municipal infrastructure program and they said no, no, no, no.

If the minister and the government feel they are right, why not tell the Prime Minister to do the right thing and go the Canadian people so that they can decide who is right and who is wrong.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, quite frankly, that is the only suggestion that I heard as I listened to the debate for the last couple of days: Call an election, no details, borrow some more money and spend a lot of it on infrastructure. On what types of infrastructure? Are there programs ready? Nobody really knows. Just throw money at the thing and then walk away.

Well, that is one suggestion and that is fine. There were some other suggestions which I hope that I can elaborate on.

Indeed, I am troubled by the latest unemployment statistics. I know that all members in the House are troubled by them. I ask the hon. Leader of the Opposition to remember one fact and it is that employment has grown in six of the last seven months. There have been 77,000 new jobs created, 104,000 permanent jobs since August. What we have here is one of the largest increases in the work force on record, some 89,000. While there have been jobs created, the growth of the labour force by 89,000 has caused the unemployment insurance figure to go up in percentage terms.

While I know the figure of 11.8 per cent is very disturbing, what is encouraging is that 13,000 new jobs were created in the month of November.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Finance.

In the province of Quebec, the unemployment rate has now reached 14.3 per cent.

• (1120)

In November this meant an increase of 1.6 per cent, the highest increase in the number of unemployed workers in Quebec in a single month since employment statistics were first available.

The Minister of Finance has proposed a fantastic project which consists in repairing two bridges in the Montreal area. That is supposed to deal with the problem.

Does the Minister of Finance have any idea of the despair that exists in Montreal and the province of Quebec? Last night, I was in Montreal, and there were for sale and for rent signs all over the place.

When will the Minister of Finance finally understand that this fight against inflation at any price is an absolute disaster? When will he act responsibly to give Quebecers a glimmer of hope and change his economic policies which have been condemned across the country by business people, workers, social groups, in fact everyone? When will the government finally understand that the time has come to change its economic policies?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I know the hon. member would sort of sneeze at $500 million being invested in infrastructure programs that can commence almost immediately. I think it is important. In addition, there are a number of private sector initiatives that can be undertaken.

I understand the seriousness of the problem, but I can assure the hon. member the steps that we announced in the economic plan on Wednesday are genuine, are real and they will be acted upon with dispatch.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): The Minister of Finance constantly asks us for suggestions. Yesterday in Montreal I saw the places where Mayor Doré told me he was ready to begin work immediately. I saw the mayor of Laval not very long ago. He told me that he has specific projects on file that would put people to work immediately, two or three days after the government decision.

Why does the government absolutely refuse to accept this proposal from the Canadian union of mayors and municipalities, who are ready to invest one-third in each of these projects? The provincial governments are ready to go ahead, only the federal goverment is blocking it.

Why does the government stubbornly refuse to trust the municipalities, which could put people to work tomorrow morning? .Why does the minister not see the good sense in it?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that we are acting. There will be tenders called for improvement to the bridges which are federal government property, $125 million in that particular area, $75 million on another group of transportation priorities, $36 million on the Montreal Port Corporation. All of these things will create a number of jobs and will create economic activity. The total effort will provide a number of new jobs and encourage the engineering and the construction sector. These things are going to start almost immediately.

In addition to that, there are a number of steps that have been taken to stimulate the small business sector incentives, improvements in access to capital, improvements in terms of providing incentives to hire more people; all of these things. The small business sector is very vibrant and alive and well in the province of Quebec. I expect that they will utilize the programs we announced and utilize them very effectively.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): In the same vein, Madam Speaker, the minister is directly depriving the unemployed and their families of $2.4 billion.

[English]

The minister says the recession is over. In the last week we have heard that 10,000 people at CN have lost their jobs; 2,000 people at Dofasco are going to lose their jobs; 2,500 people at CIBC are going to lose their jobs and GM workers in St. Catharines were delivered another blow, 800 more people to join the ranks of the unemployed. What do hear from the minister of employment? He calls them couch potatoes and accuses them of spending their winters in Florida. He has the nerve to say the unemployed should be proud to assist in paying off the national debt. How can the government make these gross statements and, worse still, how can it take these disgusting actions, these punitive measures against people who are already on their knees?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, there is a report, admittedly out of the United States, which indicates that under NAFTA the Canadian portion of the auto trade in North America will continue to be very strong, much stronger than our population would warrant. NAFTA will, of course, help to maintain our auto trade.

I am mentioning the auto trade first because the hon. member mentioned the St. Catharines closing. We have known about the St. Catharines closing. It was announced about three months ago so we have known about that. We are willing to help in any way we can together with the province. It should be pointed out that that is 800 jobs, but 21,000 jobs were announced to be gone in the automotive industry in the United States yesterday.

We are living through a downsizing throughout North America and we are more than holding our own.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, that is an awful answer. It certainly does not send any relief to the thousands of Canadians who this week have been told by the government that they are bums, and at the same time have been told by companies that they are no longer wanted.

I ask the Minister of Finance whether he agrees with his colleague, the minister of employment, who said yesterday that many of the employed wanted to collect unemployment insurance so they could spend their winters in Florida.

Does he agree with that patently absurd statement? Is that really why he has taken these punitive measures of taking $2.4 billion directly from the hands of unemployed Canadians who are already begging for work from a government that seems to have no answers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, much of the savings that will be realized in the actions that were taken will be reappropriated and reallocated toward more training and skills upgrading. Some $3.8 billion will be spent on training and a new initiative will be undertaken with respect to the provision of co-ordinating the demands and the learning skills with the private sector so that there can be better synchronization of filling the job demands in the private sector.

What is being constituted here is a freeze of the average UI benefits. As I indicated in the House yesterday, this is not the first time it has happened. When the Leader of the Opposition was the finance minister, he cut the benefits from 66 and two-thirds to 60 per cent. There was no grandfathering. Both existing and new claimants were covered. He cut a million Canadians. At that time inflation was running at 9 per cent. At that time, the whole unemployment insurance program amounted to $4 billion. He took $935 million out of the program and nobody squawked over there. It was not a tragedy then. It was far more severe, far more serious than it is today. Why the double standard?

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

I am sure if the former Minister of Finance, now the Leader of the Opposition, would repent, Canadians would be happy if the current Minister of Finance would repent too for his economic statement.

In the last 48 hours three major corporations have announced job cuts across the country totalling over 3,000 jobs. Today Statistics Canada reports that more than 80,000 people are unemployed than last month and that 60,000, three-quarters of them are women.

It is true that we have today the highest number of unemployed in the history of Canada. The measures announced by the minister this week will simply result in a net over-all job loss of 62,000 more jobs.

I want to say to the minister that it is clear that Canadians need to be getting back to work if we are to address the debt and if we are to address the pain across this country.

Will this minister withdraw his economic statement and bring in a policy that will bring hope to Canadians?

• (1130)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker, because it is an economic plan that is comprehensive, responsible, and deals with the situation as the country is today.

It provides for investment in people. It provides for investment in infrastructure. It provides ways and means to improve our trading performance. It provides for action to contain the deficit.

I believe most objective observers, in the circumstances that we find ourselves in, would find this a very credible plan. I ask the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party, rather than just picking on one or two items, to look at it in a comprehensive way and maybe she may change her mind.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, the 1.6 million unemployed Canadians will not find the minister's statement, by any objective means, useful to them in their future and what they can see as the future of their children.

[Translation]

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance another question. Women are always the first victims of the economic crisis. This morning, Statistics Canada showed that once again.

If the government does not want to answer the appeals from those it calls bleeding hearts, those it accuses of whining, how will it answer the 60,000 more women who are unemployed?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, of course I am concerned about the impact upon women. I am also concerned about what seems to be the position of the New Democratic Party and others in this House that they condone the abuse of the UI system. They not only condone it, they are encouraging it, and aiding and abetting it. I will not be associated with that kind of a position.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, the government has made it very clear they do not care about the unemployed of this country. They are not prepared to bring in policies to address the most serious job crisis in the history of Canada.

The minister and members of the government talk about bleeding hearts. Yesterday the Minister of Employment and Immigration said in this House that if a woman is being sexually harassed, "she should just quit her job." This is being outrageously insensitive. The minister has displayed a complete lack of understanding of the labour market and of the problems that working people have in the labour market.

I want to say to the Deputy Prime Minister, when his government is making statements like that which deny the realities of the work life, will he ask that minister to resign and will his government apologize to the women of Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker, because the outrageous statement of the leader of the New Democratic Party and the outrageous statements of the president of the New Democratic are absolutely and totally uncalled for. The hon. leader of the New Democratic Party should ask for the resignation of her president.

SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The government insists that sexual harassment is just cause for those who quit their jobs voluntarily, but a search of the court decisions shows this is just not so. Indeed, a handbook on unemployment insurance appeals admits that just cause is extremely hard to prove.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister why will he not set out a definition of sexual harassment as just cause, and do it today?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, yesterday stated clearly that sexual harassment is just cause to leave employment and that the UI department has been dealing with such cases for years.

I would recall to the hon. member that sexual harassment was included in the legislation, Bill C-21, as just cause for leaving a job; a bill that the opposition delayed for over one year.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, there are delays and delays. I was here and I am proud of it. However, there are other outrageous matters that this government deals with. It does not take care of its own public servants.

[Translation]

My next question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday the minister of employment said that it was time for a government with enough "balls" to face reality.

Now it is clear why the government just does not understand the serious issue of sexual harassment.

Will the government change the definition of "just cause" today?

[English]

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, if I understood the hon. member correctly, she said she was proud to have delayed Bill C-21 for over a year, therefore denying benefits to the unemployed at that time.

[Translation]

On the specific question, it is quite obvious that if opposition members read the finance minister's economic statement, besides having listened to it off and on, they would of course realize that there is no change with respect to sexual harassment. On the contrary, the situation is the same before, during and after the statement.

[English]

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. It follows up on a question by my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton East.

It concerns his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration who yesterday, when asked about his plan to force women to put up with sexual harassment on the job by effectively taking away the possibility of UIC, said that these people have to pay their way. He stated: "These people want to spend the winter in Florida."

Did the Deputy Prime Minister agree with the Minister of Employment and Immigration when he said that, and if not, what action will the Deputy Prime Minister take against the Minister of Employment and Immigration?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration clearly indicated in this House yesterday that people who quit their jobs for causes such as sexual harassment are still entitled, after the economic statement as they were before, to UI benefits. The situation has not changed and we do not expect it to change.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister who is very selective in the things that he quotes with regard to the economy. He knows full well that when he referred to the Leader of the Opposition, unemployment was at 7.4 per cent and growth was at 3.9 per cent.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he has the guts to stand in his place and indicate to the people of my district who have an unemployment rate of 20.9 per cent, what he is going to do for those individuals in that disadvantaged region of the country. What programs is he going to put in place to get them back to work, or is he going to continue to kiss up to the multinational corporations?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is quite obvious that this member not only condones the abuse of the UI system but is encouraging it and promoting it. That is exactly the purport of his question.

What are we doing? In my statement I indicated that we were going ahead with a microwave landing system. That happens to affect an important organization in his district. It will create jobs and economic activity. It is an industry of the future.

The adjustment from coal mining and the other industries that are becoming outdated, under the training program—

Mr. Dingwall: You are on dope.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member suggests that I am on dope.

Some hon. members: Withdraw.

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I did not hear. The hon. minister may conclude.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, in a very eloquent speech by his colleague, he praised the federal government for the actions that we were taking on the infrastructure and the improvement of the airport system, particularly the microwave landing system which is going to have an effect on his particular region.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

• (1140)

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

At a time when western Canadian farmers are experiencing some of the lowest prices in agricultural history, it would seem appropriate that the federal government would want to do everything in its power to assist farm families struggling to survive.

It is ironic that the federal government is intent in doing just the opposite. Farmers were deeply shocked at the recent announcement that 10 per cent of the Crow benefit will be eliminated. It will take $40 million out of Saskatchewan farmers' pockets alone at a time when they can least afford it.

Can the minister explain how this government can justify adding yet another additional blow to the economic and human suffering of western Canadian farm families?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, in the economic plan that was put forward by my colleague, the Minister of Finance, there was a reduction in expenditures of some $8 billion. There were reductions in every area, in grants and contributions, of 10 per cent.

Those reductions will apply in the agriculture sector. It is a very difficult thing for governments to do, but the necessity of reducing those expenditures has to be shared with every one.

One thing the hon. member should understand is that the farm safety nets, GRIP and NISA, cash flow enhancements have been left intact and will be there to continue to assist the agriculture sector across Canada.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, this government knows that just as it has destroyed the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada and Newfoundland, it is doing the same with agriculture producers in rural Canada.

For example, there has been a lot of concern over the impact of the export enhancement program which the United States has been using to force its way into traditional Canadian markets and the failure of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement to properly protect Canadians farmers in this area.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister this. We all know that the Liberals have completely caved in with their opposition to the free trade agreement with Mexico and the U.S.. Why has this government caved in on the Crow benefit, while at the same time signing the NAFTA agreement that will allow the United States to raid traditional Canadians markets with its destructive export enhancement program?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has to realize that there are some facts that he cannot dispute, that agricultural trade with the United States has increased 30 per cent since the signing of the free trade agreement with the United States. That puts benefit in his constituency, mine and every agricultural constituency in Canada.

The hon. member also has to recognize that there are new realities in agriculture, value added, sustainability and the ability to develop. His colleague in the province of Saskatchewan, the minister of economic development, continues to talk about it.

If the New Democratic Party wishes to assist agriculture in Canada, there are two things it can do. It can pass the farm credit legislation that allows all rural Canada to take advantage of farm credit legislation. Also, it can pass the check–off legislation that the farm community wants so that they are able to support themselves with check–offs and enter into this new real world.

The farm community, the agricultural sector of our economy, wants to do that. They want to go ahead. Will the New Democratic Party help them?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think we have to go on. The hon. member for York North.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, the only person left in Canada who thinks that the recession is over.

The unemployment statistics released today are further evidence that we face a serious national employment crisis. The unemployment rate now stands at 11.8 per cent, which means that almost 1.7 million Canadians are unemployed. The minister must admit that the reason why these people are unemployed is because his economic plan is simply not working. It is time for change.

When will he introduce a plan that will put Canadians back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I did indicate in an earlier response that I was troubled by the increase in unemployment rates from 11.3 to 11.8 per cent.

I remind the hon. member that there has been an increase in employment in six of the last seven months for a total of 77,000 new jobs, 13,000 new jobs in the month of November. Since August 104,000 permanent jobs have been created. I think what has to be noted here is that the labour force grew very dramatically, the biggest improvement on record, some 89,000.

Having said that, we have announced a number of initiatives in the economic plan that I outlined, initiatives which invest in growth, invest in people, invest in more effective trade, in an infrastructure and in new partnerships that have to be forged if we are to deal in an effective way with the newly emerging economy and to deal with the displacement of workers.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. minister will have the opportunity to elaborate on a supplemental.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, it is clear that this government does not understand the real problems faced by real people. The two groups hardest hit in today's unemployment numbers are women and youth, the exact same people who have the most to lose from the measures taken by this government.

Given that 60,000 women lost their jobs in November and there are over 438,000 unemployed young people, the future of this country, when will the government do its duty and help these people?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I take issue with the premise of the question where the hon. member identifies two groups that have most to lose. I think we are dealing with a global situation in Canada.

The Minister of Finance has recognized, as everybody here will recognize, that effectively the rate of unemployment is too high. We all agree with that and that is why we are taking those measures in order to deal with it.

The economic statement of the Minister of Finance is to do exactly that, to create 300,000 new jobs in 1993, to give incentives to small business which is the motor of the economy in order to create those new jobs for youth and women, et cetera, and to create new jobs in research and development. The leader of the hon. member's party when he speaks in Montreal forgets to mention that he is opposing legislation that will help Montreal.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It would be appreciated if on both sides of the House preambles in questions and answers would be shorter.

LANGUAGE AND SKILLS TRAINING

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who honestly must know the recession is not over.

Money in language and training skills for the province of Ontario was scheduled to be split between the employment offices and local training advisory boards. These local training advisory boards will not be in place in 1993.

Could the minister assure this House today that the $30 million allocated for local boards will be available through the employment centres as it has in the past?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not have an answer to that question at the moment. I wonder if I could take it as notice and get back to the hon. member as soon as I can.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is on the same subject and for the same minister.

I want to inform the government and the minister that the minister's staff cannot answer that question either. We have attempted to get an answer.

That means $765,000 and 85,000 hours of training at Loyalist College in my area alone. I would appreciate it if the minister could get both the answer for Canadians and the answer for those training facilities, to find out if that money will be available in 1993.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as the Minister of Finance has just indicated, we will provide the information. I will personally make sure the minister's staff gets the information and it is provided to the hon. member.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, Sunday, December 6, is the national day of remembrance of the tragic massacre of the 14 young women at the Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal in 1990. We all have a responsibility to act to end violence against women.

Will the government acknowledge that rising unemployment contributes to violence against women, that the stress of living below the poverty line contributes to violence against women, and that the strain of hanging on to a job in the face of harassment and discrimination will add, not subtract, to violence against women?

Will the government, at the very least, restore the cuts announced this week to organizations that are confronting violence against women and providing support for the victims of violence against women?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, we are reaching an anniversary of a very tragic occurrence in Montreal, Quebec. The Minister responsible for the Status of Women, as she mentioned earlier this week, has said that while substantial efforts have been made toward addressing violence against women, much work remains to be done to change the attitudes and the behaviours which give rise to violence within our society.

Each of us has a responsibility to break the silence and to act to deter incidents of physical and psychological abuse of women.

SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister of state who is answering on behalf of the minister of employment.

A spokesperson for the employment department, Richard Fix, yesterday said that a woman must offer evidence to prove her case of sexual harassment or abuse in the workplace if she is to receive unemployment insurance. I quote: "For someone to quit their job it would have to be fairly serious sexual harassment and there would either be witnesses or there would be some sort of method of being able to prove the situation".

Will the minister outline to the House very specifically what instructions are being given to the front-line workers in Employment Canada to accept statements by claimants that they have been sexually harassed?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as I indicated earlier, the concept of sexual harassment with just cause was included in Bill C-21 for the first time, which hon. members of the opposition opposed for one year.

That being said, it is a recognized cause to quit employment. The minister has indicated that yesterday. That was in place before the economic statement, during, and it is still in place at this time. The minister also indicated very specifically on a number of occasions that the benefit of the doubt is given to the person making the complaint. That will continue.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and concerns delays in crop insurance settlements within the province of Saskatchewan.

It seems that the media and others are suggesting to producers that the fault lies with the federal government, but the fact is that under federal-provincial agreement the delivery and administration of crop insurance appear to be entirely a provincial matter.

Could the Minister of Agriculture possibly clear up the confusion that appears to exist in relation to these crop insurance settlement claims within the province of Saskatchewan?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Madam Speaker, it is unfortunate that Saskatchewan is the only province that has not seen fit to react rapidly to the difficult year we have had in agriculture.

Every province, although it is a joint cost shared program, administers directly the crop insurance program. Crop insurance cheques are available in other provinces, particularly our sister provinces of Manitoba and Alberta. I asked the minister in Saskatchewan some six weeks ago to try to facilitate an immediate response to the needs. There is a crop insurance program in Saskatchewan based on fixed cost and market price. That is in the contract.

Farmers are familiar with market price. That means they will know the price at the same time as they will know the final payment for the crop year. Therefore I encourage the province of Saskatchewan and its administration of crop insurance to facilitate the needs of farmers. The money is available. They have the authority. Please send it out.

FORESTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Forestry.

On June 29 the Conservative minister and member for Rimouski—Témiscouata announced a major project for a model forest in east central Quebec. In the past 12 months, Quebec has never revealed its true intentions on what it would like its role to be in this project, which is now at a stage where they should announce their intentions.

Can the minister tell me today whether a positive decision will be made before Christmas, because I have the feeling that by his refusal, the Quebec minister, Albert Côté, is penalizing Quebec forestry, tourism and environmental associations, regional municipalities, the University of Quebec in Rimouski and workers in eastern Quebec?

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, my colleague raised a very important question. Yes, Quebec has known about a model forest. Since October 1991, we have been working through exchanges between the Minister of Forestry and his Quebec counterpart on implementing this very important project for the community.

I would simply remind the member that on our side, we have worked very hard so that the project can start as soon as possible. We are having discussions that should lead next week to an agreement which I hope will be favourable for all concerned. I hope that the Quebec minister of forestry will be sensitive to the development of his region and the development of private forests in Quebec.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. He knows that the mini budget did precious little for the province of Ontario.

In response to my specific question on this matter yesterday in the House he said: "You cannot have an NDP government in Ontario that is anti-business and expect them to create jobs".

We all realize that the NDP government at Queen's Park has been a complete bust, but why does the minister believe that provincial incompetence on the economy in Ontario should be emulated by the federal government?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, very simply because the provinces have an important role to play in the direction of the economy as well. They spend more money on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada than the federal government.

Today I am disturbed to note that Ontario is going to raise taxes further still. That will not augur well for jobs. That will not augur well for the business community to create new economic activity.

Again today The Globe and Mail in a featured article said this about the role of the provinces: "One of the most disruptive features of the past few years has been the damage done to the private sector by provincial governments and their agencies which borrowed record amounts of money abroad. They helped push the Canadian dollar into unsustainable levels and destroyed many jobs".

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, Ontarians have an incompetent government at Queen's Park and a do-nothing government in Ottawa. What do they expect Ontarians to do?

Ontario has historically been a leading spark plug for the Canadian economic engine and it is being allowed to wither away irresponsibly. While the government may be prepared to write off Ontario politically, when will it be responsible to the nation's economic best interest and seriously attempt to stimulate the Ontario economic sector?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, we are trying desperately to offset the disruptive, destructive policies of the Ontario government. It goes beyond this NDP government because its spending goes to the root of the debt problem. The foreign debt problem that I was talking about rose by 10.5 per cent per year between 1984 and 1992 while the federal government's expenditures rose at the rate of 4 per cent per year.

That is what has been driving up our international debt. That is what has been putting pressure on interest rates and that is what has been putting pressure on the dollar. The hon. member should know that. We have taken steps to stimulate the manufacturing and processing sector. We are reducing taxes, not raising taxes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will try to get a few more questions in.

SOMALIA

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The UN Security Council has approved a U.S. led enforcement action to Somalia to guarantee delivery of aid to hundreds of thousands of Somalians, victims of starvation and armed gangsters.

We welcome the fact that humanitarian needs are seen to merit such action. Canada has been asked to participate in this operation and Canadians want to know what is the government's recommendation to Parliament.

Will the government guarantee an emergency parliamentary debate to discuss the nature of Canada's involvement before any final decision is made by the government?

• (1200)

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, there is no question that the resolution that was passed yesterday in the Security Council is a serious one. We have been approached to participate and I will be making an announcement on that shortly.

It is, of course, an announcement that will reflect a decision by the government. I understand that House leaders will be talking about a potential time for a discussion in Parliament as to the implications of that decision. The decision will be announced very shortly.

ABORIGINAL HOUSING

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, last year the Auditor General reported that much of Canada's aboriginal housing is overcrowded and unsuitable. We know these conditions lead to serious health and social problems, diseases, domestic violence, sexual abuse, alcoholism and suicide problems, which the government is spending hundreds of millions of dollars to address.

My question for the Minister of Finance is this: Why did he not in his financial statement invest in upgrading aboriginal housing when he knows that housing construction is the most labour-intensive investment of public money that can be made? It would create jobs in aboriginal communities where unemployment is extremely high. Further, the availability of decent housing would reduce the social problems that cause the tremendous demand on our welfare and health budgets, and in fact contribute to reducing the deficit.

Why, instead, did the minister cut another $136 million from the program of Indian affairs?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, housing is very important to our aboriginal people in this country. For that reason we have had a 34.2 per cent increase in the funding of moneys to be spent for aboriginal housing in this country. We are continuing to increase the number of houses that are being built and we will work with our aboriginal communities to ensure that this is done.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would have liked to have had more questions today. There are two single questions that I would have liked the House to hear. Unfortunately we do not have any more time. I realize that there are two members who had asked but with all the disorder we have had today we just do not have the time.

On a point of order, the hon. government House leader.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, during the course of Question Period there was a question directed to the Minister of Finance by the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. While the Minister of Finance was answering, the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond shouted out loud enough for everyone here to hear that the minister must be on dope.

I think that is uncalled for, unparliamentary, and not in keeping with the traditions of this House. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw that remark.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, you will know and the Chair will know that the words which I used are not unparliamentary. They are not contained in any of the lists of words which are used. However, in view of the respect that I have for the Chair, if the Chair deems it to be appropriate I will gladly withdraw.

While I am on my feet, Madam Speaker, I would hope that the Minister of Finance would avail himself of this opportunity because on two repeated occasions he imputed that members on this side were abusing and facilitating the abuse of the unemployment insurance.

I will withdraw my remarks and at the same time I hope the Minister of Finance will do the same.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I did not accuse the hon. members opposite of abusing the unemployment insurance program. I said that they were not only condoning but they were indeed promoting others to do that.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, what the minister said during Question Period may not have imputed motives, but what he just said now does impute motives to the opposition in this House. We are not condoning, we are not promoting the abuse. What we are condemning is the government's heartlessness.

I would suggest that unless the minister withdraws that remark that we do check to make sure he has not abused the privileges of members of this House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If we go back, the hon. government House leader reminded the House of something that was said during Question Period which the Chair did not hear. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond answered that even though the word was not in the book as being unparliamentary, I think that with his experience in the House he will know that when it causes disorder, the Chair is more than likely to qualify the word as unparliamentary. I appreciate the fact that the hon. member did withdraw.

Taking the suggestion of the hon. member for Churchill, should we, after rereading the "blues" see that there is anything wrong with the minister's statement, we will bring it back to the House. Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, Beauchesne makes very clear in his discussion of Question Period that questions are supposed to be posed which deal with the responsibilities of the government of the country.

There has come to be a habit on the part of the government of the country and the loyal opposition of recreating debates and arguments from Queen's Park in Toronto.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Langdon: I wonder, Madam Speaker, if you would rule that if there are questions that this government wishes to raise, we here would be quite pleased to answer them and should be given a chance to do so, especially given the fact that the unemployment figures that came out today, while they showed a 5.5 per cent increase across the country, showed a significant decrease in the province of Ontario.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is making a debate out of what is supposed to be a point of order. I do not think that we will get into a debate of that nature at this time.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I would like to say, on behalf of the government, we understand our hon. friend's embarrassment at what is going on at Queen's Park and we would in no way want to enlarge upon what is happening to him and his party.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for York West. Is it on the same subject?

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Yes, Madam Speaker, it is on the same point of order.

I think the member from Windsor undermines my privileges in this House as a member of Parliament from Toronto. My constituents cannot get any leadership from Queen's Park or from Ottawa. I believe I have a right to represent their aspirations in this House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair has already ruled on that situation and we will go on with the daily routine of business.

BILL C-91

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another act in consequence thereof, and to provide for other related matters, with an amendment.

I have had the privilege of serving on many committees over my four years in Parliament and I would like to pay particular thanks for the support I received from the Legislative Council Office, the research branch of the Library of Parliament and the clerk's office. This was a very difficult bill and a very difficult process in committee. I can assure you, Madam Speaker, that they were all very supportive.

I would like to comment that as a member of Parliament I always thought legislative committees were the places where we as members could do our most important function on behalf of our constituents. It was a good opportunity to review the legislation and to address the many concerns that can be raised by witnesses and by our own individual constituents.

I believe, as chairman of the committee, that we wasted at least five days of activity that were less than productive. There were more witnesses that wanted to speak and I believe there were many people that we could have—

• (1210)

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, the member knows well that in introducing this report, the rules do not provide an opportunity for other members of the House to make any comments on the report whatever.

When he begins verging into comments for which there are in fact very substantive answers which engender debate, it seems to me he is going beyond the rules of the House and that either you rule him out of order immediately before he proceeds any further along that line or you indicate that we will have an opportunity to answer the comments that he makes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Victoria for his remarks. I was listening very carefully to the hon. member for Ontario. At first I thought he was giving a very short report, which is done, but I was just about to do exactly what the hon. member wishes me to do, which is to tell the hon. member for Ontario that he was really out of order at that time.

I think we will go on and the report will be tabled.

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, I only had one more sentence.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will go on without that sentence.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table the eighth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations.

In this report the joint committee draws the attention of the Houses to regulations which the committee believes to be ultra vires of the act, that is regulations made without jurisdiction. The alleged defects were caused, it appears, by ambiguity in the English version of section 23(d) of the Territorial Lands Act. The ambiguity does not exist in the French version.

The report recommends that the government introduce a legislative amendment to clarify the scope of the power delegated by section 23(d) and it includes a request for the tabling of a comprehensive report by the government. Until that occurs the government should be cautious in using or relying on these particular regulations.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–381, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act (post office closures in rural areas).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, several rural post offices in my riding have been closed by Canada Post as part of its rural conversion program. With this policy, Canada Post has weakened its commitment to mail delivery in the rural and isolated regions of Canada. I want to change that.

The purpose of my bill is to modify the mandate of Canada Post Corporation in two ways. First, this bill would broaden how Canada Post must deliver its services. People in all regions of Canada must receive similar service, but instead of just considering the comparable size of communities, Canada Post would now have to consider regional characteristics. A town's proximity to other communities and services and its regional economic conditions are important defining factors which Canada Post has so far refused to acknowledge.

Second, my bill would include within Canada Post Corporation's mandate the goal of maintaining an existing post office in communities where it is one of the few remaining federal symbols. The traditional post office is for many communities their last link to a distinct federal government and one which they want to keep. I am proud to present this bill before the House today and call upon members from all sides to support it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso) moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PRIVATE BILL

UNITED GRAIN GROWERS LIMITED

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I would seek leave to move a motion that this House receive a late petition for a private bill. The motion is as follows:

> That, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Orders 132 and 140, the petition for a private bill from United Grain Growers Limited presented on Tuesday, December 1, 1992 and reported on by the clerk of petitions on Wednesday, December 2, 1992 be deemed to have been filed within the required time limit and received by this House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chamber has heard the motion. Does the House wish to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, this petition is signed by a number of constituents in my riding who believe that managing our activities within a global environment is a shared responsibility with no geographical, cultural or political boundaries. They also believe our healthy future is the responsibility of all Canadians and their government in a growing concern for the environment to unify this country.

Therefore, they are calling on Parliament to urge the government to prepare a comprehensive paper which provides a contextual and tentative framework embracing the relationship among the environment, the economy and the Constitution so that Canadians can discuss in a unified way their importance to our future health and prosperity.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have three petitions to present today. The first is from a number of my constituents who note that the United States has unfairly imposed a duty on our softwood lumber exports to that country and has engaged in other trade practices which amount to harassment of Canadian producers.

They also note the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States has resulted in lost jobs and devastation of the Canadian economy without providing the promised benefits. They therefore call on Parliament to take whatever action is necessary to defend the interests of the Canadian softwood lumber industry against the unfair duties and also to request that Parliament act immediately to affect the cancellation of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, my second petition relates to the Canadian telecommunication network. The petitioners note it is one of the country's great accomplishments and it is vital to Canadian unity and economic development.

They also note that 98 per cent of Canadian households have telephones. They are concerned that deregulation could result in the erosion of services and affordability that has happened in the United States. They therefore call on Parliament to overturn the decision of the CRTC in allowing long distance telephone competition and request that the Government of Canada make a firm commitment to exclude Canada's telecommunication system from the North American free trade agreement.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would like to table a petition from Val-d'Or. Your petitioners humbly state that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and unacceptable because they encourage further violence. They say that freedom of the press should be restricted when reporting acts of violence. Repeated reporting of acts of violence on all television channels and on radio may encourage similar acts of violence.

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass legislation dealing with the above, to wipe out violence in our society, protect our children and guarantee everyone in this country a better quality of life.

SOMALIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, this petition is certified correct as to form and content.

• (1220)

[English]

The residents who signed this petition are Canadians of Somalian descent who are now permanent residents of Canada and Canadian citizens. They are appealing to Parliament to urge the government to speed up the processing of family reunification by posting additional immigration officers in Ethiopia and Kenya with instructions to carry out requisite checks but waive waiting periods because of the unusual circumstances involving hardship and suffering.

The family class and dependent relative members in Somalia and adjacent countries, Somalia being in the grip of civil disturbance and acute famine, are leaving relatives in limbo in Ethiopia and Kenya and enduring wretched conditions while sponsorship takes two or three years which adversely affects their stability.

BILL C-268

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from a number of residents of Canada who wish to designate a day of recognition of Canada's aboriginal inhabitants to honour native cultures. June 21 is the most appropriate day to recognize our First Nations. Therefore, they call upon Parliament to enact Bill C-268, an act respecting a national solidarity day for the first nations of Canada.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition to the House today with close to 9,000 signatures from Alberta and British Columbia. The petition is signed in honour of the memory of Ryan Garrioch and petitions the House to make further changes to the Young Offenders Act that need to be made in light of recent history.

CANADA RACE RELATIONS FOUNDATION

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition from residents of Kamloops, Walhachin and Montrose, British Columbia.

The petitioners want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Canada Race Relations Foundation was announced as part of the Japanese Canadian redress settlement. The Race Relations Foundation was to be funded by an endowment of $24 million, $12 million coming from the Japanese community.

The petitioners are calling up on Parliament to urge the government to consider the advisability of establishing the Canada Race Relations Foundation this fiscal year.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to table in the House today, under Standing Order 36, a petition signed primarily by the residents of Valemount, B.C. in my riding who are concerned about the whole question of water exports to the United States.

They have reason to be concerned because a water diversion project just south of that community is currently under consideration. These petitioners encourage and hope that the Canadian government will ensure that there will not be any large scale diversion of water to the United States.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my privilege and honour to present a large number of petitions calling upon Parliament to encourage the Governor General of Canada to recognize the bravery of the draegermen who sought to recover the bodies of the 26 miners who were trapped in the tragic explosion of May 9 in the Westray in Nova Scotia.

Shortly after that explosion, I wrote to the Governor General asking him to confer these medals of bravery. My request was supported by my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, in whose constituency many of these draegermen reside.

Since that time under the leadership of Shirley Day Comish, the wife of one of the draegermen, and with the assistance of the Tim Horton stores across the province of Nova Scotia, a large number of petitions were collected calling upon the Governor General to confer these medals of bravery as quickly as possible.

I am pleased to present these petitions to the House of Commons today.

BILL C-268

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I have a petition which I am very happy to present to the House of Commons.

A number of residents of Canada have signed this petition to draw the attention of the House to the fact that they wish to designate a day of recognition of Canada's original inhabitants to honour native cultures.

Therefore, they call upon Parliament to enact Bill C-268, an act respecting a national solidarity day for the first nations of Canada.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of a number of Canadians mostly from Manitoba.

These Canadians wish to designate a day of recognition for Canada's original inhabitants to honour our native cultures and suggest that June 21 is an appropriate day to recognize our first nations.

They call upon Parliament to enact Bill C-268, an act respecting a national solidarity day for the first nations of Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I ask, Madam Speaker, that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, on a point of order with regard to an exchange in Question Period which I would like to raise with the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader.

It concerns a situation by the United Nations Security Council to send a U.S. led military force to Somalia and the request which was made by my colleague to the minister to seek an emergency debate.

I think some letters have been exchanged by the critic from the Official Opposition and the minister responsible. The minister did say in the House that House leaders would be having subsequent discussions. In view of the parliamentary calendar which is to come to a close on December 11, I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary could take under advisement the suggestion that perhaps Monday evening of next week there might be a disposition for us to have a debate on this important subject matter which I think might enjoy the support of all members of the House.

I do not wish to prejudge the House in any way but I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary could take that under advisement and perhaps either later this day or early on Monday indicate whether we could have a consensus on proceeding to an emergency debate on that important matter.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I think what my hon. friend is asking for is a two-track process and I would be quite prepared to agree with the first track that he proposed and that is that discussions take place among the House leaders. That is the appropriate way to do it rather than making commitments here on the floor of the House.

Mr. Murphy: On the same point, Madam Speaker. If this action is undertaken by Canada it would be a significant departure from some of our previous activities on the world scene.

Many Canadians would be concerned to have a full debate, to understand exactly what the parameters of the commitment are. I would encourage the House leaders to meet either today or early Monday to ensure there is some vehicle for a public discussion on this issue.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATIONS) ACT, 1992

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I thought we might get unanimous consent to give me more time if necessary. I am sure the House would want to hear my remarks.

I want to thank members for their consent so that I may complete my remarks.

• (1230)

Earlier today, I raised questions with regard to the procedural acceptability of Bill C-93. I hope that before the day is out we will have a decision from the Chair in terms of the points I raised.

In my remarks I made reference to the fact that the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, now in place, with great fanfare some time ago was announced with a budget of $1.05 billion over five years. Individuals on the government side rejoiced that this was going to be the panacea for creating economic development in Atlantic Canada. In point of fact they have pointed to it as the lead tool for economic development.

The budgetary provisions of that particular day require careful examination. The money has roughly been $200 million a year for four provinces equalling approximately $86.96 per resident of Atlantic Canada. At the same time, the Government of Canada was providing $1.2 billion for a space station, not to suggest that we are against that.

When one looks at the need for economic development in Atlantic Canada, however, that certainly has not been a sizeable expenditure for the needs of those particular residents.

I attempted in my remarks to lay out the history of the Cape Breton Development Corporation with its two divisions, its mandate, its own president, its own board of directors. I talked about Bill C-103, namely the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, part I and part II which was Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. For all practical purposes it was to usurp the role of the industrial development division of Devco and thereby be rolled into a separate and distinct Crown corporation.

My colleague in the upper house raised a number of questions with regard to the efficacy of that particular Crown corporation. I would like to repeat what my colleague, the Hon. Allan J. MacEachen, at that time leader of the opposition in the other House said on June 14, 1988. He was questioning the government House leader, Senator Murray. He said:

> Would I be correct in concluding that, while ACOA, as a whole, will not be involved in infrastructure, for example, or not involved directly in assistance to farmers, the new Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will still be enabled to fund projects in the field of infrastructure, in the > field of agriculture, as has been presently done by the industrial development division of the Cape Breton Development Corporation?

The response of the government House leader in the Senate was:

> Yes, honourable senators, those are valid examples of activities in which Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation—

—as my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso will want to note—

> —as a continuation of IDD, could continue to be engaged and in which ACOA, generally speaking, is not engaged. Again, in answer to questions from our colleague, Senator Graham, I did discuss the quite worth-while activities of ACOA in encouraging economic activities and enterprises that are related to agriculture and fisheries. However, that is not what the honourable senator is asking. The short answer to his question is yes.

Senator Murray on June 14, 1988, page 3655, goes on to say:

> Honourable senators, as I have stated previously, the generality of the case with regard to Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation is that ECBC will not be prevented from doing anything that the industrial development division of Devco is now doing.

Bill C-103 created ACOA and it created Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation in the words of the government House leader in the other place to do the duties of the industrial development division of what we now know as Devco.

That was back then. That is what they said in 1988. Senator Murray is on the record as saying the following. This is from page 3656 of the Senate debates of June 14, 1988:

> Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will be a Crown corporation. It has a mandate almost identical to that of the industrial development division of Devco. As a Crown corporation, it will have a board of directors which—and I make this as a general statement—will have the same mandate and powers in respect to ECBC as the board of directors of Devco has in respect of the IDD.

I put all of this on the record to show and to underline for those in the Chamber and those who may be viewing our proceedings the ultimate in hypocrisy of a government. It gutted the industrial development division of Devco and in its place it put the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, which was to assume its responsibilities. However, it has now come to Parliament to end Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

In the debate which went on in this House those in opposition were criticized because we as a national party opposed the ACOA bill. The reason that we opposed the ACOA bill is that the Government of Canada was attempting to utilize it as a panacea for economic development in Atlantic Canada, to which we would not subscribe. In fact, we were the only national party to oppose that piece of legislation.

The Tory members opposite and members of the New Democratic Party supported ACOA. They supported the gutting of the industrial development division.

Today, we now see the results of that particular measure. We have a new bill before us which is gutting, terminating forever and ever, Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation which was to be the flagship of economic development on the island of Cape Breton.

We not only voted against Bill C-103 in this House, we had the other place forward amendments back to this Chamber. They happened to be amendments from our colleagues, our Liberal senators, which we supported, and which of course the New Democratic Party and the Tories opposite did not support.

So I want the record to be very clear that when it comes to economic development on the island of Cape Breton, we only have to look to the Tories and the NDP and examine the rhetoric. Examine the statements made in the press, but also look at the results and look at what is actually done.

This is a good example of a piece of legislation enacted some years ago which now in another form has come back before this institution and which we are going to do away with. That was the fear we anticipated back in 1987 and again in 1988 right until 1992.

Our worst dreams and our worst fears have now occurred. I am very sad that this has occurred. The reason I am sad is that people in my district in Nova Scotia believed Senator Murray when he said in the upper chamber, and these are his words: "These, honourable senators, are nation-building measures. Bill C-103, an act to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada, to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation." It is a nation-building measure. That is what he said on May 18, 1988 on page 3431 of Senate Hansard.

If that is not hypocrisy, I do not know what is. There is a senior minister of the Crown saying in Hansard that the need for Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation is because it is a nation-building measure. What do we have today? We have the likes of Bill C-93 which will gut, it will terminate Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation forever and a day thereby removing a nation-building measure.

I find it totally unacceptable that we in this Parliament would allow this government to get away with such mischief. It is mischief which has played on the hearts and the hopes of thousands of people residing in my district.

The purpose of my intervention today is to retrace the history and the facts relating to Cape Breton Development Corporation, the history of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation as it relates to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and the facts. The facts are that we have been told one thing and the government is doing the opposite.

When I think of the concern and the anguish that the people of my island have to go through, I become angry. I am angry at the way in which they have been treated, angry at the way in which governments have played with their fears, their emotions and their hopes.

As we heard in Question Period and as I reported to the Minister of Finance, the unemployment rate in Cape Breton today is 20.9 per cent. On the very day that unemployment at 20.9 per cent is recorded, the Government of Canada spells the end of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. That is something which it said several years ago was a nation-building measure. Is that fair? Is that just? Is that appropriate?

My colleagues, the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys and the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, will talk about what has happened in their districts.

Over the last number of years we have seen many destructive economic things happen on the island of Cape Breton. The radar base closed. A substantial amount of money was removed from the local economy. Positions at the coast guard college, the numbers are down. VIA Rail passenger service has been taken away. Air Canada jet service has been taken away. Just the other day, two fish plants in my district had to close as did many more on the island, to which I am sure my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso will allude.

Cape Breton Development Corporation has seen its person-years reduced substantially. The Sydney Steel Corporation has also been downsized from 1,500 to approximately 600. It goes on and on and on.

In 1991 Nova Scotia had 2,184 consumer bankruptcies. There were also 662 business bankruptcies. In October 1992 the record will show that consumer bankruptcies equalled 1,617 and business bankruptcies so far this year are up at 712. Bankruptcies since 1991 have reached a total of 5,175. Yet the Government of Canada has chosen a pretty tough course by closing down Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. Again I ask the Chamber and I ask the Chair: Is that fair, is that just?

The answer is that it is not fair. It is not generous. It is not becoming of any national government to do that in light of the economic carnage it has inflicted upon the people. No government should wilfully, as this government has done repeatedly over the last number of years, single out such a poor and devastated area of Canada as Cape Breton.

There are people there too. I think of the youth. I think of my son and my two daughters who live there as I do. They want to have an opportunity to grow, get an education, have a job and raise a family. What we find is a national government, aided and abetted by the way by a provincial government, whose incompetence is only exceeded by its arrogance and dislike for the people on that island.

Today in my district two coal mines are down. One is Lingan in New Waterford and the other is the Phalen colliery in New Waterford as well. A lot of miners, a lot of families, are directly affected and impacted. The problem is that water has come into the Lingan mine and they have had to evacuate that mine which was due to close in March. Approximately 350,000 to 400,000 tonnes of coal will not be mined as a result of that flooding. A lot of individuals have been displaced there and displaced at the Phalen colliery.

I do not know the cause of that flooding, but I have serious concerns as to why it has occurred. I have spoken with union representatives and I have spoken with management representatives. They have suggested that the water has come from another abandoned coal mine, No. 26-1B. There are two experts on site now examining the cause. It certainly has to reflect management practices at that corporation and the directives given to it by the minister responsible.

I hope the Phalen mine will be up and running as soon as humanly possible, and I am sure the minister opposite would concur, but it had better be safe. Every expert, Labour Canada, CANMET and energy mines and resources, better spell out very clearly that it is safe. I will join with union representatives and their safety co-ordinator in saying that the men should not return to work if it is not proven conclusively that the mine is safe for miners to mine coal.

As we stand here today and debate the death of Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, these people are worried about Christmas. They are worried about the new year. They are worried about getting back to work. I just want to put on record that I defy anyone in this Chamber to suggest or imply that those individuals associated and working at the Cape Breton Development Corporation are not industrious, hard working, determined men who wish to get back to work. There will be some who will try to paint the picture that all they want is unemployment insurance, a few benefits and that will be sufficient. That is not the case. Let no man or woman in this Chamber or outside this Chamber try to inflict that kind of gossip, that kind of big lie about the Cape Breton labour force. It is a very good labour force as studies have shown and as studies will indicate again and again.

These miners are worried about their lives and their families. They really are a special breed of people. They get up every morning, put their clothes on, go to the mine, get their lights and get on a little train. They are cramped in. They go down in the mine way underneath the ocean. They work, they get their pay and they come up. It is pretty scary for those individuals who do it, scary for their families, and particularly very scary for the children of miners.

I have made demands of the minister responsible in terms of unemployment insurance. I want to say on the record that I think the minister has attempted in good faith to be of some assistance. I want to thank him for that.

I have also urged the minister in a letter I have written to him that we have to do something for those miners who have been displaced at the Lingan colliery. We cannot just throw them adrift as if they are useless human beings. We need a package for those individuals. Some of them are not so old; some of them are a bit older. We need interim measures to provide assistance to those miners who are not without work and who have no idea as to when they will be able to return to full-time employment in the mines.

There is something else that the minister has not been overly positive about or co-operative about. That is the opening of the Donkin coal mine. At the present time at Devco in the coal division we have the Princess mine and the Phalen mine. Lingan looks like it is going to be closed. I hope not but it looks very much that way.

We have both domestic and international markets that must be supplied with coal. It only seems sensible, wise and prudent the Government of Canada, after spending in excess of $55 million on the Donkin mine project, will get it up, get it ready and proceed with economic development there too.

As much as I would like to vent my anger at the minister responsible for the Cape Breton Development Corporation, I have to say in all candour that the minister does not enjoy the support of the Government of Nova Scotia. The Government of Canada could proceed unilaterally but that is not the best way to proceed. It has to proceed with the co-operation and the financial support of the Government of Nova Scotia. That crowd in Nova Scotia led by the premier, Mr. Donald Cameron, is an absolute, unbelievable bunch of incompetent individuals.

They care that much for the coal industry, that much for the people of Cape Breton and that much for the miners who work in the coal industry, as evidenced by statements made by the premier, by his refusal to retract those statements, by his attitude and by his wanton disregard for the people of Cape Breton.

The Cape Breton Development Corporation was brought in under a federal statute by the Hon. Allan J. MacEachen who sits in the other House. The minister will know that it was supported at that time by the premier of the day, Robert Lorne Stanfield. It was thereafter supported throughout the years by the successor to Mr. Stanfield, Mr. Regan, who served as premier for eight years and thereafter supported by Senator John Buchanan.

But this premier has not shown the same compassion, the understanding or the willingness to support the Cape Breton Development Corporation in its operations. In point of fact he has done everything to discredit that Crown corporation and thereby discredit the minister who is opposite today. It is a shameful display by a first minister of a province to cut adrift an entire island of people who number about 170,000, as my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso will later bring to the attention of this House.

The Government of Canada needs the support of the Government of Nova Scotia to get the Donkin mine up and running. It needs the support of the Government of Nova Scotia with regard to coal contracts from the Nova Scotia Power Corporation. Yes, Devco sells coal, as the minister will attest. It sells coal to the Nova Scotia Power Corporation. However, it has been the miner who has been sacrificing his life, his family's life, in order to maintain power costs in the province of Nova Scotia. It is not Donald Cameron and those clowns in Halifax. It is high time the Government of Canada takes the gloves off and stops allowing this provincial premier to get away with wanton disregard and disrespect for a people who happen to reside on a disadvantaged island.

If I were the minister responsible I know what I would do. I would disclose the kinds of shenanigans, the way in which that premier has treated the Cape Breton Development Corporation. This premier has not only attacked the people of Cape Breton Island, the miners of Cape Breton Island, but he has also attacked the management.

Maybe there is ample room there for that, but to do so in the way he has done is something we shall never forget. I urge the minister responsible for the Cape Breton Development Corporation to continue to work to do the best he possibly can, show leadership and disclose what these clowns are all about in Halifax. The minister cannot say these things, but I can say them because I know the difficulties the minister is confronted with when trying to deal with that crowd in Halifax.

I urge him to get on with the Donkin mine. It makes sense. It will create jobs. It will put miners and their families in a much better framework. Where better is it needed than on the island of Cape Breton?

In the two minutes I have remaining, let me say this about Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. With all the economic carnage on the island, how in the name of God could a federal government today, at 20.9 per cent UIC, terminate a flagship for economic development? I will tell the House how: It is done by the Government of Canada at the support and behest of the provincial government of one Donald Cameron, the good friend of the right hon. prime minister.

• (1300)

I would hope that members in this Chamber would understand exactly what is taking place. It is that those of us who come from small disadvantaged regions of the country are suffering greatly. We seek hope, economic justice and fairness. We do not want any special deals, but we want to have our special relationship that we have always enjoyed with the Government of Canada renewed and invigorated in order to provide hope to those individuals who reside on that island.

The conduct of this government by introducing such dastardly legislation will affect greatly, not only today but for years and years and years ahead, the economy of Cape Breton.

I say to all that I will continue to fight. I will take my place in this Chamber and, no matter how unpopular it may be in some circles, I will stand with the miner, I will stand with the fisherman, the persons who work in our forests, the people who work in our small businesses, the young people and the women, our aboriginals, all of those individuals in Cape Breton. I will stand with them and for them to bring economic justice and fairness to the people of Cape Breton.

I urge all members, regardless of political faith, to support the Official Opposition in condemning the provisions of Bill C-93 and in particular the amendments to gut Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, today I would like to deal with one aspect of this legislation before the House and first of all indicate how opposed our party is to the legislation.

I listened to the original remarks this morning. It was interesting. The speaker who introduced the bill this morning for the Conservative government mentioned that the RCMP Public Complaints Commission was going to be rolled into the RCMP External Review Committee. The remark that justified this was that there would be a saving of roughly $1 million. It would eliminate duplication and it would save seven person-years.

I would like to point out that the RCMP Public Complaints Commission is virtually the only agency in Canada where Canadians who have a complaint against the state police force, the RCMP, can go and be assured of a fair investigation of their complaints.

To remove this agency or to in any way weaken it by depriving it of human resources and financial resources is certainly going to ensure that the public does not have an effective agency with which to raise its complaints and ensure that its complaints will be dealt with.

I would point out that the RCMP is probably one of the finest police forces in the world, but it does have situations occur in which there are breaches of the law, where officers act inappropriately, where some officers behave in a manner whereby they should no longer remain as members of the RCMP. It is absolutely clear that in a very large organization for one reason or another you are going to have people who do not fit in.

In an organization that can use the kind of force that the RCMP can against the public, be it direct application of force, be it by intimidation, whatever, there have been some terrible examples of injustice. It is the RCMP Public Complaints Commission that has really given an opportunity for the members of the public to be assured that their complaints can be dealt with effectively and efficiently.

The attempt to roll the RCMP Public Complaints Commission into an External Review Committee that handles grievances of RCMP officers and other matters that arise out of personnel cases is a conflict of interest. It not only destroys the effectiveness of the complaints commission, but it probably creates a situation, with the elimination of financial and human resources, that will render it ineffective.

I would like to use an example of a single case. There are all kinds of cases across Canada that can be used to justify a call by the opposition and by other people in Canada not to amalgamate this, not to cut its resources, but in fact to strengthen the resources.

The RCMP Public Complaints Commission came into being on September 30, 1988. On that night in Gibsons, British Columbia, a young man happened to be intoxicated and sleeping in a bar. The RCMP were called to take the individual out and they took that individual to jail. It was interesting that they chose to jail the individual since there was no fight or difficulty involved. The person was just asleep. They threw the individual into jail and there were a number of other people in the cell.

An altercation started in the cell and at some point during the evening the corporal of the detachment removed that prisoner from the cell. There was an altercation, the individual was injured, and it turned out quite badly.

The person was returned to the cell. The other people incarcerated with this individual throughout the night called for medical attention for the individual. The call for medical attention was disregarded. The next morning all the other individuals in the cell were sent out, no charges were laid and they disappeared.

The individual who remained, the one who had been taken into custody that night and held in the cell, was held even longer because there was an outstanding parking ticket. Later the brother appeared, paid the ticket in Sechelt and the person was unceremoniously dumped out into the street.

The person could not navigate as he had been so badly injured. A taxi driver came by, picked the person up and took him about 30 kilometres away to a hospital. The individual got to the hospital and after an examination it was determined his face had been stove in, his ribs broken and his spleen ruptured. They helicoptered him to North Vancouver where he underwent treatment and recovered.

A complaint was lodged almost immediately with the local detachment of the RCMP. It was not handled in a way that satisfied the parents of the individual. The parents tried a number of routes to get some satisfaction. It took close to a year after going through the ombudsman in British Columbia, the RCMP and a whole host of other agencies.

Eventually they wound up at the RCMP Public Complaints Commission. The RCMP Public Complaints Commission expended a fair amount of resources to find witnesses that had moved to Ontario that were in the cells that night, got the stories from those individuals and convened a public hearing. The public hearing found that there were very serious concerns about the handling of the medical problem that evening, very serious concerns about what appeared to be an assault on the individual. As a result of the questions they came to a point where a report was written that was certainly not complimentary to the RCMP's handling of this problem.

This matter then proceeded from that hearing into a civil action. The civil action dragged on for another year and eventually the RCMP settled out of court for, I understand, $20,000 and the legal costs and the issue was over.

If it had depended upon the regular mechanisms to handle this case, there would have been no satisfaction, no hearing of the main issues in this point, no hearing of the testimony of other witnesses to it. In fact, this would have simply been swept under the carpet and another case disposed of. The RCMP Public Complaints Commission prosecuted this through to the very end and laid the entire story open to the public. In the civil action the complainant settled out of court for $20,000.

That has not been the only case. The officer involved was involved in a settlement by the RCMP with another complainant who wound up receiving a $7,000 settlement out of court. There were charges laid against this officer previously in Ladysmith in the company of other officers in assaulting an individual.

Once complaining, the individual found no satisfaction and in fact found himself in greater difficulty with the problem.

What I would suggest is that if it had not been for this effective agency, the RCMP Public Complaints Commission, that the serious case would have been simply swept under the carpet. Gibsons is an area where there have been a number of assaults by the RCMP. A number of complaints by individuals in the Gibsons area and the Sechelt peninsula have been reported to the RCMP Public Complaints Commission.

There is an incredible disincentive to do this. Let me give an example where an individual happens to be accused of impaired driving. The individual is stopped by the RCMP, an altercation results, the individual is injured in the altercation, the RCMP claims that it is justified use of force. He is taken down and charged with impaired driving but not allowed to use the breathalyser. That is the end of the evening, simply the charge results and things carry on. The minute the individual lays a complaint with the RCMP Public Complaints Commission, further charges result. This individual is then charged with attempting to assault a police officer and other charges. This is the history in many cases.

I would use one more example. An individual who is a passenger in a vehicle with two other people winds up in the ferry lot of the B.C. ferries in Langdale. The police arrive on the scene. The individual at this point has not done anything. They ask him to come out of the car and he says: "I have done nothing. Why should I do that". They simply reach in, throw him out of the car and break his shoulder on the ground after jumping on him.

Again this individual makes a complaint to the RCMP Public Complaints Commission. At least they know they are going to get some satisfaction in an investigation of the events. This goes on and on. I do not know exactly how many cases I have in my files of these events but it is absolutely critical that this agency remains in place. If this is happening in one area, where there has obviously been a problem, then it is imperative to keep the RCMP Public Complaints Commission working and not roll it into the External Review Committee.

Hopefully, when the opportunity presents it, we will be making an amendment that will see a separation between the review committee and the Public Complaints Commission maintained and that in fact it will be strengthened. In the previous year's annual report, the RCMP Public Complaints Commission said that its hands had been tied by the legislation. It made 30 recommendations for changes to the legislation so that it could do an effective job.

The commissioner of the RCMP does not have to give the follow-up activity taken by the RCMP against an officer who is found to have used an inappropriate procedure. That is one of the examples where if something does occur in the way of discipline for an event, the officer and the incident is found to have erred. He made a mistake. If there is some kind of action taken on behalf of the RCMP, it should go in to the public domain. If it was anybody else who had made those kinds of errors, certainly that would have been a cause celebre covered by the media and others.

I want to stop just for a moment about the media handling the case. It is interesting that the RCMP Public Complaints Commission indicates the media is an effective way for people to get their case considered. That is not true. I had on a number of occasions talked to people in the media about the coverage of some of these things that were well within the public domain. I had some of the issues that I had picked up as files in this matter referred to me by the media. When I asked why they did not cover them, they said: "It is not in our best interest to cover them. For example, if we run afoul of the local RCMP, we may have problems driving our motor vehicle from A to B. We may find that when we phone the RCMP for information, we are cut off. We cannot report the news because the RCMP will not co-operate".

This is not my story. This is the story from a number of media agencies in the area I represent when I said, here is the thing that is happening in your community. It is a serious matter. Why have you not covered it? They said: "It is risky to do that". It is personally risky. It is risky from the business point of view when running a newspaper when you need access to the RCMP for the news. If you report things that the RCMP do not view with favour, then you are going to find that you are completely cut off and you do run some personal risks. These are stories conveyed to me by journalists, not just from one agency but from several agencies on the matter.

The critical point here is that we have an agency that has been in business since September 30, 1988. It has shown itself to be a determined agency in the investigation of complaints against the RCMP and that in prosecuting those have on behalf of citizens who have complaints, prosecuted their responsibilities very well.

At times the RCMP officer and the complainant get together and the RCMP officer says: "I was dead right. This was within the law. You made an error and that is what happened". That is the end of it. The individual gets a clear explanation. The RCMP officers lays out his side of the story and is completely vindicated.

At other times, and I have seen this happen, the matter is investigated and an apology goes forward from the RCMP that states: "There may have been in the heat of the moment some things that do not follow policy, but the circumstances were so uncertain that this is what happened and we apologize for the inconvenience". The complainant accepts that apology and that is the end of it.

Other circumstances can be far more serious. Perhaps excessive use of force is implied and the individual has been badly beaten. There has been a great deal of damage and the matter goes to a hearing, or goes to court and matters take their course. Those are extremely rare.

The RCMP is a very fine police force. We see that on a daily basis. Rarely are there incidents that create havoc, that break the confidence of the public in the law enforcement agency. We must have an impartial body set apart with resources to investigate, and we must have the legal authority to investigate effectively, and prosecute to the point where some acceptable resolution occurs.

The administration of the RCMP and the office of the Solicitor General should be seriously looking at making sure that in a democracy the police are there to use force against citizens to enforce the law. It becomes a very grey area in some cases or there is actual clear misbehaviour on the part of an individual in using that force to carry out the law or the procedures. We need that agency to be there to carry on a separate investigation.

It would be my hope that it would not be necessary to get up and debate extensively in this House a motion that argues on behalf of the opposition that the RCMP Public Complaints Commission has to be maintained. It has to have additional resources, both human resources and financial resources. This House should not be looking at gutting that agency, but should be giving serious consideration to implementing the recommendations that are outlined in the last annual report to strengthen the hand of the agency.

At this time I would leave that particular area with the admonition that we will be looking seriously at moving an amendment. Hopefully, out of that amendment, we can see the government co-operate with the opposition members to separate these two agencies, maintain the separation, provide the human and financial resources for the complaints commission to continue to carry out its good work and finally, to implement the recommendation for changes to the legislation that would make the organization more effective.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for his comments. I was especially concerned about the comments he made with respect to the police complaint procedures of the RCMP.

• (1320)

I can recall back in 1983 when the government of British Columbia went through a similar kind of cost-cutting regime that this government is currently involved in, even to the extent of using the same kinds of cliches that are used now in the division between the public and private sector, the need to downsize the number of workers, to get rid of services in government and to leave job creation up to the private sector.

However, when the cost-cutting process was done within the government of British Columbia and the dust had settled, we found out that the vast majority of programs that had been cut were things that the Conservative government in British Columbia had an ideological aversion to. The things cut were programs like family support services or funding for community groups that they considered interest groups, or help for the poor, the homeless, abused women, and abused families and that kind of thing.

That Social Credit government lost all of its support as a government in British Columbia.

It also did away entirely with the human rights commission in British Columbia because it felt that the human rights commission was advancing the cause of human rights in the province of British Columbia contrary to what Social Crediters and Tories believe.

They saw those organizations as ideologically hostile and when the dust settled the operation costs of these bodies was next to nothing. The government saved almost nothing and even after the cost cuts the deficit sky-rocketed. They did not accomplish what they were purported to be accomplishing.

What startles me is the number of cases that the member has brought forward from a particular area of his riding. I recognize that he may have some concern about possible retaliation and certainly the press has indicated that there is concern.

He also indicated that the Police Complaints Commission appears to have no power at the present time and as a result very little does happen with officers who do operate outside the law and become a threat to the public. They also discredit, as the speaker mentioned, the 99.9 per cent of RCMP officers who operate within the law and do a good job and perform an excellent service to the public.

I wonder if steps have been taken as a result of the decisions by the police complaints procedure and the RCMP complaint commission to remove the officers that have been responsible or if the RCMP has taken any steps to remove those officers so that they no longer constitute a threat to the public and discredit the vast numbers of RCMP officers who work for the force and work for the public at the same time.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a final comment on that particular area. I have not received a single complaint from that area in a considerable period of time.

I know there was concern within the RCMP about certain kinds of activities that had gone on there. Those seem to have been addressed and I have been informed of some extremely positive changes that have happened in that area. That information has come from the mayors of the communities and from other people who have indicated that there have been some significant changes about which they are very pleased.

I would like to follow up a comment that was made by my colleague, even closer than colleague, from Comox—Alberni concerning the social cuts, if I might use just a second. Part III of this legislation winds up the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and it transfers the international academic relations program from external affairs to the Canada Council and renames this organization Canada Council for the Arts for Research in the Social Sciences and Humanities. This is going to make the organization completely ineffective at a time when things like social science research is absolutely critical.

We are seeing some tremendous changes in the structure and operation of the economy of Canada. The social science and research operation, by being gutted and rolled into another agency loses its priority and drops to the bottom. We wind up seeing things like the Deputy Prime Minister in the House today attacking the unemployed. Nothing could be more false, absolutely immoral than what was done in the House today and yesterday in attacking the unemployed and blaming them for the problem.

My colleague the Solicitor General says that is nonsense. There are members of the Conservative caucus who are talking actively today about how to get the Prime Minister to change this kind of attack on the unemployed in Canada.

An hon. member: It will end up in cabinet tomorrow.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): At any rate whether he is yelling and shouting about this, it is a case where this government is blaming the unemployed for the nature of the economy when the responsibility is clearly with the government. I would say that the yelling and the screaming from the Solicitor General points to guilt rather than any serious attempt to refute the charge.

Hopefully, in dealing with the international academic relations program and the Social Science Research Council of Canada, this too will be one of the things that is reconsidered. Those two agencies will remain separate, apart and able to function with the human and financial resources to do this. With that I will conclude my remarks.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, following up on the member's comments on part III of this particular bill which winds up the Social Science and Humanities Research Council, I note that in 1979, after extensive consultations and studies, these programs were moved out of the Canada Council and into the present Social Science and Humanity Research Council. Concern has been expressed both by Canadian and international academics that this funding will not be maintained through this aspect.

I note also that this particular thrust was done not after any consultation at all, but was announced unilaterally in the budget of 1992.

I wonder if the member would have any comment on the consultative process and whether, in fact, he has any comment with respect to the lack of consultation this time around and the full consultations of the last time.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, there is a volume of correspondence but I will not go through it. The International Council for Canadian Studies has written to the Prime Minister with reference to the transfers we are talking about, and it says: "Such a transfer will prove costly and ineffective. It is an instrument of Canadian foreign policy and enjoys the full co-operation of academics abroad". The question involves Canada's reputation.

There are numerous letters from the social science groups in Canada stating the same thing. The social science research groups are very critical of being rolled into this multi-tasked agency and deprived of resources will become completely ineffective. This is not our judgment, we are simply repeating the judgments of the many people who are going to be asked to judge the Conservative government in the next election when it comes.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, although a number of issues were addressed in the changes that are being brought about by the mergers of many of the programs that were addressed by my colleagues on all sides of the House, I would like to speak to one issue in very short measure and the second matter, with respect to the Canada Council and the Social Science and Humanities Research Council in a little bit more depth.

As I speak to Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House on February 25, I am quite sure members are aware that the purpose of this bill is to implement the government's decision to merge these Crown corporation and agencies.

• (1330)

The reason that the government did this, it said, was to be more efficient through these cost cutting measures. The question and the measure shall indicate that on the one hand one undertaking seems to have been well thought through, the second certainly merits some serious reconsideration.

With respect to the Copyright Board and the Trademark Opposition Board, which will be known as the intellectual property tribunal, I have not had too many complaints. I have had next to no concern expressed about this particular merger, which is quite fascinating seeing as how we are in the midst of doing a piece of copyright legislation at this moment and certainly having a swinging door as the different groups come through to indicate their interest in the whole area of intellectual property law and the copyright decision-making in the interests of one party or the other.

It would seem to me that the merger must be being fairly well received, and it will enlarge the intellectual property considerations with additional expertise, I would presume. In light of the fact that I have not heard very much about this whole process, I would presume it is a positive and orderly step to have taken.

There was one observation made in another matter that I was dealing with and the answer to that was why would you be concerned? Where to place your concern in any of the things going on around here is in the procedure for nomination through Order in Council appointment.

If the Order in Council appointments to the tribunal are enlightened, carefully thought out and indicate that the people who are being appointed are people who have competence in the field, then through that selection process you thereby assure that the tribunal will function well. We will leave that tribunal in the hands of good nominations and then careful thought on the part of the new members.

The second thing that we are looking at is the merger of the Canada Council with the Social Science and Humanities Research Council and the International Cultural Relations Bureau of External Affairs.

This three-way merger will have an unwieldy moniker, from what I can see. It is to be called the Canada Council of the Arts and for Research in the Social Sciences and Humanities. The new acronym will be far more suitable, as it is called CARSH and for the purposes of the rest of this discussion, I will refer to it as CARSH because I think that seems appropriate to the picture.

This is the second marriage for these two bodies. I think you were in this House, Mr. Speaker, as the first marriage took place followed by the unhappy divorce and separation proceedings, a long-term mediation, and I believe you even sat on the committee, and extensive studies and consultations took place at that time.

Parliament in its wisdom saw that this was not working and allowed on the grounds of incompatibility of objectives a separation and then a divorce of the Canada Council and the Social Science and Humanities Research Council.

They had two different missions; one in the arts and cultural matters, the second in more profound kinds of research into the social sciences and the humanities.

The Canada Council was really directing its energies to the building and ongoing growth and development of the cultural arts, while the science research council was doing some wonderful spade work in developing the interests of Canadians in these fields of action.

Over the last 14 years these two councils have matured, they have flourished, someone said to me that they have flowered—that is true—each in its own separate domain of expertise. Did you give me another word, Mr. Solicitor General? I am listening. Anything that is said in a positive vein is well accepted in the Canada of today. It gives hope and forward thought.

Each in its own separate domain has become really quite expert and each has served its own constituency with concern, with caring and active boards, with the participation of those boards and with competent and dedicated staffs.

Now the government in its wisdom has decided that the two should remarry, unlike the 1978 decision, without any studies, without any consultation, with no counselling and with no mediation.

The partnerships and the multi-disciplinary work that are the keystones of the efficient and collaborative co-existence of any groups, as members of this House will know, are absolutely fundamental to good business practice and good healthy inter-group relations. I sincerely hope that every effort will be made to make this work if this is the way the government intends to go. Perhaps in committee we might come up with an amendment that might take us in another direction. We will have to see what the witnesses have to say in this regard.

It is very important to reflect for a few minutes on why it was felt in the late 1970s that such a separation was in order and why an independent research council was needed. I am indebted to Chad Gaffield of The Ottawa Citizen who wrote on March 25 of this year much of the background of the next few remarks that I am going to make.

Mr. Gaffield said that when the Canada Council was first formed in the late 1950s research activity in Canada was quite limited. Many Canadians had to seek advanced training in the United States or Europe and especially England.

Through the 1960s and the 1970s Canada developed research in all fields, including the humanities and social sciences. New graduate programs and new research projects were established. The result was two-fold: fewer and fewer Canadians were forced to go elsewhere for training and more research became available about the Canadian experience.

Instead of foreign trained experts applying research findings from other countries to us, scholars could use Canadian research to address, through specially dedicated Canadian studies, the important questions of concern to Canadians and incidentally to many other parts of the world. It could also look at our own growth and development in a variety of social and humanities disciplines, and, at the same time, serve the international community?

Something an awful lot of us do not appreciate is the very interesting and intricate work that is done by the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. For those who have a direct interest, those of us who are here doing business in committee, are well aware of the role of the estimates. In part III of the expenditure plan there is a very well documented and thoroughly outlined program of analysis of each of the departments and all of the studies that have been undertaken by the council itself.

I thought I would give you some sense of the incredibly fine work that is done on joint ventures and individually by this particular body in the interests of Canada and in the interests of the world.

My colleague, Chaviva Hosek, and I were discussing the new historical atlas that is coming out. It is really quite exciting. It is a history of the geography of Canada and it is being done out of the grants department of the social humanities. It has set a standard that is so high and the quality is so fine that scholars from around the world are looking at this historical atlas and are planning to use it as a learning model for their own country and use the technology that we developed in order to put this very exciting historical atlas into effect.

This helps us to find out about ourselves. Because of the content and because of its quality and because of its analytical approach it is a model to the world. I think that is something to be very proud of.

The other areas in which I thought the work of the council was quite fascinating were the priority areas where it supports research in areas that encompass five themes, four infrastructure development programs and joint initiatives and it has partnerships in interdisciplinary work.

I went from the very beginning of this and read through it with a great deal of interest. I really would encourage people to call my office and get a copy of this because it is really quite exciting to see the dynamism of the work that is done by these councils in the interest of Canada and in the interest of the international world.

It has set up management of technological change. Under the Research Council, which matches private sector contributions, two research chairs were approved and six new chairs were established in 1991-92. It is stimulating research in the areas that are very important to this government's priorities and new prosperity agenda.

The fields are research into technology and international competitiveness, environmental technology in resource based industries, management of technological changes in financial services—that is important—joint scholarships with NSERC and SSHRC, master scholarships on science policy to help direct and oversee new fields of science, new areas of training and the development of chairs in the field of environmental studies, eco-research programs, doctoral fellowships, university chairs, research grants, addressing regional ecosystem problems in an interdisciplinary perspective.

I would say that when we look at the joint funding, work put together by NSERC and by SSHRC, we see the importance of this kind of work in the interest of Canada's prosperity agenda, the global changes in the ecosystems, the policies for aboriginal peoples, policies of joint research with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, policies on aboriginal economic development, models for Indian governments in New Brunswick and First Nations on the Constitution. I could go on and on.

I have a colleague here who is very interested in multiculturalism, my colleague from Saint-Laurent, and they are doing some very important research in the field of multiculturalism and citizenship for Canada, state of the art review of research related to that and the drawing together of all the documents of a serious import in this field.

If we look at the kind of work that has been done, we would understand why increasing interest in Canada has been fueled by the humanity and social sciences, so that by the mid-seventies a consensus emerged concerning the need for a separate agency. The results are impressive and I have just given some sense of what was so impressive; women and work, the condition of children, aging, ethics, values, Canadian literature and the list goes on.

A jury system was put in place that worked collaboratively with the universities and some post-secondary colleges. That nurtured the whole system and was very productive. Perhaps the most striking initiative is associated with the maturing of all these research fields, that of involving the collaborative efforts with the Canadian university scholars and scholars from around the world in the fields of science and engineering and medicine.

Such efforts reflect a growing awareness of the connection between these various disciplines. It is an inherent wholeness of truly important matters as we have had increased learning which demonstrates the innate relationships between these various fields of study that pervade the thought in today's society of issues that seemingly were unconnected as early on as the seventies.

This merger has caused serious consternation and a degree of unease in the arts and scientific communities for similar and yet different but very legitimate reasons. The social sciences and humanities research community was pleased by the government's commitment to a 4 per cent increase per year in its budget for the next four years. Unfortunately, yesterday's economic statement broke that promise for at least the next two years.

They are still waiting, it is true, for an affirmation that all future budgets will be reviewed by the government and studied as separate estimates from that of the Canada Council which they have joined and in tandem with the budgets of the two other research councils, NSERC and MRC, to use their acronyms. Of particular interest are the communities concerned with program integration. Above all, it is concerned with its identity. Research, although having evident cultural dimensions, is not the same as the pursuit of the fine arts.

Mr. Speaker, I will continue to point out to you that at the same time as the Canada Council has serious concerns as does SSHRC, Canada Council—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Maybe the Chair could rise for a minute and the hon. member would have an opportunity to check exactly what she would like to do.

Mrs. Finestone: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There seems to be a move afoot to have a move done and I will do the deed when I get to the point where I am supposed to do the deed. Mr. Speaker, you will please advise me when that moment comes. Thank you very much.

This is very serious business because the culture of this House is part of the culture of this country. The Canada Council is also involved in this whole merger. It has serious concerns because the Canada Council addresses the concerns of the development of the arts community and it develops the essence of who we are as Canadians.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, it is the key to the creation of a vibrant Canadian culture which is essential to the reaffirmation of our nationhood and our sovereignty while the preservation and the exposition of our cultural heritage gives visual expression to our common history of experience and our common values and the diverse linguistic and cultural identities that mark our distinctiveness in the world of nations. It involves our writers, actors, singers, musicians and artists.

I want to advise that artists earn on average less than $1,400 a month. They need advocacy so that their role in this country can be appreciated. The advocacy organizations such as the Canadian Conference on the Arts and the Canadian Museums Association have suffered a 10 per cent cut. I think that demonstrates this government's lack of will to hear from the constituencies about the need of all our creative Canadians across this country.

I suggest that we should listen to Dr. Paule Leduc who appeared before the Senate finance committee in June and said that we cannot as an advanced and civilized country afford to neglect the arts. We must provide vigorous support and promote creative endeavour. With all my energies, therefore, I will try to convey to government the importance of the stake the country has in the healthy support of artistic creation. As a competent and effective director of the science council, her respected administrative skills will be thoroughly tested and certainly needed as she helps and heads this merger of the staff and the new board to take place.

I would like to finish by saying that this whole matter needs to be very carefully examined. It does not match any of the tests that were supposedly the tests for the measure of why we were undertaking this action. Therefore, when this goes to committee I would hope there would be effective time given so that we can study this and make an enlightened decision.

Before I sit down I would move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "that" and by substituting the following:
> That Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, be not now read a second time but be read a second time this day six months hence.

It is seconded by the member who was very busy giving me instructions, the member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville.

• (1350)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The amendment is in order. The debate is on the amendment. Does the hon. member have a question or a comment?

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I have a question. I would like to compliment my colleague from Mount Royal who so eloquently spoke on behalf the SSHRC.

I do not know whether she was aware that the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada has issued a very poignant press release. In fact, it says that abolition of the SSHRC is turning back the clock. That is how it is described.

It talks about the research in the social sciences and humanities and how crucial it is for our understanding of and adaptation to the rapid social and technological change inherent in our emerging service and information oriented society. It is very concerned.

The member mentioned in her speech that the government had not given any prior study to this and did not provide any public rationale for this takeover other than talking about cost savings.

The association goes on to talk about the importance of what SSHRC has done in its over-all research project, about the multi-disciplinary research and over the past 10 years how many research projects they have funded. In fact, it has funded 3,398 researchers in the social sciences and humanities in the past fiscal year. That is an incredible number of research scientists. It goes on to list any number of areas where it shows concern. This is what I would like the member to address.

It is concerned about the integrity of the SSHRC granting programs. As one of the key players in Canada's over-all science and technology efforts, they are concerned it will be diminished. It is concerned that the links to other research granting councils could be threatened. It goes on and list many concerns. I would love to be able to read this wonderful communique from the Association of Universities and Colleges and have a response from my colleague from Mount Royal. Unfortunately, the time does not permit me to do that. I am sure she can get the tone of its concern. I would like to hear the member's response to those.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I think the reason for this hoist motion, which I believe is fundamentally sound, is precisely to answer the serious allegations that have been made by the universities and colleges and leaders in the field of scientific research in all three of the government bodies that are involved in the funding mechanisms. As well, the mandate that has been given to the Canada Council may have become too disparate to be handled properly at this given moment.

I would say that the whole question of staffing has not been answered. What happens when some are Public Service Alliance, PSAC, and fall under unions, and some are totally outside because they fall under a different sector now of the the Financial Administration Act?

They have an exempt status. What is happening to all the workers who are coming from external affairs now into this new organization called CARSH? They will lose their status two years down the road and access to new jobs as public servants. There is the question of estimates and whether there will be three separate estimate lines; the question of the memorandum of understanding and the relationship with the Department of External Affairs. Is it in their best interest?

There are many unanswered questions. I understand the concerns that are being raised. If you do not know where your budget is coming from, if you do not know how your budget is going to be reviewed, if you do not know how the projects coming in are going to be juried or not, if you do not know how the staff which is key to this being effective is going to take place, if you do not know what the criteria of the board selection is going to be, then my motion is very relevant. If not, certainly there has to be a sunset clause in this kind of an operation.

I thank my colleague for the very enlightened question which gave me the opportunity to explain why this motion has been put before the House and is a very enlightened one.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-93. Before I do, I would like to register my objection, if not with the procedural relevance of this, certainly with the intent of the government in combining so many pieces into this legislation.

There are many agencies in this piece of legislation to which I would like to address my remarks. I am going to be obliged to confine them to one part of the bill, namely the part that deals with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. I believe that at least this part should have been separated from the remainder of the bill so that we, in the House of Commons and in committee, could study the changes that are proposed to ACOA more carefully as they address the very real difficulties which the people of Atlantic Canada and more particularly the people of Cape Breton face at this time in our history in terms of the economy of that region.

What the Government of Canada is doing in this piece of legislation is eliminating an agency, Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, which was created when the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency was set up in 1987. We in this party are opposed to that action. I would like to say a few words about why we are opposed to that action and why we are so opposed to this legislation and particularly to this part of it.

Before I do, I would like to say a few words about the economic situation in Cape Breton. It has always been our lot in history to have an economic environment which has been difficult for the residents of Cape Breton. Many Cape Bretoners have been obliged as a result to find employment elsewhere.

Mr. Lewis: It's because they vote Liberal.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): No heckling from the other side. This is a serious matter. This legislation concerns a matter which is of great concern to all of the people of Cape Breton. We have always faced difficult circumstances economically in Cape Breton but in the recent years, it has been even worse. Recently, the news about the economy there is very bleak.

The central sources of employment, namely the mines and the steel mills in industrial Cape Breton, have been steadily declining in terms of the number of jobs that they have been able to support. As a result of recent activities facing two mines operated by Devco, nearly 1,000 miners could be facing permanent job loss. That being in a region where the unemployment rate is already alarmingly high is a serious cause for concern on Cape Breton Island.

• (1400)

The steel plant as well has been facing ongoing decline in employment. Despite a great deal of capital investment over the last two or three decades, the employment that facility is able to support is as low as it has ever been. Those who remain there have serious concern about whether the steel plant will enjoy the support of the provincial government and it will be able to stay open in the medium to long term. That steel plant is absolutely crucial to the economic future of Sydney in particular because no other alternatives have been developed.

Certainly nothing this government has done over the past eight years has given the people of that part of Cape Breton any reason to hope it has created some kind of alternative economic future to which the residents can aspire.

In another very important sector of our economy, namely the fishery, we have recently discovered that fish stocks in the zones adjacent to the island are in serious decline. Scientists of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans came out a few weeks ago saying that in order to prevent a total collapse of those fish stocks there would have to be serious cuts in the quota. Already that has caused unemployment in fish plants around Cape Breton Island. There is every reason to expect that in the new year there will be major job losses in the fishing industry which is another very important sector for our local economy.

In the forestry industry which so far has remained a fairly solid pillar of the island economy the long-term prospects on a global basis are at most cloudy. The mill which sustains more than 2,000 workers either directly or indirectly is one of the most efficient and well managed corporations in the pulp and paper industry. However, in the last two or three years it has faced very difficult times because of the downturn in that industry. It also faces more long-term challenges because of the new environmental trends which go against some of the advantages the mill has enjoyed by its location on Cape Breton Island.

While we have many assets that can be developed, our economy remains dependent on industries whose futures remain troubled. We have needed and relied in the past, to develop the economic strengths on Cape Breton Island, on agencies that had the island economy at heart and had the future growth of the island's economy as their main preoccupation.

What was created in the 1960s under a Liberal government was the Cape Breton Development Corporation. It had as one arm the responsibility of managing the coal mines in industrial Cape Breton and as the other arm the industrial development division which had as its mandate the responsibility of promoting a more diverse economic development across Cape Breton Island. That division, working in tandem with the main arm of Devco over nearly 20 years, did a lot to strengthen the economic base of various parts of the island until the government, when it introduced ACOA, chose to sever the industrial development division and to create the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation as a separate entity quite apart from the rest of Devco.

I was not in the House at that time, but I know that members representing us in the House of Commons and in the Senate were vigorously opposed to that part of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency enabling legislation. They saw the writing on the wall in terms of the long-term intent of this government which was to end the mandate of the industrial development division in two stages. The first stage was to separate it from Devco and the second stage, as we saw in the budget earlier this year and in this legislation, was to shut down Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation completely.

With the exception of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation which is a branch office of ACOA working out of Halifax with a very limited mandate and with a very indirect preoccupation with the future of Cape Breton Island, this will leave no agency unique to Cape Breton, unique to that part of Canada, in place with the support of federal funds to work toward the development of a long-term viable industry to sustain the future of Cape Breton. This is at a time when the pillars of our economy—the coal industry, the steel industry, the forest industry, the pulp and paper industry, the fisheries industry and the tourist industry—are facing a future which is cloudy at best and perhaps in a long-term decline.

We in Cape Breton wonder what this government has in mind in terms of a vision, in terms of a commitment to our future in Cape Breton, when it would terminate the only agency that is in place with a mandate and a commitment to foster the economic development of Cape Breton Island.

Our situation in comparison to the rest of Canada is bad and is getting worse. The disparity on Cape Breton Island is increasing and our young people who are looking for work are finding no opportunities there. They are forced to leave. Our best resource, namely our young, educated labour force, is obliged to find work elsewhere because of lack of opportunity and lack of vision on the part of this government. That diminishes the capacity of Cape Breton to attract viable, forward looking, future oriented industries.

That is happening because we have no agency with a mandate to deal with the search for solutions on Cape Breton Island. The mandates of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and Enterprise Cape Breton, two almost Bobbsey Twins in the programs offered by the government, have been confused and distracted. They have been preoccupied with nit-picking and with small insignificant projects with no long-term economic vision for the island.

As a result the government has frittered away eight years of opportunity to do something to create a future for Cape Breton Island. After eight years the situation economically has never been more bleak. The people of Cape Breton have never been more discouraged by the absence of any real opportunity. In our main industries the future is downward and there is no apparent alternative out there for them. The government is taking away the resources needed to find a future opportunity.

That is what is at issue with this legislation. That is what is at issue with the decision by the government. It was anticipated a long time ago by our opposition in the House and by our opposition in the Senate that it was to close, to terminate, to end Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

• (1410)

As a passing note, the speech by the Minister of Finance on Wednesday, although I was not here and did not have a chance to study it thoroughly, does not appear to have offered any hope to Cape Breton. If anything, it has given Cape Breton more reason to distrust the motives of this government, to expect nothing from this government as far as understanding the local island economy, understanding the broader Atlantic Canada economy and understanding the need to work with the leadership in that area to find long-term viable sources of employment in Cape Breton.

If this government were serious, it would address itself directly to the some 27,000 people who are either unemployed or out of the labour force in Cape Breton at this time and would need to be employed in order for Cape Breton to be brought up to a level even broadly equal to the rest of the country in terms of its average level of employment and participation in the labour force. This government has absolutely no idea of how to do that.

This is the reason why the people of Cape Breton have lost any kind of hope in this federal government and why they want at the earliest opportunity an election to be called so that they and the rest of this country can throw this government out. Then we could have a government which is fresh and which is less tired, fatigued and bankrupt of ideas in place to start dealing with real solutions for the people of Cape Breton and the rest of Canada. The government has demonstrably shown in its Economic and Fiscal Statement earlier this week and in this legislation that it is totally incapable of doing that.

For that reason I concur with my colleague from Mount Royal that this legislation, including the component on the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, should not be returned for six months or, in other words, should be hoisted for hopefully an indefinite period of time. In the meantime perhaps we could have an election to set the slate anew.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my hon. friend's speech and I have two questions.

First, he is calling for an election. I would ask for the benefit of the House whether or not he intends to seek a nomination or an appointment in his riding. I will explain for the hon. member. A nomination meeting is an open democratic contest. An appointment from the Leader of the Official Opposition is where there might be a contest and he wants to avoid one.

Second, I would like to ask this question. The hon. member admitted he was not here for the finance minister's speech, admitted that he had not read the speech, and then went on to suggest in a number of allegations that the speech did nothing for Cape Breton. On what does he found his criticism?

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): The first question the minister asked had nothing to do with my remarks. It is quite irrelevant to the subject I was dealing with. I do intend to seek the nomination in Cape Breton Highlands—Canso at the appropriate time, to run again and to be elected again to this House as part of a Liberal government under our leader, the hon. member from Shawinigan.

As for the second part of the minister's question, I was on a parliamentary committee outside Ottawa on Wednesday when the minister gave his speech.

I have read summaries of the speech and portions of the economic address. I admitted that I had not as yet read the whole speech and I qualified my remarks by saying that. What I did read gave me no reason to believe that there was very much in this speech for Cape Breton.

Perhaps after I have read the whole speech I will have a different point of view. If I do, at that point I will make those revised comments before this House but what I have read so far does not give me much reason for hope.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I comment to the hon. minister that there is a great Liberal fight in his riding to seek the nomination. I do not understand how that could be. I guess they figure it is an easy riding to win the next time. Do not worry, there will not be anybody appointed there.

My hon. friend is from an area of the country that has really been decimated by this Conservative government and its programs over the years. He gave a wonderful speech outlining some of the problems which have occurred not just in his riding but in all of Atlantic Canada because of the policies of this government.

I did read the majority of the speech on some of the economic background statements and I really found it lacking in any sort of direction for economic renewal in Atlantic Canada.

I know the hon. member spent a lot of time looking at this issue. He spent a lot of time reading about it and studying it. He talked to people in his own riding and throughout Atlantic Canada as to what some of the solutions would be.

Could the hon. member outline for us today some of the ideas he has that will help bring about economic growth in his area?

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, we have to start working from our strengths on Cape Breton Island. That is the case in Atlantic Canada as it is across Canada.

We need some idea from the national government that its industrial policy and fiscal and monetary policies will be endeavouring to support the Canadian economy and economies in the various regions. The regions need to identify and develop their particular strengths particularly as they relate to the emerging North American and world-wide markets we face.

We have many strengths in Cape Breton. In addition to our work force we have the educational institutions. Many Cape Bretoners attend St. Francis Xavier University near Cape Breton. We have the University College of Cape Breton, the various trade schools and community colleges such as the Nova Scotia Community College at the Strait of Canso, the nautical school and other very qualified educational institutions.

We have natural resources in addition to coal and the forest industries. We have a tremendous super port in the Strait of Canso. We have a fabulous cultural richness and natural beauty across the island which is there to be developed with the support of government in partnership with the private sector in Cape Breton.

Agencies such as the industrial development division of Devco or the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation which was another possibility that the government is trying to eliminate, as well as an agency in the Strait of Canso could promote the development of the strengths of that part of the island.

With some kind of vision we can produce a focused development effort on Cape Breton Island. We can lower the awful levels of unemployment on that island. We can better use both public and private funds than in the past toward a realistic objective that can empower the people of Cape Breton.

• (1420)

That is where we have to go. In eight years, this government has had absolutely no vision at all in dealing with Cape Breton. It has shown no real interest, aside from offering tax incentives and tax breaks and the odd program of interest buy down and assistance to small and medium sized businesses.

Without any focus, whatever efforts might have been achieved with the dollars, meagre as they were, that were made available to Atlantic Canada and to Cape Breton in particular have dissipated.

We need to focus and to work on our strengths in Cape Breton Island. We need to identify and develop those strengths with the resources, particularly the human resources we have all around us.

I want to thank the member for his very thoughtful question and for giving me the opportunity to speak positively about the future of our island.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, in viewing Bill C-93, I am struck by problems that both the public and many government and opposition members run into when this broad-brush approach is taken by bringing in legislation under an omnibus bill.

I do not knock the government for wanting to do this in some cases. When making small housekeeping amendments it makes sense to put them into an omnibus bill.

However, in this particular case we have 10 different and diverse sections. The bill is fairly substantial. It is 84 pages long with amendments in a number of different areas to a number of different bills. It is a little hard sometimes for members of the public to keep up with exactly what sections and acts are being changed.

It would be handy for any person in British Columbia who is watching at 11.20 in the morning to go through some of the acts that this bill will change.

The bill itself is called an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992.

The bill includes ten different parts, the first of which is the agricultural products board. It then changes certain provisions in the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. Part III makes substantial changes in direction in the Canada Council for the Arts and for Research in the Social Sciences and Humanities Act with amendments to the Canada Council Act. Part IV amends the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act. Part V changes Emergency Preparedness Canada. Part VI is the independent review commission for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

One will see that this trend is fairly widespread as far as what it is touching.

Part VII deals with the Intellectual Property Tribunal, making amendments to the Copyright Act, Trade Marks Act, Intellectual Property Tribunal Act and various other amendments to other acts from the Financial Administration Act to the Privacy Act.

Part VIII concerns the International Trade and Procurement Tribunal and makes amendments to that particular act and consequential amendments to the Access to Information Act, Financial Administration Act, Privacy Act and others.

Part IX concerns the Petroleum Monitoring Agency and makes amendments to the Energy Monitoring Act.

Finally, Part X is the Veterans Land Administration amendment.

One can see in any omnibus bill we run into the situation where it is a broad-brush approach. We have too much in one bill. I suggest there are certain parts of this bill that should have been broken out and brought to the House in separate bills. For example, if there are minor changes in the Veterans Land Administration Act I can see coupling that with small changes.

In this case we are not looking at small changes. A number of them are fairly substantial. I would like to turn to some of the substantial changes. I refer specifically to those concerning the Canada Council.

Yesterday I attended the reception put on by the Speaker in the Hall of Honour. It was celebrating the 30th anniversary of the Canada Council and the 20th anniversary of the art bank. I think part of what I picked up in talking to the people there and part of what I picked up in listening to the remarks made by the president was that there was a substantial fear of major cutbacks in the arts community.

In Wednesday's economic statement the Minister of Finance indicated 10 per cent cuts across the board and substantial cuts to arts and culture.

It was clear in speaking to the people involved with the Canada Council and the art bank that they are very concerned at the degradation of the arts and cultural community in Canada. We have heard it here today and we have heard it many times before that societies survive and thrive when attention is paid to where they came from and to where they are heading. Societies thrive when they look at and preserve the art and the culture that is so important in explaining societies at any one given time.

That is what is being attacked not only in the Minister of Finance's statement on Wednesday, but also in the February 1992 budget provisions that are now being put into place with Bill C-93.

It might be reasonable at this time to point out some of the problems the arts community has with this particular section. I would like to quote liberally from a release from the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada on November 30, 1992. It states:

> As Canadians look to the 21st century and their place in a research and innovation-intensive world economy, the federal government is turning back the clock to the 1970s with its recently tabled Bill C-93. The bill would wind up Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and transfer its programs to the Canada Council.
> SSHRC was transferred out of Canada Council in 1978 after much consultation and study. This move recognized the growing importance of social sciences and humanities research to Canada's over-all science effort and gave it the profile and autonomy it needed to survive and thrive.
> Lumping the social sciences and humanities with arts, 14 years later, does not make much sense, especially at a time when SSHRC has already developed partnerships with other research councils in order to find interdisciplinary solutions to our pressing medical, industrial, environmental and human resource problems.
> Research in the social sciences and humanities is crucial for our understanding of and adaptation to the rapid social and technological change inherent in an emerging service and information oriented society.

• (1430)

This was a quote from Dr. Claude Lajeunesse.

The communiqué continues: "The proposed changes were announced in the February federal budget without any prior consultation or public study. The government provided no rationale for this takeover other than general references to cost saving". The minister responsible for the Canada Council is admitting that savings from the change will be limited.

The bill also proposes to transfer the International Academic Relations Program from external affairs to Canada Council. We are concerned", states the communiqué, "that such a move would hamper Canadian university participation in international knowledge networks. The federal government should be facilitating this participation, not creating potential road blocks, if Canada wants to attract its university world class scholars and be plugged in to international research".

I think that emphasizes fairly clearly that this community is very concerned. The thrust of what they have been doing over the last 14 years will be watered down by their coupling with the arts community and the Canada Council. I think that is a valid and reasonable fear.

It is also clear that the arts community is concerned about various cutbacks and are concerned about the thrust of their direction and where it will be going with the consolidation of their area with that of humanities and social sciences.

The Association of Universities and Colleges also points out a number of concerns about being taken over by Canada Council. These are valid concerns and should be put on the record. It is concerned that the integrity of the SSHRC granting programs will be not be maintained after it is part of the predominantly arts and cultural agencies. It is also concerned about the role that it will have as one of the key players in Canada's over-all science and technology effort and are concerned that this effort will be substantially diminished.

It is concerned about the growing collaborative links to other research granting councils and that these links could be threatened. That is a valid concern because as you work up a network, you work up a trust among a number of different universities and a number of difference agencies. When your trust is watered down, your viability is not only questioned but also the link between what you are doing and what you want to accomplish and how much you can add to the over-all research is also watered down and questioned.

It further points out its concern that social science humanities research continues to be funded from moneys allocated for Canada's science effort and that these moneys be used exclusively to support research. Of course, it points out that the minister responsible announced a 4 per cent per year increase in SSHRC for the next four years which began on April 12, 1992.

It is further concerned that other research agencies, such as the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council and the Medical Research Council, will also eventually lose their independent status. I think these are real and valid concerns.

I should also briefly quote from a couple of letters that we have received with respect to this proposal. In a letter from the International Council for Canadian Studies to the Prime Minister dated November 23, Hans-Josef Niederehe, the president, has stated: "Our concern is that contrary to its intention, such a transfer will in fact prove costly and ineffective. The cost effectiveness of the present program, which is acknowledged by all who are familiar with it, derives from the fact that it is an instrument of Canadian foreign policy and that it enjoys the full co-operation of the academics abroad who, in effect, deliver it. To transfer this responsibility to the Canada Council, which has no experience with Canadian foreign policy and no contact with academics involved in this program abroad, is bound to incur additional costs and produce a less effective program, and in the process to expose the government to serious criticism".

I think those are valid views to which the government should pay attention.

Also, in a message from the chairman of the European Task Force on Canadian Studies, Cornelius Remie, states in his summing up letter to the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

> We have acted in good faith, urged by the encouragement of your officials, who have shown a marked sensitivity to and respect for the dictates of the academic world. If the planned transfer of the delivery of Canadian studies programs from your department to the Canada Council does not build in sufficient guarantees for the continued support of these programs abroad, there will inevitably be a widespread sense of disappointment, even betrayal, that could well undermine the investments Canada has made in this field over many years. I do encourage you not to let these investments be wasted and the support upon which these rest be eroded.

It is clear the community that has worked in good faith for the last 14 years in building up Canadian studies, humanities studies, throughout the world and throughout Canada, is questioning why a bill such as this would be brought in with no consultation with those involved, after it was switched out and set up after substantial consultations back in 1970 and prior to 1978. Now, unilaterally, the government has decided as a cost cutting measure and a measure that it has admitted will not save that much money, to go ahead and say: "You are going to become part of the Canada Council".

It is not hard to imagine that if we looked in the Auditor General's report alone we could have found the money to have kept these two entities as separate entities. We could have found sufficient funds to continue to fund this particular group as a separate entity, and in fact increase its funding without hurting any other areas. We could have also continued to fund the Canada Council to the extent that it should be funded.

We only have to look to the section, for instance, on the tax havens, where the Auditor General says that there are hundreds of millions of dollars, admitted in questioning in committee, that it could be well over a billion dollars being wasted or lost in tax revenues each year as a result of the tax haven loopholes that this government has brought in.

That is one of the things that I looked for in Wednesday's economic statement. I thought, well, if we have to find revenues, where will the minister look for them? He had to look no further than one week ahead of his economic statement in the Auditor General's report of November 24, opening it up and looking in that section and seeing the Auditor General's statement of "hundreds of millions of dollars of tax revenues are being lost to large multinational corporations and large corporations each year".

Did I see that loophole closed in the economic statement? I looked and I looked some more. The Tories did not close the loophole because they have an election coming up. They depend on those large corporations to use some of the profits they are saving to help runs up to an election. It would be very simple to close those loopholes and try to ensure that things like the Canada Council and the Research and Social Sciences and Humanities Council are kept as separate entities. However, this government has a totally different direction. It is called help your big buddies and leave those who would not help you on their own.

• (1440)

Mr. Milliken: The Tory fat cats.

Mr. Whittaker: That is right. I think the member from Kingston has it exactly. Help the fat cats and we will stay fat on the fat of the land. The member from Kingston is very astute. The fat cats are sitting on the other side and they are making those poor people worry about what they are doing. They are ruining what has been developed over a 14-year period.

Let me turn just briefly to another section before my time is up. It is in respect to the emergency preparedness. Once again, if we look at the Auditor General's report for 1989 and 1992 we will find that there is a fair amount of criticism, not for the people that work within Emergency Preparedness Canada itself, but of the bureaucrats within it. They have not got to the stage where they can deal with a major crisis.

The government should be splitting out major parts of this bill, introducing them to the House as separate bills. It should use some of that wasted tax loophole money to ensure that groups that are hit by this legislation remain viable, independent organizations within the Canadian structure.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for my hon. colleague who made some excellent comments on this particular legislation.

My first question is this. I note in this bill there is reference to intellectual property and I wonder what that has to do with this government.

Second, the member referred to emergency planning. If I am not mistaken, in this bill there is a reference now to the whole procedure of emergency planning coming under the aegis of the Minister of National Defence. If it has not changed in the last while, it is my understanding that there are considerable powers given to ministers of the Crown that are laid out by Order in Council as to what powers they would have in light of an emergency.

In the past, in any case, those powers were very Draconian. No one would deny the need for the government to act in emergencies, but given some of the authority that are given to ministers, would it not be better for that authority to be passed by Parliament as opposed to Order in Council by cabinet.

I would like the member to make some observations about that particular situation and how it may relate to this bill.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley. He has obviously studied the area of emergency preparedness fairly carefully, being from British Columbia. He knows the problems, particularly on Vancouver Island and the lower mainland, with regard to earthquakes. This is a bigger problem if we look at things that the Auditor General touched on such as the Bhopal and Chernobyl problems.

These are things that while we are quick to say they happen elsewhere but would never happen here, we have to acknowledge that in fact those are real problems that could occur within our own country.

We have to ask how important is this. I have to agree with the member that the importance of this is so great that it should be brought before Parliament and debated. The power should be here with Parliament as opposed to allowing a minister to delegate the power to one of his chiefs.

I think the thrust has to be that we as parliamentarians have to ensure that Canadians are protected particularly with respect to such things as earthquakes that are always present in the minds of those in the lower mainland on Vancouver Island. As a matter of fact, we had an earthquake within the last year through the Okanagan region. I think we have to be very cognizant of the difficulties involved.

I think now with major chemical plants and the possibility of major problems such as in Bhopal we have to be very aware that throughout the industrial regions we have to have the ability to deal with those particular problems.

With the nuclear plants at Pickering and particularly the province of Ontario and some of the Atlantic provinces, I think there is a real problem. We say that our technology is such that we do not have to worry that much. It is not as much of a problem as it was in Chernobyl. We have to be very much aware after Three Mile Island that this could be a distinct possibility, coupled, for instance, with an earthquake in an area where there is a nuclear disaster. We have to watch that.

Look at what happened in Hanford in Washington state below the British Columbia border. If there is a major event down there are we prepared to deal with that in the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta? I think the answer right now is probably no. Those are the things we have to look at and that we as parliamentarians have to deal with.

I would like to deal now with his first point, that of intellectual property. While it is a complex matter dealing with copyrights and trade mark legislation, I think it is a comment on this government that perhaps it is bankrupt in the area of intellectual abilities as opposed to intellectual properties because it seems to me it has all the property but not much intellect.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I commend my colleague for his usual incisive speech. He has obviously studied this bill where others have probably feared to tread. It is a kind of daunting bill and I know the Official Opposition House leader called it an ominous bill. I know he meant to say omnibus bill but conceivably it could be ominous because we are not quite sure what exactly is in the bill.

I will say perhaps my colleague went a little too far when he suggested the member from Kingston was astute. I took exception to that at that particular time. Some might suggest this might be a housekeeping bill but after having gone through the bill I notice CITT, the Canadian International Trade Tribunal. That is our answer to the American commerce department.

Not only do Canadian firms have to deal with negative rulings from the American side, we have had to deal with considerable negative rulings against Canadian companies by our own Canadian trade group which is really quite disconcerting to all of those Canadian companies.

At first blush one would think this perhaps is totally innocuous and it has no impact upon anyone. I suggest after further review of this bill that it could be considered not innocuous but noxious.

I think the member rightly pointed out that in all likelihood there was no consultation on this bill whatsoever. I do not know if I have a question for the hon. member. Perhaps he could comment. Tell the Canadian people who are watching out there if this is a consequential bill or inconsequential as the government would have us believe.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, in response to the question I think it is very clear that there is a lot hidden within this bill. There are some things that could be looked on as housekeeping such as the Veterans Land Act. I do not necessarily look on it as a housekeeping bill. What it does is essentially fold in the Veterans Land Act under the Deputy Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Perhaps if we looked at the number of people left after the two wars and the Korean War who qualified under VLA, the numbers did not warrant keeping the Veterans Land Act. If that is correct then I suggest that maybe that is the route to go. There should have been substantial consultations to make sure that people understood, that veterans did not feel threatened when they heard that their VLA was being shut down. In their golden years they should be feeling secure.

Look at other things—the Solicitor General was here—with respect to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It is fairly substantial what it is doing. I cannot disagree with the thrust of the changes because it seems to me that it is taking two boards and making an independent external review board out of them. That perhaps is positive but it is a fairly substantial change. I think it is a change that should be discussed and considered. There should have been a little more consultation.

Therefore, I think the member is correct when he says that it is a fairly substantial bill, not inconsequential and not simply a housekeeping bill.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to debate Bill C-93 arising out of last year's fateful budget.

We have had two budgets in the last 12 months. The economy is in a mess. Clearly the first budget was wrong, as we said at the time. I remember in the budget debate we made the point that the government was overly optimistic in all of its projections and had done nothing to stimulate the economy, which we felt was essential at that time.

The minister disagreed and said that everything he was doing was stimulating to the economy. We now know that was false and wrong.

We have had a second budget delivered this week which is called an economic statement, but nevertheless it had all the trappings of a budget. It indicated how wrong the minister was when you see what the deficit has done; increasing by something like $9 billion since his original projection last February. It is hard to imagine that the finance minister could have been more off base than this one has been although his predecessor was not much better.

Mrs. Maheu: He is a Tory.

Mr. Milliken: As my colleague says, he is a Tory, but our expectations still must be reasonable; perhaps not high but at least reasonable. However, I do not think we have even reason from this particular minister in these particular budgets.

Mr. Edwards: Remember Allan and Marc Lalonde.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member opposite is hollering about a very capable former Liberal finance minister. He would do well to have his minister follow that example. The Solicitor General wants me to name a famous Liberal finance minister. We have two who are members of this House right now who come immediately to mind. The Leader of the Opposition was a very famous Minister of Finance and the former Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, was a very famous Minister of Finance who had a balanced budget.

Mr. Edwards: The last one ever.

Mr. Milliken: As the hon. member says, the last one ever. This is all the more reason for him to be raised on a pedestal and cast in bronze. I invite hon. members opposite to see that a suitable statue is erected to the memory of this great man who is a former leader of our party and is now serving this House in the distinguished position as member for Vancouver Quadra.

I now wish to turn to Bill C-93 which the government feels offers some salvation. There are points in the bill with which we in this party are in accord. We think some of the changes are worth while. We do not always dump on everything the government does, contrary to popular expectation and certainly popular perception.

However, the points that we are in agreement with are relatively narrow ones. We concede that the winding up of the directorate of the Veterans Land Act and consolidating that work with the deputy minister's office is a sensible change, especially when no new grants under that act have been available since 1975.

We are also willing to acquiesce in some of the other mergers that are proposed in the bill. However, there are a couple that warrant very close scrutiny and ought not to take place. I want to speak specifically about the proposal to merge the Social Science and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council.

My constituency is one that boasts very capable people in both fields who would be touched by this bill. Kingston has a very vibrant cultural community which benefits from the grants that are given by the Canada Council. Kingston has writers, painters, musicians, artists of all kinds who benefit from these grants, who are recipients of these grants. There are publishing companies that operate in Kingston and receive these grants to help them publish books that would otherwise be unavailable to the Canadian public.

The work of the Canada Council is vital and important. We have witnessed under this government cutbacks in the council's funding until recently when I understand there was some additional money provided.

The fact is the Canada Council has not fared well. Clearly the Conservative government regards culture as an optional extra. When it comes to dealing with things it feels government should do, it looks more at running a post office or road building and running a government like a business than it does in looking at things that are important for the self-expression of our people and that is in the arts.

The arts community in Canada is very important for our cultural and national identity. It is a very important method of self-expression for Canadians. It helps us realize our true identity as Canadians in operating and carrying on our separate existence on the North American continent. Any attempt to stifle or lessen the importance or the vibrancy of Canada's cultural community is a serious move and one that the government it seems to me has undertaken cavalierly and without due regard to the consequences throughout the eight years that Canadians have suffered badly under the government opposite.

In speaking in its defence there has been no particular change. However, there will be a subtle one to the Canada Council in that it will now take over responsibility for the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council.

That body operated for quite a different purpose and that was to grant funding to researchers involved in the social sciences. Sometimes there was overlap. Sometimes the social science research impinges on cultural matters, but generally speaking it does not. It generally deals with things in terms of sociology and politics and the study of political science and psychology and that kind of study.

Instead of keeping that as a second group the government has seen fit to lump the two together as a cost saving measure. We have seen no figures yet on how much money is to be saved by this merger.

I suggest when we look at the total savings projected from this bill and projected in the budget, they are peanuts. In the particular case of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council I am sure the savings are minuscule. Most of the staff will have to be retained to do the work. It will do it out of the Canada Council office which may save a little in rent but I expect it had to expand offices to accommodate this group. The important work of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council is carried out in the course of peer review of the applications for funding.

Most of the peer review—I think I can say all of it—is done for free. There is no charge levied by the social scientists, the sociologists, the political scientists, whoever, who sit on the review panels to decide who receives grants from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council.

There is a central processing office where the grant applications go. There is apparently some initial screening and then there is peer review of the various applications done gratuitously, free, by Canadians involved in this work across this country.

All that costs the government nothing. What it does is provide an excellent review of the work which is of benefit to the social scientists involved, but it also then assists the council in making a decision as to who and who does not get the funding.

It seems to me that given that approach, why should this group be lumped with the Canada Council whose aims and objectives are really quite different from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council? The government has decided as apparently some kind of cost-saving measure that these two bodies should operate out of one place. It is not reasonable and the government should abandon this part of the bill.

My time has expired. I will continue my remarks the next time this bill is called.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will then have 11 minutes remaining in his speech, plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi) moved that Bill C-372, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank the Conservative member for Don Valley East for seconding my motion today. I also wish to thank the Conservative member for Terrebonne, who seconded it the other day when I tabled this bill, whose purpose is to amend the Parliament of Canada Act.

I stand here in Parliament today on behalf of all Canadian taxpayers, the people who pay our salaries and our expenses. As I said on November 19, the purpose of this bill is to require the disclosure of expenses made by members of the House of Commons in connection with their parliamentary functions.

I propose that every member of the House of Commons shall, each year, within 30 days after October 31 and within 30 days after March 31, prepare a statement of expenses incurred in connection with a member's parliamentary functions. This bill would take effect on the first day of the Thirty-fifth Parliament, in other words, after the next election.

I think that is appropriate, since all members of this House—and there are 295—will go before the electorate in every riding of this country, and that is where, the effectiveness of a member, whatever his political stripe—whether he is a New Democrat, a Tory, a Liberal or a member of the Bloc Québécois or an independent member—will be judged.

What will they tell the voters? Will they be in favour of disclosure of their expenses or will they be against disclosure? In any case, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say, first of all, that I am not the first to consider this kind of legislation, since the subject came before the House on December 18, 1990. I suppose many members may have forgotten, or did not have a chance to read, the Votes and Proceedings of December 18, 1990, where it says under Presenting Reports from Committees that Mr. Danis, from the Special Committe on the Review of the Parliament of Canada Act, presented the sixth report of the committee, which is as follows: On December 14, 1989, the House of Commons, by unanimous consent, approved the following motion: "That a special committee of the House be appointed and empowered to review the Parliament of Canada Act regarding the powers, duty and obligations of the members of the House in relation thereto and regarding the authority, responsibilities and jurisdiction of the Board of Internal Economy—"

"Since its mandate began in December 1989, the work of the special committee has ranged widely over many of the legal and administrative structures relating to the House of Commons and its members. In the course of the past year, we have tabled reports dealing with such diverse matters as the general principles that guide the activities and functions of members, procedures relating to the execution of search warrants within parliamentary precincts, and extensive amendments to the Parliament of Canada Act. The special committee also sat as a legislative committee in relation to Bill C-79, which arose directly out of the committee's work, and reported that bill back to the House last month after intensive study".

"Thus, over one full year, much has been accomplished; but there is much yet to do. The purpose of this report is to indicate the outstanding matters that the committee believes remain to be addressed. Some of these are related to issues discussed in earlier reports, while others flow from the passage of Bill C-79. The committee has concluded that all are important to the members of the House and the public we serve, and are therefore worthy of future consideration".

A little further, in the same report tabled on December 18, 1990 by the hon. member for Verchères, we see the following heading: Public disclosure of expenses. We must remember that the committee consisted of members of all the opposition parties, Conservatives, Liberals and New Democrats. I shall continue: "The committee has concluded that there should be increased disclosure of those expenses over which members have direct control." The Canadian people have a right to know how the money that is entrusted to their elected representatives is being spent. Mr. Speaker, that was on December 18, 1990. On January 14, 1991, in my federal riding of Abitibi, in my home town of Val-d'Or, I gave a press conference and read these proceedings.

In a spirit of openness and financial accountability to the electorate, information should be made available on the use of such funds. The committee remains uncertain, however, about the best way to achieve this goal. In devising a system, the principle of accountability must be weighed against the principle of the independence of members, and a proper balance struck between the two. Disclosure must be detailed enough to be informative, but not so detailed that the purpose of disclosure is lost in a mountain of irrelevant detail. The privacy concerns of employees must also be respected, as must the privileges of members. All of these aspects of disclosure, as well as all the administrative details that would need to be developed, deserve thoughtful consideration."

That is where I decided to take the lead on behalf of the taxpayers of Abitibi, Quebec and Canada. I told the media that I would publicly disclose my expenses every three months, because for me, it is essential to control expenses paid from public funds.

Given the federal government's sustained commitment to restrict spending in departments, Crown corporations, et cetera, the people of Abitibi are entitled to know how their member of Parliament spends the money given to him. In a spirit of openness and accountability, following the tabling of some bills and the sixth report on December 18, 1990, I told the media that I would go ahead and disclose my expenses.

A little later, in February 1991—it is important to give the dates. Hon. members think that I am doing this for electoral or political reasons, in order to get votes. If that were the case, I would have waited until just before the election, but I did not wait. I made this decision on January 14, following the recommendations in the sixth report of the committee on the Parliament of Canada Act which recommended that we disclose our expenses.

I have a letter here from the Speaker of the House of Commons dated February 8, 1991. I will read the paragraph on reporting expenses: "As you know, the Special Committee on the Parliament of Canada Act recognized that expense disclosure is an important subject which deserves thorough investigation." This is not just anybody; it is the Speaker of the House of Commons.

A little later, in September of the same year, I disclosed my spending in the previous quarter for the people of my riding, that is my riding expenses and my office expenses.

I see the Liberal member from a small, isolated, remote part of the Island of Montreal trying to interrupt me. Anyway, she does not even dare to publish her expenses for the taxpayers.

I have a letter here dated September 5, 1991 and signed by the Clerk of the House of Commons, one of the best clerks in Canada, Robert Marleau. He wrote this in his letter: "nevertheless, nothing prevents members from voluntarily disclosing their expenses, as you have already done—".

On September 25, 1991, I tabled Motion M-591 in this House. It said that the member for Abitibi would table a quarterly report of all his expenses, including privileges, as of August 1, 1991. It is important for me to tell Canadian taxpayers and my constituents all I have done since December 18, 1990, when, before Christmas, I read the proceedings of the Special Committee on the Parliament of Canada Act, in which there was a really important recommendation for all federal MPs. It would set an example for Canadian public servants and all provincial legislators. That is important. Later, I made a first attempt to table a document in the House on November 5. I then asked the House for unanimous consent to table, in both official languages, a briefing note entitled, "Expenses incurred in the performance of my duties as member of Parliament for Abitibi for July, August and September 1991". I was refused the first time. On November 6, I was refused a second time and on November 7 I was again refused. I stopped, because if I did that every day, I would still be refused, and it gets on members' nerves.

That month, the Speaker of the House of Commons was presented a report of the audit of the House of Commons administration by the office of the Auditor General of Canada. That is not just anybody. It is a study of the Parliament of Canada and members' expenses. We see in section 6, on members' expenses, that members spent $116 million or 53 per cent of the total spent by the House of Commons.

I want to say that there are several really important things in this report and I must tell Canadian taxpayers about them, because not all taxpayers have access to this report. The reason I quote some parts is that it is important in showing why I, the member for Abitibi, disclose my expenses. I am the only MP to do so even though mayors and councillors disclose theirs every month in their city or town.

Paragraph 6.9 says, "We reviewed the administration of members' expenditures and tested a sample of individual transactions, invoices and claims submitted by members for payment. Our audit of the Comptroller's financial procedures concerning members' expenditures disclosed few problems".

Members pay attention to their budget and are not wasteful. Whatever our party, we have a budget, a salary, offices, funds for travel, et cetera. And the Auditor General says that there are few problems. So why do we not publish our expenses? It is well described in the report. There is no shame in publishing our expenses. I am not ashamed and I have been practising for it since January 14, 1991. The taxpayers thought I was spending a million dollars a year. I proved that my expenses were $236,000, in addition to my salary.

There are several important recommendations in this report. Members are not informed and no statement on our expenses is provided regularly to the administration of the House or to members.

One thing I did since February 1990, after the finance minister's budget, is that I checked how much I cost. Before, I did not check. It is as if I did my weekly grocery shopping with $200 in my pocket and left the store without a bill and it cost $800. Today I can say how much I cost and I have practice with it.

In paragraph 6.39, the Auditor General says, "Public disclosure of members' expenditures needs to be expanded. We have earlier recommended that more information be made available to the members themselves, and to the board. If these recommendations are accepted, it will be an easy, and yet important, final step to make public the details of members' expenditures. We believe that publication of this information, coupled with the publication of financial information on House administration, would enhance public accountability".

There is one thing I want to say to hon. members: It is not true that everything is public. Paragraph 6.40 on page 30 of the report on the House of Commons audit says, "Each year in the public accounts, the House reports a statement of indemnities, expense allowances and travel expenses by member. This represents only 37 per cent of members' expenditures".

Further on, in paragraph 6.43 of the same report, it says, "If the public disclosure we are recommending were put into effect at the beginning of the next Parliament, it would provide members with an opportunity to adapt to such disclosure and would provide the House administration with the time to develop the necessary means of providing it".

Recommendation 6.44 is as follows: "Information on all expenditures of members should be publicly available, at a reasonable level of detail, effective the next Parliament".

That is why I have been making my expenses public for several years now. I have received hundreds of letters from taxpayers from Vancouver, from coast to coast to coast, from my riding and elsewhere in Quebec and in Ontario. These are just a few of the letters of support I have received. I even got one from an 84 year old constituent congratulating me for doing this, a first in 125 years of Canadian history.

I know that I am running out of time—I do have 20 minutes—but I want the Canadian people to know how much I have cost them in 1991. My total expenditures for that year amounted to $236,901, plus my salary and so on. I have three constituency offices and one parliamentary office. Insurance costs were $578; post office box, $261; travel expenses for myself, my family and my staff, $33,670. That is not much, considering that, apart from the two Territories, my riding is the largest in Canada, with 553,837 kilometres square, including the northern tip of New Quebec.

Photocopying, $3,650; office rental in Val-d'Or, Amos and Senneterre, $25,639; stationery, office supplies in Ottawa, Val-d'Or, Amos and Senneterre, $7,337; my staff's salaries, $110,471 gross; telephone service in Ottawa, $6,500; telephone service and equipment rental in my riding, $26,600; translation, approximately $5,000; travels in Canada and abroad, $1,233. Householder mailings did not cost me a cent. There were none this year because I wanted to save the money of the taxpayers on account of the recession. Travels in Canada—ask my family—none; travels in Canada and abroad, none; travels for sponsors, none either.

I consider government as a public institution that should abide by the same rules as a municipal board or a private company. For instance, what would happen if the management of a company decided not to produce a financial report for its shareholders? I do not think that it would last very long.

Elected members of Parliament have a duty to be transparent, whether they like it or not. There is nothing personal in making a member's expenses public. What is embarrassing about that? We are still in a recession. All governments have to tighten the belt. Elected members of Parliament must set the example for their staff. I cut my expenses and privileges to do just that because I know that change has to be instigated from the top.

In closing, I must say that the worst enemy of parliamentary democracy is secretiveness. I would like to ask you this, Mr. Speaker: to settle the issue, could I find unanimous consent in this Chamber to put this bill to a vote at the end of the day.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is not agreed. I regret the hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Gaspé now has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I did not get unanimous consent for my request. I noticed that the "no" came from the Liberal member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Gaspé.

Mrs. Maheu: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I respect your judgment on the last intervention. I believe it was not a point of order. It was a point of partisanship.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It was not a point of order. I do not know where the no came from but there was a no. Therefore, we will now go to debate.

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. There were two noes, one from each side of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Fine. The hon. member for Gaspé.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak on the bill put forward by my colleague from Abitibi to amend the Parliament of Canada Act.

• (1520)

The purpose of this bill is to require the disclosure of expenses made by members of the House of Commons in connection with their parliamentary functions. The hon. member's bill would amend the Parliament of Canada Act as follows, and I quote: "Every member of the House of Commons shall, each year, within thirty days after October 31 and within thirty days after March 31, prepare a statement of expenses incurred in connection with the member's parliamentary functions and shall immediately deposit such statement with the board".

The board may make bylaws exempting members of the House of Commons from preparing a statement of expenses where, in the opinion of the board, the period of time between the beginning of a Parliament and the time at which the statement of expenses is to be prepared is so short as not to warrant the making of such a statement. Third, the board may make bylaws prescribing items to be included in a statement of expenses, including expenses relating to salaries of a member's employees, rent for constituency offices, travel, stationery and telephone. Furthermore, the Speaker shall table before the House of Commons the statements of expenses on any of the first 30 days after the statements are deposited by the members with the Board.

The Board of Internal Economy, as created by the Parliament of Canada Act, is responsible for financial and administrative affairs concerning the House of Commons, its premises, services, staff and members.

The board may make bylaws to regulate members' use funds, goods, services and premises made available to members within the context of their parliamentary functions. It may also make bylaws concerning management and accounting of funds made available to members. The Speaker shall table these bylaws in the House of Commons within 30 days after their approval.

Finally, the board has the exclusive authority to determine, bearing in mind the nature of its functions, the proper use by members, of funds, goods, services or premises available to them on the basis of their parliamentary functions and more specifically, whether that use is in keeping with the letter and intent of the bylaws.

The Parliament of Canada Act provides for sessional allowances for members of both Houses of Parliament. It also provides that any member of each House of Parliament shall be allowed certain expenses, such as moving, travel, transportation and telecommunications expenses.

In the course of an investigation by a peace officer into a member's use of specific funds, goods, services or premises, the peace officer may request an opinion from the board on the propriety of that use.

We must remember that a member of Parliament may face charges in court in the case of unlawful use of public funds. We already have mechanisms for monitoring members expenses.

Over the years, there have been a number of changes with a view to improving the existing system. I think everyone will agree it is important to ensure that taxpayers' money is used wisely and appropriately.

As members of Parliament and elected representatives, we must have an abiding concern for the proper use of public funds. Mr. Speaker, at this point I would like to consider in a more general way the issue of a member's accountability.

In fact, the issue raised by the hon. member for Abitibi is above all one of being accountable to the people of Canada. We are elected by the people and we are accountable to the people. We do this in various ways: through our presence in the riding where we were elected, by listening carefully to members of the community, and by always being available to help our constituents.

We are accountable in the House, when we take part in many debates on important issues when we put questions to members of the government, and when we draw attention to the problems of our fellow citizens. We are accountable through our participation on parliamentary committees, by ensuring at all times that the interests and the well-being of Canadians are always considered when important initiatives or legislation is discussed. Ultimately, we are accountable to the people at election time, when we show them what we have accomplished as members of Parliament during a given mandate. The people then decide whether or not to give another mandate to their representative it in Parliament.

We all agree that public moneys should be used in an appropriate manner. Some mechanisms are already in place to control members' expenses. It is in compliance with those rules that we will accomplish our duties as members of Parliament.

[English]

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond on behalf of the New Democratic Party for a few moments. The member for Abitibi has received some notoriety on this subject, and gained perhaps both good and bad publicity.

He is a pioneer in this area and we salute him for the concept he puts forward. I know he must feel frustrated in his desire to bring forward this idea.

I have recently gone through a private member's bill that I felt was significant enough to move beyond a couple of votes and into committee. Fortunately I have reached that point. I have to thank both other parties for allowing that to happen. I also am quite aware of the long, rocky road to that final end and even when you get there, you may not be gratified with the results.

We do salute the member for his continued perseverance against great odds. I am sure he is receiving static from within his own caucus.

We must be accountable in this business of politics for the money we spend from the public purse. We must not only be accountable, we must not only be honest, but we must appear to be honest. The perception is of as much significance I suppose as the accounting.

I am sure that several members would be afraid of the static that would come forward. I just looked at my travel budget which brings me to work in Ottawa from Sault Ste. Marie once a week. I figure it out to be approximately $28,000 per year. I am sure some of the constituents back home say it is quite a price tag to send me to work on their behalf.

I should point out that it costs $670 for a return trip between Sault Ste. Marie and Ottawa at least once a week. I could travel to London, England, every week cheaper than going to Ottawa to work. That is an anomaly. That is the way the airline fares treat us and I suspect that next year it might cost $750 for a member of Parliament to get to work each week. However, that is the reality of it.

We are looking to move our office. The lease is going to run out. We now spend $800 a month for accommodation. I am disclosing my expenses, as did the member, in a forum that is not appropriate but I am not afraid to do so. It costs $800 a month rent where we are. Our lease is running out. In order to find an appropriate spot within the community we will have to pay considerably more. We have outlived our accommodation but it is very expensive to move. I am not afraid to indicate to constituents what exactly their tax dollars are going toward.

I can appreciate that some people would be fearful of manipulation of certain statistics and have grave concerns about that as an individual.

I would ask that perhaps we as MPs could take the lead from the hon. member for Abitibi and disclose, as he has done. I have no problem with that. Perhaps I have not taken that initiative to this point, but it does not mean that I am fearful of doing just that.

• (1530)

I am sure the hon. member has been accused of self-aggrandizement with this initiative. I am sure people have suggested grandstanding, that he is not trying to set an example for anybody; he is just trying to show up other members of Parliament. I will take him at face value since he has been at this for so long. I would suggest he is probably very sincere in his intent, in what he is attempting to do.

With that I suspect the member appreciates this may very well be coming to a dead end sooner rather than later. The New Democrats at this point would request unanimous consent to have Bill C-372 referred to committee for further study.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, this bill is an interesting concept and I congratulate the hon. member for Abitibi for having brought it forward.

He obviously has thought about the question that he has raised. I know he has persisted in attempting to file with the House his statement of expenses. I recognize this bill as the product.

[Translation]

This bill is the result of the efforts that he has been making in this House for a long time. I congratulate him on that but I do not think that this bill is a good one and it should not pass second reading.

[English]

What the member has proposed could be dealt with by by-law by the Board of Internal Economy. I have every reason to expect that something along these lines is being considered by that board. As the hon. member may be aware, I am not a member of it so I do not attend its meetings and I have no more information as to what goes on there than he has. But I am aware that the board has looked at the possibility of publicizing additional information about members' expenses than has been the case hitherto.

As he knows, the Public Accounts of Canada contain details of the expenses that members incur in travel. I understand the Public Accounts of Canada are delayed this year. The government does not have them ready. One suspects it is trying to fix the books; there is so much red ink in them that it has to get them printed in the proper way in black ink so that it does not show up.

Mr. Edwards: That is an imputation.

Mr. Milliken: No, no, no. I did not say that it had cooked the books. I avoided that. I said it is trying to fix the books and it has to get them fixed up. They are late. They should have been tabled two days after the Auditor General's report. That is the standard practice. Guess when they are coming before the House. It will be on December 10, the day before we adjourn, so we cannot ask any questions. That is what is going on.

However, aside from that, the figures will be published for travel. Last spring the management committee had before it the Auditor General who had completed a study on the House of Commons and the way it operated. The Auditor General was critical of the way this House reported on financial matters, particularly individual members, because members get many things provided for them by the House that are not charged to members' operating budgets. The recommendation the Auditor General made—and frankly in principle it is a very good recommendation—was that members' operating budgets be increased and they be charged for expenses they incur for which the House is currently paying.

That includes things like long distance telephone calls, office equipment that is available on the Hill, the travel budget generally which could be added to the member's operating budget and the expenses charged out against it, the stationery supplies which are currently provided for free, as well as householder expenses which could be charged to an operating budget.

In that way members would take some considerable responsibility for the expenses they incur instead of the current arrangement where since these things are provided for free the member is not encouraged to use any thrift or particular judgment in deciding whether or not to spend the money. The money is not accountable. The House absorbs the cost. It is free to the member so it is simply a matter of using a privilege that is extended and using it fully or less than fully. The fact is that the privilege is there.

I would be quite happy as a member to have my budget increased and then have the ability to spend the money in different ways within the budget, deciding what I think is a priority. If I consider travel a priority then I can opt for more travel. If I consider householders a priority, I can opt for more householders. If I consider telephone communication a priority, I can opt for more telephone calls and so on. That to me is the way the place ought to operate. I think it is fair and reasonable.

The question is: How much of that do we then report? Once members are on the same basis it is reasonable to expect that some reporting mechanism would follow so that people could see roughly how members spend their budgets. The total amount ought to be disclosed. The breakdown into various categories could be discussed, settled upon and made a subject of disclosure.

It is a matter for the Board of Internal Economy to deal with and pass a bylaw concerning, and members will then be bound by it. I do not think it is necessary to do it by amendment to the Parliament of Canada Act which is what the hon. member is proposing in this bill.

Some say with some justification that it would hardly be fair that a member who lives in Yellowknife, Whitehorse or Vancouver would have the same budget as somebody who lives in Ottawa or in Kingston. Fair enough. The budgets will clearly differ because the travel component has to reflect the difference in travel costs for these members.

Every member could be granted a base of travel amount to cover exceptional trips and then be allowed a reasonable amount for trips to and from the constituency. That could take up the bulk of the trips that are now given. As it is, members are encouraged to book their trip at any time they feel like, at whatever ticket price they can get, and there is no incentive imposed on members to take trips at the lowest possible rate or to seek to get an economy fare at any time. There is no advantage in doing so because the member does not have to account for the money and it is not charged to his or her operating budget.

If it were part of the budget and the member was spending the money and having to account for it, there would be a much greater incentive for saving. It makes sense that the Board of Internal Economy looks very carefully at such a proposal.

There are lots of ways the administration of the members' budgets could be cleaned up. I am not sure the proposal put forward by the hon. member goes far enough or anywhere near far enough in solving that problem, because there are so many expenses that are not reported now and would not be reported under this bill unless the changes that I have mentioned and that were recommended by the Auditor General were implemented at the same time.

I feel this bill is a little premature. I do not think it is worth proceeding with at this stage for the reasons I have outlined. It is appropriate that the member raised the issue here. I am glad it has been discussed in the House today. I support the principle of the bill, to the extent that I believe reporting is important for members of Parliament. I think the public has a right to know more about the way we spend our money. It is public money and I am quite happy to account for it.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate. I rise today to speak on this bill because I believe it raises the important concept of accountability to our constituents, to those who elect us to represent their views in the House and Parliament.

The purpose of the bill before us today is to require a disclosure of expenses made by members of the House of Commons in connection with their parliamentary functions. It would require that twice a year members of Parliament publicly declare their expenses.

This is a laudatory objective but one which at the moment I cannot support. I cannot support this bill at this time for two fundamental reasons. The first is because, as explained by the Auditor General, there are not the accounting systems yet in place to allow each member of Parliament to determine with any accuracy his or her expenses. Second, because it will lead to an unjust comparison between the ways in which each MP decides to fulfil his or her role as a member of Parliament.

As the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has just suggested, he might choose to put out more householders and do less travel to the riding or vice versa. That point was recognized by the Auditor General in his report of the audit to the House of Commons administration, a piece of bed-time reading with which I know Your Honour is very familiar. At page 2 the Auditor General under point 1.9 says: "A new approach to members' expenditures is needed. The House like all legislatures has a difficult balancing act. It must provide support to members to facilitate their work but yet do so with fixed resources. One of the simplest ways is to establish specific limits and restrictions. For example the House permits members to send annually no more than four newsletters, called householders. Although this no doubt curbs wasteful use or misuse, it restricts the member to some extent. For example the member who thinks that bi-monthly householders are a more effective way to communicate than frequent trips to the constituency, cannot make that choice".

• (1540)

Let us go back to the first reason as laid out by the Auditor General. We know that the Public Accounts of Canada list the expenses of each member of Parliament. These expenses are broken down into three categories by indemnities, by expense allowances and by travel expenses. Those are the three large categories of expenditures.

The Auditor General examined the House of Commons administration in 1991. I first of all would like to state that he clearly concluded that all provisions approved by the Board of Internal Economy were complied with in all but a few minor cases. He stated the transactions were accurately and completely recorded.

To return to the categories of expenditures displayed in the public accounts, the Auditor General stated that three categories of expenditures did not capture all expenditures of MPs. This is because the House of Commons budget provides services to each member which are not included in these three categories. In fact, the Auditor General stated that the public accounts cover only 37 per cent of members' expenditures.

A member uses a common pool of services but does not know the cost of his own use of those services. Those services include such things as printing, telephone, postage, et cetera. I do acknowledge that we can demand, as I do, a monthly print-out of our telephone bills in order to keep a watchful eye on that. I find that to be a useful control.

In addition to these services, there are also the research and media monitoring provided by the House of Commons. Procedures have been developed which allow us to allocate overhead costs to individual members. I submit that rendering accounts which are not complete and accurate would be a meaningless exercise. I also believe that it would lead to a sense by our constituents that they might have been deceived and thus the effect of the bill could be the opposite of what is intended.

The ultimate objective of such attribution of costs and disclosure would be to make MPs more cost conscious. I know that the hon. member for Abitibi believes that a 20 per cent reduction in Parliament's expenses could be achieved.

I am happy to note the work of the House management committee in this regard. Members are aware that in 1992 the committee for the first time undertook a vigorous and detailed study of the estimates of the House of Commons. The committee also made the budget planning document available to all members of the House and to the media. It was an important step in opening up the process and stimulating public and parliamentary debate on the cost of operation of the House of Commons.

In a further step the committee recommended that the area of MPs' travel should be reviewed to identify whether potential savings could be achieved. A large number of other issues were raised by individual members during the course of the committee work. These include privatization of various services and programs and reduction of the cost of householders.

I note that the hon. member who sponsored this bill sends only one householder per year, or previously did. I believe I heard him say that this year he had sent none, rather than the four which are permitted by our rules.

My principal objection to the bill is not with the concept of reducing costs, but how cost disclosure could be interpreted.

Let us look for a moment at what we would define as parliamentary functions. There are four main functions which Parliament fulfils: first, approval of supply or the funds necessary for the operation of government; second, law making by which policy principles and administrative mandates are approved; third, the calling to account of ministers under the framework of ministerial accountability; and, fourth, representing constituents in all of the above functions and acting as an intervener in the constituents' interactions with government. I wonder whether a dollar figure could be really attached to these functions? This is my second reason, which I mentioned earlier, for objecting to the bill.

I want to relate certain events in the life of three members of Parliament, all of which are true and none which will reveal the name of the member of Parliament. These stories will demonstrate why the fulfilment of parliamentary functions cannot be accounted for in dollars and cents.

The first has to do with a member who is no longer sitting in this House. He represented a riding in northern Ontario and several times a year he was able to organize visits to this place by his young native constituents. He would work tirelessly through the year with local service organizations to raise money to pay the fare of these young constituents and then he would cajole and bend some arms of his fellow MPs to have these young people stay with them while they were in Ottawa. These constituents would come to Parliament and watch this place in action. A colleague would take them in to Question Period, he would guide them into the Senate, he would sit with them in committee.

Over the course of several days this member of Parliament would pay for their meals. The constituents coming from small Indian reserves in northern Ontario would not have been able to feed themselves while away from home. This member wanted these young people to experience the democratic process of this place. He wanted them to see how Parliament worked. He paid for this from his salary and his expense allowance. Those are the hard facts and figures.

But how do we account for the hours and hours of effort in making the arrangements for these teenagers to come to Ottawa? How do we account for the patience and energy required to host these students and the simple spending of time with them?

The second story is a more recent one, Mr. Speaker. A member told me that his referendum committee from this fall did not break even. It needed more contributions to be able to pay off its debts. Regardless of what position any of the elected members of Parliament took in the referendum, we all recognized the right of Canadians to participate in it and the extraordinary exercise in democracy that the referendum was. We all gladly contributed our days and nights and every last bit of energy and wit we had to that exercise. Can we account in dollars and cents for that energy and wit?

Let us return to the question of the debt of the committee. How would that MP help that referendum committee in his riding? Well, he will organize and attend functions to raise the money necessary to pay off the debts.

My third story has to do with a member who is significantly interested in the legislative role of the MP. I know that over the course of three months on a major bill he met in committee three times per week, returning to his riding on each weekend to meet with his constituents. This MP's expenses were quite different from the previous two MPs. They were lower because of all his time spent in committee, interacting with policy experts and public servants in developing the best possible laws for this country.

The point of these stories is that each of us fulfils our function in different ways. That is one of the freedoms and the pleasures of being a member of Parliament. The way in which we fulfil our functions has different costs attached to them. It is not for me to say that my colleague who held so dearly the role of educating his young constituents about Parliament should not have done this because his expenditures might have been higher than those of another MP.

Could we say that the MP who spends more time in committee is a better MP because his costs are less than others? What is it we are measuring here?

Mr. Speaker, I would submit that a dollar accounting comparison between two MPs would not in the slightest reveal the value for dollar which the Auditor General says is the true measure of an accounting system.

The Auditor General stated in his 1991 audit of the House of Commons that he did not go beyond the documentation to consider the merits of individual transactions. I do not believe that anyone could. I do not believe that anyone could place a value on how each of us interprets and carries out our representative role.

In the 1992 report of the Auditor General he enunciated three over-all criteria for information for Parliament. These are relevancy, reliability and understandability.

To be relevant, and I quote: "The information should be meaningful, complete and timely."

To be reliable: "The claims made should be consistent from one information source or another, and over time."

To be understandable: "Anyone who is not an expert should be able to comprehend the information."

Because MPs carry out their functions in different ways, accounting for one MP would reveal very different information than for another MP. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to meet the criteria which the Auditor General believes should be met.

Publishing our individual accounts would need to be qualified about how we do our business. Such publication could lead to misplaced, misleading comparisons between members of Parliament. I do not believe that it would be right to value the most highly that member who spent the least amount of money and perhaps gave the most amount of heart to his job.

I believe that contrary to the intent of this bill, the effect could perversely be to impede democracy. For that reason I will not support the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

Shall I call it four o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being four o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 3.50 p.m.

NATIONAL SOLIDARITY DAY FOR THE FIRST NATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved that Bill C-268, an act respecting a national solidarity day for the First Nations of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to introduce Bill C-268 at second reading after some extensive but important consultations with the parties in this House after considerable discussion and consultation with aboriginal organizations and individuals throughout Canada.

I will be presenting petitions later today. I do not know whether there are hundreds of thousands of names, but there are certainly tens of thousands of names of aboriginal peoples from across the country who have signed a petition endorsing the general thrust of Bill C-268, an act respecting a national solidarity day for the First Nations of Canada.

I want to say right off the top that one of the positive aspects of this round of consultation was the suggestion for a change in the description of the bill. The explanatory note in the bill says that:

> This bill would ensure that, in each and every year, the 21st day of June is known as the "Aboriginal Solidarity Day".

There was a suggestion that would be a more appropriate way to title the bill as well because referring specifically to First Nations is not as inclusive as the term aboriginal suggests. If the bill proceeds to a legislative committee, this could easily be clarified through an appropriate amendment, making this bill more inclusive of all aboriginal people of Canada.

• (1110)

Today our country and aboriginal peoples are at a very crucial and critical point in the evolution of our history together. In terms of the movement now toward self-government, self-determination and self-reliance, aboriginal peoples have never been better poised for advancing these three causes and for advancing aboriginal cultures generally than they are today.

In the referendum process, one of the positive aspects enjoyed by many of us was working together with aboriginal organizations toward constitutional change which, in our judgment, would have enhanced the situation within Canada. It certainly would have enhanced the situation regarding aboriginal peoples. The leadership role played by Ovide Mercredi and other aboriginal leaders was nothing short of outstanding and extraordinary.

Personally, I had the opportunity of sharing almost all of the meetings, seminars, discussion groups and public forums with local aboriginal leaders in the Kamloops constituency.

I refer specifically to Chief Nathan Matthew who is not only chief of the Cheu Chua Band, the North Thompson Indian Band, but also the recently elected chief of the Shuswap Nation Tribal Council and also Chief Manny Jules from the Kamloops Indian Band. For many years now he has provided excellent and outstanding leadership along with his colleague, Nathan Matthew, toward advancing the cause of aboriginal peoples in British Columbia and throughout Canada generally.

I could also refer to a number of individuals representing different aboriginal communities, both reserve and off-reserve communities, who played outstanding leadership roles in the discussions on the referendum. They explained to the public what was meant by self-government, why it was important that aboriginal peoples become more self-determining and self-reliant and how this could be achieved in co-operation with the non-native communities. Their comments did a great deal in enhancing the understanding between native and non-native people.

This bill reflects the renewed and enhanced recognition, understanding and appreciation by non-native people of native people and native cultures generally.

The recent spate of movies has assisted this process. I do not think there is a single classroom that I visit in carrying out my responsibilities as a member of Parliament where young people do not raise questions about aboriginal peoples and cultures.

Young people ask questions regarding aboriginal aspirations within Canada. They ask questions in terms of an enhanced appreciation of aboriginal history within the Canadian context. It really moves me.

In a very short period of time we have made quantum gains in not only the advancement of aboriginal people but also the understanding, appreciation and recognition of that advancement by the non-native communities.

The day in the bill to be identified as the national solidarity day is June 21. First Nations people have identified this date as a day of celebration in terms of their own communities, accomplishments and aspirations.

I felt for our country as a whole it would be appropriate to set aside June 21. By definition, it is the day heralding the beginning of one of our seasons. It is the beginning of summer. It is the longest day of the year. It is the time for renewal and regeneration.

It is the perfect time out of the 365 days for all of us to say together, shoulder to shoulder, arm in arm that we move forward in solidarity in the best interest of the aboriginal and non-aboriginal communities of Canada.

Today I simply ask my colleagues to pass this bill on a voice vote to enable it to go quickly to a legislative committee meeting.

There may be other appropriate changes, but because it is a fairly straightforward bill the one suggested change would be to change First Nations day to the aboriginal solidarity day. That would make it more inclusive.

From the homework which has been done around this bill, it seems to have the virtual unanimous support of all aboriginal organizations and of thousands and thousands of individuals from aboriginal communities, including reserves, Métis communities and urban communities.

People have asked: Does this bill mean that there will be a national holiday on this day? The answer is no, this would not be a staff holiday. It would simply be a day set aside to appreciate the occasion. It is not that we would not want to do this throughout the year every day. It means there would be one specific day of celebration, a day of coming together to celebrate how much we have achieved. It would be to acknowledge the continuous development of our aboriginal communities from coast to coast to coast.

I ask my colleagues to see fit before the hour is out to pass this on a voice vote and allow the bill to go to the next stage of development.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to speak to Bill C-268 which proposes to designate June 21 as a national day for the recognition of aboriginal people in Canada.

Certainly, most Canadians are well aware that the contributions of aboriginal people to this country cannot in any way be underestimated.

I spent much of my life studying and teaching Canadian history. Quite frankly, one of the things we have not done well in teaching Canadian history is to recognize adequately the contribution of aboriginal people, or those we would probably call First Nations today, during the settlement period.

They played a vital role in assisting the survival of Europeans and in the fur trade. They were vital partners in the process and I particularly note the role women played in that process. The aboriginal people played a role in establishing the province of Manitoba in 1870. They played a role in the wars in which Canada has participated.

Certainly they play the roles as teachers, politicians, authors, athletes, business people, homemakers, et cetera. It has indeed been a very significant contribution and one which regretfully has gone largely unrecognized. Their heritage is a very important part of Canada's heritage and is one which should be honoured and valued.

The hon. member's bill is very worthy of our consideration and debate. This is particularly true as we approach 1993.

The United Nations has declared 1993 as the International Year of the World's Indigenous People. I think it is appropriate that the United Nations recognizes the contribution of indigenous people around the world in an appropriate fashion. In fact, the Government of Canada has been moving in that direction, in its own way, during the course of the last months. Agriculture Canada sponsored the first ever federal Aboriginal Awareness Week from May 20 to May 22. Just recently the department challenged other departments to participate and many have.

• (1120)

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development held a Native Awareness Day focusing on employment issues. Other federal departments are preparing to participate in the International Year for Indigenous People which begins on December 10, two days hence.

In approaching this issue, I believe there are some important matters which should be considered. First, it would be very important to hear from the aboriginal leadership on this issue because it is important that they be consulted and be a part in the process. One of the things that troubles me about aboriginal-government relationships during the course of the last few decades is that very often it is a case of one side doing something for the other side. There is a degree of implied paternalism and, in fact, real paternalism in that.

That process can no longer be accepted. What is important now is that the principle of partnership be very much agreed upon. Prior to the passage of such a motion, it would be important that consultation occur, and if there is agreement that this day should be recognized in this appropriate manner, then the wording of the bill would have to be influenced by that as well as the choice of the date.

I would also hope that such a day, provided it was agreed upon, would recognize the culture and the contribution of all aboriginal groups in Canada, non-status as well as status Indians, Inuit and Métis. This type of clarification would be helpful in securing the objective of the bill.

One of the difficulties I have with Bill C-268, as worded, is with the use of the word solidarity. This may be due to my own difficulty in understanding the meaning of that word. The word as used in our recent history has had political connotations and sometimes confrontational connotations. One of the things that should be consulted and considered during the consultation process is the use of that word. My personal opinion is that perhaps another word might be more appropriate.

The aboriginal people of Canada had a self-sustaining, self-supporting, self-government in place prior to the coming of the Europeans. It was a society which was not free, but relatively free of conflict. It was a society in which there was a very significant role for women as well as men. It was a society in which people were proud of their achievements.

There is a great deal which we in Canada today can learn from the role of aboriginals in our history as well as the result of their participation in today's society. It is important that we treat this proposal with respect just as it is very very important that we enhance our understanding of the aspirations of the aboriginal community as it exists today.

During the course of the weekend, when I was back in my constituency of Brandon, I had a fairly long discussion with one of the chiefs from a nearby community. While we did not agree on each and every point during the course of our discussion, I was reminded of the role of the First Nations in Canada. I would certainly suggest to the House that we should give very careful consideration to the principle of the motion which is before us.

Prior to reaching a resolution on this matter, I would suggest that we would want to consult very carefully with the aboriginal community itself to determine what its views are on this very important matter.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on Bill C-268. I must say that it is a nice gesture. At this point I think the only way we can look at it is as a nice gesture.

When the hon. member who spoke last said that the contributions of the aboriginal people cannot be underestimated, it is very true. I do not know why we say contributions to the people of Canada because it should not be regarded as that. It should be regarded as the things that aboriginal people have done on behalf of Canada.

Just last month the Inuit of the Eastern Arctic agreed to give to the Government of Canada 82 per cent of Nunavut, or 660,000 square miles, so the Government of Canada can have certainty over the land that it thinks it owns.

When we are talking about recognizing the contributions of the aboriginal people, we have to make some concrete decisions as to what we should recognize, acknowledge exactly what the aboriginal people have done. The government and other organizations should instantly recognize, by making available some things to the aboriginal people, rather than just through gestures like the recognition of the day. I can give some examples.

The Government of Canada just cut the CMHC housing on reserves to the point where aboriginal housing is in dire straits. It already was in dire straits and now it is in even worse condition. The government should immediately go back to pre-1991 funding from CMHC for aboriginal housing.

The people of Grise Fiord and Resolute Bay who were moved to those communities from northern Quebec have been asking for recognition, an apology, as well as $10 million to help them. The government moved these people to help maintain sovereignty over the Canadian Arctic. It should immediately move to do those things for the people of Grise Fiord and Resolute Bay.

The government should immediately move to counter the kind of ads which the International Fund for Animal Welfare, the anti-fur movement and the animal rights groups are putting out. The government should immediately counter those attacks.

One of the more bitter legacies of the last 300 to 500 years is the lack of spirituality issue and morale of the aboriginal people in Canada. If people had looked at the newspapers in the last few days they would have seen that in a particular community, Big Cove, New Brunswick, 75 native people, aboriginal people, have attempted suicide in the last year. People must wonder why these young people, most of whom are young men, are killing themselves. It is the despair on the reserves and the despair in the communities that are causing this. There should be a move by the government to do something about those matters. It is not a case of more money. It is a case of recognizing that these people have something to offer and maybe what they have to offer can help them get out of the deep despair a lot of communities and a lot of reserves are in.

These are only words. The government has not done the kind of work it should be doing. It should be countering all the things plaguing us today. The government can also do an awful lot for the aboriginal people of Canada by doing things like appointing qualified people. We have a lot of problems with the justice system that has been introduced or that we have had to live with for hundreds of years.

The government should move to appoint people like Judge Igloliorte from Labrador, Justice Sinclair from Manitoba or even the hon. member for Wetaskiwin to the Supreme Court. It should show its commitment to bettering the lives of aboriginal people by doing these things. It should do these things to ensure that the aboriginal people feel very much a part of Canada. It should do the things aboriginal people have been telling them to do, such as doing more for the environment and more about the land claims issues.

Still today the Government of Canada has an extinguishment policy where it asks all aboriginal people who will be negotiating comprehensive claims to extinguish their title to the land before they even sit down to negotiate.

It should do something about recognizing the languages and cultures of aboriginal people. There are 53 different aboriginal languages in Canada, yet not one of them is recognized nationally. Territorially we have seven aboriginal languages recognized in the Northwest Territories, but not one of them is recognized nationally.

It is a nice gesture but the government and other groups should make every day a day to honour the aboriginal people of Canada, the people who were here to welcome Christopher Columbus when he took a wrong turn trying to get to India. The government could show its commitment by telling the people of Canada that every day is a day to honour the aboriginal people of Canada. Every day is a day to recognize the contributions of the aboriginal people of Canada.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this motion. I hope, if we are to make this gesture, that it will not be an empty gesture but one that will recognize and do more than has ever been done for the aboriginal people of Canada.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words on this matter.

My colleagues have addressed it in a number of ways. I was interested to hear a couple of the comments of my colleague from Nunavut, which I guess will be the new name of the constituency as rightly it should be, about recognizing aboriginal people every day.

One interesting result of the very difficult times we have seen in the last years as we have discussed our Constitution has been a change in attitudes dealing with aboriginal people and aboriginal issues. There has been a change in understanding not only of aboriginal people but thankfully in the attitude of non-aboriginal people in relation to those people and a greater understanding of the historical and cultural contribution of aboriginal people.

I question myself all the time on this point, but I genuinely believe there is a new commitment among Canadian people not only to resolve the problems plaguing aboriginal people for hundreds of years but also to recognize that the tremendous number of problems and challenges aboriginal and northern people face are not problems of their own creation and that solutions are found in the attitudes and actions of all of us in this country.

In coming forward with a solution like this one perhaps we can focus on a number of things, like education. If we can focus the resolve of governments, the resolve of the community and the resolve of interest and support groups on looking at some of the concerns and at what some of the solutions might be, we as a country will be stronger and much better off.

People have said to me in the past that the issues of different provinces are not issues that pertain to them. Some of the historical concerns and some of the history and culture of Quebec, for instance, are of no relationship to Newfoundlanders and Labradorians.

I have always argued and I firmly believe that whatever the history of a particular people or a particular group of people, be it the history of Quebec, the history of Ukrainian people in western Canada or the history of those people who came and developed the Fraser River in British Columbia, it is as much a part of the history and the culture of modern day Newfoundland and Labrador as our history and culture, as diverse as they are, are part of theirs. Inevitably we can find connections.

What has happened to all of us collectively, even though there may have been no relationship, impacts on all of us today and in the future. It is something we should feel proud of and, however vicariously, take some ownership of and feel some possession of. Perhaps there is no other group in this country than the first people of this country, those people who came here perhaps 35,000 and 40,000 years ago in some cases. They were the people who were here when the European settlers came. They were the people who welcomed the European settlers as early as 1497 in the case of eastern Canada, and I suspect probably 500 years before that when the Norse came to L'Anse aux Meadows on the northern island of Newfoundland. If we can begin to understand they are part of our history then we are taking the first step to ensuring that we are sensitive in everything we do to that particular history, to that initial ownership and to that initial possession.

Aboriginal people lived, farmed, hunted, fished and occupied this land. They had governments that allowed well developed, highly developed cultures and societies not only to function as individual entities but to relate to each other and to develop structures that allowed for a reasonable and sensible ongoing day-to-day and long term living together.

We consider that the base of self-government. It is not something government gives or even the Constitution gives. It is something we should all recognize. We all have to recognize that aboriginal people particularly are facing challenges more and greater than the rest of us in many cases. The whys of that is something I suppose we could debate for a long period of time.

I can say without much fear of contradiction that a lot of it has resulted from a total lack of understanding of aboriginal people, their communities, their societies, their traditions, their histories, their cultures, the way aboriginal people relate to each other, and frankly today the way aboriginal people want to relate to the rest of the country and would like the rest of the country to relate to them.

If we can get some better understanding of that in terms of knowledge, in terms of education and in the end in terms of some practical application of how it is, we can come together to help resolve these problems. But the coming together has to be a recognition that we must, as we do in so many other cases, provide the tools, provide the opportunities and provide the resources for aboriginal people to continue to develop the societies and the cultures that played such a huge role in the development of this country in a very positive and very substantial way.

We must help aboriginal communities maintain the sense of tradition as so many of the rest of us do and insist upon. Unfortunately from time to time we are prepared to deny it to others. We should be able to apply that and help it be applied to 1992 and the year 2000 and beyond. We should be able to say to aboriginal people that how they govern themselves is critical to their ability to grow, to flourish and to carry on. The rest of us should have the ability and the willingness and the understanding to be able to support that process.

Frankly June 21 is as good a day as could we come up with. We have seen it reflected in the Dene and the celebrations they have had of recognition. The aboriginal communities in Toronto have done the same. The AFN in its old form in the past has used the same date. It is symbolic in many ways. It is symbolic in a lot of cultures but no more important than in aboriginal cultures.

I hope we can use it as well to recognize there is not one group of aboriginal people. They are hugely diverse peoples and nations, very diverse cultures, very diverse ethnic backgrounds and very diverse histories. Understanding that difference is essential in understanding the aboriginal people.

I congratulate my colleague across the way for trying to bring some of this together. As my colleague from Brandon—Souris has raised, there are perhaps some concerns about the way the bill is written. There are some concerns that it include all people, but I think the message is important. We should say to Canadians that it is in all our interests and it is to all our benefit to understand and to express our support for aboriginal people in coming to grips with their concerns. It has to be symbolic but it has to be practical. It cannot simply be a pat on the head. For too long, unfortunately, it has been just that.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I am more than pleased to stand this morning to speak to Bill C-268, an act cited as a National Day of Solidarity for the First Nations of Canada Act.

I think it is most appropriate that June 21 be the day set aside for this day of solidarity. The first day of summer strikes me as being a time, particularly in Canada, that takes on a significance that only those who live in the northern climes can appreciate. That being the case, I would suggest that it also reflects on the appreciation which we as Canadians have for our First Nations.

There is no way in which we as a nation can make up for past injustices to our First Nations. I am reminded of an incident which occurred just this last summer. I was canvassing door to door but I happened to meet someone on the street. I saw them coming toward me and, as I got closer, I recognized the person as being a young aboriginal person. I stopped and introduced myself, said hello to him and asked how things were going. He said: "Not too well; I have lost my land".

I come from a farm. I suppose all Canadians are well aware that farmers are losing their land at a rather record pace. In my naivety I thought perhaps he was from the agricultural community and had lost his farm. I said: "I am terribly sorry to hear that. Where is your land?", to which he replied: "We are standing on it".

That just goes a short way toward exemplifying the depth to which the aboriginal people have suffered and the understanding as well among themselves of how much they have suffered and how far they have to go. I grant that the setting aside of a day of solidarity with our First Nations is not going to erase the past wrongs, and there are others which I think should probably be mentioned.

I recently discovered something, much to my chagrin, because my ancestry is Scottish. Some of my ancestors came to this country and availed themselves of the ability to acquire land very, very cheaply. It was known as homesteading, a way of settling the west, which certainly the country needed. To my horror, I discovered that our native people were not able, whether they were treaty Indians or whether they were Métis, to become homesteaders, at least without giving up their heritage and without giving up their treaty rights. That is certainly an outrage that cannot be corrected, but an outrage nonetheless and something for which certainly our aboriginal people are suffering yet today.

The fact is these people had inhabited the land for century after century after century. They had developed in the country, on the land, forms of government which suited themselves extremely well, and of course which we know today would, can and must still hold them in very good stead. Of course, I am talking about their inherent right to self-government. It certainly has been demonstrated that they are eminently qualified to be able to do that.

• (1150)

As well, as a western Canadian, I am aware of the devastation that was caused by forcing the aboriginal people on to reserves. I am also aware of the piracy which occurred when after the reserves were set up, those who were in charge, those who were in control, those who were in power of authority proceeded post-haste to illegally take back many, many of the acres and many, many parts of the best farmland in the different provinces from those to whom it had been promised.

Just recently in the province of Saskatchewan, the Canadian and provincial governments have gone a short way toward rectifying some of those injustices, but nonetheless there is much more which has to be done. That is a concrete way of rectifying some of the faults which we have perpetrated in the past.

In conclusion, I congratulate my colleague from Kamloops for having brought forward this motion. I certainly ask that members unanimously support its furtherance through the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since there are no further speakers on this bill, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the time and that there are no further speakers on this bill. After listening carefully to all of the interventions, which were very thoughtful from all sides of the House, there seems to me to be unanimity in having this bill referred to a legislative committee.

At this point, I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to seek unanimous consent to have this bill sent to a legislative committee for further study.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is not unanimous consent.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—GOVERNMENT ECONOMIC POLICY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East) moved:

That this House condemn the government's continued adherence to its failed economic policy of trickle-down misery.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since today is the last allotted day in the supply period ending December 10, 1992, the House will proceed, as usual, to consideration and passage of a supply bill.

Considering our recent practice, is it agreed to have the bill distributed now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, since many members wish to speak to this motion, we in our caucus have decided to share our speaking time. In other words, we will each take 10 minutes.

[English]

Canada has the highest unemployment rate in the western world; higher than Britain, France, Italy, Germany, Japan and the United States.

An hon. member: Shame.

Ms. Copps: Yet once again last week we heard the government say that it has the fundamentals right, that it will stay the course, that it is doing a good job.

In the United States, the unemployment rate is 7.2 per cent and President-elect Clinton has called it a national disgrace. He has called for a massive program to put people back to work. In Canada, the unemployment rate is 11.8 per cent and this government has cut benefits for the jobless.

An hon. member: Shame.

Ms. Copps: Two days after the Minister of Finance tabled an economic statement in which he said one more time that the recession is over, the unemployment rate has once again reached a record high; 1,650,000 in jobless lines. The Minister of Finance calls people who are worried about the unemployed bleeding hearts.

The Minister of Finance says the way to kick-start the economy is to kick people when they are down. The Minister of Finance says the ways to attack unemployment is to attack the unemployed. The Minister of Finance says the way to attack poverty is to attack the poor. There are millions of people in this country who cannot afford to put presents under their Christmas tree this year and who cannot even afford to provide a Christmas dinner for their children. It is not like they cannot afford a Christmas turkey with stuffing and cranberry sauce. They cannot afford a grilled cheese sandwich. They will have to rely upon Christmas baskets from charitable organizations to feed their kids on December 25.

The minister of employment calls them couch potatoes. It is not like they cannot afford Air Jordan basketball shoes and Nintendo Game Boys for their kids. They cannot afford shoes or any games for their kids. The minister of employment accuses them of wanting to spend their winters in Florida.

Millions of people who are still employed are terrified about whether they will be able to hang on to their jobs. They are worried they will be the next out on the street and the minister of employment calls them rip off artists and bums.

In a desperate effort to appeal to a right-wing constituency in a budget last week that I parallel as almost an instant replay of the Republican convention last summer, the government has chosen to destroy hope for all those who are down on their luck. In a desperate effort to give the Prime Minister another couple of months to make up his mind whether he is going to quit or not, this government, with no constructive agenda, has decided to stick it to the weakest members of our society.

While the Prime Minister will be spending his Christmas at 24 Sussex, millions of other Canadians will be at the Shepherds of Good Hope, the Salvation Army soup kitchen or the local food bank. While the Minister of Justice is in Vancouver planning her leadership bid, thousands of her constituents will be figuring out how to tell their children that Santa Claus is not coming this year. While the Secretary of State for External Affairs is planning her leadership bid, thousands of Torontonians will be lining up to collect welfare. While the Minister of Communications is travelling around Ontario in his bid, 600,000 jobless Ontarians will go to bed realizing that the ministers in this government consider them to be the dregs in society.

In a despicable attempt to try to gain support among people who do have jobs, this government is prepared to sacrifice the one in five Canadians who do not have jobs. This government is hoping to get re-elected by proving that it can beat up on the little guy. The government plans to cut hundreds of thousands of people off unemployment insurance so that it can claim that it has reduced the official unemployment rate. It does not care that it is going to throw thousands and thousands of people on to the welfare lines. It will not help the unemployed. It will recategorize them.

This Conservative government is so afraid of losing its spot at the top that it is playing for time by destroying the lives of thousands of people at the bottom of the economic ladder. The truth is the government has no agenda, but it does not have the guts to call an election now and it does not care how many lives will be destroyed in its effort to cling to power over the next few months.

The Prime Minister used to say that every Canadian government had a moral responsibility to call an election after four years in power. This government has been in power more than four years, but that promise, like every other promise of the Prime Minister, has turned to dust.

The truth is that this motion underlines to Canadians the truth that this Conservative government is morally, philosophically and politically bankrupt and bereft of ideas. It is a tired old government that has run out of steam, has nothing new to offer and is flailing around like a cornered rat.

I could read the statistics. Long term unemployment rose from 425,000 to 806,000 Canadians. The number of part-time workers who would like to be working full time, involuntary part-time workers, rose from 409,000 to 662,000 people. The number of people who have given up rose from 101,000 to 141,000. The number of unemployed parents supporting children rose from 305,000 to 444,000. The hours lost by people who would like to be working longer hours, but who have shortened their hours to keep their companies and their fellow workers working, increased by 52 per cent.

[Translation]

According to the statistics, in Montreal alone 215,000 people are unemployed. At this very moment, one out of four persons in Montreal is living on unemployment insurance benefits or welfare.

• (1210)

In this region, 615,000 people are living below the poverty line.

These are beyond statistics. Last week in my office I had the opportunity of meeting with an unemployed steel worker and his wife. His name is Andy McQuarrie. He says that I can talk today about his circumstance. I think that his circumstance reflects the circumstances of thousands of other Canadians. He is a 54 year-old man who worked for a company for 21 years. He was a good employee. That company, Canadian Building Systems, went south. The member for Winnipeg South says: "Lay it on".

Andy McQuarrie would like to know what this government is doing for a 54 year-old man with 21 years of service to his company, who not only is suffering from the government's cutbacks on unemployment, but who finds himself at the age of 54 with a 16 year-old daughter at home that he is trying to support. He has a wife and family and an education level that is not great because he left school for the work force at grade nine. At age 54, with a slight hearing problem and a back problem, he is told that he should get retrained and get back and become a productive member of the work force.

Andy McQuarrie wants to work. Andy McQaurrie has been out there every day. He sold his house because he could not afford the mortgage and this month he cannot afford to pay his rent. There are literally thousands of people like Andy McQuarrie who were looking to this government last week for some hope, who were looking for a sign, a signal that maybe Bill Clinton's change in economic thinking in the United States will trickle over to Canada. What he saw instead was a government that was prepared to penalize the down to try and ensure that they are out.

Our message to this government is that it is about time that it is out. We hope that this non-confidence motion will pass so that some Canadians will finally understand that every member in this Parliament does not support the heartless move of this government as enunciated by the Minister of Finance last week.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to what my colleague said, which affects everyone, even the member for Winnipeg, despite her silly comments earlier.

This morning, I too contacted my riding office before coming here and almost all cases this morning were constituents who came to say: "Mr. Boudria, you are in Ottawa. Can't you do something to find me a job, because I haven't worked for months?"

I admit that we cannot do everything, we cannot do the impossible, but at least we could have done something. Could we not at least have had an infrastructure program that would help people in construction, for example, not to shovel air but to do work that already needed to be done, like repairs?

I take Perley Bridge in my riding as an example. It is certainly not a pretty sight. This bridge needs to be replaced. The sewers in our cities like Hamilton, Hawkesbury and Alexandria and our sidewalks are projects that need to be done. I think it is past time that we just have useless make-work projects, if there ever was a time for that. Should we not have invested in that infrastructure which our cities, towns, villages and country need and at the same time restore hope for those people who need it so much, those whom my colleague was just talking about?

Ms. Copps: Absolutely, Mr. Speaker, and that is what Canadians expected last week from the Minister of Finance's mini-budget.

They talked about spending a lot of money on starting infrastructure projects, an idea already supported by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, Mayor Jean Doré in Montreal, Bob Morrow in Hamilton and a number of other mayors. The Leader of the Opposition said, in the House and elsewhere, that the right time to go ahead with this kind of project was when we were in the middle of a devastating recession, which has now been going on for 30 months. Funding for such projects should be released when times are difficult, when the need is there, not just when the economy is starting to recover.

When the Minister of Finance says the recession is a world-wide phenomenon, he is right. However, two years ago here in the House, the former Minister of Finance admitted that he had decided to create a recession in Canada in order to cool down an overheated economy in Toronto. That is what he said. Right in the middle of a world-wide recession, the former Minister of Finance decided to pursue a policy in this country which merely made a bad situation worse.

The government says this is a world-wide phenomenon and nothing can be done about it, but these are the same people whose policy it was to keep interest rates and the dollar high—a dollar that was very high in relation to the American dollar. What a coincidence. This was just after it decided to sign the free trade agreement. It is clear that pursuing a high dollar and high interest rate policy at the very moment the government signed a free trade agreement with the United States merely brought things to a head, and this is exactly what made a bad situation for worse.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to rise to deal with the opposition motion. This motion is very timely because of the belief of Canadians, as reported in the media and by forays of different ministers of the government, that in essence where we are today is simply no fault of the government; in essence, what has happened is that the Conservative government's policy has to be the way it is because its hands are tied.

One issue we have to talk about in this place in a debate like this is solutions. We have to talk about ideas that we have as members of Parliament that will help our constituents and Canadians in general to feel that there is some hope and to understand that we in this place are dealing with issues that are of utmost importance in their minds.

What concerns me the most in this whole debate so far and in this last eight years of Tory rule is that they have continued to perpetuate the myth that the federal government's hands are tied. They say we have a deficit and therefore they cannot afford to help Canadians. The attitude is that market forces will lead the recovery and that we will get out of the recession if we leave it in the hands of the business community; that if we allow the U.S. to get back on its feet, it will lead the recovery and that, indeed, will usher in better times for Canadians.

The Canadian government and the Canadian people are in grave trouble. Let us look at the facts. Unemployment is at roughly 1.7 million people, welfare at 2.3 million Canadians. That is a total of roughly four million people. It is not easy to say in this House that there are four million Canadians who are not participating in the economy, not active contributors to the policies we would like to put forward in order to build the hopes and aspirations of Canadians.

I want to talk a little bit about the Conservatives' policies as they relate to those particular Canadians, and indeed about the lack of policy. We all know that Canadian employers and employees pay roughly $20 billion toward the unemployment insurance system. That is a lot of money. That money is mainly used for income maintenance.

Why is it if Canadians are unemployed or on welfare, they are being paid to a certain extent to stay home because they cannot find employment, to stay home because they have no hope of finding a job, to stay home because they are not educated in some of the industries that are going to be the main industries of the future? That is a very obvious question that should be asked, and one that we should very comprehensively deal with in this place.

It is important for us as Canadians and as members of Parliament to put forward suggestions. Why is there not a national apprenticeship program in this country to try to help those without the tools to get employment in certain industries to move on to other industries? Is it a fact that a 54-year old man is not capable of being retrained? The pundits say so. I do not agree with that. There are people in this country, no matter what their age, who have the abilities to be trained in a particular area in which jobs may be created.

Why is it that instead of having people collecting unemployment through an income maintenance system they are not asked to go into some sort of co-op system? In such a system we would ask employers across the country, in Ontario for example, whether they would take an unemployed person who is on UI, and has no hope of getting a job, for a certain amount of weeks and months. We would continue to pay that individual's unemployment insurance as we are anyway and they would have the opportunity to go to work every day through a co-op program and learn some other trade. Why is that not possible? Why can we not give Canadians that kind of policy initiative to give them hope?

The government likes to say that there are a lot of Canadians who just do not have the skills, and that is true. However, why do we not put together an initiative to allow Canadians to go into the colleges and universities that are available to us and enter a program that would give them the skills to go into the work force at some future date?

We have all the infrastructure, the infrastructure of the colleges and the universities and the infrastructure of the existing business community. It is already there. Why do we continue to just pay income maintenance to Canadians to stay home and collect unemployment and welfare? We could put that kind of initiative together and put those four million Canadians to some use for the good of all of Canada and at the same time give them hope that eventually they will be able to get a job that they can call their own.

In other countries they have completely changed gears concerning the unemployed. They have completely changed gears concerning people on welfare. However, here in this country we continue to say that eventually market forces will put those people back to work. They will not because times have changed.

It is incumbent on us, as members of Parliament, to establish policy initiatives that will put these people back to work, that will train them and give them some sort of hope that eventually they will be back in the work force where they rightfully belong.

The Conservatives' economic policy, or the lack of such, is what we are talking about today. The myth they continue to perpetuate that their hands are tied and they cannot do anything because of the deficit we have is completely unacceptable. If we continue to use that kind of philosophy this country will get into bigger trouble than it already is.

Let me give an example as it relates to regional development. In northern Ontario there is a regional development program called FEDNOR. It has a particular mandate to diversify the economy. That is what its mandate is. It has to set the rules and regulations by which the business community can access certain loans and grants.

The other day I put forward a very legitimate concern of a very large constituency in my riding, the agricultural community. We have been working for the last 20 years in Kenora—Rainy River to have a port of entry into Minnesota. Minnesota is a very protectionist state. It does not allow the export of agricultural commodities through northern Ontario into Minnesota.

Lo and behold, we get this beautiful free trade agreement. I have written probably 10 letters to the Minister of Agriculture in the last four years letting him know about the difficulties of the agricultural community. We even gave him some solutions. We entered into a discussion with the state of Minnesota to open this port of entry so the agricultural community can diversify itself.

One of the things that Minnesota so desperately needs, and which we can provide, is slaughter cattle. It is a very normal commodity. What do we do now as northerners in Ontario? We ship our slaughter cattle all the way to Manitoba through North Dakota and back to Minnesota. That costs an extra $800 per trip for transportation.

I have asked the minister on numerous occasions to examine that very simple thing we can do as members of Parliament to give that particular industry and the agricultural community a chance to make a go of it in that area. All I have got so far is political rhetoric.

Those are the kinds of issues that we are dealing with today in the House. These are the reasons why the motion put forward by my colleague is so important. We as backbenchers can stand up and talk about these kinds of issues and the government should not hold its head down in shame but listen to what we have to say. Maybe it could take a look at this initiative, put it forward, and help the community. Then this country will start to work a little more efficiently.

There are some other initiatives that we would like to talk about, and I would like to talk about, in the mining and forestry sector, but this government seems to think that it cannot get involved. If anyone believes on that side of the House that governments cannot take an active role in making our economy work then they are really stuck on an ideological bent that will not get them anywhere in the future in making this country as truly great as it should be.

I hope that during the debate—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time of the hon. member has now expired.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the hon. member for all of his good suggestions. They make some sense.

However, I wonder if he knows that the current federal government, which he and his colleague have spent such a lot of time denigrating, has set aside $3.8 billion for retraining to ensure that people who are out of work through no fault of their own have an opportunity to come back into the work force and have a rewarding and productive experience in the future.

I also wonder if he is aware that we have another quarter of a billion dollars set aside for sectoral training, which will be undertaken through advisory committees in conjunction with the labour movement. The hon. member says that we have not used the resources to try to help people who are in this category and who need help. How can he say that in light of the truth and the facts that I have just laid before him?

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, the numbers speak for themselves. I find it almost unbelievable that the member would stand up and say: "We have $3.8 billion in training and we have so many dollars in sectoral training". The reality is we have four million Canadians who are not working or are on welfare.

Let us put that in clearer terms.

• (1230)

That is like saying that B.C. and Alberta, the two furthest provinces to the west, are completely unemployed, not working, or on welfare.

When we take that kind of situation and put it in its proper context tinkering around with the system is not what we are talking about. We saw in the economic statement put forward last week a continuation of the tinkering with the system that is making the situation worse. We are asking for initiatives by the government that will revamp the unemployment insurance system, that will make it a training regime rather than an income maintenance system. That is what we are talking about. For example, in my riding in the last four years there have been some major layoffs in the mining community.

We are not suggesting for a moment that in the mining community mines will not close down. For example, in Ignace 250 people were laid off permanently in the mining industry in that community because the mine was shut down.

What is the government's policy to deal with major closures in single industry towns like Ignace? We also know in the province of Ontario that there are going to be other mines, with large work forces, that will shut down in the near future. What is the government going to do when that inevitable situation occurs? It cannot continually say that is too bad.

There must be a policy, an initiative, so that we are ready to deal with those individuals who happen to be 25, 35, 45, and be prepared to do something and not say: "Go on UI until it runs out", or in this case, because of the simple little change the government made, tell them to use up all their severance, and in some cases the only savings they have, which takes a good year, and then go on UI for another year, and then maybe convince them to go into some sort of training program—if there is anything available.

That is the issue we are dealing with. The $3.8 billion figure is a nice number. It sounds really good, but does it meet the needs of Canadians when there are four million Canadians sitting at home wondering if they will ever work again?

It would if this government could say to us that eventually over time, with its policies, it believes that unemployment will be 6 per cent and showed us how many people will be working and trained, if it said: "These are the demographics and how it is all structured". However, that is not what we are hearing. We are hearing that there is restructuring, period, and because of that restructuring there are going to be some very difficult times which will have to be accepted.

I do not think Canadians are prepared to accept that, and the government will see in the next election that they are not. They want initiatives by their members of Parliament, by governments at all levels, that will make the economy grow but at the same time give them some hope.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, today's opposition motion condemns our government for adhering to its economic policies and clearly suggests that our policies are the source of Canada's slow growth and industrial difficulties.

There are at least two clear and basic problems with that simplistic and self-serving attack.

First, it implies that Canada is somehow isolated from today's global economy, that we are this little island in the northern hemisphere that can crawl into its shell and not pay attention to what is going on around the world.

Second, it tries to suggest that the government is doing little or nothing to help the economy and the people who are facing hardship.

Let me point out that by using the phrase "trickle down" the hon. member's motion is obviously trying to equate our policies with those of the administrations of the United States. What the hon. member ignores, and I believe clearly hopes that Canadians will not realize, is that in Canada the federal government already plays a more involved role in the economy than does the federal government of the United States.

My hon. friend from Hamilton East used an excess of verbiage this morning. She was quoting the Minister of Finance to the people of Canada. She attributed to him a number of statements that obviously the Minister of Finance has never, ever uttered. I want the hon. member to produce those quotes to the House, all those things she attributed to the Minister of Finance today. Anyone who knows the Minister of Finance knows that he would not make the statements the hon. member attributed to him this morning.

Let me return to the main issue here. We all realize that Canada is only slowly recovering from what has been a very painful and prolonged recession. The economy is still weak and unemployment is much too high. People in businesses everywhere are feeling the painful consequences. It is also true that only by recognizing the underlying causes behind our difficulties, the interplay of global pressures and Canada's competitive ability, can any government implement effective policies to win firm and lasting economic success and security. That is the basis of the policies we have put in place.

These are policies that look ahead to Canada's medium term needs rather than superficial quick fixes. This is where we differ so dramatically from the opposition. What little economic plan it offers seems to emphasize nothing but supposed quick fixes. Of course that should be no surprise. It was its emphasis on short-term crutches in past periods of economic difficulty that helped diminish our competitive muscle and has left Canada so vulnerable to economic weaknesses today. That is the opposition's legacy and its formula again for the future.

Canada cannot afford yet another dose of Liberal steroids and snake oil. Instead, to create jobs and boost our standard of living, we must make sure the actions we take today do not leave us weaker tomorrow. That is one of the guiding principles behind our policies and actions.

Let me again remind the opposition why the Canadian economy is not as strong as all of us would like. It reflects many factors. Some of them are beyond our control such as the ongoing weakness of our trading partners. Canada is one of the most trade dependent nations in the world. When other major economies slow down sharply our economy suffers. Other factors beyond our control include the negative effects of foreign subsidies on grain prices which has hurt our agricultural sector. As well, weak world commodity prices have had a harsh impact on companies and workers in sectors like mining and in forestry. We also face problems like the disappearance of east coast fish stocks.

Canadians are also being affected by the difficult process of industrial restructuring that companies must apply if they want to survive, succeed and provide jobs in this fast changing global market. That is never mentioned by the opposition. Many of Canada's current economic problems are the inevitable consequence of the excesses of the 1980s, the reduction in our ability to compete caused by poor productivity and business cost performance, high levels of corporate and personal indebtedness and the poor state of government finances that was inherited in 1984.

These are problems that took years to build up and take time to be corrected. It is also a fact that our government has made real progress in reversing these trends, progress we must maintain for Canada's economic future. The questions we have to ask concern what is being done now. Unfortunately the opposition is much better at bugling complaints about what we are doing than offering reasonable alternatives.

The first thing to do is to recognize that there are limits to what governments can do to get the economy going again in the short term. I understand the opposition's position: oppose, oppose, oppose. That is why it is called the opposition. We must recognize there are limits to what we can do.

• (1240)

We as governments do not have resources of our own that we can simply go out and spend and create jobs and incomes. The resources of Canada's governments come from one place only, and that is Canadian citizens. Government spending is paid either by the citizens of today or by the citizens of tomorrow because government borrowing now leads to heavy taxes and reduced services in the future.

We also have to realize that taking more money from some citizens to give to others will not do much to stimulate the economy and restore confidence. Most Canadians feel our national tax burden is already too high. Taking more money from the citizens of tomorrow through increased borrowing is just a bad solution.

Canadian governments are so indebted now that increased borrowing may just cause Canadians to expect higher taxes in the future, leading consumers to hold back on spending even more. At the same time increased borrowing could cause lenders, especially those in other countries, to worry about the government's financial ability to repay its borrowing. It is a vicious circle. This could result in higher interest rates for all Canadians, creating further economic problems.

Despite the limits on government resources there are two important areas where governments can and I believe must act. The first is action directly to help Canadians deal with lost jobs and falling incomes. We are doing this.

People often take for granted the resources that the federal government provides to help cushion economic weakness. For example, more than one-third of all federal government spending goes to provide direct income support to people. This includes unemployment insurance, old age security and assistance to children. As well the federal government makes substantial payments to provinces to help fund other social assistance and medicare. There is also spending on regional development.

Most important, this spending continues even when a recession cuts government revenues. In other words, when the economy is weak governments actually increase the share of their revenues that go to assist Canadians, especially those most vulnerable to hard times. This contributes to restoring economic growth.

We must also recognize that these automatic stabilizers can be a mixed blessing. When the economy is weak, government automatically takes in less taxes. Revenue is down and this reduces the pressure on reduced incomes, but it also means an increase in the deficit. This is happening now. Unless we take action the deficit will continue to climb adding new pressure to interest rates.

The second thing government must do is respond to the underlying economic problems Canada is facing, particularly our poor national productivity record. Increased productivity is a key to improving Canada's competitiveness at home and I guess very important in our vital trade markets. Raising Canada's productivity growth requires that all stakeholders in the economy work together so that we can invest more in capital, technology, education and workers' skills.

The key role that governments can play in helping is to establish first a climate that supports and rewards productive investment. The opposition does not talk about that. The second is to help Canadian workers and businesses adjust to the economic restructuring that is now taking place. The opposition does not recognize that restructuring is going on. It says we are using it as an excuse. The third is to create the secure trading opportunities that allow Canada to increase its sales to world markets. What do opposition parties want to do? They want to tear up the trade agreement.

The federal government has been doing all these things to help our economy. We have improved the climate for investment by getting inflation and interest rates down and through tax reform. We have reoriented our labour market support toward provision of training and help in adjusting. We have pursued trade agreements that secure Canada's access to its export markets. We are committed to adding to those positive actions.

That is why last week's Fiscal and Economic Statement announced wide-ranging initiatives to bolster further public and private investment in economic growth while also reducing the cost of government. These actions are built on the policies which are already increasing Canada's productivity and competitiveness.

Let me remind hon. members once again of the highlights of this action plan for real, sustained growth and secure lasting job creation.

Over the last decade the small business sector has created 80 per cent of new full-time jobs. To help this vital sector the government is launching a small business employment and investment package. Under this package most small businesses will be able to add new workers without paying initial unemployment insurance premiums in 1993. This will reduce the cost of hiring additional workers by up to $1,600 each.

Other actions include a 10 per cent small business investment tax credit for machinery and equipment purchases. Rules on investment in small businesses by RRSPs and other funds will be simplified and investment options expanded. Programs that provide financial assistance are being expanded or extended. This is for small business. These are the things small businesses said would help them during these economic times. The government has listened to them and they were announced by the Minister of Finance.

Research and development as we all know is a key to developing the new products and processes that deliver competitive successes and growth in the global marketplace. There are still areas where tax rules could be improved to help business adapt and grow in an area of knowledge based work and technical change. We set aside $400 million over five years to remove tax base impediments to innovation and growth. In an increasing knowledge based economy Canada's economic prospects depend more and more on the skills of its people.

The government is helping to meet this challenge. Our support for worker training and adjustment, as my colleague from Winnipeg pointed out earlier, will be increased to $3.8 billion next year. Part of this, funds for developmental training use under the UI program, will grow to $2.2 billion. That is up from $1.9 billion last year and just $550 million in 1990. That is a big increase. That shows the priority the government is placing on training. The increase will be used to meet the special needs of long service workers who lose their jobs, the type of person that my hon. friend from Hamilton East was mentioning this morning.

The government will also help workers and employers make learning and skills upgrading a constant priority. The government will provide $250 million over five years to help lever a national training effort driven by labour and business. It will develop tax incentives to help defray the costs of training workers to meet these occupational standards.

A nation's infrastructure, such national assets as transportation and communications, can provide an important competitive advantage in the new global economy. Based on savings and other activities the government is committing an additional $500 million to pursue specific strategic opportunities. In the next five years these initiatives will result in infrastructure of some $2 billion and directly generate 4,000 to 5,000 jobs a year.

We are taking direct action to help the people of Canada. A tax cut will take effect January 1, 1993. This will put $1.2 billion back into the economy. It is an economic stimulus, modest but important.

We also announced the 1993 unemployment insurance premium rates for both employers and employees would be frozen at 1992 levels. This leads me to the federal deficit and the challenge it presents us.

It is because of excessive deficit spending during the 1970s and 1980s that our government faces tough limits on what we can do to boost the economy today. We have to break this vicious cycle of borrow and spend if we are going to create a truly strong and prosperous economy.

To achieve this goal we are taking further strong action to reduce federal operating costs. All our new initiatives will be paid for through these spending cuts and budget reallocation. Some $8 billion will be saved over the next two years.

For two years salaries will be frozen for public servants, the prime minister, cabinet ministers, members of Parliament, senators and the federal judiciary. Crown corporations that depend on federal funding will have operating budgets cut to achieve the same results.

• (1250)

Operating budgets of government departments will be cut by 3 per cent in 1993–94. Combined with the wage freeze, federal operating budgets will be 5 per cent lower than the planned levels over the next two fiscal years.

Average unemployment insurance benefits will be frozen. Subsidies to most organizations and interest groups will be cut by 10 per cent in each of the next two years. These cuts we recognize mean further sacrifices for many Canadians, but they are needed so that a stronger recovery and sustained growth can be shared by all Canadians.

In conclusion, our government is taking real positive action to boost Canada's economy and create the conditions for new jobs. The results of these actions are not trickling down; they are showing clear results. At 1.4 per cent inflation, the rate is the lowest in the G–7. Productivity is up by 2.6 per cent so far this year. This increases our competitiveness. Trade performance is showing results. Merchandise trade surplus, one of the keys to reducing our current account deficit, is up by almost $2 billion from last year.

Real output increased 1.4 per cent in the third quarter. Domestic demand, including consumer spending, housing, investment in machinery and equipment, increased by more than 5 per cent. Employment has increased in five of the last six months. There have been 104,000 full–time jobs. That is the rise since August. Yes, we must interpret these signs cautiously. The world economy is going through a very difficult period.

We are not immune from that. We understand that. We are doing what we can for the Canadian people, this country and the economy, not only today, because we have put in place policies to help today and in the future. We cannot forget the future. I believe that for far too long governments have ignored down the road and looked at the next four years at what might get it re–elected in the next election rather than looking at the long term and what is needed for this country.

Mr. Mills: Nine years later.

Mr. McDermid: Well, in nine years we have accomplished a tremendous amount. In tax reform, in new trade agreements, we have accomplished a tremendous amount in this country. Today, there are —I will get the exact figure for the hon. member over there who is chuckling away—1,247,000 more people working than in 1984.

As the fundamental strengths of Canada's economy continue to grow, we will be well positioned to be a growth leader among the major nations as the world's economy improves. Everyone in the world is saying that today. This will prove that our government has truly and fully honoured its obligations to Canadians to help them win a secure and prosperous future. That is what we are working toward and will continue to work toward.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, very briefly because the minister challenged me to speak about some statements that were made. I would like to quote from The Ottawa Citizen of December 4: "Don Mazankowski was pulling no punches". "There is a sense up here that all we do is bring out cheque writing machines and send people a cheque. Those days are over. Bleeding hearts want the government to spend more on social programs, Mazankowski said, but eliminating benefits for voluntary quitters is just being fair to workers and businesses who support the system. Look at the people who are working. Look at the people and the sacrifices they are making".

[Translation]

The worst example is what his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration said, and I quote: "They claim someone who leaves his job for no good reason to go to Florida in the winter should get unemployment insurance benefits. It's about time the government had the balls to be realistic, considering the times we live in, etc. etc."

[English]

These statements, including the statement made by the former minister that the recession was made in Canada, are all part of the public record. The minister should stop accusing other people of misstating the facts. The facts are here in black and white in direct quotes in several newspapers as a result of statements made by his government in the last few days.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member quoted the Minister of Finance, listing a number of things that he said. She just mentioned one here. She mentioned a number in her speech. I believe that a lot of them were probably manufactured by her as she went along. Using her usually excessive rhetoric, she probably attributed a number of things to the Minister of Finance that he did not say. I will be interested to see each one of the quotes she attributed to the Minister of Finance and the justification for that. She has only stood up and justified one of them.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member carefully. I believe he used these words: "We must break the vicious deficit cycle". For nine years the government has made projections on deficit and debt which have not really come to pass. This government came into power in 1984. When the Tories were in opposition, they had a real attitude toward deficit and debt. At that time it differentiated their party from ours because we were a little more sympathetic toward people who were unemployed and in pain.

The government came in with a policy of tax reform yet it has had 32 tax increases, not to mention the poorly designed GST which, in fact, the Minister of Finance admitted last week required some changes. I think that is fine.

The trade performance on the merchandise trade surplus in the last six years has been in decline. The debt has doubled in the nine years of this government. I must confess that the inflation numbers are very good and interest rates are low. However, there is a feeling in the country that there is no confidence in our economy, no hope. I would suggest to the member that a lot of the reason why that exists is because there is very little trust in this government. There is no trust in its projections. That is a fact.

Does the member not think that part of the reason why we cannot seem to get the spirit of this country going again is because none of the actions that have been taken in the last little while are doing anything to rebuild that trust. He is basically making the same speech in year nine that was given in year one. Yet in the last eight years this government has never acted on its own advice or its own prescription.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. I can tell the hon. member that I am not giving the same speech I gave nine years ago. I can say that our deficit is half of what it was when we came into power in 1984. In 1984 the deficit was about 8.5 per cent of our Gross Domestic Product. Today it is about 4.5 per cent. It has been cut in half.

I can say that we have an operating surplus today, which I could not say in 1984. The government of the day was borrowing $16 billion just for the operations of the government. Today we have an operating surplus of some $7 billion. So, no, it is not the same speech.

I can say that from 1964 or 1965 through to 1984 government expenditures increased at a rate of a little over 14 per cent a year. This government has kept the increase in expenditures year over year to less than 4 per cent, less than the rate of inflation. So, no, I am not delivering the same speech today.

We delivered on corporate, personal and sales tax reform, something that was recommended for over 40 years by a number of royal commissions, including one that the Liberals set up just recently and reported in 1984–85, which recommended that we go to a consumption tax.

Is the Minister of Finance making some changes? Certainly he is. He wants the tax system to operate in a better way. Is the hon. member telling me that the Liberals never changed tax systems in this country, that they never amended them? They certainly did amend them. For him to make those statements is crazy.

Finally, there is the other thing about projections being wrong. If the hon. member were honest with the House, I think he would admit that every single organization that makes projections, banks, think-tank organizations both here and abroad, governments at all levels no matter who their political masters are, made projections for 1992 that were off base, every single one of them. If the hon. member looks at the projections that the federal government made, they were far more conservative than those projections that were made in the private sector and some of the think-tanks both here and overseas. So do not lay that one on the Minister of Finance.

• (1300)

Mr. Mills: Why no confidence?

Mr. McDermid: The hon. member is totally unfair when he makes that criticism of the Minister of Finance.

Why no confidence? I think there are a number of reasons. When people read that General Motors is going to lay off 20,000 people around the world and that IBM is laying off thousands of people, they worry about their own jobs in their company, no matter what that company may be. I understand that concern very, very much. I think people rein in. I think people start paying down debt, which we are seeing. I think people save, which we are seeing. I think people tend not to spend when those types of things are going on. This is going on around the world, not just in Canada. It is a concern. I am not minimizing it at all, but I think that is why there is the lack of confidence there.

We have got to get through this restructuring process. All industries and all businesses everywhere are having this problem. It is not just in Canada where the confidence is down; it is everywhere. The hon. member knows that.

I think we should have a very frank discussion about what is going on in the world rather than hammering away. I will tell you one other reason. The opposition gets up every day and just hammers away, just bangs away at all the problems. God, we do not minimize the problems, we have got them. They are major and we are doing something about it. Therefore, the hon. member should be fair in his criticisms of the Minister of Finance when he says those things.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I think the comments which the junior Minister of Finance has just stated to the House, that we should have a frank discussion and that we should talk about what is really happening in this country, are good suggestions and I am going to follow them. I want to follow them in talking this morning, as coolly and as unemotionally as I possibly can, because I think that maybe I will get it out of my system. To start with, I think what this government is doing with respect to the unemployed people in this country is sick. I think there is a psychological sickness in this government which frankly appals me as a Canadian.

I want to try to talk about some of the reasons that I feel as deeply as I do about that and I want to try and do it as calmly and as coolly as I possibly can.

The minister in his comments has made a suggestion quite defensively. Of course, it is up to the opposition to oppose and up to the government to defend. One cannot accuse it too seriously of being defensive. One of the things that I have always believed is that the government would make far more sense to people by listening, far more sense to the country in trying to explain what is happening if it started out saying: "Yes, there are some very serious problems which have been demonstrated by the unemployment figures that came out this Friday and we are shocked by those unemployment figures".

The government should have been prepared to say that if after nine years of being the government of this country the fact is that unemployment has reached a level of 11.8 per cent, not as calculated by the opposition, but as calculated by the government's own statistical agency, and that level of unemployment is higher than we have had in Canada since 1983, clearly it is doing something wrong.

This government is clearly doing something wrong. We can look around the world at the various other places that the minister mentioned. The United States does not have an 11.8 per cent unemployment rate. In fact, unemployment rates in the U.S. are 7.5 per cent, 7.4 per cent and they are falling.

An hon. member: It calculates them differently.

Mr. Langdon: Based on the same kinds of calculations. Many of the European economists do calculate them somewhat differently but they do so in a way that tends to overstate them compared to our figures.

There are not unemployment rates there that are as sky-high or that have moved as dramatically as in this country. In this country there is a human tragedy. It is a human tragedy that is evident not just in the 11.8 per cent unemployment figures but in the specifics of the unemployment figures.

Take young people for instance. The unemployment rate for young people is 18.4 per cent. How can there be any sense of hope among our young people? How can there be any sense of enthusiasm, of looking forward to the future with excitement and hope in our high schools, our universities, or our community colleges when the unemployment rate among young people is 18.4 per cent?

Look at women. There was a big jump in unemployment last month, and 60,000 of the 84,000 jump was among women. Women are again being hit particularly hard by these increases in unemployment. We can look at what has happened to full-time employment.

Full-time employment fell by one percentage point in this past year. The government would have us believe that jobs have increased in this country, despite the fact that the unemployment rate is up.

An hon. member: There are more people working.

Mr. Langdon: This is true, there are more people working, but more people are working at part-time jobs. More people are doing so involuntarily.

We have a serious and tragic situation in this country, and we can see it not just in the over-all figures. We can see it in community by community figures. We can see it in St. John's, Newfoundland, where the unemployment rate has gone up from 14.5 per cent to 15.2 per cent in the past month. We can see it in Montreal where the unemployment rate has gone up from 12.8 per cent to 13.6 per cent.

We can see it in my home community of Windsor where the unemployment rate is up from 12.8 per cent to 13.6 per cent. In Regina it has increased from 8.4 per cent to 8.9 per cent. Even in Calgary, which used to be thought of as somehow immune from all of these unemployment problems, the rate has increased from 9.8 per cent to 10.7 per cent.

There is a human tragedy taking place across the country. People are losing their jobs and losing their sense of confidence in this country as a consequence.

The Minister of Finance suggested on November 26 that: "I would argue with the hon. member's contention that we are still in a recession". He went on to talk about how there had been this tremendous increase in employment and that there were all kinds of strong positive indicators.

Then reality intruded last Friday with that massive increase in unemployment rates from 11.3 per cent up to 11.8 per cent, higher than anything since 1983. In the face of this human tragedy, this despair among unemployed people, it is perhaps not surprising to see the government talk about cutbacks. It has talked about cutbacks for years. It has talked about bringing the deficit down even though the deficit has gone up.

• (1310)

The reality is that there is something very sick when we have this much unemployment and it is growing and then a government decides deliberately to attack the unemployed. Over 30 per cent of the cuts it made in its budget statement last week were cuts affecting the unemployed in this country, $2.5 billion according to the government's own economic statement, $900 million from those who are identified as voluntary quitters, but in fact this includes people who are fired from their jobs, and another $1.55 billion from the benefit freeze.

The Minister of Finance was quoted in the Montreal Gazette on December 5 as being mystified, as being caught completely by surprise by the outrage that greeted the government's decision to cut off unemployment insurance benefits. The minister is still not really sure why so many people are up in arms.

An hon. member: They are not.

Mr. Langdon: The junior minister suggests they are not. I do not know where he spends his weekends.

If he were to talk to ordinary working people in his constituency, he would have found the sense of outrage, anger and real despair about this government that I certainly found in my constituency, and that I found yesterday in a rally against the North American free trade agreement in Cornwall. This anger and concern is out there. If the minister does not believe it he can wait until the election and discover it for himself.

Why is it there? It is there because people across the country understand what is happening in the labour market?

I want to put on the record this morning some cases that I hope will demonstrate to the Minister of Finance exactly why his decision to attack the unemployed in the way he has is so unjust, so cruel and so fundamentally sick. I will give some examples of people who have phoned in to us, of cases we have been working on in our various constituency offices.

There are a couple of cases from Winnipeg. In one case the person quit his employment because the boss was always in a rage, always intimidating, and always insulting. He was given a 12-week disqualification under the present rules until the other employees of this particular company also quit and backed up his story. At that point the 12-week disqualification was finally eliminated.

Under the new changes, he would have been facing having to somehow go out and get welfare. He would not have been able to get that welfare if he had a bank account of any kind, if he had a house or if he had a car. He would not have been able to get welfare.

In another case from Winnipeg someone was being transferred to another community who had a fiancé. Obviously, his fiancé wanted to move too. As a result of the fact that they had not been living together she would have had to take the 12-week penalty to be able to move from Winnipeg to this other community many miles away.

Under the present changes that are now suggested she would receive absolutely nothing if she wanted to move to the new community and look for a job that would keep her in the same city as the person to whom she is engaged to be married.

That is an actual case.

An hon. member: Are you suggesting that unemployment insurance is for people who quit because they are engaged?

Mr. Langdon: Is the minister suggesting that people should not have some commitments to family life together, that they should not keep the commitment of one person to another? Does this government not understand that people in this country have bonds with each other? Does it not understand these things?

Let us take another case. This is a case in British Columbia. Someone who had worked for two years in a group home for mentally handicapped persons quit and went to a licensing board, to the mental health board for the area, and filed complaints about the conduct of the owner-operator of the home, complaints about mistreatment of residents and misuse of public funds.

A full inquiry was undertaken. While this inquiry was being undertaken the woman involved was requested to keep all information fully confidential. She then applied for UI. She said she had quit her job for just cause but the UIC said it needed a full explanation. She said she could not provide that because of the confidentiality which her complaint involved. She was disqualified for 12 weeks for quitting that job. One year later the investigation of the care home was completed. The home lost its licence. The residents were all shifted to new settings and are doing very well. The woman feels very good about what she did. She is now going back to the UIC to reopen the question of disqualification at that time and she will probably win her appeal. The point is that under these new regulations she would have received absolutely nothing from unemployment insurance for over a year until this case was decided.

Let us take another case from Oshawa. A 22-year old woman worked in a donut shop. She phoned in sick one day. The next day when she went in she was fired. She went to the UIC and said she had been fired. She was told it was just cause because she had phoned in sick.

Under these new rules she would not be entitled to anything at all.

Are we saying that people cannot phone in sick for a day?

I want to talk about three cases from my constituency that demonstrate this point very powerfully. One case concerns a woman who works for a home care institution. Often as she works for her various clients providing home care she does some extras for them. One of her clients, somebody who had known her and her husband as friends before she became employed for this home care company, asked her if she and her husband could move some furniture in the house. Her husband came in and moved some furniture. The home care company that this woman works for has a policy that no "strangers" are to come into the houses of any of the clients that the woman works for.

• (1320)

When they discovered that this woman's husband had come in to move this furniture, this woman was fired. She went to UI, explaining the circumstances, and she is seeking redress with the Ontario Labour Relations Board for unfair dismissal. During this period she has been disqualified again for a period of time from receiving unemployment insurance. Under this new system she would receive nothing.

I had somebody in to talk with me just this past Saturday who was involved in a dispute with her employer who has fired her because he believes that she took money unfairly from his business. She rejects this categorically. They are in a court case to settle the issue. The court case will take at least a year to come to its conclusion. Under the new rules she will have no support. As a single parent of three children, she will have no support whatsoever from unemployment insurance despite her years of paying into it.

All of these cases, and I have many more that I could include, demonstrate how viciously unjust, how psychologically sick this decision is that the government has taken in its economic statement.

I do not know if it will do any good to change this government's mind but we at least will keep fighting. We will keep bringing these facts before Parliament, before the people of this country.

Therefore, I wish to move:

That the motion be amended by adding the following words:

specifically the government's planned changes to the Unemployment Insurance Program which will further victimize the unemployed.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): My question to the member relates to that portion of the minister's paper, the one investing in growth, and it has to do with the section relating to keeping inflation low. The government goes on to describe the importance of keeping inflation low, and I do not think that any one of us in this House would argue that controlling inflation is a vital ingredient in terms of putting some of the basics in place.

My question to the member, because the member is an economist, has to do with the actual program that we use in the Government of Canada for measuring inflation.

I have been saying, and many other members have been saying, for the last year and a half that there is not any inflation in this country. Things are so depressed; prices are suppressed, even wages have been suppressed. I know that the government, because it is so preoccupied with these inflation numbers, seems to be less sensitive to the million and a half people who are actually carrying the burden of its preoccupation with the inflation numbers.

Does the member think it is possible that the modelling that the government is using to calculate these inflation numbers could be in error and the actual inflation is a lot lower than we actually have shown? Maybe if we took a review of that system we might get this government to let up a little bit and put a little bit of steam back into the economy.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for an interesting question.

Inflation levels in Canada are calculated by Statistics Canada using a system of average expenditure patterns which a particular household would undertake in a given month.

They are not based on modelling techniques as are some of the projections in the government's material. Those modelling projections are often subject to considerable error, but the actual inflation figures are rarely subject to those errors. They are, however, somewhat misleading for any individual household because what they give is a figure for an average household.

If you happen to be, for instance, a household which relies on electricity for heating and cooking, the level of inflation, the way prices have increased for you recently has been significantly higher than if you happen to be a household that is using natural gas because natural gas prices have not increased nearly as much.

The other key point to make about the inflation figures is that the great bulk of the increase in inflation which has occurred in recent months have been increases related to government taxation. They are not really signs of pressure in the economy to which the government needs to respond because of the overheating of the economy.

To suggest we have no inflation in Canada might be a little bit extreme, but we certainly have no significant inflation which we need higher interest rates to counter. The higher interest rates which we have had in Canada recently have been related entirely to pressure on the Canadian dollar, a pressure which I think is a reflection of lack of confidence among investors throughout the world in the economic policies of this government.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the hon. member if in his criticism of the federal government he would not include the borrowings of the provincial governments and that the economic policies and stands that provincial governments take do not affect as well the confidence in the dollar and the subsequent change in interest rates.

Borrowing collectively from the provinces which is greater than the federal government and labour laws which frighten the hell out of business and investment in this country, which the Ontario government is determined to bring in even as the best advice it received told it not to—does the member not think these particular policies also affect the economic performance of this country?

Or does the hon. member just think it is the federal government alone and that in this federation that we have provinces do not have an important role to play in the confidence he talks about?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, again I thank the minister for an interesting question because it certainly is the case that what provincial governments do has some effect on business confidence, consumer confidence, on the amount of disposable income that people have in their pockets to be able to spend.

In the House of Commons we have to concentrate on the levels of performance of the federal government. The levels of performance of the federal government as they affect provinces are probably more important than the provincial governments themselves.

• (1330)

The minister talks about the fact that provincial governments have had to go out and borrow more money and he is certainly right in that. It has been true of provincial governments throughout the country. The reason that has had to take place is that the federal government has reduced very significantly its transfer payments to provincial governments. The promises which were made to the three provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario with respect to support for the Canada Assistance Program have been brutally broken by this government. The government promised when it brought the Canada Assistance Program in that it would pay 50 per cent of that program. Do you know what level it is paying in Ontario now? Just 33 per cent of the total.

The reason for that is that the government of this country has put the unemployment figures in Canada up significantly. It has reduced the capacity of people who are on unemployment to get unemployment insurance and has, therefore, forced provinces to pay the gap, pay the difference because only welfare is available.

For provinces like Ontario the consequence is a shortfall in payments from the federal government of $4.5 billion this past year. Despite that the province of Ontario will be very close to its deficit figures, whereas the Government of Canada is $7 billion higher than the deficit figures it projected for this year and over $10 billion higher for the deficit figures it projects for next year. What we see here is a group of people bankrupting this country both financially and in terms of policy ideas.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Speaker has taken under consideration the amendment tabled by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor and I expect to make a ruling after Question Period.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, we are talking today about an economic plan that is, to quote the Prime Minister, staying the course. Let us look at what kind of a course we are staying on.

We are looking at a course that has brought us the highest number ever of Canadians out of work. Canadians are worried about how they are going to put food on the table, how they are going to pay the rent or mortgage, how they are going to send their kids to school. We are talking about staying a course that has brought us a record number of bankruptcies, both individually and personally. We are talking about staying a course that has brought us a record level of poverty. We now have close to four million Canadians living in poverty, one million of whom are children. Food banks across this country are in greater numbers than McDonald's and one third of the people using those food banks are children.

We are staying the course because it is supposed to reduce the deficit. This is the same course that we are now into the ninth year of hearing is going to reduce the deficit. Instead, we have a higher deficit, not a lower deficit. The deficit itself has doubled. Is that deficit paying for more services? Is it paying for programs to address the economic misery in this country? It is not. What we are spending now on programs and services to Canadians has dramatically reduced and this increased deficit is going to pay the debt.

We were going to reduce the debt. This course we are on, and I have read it in every budget statement since 1984, is going to reduce the debt.

How much is the debt reduced? It has gone up by over 200 per cent, up not down. In every budget since 1984 the government has said that it is going to create more jobs. Instead, we see jobs leaving this country, disappearing by the tens of thousands, and by the hundreds of thousands in total, since this government took office.

The only people in Canada who do not know that this course is destroying this country, bringing unprecedented misery to Canadians, reducing our opportunities to have the kind of future that this country and Canadians deserve, the only people who do not know that is what this course of action is doing are the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and all those sitting on the other side of the House.

We have this kind of a budget because this government sees its popularity vanishing down the drain and drifting into the hands of the Reform Party. It is doing everything it can to steal back votes from the Reform Party, votes from a party that says the "I'm all right, Jack" philosophy of citizenship and of governments is what works. Those who have should continue to prosper. Those who do not should continue to fail in increasing numbers.

A good government and a good society is not about dog eat dog competitiveness, where only the strongest, wealthiest, most powerful and most vicious survive. That is not what this country is about.

The only positive thing I can see in this economic statement is the small bit of assistance that is being offered to small businesses. We have a small business loan program in this country that is not working for small businesses. We know the rate at which those businesses have been going out of business. We know the rate at which the jobs they provide in greater numbers than any other sector of our economy have been disappearing.

However, what we also see in this budget is a deliberate attempt, as we have seen over the years with this government, to stifle the voices of those who stand up for those who are living in increasing misery as a result of the actions of this government. We do see a cutback in funding to organizations for women, funding to organizations for aboriginal people and funding to organizations for the unemployed in this budget. However, if this government believes that stifling the voices of protest is going to get it re-elected it is dramatically mistaken. Those voices are out there and are powerful. Those voices are out there waiting to elect a new government.

This budget is hypocritical and contradictory. It blames the world situation for the misery in Canada right now. That is really easy. If the government blames the rest of the world it does not have to do anything about the problem, does it? It can pretend that it is somebody else's fault, hide its head under the blanket and pretend that it will go away when somebody else does something about it.

It is hypocritical in that it says we need to leave more money in the hands of consumers. Is that what it is doing when it cuts unemployment insurance, when it says that when people have lost their job after 20, 25 or 30 years of dedicated service to an employer they are going to be able to collect barely half their salary, provided it is under $33,000?

Is that how people are going to manage to send and keep their children in school, to send them on to university, to develop the education and commitment to learning that this country needs in the future? I do not think so. Do we leave money in the pockets of consumers so that they can stimulate the economy when we freeze wages for the largest employer in the country?

The federal government itself says that half a million and more public sector employees are going to have no more income next year when they have already been through one year of zero increase and then they are going to have a third year on top of that. Does that stimulate consumer spending? I do not think so.

Does it stimulate consumer spending when the government says on one hand that it is going to spend millions of dollars to create jobs and on the other that it is going to create unemployment within its own work force? Does it stimulate or save money by forcing people not to collect unemployment insurance but instead to collect welfare from the local community where other unemployed people like them are struggling to keep a roof over their head and pay their property taxes? Does that help stimulate consumer spending? I do not think so.

This economic statement tackles the lowest paid or the totally unpaid, the most vulnerable in our society and in each of our communities. It has been the pattern of this government to not do its job for those who most need leadership from their government to end the misery and create jobs.

We have young people dropping out of school to support their families. Does that help build a future for this country? I think not. We have a government boasting about improvements. It says: "Trade is up, jobs are up". However, that is not the reality that Canadians are seeing.

When it has let the situation get so bad that it cannot get any worse I suppose it seizes on one-tenth of one per cent improvement to claim improvement. If there is any improvement in any indicator it is only because under this government the situation has got so bad that it is no longer tolerable for Canadians, and this government is no longer tolerable for Canadians.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member to tell me how much the interest payments are on the national debt and how much they were when her government left office.

She talks about the debt growing and the difficulties that the government today has in terms of options. She may want to outline for the members of this House and the public what contribution her government made in its previous incarnation as the party in power.

It left a huge debt, and the increase in the debt is entirely due to interest payments. When that government left office the gap between income tax and program spending was absolutely incredible, insupportable. It mortgaged the futures of not only our children but our grandchildren. Those members continue to talk about program spending that would further bankrupt this country, and not just our grandchildren but their grandchildren as well.

Perhaps she would like to explain how her party would come up with all these programs, with all of this spending, with all of these quick fixes without increasing the debt the way it did in the 1970s.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to reply to that question with a question to the hon. member.

I ask her how her government has turned the debt of this country from less than $170 billion to close to $500 billion. I ask her how her government has managed to introduce 37 different tax increases, increasing the burden on the poor and making the middle class close to poor, but has still not managed to pay off some of that debt and therefore reduce the interest payments on that debt.

I ask her how through years of good employment, higher revenue into the coffers of the government and lower interest rates her government could irresponsibly fail to pay off that debt. In fact, it has increased the debt and the interest payments on that debt.

I ask her how her government could spend $22 billion a year paying interest on foreign debt. That alone is costing Canadians $11 billion in forgone income tax, $22 billion out of the Canadian economy in interest payments to foreigners. It is money that is not circulating in the economy. That is $11 billion in income tax that could be collected if that debt interest were being paid in Canada. That is one-third of the deficit right there.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, as I was listening to the member from Winnipeg asking my colleague a question I recalled some of the personal income tax increases that have happened during this government's almost nine years in office. From 1984 to 1988 personal income taxes rose from $37.5 billion to $59.7 billion. From 1988 to 1992 personal income taxes increased another 22.6 per cent to $73.256 billion.

As well as not tackling the debt, this government certainly knows how to suck out billions of dollars from the taxpayer. Does the hon. member not think that kind of Draconian attack on the taxpayers of this country goes a long way toward suppressing consumer confidence?

Mrs. Catterall: I thank my colleague for the question. It is probably a good time to remind Canadians of the 3 per cent surtax on income tax that was supposed to come off when the GST was introduced. They will know that they are still paying a good part of that surtax. It is making it more difficult for them to pay their mortgages and pay their debts. Nonetheless, Canadian consumers know they have to pay off their debt and that they cannot simply keep piling on interest on interest on interest as this government has done.

It is a good thing that Canadians are managing their personal finances better than this government is managing its public finances.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, what usually happens to the employee who does not know how to manage the company's budget? He is dismissed. Well, it seems to be high time to dismiss the Conservative government now in power, which from budget to budget has led us straight to quicksand.

When it took office eight years ago, this government promised to put the nation's finances in order and thus assure Canada a prosperous future. Today we see the results. Imagine what this country would have become if it had not promised us a better future.

Every year the Auditor General presents a report of government activities and spending. He does not just say what was done but adds comments and suggests possible cuts. What is this government doing about it? We really wonder.

From what the Minister of Finance presented to us last week in his economic statement, we may even wonder whether he read the report. If he did, he did all he could not to benefit from it.

He announced cuts of some $8 billion spread over two years. About a third, $2.5 billion, has to do with unemployment insurance. To quote Gilles Lesage in Le Devoir: "Most cynical of all, instead of announcing some breaks for victims of the crisis or, even better, announcing the promised jobs, the government attacks the present and future unemployed. Those who are already poor and voiceless will become even more so, as if they alone were responsible for their precarious situation. We gladly agree that reforms are necessary, but Ottawa should not be going about them in this manner at this time."

In Quebec the unemployment rate is rising all the time as job creation is not able to offset the lost employment. The Minister of Finance and the federal government could have announced that the overlapping jurisdiction and costly duplication involved in labour force training and development programs would end soon. Even more waste. Quebec needs the assurance that the constitutional agreements that were ready can be turned into administrative agreements. Ottawa is not moving and the situation is getting worse every day. Ottawa still refuses to get involved and the Reform Party of Canada is glad to see Quebec going down the drain.

• (1350)

There is absolutely nothing here for economic recovery. The only solution Ottawa came up with was to go after the unemployed instead of unemployment. The Tory government is obsessed with reducing the deficit and inflation, but all it seems to be doing is prolong the recession. Is this the way to run a country?

Meanwhile, the Minister of Finance has also created a nightmare for employers and employees. According to Mr. Dufour, president of the Conseil du patronat, and I quote:

> These changes mean we will constantly be going to court. Endless legal challenges. I am not saying this measure is all bad, but I have some questions about the way it will be implemented.

It is bad enough for the government to assume that large numbers of people are cheating on unemployment insurance, but taking money out of the pockets of people who worked hard and need help to get back on their feet is simply the last straw.

Of course, the minister will say that the people who are penalized will be the exception, but now that a certain kind of employer will be able to use blackmail, the whole system can turn into a nightmare for the employee.

I would now like to quote Mr. Gaétan Guérard, president of Mouvement Action-chômage:

> About 3 per cent of the people on unemployment insurance are freeloaders, and that is par for the course. Most people leave their jobs as a last resort, but now, they may prefer to hang on, which in the long run will be just as bad for the employer.

The changes proposed by the Minister of Finance will not create jobs or replace jobs that were lost, so they are no help at all. These changes are supposed to improve the country's economy. However, the federal government is actually transferring to the provinces the burden of supporting all these people who will end up on welfare. What a strange way to make Canada competitive and prosperous.

After eight years of mismanagement by this Conservative government, the country really needs a responsible government to take charge. It is high time for us to take power to get this country back on its feet. Canada is on a downward slide and we must at all costs stop this slide before we completely lose control.

The government in office was elected because it promised a growing economy, jobs, jobs, jobs, prosperity and a decreasing deficit. What did it deliver? Just the opposite. The country could hardly be in worse shape. Companies are closing left and right, young people no longer believe in tomorrow and more and more people in their forties find themselves with nothing after their jobs were completely wiped out.

Taxes continue to rise, salaries are frozen, inflation is still rising and this government tells us to have confidence. They want us to have faith in its management. That is really making fun of us.

The country can no longer live with band-aid solutions that solve nothing; it is time to take drastic action and to dare to have guts. It is time to take charge of this country, to work with business and to build a promising future.

It is high time to listen and especially to implement the Auditor General's recommendations.

It is high time to stop duplication and give Quebec and other provinces that want it jurisdiction over manpower training and development. It is high time to call an election and let the people choose a new government to run this country.

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said it was time her party came to power to straighten out the economy in this country. Could the hon. member describe the principles and policies that would form the basis for her party's decisions?

First of all, will she increase spending and borrowing? Will she cut or increase revenue? I would like some details on what she expects to do in the way of programs.

Mrs. Maheu: I want to thank the hon. member for Lévis for this opportunity to remind the House of the program suggested by the Leader of the Opposition. To create jobs, we asked for infrastructure projects that would help our provincial and municipal governments and in the process kick-start the economy. The government considered this, but it has only provided for overhauling two bridges in Montreal. That's all it amounts to.

As to whether we want to increase spending, my answer is this. Who increased spending in this country? Who almost tripled the debt? Who raised taxes 37 times? The Tory government. It is high time we started listening to the experts in this country, something it seems incapable of doing.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few moments to congratulate my Liberal colleague and point out to hon. members opposite that what we need is a government that will start thinking about what Canadians need. Statistics are all very well, but what people want is jobs. They want to work. We know there is no miracle solution. We realize that. But the projects you introduced in your mini budget do not hold out any hope for Canadians. There is nothing there that can help people this winter. We want something for this winter.

The infrastructure project proposed by the Leader of the Opposition would involve all three levels of government: the federal government and the provincial and municipal governments, each contributing one-third. We know these projets are ready to go today. Why were there no proposals for a program of this kind? It seems to me that if we had a number of projects that could start right away, to provide some hope for people who want a job between now and next summer— Perhaps the hon. member would like to comment.

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to add to what my colleague said. Canadians are listening to us, of course. In its mini budget last week, the government predicted 5,000 more jobs.

I live in and represent the riding of Saint-Laurent—Cartierville. Saint-Laurent is Quebec's second-largest industrial city. We have lost over 5,000 jobs since this government took power. When they imposed the free trade agreement on Canadians, they said that high technology was our country's future. Philips, a high-tech company in our riding, has just let 490 high-tech jobs go in the very field that the government says is the future. I think that they really need to reflect, consult and listen.

CYPRUS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, by the middle of this month Canada must decide whether to renew its UN peacekeeping commitment in Cyprus for another six months.

We have been there for 28 years so it is understandable that our government which is being pressed to provide peacekeepers in other world trouble spots would consider ending our Cyprus commitments.

Cyprus is the last European country still occupied by foreign troops. Since 1974 the UN has passed 24 resolutions calling on Turkey to withdraw its troops.

Canada stood behind the UN resolutions in Iraq and Kuwait. We did not pull out in the middle of the gulf war. We stayed until the job was done.

Negotiations for a solution to the Cyprus problem are scheduled to begin again 100 days from now. Surely the honourable thing for Canada to do is to keep our peacekeepers in Cyprus until their job has been successfully completed rather than pulling out now, risking a new war just so that we can take on another peacekeeping commitment someplace else.

WESTRAY MINE DISASTER

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, 26 men lost their lives in the Westray mine disaster. Today, seven months later the widows, the children, the workers, the loved ones including Chris Martin of Thorburn, a brother of one of the men who lost his life, are still asking: Why? What happened? What went wrong?

Those widows, those workers, those children have a right to know. Canadian taxpayers also deserve to know because they footed the bill to the tune of $135 million.

They are asking whether safety was compromised. Why did the Prime Minister act so quickly to have the deal approved? Were human lives the pawns in a political game?

A federal inquiry could answer these questions. That is why the Prime Minister should call one without delay. Or, as the Prime Minister unwittingly indicated in responding to the member from Halifax West last week, does he have something to hide in this matter?

OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec City Organizing Committee realized a major coup this weekend by putting Quebec City on the list of finalists for the Winter Olympics of the year 2002. The final choice will be made on June 16, 1995, in Budapest. This is a first victory for the volunteers who worked hard for beautiful Quebec City, known world-wide for its hospitality.

Mr. Speaker, there is still much to be done, but I want to assure you that the people of Abitibi are proud to be part of a project which is so wonderful for the population of Quebec and that of Canada.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, like other sectors of the Canadian economy ravaged by this recession, the steel industry is no exception.

Combined with the thousands of lay-offs and trade disputes with the U.S., inaction by the Conservative government threatens future destruction within the Canadian steel industry.

Stelco chairman Fred Telmer says that problems in the steel industry are symptomatic of larger concerns. He notes there is a list of trade disputes with the United States "as long as your arm, covering a whole raft of products including automobiles, wine, beer, softwood lumber and furniture" because the Canadian government has failed to make good on commitments to solving trade disputes.

Even the member from Burlington who is chairman of the non-partisan all-party steel caucus has failed to seize the opportunity to take the steel caucus to Washington on behalf of Canadian producers where a dialogue and possible solutions could be found to the trade disputes.

In the absence of government action on promised negotiations Canadian steel producers have submitted a proposal for a steel accord between Canada and the U.S.

In the words of Stelco chairman Telmer: "It would be a tragedy of monumental proportions if the government sacrificed such a proposal on the altar of a lack of political will".

PREMIER RALPH KLEIN

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday night the Alberta Conservatives paid tribute to retiring Premier Don Getty and elected Ralph Klein as the new party leader.

In the most open and democratic process ever used in Alberta all members of the party were allowed to vote at polling stations across the province. Over 72,000 Albertans took advantage of the opportunity and the people confirmed the caucus choice for leader.

As mayor of Calgary, Mr. Klein had welcomed the world to the most successful Winter Olympics ever. His success this week at gaining supporters from all corners of Alberta proved that his popularity with the people continues. If he can build on successes like that Alberta is going to be in good hands.

I join all Albertans in extending congratulations and best wishes to Ralph and his wife Colleen as he prepares to assume duties as the 12th premier of the province of Alberta.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, last week's announcement of cuts in foreign aid and environmental spending is another in a long line of broken promises from the Tories.

They clearly do not understand global security. The Tories find money for their pet projects like the $4.4 billion on military helicopters and they cut foreign aid spending. Population, poverty and debt are very real threats to our common security. Poverty is not sustainable.

Perhaps if this government had spent 0.7 per cent GDP on foreign aid as the environment minister promised yet again at the earth summit, there would be no need to send troops to famine-stricken Somalia.

The Conservatives also cut environment spending here at home instead of investing in a long-term, environmentally sound economic strategy.

They have demonstrated appalling deception by promising all kinds of action at the international level knowing they will renege, retreat and reveal their true Tory-blue nature.

I have some advice for this crisis-mismanagement government: scrap helicopters. Finance environmental security both here and abroad.

MEDICAL RESEARCH

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, the University of Alberta, which is situated in Edmonton—Strathcona, is the second largest university in Canada. It is renowned for its excellence in medicine, pharmacy and chemistry. The University of Alberta's Health Sciences Centre is a leading edge hospital. Alberta is also home to the Alberta Heritage Savings Trust Fund Medical Research Foundation which funds medical research out of the earnings of its $600 million fund.

Recently Glaxo Canada announced it would spend $15 million over five years on research leading to potential cures of hepatitis B and AIDS. Its partners are the University of Alberta, the University of Alberta Health Sciences Centre and the Alberta Heritage Savings Trust Fund Medical Research Foundation.

This is a powerful combination of commitment, equipment, research capability and knowledge. Over 40 Ph.D.s will be involved in this project.

This is all possible because of Bill C-91, an act to extend patent protection to brand name, innovative pharmaceutical manufacturers.

PREMIER RALPH KLEIN

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, on December 5, Ralph Klein, former mayor of Calgary and environment minister, steamrolled passed the establishment to win the race to become leader of the Alberta Progressive Conservatives and the province's 12th premier.

For the first time, Albertans of all political stripes were entitled to cast their ballots for the premier. This is the first step toward the primary voting system in Canada. Albertans want more open and democratic institutions. They will continue to lead the way for change.

As well, Albertans would like to know why the House Special Committee on Parliamentary Reform has held 21 secret and only 4 open meetings. This committee of Conservatives, Liberals and NDPers exemplifies the archaic attitudes of this institution.

Albertans want an elected Senate. We urge the Prime Minister to listen to the people and call for elections to fill the current vacancies in the Senate.

Congratulations, Premier Ralph. I wish you and Colleen success in your efforts on behalf of the people.

CHRISTMAS TREE INDUSTRY

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, later this afternoon a ceremony will take place that recognizes excellence in one of Canada's renewable resource industries, the real Christmas tree industry.

This year's national winner of the annual competition to determine Canada's outstanding Christmas tree grower is Mr. Bruce Turner of New Ross, Lunenburg County, Nova Scotia. Bruce will present a winning tree to the Prime Minister.

Cultivated real Christmas trees are grown to be harvested. They represent one of the most important centre-pieces in the celebration of the Christmas season. Real Christmas trees are a renewable resource produced by an environmentally friendly industry. They are beautiful and they even smell good.

I urge all members and all Canadians to include a real Christmas tree in their plans this year. None are better than the balsam firs produced by Bruce Turner and his fellow growers from Lunenburg County and the South Shore of Nova Scotia.

WATER QUALITY

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, water is Canada's most valuable resource. Improving the quality of water is one of Canada's most pressing issues.

Lakes and rivers are damaged by air pollution. In many cities rivers are used as sinks for dumping waste. Underground water is polluted by pesticides and other toxic chemicals.

Seven years ago the Pearse inquiry recommended a comprehensive water policy for Canada. Seven years have gone by and still the government has not produced a much needed water policy for Canada.

• (1410)

We urge the government to pay attention to how water quality impacts on public health and the economy.

Canadians expect action from the provinces and the municipalities, but the initial step must be taken by Ottawa where the political will is lacking.

Will the government wake up after seven years of inaction? Will the Minister of the Environment discharge his responsibilities on water on behalf of all Canadians?

CHRISTMAS SEALS CAMPAIGN

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Lung Association's annual Christmas seals campaign is now under way.

The Canadian Lung Association was the first national volunteer organization. It was founded in 1900 to fight tuberculosis, which was then a major health problem. Since then the association has attacked lung cancer, asthma, chronic bronchitis and emphysema, in particular.

We all know Christmas seals, but we may not all be aware that this campaign is the lung association's main source of funds. Every year, some 11 million seals are sent to five million homes. The funds collected are used for basic activities: research, education, services, patient care and the health promotion campaign.

I congratulate the Lung Association and I hope that its Christmas seals campaign is a great success.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance's edict that Canadians who quit their jobs or are fired for cause is one of the most vicious decisions ever made by a Government of Canada.

At best, it says work or starve. At worst, it violates the basic democratic and legal principle that a Canadian citizen is innocent until proven guilty.

A company can dump pollutants into our oceans and be fined a mere $2,000 after due process. A Canadian under the new proposals of the government who quits his or her job or is summarily fired is in reality being subjected to a fine of from $7,242 to $21,300 without due process, without the right to defend the case before the penalty is imposed.

I call upon the government and the minister to reconsider this vicious proposal.

MISSISSAUGA YOUTH ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): For the past 10 years the Mayor's Youth Advisory Committee of Mississauga has provided a forum for young people to address issues concerning their future and provide input to all levels of government. As well, members of the Mississauga Youth Advisory Committee are active participants in projects throughout the city of Mississauga.

In recent years the committee has fostered discussions on racism and discrimination, the environment and youth crime. Members of the committee assist in Earth Day celebrations and Canada Day festivities. As well, they have been active supporters of Our Place Peel, Mississauga's only youth shelter.

During this 10th anniversary year, the Mississauga Youth Advisory Committee sponsored a successful youth conference. They talked about drug abuse among youth, as well as issues relating to the future of Canada.

As I extend my congratulations to the Mississauga Youth Advisory Committee I would also like to encourage other young people across the country to be active participants in addressing the difficult issues facing the youth of our country and the nation as a whole.

INTERNATIONAL FUND FOR ANIMAL WELFARE

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

The recent advertising campaign of the International Fund for Animal Welfare is totally misleading and irresponsible. The fund says it wants to have some honesty and clear thinking on harvesting issues.

Let us have some honesty by giving Canadians the facts that animal rights groups do not tell Canadians.

What about the fact that the anti-sealing lobby destroyed the economy of the eastern Arctic? What about the fact that aboriginal unemployment in the eastern Arctic is now about 80 per cent? What about the fact that since it is no longer possible for families to make their living by hunting, the social welfare rolls have soared and social problems have increased?

What about the fact that manufacturers of fake fur coats cause more serious environmental consequences than wildlife harvesting ever will?

The fund and other animal rights groups say continued hunting will drag down Canada's reputation in the eyes of the world.

As the world heads into 1993, the International Year for Indigenous Peoples, let the truth be told about how these groups continue to drag down aboriginal peoples by exploiting domestic and international ignorance of wildlife and aboriginal peoples.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLE

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from travelling with the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples in my riding. What the commission heard regarding the high rate of teen suicides in northern Ontario is quite shocking to say the least.

Since 1986 there have been 49 suicides and nearly 800 suicide attempts by teenagers. This is nearly seven times the national average. It is clear from the statistics that the government has failed to provide adequate policies and financial resources to deal with the issue of suicides in aboriginal communities.

It is time for this government to move very quickly, first, by committing the financial resources to help these communities deal effectively with the problem of teen suicide and, second, by conducting an inquiry to look at the long-term issues relating to suicides.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENTS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, Manitoba Premier Gary Filmon refused to attend a PC fund raising dinner with the Prime Minister. Despite the fact that Filmon's finance minister, Clayton Manners, had endorsed the federal government's economic statement, Filmon was reported as being miffed that Manitoba did not receive its fair share in the mini budget.

Why have these two Conservative governments not renewed a number of federal-provincial agreements that the former NDP government of Manitoba had initiated?

Why has the inner city core area initiative been allowed to die? Why has the northern development agreement not been renegotiated? Why is there no new agreement on the bay line in the port of Churchill? Why have affirmative action education programs for natives been dropped? Why have land entitlement negotiations, which are so important for the economic development of native people, been put on the back burner?

Why have any number of federal-provincial agreements, including tourism, mining and forestry been either downgraded or dropped?

Why can these two Conservative governments not work with each other?

UNEMPLOYMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Fact: the recession has been going on for 30 months. Fact: by the government's own admission it is a made-in-Canada recession. Fact: 1,600,000 Canadians are not working. Fact: 2,300,000 Canadians are on welfare. Fact: one million Canadian children are living in poverty. Yet the pre-Christmas message of the Minister of Finance last week was: stay the course, our economic policies are working.

If this government is doing such a good job, why does Canada have the highest unemployment rate in the western world? Why is our jobless situation worse than that in the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Japan and even Italy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that the hon. member would have been pleased and satisfied to note that the prime interest rates fell today. The Bank of Montreal lowered its rate to 8.75 per cent, as did the Royal Bank and the Toronto-Dominion Bank. It is a very positive outcome arising from the economic plan I announced in the House on behalf of the government last week.

The economic plan I announced is about creating jobs, creating new opportunities, investing in growth, investing in people, investing in infrastructure, investing in new efforts to trade and investing in partnerships.

In the small business sector alone, which is the most important engine of economic activity in Canada, we took several steps; freezing UI premiums, a premium holiday on new employees, a 10 per cent investment tax credit, improved access to capital, improvements in R and D, improvements in the treatment of capital cost allowance. All of these are positive measures that will generate growth and job activity.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in fact, the number of welfare recipients in Quebec alone is rising by 3,000 a month. Six hundred thousand people just in Montreal live in poverty. However, the policies announced by the minister last week will force more unemployed people onto welfare as of April 1. The government will therefore claim that the unemployment rate has gone down, when in fact the minister is not solving the unemployment problem but is putting more people on welfare, which costs the provinces and municipalities more.

• (1420)

Does the Minister of Finance think that by reclassifying people who are out of work they will disappear?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, given the country's economic situation, we should instead look at the measures put forward by the Minister of Finance and the government and how we can help these unemployed people.

As a government, we decided that we had to invest massively in developing human resources, both in Quebec and in the rest of the country. That is why, for example, $400 million was spent in the past three years to train the unemployed and jobless. This amount was raised to $2.2 billion this year and tens of thousands of unemployed people will have a chance to acquire skills with which they can return to the labour market.

We must consider how we can help people. To encourage investments, we need a skilled work force, and that is where the emphasis was put in last week's statement.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, last week, the minister said that these policies, which would put the unemployed on welfare, showed that the government had balls. I, for one, am glad I do not have any. Today, more than two million people are on welfare, and these policies will put even more people on welfare.

Why does the Minister of Employment and Immigration keep hurthing the neediest in our society? Why are his policies so unfair?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the truth is that since the last recession in 1981-82, people who exhaust their unemployment insurance benefits and go on welfare represent about 10 per cent of the total. To hear the hon. member talk, you would think everybody was going on welfare. The statistics are clear. They show that 70 per cent of these people are back on the labour market within six months. What matters is how we are going to help people get back on the labour market. We on this side of the House say that the key is training. That is why we have increased our resources for training the unemployed and other Canadians to a total of $3.8 billion this year, something unprecedented in Canada's history.

[English]

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Youth.

When the minister took over the youth portfolio in April 1991, 390,000 young people were out of work. Nineteen months later that figure has increased to an incredible 438,000 people. Over 40,000 more young people have joined the ranks of the unemployed since this minister took office.

Specifically, what is the minister going to do to get these young people back to work?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member and everybody in this House knows, we have been living through a recession. Unfortunately young people have suffered from the effects of the recession like the older people, that is people beyond 24 years of age.

The hon. member should recognize that the economic statement of last week is the instrument to permit everybody, including youth, to get back to work and to benefit from the situation that is going to prevail in 1993, including the creation of 300,000 new jobs.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, when the minister was talking on Friday about creating jobs, he gave no specific details on job creation for Canada's 438,000 young people out of work. In fact, the economic statement of the Minister of Finance makes no mention of any job creation program directed at youth.

Why is there no specific job creation program to get our young people back to work today?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would recommend that the hon. member reread the economic statement, which I am sure he has not done yet. The statement clearly identifies the initiatives with respect to partnerships and to small business, which creates 80 per cent of the jobs in this country.

SOMALIA

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

We are all deeply affected by the tragedy in Somalia. I think Canada's participation in UN activities in this country is appropriate in that we are using Canadian troops for humanitarian purposes.

However, a decision to send troops into a war zone is a major one that should be debated by Parliament before the fact. This decision was made without consulting Parliament, without debate.

I would like to put the following question to the minister: Why was this intervention not debated in the House?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is the government's responsibility to formulate and make decisions on major issues, such as the situation in Somalia. However, we have offered, first of all, an opportunity for discussion or debate in the House and that opportunity will be given this evening. We also offered to brief members of the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party on the details this afternoon, before the debate.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. My first question asked why, on such an important matter as sending troops—not that I have an objection to that—was there not a debate in the House of Commons before the decision was taken, with all of the reasons presented to the Canadian public so that we can have a real debate. It is an abrogation of the democratic process for the government to say: after we have taken the decision, we will have a debate on it.

I want to ask the minister this. The role of Canadian troops is not entirely clear. When will Canadian troops be leaving? To whom will the Canadian military forces be accountable? What precisely will be their role and who is paying the cost?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, much of this will come out in the discussion tonight.

As I said to the hon. member, it is the responsibility of the government to take decisions in a timely way. It was important that we respond to the request immediately. It is our responsibility and our prerogative to do that.

In the initial announcement we said that we would look forward to a parliamentary discussion of the issue, so we have been very forthcoming from the beginning with information.

The unified command held briefings in New York on the weekend and all of these things are emerging. We will make them as clear as we can tonight in the debate and before the week is out.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Clearly the government does not care about the democratic process. The minister made statements outside the House on what the decisions of the government would be and did not make these statements inside the House.

Surely the Government of Canada has a responsibility to seek the wisdom of all sides of this House on such an important matter.

As we read in the media—not discussed here—we realize that this is a short-term exercise in Somalia. We know that it also needs a long-term solution.

What initiatives has her government taken to ensure a long-term solution after the military relief effort is over, and what assurances do the people of Somalia and the world have that the situation existing now will not simply continue as it is?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in announcing our decision on Friday, I said that we would be taking part in this first phase but that we would not remain to perform a peacekeeping function.

I informed our Ambassador to the United Nations last night on the telephone that obviously there will be a need for other things afterward besides peacekeeping forces. There will need to be assistance in building some of the democratic institutions, the infrastructure and so on, bringing some kind of orderly economic development into Somalia. We are a very aware of that.

I have asked her to tell the Secretary-General that we will be working on some ideas and some proposals with the United Nations for what comes afterward.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In 1984 the Prime Minister of Canada promised to inflict prosperity on the Atlantic region. It has been eight years since that commitment, and it is not prosperity with which we have been inflicted but rather unemployment which has afflicted the people of the Atlantic region.

Last week in his budget the Minister of Finance made a bad situation worse by announcing cuts to the Atlantic freight rate subsidy, cuts to the Atlantic inter-regional subsidy and cuts to the Atlantic selective westbound subsidy.

How does this government expect to inflict prosperity or even bring a measure of prosperity or even nudge Atlantic Canada toward prosperity when it continues to cut the region adrift from the rest of this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows—and many members on his side of the House have pointed it out—that there has been upward pressure on the deficit due to the very dramatic decline in revenues. We have gone through a process of broad based belt tightening all across the board in order to get a better handle on the deficit and to contain it as best as we possibly can.

We took a number of measures to reduce expenditures, but we also took a number of measures to invest in growth, jobs, people and economic activity so that we could generate jobs and growth. We emphasized training and we emphasized a number of infrastructure projects like the fixed link and improvements in the road system which will be very important to the Atlantic region.

In order to do that and to create that job activity in the very short term, we had to go through a process of reallocation. It is important that be pointed out because we have gone through a process of reallocation to put money in those areas that would generate the kind of economic activity and the job creation activity that the hon. member, I am sure, recognizes and that needs to be fulfilled.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the freight rates for the Atlantic region have been in place since 1927. This government has arbitrarily cut these subsidies, without consulting any of the provinces, without consulting the Atlantic provinces' economic council or the Atlantic provinces transportation commission. They will primarily impact upon manufactured, value added industries, and the minister knows that.

Is the minister prepared to stay these transportation subsidy cuts, to consult with the provincial governments in Atlantic Canada and to consult with the transportation commission to realize a sensible approach to these transportation programs and not to destroy arbitrarily a program that has been in place for nearly 60 years in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there comes a time when governments are faced with the difficult choice of having to contain spending.

We are at the point where because of the dramatic decline in revenues we have to take extraordinary steps to bring our spending and our revenues more in line. We are asking Canadians across the board; it is not only that there is an attack on the Atlantic region or any one region of the country.

What we are proposing here are across the board reductions for a period of time. It is an exercise in belt tightening so that we can preserve in the future those programs that are so important, have been so important in the past and will be in the future as well.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

In a radio interview this weekend on CBC commenting on the government's drug patent policy, the minister said: "It is not a health issue. Whether it is a bicycle, whether it is a song, whether it is a drug, it is all just intellectual property".

This policy is all about health care. It is all about Canadian consumers and Canadian health care systems having to fork out billions of dollars more to multinational drug companies.

How could the minister possibly make such a ridiculous statement which effectively equates the integrity of Canada's health care system to the patent on a hockey helmet?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to see that the hon. member is now listening to me. It is the first time in the last three years he has even listened to me.

What I mentioned was that obviously this legislation was about intellectual property. Patented drugs represent only 3 per cent of total health costs in this country so the 97 per cent are other matters such as hospital costs, surgery and all those things, as well as generic drugs.

What we should do with that is look at whether Canada wants to be in line with the rest of the world as far as intellectual property is concerned. This is what this bill is all about.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The Minister of Health of British Columbia, Elizabeth Cull, stated clearly: "The British Columbia health care plan will pay out over $145 million more for just two drugs as a result of this government's patent policy".

When will the minister stop working for the interest of multinational drug companies and start working for the interest of Canadian consumers, the people he was elected to serve?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I think that in the past several months, we could have really discussed the facts instead of fears and instead of frightening Canadian consumers. I believe that the figures speak for themselves; the most accurate estimates we have now show that the increase will not be more than $125 million over five years. That is a dollar per Canadian per year. Beyond that, we have already obtained $1.1 billion in investment since 1987. We will get $500 million more in the coming months so that Canadian researchers, physicians and universities throughout Canada can be in the major leagues of research. I think we owe that to Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a copy of a letter dated February 26, 1992 from the U.S. multinational drug companies to U.S. trade negotiator Carla Hills, which states:

> In clear, straightforward language, the NAFTA must require Canada to dismantle its discriminatory compulsory licensing regime for pharmaceutical products and to suspend the granting of any compulsory licences from December 20, 1991 forward.

My question is for the minister answering for the minister of trade. Will the minister confirm that Bill C-91 accomplishes both of these U.S. goals and confirm that with the NAFTA Canadian governments will lose sovereignty and will not be allowed to bring back compulsory licensed low cost generic drugs?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, there are two questions and the answer to both is no.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, it is now clear that the December 20, 1991 retroactive date was not required by GATT but was directed by the U.S. pharmaceutical industry and resulted in 24 drugs receiving up to 13 years additional patent protection.

In view of this, will the government do the honourable thing in the face of this corporate greed and withdraw Bill C-91?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I think that my colleague is leaving something out. December 20, 1991 was the date Mr. Dunkel, GATT Secretary General, tabled his report and all industrialized countries that make pharmaceutical products and do basic research accepted this date. I do not see why Canada should have a date different from the rest. It is not by choice or related to trilateral or bilateral negotiations but because we live in a world where more and more barriers are coming down. Canada wants to be a leader in basic research, which will help Canadians and Canada enter the 21st century not as copiers but as a country that does basic research.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

The North American free trade agreement involves a thorough restructuring of our economy. From now on Japan, through Mexico, will be within driving distance of our domestic markets.

Why does the government keep repeating the same mistakes it made in the free trade agreement with the United States? Why, in last week's minibudget, did the minister refuse to prepare Canadian workers and businesses for this unprecedented level of international competition?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should take the trouble to read last week's statement.

If we look at the statement over all and the major investment in human resources, in training, there we have Canada's key to success on international markets, the key to being competitive and productive.

The hon. member has been asking us to invest more in human resources, and now that we have, I am waiting for a token of approval.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the fund went broke last June and what the government has put in place will not carry it through the last summer. The fact is that it is substantially short of the mark and it is going to bear a terrible penalty for it.

There can be no worse time to enter into a free trade agreement such as the one this government wants with Mexico than during a period of crippling unemployment. Those who are at the greatest risk are the middle aged who are without training and the young who have no employment history. NAFTA as it is is a bad deal for Canada.

Why is this government compounding its failure? Why is the government refusing to bring in adjustment measures now to help those for whom Mexico represents the greatest threat? Or, was last week's budget indeed the government's final response to NAFTA? That would be the unkindest thrust of all.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just said that the moneys we had raised for training unemployed Canadians would not last. I do not know how long he said, but it is not enough. This is the party that opposed the activation of this passive fund within UI.

If the Liberals and the House are ready today to pass a unanimous resolution to increase that activation of the UI fund, I am ready to do it today.

MANITOBA

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Last week, as the minister will know, the Prime Minister took his travelling show out to Winnipeg, but instead of being greeted by rousing crowds of enthusiastic supporter he was greeted by very angry Manitobans, including the premier of Manitoba who could not even be bothered to stay for dinner.

Given the opposition in Manitoba to the scorched earth policy, again reconfirmed in the Wednesday mini budget, could the Prime Minister not come back and instruct his minister to rewrite the budget and give something, one little thing, to Manitoba?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is something in the economic plan that I outlined last week for every province and every region of the country.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

So far this government has not committed itself to a proper highway construction project in Manitoba, has not confirmed that it is going to support the core area initiative despite three years of promises, and has not even found a site for the virology lab which was first publicized four years ago.

When are these promises going to be lived up to? When is the government finally going to do something for the province of Manitoba?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the member is dead wrong. It is in his riding. It is at the corner of Tecumseh and William. If he does not know where Tecumseh and William is, I will take him to his riding some time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

Last Wednesday after the finance minister's mini budget, one of the delegates at the B.C. Federation of Labour Convention explained that he had been fired for representing a union member in a grievance. It took months, with the help of the union, to reinstate him.

During that time he survived on UI. When he won reinstatement, he was granted $20,000 retroactive pay from which he repaid UI. Under the proposed new rules, he would be unable to collect that UI. Will the minister acknowledge that the disqualification of those fired for cause is unjust, unfair and will he reconsider this cruel proposal to ensure that people have an opportunity to appeal their firings?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in 1991–92 there were 225,000 Canadians who quit a job without reason. They are the only people who will be affected by these changes, those who voluntarily quit a job without just cause, not those who have a good reason, those who have a just cause. This government in amending the Unemployment Insurance Act put those reasons in the act.

The process for determining just cause is not touched at all. It will not change the situation from what it was before. The only difference is that employers and employees, hard working Canadians, will not subsidize paying benefits to a person who quits a job for no reason.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, if the minister wants to talk about those who leave voluntarily as opposed to those who are fired—my question was about firing—I will talk about those who leave voluntarily.

At that same convention a woman delegate got to her feet and, fighting back tears, explained to the delegation that as a non-union worker, she left a non-union job because she had been sexually harassed. She told of how humiliated she was, how frightened of her employer she was and how emotionally she could not face taking him on. She also said that in her industry, if she had taken on her employer, she would never have worked again.

She quit and searched for another job, knowing she would have UI. What will this woman and hundreds of other women in Canada do if they will not be eligible for UI under this process? Will the minister, knowing that women cannot take on the system, rethink this wrong-headed policy?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the NDP keeps insisting that sexual harassment is not a just cause. I am telling them it is and they, as representatives of the people of this country, should stop arguing.

CYPRUS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs who is aware that during this coming week the government must decide whether or not it is going to renew our peacekeeping commitment in Cyprus. Although we have been in Cyprus now for some 28 years, and the government is being pressed to undertake new peacekeeping commitments elsewhere, surely the minister will agree that Canada should stay in Cyprus, finish the job and bring it to a successful conclusion before we leave Cyprus and risk another war. Or, is this decision to be made solely on the basis of cost at the same time we are undertaking other commitments elsewhere in the world?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the decision will be made very shortly. I should say it will not be made solely on reasons of cost. In fact, in this case that is a relatively small matter compared with some of our other operations.

I should say that after 28 years, Canada feels that it has done an excellent job in the region. We are very disappointed that up until now, negotiations have not been successful. In fact, the negotiations that have been going on this year have gone on partly because Canada last January raised this with the Secretary General and indicated at that time that we would pull out if there is not progress.

I should say as well that whatever Canada's decision, it does not necessarily mean an end to peacekeeping in Cyprus. There are countries that can be called upon and it is the responsibility of the Secretary General, if he feels that peacekeeping should continue, as long as the Security Council continues to appropriate itself to him, to fill that role.

The House will know very shortly what our decision is.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. What are the latest developments in the GATT Uruguay round and what repercussions will they have on the Canadian agricultural industry?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the initial agreement reached recently by the Americans and the Europeans obviously brought the subject back on the table. As you know, the Europeans reacted in various ways. For us it was good news because as far as Canada's exports are concerned, it is important to stop these outrageous subsidies which have destroyed agriculture in many parts of the world as a result of the billions of dollars spent on subsidies.

However, negotiations are expected to resume, probably next week which is expected to be very busy, and Canada will be well represented at the talks to ensure that as far as the marketing boards are concerned, which are represented across Canada, and especially in the maritimes, Quebec and Ontario, the position on article XI is maintained. We will do everything we can, together with the people in the industry, to defend Canada's position.

MUNICIPAL TAXATION

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Buried in the fine print of last week's mini budget is a sinister policy change which potentially could increase taxes at the municipal level and ultimately to homeowners, renters and small businesses.

The federal government is freezing its grants in lieu of taxes program at the 1992 levels, a reversal of its commitment to municipalities. How does the minister expect municipalities to make up for this 1993 budgetary shortfall other than by raising property taxes and why should municipalities be forced to fund this government's mismanagement of the economy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, again we are talking about a freeze here. I should advise the hon. member that there have been discussions going on with the various authorities to get a better formula with respect to this.

I think it would be fair to say that this would not come as a great surprise. It is a $400 million bill and we are constraining expenditures in various ways. We expect other governments to do the same.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, this policy is just another example of how this government pretends to solve its problems by dumping them on to other levels of government.

The changes to the unemployment insurance benefits will download millions on to the municipal and provincial governments. The freezing of the federal government's payments to municipalities will also result in budgetary shortfalls at the municipal levels.

I want to ask the minister how the over-all health of the Canadian economy, which he likes to talk about all the time, will be improved by forcing homeowners, renters and small businesses to pay, not less taxes, but more taxes to municipalities?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier in response to a question, this is a general belt tightening right across the board and we are asking all Canadians and all governments to participate in this exercise.

The hon. member knows very well that the federal government has had to constrain expenditures in order to keep the deficit under control, and it is still rising.

The hon. member is suggesting that we should not implement any cost savings and, at the same time, the members of his party are advocating the expenditure of some $15 billion on infrastructure. I ask the hon. member where he would get that kind of money without some corresponding reductions or reallocation. That is what we are attempting to do. He is either going to borrow more or he is going to tax more. What is he going to do?

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In his mini budget last week, the minister announced a 10 per cent cut in industrial milk subsidies paid to dairy farmers. Since the Minister of Finance is the former Minister of Agriculture, is he not aware of the harm he will do to dairy farmers?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to meet milk producers last week, on Thursday to be precise. Yes, they are rather disappointed, but when we look at it in perspective, this cut is only 1 per cent of the cost of a hectolitre. Since a hectolitre sells for $50, it is only 60 cents on $50, which is quite little, all in all.

Under the formula used to set the price of industrial milk in Canada—and my colleague must know how it works—the milk producers' costs are assessed every six months. The farmers are therefore able to establish their production costs. This means that this amount of 60 cents will be evaluated every year and they will be able to get all or part of it back when the price of milk is set, twice a year.

I think that the milk producers are reacting a little too strongly to the news, which is quite a small cut, all in all, under the circumstances.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the minister is quite right when he says that farmers are reacting violently to this cut. He knows that during the past couple of years farmers have had their quotas cut by 10 per cent. On April 1 the minister is proposing to slash that income support program by another 10 per cent. When there is such great uncertainty in this industry already because farmers do not trust this government in the GATT negotiations because of what happened in the FTA, why is the government chopping this income by millions and millions of dollars to Canadian dairy producers? Why?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the member is not accurate when he says this is an income program. It is a subsidy that has been paid to producers because of the cost of production method that we have at this time. The subsidy is there, like all grants and contributions, throughout the whole of the government. We are talking about an $8.5 billion reduction in expenditures by the Government of Canada and agriculture is paying part of that.

Mr. Speaker, we have as you know over $20 billion in debt in the agriculture sector. The interest rate fluctuations we have seen over the last number of weeks, because of the view of the international market of Canada, cost agriculture hundreds of millions of dollars. Just 1 per cent in our debt costs agriculture $100 million.

We know it is difficult, but all parts of the government with the exception of those cost shared income programs, safety nets, have been reduced.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Culture and Communications. The father of a 15-year old boy contacted me in my office recently. It had to do with the 1-976 sex lines. The phone bill was substantial. It was the first inkling that the boy was phoning these numbers. His concern was how this this number can be kept from the use of young people. There are plenty of ads today. There is a full-page ad in one of our Ottawa papers of these 1-976 telephone numbers.

My question to the minister is, what does the government intend to do to take care of this type of situation for a 15-year old and other young people?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I fully share my hon. friend's concern. When we have a situation where young people are enticed to call and receive sexually explicit material and when this is automatically added to the phone bill, it is a situation that is not acceptable.

I have spoken to the chairman of the CRTC with regard to this and I will be writing to him to ask the CRTC to look into this matter to see if there are ways in which families can be given better protection.

EXTERNAL AID

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Yesterday of course was the National Day of Remembrance for the Victims of Violence against Women. All Canadians joined in an outpouring of feeling that we should do all we can to end the scourge of violence against women.

Within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State for External Affairs comes the issue of humanitarian relief, particularly in Bosnia-Hercegovina. At this time, the world is witnessing the systematic rape and assault of Muslim women and girls under the direction of the armed forces of the Serbian government and its surrogates.

Will the minister agree that at least some of the humanitarian funds designated by Canada in the same fashion as is being done from Germany will be set aside for those women, victims of sexual assault and rape in Bosnia, as a mark of our concern in honour of the national day of remembrance in this country?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have looked at a number of ways in which to make our aid to that region as effective as possible. I know there were some suggestions on this subject which came forward from the human rights group that was headed by Mr. Broadbent.

I should say that we do this in some areas in the world. We do it in Africa, for example, where there is specific funding targeted toward women in development. We have done it for women in other areas.

I am certainly open to the idea. We want to use our funding for humanitarian aid in that region as well as we can.

There is no question that what is going on there with regard to the Muslims and the atrocities committed on all sides are in many ways particularly hard on women. I would be quite happy to see if there is something we can do along these lines.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my first question to the minister of employment was regarding a worker fired with cause. The minister responded twice that this policy only applies to voluntary quits. In the economic and fiscal statement it states: "Persons who voluntarily quit their jobs—"

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, I have to advise the hon. member that is a question of debate. She may wish to pursue it further, but it is not an appropriate point of order.

BILL C-93—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I have a judgment to render. On Friday, December 4, 1992, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond rose on a point of order relating to the omnibus nature of Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992. I would like to thank him for the succinctness of his presentation. I would also like to thank the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader for his intervention.

[Translation]

I have reviewed the matter and am now prepared to rule on the point of order.

The purpose of Bill C-93 is to wind up and transfer or merge the functions, and in some cases the staff, of nine government organizations to other government agencies or departments, and provide for the continuation and ultimate dissolution of the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

[English]

The objections raised by the hon. member were that the bill not only would wind up some agencies, but it would also make major changes to public policy with regard to the role of government. The House leader of the Official Opposition stated that if properly drafted, the long title of the bill would indicate its purpose of terminating specific agencies by name, revealing what he felt was the real purpose of the bill. He also argued that it is an omnibus bill and ought to be sent back to the drafters to be divided.

These points are very similar to the arguments presented by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond concerning the omnibus nature of Bill C-63, an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies, on which I ruled on April 1, 1992. As noted at that time, one of the purposes of omnibus bills is to group together multiple statutory amendments so that discussion in the House may be focused. It was also pointed out that the Speaker has not been given any specific authority over the form or content of omnibus bills.

I would refer hon. members to the ruling of April 1, 1992, which dealt in some detail with the very points raised on Friday last by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. The arguments presented in relation to Bill C-93, while put forward with skill, have not convinced me that the Chair should deviate from our practice. Accordingly, I must conclude that it would not be appropriate under these circumstances to accept the objections raised.

Therefore, the bill is properly before the House.

ORDER IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF PLACEMENTS

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege to rise today in the House and table, in accordance with Standing Order 32(2), in both official languages, Order in Council P.C. 1992-2519 which places members of the Canadian Armed Forces on active service for the multinational military effort in and around Somalia.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

HEALTH AND WELFARE, SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SENIORS AND THE STATUS OF WOMEN

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO SUBCOMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, on February 19, 1992 a report of the subcommittee of the standing committee on health, welfare and social affairs tabled a report in this House on hepatitis B. The report called upon the government to initiate a national hepatitis B vaccination program.

To date, 10 months later, the government has failed to respond to this report. In view of that some of the provincial governments have had to start initiating programs on their own. This means we are now developing a patchwork instead of an integrated public health program that would protect all Canadians.

The government has had 10 months to respond to this report. When does it intend to file a response to the hepatitis B report?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have heard my friend's representation and I will undertake to respond to him as soon as possible.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): On the same point, Mr. Speaker. There are 17 reports awaiting a response from the government, 17 reports of standing committees of this House that have not received an answer in the appropriate time. Seventeen is a lot of reporting.

I know the parliamentary secretary is a fair and serious man. Will he give us an undertaking that we will have an answer by tomorrow as to why these reports are not in the possession of the House?

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, as the House is aware all of us were preoccupied for some weeks with the referendum question. That now being behind us, these reports are now emerging.

While I cannot guarantee they will be available tomorrow, I can tell my hon. friend I have given assurances and I am sure myself that a large number of them will be deposited during the course of this week.

I cannot promise a deluge, but there will certainly be a flurry.

TOBACCO RESTRAINT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-382, an act to amend the Tobacco Restraint Act (persons under the age of 18 years).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Malone: This bill is part of a series of initiatives that needs to be undertaken to enhance the health of Canadians. The bill yields two significant achievements. First, it raises the legal age for the purchase and use of tobacco from 16 to 18. Second, it increases the penalty for retailers who sell tobacco or tobacco products to minors.

The present legislation was enacted in 1908. It established that a person under the age of 16 convicted of smoking will be reprimanded upon first offence, be fined not in excess of $1 upon second offence, and be fined not in excess of $4 on third or subsequent offences.

These amendments will allow an outdated and therefore useless law to become effective.

Tobacco use in Canada is our greatest health problem and each year 35,000 Canadians die because of smoking. That is more than the combined deaths caused by drug abuse, AIDS, murder, suicide and motor vehicle traffic accidents.

These amendments will correct an otherwise ineffective and inappropriate law.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Malone moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and printed.

SPECIAL DEBATE

SITUATION IN SOMALIA

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find there is unanimous consent for the following motion:

That notwithstanding any Standing Order of this House, on Monday, December 7, 1992 immediately after the supply proceedings have been disposed of and after the deferred vote on second reading of Bill C-98, this House shall continue to sit and proceed with a special debate;

That for the purpose of this special debate the question before the House shall be:

"That this House affirm its support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted with regard to the present situation in Somalia and for Canadian participation in the multinational effort to establish as soon as possible a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia";

That no member be permitted to speak more than once and that speeches be limited to a maximum of 20 minutes;

That under the provisions of this order, the Speaker shall not entertain any dilatory motions or quorum calls;

That when no further member rises to speak, but no later than three hours after the commencement of this special debate, all questions necessary to dispose of the motion shall be put and if a recorded division is requested, it shall be deferred until Tuesday, December 8, 1992 at 3 p.m.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions with opposition parties with regard to the substance of the motion.

We are prepared to offer our consent to the motion. I do want to make the caveat that during debate, there may be occasion when members on our side will utilize the provisions of the Standing Orders and speak for ten and five, if that is in accordance with our understanding.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate our support for having a special debate tonight. My only regret is that we did not have a debate before the action was announced by the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

SOCIAL SCIENCES AND HUMANITIES RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in the petition I am presenting, the petitioners ask the government that the merger of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council be halted until there is appropriate consultation.

They point out that Canada's major challenges today: the level of poverty, the level of unemployment, people being fed by food banks, people receiving social assistance, are really of the domain of the social sciences and humanities. They plead that to proceed as the government has indicated it wishes to is a step backward.

They ask that it be deferred, that there be consultation before a decision is made. I concur and I hope that the government will support these petitioners.

[Translation]

LANGUAGE USED ON RADIO AND TELEVISION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition in which the petitioners ask the Parliament of Canada to ensure that the CRTC carefully regulates the language used on radio and television programs.

They point out that on many occasions they have noted that the kind of language used is contrary to the efforts being made in homes throughout Canada.

They add that it is not necessary to use such language, which is a form of violence, and since we are very sensitive to violence in our society, there should be unanimous support for this proposal.

[English]

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present.

The first one is from a group of my constituents in the Portage district who petition the government to find ways to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I also have five other petitions, not uncommon to this House in recent times, about changing the Criminal Code so that the Young Offenders Act would be updated and the Juvenile Delinquent Act be amended to a lower maximum age of 13 years.

These petitions come from Portage la Prairie and surrounding communities and I present them to the House today.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present to the House today.

The first is from residents of Victoria, Sidney and the Gulf Islands. It is from concerned citizens who care about Canada losing a first class telephone system. That risk will increase if the CRTC accepts the proposal by Unitel and B.C. Rail to enter the telecommunications market.

The petitioners ask the government to consult with all affected parties, especially rural residents who risk substantially increased costs for telephone calls. I present that petition. It is a domestic issue.

THREE GORGES HYDRO PROJECT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the other issue on which I have a number of petitions to present to the House concerns something more distant.

It is the Three Gorges hydro project in China. These petitioners are from as far away as Toronto, Regina, Saskatchewan and all over Ontario. They ask the government to refuse to participate in or provide technical assistance, loans, grants, guarantees or subsidies in any form for any aspect of the Three Gorges dam project from this day on.

I urge the government to hear these petitioners and to act accordingly.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition from residents of Cadillac, stating that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and unacceptable because they encourage further violence.

It says that all toys that are an incentive to violent games are unacceptable and that production of such toys should be banned. Freedom of the press should be restricted when reporting acts of violence. The repeated reporting of acts of violence on all television channels and on radio may encourage similar acts of violence.

Wherefore, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass legislation dealing with the above, to wipe out violence in our society, protect our children and guarantee everyone in this country a better quality of life.

[English]

BILL C-268

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a host of petitions with thousands of names from residents of Nipissing Band No. 10, Sudbury, Hamilton, Blue River, Harrison Lake, Penticton, Lewis Creek, Clearwater, North Bay, Courtenay, Toronto, Kenora, Yellowknife, Charlottetown, Sturgeon Falls, Garden Valley, Sioux Valley, Kingston, Sioux Lookout, Kamloops, Barriere, Mine Centre, Kipawa, Mission, Victoria and Saskatoon.

All of these people support Bill C-268 which is an act respecting a national solidarity day for the First Nations of Canada. The record will show that when the bill was presented, the Progressive Conservatives in the House of Commons did not support it and consequently it was defeated.

• (1520)

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of Canadians from Winnipeg, Manitoba and Dundurn, Saskatchewan.

The petitioners urge the government not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22, passed in 1987, so that Canadians will have the full benefit of lower priced generic drugs. In this way, provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees and/or provide less service.

They do this because after 1987 when Bill C-22 was passed, drug prices did increase. Bill C-91 extends the time from 10 years to 20 years for the prohibition of generic drug manufacture in Canada. The drug companies simply do not need 20 years of exclusivity for their drugs.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I notice that there is no one from the government side to move the usual motion that the questions stand. Perhaps now someone could respond.

I notice that question No. 406 has been on the Order Paper since September 16. You will know that the 45-day limit has long passed, Mr. Speaker. That question was in regard to the use of government aircraft by the Prime Minister.

Question No. 407 of September 16 was in regard to the number of secure telephones that the Government of Canada has purchased.

Neither of those questions has been answered. In particular, the first one is a very easy one to answer. It is now about 65 days since I asked the question. The government, according to our rules, only has 45 days to answer.

I was wondering, Mr. Speaker, if the parliamentary secretary would be in a position to give us at least a commitment that these questions will be answered before the adjournment at the end of this week.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to apologize to you and to the House for being a little tardy in responding to your call. I would beg your indulgence, Sir.

I can get to my friend's question if the House would allow me to revert to responses to Questions on the Order Paper, and then I would be prepared to proceed, if the House would agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We will then resume consideration of Questions on the Order Paper.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 410 and 412.

[Text]

Question No. 410—Mr. Barrett:

Does the Minister of International Trade have a list of "third party support" for the North American free trade agreement and, if so, what are the names of these companies and individuals and what materials, if any, have been sent to them in relation to NAFTA?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): A list of NAFTA "third party" supporters does not exist. However, what does exist is a computer list of public statements on NAFTA and/or trade which have been gathered from the press. Indeed, I myself am included in this list.

The list tabled November 23, 1992 under Question No. 409, assits us in both identifying public information needs and co-ordinating our trade communications. David Helwig, a journalist from St. Thomas, Ontario, writing in the Toronto Star (September 19, 1992) stated that: "the computer disk lists 200 letters to newspaper editors and articles judged to be favourable or neutral toward the NAFTA, compared to only 79 negative".

Question No. 412—Mr. Angus:

Does the government, under the Department of National Defence, own and operate a vessel called HMCS Protecteur and, if so, (a) has the HMCS Protecteur visited ports of call or travelled through inland waterways west of the Welland Canal (b) what were the dates of any such passage through the Welland Canal (c) what were the problems associated with HMCS Protecteur moving through the Welland Canal system?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): The Department of National Defence owns and operates a vessel called HMCS Protecteur.

a) HMCS Protecteur has not transited through the Welland Canal system and has therefore not visited any ports of call west of the canal.

b) See a).

c) Passage of HMCS Protecteur through the Welland Canal system was regarded as a safety risk to both the ship and the locks themselves owing to the very narrow clearances between the vessel and the canal walls.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: I appreciate my friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell asking about questions Nos. 406 and 407. I can assure him that the response to question No. 406 is in the final stages of preparation, and that the response to question No. 407 should be ready shortly. I have been chasing this one for my friend and I will give it a little more diligence and see what we can produce for him.

Mr. Boudria: Thank you.

Mr. Duhamel: I believe that my colleague, the parliamentary secretary, will remember that it was almost a year ago that I asked a question that went somewhat as follows: How many dollars in taxes have been collected from the goods and services tax and which amounts, if any, of that have been given toward the deficit and the debt. To my knowledge that has not yet been answered. Apparently I am not in error. About three weeks ago I asked again in this House when this question would be answered. Two weeks ago I asked once again. I gave my colleague one week's rest so that he could be absolutely certain to get me those answers. As he can well appreciate, constituents are really concerned about the goods and services tax money and where it is going.

I wonder if we can get a commitment today that this series of questions will be answered by the end of the week before we recess.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend from St. Boniface well knows, the question has been answered in a different way. Nonetheless, he deserves a response to his questions.

He will recall that on Wednesday last the Minister of Finance confirmed what Canadians all happily know and that is that every net nickel raised by the goods and services tax goes to debt and deficit reduction by law.

However I can tell my friend that his prodding and my inquiries have resulted in this file moving upward and that it is in sight. I think we can promise that there will be something, I hesitate to say a specific day, but very, very soon.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—GOVERNMENT ECONOMIC POLICY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Copps (p. 14701).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): After consideration, the Speaker is ready to declare that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor is in order.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to the motion tabled by the Liberal Party and its spokesperson and to the amendment moved by the NDP.

In a debate like this, I think it is important to consider what the situation was like in the past, what it is like now, and what we would like to see in the future. In this context, we must talk about productivity growth. It is not a new phenomenon, and I think many people in this country are familiar with the word. However, if we look at the statistics, we see that in this country, we need to improve our current level of productivity if we are to progress. As I say this, we are aware, of course, that Canada is recovering from a world recession. Although you may hear the opposition parties say this is a made-in-Canada recession, you and I know perfectly well that is not true. Most countries in the world have experienced or are experiencing economic problems.

If we look at world growth, in 1988 it was 4.3 per cent, while this year, in 1992, it will be about 1 per cent. The United States, Japan, Great Britain, Germany and all other industrialized countries, including Canada, have had a very difficult year as far as the economy and growth are concerned. Furthermore, Canada is now undergoing major industrial restructuring. We all know about the liberalization of trade with the United States, Mexico and the rest of the world. We also know that technical and technological changes are accelerating in this country. We may not come first. We may not lead in that field. Maybe we should step up our efforts.

Our productivity, technological changes, the global recession, all have to be taken into consideration when the Minister of Finance comes up with an economic plan. The opposition takes the plan and throws it in the garbage. It says: "It is no good" without even having looked the whole thing over, as I just said, and without suggesting alternatives either, which is unfortunate.

You know, Mr. Speaker, when you are talking about this or that with your colleagues and you disagree with one of them, you normally say something like: "I do not agree on this or that and I think this is what we should do. I think that the answer is No. 4".

What we are seeing here is the opposition saying: "What the government is suggesting is no good". That is all we have been hearing for three, four days now—I am not sure exactly how long any more. They keep repeating this without offering sound, practical alternatives. We have to be realistic here.

The members opposite talked about a $12 billion road infrastructure project across the country. It might be a fine idea, but it is just not practical in the present Canadian economic context with the debt we inherited from that government in the context of 1980–81. We all know the difficult times we have gone through then. Inflation was 10 per cent. Interest rates were running as high as 22, 23 and 24 percent. They are suggesting we increase the deficit and allow inflation to rise again. Automatically, interest rates will start rising too. Then what? You end up with job creation projects for six or eight months, a year if you are lucky, without the real issues, the problem with productivity, new technologies and the global recession having been dealt with.

That is what we have to work with, the basic factors, and the Minister of Finance has done just that. That is why his economic plan is sound. It is hard to stomach. Not everyone is happy with it. I for one. But this plan is set in a Canadian and global context.

We talk about the current debt exceeding $400 billions, but where does this debt come from? It was $206 billion when we were elected in 1984. Add to that interest on $206 billion since 1984 and you get the amount of the current debt. This means that since 1984, this government has managed to no longer borrow to pay for programs, government operations, government spending, except for debt charges.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, our accumulated operating surplus since the fiscal year 1987–88 is nearly $34 billion, which means that had it not been for the debt charges we have had to pay on the debt we inherited, we would now have a $33 billion surplus in our coffers.

Again, the opposition will argue: "No wonder. You have raised taxes umpteen times since". This government's operating surplus since 1987–88 is due in part to a 30 per cent tax hike and in part to 70 per cent cuts in government spending. We have administered, we have managed this country as well as it could be. There is still room for improvement. There is no doubt in my mind about that. However, we have taken big steps to ensure that on every tax dollar paid to government, not one per cent goes toward the interest on the debt, not one per cent has to be taken to borrow to pay for the day–to–day stuff, the equivalent of groceries for a family. The money which comes in here stays here and pays all the government's expenses and some is left. Unfortunately, the problem is that there is not enough left to pay the huge amount of interest on the immense debt we inherited.

In that context, the finance minister's economic plan is important. In a difficult period of global change, we must have a vision of the future. The Minister of Finance and the Government of Canada must take measures that may seem Draconian but are important in the long run for the well–being of a community and a country called Canada.

Again, I challenge the opposition. Instead of a motion condemning the government, which is easy to do—The motion of the hon. member for Hamilton East has two lines: That the House of Commons condemn the government for its economic policy which is no good. Two lines. Where are the suggestions? Where are the improvements to the system which the opposition could very well suggest and which we would be ready to listen to and work on for the good of Canada? Again, I did say these should be valid, feasible suggestions. Do not ask us to spend more and more; the government has none. Forget about spending projects. We must act and as we said in 1984, we are acting and will continue to act to reduce the deficit. Canada must not end up totally in debt. That is why the measures taken are not easy.

I think that we must honestly see the positive points. In the third quarter, housing sales and starts increased over last year. This is partly due to a measure that the Minister of Finance put in the 1992 budget allowing the use of RRSP money for the purchase of new homes. Domestic demand in Canada and purchases have increased and 77,000 new jobs have been created since April. I am in a good position to tell you and to know that that is not enough in Canada, in the Trois–Rivières region or in Quebec. But when do you hear about the 77,000 jobs created since April? When, in this House, does a member of the opposition rise to congratulate the government for the 77,000 jobs it has created? After all, 77,000 new jobs is better than nothing. But no, when a member rises it is to talk about all those who are unemployed, again without necessarily suggesting solutions, or else to propose solutions that would make the inflation rate go up. We know that if inflation goes up, interest rates will also go up. Consumers, small businesses and large companies will not be able to improve technically, benefit from the new technology and be competitive if interest rates go up to 20 per cent or 22 per cent and inflation is 10 per cent. We know that because we experienced this situation in 1981–82. It simply does not work.

I also want to talk about the famous GST. The GST replaced the federal sales tax which had been in existence for 65 years and which taxed people at a 13.5 per cent rate, unbeknown to them. A 13.5 per cent tax was applied on cars and numerous other items, but nobody knew about it. Everybody was happy; everybody was paying taxes, but nobody knew about it.

This government wanted to implement a taxation system that would be more visible, fair and equitable; it wanted a tax system based on consumption. If you earn $200,000 a year, you consume and pay tax, a tax you see and know. On the other hand, some money is given back to low income people who must also pay the GST but who are financially less secure.

The GST puts Canada on the same level as some 50 other countries in the world. No country in the world has a federal sales tax like we had. Some 50 countries have the GST, which is called the TVA in France. You might say that we should have eliminated the federal sales tax and not replaced it with the GST. I agree. The problem is that we would have had a major shortfall and we would have had to find this money elsewhere, namely by raising income taxes and excise taxes. We would have had to find the money to replace the revenue generated by this federal sales tax which is now the GST. We simply did not have the means to abolish the federal sales tax without replacing it. As an elected politician, I would obviously have preferred to tell the people of Trois-Rivières that we were eliminating the federal sales tax, that we had lots of money and therefore would not have to replace that tax with another one. But given the context that we know, given the financial situation that we inherited, it was impossible.

Thanks to the GST, Canadian exporters have so far saved $3.5 billion. This is not often mentioned, but it is also good news. Since the GST replaced the federal sales tax, which was obsolete and which no longer met the economic and practical needs of our country, our exports have increased by $16 billion. This increase of $16 billion in exports represents roughly 200,000 new jobs. That is not bad news either. In fact, it is good news. That must be said. Before I became a member of Parliament, I was a lawyer in Trois-Rivières and I worked with an accountant who used to say: "No coin is so thin as to have only one side". The GST is the other side of that coin. This is the positive side of that tax. I believe we must emphasize this reality.

All this is part of the economic plan which has been put in place by our government since 1984. Look at the different stages since 1984 and you will see that there is a plan, a philosophy behind this all, and that all the pieces of the puzzle are gradually being put together. Sometimes it is more difficult. We have to look for the right piece, but then we find it. So it is with the economic plan of last week.

The motion of the hon. member is unfortunately yet another action just like those taken by the opposition in the last eight years, namely to condemn the government without once again proposing any fresh ideas. We are open to new ideas, but let us not forget that these ideas must be new, valid and feasible.

Those are my comments on the motion of the opposition, and of course I urge the members of this House to vote against this motion which brings absolutely nothing positive, which makes no suggestion whatsoever, and which leaves us in a state of limbo just like the opposition has been in for the last eight years.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member and I noticed he was looking for congratulations. He said that this side of the House never gives the government congratulations. I think that is not totally accurate. Many times on this side of the House we talked about this particular aspect of the Small Businesses Loans Act. That is a good initiative that the government has put forward. I am disappointed that it has taken nine months to put it through the House because we are all pretty amenable to that particular piece of legislation. It will help many of the million-odd small businesses in the country.

I think it is important that the government communicate that piece of legislation not just to the bankers but also to the small businesses. I think the minister responsible for small business and tourism would concede that in some of his discussions with small businesses in the past few days, many of them had not heard about the piece of legislation the government had designed and amended.

The point I want to make is that quite often on the government side of the House you do not do things perfectly and here is a specific example. It is our responsibility as opposition to speak for the people who are disadvantaged.

I have said that many times before.

You cannot expect us to stand up all the time and pat the government on the back. The fact of the matter is that the GST was a poorly designed tax at a very poor time and one of the things we know for certain now is that it has created a massive underground economy. If we were to just sit over here and not point this out to the government, we would not be living up to our responsibility as Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

The same goes for inflation. This government is so possessed by inflation that it forgets that the people who should be congratulated for inflation are not the government, but the 1.5 million and 2 million and many more who are bearing the brunt of the aggressive inflation policy of the government.

I think it is overly fixed on inflation. I think it could let up a little bit.

My question to the member is—and I have tried to be constructive in my tone and specific on one particular area—does he not feel that it is the responsibility of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition to point out to the government when it sort of makes errors in its economic policy?

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for his question. I must say that the hon. member is always present and available to ask or answer questions during a debate. I appreciate his question.

The hon. member will allow me to make a brief comment on the Small Businesses Loans Act. In his budget, the minister said that the act would be amended. However, I have to agree with him that the tabling and the passing of this legislation is taking a very long time. I would hope that the minister responsible will speed up the process as much as possible.

When the hon. member says that a lot of small businesses are not aware of these amendments, I can tell him that I mentioned these changes in my parliamentary bulletin and I received many calls in my office from people inquiring about when this legislation would be passed, how to apply, et cetera. I think that it is the duty of all members, regardeless of their party, to keep the people informed of the government's actions. I saw quite a few householders put out by my Conservative colleagues in which they mentioned this particular legislation. But I saw an equally good number of them, not necessarily from members of his own party, but from the opposition, which did not mention these amendments.

There is no doubt in my mind that members, even if they belong to the opposition, must keep their constituents informed of what the government is doing through their householders. They may not agree with what it is doing but I think that, in any case, it is their duty to mention it. Sometimes I think that some of them are remiss in that department.

This creates a problem since there are 130 ridings in Canada which are not represented by government members. Therefore, if in these 130 ridings, constituents do not receive through their householders information regarding what is going on here for all intents and purposes, they are not informed. The government cannot step in a riding and tell people that it is going to inform them and then proceed with giving them a householder different from the one they received from their member. I do not think that this would be appropriate either. We do seem to have a communication problem at this level.

He said that as far as the GST was concerned, it was bad timing and that it was poorly designed. I agree with him on the time chosen to introduce the GST. It is never the right time to introduce a new tax, no matter the date, the day, the hour or the year. Mr. Speaker, neither you nor I like taxes, neither does my colleague or anybody else for that matter. There cannot be a good time to introduce a new tax, I must agree with him.

When he claims that it was poorly designed, I think that it is normal for glitches to happen at the beginning; when you alter a system which is 65 years old, you expect that it will take one year before everything is in place. I think that it is normal in such a context. One has to be realistic.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling that my time is up, I will therefore conclude with a comment on my colleague's remarks regarding inflation. In my mind it is of paramount importance for a government to deal with the inflation issue since, if it fails to do so, it will have a whole bunch of economic repercussions.

[English]

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak today on this motion which really talks about the economic direction of this government.

I must say that I agree with the motion that this House condemn the government's continued adherence to its failed economic policy.

Obviously, this country is facing an economic crisis; 1.6 million Canadians are out of work and there is little indication that this will go down any time in the near future.

In the last year thousands and thousands of businesses have gone bankrupt. Agriculture in this country is in decline and cities and towns that desperately need infrastructure work are literally falling apart.

I think it is fair to say this is all a fair indication of the failed economic plan of this government. We can no longer put the blame on past governments. We have to face the reality of today's.

I know that sitting on this side of the House it is easy to criticize. As a member of the Official Opposition, my role in many ways is to criticize government policy in an attempt to make the government responsible. At the same time I do realize, and many here on this side realize, that we too have to offer constructive criticism, that we have to offer alternatives. I believe that my colleagues on this side of the House throughout this morning and this afternoon have been outlining these positive alternatives for Canada.

To start off, it is really fair to say that the jobs, jobs, jobs strategy of the government has really been a failure and that these jobs have not materialized. If they have materialized they have really been short term jobs and they really have not been able to lead Canadians into futures, into careers that they can feel comfortable with and feel that they can be with for some time.

Unemployment is a staggering 11.3 per cent and close to 19 per cent of Canadian youth are unemployed. I think that we can say with much certainty that the economic policies of this government are not working for Canadian youth. They are not putting them back to work.

The point is that we are in a recession and we all agree that the world is in a recession. This recession has hit Canada harder than any other G-7 country. It has hit us hard when we look at our youth and at our high unemployment rates.

I can safely say that this government policy direction has done nothing to get us out of this recession. I think most hon. members would agree. The government has to admit that our unemployment rates are higher than anywhere else in the G-7, that we have failed Canadians by not putting them back to work.

We know that with the government's economic policy the consumers did not start spending again. We know that people did not start building houses. We know that businesses did not start investing. It is certainly fair to say that industry did not modernize its plants or expand production because of the government's economic policies.

The point is that because of low interest rates there has been no economic growth. We all called for low interest rates, but we also called for other action by this government and the government has refused to take that action. On Wednesday the minister reduced the economic growth that he had suggested only in February would be 4.5 per cent down to 2.5 per cent. Most other analysts predict it will be somewhere around one per cent.

What kind of economic growth is that? The simple fact is that we have to make economic growth and job creation among Canada's top priorities, especially as they relate to our younger people. This next generation sees no hope or no future in this economic plan of the government.

Strangely, we hear from this government that Canada has to be more competitive, more challenging on the international markets and be willing to be more forward looking, better skilled and more educated. The government talks well and it brought out a good study on competitiveness. It talked about a lot of the problems.

It did not give us any solutions. The Minister of Finance in his economic statement has essentially told Canadians that he is not listening to his own study.

I have always said that in order to become more competitive in Canada, we must be committed to new initiatives to promote labour force training, research and development and marketing support. I know members opposite would agree to that. Ultimately our commitment to that has to be unequivocal. We have to be willing to put our resources there, no matter what the problems, and direct what limited resources we have in that direction.

Unfortunately, nothing in the minister's economic statement addresses this area in any meaningful way. What we have are promises to fulfil old promises and to fulfil previous promises. The promises are not being fulfilled. In fact Canadians are not buying it any more. Canadians want action and they want action today.

• (1600)

This government has to give Canadians hope. Wednesday's statement did little to do that. Contrary to what the government thinks, Canadians can be the engine of economic growth. If we want Canadians to start spending again, if we want the private sector to be ready for the challenges of globalization, we have to show them that the government is willing to invest in Canadians and to take this initiative.

We need to kick-start the economy. It is only common sense that we need to get the economy rolling again. This government's paltry commitment to that of some $500 million just does not wash.

One approach to get the economy working again is to implement a comprehensive infrastructure program. We on this side of the House have been calling for this for some time now. Unfortunately the government's proposals in its recent economic statements really are inadequate. Hundreds of towns and cities across this country have infrastructure projects ready to go. The amount of $500 million promised in last Wednesday's mini budget only amounts to about one-quarter of the $2.4 billion taken away from the unemployed in the economic statement. That supposedly will create some 5,000 jobs. With 480,000 young people out of work, big deal.

Recently the Canadian Federation of Municipalities estimated that at least $20 billion must be spent to maintain our existing bridges, highways and sewage treatment plants. Obviously $500 million is not going to go a long way.

To conclude I would like to offer some advice to this government. Fiscal responsibility means more than cutting and slashing. It means more than just the bottom line. In fact this country has had enough pain from this government.

I believe the economic crisis we face today necessitates the government take proactive measures on the economy. I also believe there is a difference between spending and investing. Let us invest in Canadians. This short-term measure can be done discriminately and responsibly by ensuring that every line item of spending is scrutinized.

This government has to concede that its economic policy has not worked and that a new action plan is needed. To provide leadership a government must be willing to do what is best for the people it purports to serve. It cannot be constrained by what it says is its ideology and in this case tired economic theory. We have to get things back on track and we have to get Canadians working again.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the very thoughtful remarks of my distinguished colleague from the riding of Haldimand—Norfolk. In particular, today he was asking a question of the government on the important issue of unemployment among Canadian youth.

I want to ask my colleague two questions. First, we are living in very difficult economic times for our youth. He has mentioned, very eloquently of course, what the government has failed to do to assist our youth. But another thought comes to mind, the present policies of the Ontario NDP that have increased tuition fees for our youth in our universities and have at the same time cut back on student loans. This is from a party that had promised to abolish tuition fees, if we can believe it.

I want to ask my colleague which he thinks is the worse: this federal Conservative government or the provincial NDP.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, that has to be one of the toughest questions I have had to answer in the House.

Granted, the country is going through a recession. We have admitted that. We have also admitted that the recession is world-wide. However, there are specific ideas and specific proposals put out by us and by different student groups and groups of unemployed that suggest certain ways in which the hardship of our economic times can be alleviated in certain sectors.

Obviously the provincial NDP has moved in certain areas. I will give it credit for some of the areas it has moved in. It has invested some money in infrastructure in order to put some people back to work immediately. Unfortunately it has failed in the over-all picture of dealing with the problems of university students, students who have no jobs and must spend time in university until there is an opportunity out there for them.

I will give credit to this government in certain areas. Under the youth portfolio it has good programs to keep people in school. I think that is great and we need to invest in that area. I am glad the government has looked at the longer term picture.

Right now, immediately, there are 480,000 people out of work. That cannot be ignored. We cannot say: "We are going to wait for the U.S. economy or the world economy to turn around and these people will eventually get a job. They may lose two, three or four years of their lives because of it, but we all have to take the pain and we all have to take the hardship". That does not wash. There are certain things this government can do today to invest in our young people, to invest in Canadians and to give them something to bridge the hard economic times they are facing today.

To answer my hon. colleague's question, both of them have done a minimal amount to help our young people but both of them sorely lack and have failed to address the main problem of 480,000 young Canadians who are out of work.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to the opposition motion today. I will try to put it in the context, as everybody else has done, of the utter disgrace we witnessed last week with the Minister of Finance and something he called an economic statement.

Personally, I was rather looking forward to it. I thought it would be some kind of blueprint and that Canadians could look forward to hearing something positive in it to address the problems they confronted at this time. Once again we saw the government failing Canadians, failing to focus Canada toward something that was positive and something that was renewable, something we could look forward to in the way of sound economic principles. It was totally lacking in what the Minister of Finance had to say.

Instead of taking measures which would instil confidence in Canadians, the government did nothing more than increase the levels of fear and the levels of apprehension in the minds of Canadians. The country is begging for leadership and integrity in leadership. It is not and has not been getting them from those opposite.

We spend a lot of time in the House talking about our internal problems, our social problems, violence in society, homeless people, the needs of the poor, food banks and the ever increasing number of people with a growing dependence on food banks. This is Canada, one of the richest countries in the world. Something is not meshing here. There is a great correlation between those problems we dwell on so often and in such great depth.

Employment opportunities, there seems to be a correlation there. If you increase the one, you will decrease the other. I do not think anyone would argue with that. If that is true, and I think most people would agree that it is, why was unemployment not addressed in the mini budget, the economic statement or whatever it was? It was not addressed in a serious way.

The best context in which you could put this is, I am told, that it costs Canadian taxpayers about $15,000 to keep a full time equivalent person on unemployment for a year. There is $15,000. If the person was working and making the average Canadian wage, he would not need the $15,000 naturally. In turn, he would be putting back into the economy in the way of taxes paid $7,000 or $8,000, depending on the wage scale.

With employment opportunities, Canadians would rediscover themselves. It would put some stability into those families once again, put some stability into our communities once again, make taxpayers out of the unemployed. It would have made sense if our finance minister had seen that correlation between employment or unemployment and the ability to pay taxes.

We are in tough times in Canada right now. I think Canadians were in the mood for a tough time strategy at this time in our history and we did not get it last Wednesday. The government tinkered and fiddled around a little bit with UI benefits when what we needed actually was an attack on the conditions that cause unemployment.

We did not need an attack on those who find themselves unemployed. They have been attacked for long enough. In this country, we need a revamped infrastructure. I am not suggesting that we should put people to work and call it work if it is just busy work. I do not think anyone would want to address the problem that way.

However, if you drive on the major highways in Canada today, you see that they are becoming dilapidated and worn out. Most of them were designed to carry a load for about 20 or 25 years. With little left of them, we are going to be confronted very soon in this country with a major bill for restructuring the major highways of this country.

What was in the finance minister's statement about major highways in Ontario? Absolutely nothing. We need a retrained work force in this country. Canadians will only rediscover themselves when the government shows some vision, when it has given them an opportunity to get back to work. The government had that opportunity last week and once again it disappointed the majority of Canadians.

There is an inscription about 100 metres from here on the west arch of the Peace Tower that reads: "Where there is no vision, the people perish". That is the stage at which we seem to be in Canada right now with a lack of vision on the part of this country.

I think becoming the Prime Minister of this country should never become someone's obsession, where he must become Prime Minister. Forming a government in this country should never become an end in itself, as it seems to be with the current government.

Put that in a more practical way. The signing of the free trade agreement should never have been an end in itself. The signing of the free trade agreement was just the beginning. It should have been followed by a massive restructuring of skills development so that Canadians who wanted to go to work would have had the skills in a much changed world economy which we are supposed to be embracing. I am not condemning the embracing of it, but I am condemning the lack of ability of the government to get on with it.

The Prime Minister said that anyone displaced by the free trade would be retrained. Canada is waiting. A vibrant, zealous work force that was offered meaningful opportunities for Canadians was called for at this time. This tax and spend mind set of the current government has to be replaced by an investment in growth mind set. We have done it before in Canada.

We moved from an agricultural base after the Second World War to an industrial base. That was a massive thing for Canadians to do. The difference was that at that time we had leaders with vision, leaders with integrity, and we are lacking in that department so obviously that we have brought ourselves almost to our knees by that lack of vision which is so apparent today in the benches across the way.

In those years there was excitement. There was a kind of an exuberance and a vibrancy among Canadians. They had confidence in what they were doing. Those ideas were promoted by men and women who had vision and knew where they wanted to carry this country.

I do not think that the needs and the challenges of today are any more than they were in those years. However, the difference is that there is no leadership, no vision from the present government. That is the major difference. It seems to be paralysed and it seems to be fossilized in its present locked-step method. It is either not prepared or it is not capable of giving the required leadership. The government seems to be caught up in its own importance.

Now its total obsession is when would be the most opportune time for it to call an election? Never mind what it would do to Canada. Never mind what a delay would do or what stepping up the date would do. What would be the best position for us to get a fix on for a date that would make sure that we again try to fool Canadians? I do not think that Canadians are going to be fooled this time. They are looking for direction.

This government has done nothing to expand the economy of the country. If you are going to continue to try and draw revenues from a stagnant economy, all you are really doing is digging yourself into a bigger hole and compounding your problems. Promises are no longer valid when they come from the government across the way because it has seen so many of them so quickly vanish, with no attempt whatsoever to see that they were carried through.

In closing, if someone asked me what I would have done, I would have announced grandly that we were cancelling the $4.5 billion helicopter order. Every Canadian from St. John's, Newfoundland to the west coast to the north would have applauded the government and even this government might have retained or regained a little bit of integrity with that step.

There something at play out there. It is called mass hysteria; trying to equip us with 50 helicopters at a time when unemployment rolls are extending more and more. Bread lines are extending more and more.

I see my time has expired.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for his insightful observations. I am only sorry that he did not get a chance to continue.

We are discussing today the failed economic policies of this government. I wonder if he would like to make some commentary on the following examples. I will quote the examples of this failure.

In 1984, at the end of the fiscal year, I have a signed letter from the then Minister of Finance indicating that the debt was $167.8 billion. It is now in the neighbourhood of $450 billion. The deficit at that time was in excess of $30 billion and it is now as well. There is no improvement there either.

If one looks at the revenues at the end of 1984, they were in the neighbourhood of $70 billion. Now they are roughly $130 billion. Government has almost doubled its revenues and yet on the deficit there has been no real substantial improvement and the debt has deteriorated significantly.

• (1620)

Let us look at the situation. Unemployment is over 1.6 million and roughly half a million of those unemployed are young people. Over two million Canadians are receiving social assistance as we speak now. Over two million Canadians will be fed at food banks this year. Surely there has been no progress in that department.

If one looks at the level of poverty in Canada, we note that people living at the poverty level or below are almost five million. The majority are women, and over one million of those are children.

The government has been downloading as well to colleges, universities, provinces, municipalities. It attempts to suggest to Canadians that it has made some progress, that it has had some success. I wonder if my colleague would care to comment on those examples. Those are examples of failure. Are there other examples that he would like to share with us, and does he want to add some additional commentary?

Mr. Jordan: I want to thank my colleague for the excellent question.

He mentions that we went from roughly a $168 billion deficit to something like $400 billion. That would not be so bad except through all that the standard of living for most Canadians has dropped. You would expect if you were going out and getting that far in debt that you would have surrounded yourself with some luxuries. The statistics will show that just the opposite is happening, which indicates to me that there was no strategy whatsoever. There seemed to be almost a determination that we would go farther in debt and more Canadians would see their dreams, if they are entitled to have dreams anymore, shattered even more.

I think there is no way that it was expressed more clearly than in one of the national dailies. The headline reads: "The Tories may be proud of juggling the numbers, but Canadians see only the wreckage left over". It goes on to say: "Leadership means more than managing the economy competently. It means giving the nation a reason to pull together, a sense of direction, a vision. The Tories have lost their ability to call forth the best in Canadians and the people have lost their will to listen to them".

The last thing I wanted to say with the language of an economist—and they will use this—is when you do not go in the hole quite as far as you thought you would, they call it a surplus. I have seen them do that on another occasion. They plan to put more debt on the Canadian people, and if in any one year they have not gone quite as far in debt as they said they were going to go, they will call it a surplus. I was always rather surprised at that term. It is obviously an attempt to mislead the Canadian people, that is all. That is what this article in the daily suggests, that the Tories are juggling the numbers. That is the numbers game that we are into now. Canadians are not going to buy it.

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I just heard the hon. member say that there had been a deliberate attempt by this government to mislead the Canadian people. I wish that remark to be withdrawn.

Mr. Jordan: I was quoting when I said a deliberate attempt to mislead the Canadian people. I will have to check the "blues" on that.

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, it was very clear. The member was not quoting and I would appreciate it if he would withdraw the remark.

Mr. Jordan: If the member is that sensitive, in spite of the fact that most Canadians would not object to that statement, it really shows you the state that the government is in when that comment bothers him to that degree. If he is that sensitive about it, if it makes him feel any better, when most Canadians, particularly those who are unemployed, would agree with me, we will do what we have to do to satisfy the gentleman because he probably will not be sitting in the House too much longer anyway.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I thank the members from both sides of this House for their co-operation.

[English]

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat difficult to stand in this House and respond to the kind of remarks we just heard because it is difficult to know where to start. The twisting of facts by the hon. member who just spoke is almost incomprehensible.

The situation with the debt and the deficit is concerning. I think we had better take a couple of minutes now just to try and run through it in a factual way so we can perhaps correct some of the misapprehensions, the misstatements of fact that the hon. member who just spoke has put forth in this House.

My constituents in the riding of Halton—Peel have consistently demonstrated to me that they have not only a good understanding of our financial situation as a nation but real and honest concern, bordering sometimes on horror, for the state of the country's finances, particularly with respect to the debt and the deficit we have now.

I may remind the House that I did stand in this House some days ago and make an apology to my constituents because I have been telling them over the last couple of years that this government had certain deficit targets and the government would meet those targets.

We have found out it is going to be impossible for that to happen and I felt duty bound to apologize to them for having told them something was going to happen that did not.

Having said that, I also need to explain to my constituents why and I think this is the most important point. I have tried to use various ways of involving my constituents in this debate about the debt and the deficit and the choices that any government in Canada has to make now at federal and provincial levels to deal with it.

I put out a brochure called You Be the Finance Minister in which I listed every single expenditure that the federal government makes and asked people to draft their own budgets and submit them back to me, and thousands did.

I have done a number of surveys in my riding and I have one out right now which basically asks people a number of very detailed economic questions and asks again for the kinds of decisions they would make in terms of running Canada's financing.

I have had approximately 40 townhall meeting in my riding since I have been elected and most of those have dealt with economic issues because those were the questions that came up from the floor.

My correspondence is extremely heavy with letters from people who are concerned about the debt and the deficit, whether the government is taking appropriates actions to deal with it.

There are many points that have been brought up in this debate so far that we should examine. We should try and understand the nature of the problem that Canada faces and I guess what the alternatives are on this side of the House and the other side of the House for dealing with those problems.

As hon. members opposite have mentioned over the last few minutes, Canada is not alone in having a recession today. There are many nations across the western industrialized world finding themselves in similar situations. A number of these countries have also seen their currencies under attack partly because they have been weakened. They are sort of wounded animals in the economic landscape and a lot of speculators, vultures, will come in and try and take advantage of those wounded economies.

We have seen currency speculations trying to destroy the French franc. We have seen currency speculation in terms of some of the Scandinavian countries and we saw it most recently with the Canadian dollar. A global recession breeds weak economies which breed volatile currencies. We know all of those things, they are facts.

The recession has lead to low growth and high unemployment in a lot of countries, Canada included. Part of the reason we have such difficulty right now is our mounting debts. This is what the member who just spoke concentrated on. He tried to pin exclusive blame on the government for the fact that the country's debt has literally doubled in the last eight years, and he is perfectly correct.

He is absolutely correct and I am not going to dispute it for a minute and this is one of the reasons I had to stand in this House and apologize to my constituents. That debt has doubled. It is a matter of fact, it is there, we have to deal with it. At the same time we need to make sure my constituents and all Canadians are informed about how that happened.

• (1630)

In terms of our debt our fiscal position is the second worst among the G-7 countries, among the seven largest western industrialized countries.

On a national accounts basis, our deficit last year was 6.1 per cent of our gross domestic product. That is totally unacceptable.

The figures for Canada's total public debt now add up to 48.5 per cent of our gross domestic product on a national accounts basis. Again, we are second worst among the G-7 countries. Only Italy has a worse record than Canada right now.

I would like to go back and try to understand how we got into this pickle. Why is the country in such a mess? A lot of people do not like it when politicians stand up and blame other politicians, blame history, or blame past governments or governmental actions for the situation we are in today. I tend to agree with them. It is a bit annoying.

I do want to stress that actions taken today have consequences for tomorrow. It is true today, in 1992. It is true for 20 years ago and it is true for 25 years ago. The actions we take in one day have consequences far down the line.

When I was a journalist I covered an economic summit conference of the G-7 countries in Venice. At the time the finance minister of Canada was Allan MacEachen. I remember chatting with him in Venice as a journalist. He had just unveiled a budget which had a very sizeable deficit for those days of $8 billion.

A lot of us in the financial press were scandalized that the Government of Canada had brought in a deficit that was that high. I remember asking MacEachen—this was about 14 years ago—whether he was concerned about the consequences in the future of the deficit in the budget he had brought in that day. The finance minister at the time said: "No. We run deficits as a normal course of events. We subscribe to deficit financing".

Was he right, and did they ever.

During that period of time that I was a journalist I was trying to get the finance minister to explain how Canada was going to be helped by running an operating deficit. In the 15 years before 1984 program spending in this country increased by an average of 14 per cent a year, which was nearly two full percentage points faster than the economy was growing. Spending was growing faster than the economy.

At the same time the tax base had deteriorated because of tax exemptions.

By 1984-85 when this government came into office, when we inherited that $168 billion deficit the members opposite have just been talking about, program spending exceeded revenues by $16 billion a year and the government was spending $1.33 for every dollar it was collecting in tax revenue.

The growth of the government debt had become self-perpetuating by that point. Those deficits that the finance minister told me at the economic summit he was not worried about had suddenly accumulated to the point where the deficit itself was growing cancerously.

The compounding nature of the debt ensured that it would only be harder to deal with in the future. I have just quoted right out of Investing in Growth, which is one of the documents tabled last Wednesday by the Minister of Finance.

What the minister was talking about was what the Minister of Finance was not talking to me about 15 years earlier, and that was the magic of compound interest. It is true that the $168 billion debt in 1984-85 has become one of more than $400 billion today.

All of the additional debt that has been added since 1984 has been through compound interest. There has been no new debt added because of any actions taken by this government. Not a cent has been added to the debt by this government adding on to it.

Furthermore, if the government had not run an operating surplus over the last three years the debt would be higher today than it is now.

The members opposite do not want Canadians to know that the actions of the government itself have not added to that debt. In the future, whatever party forms the government is going to run into exactly the same strait-jacket. That is what we all have to understand on all sides of the House. It is not just a Tory problem or a Conservative debt. The government that is formed after the next election, whatever it is, will have exactly the same problems as the government today. There is no magic solution. There is no magic bullet. There is no way that we can snap our fingers and ease the problems.

The interest on the debt this year will require $42 billion in tax revenues to finance, and about one-third of that is leaving the country in interest to foreign bond holders. In other words, we are going to be putting $8 billion, $9 billion or $10 billion into the pockets of German, Japanese and American bond holders. That is about the worst economic policy that we can have because it hurts Canada's sovereignty.

A lot of the other interest is flowing from the pockets of taxpayers. Whether they are old folks, single parents or families they are all contributing tax dollars that will end up flowing into the pockets of investors who bought Government of Canada bonds. I do not see how members opposite can approve of that. We are taking money from people in all social and economic categories and putting it into the pockets of people who are generally better off, the bond holders of Canada. It is not good social policy.

The New Democrats should be on their feet screaming to end the deficit because it is making the rich richer and the poor poorer. That is what it is doing. It has to stop.

This economic situation that the Minister of Finance found himself in last Wednesday was not a happy one. It was an inevitable one. I guess we could have done what Allan MacEachen did when he was Minister of Finance, which is crank up the printing presses more, spend more than the economy is growing, and forget that today's actions have future consequences.

The finance minister of today did not take that course. He did something a lot tougher, something that is going to draw a lot of fire from the opposition, something that is going to be misinterpreted by those who continue to deny reality and do not want to face up to the facts. The finance minister found himself in a situation in which he has to find $42 billion this year to pay interest on the debt.

He found himself trying to craft an economic statement and guide a country in a world that is restructuring in terms of its whole economy. Low wage jobs are flowing to low wage countries. High-tech, high value-added jobs are the ones being sought by our competitors, who are also high value-added, high wage countries like Germany and Japan.

The finance minister found himself in a situation in which competitiveness and productivity are the challenges of today. He did not have to find new ways to turn on the printing presses but ways to be competitive through deregulation, sane taxes, and integrated economic policies so that Canadian companies can compete across the world.

The finance minister stood here and found himself trying to craft a budget at a time when investor confidence and consumer confidence are very weak. One of the reasons is that every day in this House of Commons members opposite stand up and give a tale of woe and doom about the economy. They do everything they can to try to accentuate the negative and they are reinforced by the media. The Official Opposition is doing a lot in this country to grind down the feelings of people about the fact that their country is one of the best in the world, as judged by almost every international agency that looks at us from afar.

As a consequence, the Minister of Finance stands in this Chamber and deals with certain realities: a drastic $8 billion annual drop in revenues because of the recession; an unacceptably high 1.6 million people unemployed that we need to do something for; slow retail sales; this frenzy of negative news that surrounds us; the deficit rising beyond targets; the dollar under pressure because of speculation on a weak currency from a weak economy; and interest rates having to rise to defend that dollar.

Those are the realities, the economic realities, almost all of which the Minister of Finance had no control over. Yet he has to deal with them. What would the opposition do, given the circumstances that I have just described with a global recession and a debt that is cancerously growing by itself? What would the opposition do?

The New Democratic Party is on record as saying what it would do. It would scrap the GST without telling us where and how $15 billion would be found to replace the revenues being lost. It would just scrap the GST and throw it away.

The New Democratic Party says that it would rip up the free trade agreement, the very free trade agreement that has increased our exports with the United States by 10.5 per cent this year alone, that is responsible for $16 billion in additional trade with the United States. Exports right now are the strongest segment of our economy and are dragging this recovery right along. The New Democratic Party would just rip it up, build a new wall around Canada, keep out the prosperity and keep out the wealth.

What would the NDP do? The NDP says: "Well, we will just tax the rich". I think my constituents have a sinking feeling that the NDP are referring to them as rich. Maybe hard-working folks, middle class folks who own their own homes and who work hard to try to put their kids through school are the people the NDP call the rich. I think it would target my constituents.

What else would the NDP do? The NDP would probably try to do what Bob Rae has done in Ontario. Bob Rae is the man who leads a government which in four years will add more debt to the province of Ontario than was accumulated in the 125 years that preceded that four-year period. Bob Rae is the same man who would start making us pay to drive on the roads that we have already paid to have paved. Bob Rae is the man who says he is ready to raise new personal income taxes. About the last thing this economy needs is more taxes. More taxes make us less competitive, but that is what Bob Rae would do. Bob Rae is the man who has just introduced labour law reform in the province of Ontario, which would handicap employers during a strike and drive investment away from the province of Ontario, which scares people who now are maybe going to Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania or other places where there is right to work legislation diametrically opposed to the right to strike legislation in Ontario. This is the same Bob Rae who leads a government that is now being roundly criticized in international markets, who leads a government that investment newsletters in the United States are now making sure they warn Americans away from.

For example, a recent edition of Grant's Newsletter, published in the United States to give some tips to American investors, states: "And what is happening to Hydro's credit"—Ontario Hydro—"and what is happening to the credit of the province of Ontario? Briefly given, the answers are decay and decline respectively". There it is, decay and decline. That is what has happened to Ontario, the engine of Canada's economy, driving 40 per cent of our economic activity. The Americans are being told to stay away, decay and decline has taken over Ontario. That is what we can expect out of the NDP.

How about the Liberals? It is really fortunate, Mr. Speaker, that you have just told me that I have only about one minute left because in that minute I could probably run over the Liberal economic policy 60 times because there is no policy. The only thing we have heard in this chamber is: "Well, Mr. Speaker, we think the Government of Canada ought to spend more, spend, spend, spend".

I just discussed my conversation with the Minister of Finance 14 years ago when I was a journalist. In that conversation that is what he said they were going to do. In 1974 he said: "We are going to spend". He sure made good on that one. Here we are today with a $450 billion deficit, which is a legacy of the government opposite. God help this great country, which is going to get out of this hassle, if they are ever returned to this side because we are in for a lot more pain and no gain. Canadians can see through it and those guys are staying over there.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I know my colleague across used to work for the Sun chain of newspapers. I wonder if he agrees with today's editorial. Let me read some of it to you, Mr. Speaker:

> For those of you who are still wondering what Finance Minister Don Mazankowski actually said last week in his economic statement to the House of Commons, we offer you this partial text.
> Our most recent economic progress has been. . .blah, blah, blah—slowed by a stubborn world-wide recession—blah, blah, blah—economic restructuring—blah, blah, blah—trade uncertainties, confidence and to rekindle hope—blah, blah, blah—Canada's experience—blah, blah, blah—lasting jobs—blah, blah, blah.

It ends with "You're welcome".

This is from the newspaper that my colleague across was a well respected journalist for some years ago when he interviewed the previous Minister of Finance, as he so eloquently put it to us earlier today. Does he agree with his former employer that all we heard from the Minister of Finance was blah, blah, blah and no substance at all to solve the economic problems of this country? In other words, does he agree that his government is just as inept at solving the problems of our country as Brother Buffalo Bob and Pink Floyd are in the province of Ontario. Mr. Speaker, no disrespect intended here for comrades at Queen's Park because we must always use the proper nomenclature whenever we talk about our socialist friends at Queen's Park as well.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel: Mr. Speaker, I did not always agree with all the editorials written in the newspaper for which I did toil from time to time. I think it is interesting that in this Chamber during this economic debate that the members opposite have basically stood up and said: "Blah, blah, blah" in terms of their economic policy which goes something like: "Spend, spend, spend—blah, blah, blah".

The important point for me, and I would like to put this into context because I spoke a few minutes ago about when I was a journalist and when I did interview ministers of finance, is at that time I remember saying consistently and as often as I could that as many times as this Government of Canada ran a deficit, it was creating problems for our children. We have already spent all the way through the kids and we are into the grandchildren. That is how serious the problem with the debt and the deficit has become. The "blah, blah, blah. . .spend, spend spend" policies opposite are exactly the ones that have sown the seed for the harvest we are reaping now.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker to my hon. colleague on this side of the House talked about a government having an obsession with governing.

I would like to ask my colleague who has just spoken whether he could possibly identify a government that for 15 years seemed to have an obsession with governing. It spent and spent and spent and if it seemed to be good, it bought it. I wonder if he could tell me what government that was and if he can remember a single, solitary program in government at that time that was actually cut to save money and thus not get into the $16 billion a year operating deficit that my colleague just spoke about.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague for the excellent question. I certainly can remember a government that was in office for some 15 years and during that period of time added substantially to the country's debt through a program of spending which I do not think was exceeded in any other time except during wartime in this country. During wars, when we were running up deficits and debts to equip our troops and send brave Canadians off to face adversaries across the seas, was the only time that we exceeded the spending record of the 15 years prior to 1985.

During that period of time, the 15 years before 1985, program spending not including servicing the debt increased every year by 14 per cent, 2 per cent more than the economy was growing. It would not have been quite as bad if we had had spending somewhat consistent with the expansion of the economy, but we did not see that.

On average, for every one of those 15 years, one after the other, there was 14 per cent added on. You can imagine at that period of time the situation that Canada was in. Canada in the 1984–85 fiscal year had $168 billion in accumulated deficits. At that period of time, the interest on those accumulated deficits of $168 billion was onerous, particularly because the Liberal government had allowed interest rates during the last period of that 15-year time span to rise to more than 22 per cent.

I will give another little story from my days as a journalist. In 1981, when mortgage rates were 22.75 per cent, I was not in the Chamber. I was outside. I was there with about 1,000 other Canadians, middle class people, who had travelled from Toronto because their homes were in danger. The Liberal government allowed interest rates on mortgages to hit 22.75 per cent. In fact, the situation was so dire that the banks and trust companies in this country were not even lending five-year money.

The most you could get was a 12-month commitment and these poor middle class home owners were thrown out on these terrible economic policies of run-away spending, run-away deficits and run-away interest rates. It is hard to imagine a more difficult situation to inherit than that. Within that situation, with high interest rates and $168 billion debt, we had the seeds of the problem today.

We have not added to the debt of this country. The Government of Canada today has not added to the debt. The compound interest that was on that debt has been responsible for a situation where $42 billion this year, or almost a third of all the taxes that my constituents pay, is going to service that debt.

Furthermore, my constituents are seeing more than $10 billion this year that is going in interest payments to foreign bond holders. That is a real crime. It is a real crime that my constituents have to cough up that kind of tax money so that it can be flushed away into the pockets of bond holders in other countries. I do not think they are going to stand for that.

They definitely know that the way to get off this treadmill is to cut back on government spending, to live within our means, to get the fundamentals right of low inflation, low interest rates and a low Canadian dollar that allows us to export more and bring more wealth and prosperity into this country.

They are not stupid. They have a lot more sense than the members opposite give them credit for. They see companies in my riding like Husky Injection Molding and Mold-Masters. They are high-tech, high value-added, high wage jobs that are bringing wealth into my riding. They know what is happening. Their friends and neighbours are working for companies that are on the leading edge of today's technology, companies that have not been afraid to invest in the future, just as this government is investing in the future.

The government is getting our debts under control by bringing our spending down, by stimulating investors to create jobs in the private sector, by not creating temporary make-work jobs with my constituents' money. That is the way of the future and I think my constituents will see very clearly that the ideas opposite are bankrupt of common sense. The ideas that will save Canada are on this side of the House.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today in the House to speak on the supply motion put forth by the Liberals:

> That this House condemn the government's continued adherence to its failed economic policy of trickle-down misery.

Just by way of starting, I guess the best description I have ever heard of the trickle-down theory of economics is certainly what we have been operating under in the last 10 years or so in this country. It is eight years, although it seems like a lot more than that. Of course, in North America and most of the English-speaking world, it is for even longer than that. The best description I have heard of it is that if you feed the horse enough oats, the sparrows will eat. Mr. Speaker, I am here to tell you the sparrows are getting mighty tired of the fare they have been munching on these last number of years, particularly under this Tory government.

The promise when these sparrows—these turkeys—came to power was prosperity. Prosperity was the promise of the day. They sounded so good and so convincing that the Canadian public fell for it and elected them.

Certainly, experience has shown that they have lost their credibility altogether. There is no way that the Canadian public is going to take a chance on these trickle-down economists again. Of course, by the time the election comes around there may be little left of the country for them even to consider.

What happened to the prosperity? There is certainly evidence that it is not there. There are different ways to look at it. Certainly there are good explanations of what has happened. Primarily what has happened is that over the years, even preceding this government, successive Liberal and Conservative governments have simply foregone collecting taxes from those who are well able to pay. Statistics Canada research has shown that the source of the debt is precisely that. Tax breaks to the wealthy plus the very high interest rates leading to the debt which we have is a problem of course. It has also been the doom of any prosperity in this country, except of course for those whom the previous speaker so rightfully condemned, and I agree with him. There is probably no better description in the House of those who clipped the bonds and reaped the interest of this $400 billion debt from which Canada is suffering than to simply call them vultures.

There is evidence that the prosperity certainly is not there and has been going down. In the 1950s the disposable income of Canadians grew by about 34 per cent. In the 1960s it grew by about 22 per cent. In the 1970s it grew by about 22 per cent and in the 1980s, an appalling .5 per cent.

The government wonders why prosperity has not arrived. Canadians know very well it has not arrived. Canadians know that they certainly do not have the disposable income which they had in previous times. As someone who worked through the 1960s and 1970s, I can certainly attest to the demise of disposable income, that income which Canadians spend and consumers spend, which fuels the economy and leads to prosperity within a country.

If consumers do not have the money to spend, the economy is certainly going to suffer. The government has certainly done everything it can to limit that.

I would also like to refer to the vicious provision of the mini budget which was brought down last week whereby those who are fired or quit their jobs are excluded from being able to collect unemployment insurance.

The fact of the matter is that people who find themselves in that position immediately lose their source of income. It is not a matter of a seven to 12 week heist of the ability to collect unemployment insurance anymore. They will not get it until they prove that they quit for cause if they just quit their jobs. There may be any number of reasons why people would quit their jobs and any number of reasons which they would not necessarily want to make public. Much reference has been made to sexual harassment. I can understand why women particularly would not want to make this public and thereby would exclude themselves from the ability to collect unemployment insurance after having removed themselves from an intolerable situation.

• (1700)

The minimum amount of weeks which a person can qualify for is 17. The maximum number of weeks which a person can qualify for is 50. If collecting the maximum, which I believe is $426, in either of those two situations, these provisions mean that without any recourse to protection, without any recourse to due process, those people are potentially facing a fine of $7,242, which in our society is a very sizeable fine for any number of offences, civil or criminal.

In a similar situation at a maximum of 50 weeks where a person may possibly not be able to get a job having left it, because heaven only knows there sure are not many jobs out there to be had, the maximum fine is $21,300. I maintain it has to be looked at as a potential fine which someone could very well have to suffer for having quit their job.

We have corporations in this country that have been charged for polluting our oceans, that have gone through the whole process while being able to defend themselves, and been fined $2,000. However, if you quit your job you could be fined $21,300. You pollute our waters and you are probably not going to have to pay any more than $2,000. I would suggest that that exemplifies the absolute crooked thinking that this government seems bent upon.

It shows a disdain for people which is certainly exemplified in spades in these provisions. People will be excluded from collecting unemployment insurance under those conditions. It is not satisfactory. It is not tolerable in our society that people have to suffer that kind of economic loss without the benefit of due process, without the ability to defend themselves before the fine is paid.

I know of no instances in this country where under the normal process of jurisprudence, if that is the right word, people pay a fine before the system has decided what the fine should be.

I reiterate that this is one of the most vicious provisions that any government in the history of country has ever brought forward and shows the absolute disdain, I would suggest probably even bordering on hate, which this government obviously has for people.

The minister is very quick to mention the numbers of people who quit voluntarily. I would suggest that he ought to be coming up with the numbers of women who quit because they cannot tolerate the situation they find themselves in due to sexual harassment or other forms of harassment within the workplace. He cannot do that because so many of those women will not divulge that kind of information, will not make those kinds of personal situations known and the minister never will be able to find those out, nor will society. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that that happens over and over again. I would suggest it would be well worth while for the minister to spend more time trying to alleviate that kind of situation than to be so quick coming forward with the number of people who voluntarily quit.

Mr. Speaker, we have our time divided into two parts and I would like to thank you for the time that I have had this afternoon.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the comments of our colleague. Sometimes in the cut and thrust of debate we use a few words that are either misunderstood or we do not put it quite the way we want to.

I heard him refer to bond holders as vultures and I want to take exception to that. Bond holders are varied. Of course, there are a few very large ones, but the principle applies equally whether buying a Canada Savings Bond as a person who is only slightly involved, or one of the large purveyors of funds for the government. I have before me the Ontario Economic Outlook which describes the picture of the provincial economy and how the provincial government is selling bonds to finance its operation. That is a New Democratic Party government.

Is he saying that it is wrong for the people to finance the operation of the government and that the government should be discouraging people from buying its own bonds? If that is what he is saying, is he not asking for higher interest rates?

Perhaps what he stated was not exactly what he wanted to say, at least I trust that that is the case.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for asking the question. There certainly has been a misunderstanding. I was quoting the previous speaker on the government side.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I just heard the member opposite refer to my speech and allege that I used the word vulture to refer to bond holders.

I did not, Mr. Speaker. I used derogatory terms when I talked about currency speculators, people who have attempted to destroy the currency of Canada. I never used the word bond holder and vulture synonymously. The hon. member opposite did and I think he owes this House an explanation.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, if I used the term bond holder—and I am not entirely sure that I did—the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is quite right. In the cut and thrust of debate sometimes we do say things. If I referred to bond holders, and I doubt if I did, the "blues" will show it and I certainly do apologize for that.

Certainly I would agree that money speculators are vultures. It distresses me no end that in the economics of the world today, with the swift movement of funds by computer and so on, and the ability of the speculators to really suck the life blood out of many of the economies of the world, and certainly Canada's being among them, to be among the most despicable types of money changers, I guess you would say, on the face of the earth. The word vulture certainly is applicable.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks on this motion of the Official Opposition in which Tory policies are referred to as trickle down. Of course, they are trickle down. I want to try and make the case of how they have, in effect, a trickle down approach to economics in Canada.

First of all, this government came into office in 1984 with the firm statement and firm belief that the private sector was the engine of the economy.

• (1710)

When you think of the private sector, of course, I think of all the small and medium-sized businesses which employ 80 per cent of the work force in this country but, unfortunately, the Tories do not think that way. When they were talking about the private sector they were talking about big business. The Tories like big business.

For eight years the Tory government has been really an economic constitution of the Canadian corporate welfare state. There are six pillars of Tory hell in this new economic constitution.

How did they go about establishing the trickle down approach? The first thing they did was to nullify the effect of Parliament. In other words they gutted Parliament. They eunuched Parliament.

People are watching. People watched that exercise last Wednesday. They watched the Conservative government in operation. Every time the government uses time allocation and closure to shut down debate, the people of Canada, who may not be in agreement with Tory policies, have no opportunity to use Parliament to buy time for reconsideration. They have deliberately used time allocation as a method of proceeding.

No wonder people think that Parliament is irrelevant. No wonder they believe and show cynicism about politicians and the use of this place because the Tories have given Parliament a bad name. That is the first thing they did. We have seen lots of examples of that, especially in recent times, of how they just simply drive their plans home and give no opportunity for people to be heard. I do not have to tell you about that. I will deal with some of the specific examples.

What is the first pillar of Tory hell in this new economic constitution? The first thing they did was deregulation. Look at what has happened with deregulation. With deregulations we see the big fish eating all the little fish. We saw examples of that with the airline industry. They were not satisfied that we had a regulated airline industry. Let us deregulate it and this way we will have more airlines coming into market, we will have more competition and we will see prices come down.

I can give members an example. Before the Tories came into office and brought in this deregulation pillar, put this pillar in place, we had three airlines that were flying. Three airlines were flying between Sudbury and Ottawa and prices were pretty competitive.

What happened with deregulation? Today we have one airline flying Sudbury to Ottawa direct and the cost of a return flight from Sudbury to Ottawa is $480. You can fly around the world for that. We have one airline.

After deregulation there was a proliferation of airlines for a short while until all the big piranhas just went around and gobbled up all the little mullets; just ate them up. Today we have an airline industry that is in total chaos. Some large American airline will just come in and provide the competition and control the whole operation. I would not be at all surprised if it ends up with one big airline operating in Canada. I will predict that it happens.

That is part of the trickle down. The hope is that wealth created by that one is going to trickle down and somehow get to the people at the bottom. It means less employment. It means less economic investment. It means less service. That is coming. That is part of it.

They did the same thing with banks. They did the same thing with financial institutions. At that time I predicted that one morning we would wake up, open our eyes and there would be one superbank.

All the big banks are going to eat up all the little banks. If we look around today we will see it. It happened with the brokerage industry. Now it is happening with the trust industry. Toronto–Dominion just got Central Guaranty Trust. Watch what is on the horizon. That is part of deregulation.

We had an example of it in the past three weeks with Bill C–91. We have had compulsory licensing for drugs in this country since 1969. From the evidence presented that has allowed the competition between drug manufacturers and the copycats.

What have they done? To whom are they kowtowing? They are kowtowing to large multinational drug companies. Now they are going to increase the protection of patents from 10 years to 20 years.

Dr. Schondelmeyer gave evidence before the committee the other day—and I happened to be in the committee—that over the next 15 years it is going to cost Canadians $7 billion. For that $7 billion we are going to get $500 million of research and development. It will be mostly clinical development, not basic research.

Who is benefiting from that? Certainly not ordinary Canadians. It is the trickle down theory at work again. If we keep feeding the lion then hopefully there will be something out of the other end of the lion to feed on. That might work fine for lions. It keeps lions healthy but it sure does nothing for sparrows. They have to eat an awful lot of that stuff and it is not even healthy for them. That is the same way it is working with us.

I have referred to the way in which this government introduced Bill C–91 without giving Canadians an opportunity to be heard. The opposition, in its attempts to put a brake on the speed which which this government was moving, found themselves against the Juggernauts of the Tory majority.

That is not the way Parliament should work. The hon. member from Peel spoke earlier. He is always an admirer of a system that is democratic in process. What is so democratic about that? First it did not want to allow witnesses and we had to force witnesses on to this government. Then it limited the witnesses. All the witnesses were heard within one week. Then majority rules. That is part of the column. That is part of the six pillars. That is part of it.

The second pillar is privatization. No more is there any faith in those enterprises that Canadians built with their own initiative and with their taxes. The industries they built were all sold off. All of those will end up either off the books or in some large corporation's belly.

The third pillar was the attack on universality, the entrenching of selfishness. The recent UI change—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. It is time for the five-minute question or comment period.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have heard the remarks of my colleague and want to use this occasion to ask him a question about fairness in government policy.

• (1720)

A little earlier this afternoon I had to absent myself from the Chamber, having received a phone call from a constituent in distress. This woman living in my constituency phoned me. She is the mother of two children, unemployed and the sole support. She makes from a combination of mother's allowance and the child benefit, baby bonus for lack of a better name, something like $17,900 a year. She was telling me today that she had not received the advance child tax credit this year because she makes "too much money". I verified this with Revenue Canada and in fact that is true, not that she makes too much money but that is in fact the correct interpretation. Apparently someone who makes more than $17,200 a year as a sole support mother with two children, someone who receives straight mother's allowance, in other words someone on social assistance, is apparently too rich to get this government benefit.

Would my colleague not agree with me that this has to be the height of unfairness, that nothing could possibly be worse than to tantalize someone on social assistance by telling them that there is a program for them, only then to tell the poorest of the poor that they are too rich to receive the program which apparently was designed for them to start with?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. That is the fourth pillar of Tory hell: the question of taxation.

Notice how very tough the Tories are on the poor: the member's constituent is making too much money, but lo and behold she does not have a box at the SkyDome for which she is paying rent and which she can write-off on her income tax. She does not have, I will bet dollars to doughnuts, a three-martini lunch. I am sure she does not have an overseas shell operation of her corporation where she can avoid paying taxes in Canada. I am sure she has not set up a trust under the 1971 trust protection fund whereby she can protect all the profits she has made in a trust for future generations of her family. I am sure she does not have all that. If she were very wealthy then she would be the friend of the Tories and therefore she would be protected. However she is poor so she has this trickle down approach. Hopefully if they can feed the lion up at the top then some of this might trickle down to her.

In the meantime, all the forces of Revenue Canada make an interpretation of things like she makes too much money, just cause and all other things that are applied to the poor.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, when I heard my colleague from the New Democratic Party talk about the SkyDome boxes, I could not resist the opportunity to put in a pitch for all of us from Toronto who are opposed to the NDP selling off the stadium at a price that is really about one-fifth of its value.

By the way I share his view on the SkyDome boxes. I understand where he is coming from there, but the SkyDome itself is a tourism instrument. We use it for trade shows. People come into our city from not just from the Toronto area but from Buffalo and all over the United States. Right now they go into restaurants and hotels and there is lots of spin-off business. This can all be quantified.

The danger that we see in privatization is that all of a sudden we are going to go from a $5 Coca-Cola to a $10 Coca-Cola because the people who are going to end up taking over this SkyDome are going to be more interested in getting their money out right away. I was wondering if the NDP would use its influence to slow that process down a bit.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I want to say briefly that the previous Peterson and Davis governments worked out one of the worst business deals for the taxpayers of Ontario. It is costing those taxpayers $63,000 a day. Of course Floyd Laughren had to jettison something that was disadvantageous to the public of Ontario.

I also want to point out that my friend from Peel asks the House: "Where are going to get the money?" Why do we not go to that trust fund? There is $70 billion to $75 billion sitting in the trust fund and not one penny of tax is paid on it. Yet the Tories are going to bring in a bill to protect them for a further 20 years.

When are we going to get the best benefit for the taxpayers of this country? When are the rich going to start paying their fair share of taxes? Let us see the Tories actually stop this trickle down approach to economics in Canada.

Mr. Clement Couture (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has delivered his financial and economic statement and now the members have the opportunity to make their point of view known regarding the future orientation of our country. I for one do appreciate such an opportunity.

One of the issues brought up by the minister in his statement is how important trade is for Canada. Let me take a few moments to demonstrate how important it is not only in Canada but elsewhere too.

Very often we hear how important international trade is. It is very important indeed. For Canada, it is vital. But interprovincial trade is just as important.

Since each of our provinces produces different goods, our standard of living depends just as much on the dynamism of exchanges among regions as it does on exchanges between Canada and other countries.

Interprovincial trade allows local producers to have access to a much bigger market than their own province, just as international trade gives them access to world markets. This is particularly important for the smaller provinces. These bigger markets allow for economies of scale making businesses more efficient in their production.

Except in Newfoundland and British-Columbia, where inter-Canadian trade is a lot less important than in other provinces, about 40 per cent of all goods exported by provinces go to other provinces. Quebec, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Manitoba export at least as much to other provinces as they do abroad.

However, external trade is not as free as it should be. There might be strong economic links among provinces but there are also adverse provincial trade barriers which translate into higher prices for consumers and reduced competitiveness for our businesses.

Let me give a few examples. Let us start with beer. The preferred treatment granted local producers by provincial boards controlling beer distribution as well as other measures have fragmented the beer industry in Canada.

In the area of procurement, preferred treatment and local content requirements demanded by provincial government agencies and administrations for their purchases have lowered competition.

Most of us know that the price setting and distribution policies followed by provincially regulated marketing boards might distort interprovincial trade.

In yet another area, that of health regulations and standards, differences among provinces might prevent businesses from developing national marketing strategies in the food processing industry and in the drug manufacturing sector.

In his statement, the Minister of Finance stressed the importance of strengthening growth partnerships between the private sector and provincial governments. Let me quote him:

• (1730)

> The time has come for comprehensive and concrete measures to reduce trade barriers between provinces by agreeing on a set agenda and time schedule. The federal government urged provinces to eliminate all internal trade barriers by 1995. Canadian agriculture ministers have taken encouraging steps in that direction. More progress in a whole range of areas can only reinforce our competitiveness at home and abroad.

Freer trade is important for the future of Canada. Freer domestic trade would certainly enhance our ability to attract investment in Canada and create jobs.

If it is in no way justified to let the United States become the only country with a free access to both the Canadian and the Mexican markets, which is one of our arguments for NAFTA, is there a single reason to give the American producers easier access to our whole Canadian market than to the Canadian producers? Surely the answer should be no.

The finance minister specified that the federal government was committed to reducing barriers to internal trade and will co-operate with the provinces towards this goal. In his statement, he reiterated the determination of his government to free the commercial markets.

Since the Second World War, Canada constantly strived for freer international trade. We did so through the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs and free trade agreements with our regional partners.

Thanks to successive GATT negotiation rounds, tariffs levied on our imports have been reduced and our access to export markets has been enhanced. The minister confirmed in his statement that this government will continue to work for a positive conclusion to the Uruguay round negotiations.

The free trade agreement is a concrete example of a regional trade agreement, and I dare say it is a success. Our exports in the United States increased dramatically and the free trade agreement spurred growth in foreign investment.

NAFTA is another component of our free trade policy. The minister has confirmed the fact that we are working to finalize that deal.

Let me say a few words on this subject. Canada is already competing with Mexico on the American market. In 1990, we exported goods and services worth $123 billion to the United States, whereas Mexico's exports to the U.S. totalled $45 billion.

Among other benefits, NAFTA will allow Canada to face increasingly strong competition from Mexico on the American market, which is crucial to our businesses. Without NAFTA, Canada would be faced with the possibility of uneven competition in the United States. With NAFTA, the three participating countries will be able to compete within the same basic framework.

An economic evaluation of NAFTA by the Department of Finance shows that the deal will also put us in a better position to increase Canadian exports to Mexico, which will further stimulate our economy.

The benefits of NAFTA for Canada will be modest at first because bilateral trade between the two countries is only about $3 billion a year, compared to some $236 billion between Canada and the United States, but they should increase with time.

NAFTA will not make Mexican businesses a lot more competitive in Canada since our customs duties are already low. However, Mexican customs duties on Canadian imports are approximately three times higher, so the reduction of duties brought about by NAFTA will open new doors to Canadian businesses.

Canada will be in a better position to compete with Mexico with NAFTA than without. The Department of Finance's assessment shows that while labour costs in Mexico are one seventh of what they are in Canada, Canadian workers' productivity is 6.5 times higher than that of their Mexican counterparts. Capital costs are lower in Canada while the productivity of capital is higher, thus giving Canada a competitive edge in the production high value-added goods by capital-intensive industries. Canada should also profit by the enormous Mexican needs for imported capital equipment. Our country actually has a comparative advantage in that area.

Further trade liberalization through NAFTA will see Canada's competitiveness improve and strengthen the economic and employment growth.

I would like to raise another sensitive issue concerning international trade. Even the Goods and Services Tax is having a major positive impact on trade. Contrary to what the critics opposite may say, the GST did promote competitiveness by replacing a tax that favoured imports over goods made in Canada. Therefore, Canadian products are not at a disadvantage compared to the competition on the domestic market. In addition, the GST improves our producers' competitiveness because they pay less tax on the inputs used to produce export goods. According to the Canadian Exporters' Association, the GST has reduced hidden import taxes from 3.4 to 1.8 per cent and what is left of it is due to provincial and municipal taxes, not federal taxes.

Mr. Speaker, if I may raise one last controversial issue concerning trade. Even the Goods and Services Tax generates substantial trade benefits.

Mr. Boudria: That is why it is so popular.

Mr. Couture: Those who live in glass houses should not throw stones.

Contrary to what our critics opposite would like us to believe, the GST did generate substantial trade benefits. The GST has replaced a tax that favoured imports at the expense of domestic goods. It ensures that Canadian products are not at a disadvantage on the domestic market. In addition, the GST helps us compete by lowering the tax on export good producers inputs. According to the Canadian Exporters' Association, the GST has reduced hidden import taxes from 3.4 to 1.8 per cent.

To ensure the economic future of our children and grandchildren, personally I want Canada to enter the 21st century as a fully competitive and productive nation. Our trade policies will promote this. Therefore, I urge all members of this House to support this initiative.

[English]

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I am sure Canadians who have watched this debate this afternoon are going to be fascinated to find out just how empty this government is when it comes to trying to address the current problems of the unemployed and the poor.

All we hear is the government recalling the previous government. It was the previous government. It is going into its ninth year. Canadians are not going to buy that. The government did not start this year or the previous year. It is going into its ninth year and seems to be as void now of vision as it was then.

I think Canadians are going to realize that. My question is to my colleague who just spoke. Could I get his personal view, or perhaps he would like to speak for his party, on where he is going to find the $4.5 billion to buy 50 naval helicopters. Count them. Not 5,000, not 500, but 50 helicopters. Does he not think there are better uses to which that $4.5 billion could be put at this time when so many people in this country are so desperate for help.

• (1740)

Does he not think it wise for the government to announce it has cancelled that order, or is it waiting until the eve of the next election. At that point I think it would be too late to announce it was cancelling the order and give the impression at least that it has the concerns of Canadians at heart.

Mr. Couture: Mr. Speaker, my speech has really been put in terms of the actions of our government to reduce and eliminate completely the commercial barriers between the provinces.

The hon. member refers to our armed forces. Definitely they need a certain amount of equipment. It is imperative. If we want to have an armed force which is acceptably equipped, we must spend a certain amount of money to do so.

What is probably most important of all is to make sure that prosperity in Canada will permit our government to provide all the services and equipment that might be requested by our country. To do so we have put forward many good initiatives that are providing the prosperity we are looking for.

First, we have been talking about the elimination of the commercial barriers inside Canada. Second, I was talking about the GST which has provided much better capabilities for the Canadian government and manufacturers to export their product. I feel that all this justifies by and large the actions taken by the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to make sure I heard the hon. member correctly. Did I hear him praise the GST a few minutes ago? Is that possible? My colleagues and I have consulted each other about whether it was possible for someone to speak highly of the GST and say that this tax is good for us, Mr. Speaker. Can you imagine that?

I told myself that this was impossible; I must have misunderstood. It is impossible for someone to say that, namely a backbencher who, no doubt, must have had to hear the not so positive comments of his constituents when he supported the GST. Is it possible that the hon. member would have talked highly of this abominable tax?

We will give him the opportunity to redeem himself with his constituents by elaborating on this.

Mr. Couture: Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I will answer the hon. member's question.

In Canada we had a federal tax that applied to manufacturers. Many recommendations were made to the Liberal government of the time to eliminate this tax because it was very detrimental to Canadian manufacturers. This tax was imposed on exports. The Liberal government of the time never understood that this tax was negative and hidden and could not in any way help the Canadian government improve the situation. This tax had 22,000 exemptions. The government bureaucracy was managing the revenue shortfall.

If the hon. member will listen, I will explain to him why I am so enthusiastic about the GST. We replaced this obsolete federal sales tax with a modern tax which is naturally a consumption tax, a visible tax. This 7 per cent consumption tax replaced a 13.5 per cent tax.

All these things justify and confirm why, once Canadians reasonably understood it, the GST will become the tax par excellence in Canada.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I have another question for my colleague on the other side who likes the GST and similar measures so much.

Was most of the electorate in favour of the GST? I must say that at least the constituents of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell were opposed to it. Could the member give us more details on his constituents' opinion on—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but I must interrupt the hon. member.

It being 5.45 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 81(15), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of the supply proceedings now before the House.

The first vote will be on Mr. Langdon's amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

[English]

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, it was not the intention to have the motion pass on division. We wish to have a recorded vote. However, we are quite prepared to have the vote as previously taken applied to this motion as well as third reading of this particular bill.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, as long as the motion previously applied is the vote we took on Schedule A.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, there is something I would like to say to a number of members who sit on another committee where we believe it was rather difficult to receive services in both languages in a way that made sense. I simply want to draw your attention to the fact that at long last, thanks to the co-operation of our clerk, we have been able to have this document not only in both languages, as prescribed by law, but in alphabetical order as well, so that when you work in English, it's easy.

[English]

If you proceed in English it is very easy. You have your own alphabetical order. For those of us who have to follow in French it was total confusion and so it was corrected.

I would just like to draw to the attention of the member that we are working on a very important piece of legislation called the Electoral Act in which everything is in English. When you write during the election and you have to address yourself immediately to a problem, you have to go through the English alphabetical order and then you are lost. By the time you find it, the problem you want to resolve is already resolved by itself.

I want to show by this that if we look attentively we will save a lot of time and show that it can be done.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the Chair to conclude there is unanimous consent for applying the recorded vote taken previously to the various stages of this bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The next question is on the concurrence motion.

SPECIAL DEBATE

SOMALIA

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That this House affirm its support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted with regard to the present situation in Somalia and for Canadian participation in the multinational effort to establish as soon as possible a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia.

[English]

She said: Mr. Speaker, every day from around the world Canadians are confronted with images of conflict, human suffering and deprivation. Every day Canada and the international community have new compelling reasons to help wherever the human family finds itself in desperate need.

Nowhere are the reasons more compelling, the suffering more tragic than in Somalia. We must act now to stop the killing and destruction. We must feed the hungry. We must heal the injured. We must bring families together again. We must care for the children. We must help the proud and peace loving Somali people rebuild their own country and their own lives.

The process of achieving an international consensus to act strongly has taken a frustratingly long time, despite the urging of countries like ours. We were indeed among the first.

When that consensus was achieved by a unanimous vote in the Security Council last week, there was only one answer to the query of whether Canada will help. That answer was yes.

Before turning to our decision to join the unified force, I want to discuss with members of the House the circumstances leading to the decision of the Security Council last Thursday and the government's decision on Friday.

After the overthrow of former dictator Mohammed Siad Barre in 1991, Somalia has degenerated swiftly into violent and brutal anarchy. Tens of thousands of innocent men, women and children have been victimized. The absence of civil order has created a vicious circle of violence, counter-violence, terror and counter-terror, pillaging and senseless killing. In some areas Somalis carry weapons as casually as we carry our bus tickets.

As things stand today, Somalia is a country only in name. Warlords who are more preoccupied with their hunger for power than the hunger of their people have created untold death and suffering in Somalia.

[Translation]

Canada fully endorsed the UN's action in Somalia. Last August, the Prime Minister wrote to the Secretary General, President Bush and Prime Minister Major to urge them to vote in favour of UN concerted actions and ask that such actions be paid for through contributions.

When the Security Council approved the deployment of four infantry battalions in the area around Mogadishu Canada was one of the first countries to respond to the Secretary General's request.

• (1840)

Canada has played a leading role in international humanitarian efforts to deliver food and medicine to the Somali people. We sent three military aircraft carrying food and other supplies; we provided nearly $22 million in humanitarian aid to Somalia and Somali refugees in neighbouring countries and we are now looking at ways to further increase our aid.

[English]

We and other members of the international community now know that sending food and medicine and other desperately needed supplies is simply not enough because warlords are snatching food right from the hands of weak and starving people to feed themselves and their armed soldiers.

As relief supplies began to arrive in Somalia, they were increasingly the object of theft and attack by armed bandits. It became dangerous, in fact impossible, to guarantee delivery of supplies to those most in need, though supplies did reach some people. Thousands of others were left to starve, cut off from supplies.

Faced with this situation, the United Nations approved the deployment of a peacekeeping mission known as UNOSOM. Its mandate was to protect the delivery of food and other humanitarian assistance, to promote national reconciliation and contribute to internal security and order. From the beginning, the peacekeeping mission itself was fraught with difficulty.

There were delays in achieving agreement among the factions for the deployment of the battalion into Mogadishu. When it was finally in place, soldiers were harassed and attacked to the point where they could no longer do their job.

There were similar delays in getting agreement for the deployment of peacekeepers elsewhere in the country and, in some areas, there still is no agreement.

Anarchy, the absence of civil authority and the breakdown of roads and bridges and water systems led to the need for extraordinary logistical measures in support of the peacekeeping operation.

Canada agreed to provide a full, combat-ready unit with the arms and equipment necessary to deal with the lawlessness. To overcome logistical problems, Canada supplied a ship, HMCS Preserver, to provide essential technical and medical support to the unit until UN arrangements could be put in place.

[Translation]

Canada has never changed its position on this question. In addition to assigning 750 soldiers to UNOSOM, we have urged the UN many times to take a comprehensive approach to the situation in Somalia that would cover security, humanitarian aid and political settlement of the conflict.

[English]

Sadly, over the past several weeks it became clear that humanitarian operations in southern and central Somalia could not overcome the problems of obstruction, looting and extortion by heavily armed bandits. The United Nations was unable to secure the concurrence of Somali factions for the deployment of peacekeepers in key areas of the country where the fighting is going on.

The size of the UN security force was inadequate to secure humanitarian operations. The United Nations Secretary General explicitly acknowledged these critical shortcomings in his letter to the President of the Security Council on November 24.

[Translation]

In this letter, the Secretary General gave three reasons for reviewing the premises and principles of the peacekeeping mission (UNOSOM): first, the absence of a government in Somalia; second, the extortion, blackmail and looting with which international aid workers were confronted; and third, the attacks against UN personnel and equipment and other organizations providing humanitarian aid.

In another letter addressed to the president of the Security Council on November 29, the Secretary General begged the council to urgently consider a number of options for dealing with the situation. One of the options was to maintain and reinforce UNOSOM. The secretary advised against this option because, as he said: "Pursuing UNOSOM operations in the present circumstances would not provide a satisfactory solution to the humanitarian crisis in Somalia".

The Secretary-General concluded that more energetic measures had to be taken as soon as possible.

Another option submitted to the Security Council by the Secretary-General and recommended by the latter was resorting to coercive action as provided under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. This proposal was approved unanimously by the Security Council last Thursday.

[English]

To request contributions of forces and funds from all member states was one of those four main elements. To establish an enforcement operation under American command which has authorized use of all means necessary to establish as soon as possible a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia.

Third, to authorize the continued existence of UNOSOM, which will be at the discretion of the Secretary General. He will decide when and where to employ UNOSOM peacekeepers, most likely only when order has been re-established in Somalia.

Finally, to ensure close and effective co-ordination between the United Nations, UNOSOM and the unified command led by the United Nations.

When this government originally decided to contribute 750 peacekeepers to UNOSOM, we felt not only that such a contribution was consistent with our peacekeeping tradition, but that it would be constructive in helping to relieve the misery in Somalia.

Thus, in spite of the serious financial and personnel implications, we believed it was important for Canada to support this UN mission.

Last Friday, my cabinet colleagues and I had to review our original decision in light of recent developments. After full consultation with the Secretary-General, we agreed to participate in the enforcement mission.

We did so because we concluded that only such a mission as this can effectively put an end to the rule of warlords. Only such a mission can restore sufficient order that the hungry can be fed, the sick can have medicine and the injured can have treatment.

Only such a mission can create the kind of environment necessary so that work can begin toward a peaceful, negotiated settlement of the internal political conflict and toward the reconstruction of this nation by the Somalis themselves.

There is an international consensus that such a mission can yield the desired results in a timely way. Speaking to the Security Council last Thursday night, the representative of Morocco thanked the council for passing a resolution that meets the fervent request of so many African and Muslim nations.

By responding to the Security Council in this way, Canada is building on its traditional peacekeeping role. At the same time, we are helping to develop as we said we would the capacity of the UN to meet threats to international peace and security in new ways.

Peace enforcement is, in fact, one of the tasks set out for the organization by the Secretary-General in his report last summer "Agenda for Peace". We applauded that report when it was issued and we have been trying ever since to ensure that the Secretary-General's ideas get wide circulation and thorough analysis.

Now, under tragic circumstances, we will be putting some of those ideas into practice.

In the final analysis, what really counts is to put an end to the banditry and the lawlessness that makes the delivery of food, medicine and essentials impossible to those who need them. Thousands of men, women and children are dying of starvation. The Secretary-General and the United Nations decided rightly that vigorous action is required and we support that course of action.

• (1850)

We realize, just as the Secretary-General does, that military enforcement to secure humanitarian aid is not an end in itself. The enforcement action in Somalia must ultimately facilitate a process of political settlement under the auspices of the United Nations but brought about by the people themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I can assure you and all the members of this House that beyond this military operation Canada will work with the Secretary-General and with others in the international community to help find a durable political solution to this conflict that is in the interests of the Somali people, through diplomatic means and through direct assistance.

Rebuilding civil society and national government in Somalia is not going to happen overnight. The devastation has been far too great. Sadly, it will be a long-term process, in which Somalis themselves will have to take the initiative, together with patient and substantial international support.

It is essential that the military action in Somalia that we have undertaken to join be balanced by UN efforts to promote peace and reconciliation. In some parts of Somalia, such as the northeast, conditions are relatively stable and co-operation does exist for peacekeeping, relief and rehabilitation efforts, so that they may begin.

It is the season when we celebrate peace and when there are so many holidays and celebrations around the world of joy, of a family nature and of a religious nature. Most Somalis also long for peace. They desperately want civil order, and they are willing and prepared to seek a long-term political solution to their internal differences. They also do not want to face weapons and rifles every day as they walk down their streets and paths.

In this regard I am encouraged by the results of the just concluded UN meeting on aid to Somalia that was held in Addis Ababa.

In what is a very bleak and disturbing situation we find one inspiring example after another of courage and devotion to humanity, some by the Somalis themselves, who must have more courage than anyone else. However, I am referring as well to the many international aid workers who have been braving the violence and horror in Somalia, some of them Canadians, to bring relief to the innocent victims of this conflict. They are also uppermost in our minds as we undertake this operation.

I fully support the Secretary-General's position, and I know that members of this House do, that military action must take into full account the security of international civilians and that their safety must be a primary consideration in the enforcement action.

This is, in the season of peace, more than a mission of enforcement. It is a mission of peace. It is a mission of mercy for tens of thousands of our fellow human beings who are living in terror, who are too weak and are moving toward death.

Once again, Canada has been called upon to do its part. Canada must do its part. Canada will do its part. Make no mistake about it, we are determined that this mission will succeed. We will show the people of Somalia that we are ready, that we are able to answer their desperate cries for help as they reach out to us, and finally that we are able to reach back to them.

In the name of peace and humanity, I ask this House and all Canadians to support our decision, as they have since we first moved into this phase of our operations on Friday. I have been touched and overwhelmed by the expressions of support, both from members of this House on all sides as well as from people across Canada who have been urging us and are now pleased that we are saying yes we can and we will do more.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in opening the response on behalf of our caucus and our leader, let me say that we fully support the decision taken by the United Nations to authorize a mission of mercy and hope into Somalia.

It is an action we have been urging for the last several months. We recognized that the situation in Somalia was deteriorating, that the actions undertaken up to that point were not working, that the suffering was increasing and that the world was watching.

We welcome this initiative. We certainly support the decision by the government to have Canadian forces participate in this new multinational effort. We have been asking since last July that more effective action be taken in Somalia and that Canada take the lead in trying to promote this. We endorse fully the involvement and the contribution that our armed forces can make.

For me, one of the redeeming moments during the debate on the Constitution was when I, along with our leader, was asked to attend a group of Canadian forces leaving Kapyong Barracks to attend a peacekeeping mission in Croatia. It was at a time when the country was being racked and divided by questions about its own unity and its own sense of identity. We went into the barracks and talked to young men and women who came from all regions of Canada, spoke both official languages, represented a wide variety of cultural and ethnic backgrounds and who with one voice were saying they were proud to be going on behalf of this country. It was one of those moments that sticks in your mind and you will never forget.

Endorsing this action and supporting the Canadian participation also requires that this Parliament begin asking some serious questions on behalf of the Canadian people. One thing is very clear. As each day goes by, the United Nations and the participating members cross traditional lines. As the Secretary-General himself said just last Monday: "Experience has shown that this cannot be achieved by UN operations based on the accepted principles of peacekeeping".

The normal conventional wisdoms that have applied to Canadian peacekeeping missions since 1956 are being extended, changed and altered into something very new and very dramatic, something that carries far greater ramifications and consequences and puts into a new dimension the notion of Canadians' role as part of international forces.

The minister said that we are now embarking on a peace enforcement action, a peacemaking action if you like, putting substantial new risks in the way of our forces and putting yet substantial new commitments that we are asking the Canadian people to support. We are breaking ground, we are going into uncharted waters, we are drawing a new map of international rules and procedures and organization for the sake of trying to fill the gap and void that has been created by the end of the cold war. We will be trying to put in place a different kind of international morality and international responsibility.

That is why it is so important and so crucial that such actions be endorsed fully by the Parliament of Canada, speaking for all the Canadian people. We cannot begin to assume automatically that these kinds of new initiatives which are moving Canada, along with other nations, into a substantial new role of intervention and enforcement, can take place without a consensus, without the agreement of the Canadian people. Let us be blunt about it. There will be new risks. There will be new dangers. There will be new tensions. We are putting young Canadian men and women into situations of high risk, of real danger to their lives.

If we are going to continue to do this, we must ensure that it is based on a sound and broad understanding of what those risks are and what the consequences are, and an agreement by Canadians that they are prepared to take that initiative. There is only one way of doing that in our system. It has to be based on a fair and open debate in this Parliament and then approval of this forum.

That is why we have been urging the minister in letters and in comments and statements for several months now to bring these matters before Parliament so that consensus-building can begin to happen, that Canadians can begin to understand.

It was interesting in a speech the minister gave recently when she said Canadians must understand more about what is happening in their foreign policy, the way the world is changing and how it affects them. Yet time after time there has been a refusal or a reluctance to use Parliament as the forum for that education, for that consensus building.

In fact, and I say this with great regret, last Friday when the question was posed by a member of this caucus to the minister about what Canada's intentions were, she did not answer the question but went outside of Parliament to hold a press conference in which the very same matters were addressed.

Trust cannot be built if Parliament is disregarded. A new sense of understanding and comprehension and support and willingness cannot begin to develop if the government evades its own commitment in this Chamber. It is not the Chamber itself that is important, it is what the Chamber represents, which is 26 million Canadians who want to be involved and need to be involved in some basic way in helping to find this new world responsibility that Canada is undertaking.

Canadians have serious questions. Colleagues of mine today have come to me and I have also received calls and letters asking what does this commitment involve? Will Canadian troops be fully supported? Will they have proper equipment? Will they have proper backup of command and logistics and supplies?

These are questions, honest questions, concerned questions by relatives, mothers and friends about troops that are being sent over.

That is why it is absolutely essential and crucial that one of the changes required is the democratization of the way we make decisions, especially on crucial issues where we are committing our forces into risky, dangerous, new situations.

I would hope at some point we can get a commitment from this minister to do that, to begin to democratize the way decisions are made on these crucial matters and to use Parliament as the forum in which it was traditionally and originally intended, not to evade it or ignore, or go around it but to use it in faith as a way of developing a fundamental agreement, a contract if you like, between Canadians in these times of trouble.

Serious questions must be raised concerning the mixed signals that we receive from this government. Just last Wednesday the Minister of Finance brought down a mini budget which contained further substantial reductions in maintenance funds for the department of defence. It did not change the capital expenditures. It did not alter the purchase of helicopters or submarines or anything else, but it changed the operating method. Yet it was just the week before that that the minister of defence said the Canadian commitment to peacekeeping must be pulled back, pulled in, shrunken because there was not enough money to support our efforts.

We have had Canadian generals saying we cannot do any more because there are not sufficient funds to do it. We have reached our capacity, the full scope of our actions, yet the government shrinks its budget and reduces that commitment even further.

We are making promises, commitments if you like, for a role that the world needs, wants and recognizes Canada as having a competence and experience to play. At the same time we are substantially hindering, restricting and limiting the capacity to author and mount a peacekeeping measure.

It means we fundamentally need to have closer synergy between our defence policy and our foreign policy. We have to change the priorities of our defence establishment away from cold war priorities to peacemaking priorities and make sure there is sufficient budget and resources allocated to make that happen. That is another set of questions that needs to be worked out in serious debate and dialogue in this Parliament as to what is this new role and how we properly reallocate and reassign resources to make it happen.

Perhaps a fundamental question is being posed across the country today after the announcement, as I believe is being asked in other national capitals and other countries: If we are prepared to break traditional peacekeeping roles to provide an armed force for the protection of humanitarian efforts in Somalia, when are we going to do the same in Bosnia? Are we prepared to do the same in Liberia?

In other words, there are other areas of intense conflict, human suffering, tragedy and hunger in which there is a compelling need for international involvement and intervention. Does this set precedent or are we picking and choosing between which tragedy we will attempt to respond to?

This morning we held a major round table of Canadians to deal with the situation in Bosnia-Hercegovina representing a wide variety of interest groups and experts with incredibly different points of view. They did agree on one thing, that the present UN role in Bosnia has come to a stalemate and has to be re-energized, reset and re-established in a more effective way. That is also an important subject for debate in this House. We must come to grips with the fundamental question of criteria. If we are going to establish a new role for peacemaking on what is it going to be based? What are the standards and judgments that will be applied? Will we do it on ad hoc basis, situation by situation? Will there be a new policy framework? That is something I think Canadians have a right to know.

When I read the minister's recent speech I must confess it gave me cause for concern. The minister addressed the question of criteria and went through the traditional peacekeeping responsibilities of meeting a threat to peace and security or whether a UN multilateral body had decided. She began to say that there should be new criteria such as costs, risks and potential duration of individual missions, Canada's historic, political and economic interest in the region, a bilateral and multilateral commitment.

It reads to me as a pulling in of criteria, as an attempt to begin to restrict the role, of limiting what our commitments will be. Now that may be a fair proposition. That one I agree with. It may be a fair one but it requires serious examination by the people of Canada, this Parliament and a vehicle of this Parliament.

In addition to the criteria put out by the minister on costs, historic interest, bilateral and multilateral commitments, what we should be asking is whether in the new criteria Canadians have a basic interest in alleviating extreme suffering, stopping extreme human rights violations, crimes against humanity or crimes of genocide anywhere. That should perhaps begin to be the fundamental criteria that we use and then worry about the other particulars, whether in fact there is extreme inhumanity of people against people. That should be the basis upon which we make that decision.

I am prepared to say that I do not think my criteria, the criteria of the minister or those of other critics in the House should be the final say or should be the limit of the debate. It is too serious and too broad ranging for Canadians. It is one of the most important decisions this generation of Canadians will make because it comes to grips with what our international role and responsibilities will be for years to come.

That is why I think it is necessary that we broaden this debate. I do not see the minister in the House at the moment but perhaps she is listening somewhere. The way of coming to grips with this matter would be to send a joint committee of the House and Senate across the country, beginning in the new year, to look at the new role of peacemaking for Canada: what criteria should determine it, what kind of resources should be applied to it, what kind of policies should be utilized for it. There could then be a full, open opportunity for all Canadians to be heard from coast to coast to coast, not just in the confines of the Ottawa region, to come to grips with this most serious of questions. In fact there are the three coasts and one continental boundary. We will cover the entire domain of Canada.

The Senate has already started to hold some hearings. The Standing Committee on External Affairs has begun to look a little at the agenda for peace. It should now become a major commitment and mission of this Parliament to authorize such an undertaking, to show Canadians that they have a right to participate and that this Parliament is coming to grips with these tough, difficult, complex issues.

I again raise a question about the role the minister describes as taking place after the warlords have been disarmed and the corridors have been opened up. In the statement the minister made on Friday she said: "We will participate in the enforcement action only. We do not plan to participate in any subsequent peacekeeping operations".

We may have heard something slightly different this evening in the debate, but frankly I am not sure the minister fully recognizes and accepts that this kind of action is a short-term quick fix and that the tough part, the difficult part, the serious part, will be coming afterward. There will continue to be a responsibility for peacekeeping in a country in which the entire civil authority has broken down. What is the point of moving in, taking the arms away and then moving out again and letting the same forces gather strength and go after each other again? What do we attain by that?

It is important now as a signal of hope to the people in Somalia and other places that the international community including Canada is prepared to stick in. If we are called upon for other commitments and other resources, we will do our best to answer that call. We will make sure that while the troops are in there taking the arms away there will be serious examination at the United Nations about the rebuilding of Somalia, not just in terms of immediate humanitarian aid but in terms of the reconstruction of political authority, a rule of law, a system of justice and a system of economic development, something that will give some hope.

That just begins to touch on the kinds of questions I think Canadians legitimately have. There are many more questions that I think Parliament deserves to have answered. I would ask during this debate—and I hope we will receive an answer from someone in government—that in addition to this commitment to Somalia we will have an equal opportunity in the very near future to have a similar debate about the situation in Bosnia, what we should do about it, what Canada's role will be in it and what we can do at the UN to try to end the suffering and tragedy taking place in that country at this time. I think we will approach it with the same kind of willingness to co-operate and deal with the matter.

There is an old saying in the Talmud that to save one life is to save the world. Canada is called uniquely at this time to save not one life but many lives. It is an opportunity that may be unique in this generation's history, something that we can look upon as one of the turning points in defining who we are as a country and the kind of role we can play in the world. If Canadians are looking for a sense of mission, a sense of purpose and a sense of what holds us together, perhaps there can be no greater tribute than the call we receive from the world to be a major player and partner in these kinds of initiatives overseas to save lives and to solve tragedy.

If I might, just to add and to strengthen the motion, I would like to move the following amendment:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "establish" and by substituting the following therefor:
> —as soon as possible an enduring secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia.

Clearly the purpose is to say that this is not a short-term quick fix. Canada is prepared for the kind of commitment that will not only give immediate relief but long-term hope to the people of Somalia and show that in these kinds of adventures, international initiatives, one must be prepared to play out the long haul.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will take under advisement the motion moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg-South-Centre and seconded by the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the motion before the House regarding the role that Canada should play in responding to the desperate situation facing the people of Somalia. It is fair to say that none of us over the past year has been untouched by the tragedy that we see unfolding in Somalia, the virtual breakdown of a society, the images of death, of starvation, the pain on the faces of the children, the children being victims of a system that quite clearly has gone mad.

There is also the tragedy that almost certainly we will not see and that almost certainly will be occurring on a daily basis, and that is the victimization of women who are always the most vulnerable along with the children in a situation such as the one in Somalia. I am sure that instances of rape and the brutalization of women continue and that we will not see them on television. It is clear that women and children tend too often to be the victims of decisions in which they have not participated. It is against this horror that my party supports this motion.

I want also to say a word of praise for the very brave relief workers who have worked and risked their lives to this date for their fellow human beings in Somalia. It would be very easy for us tonight as parliamentarians to feel very smug that we are somehow suddenly finding our conscience, but in fact it is the relief workers who have worked so hard in Somalia, and indeed in other countries, simply on a humanitarian basis and have been the force behind touching the consciences of this country and many other countries.

Much time has passed since we first learned of the famine in Somalia. It is not the time to feel that we have somehow just found a sense of altruism, but that we must give respect to those who have in fact brought to the attention of the world the situation in Somalia, those who have been workers with non-governmental organizations.

I would like to begin by expressing my profound regret that we are tonight debating a motion on a decision that has already been taken. I cannot say too strongly how anti-democratic I feel this is, how arrogant it is of this government to have taken the decision and then to allow elected members to debate a decision already taken. The democratic process and the parliamentary system in this country are under much criticism. This is why. One's temptation is to ask: "Why would I participate in such a debate?"

However, I and my party feel that the situation in Somalia transcends our own concerns about the inadequacy of this government in seeking out solutions and alternatives, not just giving information but trying to use the best resources in this House of Commons to find alternatives.

The question of when and how to use force is a serious decision, if not the most serious decision, that we as parliamentarians make. Clearly we are making decisions that affect the lives of young men and women. In the past, force has been used by the United Nations in cases in which international law has been broken. We are now being asked to give our consent to the use of force in order to ensure the success of international relief efforts.

In the case of Somalia, the New Democratic Party supports the proposed multilateral effort directed and authorized by the United Nations to establish a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia. We must also point out that this is a precedent. This is a new direction. We are supporting the participation of Canada in this effort because we do not live in a perfect world. We know that if aid does not get to those areas where famine has been occurring, millions of human beings could die.

As New Democrats, as Canadians and as internationalists we cannot sit idly by and allow this to happen.

[Translation]

Canada has a long tradition of participating in peacekeeping missions. We must help stabilize the hostile situations on our planet and we now have an opportunity to do so.

A year ago, I spoke to a group interested in world peace and security and talked about the opportunities for the United Nations and for civilization in the aftermath of the cold war and in this period of transition toward a new world order.

I explained then that the new world order suggested by some was nothing new. It is a world order which will be controlled by the industrialized nations in their interest and at the expense of developing nations.

I said that the consequences of this new world order for the vast majority of people on earth would be continued poverty, greater instability and, of course, an everpresent climate of insecurity.

I then suggested that we should replace the concept of a new world order with that of a new world community in which all nations on earth could work together in a new era of international cooperation.

[English]

The number one threat to security in the world is clearly poverty. In that respect, the government's cuts to its official development assistance to the world's poorest nations is regrettable and offensive. It is clear to us on this side of the House that there will never be peace in the world until we address ourselves to the fundamental issues of poverty throughout the world.

The efforts taken in Somalia could be a real opportunity to forge a new world community, in which our interest in ending hunger means as much as our desire for maintaining our supplies of oil, in which our interest in ending hunger does not fade when we no longer see people starving on television.

To a large degree, the efforts in Somalia could be an important step toward a new world community. However, I would be remiss if I did not point out some of my fundamental concerns with the way in which our government has handled this situation. At the same time, I would like to offer possible alternatives.

First, I am concerned about the apparent lack of a long-term solution. I am concerned about the uncertainty over the role of Canadian forces, the uncertainty as to the role of the United Nations, the United States and to whom the military forces will be accountable.

I am also concerned with the uncertainty over the timetable for the deployment of Canadian troops and the question of who pays and, as I mentioned before, the delayed after the fact consultation with Parliament.

[Translation]

I want to emphasize one thing: although we agree that Canada should participate in this important emergency measure, we must remember that it is important to find a long-term solution.

If nothing is done to solve the basic problems and if we do not seek a long-term solution, the problem will resurface once the troops leave.

The long-term solution requires rebuilding of the local political structures. It is also dependent on the involvement of local people and clan leaders in development projects to rebuild infrastructure and restore confidence.

When UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali recommended sending a peacekeeping force to Somalia, he said: "We must also act to promote national reconciliation and thus eliminate the main causes of the humanitarian intervention."

[English]

The Canadian government has not given any real indication about its plans for ensuring long-term stability. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said today, when asked this question by me in the House of Commons, that the long-term plan would be looked at after the short-term plan was executed. It seems to me that surely we would not be sending young men and women into a very risky situation without some intervention as well at the diplomatic level and with other countries to work toward achieving a necessary and long-lasting solution.

This clearly is a deviation and a new policy for Canada in many ways. We have had a very long role in peacekeeping and clearly that role is now changing. The traditional peacekeeping is changing into what is being called peacemaking.

The humanitarian grounds that have occasioned this change in policy we certainly support. I think there is an extremely compelling reason to care for our brothers and sisters in all parts of this world. However, I do urge the government to come forward with proposals for a long-term solution, not simply to deny that can wait. These proposals should be debated in Parliament. They should be advocated within the United Nations. We should have a government that is activist in providing real alternatives that will bring long-term peace and stability in Somalia and that will be a model for future crises in other parts of the world.

On the question of the role of the United Nations, I would like to make several comments. We see again for the most part that it is the powerful military dominance of the United States which is taking a leadership role in this effort. While I must commend the UN Secretary-General for setting up an important accountability structure, it is fundamentally not healthy for a country, which incidentally happens to be the single largest debtor to the United Nations, to act as the dominant force in such an operation.

On November 30 the UN Secretary-General wrote to the Security Council and said: "If forceful action is taken, it should preferably be under UN command and control. If this is not feasible an alternative would be an operation undertaken by member states acting with the authorization of the Security Council". However, last Friday the chief of forces said the Americans are going to run this operation.

The lesson of the gulf war and the lesson we are learning now is that the world governments must work to establish a UN command structure, perhaps in consideration of resurrecting the military staff committee of the United Nations. It is now imperative that such a system be established so that future conflicts will not have to be addressed through U.S. command and U.S. control.

Let me stress that it is essential that information be shared with this House of Commons in terms of what the role of our troops will be, how long it is anticipated they will be there and, as I mentioned earlier, the long-term plan. There has been as yet none of these details available to the House of Commons and more important to the Canadian people.

Our party supports the United Nations. We support a reformed United Nations as we feel it is the major hope for humanity in this world.

• (1930)

The Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali earlier this year tabled significant proposals for a strengthened and revitalized United Nations in his agenda for peace. The UN operation in Somalia represents the first significant test for these principles and I urge the Canadian government and other countries to do their part to ensure that these principles are implemented.

In conclusion, to the men and women who will participate in this mission, we wish them a safe return. There is probably no more noble effort that one can do in life than to help our fellow citizens. In this case we will owe a great debt of gratitude to the young men and women in our forces.

We thank them for their dedication and their commitment. At this time of year when so many families are looking forward to reunions, we also wish the families of those who will be going to Somalia our best wishes and to say to them that our thoughts are with them.

We support this motion because we believe that Canada, in our great tradition, can continue in a humanitarian way to help our brothers and sisters throughout the world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is in order and debate is now on the amendment.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of hope that I rise today to speak on the motion and I will be directing my remarks to the main motion in the large part.

The motion concerns the deployment of Canadian forces personnel to Somalia in support of the United Nations Security Council resolution 794, adopted on December 3, 1992. I believe that it is only befitting for Canada, a country that has always been known in the vanguard of peace, to act boldly to restore hope to the people of Somalia.

I wish to encourage my colleagues in the House from all parties to join me in supporting this motion and by so doing sending a message of solidarity to the population of Somalia.

Just a few moments ago I was outside the House for the lighting of the Christmas trees and this year the National Capital Commission dedicated the lighting to our peacekeepers.

It was a very moving ceremony and I was joined by a young paratrooper, paratrooper Vienneau who came from Petawawa to represent his colleagues as a peacekeeper. He is scheduled to go to Somalia in a very short time. In talking with him I asked him how he felt, was he prepared. His response was he is ready and waiting to go. He wants to get there.

He typifies to me the men and women who serve in the Canadian Armed Forces who have done such an outstanding job. They are so ready and so prepared to help the world over.

Yesterday I was in Chilliwack meeting with the families of some of our peacekeepers at their little Christmas get together with the children and I had a chance to talk to some of our peacekeepers abroad. I know that hon. colleagues will be pleased to hear that they are doing well and are in great spirits.

One of the mothers told me that her son had asked her why his father had to go away at Christmas. They came from a presentation of some pictures of what was going on and the pictures showed the starving children. After the little boy had seen the pictures he said to his mom that he knows those children need his father more than he does right now.

I would like to thank those families and those children because they are also making important sacrifices as their loved ones serve on behalf of Canada all over the world and very shortly in Somalia.

Before discussing the particulars of our deployment to Somalia, I would like to speak about the situation in that country. I would specifically like to address the political context, the military threat and what the United Nations has proposed to do before the most recent Security Council resolution. I would then like to outline for the House the important aspects of the Canadian Forces' intended role in this operation, bearing in mind that this is a humanitarian exercise intended to create the conditions which will allow the delivery of much needed assistance to the people of Somalia.

[Translation]

This mission, which is somewhat similar to the military intervention in Korea and the Persian Gulf war, is an unprecedented effort by members of the international community to stabilize the situation in Somalia and ensure that relief reaches those who need it most.

[English]

The simple fact of the matter is that Canada, as a responsible member of the international community, cannot nor should not sit idly by and watch as the situation in Somalia deteriorates beyond hope.

Let me remind members of the House of some of the tragic political and military developments that have occurred recently in Somalia. Somali dictator Siyad Barre was overthrown in February, 1991 after a very brutal civil war. Since then the country has descended into chaos as over 40 clans, once united in their struggle against the government, began to battle for control of the country. An interim President, Ali Mahdi, was installed in Mogadishu and in May, 1991 the northwest region of the country declared its independence as the republic of Somaliland. No country has recognized that independence and neither government exercises anything more than very local authority.

Most of the country is now split along tribal lines with several so-called warlords. We have seen that name being used in the media quite a lot. There are different loyalties and interests battling for power and local prestige. Even within factions chaos reigns as the individual warlords have scant control over their band members.

Most vestiges of the country's social structure have been destroyed in this conflict, leaving a situation of near anarchy. It reminds me of a book I remember reading as a teenager of what happens when law and order breaks down. The pictures I have seen on television have really brought that memory back to me of what has happened there.

Drought and the destruction of the infrastructure have compounded the problem, creating appalling living conditions for the innocent people of this country.

The breakdown of civil order in Somalia has given rise to a situation in which local warlords have armaments of various capabilities. Ill prepared but fiercely proud, this collection of rag-tag bands has wrought havoc on the aid distribution efforts of the United Nations as well as the international agencies of non-government organizations that have been trying to help in Somalia.

We have all seen the images of the commandeered jeeps or the trucks laden with youths and armed with machine guns or other weapons careening down the streets of Mogadishu. Other groups have heavier weapons. These armed thugs have interfered with delivery of relief on the ground, but even aircraft and ships have come under fire. It has become far too dangerous for relief workers. They are intimidated, threatened and prevented from doing the very job which they have been trying to do. Their vehicles have been hijacked and they have even been shot at.

Since the demise of Mr. Barre, 300,000 Somalis have died of hunger or as a result of the fighting. It has been said that four million of Somalia's seven million people need emergency food aid and that two million are currently dying of starvation.

• (1940)

Some will say that these numbers are exaggerated. It is hard to know, but whether they are precise is really beside the point. The fact of the matter is that more deaths in Somalia are too many. We must create a situation in which food is no longer a weapon in the battle for power in Somalia.

As we all know, the United Nations has tried without success to establish a significant and functional presence in Somalia. On July 27, 1992 the UN Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 767, which called for the establishment of an immediate cease-fire throughout the country and prevailed upon the UN Secretary General and the international community to provide humanitarian assistance.

On August 28, 1992 the UN Security Council met and adopted resolution 775 authorizing the expansion of the UN operation in Somalia to a new total of just over 4,600 civilian and military personnel. Since then a Pakistani battalion of 500 troops was dispatched to the Mogadishu airport, but this battalion remains confined to the airport for all intents and purposes. It has basically been held hostage by the anarchy of the state of affairs in and around the city.

Canada has participated in two of the international community's attempts to bring relief to this devastated country. On September 11 we started bringing humanitarian relief from Nairobi, Kenya, using three Hercules transport aircraft and some 70 personnel. This international effort, which is being co-ordinated by the International Committee of the Red Cross, has successfully conducted 314 flights and delivered more than 4,100 tonnes of relief supplies since early September 1992.

Nevertheless, these aircraft have come under fire while air-dropping supplies to remote parts of Somalia. Another instance of this violence against relief efforts occurred on October 5. While people were unloading the Canadian Hercules and a Belgian transport aircraft at the Mogadishu airport a shell landed between the planes. Both aircraft were forced to depart quickly, and pursued by small arms fire. Fortunately no one was injured.

The other aspect of Canada's contribution to the international relief efforts has been our willingness to participate in the United Nations Operation in Somalia, UNOSOM. On August 28 the Minister of National Defence announced that the government was offering 750 Canadian forces personnel to this multilateral peacekeeping operation. The Canadian Airborne Battalion, reinforced with engineers and support personnel from Canadian Forces Base Petawawa, was ready to deploy to the northeastern part of Somalia in the area around Bossasso. The supply ship HMCS Preserver was in the Red Sea en route to Somalia loaded with provisions to make our Canadian contingent self-sufficient.

It was at this point that the United States offered the United Nations up to 30,000 personnel to deal with the situation.

The United Nations Secretary-General considered the American offer and on November 30 presented the Security Council with options for a response to the present impasse. On December 3, the Security Council passed resolution 794 which authorizes: "Member states. . .to establish as soon as possible a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia".

As the Security Council resolution pointed out:

> The situation in Somalia is intolerable and—it has become necessary to review the basic premises and principles of the UN effort in Somalia and—UNOSOM's existing course would not, in the present circumstances, be an adequate response to the tragedy in Somalia.

In light of the emerging situation the government was presented with essentially two options. Canada could either participate in this new UN operation to ensure the delivery of humanitarian aid or in the peacekeeping mission that would likely follow.

The government decided to make the most realistic and immediate consideration that it could of our contribution. Given the fact that our airborne battalion was already equipped and prepared to go to Somalia as a part of UNOSOM and that HMCS Preserver was already in the area it only made sense for Canada to participate in the first phase. This is a meaningful contribution that we can make now, and with a minimal amount of adjustment to our planned deployment as part of UNOSOM.

Thus, Canadian forces personnel will work together with a number of other countries to ensure that the mission is accomplished with a minimum amount of risk and with the greatest benefit to the needy population of Somalia.

I want to make it perfectly clear that we are participating in this new UN action for humanitarian reasons. As a responsible member of the international community it is our duty to answer the call of the starving people of Somalia. Accordingly, up to 900 Canadian forces ground personnel, 350 personnel aboard HMCS Preserver, and some additional people assigned to various headquarters will participate in this new international effort.

We envisage contributing essentially the same force that we were planning to send to the northeastern part of Somalia as part of UNOSOM, which is a parachute battalion with wheeled armoured personnel carriers. However, this task force will take some additional equipment, such as more heavily armed wheeled fighting vehicles, in response to the changing requirements of the mission. This necessary equipment is now in the port of Montreal. The Chief of the Defence Staff has already instructed the commander of Land Forces Command to begin loading operations, so those ships will be loaded in the next few days and ready to sail.

While this mission entails some measure of danger—and no one has denied that, from the UN, the Chief of the Defence Staff, or the minister—we consider the risks to our personnel acceptable. Members of the Canadian forces have an appropriate mandate and the necessary equipment to complete their mission. As with all United Nations missions, contingency plans exist for commanders to take necessary action to protect their people.

[Translation]

Our commanders and personnel are competent professionals who have the government's full confidence. They will determine whether or not to use force in the context of the rules of engagement applicable to this mission. The government believes that our military will perform their task impeccably so that humanitarian aid is distributed to the starving Somalian people.

[English]

There will undoubtedly be those who cite our involvement in this operation as evidence of Canadian complicity in an American-run show. I should point out that this line of argument ignores several key points. First, there are over 30 other countries involved. In addition to the United States, France, Belgium and Italy will be providing forces. What is even more interesting is that countries like Ethiopia, Morocco, Nigeria, Senegal, Yemen and Zimbabwe, to name a few, will be contributing in one way or another to this operation.

Second, and perhaps more important, this is a UN operation, complete with UN oversight and an ad hoc commission composed of UN Security Council members, the membership of which is drawn from no less than a dozen different countries. The Secretary-General, through a liaison staff, will submit regular reports to the Security Council on the progress of the operation, much as a United Nations military command was originally intended to function. In addition, the Secretary-General has been given a mandate to establish a fund to pay for the operation.

Indeed, the willingness of the United States to exercise its power through the United Nations in an operation of this type is something that should be welcomed. For years middle powers like Canada have sought to engage the United States in multilateral endeavours of just this sort.

We have come to learn, the hard way, that the end of the cold war does not automatically guarantee a more stable and peaceful world. As we embark on trying to address the new generation of security problems we should be pleased to be able to call upon the capabilities and resources of a country like the United States.

• (1950)

The situation facing the people of Somalia is neither simple nor unchanging. The international community has for some time now sought a solution to the war and famine that are wracking the country. The measures initially proposed by the United Nations this summer are clearly not enough. The situation has deteriorated further and only stands to get worse. Therefore, a more forceful response is essential.

The United Nations is having to face the challenges presented by the emergence of a new and more complex world. In response, nine UN members have again devised an innovative approach to address conflict and alleviate human suffering.

In summary, why is Canada in Somalia? Because our heritage as a multicultural country and a compassionate society has meant that Canadians cannot ignore human tragedy wherever it may occur. Beyond this, as one of the founding members of the United Nations, Canada has a unique responsibility to support the UN at this critical point in its history.

This is why Canada supports this enforcement action and will back its words with concrete action. Our objectives are clear and simple. We will go into Somalia with other UN members to ensure a secure environment for the delivery of humanitarian assistance and we will pave the way for a subsequent peacekeeping mission.

Our personnel and equipment are ready to go. We are consulting with other UN member states and joint planning is under way as I speak. I think that all Canadians will share my conviction that this is a just cause and my confidence in the ability of our Canadian forces. As a result, I sincerely hope that all members of this House will vote in favour of the main motion and support Canada's efforts to restore hope to Somalia.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I shall be taking 10 minutes of our party's time. My colleague for Northumberland will be sharing the 20 minutes with me. I would appreciate, Mr. Speaker, if you would indicate when my time is up.

I want to say, as my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre said, that we support the motion with the amendment that this should be a long-term plan and not just a short term quick fix. He has said very ably why this needs to be done and why this party supports the action of the government.

He has questioned, quite rightly, what happens afterward and what are the long term consequences of what we are doing. He has said too that this brings into question the future of peacekeeping. Canada has been an historic player in peacekeeping. It seems to me that we are in what might be described as a sea change now. We are in a situation which requires not just peacekeeping, but peacemaking.

We have to ask not only what the policy is going to be in future for our forces but we have to ask also—and I want to use my time to ask the specific question—will the resources be available to our men and women overseas to do the job that they have to do? Not only have Canadians got a record in peacekeeping because they are credible, but because they are competent.

I along with other people was in the gulf and had a chance to see for myself that competence and the fact that the Canadian forces performed so well when called upon to do a job. The question is: Are the resources going to be available to them in future?

I remind the House that during the gulf war when our ships were going overseas, we took a gun out of the museum to put on the deck to make the armaments possible. That is not the kind of equipment that competent men and women deserve when they go into a battle situation.

I would remind the House it is not just the gulf where our equipment has been called into question. When General Mackenzie came back from overseas, he said: "Canada won't be able to participate in additional United Nations peacekeeping operations unless the Canadian forces get more money and troops. Our ability", he said, "to respond to future requests has pretty much reached its limit". This was before we went into Somalia. This was pre-Somalia.

He said our infantry force is 1,200 members smaller than the metro Toronto police force and yet we are policing the world. He asked if we could not channel the peace dividend from the cold war into peacekeeping equipment and capability for Canadian troops. That has been echoed by others.

It has been echoed by Colonel Alex Morrison who was formerly of the Armed Forces. As a matter of fact, he suggested that the defence department is thinking of forming a special force specially designed to help meet Canada-UN peacekeeping commitments.

Analysts immediately noted, including Mr. Morrison, that the option is being considered at exactly the same time that the strength of the Armed Forces is being cut. He said: "It leaves me perplexed. On the one hand, the government is systematically decreasing the size of the Armed Forces, and now it is talking about setting up a special force. It indicates that the federal government wants Canada to remain a world leader in peacekeeping without going back on its policy to reduce the size of the Armed Forces".

These statements are from capable men and women, some of whom are serving now, some of whom have served previously. They call into question the irony of at the one hand increasing our commitments around the world, stretching our resources to the limit, and at the same time cutting back on our forces and cutting back on funds.

Recently we saw evidence again in the last economic statement that another $1 billion is being taken from the defence department in addition to the cuts that had been made already, without any indication of where those cuts are going to be made or what the effect might be on peacekeeping or where in fact peacekeeping might have a priority within the spending estimates of the department. These are the questions that the government has to answer. The men and women who are going overseas deserve some answers to those questions.

In this budget as in previous budgets, the Department of Finance is dictating the policy of the defence department. That is not good enough for credible and competent men and women going overseas. They want a clear indication from this government as to where it intends to take us in the future and how they will be supported.

At the same time as that policy statement was made by the Minister of Finance, the Auditor General was questioning the spending priorities of the Department of National Defence. Capital projects are vastly overspent; the reserves called into question in terms of their funding and their capabilities; spare parts are far too costly. We have the irony of increasing our commitments without a clear policy direction. At the same time as funds are being reduced, the spending that is going on of present funds is being called into question by the Auditor General.

My time is limited and I did not want to be wholly negative on this because as I said at the beginning, we do support this action. These people who are going overseas and indeed all Canadians want these questions answered. They want the questions answered as to the future of peacekeeping. What is going to be the policy and will the resources be there for them?

We need a clear statement from the government on our future, not just in peacekeeping, but in peacemaking. We need a clear statement of what the priority is going to be in resource allocations. Canadians support peacekeeping, but they want a firm assurance that the equipment is going to be there.

I want to close by reading from a letter that actually was written to the Minister of Finance by Valerie Pike of Ottawa. It says what I have been trying to say.

> I would like to express my concern with regard to the most recent, and seemingly endless, decreases in defence spending.
> We apparently expect our military to undertake increasingly difficult assignments with not only less funding, but without the certainty of any increased support in the future.
> If a commitment to a more peaceful world is still part of the stated foreign policy of this country, then we must be prepared to fully support our peacekeeping operations—
> The federal government seemed eager to exploit the popularity of peacekeepers during the recent referendum campaign. While the ads themselves were excellent, one would think that a more concrete demonstration of support would be in order.
> In the final analysis a nation should be judged not by the amount of its GNP but rather by the legacy of its contribution to humanitarian efforts. We are in a unique position of having peacekeeping expertise which is the envy of the world. While we may in the future establish an international peacekeeping college, we should in the present fully fund our military. Canadians are putting their lives on the line throughout the world and they deserve our total support. To do less is unconscionable.

• (2000)

We support the present action. We support the objective. We want that objective to be enlarged and to make it clear that it is long term.

It is time to give the men and women who serve in the Canadian forces some clear indication of what the policy is going to be in the future. Moreover, we must give some indication that the resources are going to be there so that we will continue to be capable and effective, not only in this peacekeeping operation but in others that we may be called upon to do elsewhere in the world.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak to the resolution before the House this evening which with our amendment the Liberal Party is very pleased to support.

Who can look at the agony, the misery, the deprivation of tens and tens of thousands of Somalis and not long to personally be able to go out and do something to help them.

I would like to begin my comments by thanking all of those people, Canadian and non-Canadian, who for months and months have toiled under dreadful conditions to try and bring in our name, I would like to think, some help to these starving, violence-ridden human beings, victims of such a horrible situation in Somalia.

We support the United Nations resolution which has enacted an enforcement action, or peacemaking, to resolve some of the problems that exist today in Somalia. Although the peacemaking forces are going to be U.S. led, the United Nations will have an ongoing role in keeping track of what the situation is and the Secretary-General will have a role in continuing decision-making with regard to the situation.

It gives us some hope that finally human beings, innocent victims of violence and famine, are the focus and the target of an enforcement action and that we do not only respond when our own self-interest is at stake. This I believe is an important step for the United Nations and the world and something that can give all of us hope.

Another area to do with this whole operation that gives me some hope for the future is the fact that we are taking an enforcement action to disarm those people who are provoking violence against innocent people in Somalia. Those young people, 11, 12, and 13 years old and their warlord masters did not come into possession of those weapons through their own making. We in the western industrial nations of the world, in the north in particular, have profited greatly over decades by arming people throughout the world and those arms have fallen to the people who now perpetrate this violence against the innocent of Somalia.

We are now going to have to pay the cost for what we have profited from in the past. Hopefully, through this action, as we pay the cost, I sincerely hope that cost will not be in human lives. As we pay the cost of this operation, I hope we will come to recognize that our profiting from arms sales world-wide is not worth the cost and that we will be more committed than we ever have been in the past to an arms control convention in the world, not just control of large weapons but conventional weapons as well. We will need to put a lot more work and effort into the conversion of our military industrial base and help other nations of the world to make that conversion as well.

Before I continue, I would like to express my dissatisfaction with what is happening in the House this evening. On Friday morning in Question Period I raised the question as to what recommendations the minister would give to this House for prior debate before a decision was made on what we would do in Somalia.

I personally felt that I was treated with contempt by that minister. It was not just that I felt that I was treated with contempt. I felt the people of Canada were treated contemptuously by this minister and worst of all, I feel that this House was treated with contempt by our minister.

She refused to answer the question in the House. She refused to answer to the people of Canada directly where there could be some debate and some discussion and she arrogantly dismissed us and went to hold a press conference to announce the government's decision.

The process cannot continue this way. The people of this country want to be involved. They do care about what is going on in Somalia and what our relationship is to that situation.

To give highlight to some of their concerns so that it is not thought it is just the opposition raising these arguments, I would like to quote from some recent articles on this issue.

I will begin by a quote from an article by Geoffrey York in The Globe and Mail this week. He said: "Some relief agencies are worried that the U.S. troops will cause more problems than they will solve. They expect that the Somalis will simply hide their guns until the U.S. troops have departed. Then the same problems of violence and lawlessness could resume".

We have tried to raise this issue this evening, and our action in Somalia which the minister has said will be for a period of up to 12 months with no peacekeeping role after that causes a lot of concern not only to us on the opposition side of this House but also to Canadians. There has to be a long-term view of what we are doing in Somalia. Perhaps it would be appropriate for Canadian forces to be involved in peacekeeping as well as peacemaking.

In quoting Mr. Fennell the article goes on to say: "There are two fears: if the military involvement is too short, things will just go back to the way they are now. And if it's too heavy-handed and neo-colonial, it would just alienate the population".

There is another quote out of The Washington Post that says that things could unravel. We have heard from representatives, both in the U.S. and here in Canada, that we can expect casualties in this operation. That means we could have some Canadian casualties.

I would like to reiterate what my colleague from Labrador was saying. I have grave concerns about the cuts which have been made to national defence.

Rather indiscriminately they appear to be on focus. I had forces personnel speak to me after the gulf war project. They said that before they went to the gulf, they had to beg and borrow equipment and clothing from their colleagues before they could head out to the gulf because they were poorly equipped.

We will risk casualties and we will make higher risks than are necessary if our government is not committed to equipping and looking after our peacemakers appropriately.

We want to know if we are going to provide humanitarian assistance through enforcement action in Somalia whether this is a new principle of government policy. Where else might we expect to see similar actions taken?

I will quote from a New York Times article that says: "The problem is that if halting starvation or upholding human rights are now legitimate criteria for U.S. intervention abroad, as compelling as protecting traditional strategic interests, where does Mr. Clinton draw the new red line? How much starvation is necessary, or how woefully must human rights deteriorate, to justify U.S."—or we can say Canadian—"action? If Somalia, why not Bosnia, and if Bosnia, why not Kurdistan, and if Kurdistan, why not Haiti?"

• (2010)

We listened this morning in the Liberal caucus to very dreadful stories that parallel those occurring in Somalia, but they are occurring in former Yugoslavia on this very day.

We must respond as well to the human misery there. We must try new ways to bring humanitarian assistance to the people who are being so violently deprived in that area of the world. We need an opportunity to discuss and debate what it is the government is setting as it takes these new paths.

What are our principles and is the Canadian action now limited as it is to peacemaking only? What is, in fact, in the best interests not just of Canada but particularly in the best interests of the Somalians we are trying to help? Helping them today, disarming today, then abandoning them to allow those with power through guns to re-arm tomorrow is really not helping Somalia.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise you that I will share my time with the hon. member for Rosedale.

I rise in this House as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for External Relations and International Development.

The subject that we are debating today is extremely important and historically significant. Indeed, the role that Canada will be called upon to play in Somalia, together with other member countries of the United Nations, goes beyond the roles of humanitarian assistance and peacekeeping that we have traditionally played in the international community.

That is why I consider it essential to examine the reasons for firm intervention by the international forces in Somalia and also the impact of the Somalian crisis on countries in the Horn of Africa and the whole African continent.

The Canadian government's decision to participate in this operation goes much further than the additional measures announced by the Prime Minister on August 21 to support the comprehensive security and humanitarian aid initiative taken by the United Nations in Somalia.

It goes much further because there is no alternative: every effort made so far and all the money spent by the international community to send relief to the sick and starving people of Somalia have not been enough to achieve the objectives.

This year alone, Canada has provided Somalia with food and humanitarian aid totalling more than $22 million, including the emergency aid for Somalian refugees in Djibouti, Kenya and Yemen.

It goes much further because the stability of the whole Horn of Africa is threatened. Although the civil war in southern Sudan continues, some countries are now on the road to recovery and reform. Ethiopia has also begun economic and democratic reforms that give hope. Kenya, which will hold elections on December 29, is moving toward democracy. Canada has given substantial support to the efforts of these last two countries.

The Somalian crisis and the massive movements of refugees in the countries of the region endanger this whole process. The growing insecurity and the drought afflicting the country have forced some 700,000 Somalis to seek refuge in neighboring countries, while 300,000 others are exiled in Europe, North America, Saudi Arabia, Yemen and other regions. Kenya alone has more than 300,000 Somali refugees. Canada will closely monitor these refugee movements and support UN operations in this regard.

We have used every international channel available to get humanitarian relief to various parts of Somalia. Several agencies in the UN network, such as the World Food Programme and UNICEF as well as the International Committee of the Red Cross, take part in the relief operations. A number of Canadian non governmental organizations supported by CIDA are also on location: CARE, Médecins sans frontières, Oxfam-Québec, Hope International.

During the 22 months since the overthrow of the Somali President, the situation has been constantly deteriorating in most parts of the country. Over four million Somalis are suffering from severe malnutrition and malnutrition-related diseases. The death toll since November 1991 is over 300,000 and an estimated two million more lives are presently threatened.

The Somali crisis emphasizes the convergence of actions—on the humanitarian, political and military level—required to bring about reconciliation and to restore power and authority. You will remember that, following negotiations with the clan leaders last September, the United Nations had decided to deploy troops to increase the protection provided for the unloading and storage of emergency supplies as well as the protection of convoys in and around Mogadishu.

In response to the call from the United Nations, a Canadian airlift operation was undertaken at that time. Three cargo aircraft support the emergency relief effort under the auspices of the World Food Program and the International Committee of the Red Cross. The airlift is between Nairobi, in Kenya, and the southern part of Somalia.

In spite of all the humanitarian and diplomatic efforts on the part of the international community, the situation is still deteriorating, aggravated by numerous confrontations between the various opposing factions.

Just last weekend there were reports in the papers of this state of chronic instability jeopardising the food relief efforts in Somalia. Humanitarian organizations on location attempted a last-ditch on Saturday to ship 400 tonnes of supplies stored in the port of Mogadishu since the beginning of November out to the northern part of the capital under the terms of an agreement between the factions controlling the two sectors. For the first time in three weeks, the convoy was able to leave the port, but attacks on storage facilities in the provinces are now on the rise. There are over 40 more trucks loaded with supplies waiting to leave the port of Mogadishu for the northern part of the region.

[English]

The situation has become so volatile that firm intervention by multinational forces has become unavoidable, although the immediate risk of such an operation temporarily interrupting various efforts does concern us very much.

We hope that this intervention will be as brief as possible and that it will meet with co-operation on the part of forces now on the ground. Only the establishment of civil authority will allow us to bring an end to this intervention.

Traditional diplomatic relations do not work in Somalia right now precisely because no civilian or governmental authority structures now exist in Somalia. Humanitarian intervention by stronger nations has therefore become more justifiable because the chances of negotiating order and a political solution are very slight given that the disputing factions have no real identifiable political objectives.

It is essential that the process of reconciliation be set in motion and that civil authority be established. Leaders of other countries in the region have a crucial role to play and I think that we should applaud the initiatives of the Government of Ethiopia to encourage reconciliation in Somalia.

• (2020)

Political instability, drought and civil war remain the principal obstacle to development in the Horn of Africa and they are behind this enormous demand for international humanitarian assistance. Over the last three years Canada has provided to the countries of the Horn of Africa food aid and humanitarian assistance worth some $200 million. It is in Ethiopia and Sudan that the need for emergency aid had been greatest.

[Translation]

To manage a durable solution to the chronic crisis raging in the Horn of Africa, it will be necessary to deal simultaneously with the problems caused by heavily armed and militarized societies, massive population movements, ethnic conflict, collapsed economies and environmental destruction caused by human factors.

Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if I could go on for another two minutes. I don't know whether the hon. member for Rosedale would let me finish.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): That's fine.

Mrs. Duplessis: The countries in the Horn of Africa must set up governmental structures that are resolutely focused on peace, security and development. In Somalia, however, it is wishful thinking to even consider that a national government could emerge from the current chaos without outside help. It is equally Utopian to imagine, especially considering the current state of the world economy, that the international community could continue to provide humanitarian aid indefinitely, without looking for ways to introduce conditions that are favourable to reconstruction and rehabilitation of the countries in that area.

The Somali crisis is one example of the need for better co-ordination of humanitarian aid. That is why Canada fully supported creating a department of humanitarian affairs within the UN, while contributing to the central emergency fund set up last December.

I could say a lot more, but I will finish my speech. It is in that perspective that we should see the decision made by the Government of Canada on December 4 this year to take part in operations approved by the Security Council for the delivery of humanitarian aid in Somalia. As a member of this government and as a citizen of a strong, free and democratic country, I fully support this delicate operation and I recognize its historic impact.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the House that although the attention of the whole world is now focused on the crisis in Somalia, other nations need international aid and original solutions. I am thinking, for instance, of Mozambique, Angola and the Sudan. Canada must continue to do its fair share within the international community and find long-term solutions to long, drawn out conflicts, especially in African countries.

[English]

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate and, even more, I welcome the opportunity for the debate itself to occur. I have listened carefully to a number of the speeches. I must say that I am a bit concerned at the outset at the attempt to state that we are in some ways not allowing sufficient opportunity for this matter to be debated.

I have heard very few questions in this House raised over the past few months on this issue. It is not only in this House. We have many committees in which this matter could be more effectively and more consistently pursued. I would invite all members of the House to make further and greater use of that because the issues at stake in Somalia are not ones that by themselves can be simply sorted out in a few minutes in the general debate.

One of the things that I think is important to remember in all of this is that at the centre of the present tragedy of Somalia today is the situation in which complete chaos has occurred in the context of high-tech weaponry. Somebody should ask the question: Where did all these weapons come from? They were not manufactured in Somali basements or in garages or somewhere within that country itself.

One only has to review a bit of the history to know that in the 1970s a major conflict erupted between Somalia and Ethiopia in an attempt by the Somalis to regain territory that they thought was rightfully theirs in the Ogaden. Unfortunately, and I will not go into the details this evening, the arming that took place of Somalia, first by the Soviet Union and later by the United States, has left its tragic legacy in that country. There has been increasing concern, particularly since the Iraq war, about the way in which the arms race seems to go on unabated with or without the cold war. We are again seeing the latest manifestation of that in Somalia.

I would hope that members on all sides would pursue this issue much more aggressively beyond this single debate this evening.

The situation in Somalia will not be resolved easily. My colleague from Winnipeg has proposed a slight amendment to the original motion talking about an enduring secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia. I am not sure that the amendment is quite what the member intends. If it is, I believe it is only going to contribute further to a fundamental problem that we face not just in Somalia but indeed throughout the Horn of Africa and in other parts of the world.

We have become very good, even though I say so myself, at humanitarian gestures and actions. We heard in the recent statement by the parliamentary secretary of the extent to which Canada has consistently responded with humanitarian assistance, but humanitarian assistance is not the solution to the problems of Somalia, Djibouti, Kenya, Uganda, Sudan, Ethiopia, Mozambique, Angola, any of the countries you want to mention where there has been and continues to be internal conflict. The problem in all of these countries is much more long term, much more associated with the fundamental and grinding poverty that existed for far too long and, I would have to say, by the patterns of international economic activity and sometimes external great power conflicts which do their own damage to the ultimate fabric of these societies.

I am most impressed, and it was referred to I believe in a speech earlier today, with the proposal from the Secretary-General of the United Nations, the Agenda for Peace which he proposed to the United Nations earlier this year. Before I talk about that specifically, I want to say that the Secretary-General himself is to be given a very large amount of credit to the degree to which we have already been able to move. It is very little and it is very late, but the Secretary-General from his own personal knowledge of Somalia has risked his own stature of leadership to ensure that the Security Council and the United Nations itself would act in this instance.

In that context he has produced I think what may be one of the most important documents to come before the United Nations since its inception. It is an attempt to break out of a narrow definition of peacekeeping to a much larger definition of peace building, beginning with a whole process much in advance of when conflict finally erupts through what he refers to as preventive diplomacy and then in some cases preventive deployment. I suppose that is what we are into at this point. Then it is the actual business of peacemaking which again is part, I think at least, of this present initiative and then peacekeeping which is a traditional definition and a traditional activity that we have heavily engaged in as a country and, finally, building peace.

I am not going to elaborate on all this but I certainly would invite all members to look closely at the leadership that the Secretary-General of the United Nations has provided on these matters because they are quite crucial.

Just two or three weeks ago, along with several other colleagues from this House, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, the member for Waterloo and I took part in a two-day meeting at the United Nations in which we looked at this document, particularly in the context of present day Somalia. It was a conference of parliamentarians organized by parliamentarians for global action which attempted to say: "Are there not ways in which we can somehow act more proactively, more constructively and more long term for peace building?"

I do not think the issue here, even at the moment with the extent of hardship and suffering, is simply or finally a matter of making sure enough relief food and relief supplies gets delivered from ports and gets transported to each and every Somali village. It is a question of whether at the end of the day we can ensure that there is a different situation in Somalia so that this situation does not repeat itself again next year or the year after or five years from now. That is very different, if I may say so with respect to the member from Winnipeg, from the amendment he has proposed this evening.

This evening we are dealing in a sense with sending a very large fire brigade to put out the fire. Just like very large conflagrations this is a very dangerous enterprise. No one should be sanguine about the extent to which we are going to risk human lives, along with other aspects of our activity in this situation.

I regard this as a high point in the initiatives of the United Nations and the Security Council in effecting this international effort to try to establish some corridors of peace for humanitarian relief and assistance. In that sense this is an important motion which I hope will be supported by all sides of the House.

I hope we will continue to have not just debates in this Chamber or questions in this House but much more discussion in the committees of the House and in areas where we can do a lot of detailed and important work toward assisting and working with the people of Somalia and their neighbours to establish a just and lasting peace.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, we in the Liberal Party support this resolution to send Canadian troops to Somalia as part of a United Nations sanctioned multinational force to maintain the security of humanitarian relief in that country.

When the hon. member for Rosedale who just spoke opened his remarks he questioned the Liberal Party's position that this matter should first have been announced in the House of Commons and first approved in the House of Commons. That is our position. We say that wherever possible these kinds of operations should be first brought to the House of Commons and approved here.

We say that because this particular type of initiative is of significant difference from the ordinary peacekeeping operations. In this case the use of force is authorized not only by the peacemaking force but obviously can be used against the peacekeeping force by the warlords in Somalia. Therefore Canadian lives are at risk. We believe that if we are going to send Canadian troops abroad where their lives are at risk there should be a broad consensus in this country to do that, and the place to get that broad consensus is in this House of Commons.

I agree with him that there should be more discussion in committee. We are not against press conferences, but we believe that when Canadian troops, young men and women, are sent abroad on high principle, I admit, but with their lives at risk, that matter should be discussed and approved in this House of Commons. There may be occasions when the government will not be able to do that. We understand that, but in those cases it should come back to the House as soon as possible.

We must recognize immediately—and I referred to it a few minutes ago—that this initiative is an important breakthrough, another important breakthrough on the road to establishing more effective UN peacekeeping and in this case we could call it peacemaking.

Somalia is now a wasteland of warring clans. There is a total collapse of public order with random killing by tribal warlords and mass starvation. It is a situation of chaos. A few years ago there were seven million people living in Somalia—that is an estimate—and today we have already had one million of those seven million people fleeing the country as refugees, refugees from war or famine. We have within the country 1.5 million people on the verge of starvation and 3 million more in desperate need.

We all know that the United Nations has tried to come to the relief and the help of these people. It has approved humanitarian aid and food aid, but because of the warring factions in that country these relief efforts have been faced by extremely dangerous and difficult situations. It has been almost impossible in many cases to deliver that aid.

As hon. members know, UN peacekeeping started in the 1950s as an initiative of Lester B. Pearson, a former Prime Minister of this country who won the Nobel Prize for his proposals in setting up the first United Nations peace forces. Over the years, Canadians have played a prominent role in almost every peacekeeping operation.

Even during the cold war, new peacekeeping operations were approved but innovation or improvement was impossible in the system. However, with the end of the cold war during the last two years peacekeeping has been given a new life. We can see what has been done in Namibia, Afghanistan, Cambodia—that operation is in some doubt now but it is one of the largest peacekeeping forces ever mustered by the United Nations—and western Sahara and so on. There has been a new life, a new impetus for UN peacekeeping operations.

There have also been new innovations with respect to peacemaking and enforcement. While I did not fully agree with the multinational force that was approved for the Iraq-Kuwait war, the gulf war, because I felt it was not the last resort in gaining a peaceful settlement in that conflict, and while I believe that it was not fully responsible to the United Nations, it was still an attempt at establishing a new means of settling international conflicts.

After the war, the United Nations set up the safe zone for the Kurds within the territory of Iraq. That was another new development. Recently there was the dispatch of UN forces to the former Yugoslavia, which is a disintegrating nation.

In these new innovations there has been some difficulty with article 2, section 7 of the UN charter which says: "That nothing contained in the charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state". But it goes on to say: "This principle should not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under chapter 7".

A major issue for the countries of the world is how to balance the principle of non-intervention in section 7, which I just referred to, and the need to protect groups within nations who are the victims of genocide or mass violations of human rights, as has been spoken to by the United Nations in its convention against genocide and its convention for human rights. There is an obligation, as we have seen in countries like Somalia and Yugoslavia, for the UN to intervene and protect these people who are being destroyed, not only as individuals but as nations of people.

So far these new innovations have been ad hoc. But they are providing the groundwork for new approaches in preventive peacekeeping and in enforcement of UN orders with respect to keeping of the peace and preventing conflict. As others have mentioned, the new Secretary-General of the United Nations, Boutros-Ghali, has published his agenda for peace in which he has quite specific proposals to bring about preventive peacekeeping and other measures for global security.

While we approve, in this resolution before the House, of yet another ad hoc measure we recognize that there is a need to formalize new rules with respect to these matters and institutionalize those new rules so that there will be criteria upon which the United Nations and the Secretary-General can intervene in accordance with the rules of law.

The two major questions that the United Nations and the people of the world must decide upon are: one, to what extent we must balance that principle of non-intervention with the duty to protect innocent people for humanitarian and other reasons; and two, to what extent will we go beyond peacekeeping into areas of enforcement and preventive peacekeeping?

• (2040)

As we approve this motion it is obvious we will have to consider its implications for the conflict in the former Yugoslavia, a very tragic war with its ethnic cleansing and genocide.

I also want to mention the whole problem of refugees. We were critical last summer when the minister of immigration announced a special program for Yugoslavia to reunite families; a program for 10,000 families amounting to about 26,000 persons and said if you are going to do that for Yugoslavia you must also do that for Somalia.

On November 13 the minister did go part way as part of the United Nations' 100 day action program for accelerated humanitarian assistance to Somalia. He did recognize or put forward a new program for family reunification for Somalians but it is on a much smaller scale than for Yugoslavia and he hopes, he says in the letter that he sent to the Somalian community in Canada, that he will consult with it on the carrying out of this program.

In conclusion, while we approve of this resolution to send our troops to Somalia, we recognize there are risks, that some Canadian soldiers could be killed and therefore, as I said at the beginning, it is essential in these situations that Parliament give its approval in advance.

We support the resolution. We hope our Canadian troops will be well supported in Somalia. We hope they will return safe and sound with their mission well accomplished.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, thank you for reminding us that we are now debating the amendment to the motion. The motion as amended will read: "That this House affirm its support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted with regard to the present situation in Somalia, and for Canadian participation in the multinational effort to establish, as soon as possible, an enduring, secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia".

I do not know why the member for Rosedale had difficulty with our amendment. The last thing we want is UN troops going in, putting everything in order for a week and then as soon as they are out everything is back to chaos. That we do not want and that is why our critic put in that amendment.

My first contact with Somalians was in my own riding of Parkdale—High Park. Many Somalians are settling in my riding. They already have a Somalian community centre. Many of them are getting into small businesses such as food processing, the restaurant business and what have you. Many of them have their Canadian citizenship already and are permanent residents. I know this debate tonight is of great interest and great importance to them.

It is important to them because they have many families separated by this war. Just last Friday I tabled a petition on their behalf, urging this government to speed up the unification of families. Again, it has taken two, three, four years to unite families.

Whether it was people from Ukraine, Poland or wherever, when it came to reuniting families I do not know why it takes this government so long to reunite families. I urge the government to please speed up the reunification of these families. A separated family is not good for Somalia, it is not good for Canada.

My second encounter with Somalians was in the neighbouring country of Ethiopia when I was there with the hon. member for Rosedale observing its regional elections on its request. I must compliment the member for Rosedale on the kind of reputation he left for Canada when he was its ambassador for two years and when he was in charge of distributing food to the starving in Ethiopia.

I hope Canada will get the same reputation in Somalia as we have in Ethiopia. It was very heart-warming when the embassy car would stop at the stoplights or if we were walking along the street the children and elders would be whispering or shouting Canada, Canada. I hope we will leave the same kind of reputation in Somalia.

Canadians have watched the scenes of horror in Somalia and I am sure that we all agree that something must be done to get humanitarian aid to the starving. The main question is what is the best course of action?

Last Thursday the United Nations Security Council unanimously passed Resolution 794 which calls for an unprecedented effort to ensure the proper delivery of emergency relief supplies throughout Somalia. This decision is the first in which the United Nations has intervened in a country's internal affairs with a mandate to use offensive force if necessary. In my opinion, this is the most significant decision taken by the Security Council since the gulf war.

Since 900 Canadian lives are going to be placed on the front lines of this extraordinary relief effort, the decision to send our troops deserves close examination and debate by this House. Our task as members of Parliament is to reflect the concerns of all Canadians, especially the families of Canadian forces personnel who are sacrificing Christmas at home and who must accept the risk that our ground forces will be far more vulnerable to attack than our participation in the gulf war.

I am naturally concerned, therefore, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced last Friday that Canada will participate in this U.S. led force without consulting Parliament first and not announcing it in this House when she had the opportunity.

The hon. member for Northumberland in Question Period on Friday asked the secretary of state whether we would be committing troops or not. The secretary of state had a golden opportunity to make that announcement in this House. What did she do? She ran out to the media and made the announcement to them. Despicable behaviour.

Security Council Resolution 794 is a significant departure from our conventional understanding of peacekeeping. In fact, we are breaking new ground with the risky and untried proposition of peacemaking. My party supports this decision of the United Nations to take firmer action in Somalia but we must be convinced that this is the best course of action to get food and aid to the starving and the ill in that country.

What about the promise by President Bush to pull U.S. forces out by next January? Where does that leave the multinational force? Where does that leave the Canadian troops? Where does that leave the neighbouring Ethiopian forces that, with limited resources, will also be participating?

We are intervening in a civil war without any guarantee that the prime motivator of this action, the United States, is willing to finish what it starts. We could be faced with another protracted conflict, the likes of which could go on for years. We risk diving into an open-ended conflict with no game plan after mid-January. Do we really think that we can solve all of Somalia's problems in less than two months? Is it fair to the people of Somalia to restore the peace for one day and then hastily retreat out the back door? I would like to know the government's game plan before we commit to a multinational force. Clearly there is a need to finish what we start in Somalia.

I agree with taking the first step. If we do so, we must be prepared to take the responsibility of ensuring long-term security in the region. Otherwise all our efforts will be wasted on the warlords who will resume the war as soon as the multinational force departs from the country.

It is also not clear to me who is responsible for the financial commitment to restore the vital infrastructure and the democratic institutions in Somalia. Is it simply expected that the United States will stick the international community for the bill as it always has done with the United Nations? The Secretary-General, I understand, is authorized to set up a fund to pay for the operation and that is fair. However, I must ask the United Nations, why are Canadian taxpayers paying $14 million per annum for our troops in Cyprus? I just visited these troops a week ago.

Is it fair that the countries who commit the troops and other resources are the ones that pick up the tab or should it be all the countries that belong to the United Nations sharing the cost? I think the answer is clear.

The United Nations' charter calls upon the member nations to respect human rights and fundamental freedoms. The charter calls for a deeper understanding for the rights of minorities, including protection for the more vulnerable groups in societies such as women and children.

How will the action in Somalia affect the way we handle the civil war in Bosnia-Hercegovina? Is the international community prepared to take the same risks on behalf of the innocent women and children in Bosnia-Hercegovina as in Somalia?

• (2050)

This morning our critic chaired a round table on the problems of Bosnia-Hercegovina and we had Canadians of Serbian, Croatian, Albanian, Greek and Bosnian descent there. It was a true Canadian way of debating, at the round table, not shouting at each other but giving recommendations. This is what the government should be doing, getting out and listening to Canadians. However, the government is not doing it so we in the opposition party will do it.

In my riding I have constituents representing both the Somali and the Bosnian communities. They are going to ask me if the Government of Canada is willing to act in the same consistent manner in each region.

At this time I am not sure that anyone can provide that answer, but I caution the government and the Secretary of State for External Affairs that we must at least have a game plan over the long term, lest we be forced to follow the whims of super powers and then suffer the consequences.

Last Saturday I attended the annual Christmas festival put on by the Parkdale Intercultural Council. The Parkdale Intercultural Council tries to invite Canadians who are newer arrivals to Canada. In addition to the Ukrainian performers and participants we had Somalis, Vietnamese, El Salvadorans, and people from Zaire and Thailand.

I looked up the national anthems of all these countries and they all had something in common. All the people of those countries wanted peace. It was so striking to me that at this time, the Christmas season, all the national anthems call for peace and development.

I hope through Resolution 794 that we will have peace not only in Somalia but in Bosnia-Hercegovina and all around the world.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I will be dividing my time with my colleague from Saskatoon—Humboldt and we will each be taking approximately 10 minutes.

I rise to speak on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party in making it clear that while we support the resolution which is before the House and support the amendment which has been proposed by my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre, we do have very grave concerns about the process which has led us to this debate.

Last week we in the New Democratic Party called on the government to recognize that before a decision committing Canadian troops to a very dangerous new mission involving the real threat to life was undertaken that Parliament should be consulted. There should have been an opportunity for Parliament to have input before that decision was announced.

Instead what we saw was the minister announcing the decision and now today suggesting that Parliament is in a position to debate a decision which has already been made.

This represents a fundamental contempt not only for this Parliament and members of this House but, as well, for the Canadian people who surely should be consulted through this House before a decision this fundamental has been made.

The member for Rosedale has pointed out rightly that Canadian lives are at risk. Nine hundred members of the Canadian Airborne Regiment will be in Somalia in the very near future. However, the minister suggested that in response to a question from my leader earlier today that governments have to make decisions.

I very much regret that in this particular instance the government has chosen to ignore the important principle of consulting with Parliament before this decision was made.

Having said that, I want to make it clear that we do support the proposed deployment of Canadian forces to Somalia in accordance with the provisions of Security Council Resolution 794. It should be very clearly understood that very dedicated members of the international aid community have expressed concerns about the potential impact of a massive military intervention on the safety of international aid workers, particularly one under the United States leadership.

I think it is important that we recognize the context here today, that some 300,000 people have died in Somalia this year alone from starvation, disease and warfare. Almost a third of the population, two million people, are threatened with starvation and 250,000 to 300,000 could die before Christmas without any help.

It is also important that we not forget our history, that we recognize for 10 years, from 1977 to 1987, the United States poured almost $800 million into this client state. There were massive weapons supplies dumped into that particular region. Of course, there was the propping up of a corrupt and increasingly brutal Siyad Barre. When he collapsed, they walked away but they left behind weapons.

There were massive quantities of weapons: mortars, air-to-ground rockets, plastics explosives, M-16 rifles and tens of thousands of mines. These weapons used against the people of Somalia by Siyad Barre had been supplied by the United States. Therefore, it is essential that we recognize the history, the fact that the international community has a responsibility here.

Certainly we would have preferred, as indeed the Secretary-General himself indicated in his letter to the United Nations, that there be a country-wide enforcement operation under United Nations command and control. Unfortunately, according to Secretary-General Boutros-Ghali, the UN does not at present have the capability to command and control an enforcement operation of the size and urgency required by the present crisis in Somalia.

One of the reasons for that is the fact that the United States has not paid its dues. It has not paid its peacekeeping commitments for too many years, which is certainly an essential element of any lasting change in the approach of the United Nations. There must be a recognition that the principles set out by Secretary-General Boutros-Ghali in the Agenda for Peace earlier this year must become a reality.

There must be a United Nations standing army so that we do not have to depend on ad hoc decisions by the United States or by other countries. We must also recognize that there remain many questions about the nature of this operation. Indeed, it is essential that humanitarian aid be provided to those who are starving literally by the thousands, but what exactly is the scope of this operation?

Secretary-General Boutros-Ghali has pointed out that in addition to getting humanitarian aid through, in his words it is going to be essential for "at least the heavy weapons of the organized factions to be neutralized and brought under international control and for the irregular forces and gangs to be disarmed".

That is a very dangerous and risky operation. The lives of Canadian men and women are clearly at risk and many questions remain unanswered about the scope and mandate of this operation. What is essential is that there be a rebuilding of civil society in Somalia. Somalia is basically a country without a government. It is a country in a state of anarchy.

Africa Watch has pointed out the importance of rebuilding a civil society and the importance of the United Nations working together with those elements of Somalia society that in fact have survived the ravages of Siyad Barre. They include the Somali Red Crescent, informal organizations of Somalis that have distributed food, cared for the sick, the wounded, for children, the elderly and the traditional clan elders.

I believe it to be profoundly tragic that the former United Nations special envoy for Somalia, Mohamed Sahnoun, who had been negotiating effectively with all elements of Somali society to secure an end to the conflict and to protect the relief effort and was negotiating with traditional Somali clan elders, was pulled out of that particular region.

It is essential that there be a resumption of political dialogue and negotiations under United Nations leadership. Canada can play an important role in that process. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that Canada will participate in the initial humanitarian intervention and then will pull out. We will not participate in the ongoing peacekeeping efforts.

• (2100)

What will our role be internationally after we have pulled out from Somalia? What will our role be in working with the NGOs which, under the government's recent economic statement, are going to have their budgets slashed? The very NGOs, Oxfam, Care Canada and other NGOs that are working in the field and to whom we owe an enormous debt of gratitude are having their budgets cut by this government. Clearly that too is unacceptable.

I think that we as Canadians have the right to ask as well within the context of the United Nations: What about consistency? There is a human tragedy unfolding in Bosnia. Surely if the United Nations is prepared to act and to act vigorously and pursuant to an international mandate to the Security Council in Somalia, there are other crises including the crises in Bosnia, Liberia and elsewhere that must be addressed as well. There cannot be one standard in Somalia and another in Bosnia where genocide is unquestionably taking place.

In the longer term, we may very well have to look at a role for the United Nations in terms of some form of trusteeship in Somalia to help to restore civil society, to look at the possibility of an international conference under United Nations auspices to bring together the various parties to try to arrive at a permanent and lasting solution.

The final point I want to make is again to underline the risks in this operation. It was an old Somali proverb which stated that all Somalis will ban together against the non-Somali intruder. The fear of course is that if this operation goes wrong, what could happen is that the various warring clans might come together not only against the United Nations, but against the some 400 international aid workers as well with tragic consequences.

We join in applauding the courage and the dedication of the Canadian troops which will be working in Somalia, the Canadian Airborne Regiment. We wish them well. We think of their families at this very difficult time and certainly we hope for a solution that will not only bring badly needed humanitarian aid, food and drugs to that region but as well will involve the rebuilding of a civil society and a government for the people of Somalia.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, Canada is right to offer troops to the United Nations rescue operation in Somalia. The situation there is ghastly and the reality of the famine and the external wars has left limited choices and left the entire people in peril.

It is impossible to remain aloof while gangs of undisciplined bandits operating for their own profit only are able to impede the delivery of emergency food and medicines to those Somalis who have need of that food and those medicines.

If we are to believe the reports that we hear, and we have no reason to disbelieve, we are told that thousands or more people are dying every day and that up to two million lives are at risk. Boutros Boutros-Ghali last week informed the United Nations that if food is to reach those trapped by the war situation in Somalia, there is no alternative but to use either the threat of force or to use actual force.

Much as many of us abhor supporting armed intervention, when it is the only way to save millions of innocents from death by starvation or disease, we are forced to support it. Now the government must do what it can to make sure that what the United Nations is doing and what we are taking part in is done right and that any action taken by the United Nations sanctioned force is not done in vain. We have a responsibility if we are going to be part of this intervention by the military that when it is over the country will not revert to its present chaotic state.

We also have a responsibility to do right for another important reason. Somalia is not the only humanitarian crisis in the world today. Others are, as mentioned by my colleague, Bosnia, Liberia, the Sudan. These are situations that are crying out for solutions. The United Nations is entering into the new era of peacekeeping and peacemaking. It would seem that we are moving into a more interventionist mode. A well-intentioned but badly conducted operation in Somalia could set a wrong precedent and make it more difficult or even impossible for the United Nations to intervene on the side of peace and humanitarian treatment of the people in the future.

It worries me that this initiative seems to be so U.S driven, so Bush driven if you wish. It seems to me that the need for the United Nations has never been greater in the world. Only through the collective initiatives of the nations of the world will we be able to seize the new avenues of opportunity to address the problems of today and of tomorrow; not just issues such as Somalia, Yugoslavia, the Middle East, but all of the tensions that are caused by poverty, by the population explosion, degradation of the environment, social injustice and abuse of human rights.

A Bush/United States driven initiative in Somalia may not be the best entry into the new world community.

What is lacking from this decision? What is lacking for us here in Canada and probably for the whole world? What must we, as Canadians, be sure is in place if we are going to go on as part of this kind of intervention in the future?

First of all, it is necessary to define the principle of humanitarian intervention. What does it mean? Is military intervention justifiable in Somalia because civil order has collapsed, famine threatens the entire population and all other peacekeeping efforts have failed? Is rapid response absolutely necessary? Will those be the requirements of all intervention in the future? Or has the United Nations, in this particular situation, crossed the line in respect to sovereignty; is there need for a new definition of sovereignty which would not have allowed the United Nations to take this kind of action in the past?

Second, there must be a set timetable. To avoid a Vietnam syndrome sort of approach and to avoid the quagmire of continuing war, we should establish a deadline which will require the Security Council or at least the Secretary-General to have to renew the troops' mandate at some time in the future. That has not been done at this time but it should be recognized as a necessity in the future.

Third, we should sign up more allies. A U.S. operation, conditional on U.S. leadership, smells too much of Desert Storm. Europeans and other African states, as part of the intervening troops, would make the intervention much more palatable to many people of the world, and I am sure to the Somalians as well.

The leadership should be UN driven. Again, U.S. command does not sit well to many people. A multinational command would be more United Nations related and would not contribute to the United States global cop image.

Fourth, we should define the goals now. It is obvious that the short-term goal is humanitarian related and the disarming of the warring factions within Somalia.

• (2110)

What are the long-term goals and who will fulfil them? In every case is this to be the kind of intervention that we can expect in the future? There must be long-term goals not only in Somalia but in other countries where the UN is operating. There should be action to help the Somalians build a new society.

A large number of NGOs from Canada has been operating in the Horn area. They met on November 26 and November 27 in Ottawa. The idea of intervention into this particular situation was brought before the meeting. They had great concerns. They suggested that the proposed massive intervention may jeopardize the long-term prospects of peace in the region, but they agree that intervention is possible and is probably absolutely necessary under the circumstances.

However they say the intervention should be limited. No more than is absolutely necessary should be put in and the intervention should be monitored. It should not be left up to the United States. It should be monitored by someone who can be objective about what is going on at a particular time. It should also be monitored within recognition of the regional realities of the particular area. In other words, although they think this is necessary they have a great concern that it must be done properly.

That is my message here tonight. If we are going to do this in the future as we have done in the past but under new terms, those terms must be established so that we do this right, that we do not add to the dangers of the situation but make them better for the future.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): The House will now hear two members of the Official Opposition for a 20 minute period to be divided equally. The next 10 minutes are for the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to debate the motion before us this evening.

I have watched like all our colleagues the situation unfold over past months and indeed in the last few days since we have more or less had a commitment of troops to the area. I see many similarities in the situation tonight as had existed almost two years ago to the day with respect to committing troops to the gulf, young Canadian sailors, soldiers and airmen in a situation of risk as is always associated with peacekeeping but in this particular case and the instance in the gulf more risky than heretofore.

I feel very conscious there are many watching us in the emergency debate this evening, particularly the families and friends of those young Canadians who are about to embark on this operation. I express to them—and I know I speak for all of my colleagues on both sides of the House—the appreciation we have for the dedication of their husbands, wives and relatives and indeed for their professionalism. They go forward in the mission we are debating evening with our full confidence and I hope with unanimous support that they are doing for Canada what Canadians want them to do. This is the crux of the debate here this evening. We are debating this matter so that Canadians can approve or disapprove of this operation and of future operations.

This operation is not as large in scope as the gulf operation but in risk, it is at least as great. In the opinion of many, the risk is greater. We have to be cognizant of that as we debate this motion.

There are some similarities with the gulf operation. I hope we can learn from that experience. First and foremost, we have to be very, very careful that we understand why there is support for this operation. Why are we supporting participation of Canadian troops, young Canadians in a far off land for humanitarian purposes?

A lot of us feel more sanguine, more clear on participation in this than we did in the gulf operation. It is not because there is civil disobedience and civil breakdown in a country. It is not because it is perhaps less difficult to confront disorganized warlords, a lot of them teenagers, than it is to face Serbian-trained Bosnians, a situation we were involved in a few months ago. It is because all other peacekeeping efforts have failed. It is because an entire population of a country is threatened by famine and it is because there is need to act now.

I believe that Somalia should be seen as a testing ground for a better United Nations operation. My colleagues and I had a lot of problems with the previous operation. Strictly speaking, it was not in any sense of the words a United Nations operation. The command was different. The control was different and the reporting mechanisms were different. I hope in this operation at least more tools of the United Nations mechanism will be put in place.

I understand that the Secretary-General of the United Nations has accepted there will be United States command. No doubt that gives President Bush more leverage to commit up to 30,000 American troops. However, I hope the United Nations mechanism will be in place so that at least the reports will go to the United Nations. My colleagues and I hope there will be more of the United Nations military committee organizations set up so that the operation will come into force.

My third concern is that we not ignore Parliament. As I said, this operation is different from the gulf operation. I certainly sense from Canadians a concern that we are getting into an area of peace building that is beyond what we were doing when we started in 1948 and progressed over these many years.

In the last two months I have communicated with four constituents who have been concerned about the safety of their children who are serving now. While there is risk, I assured them that the Canadian forces, because of their professionalism, the leadership of their officers and the understanding of their seniors, they will have the best support possible. Anything that can be done for them will be done, be it in Canada, afloat, in the air or on the ground.

I would like to assure them, in consonance with the concerns of my colleagues as espoused by my hon. colleague from Winnipeg—South Centre, because of the changing nature and the growth of this peacekeeping operation idea in practice there is a pressing need that there be something institutionalized to keep a watchful eye from a parliamentarian viewpoint.

We need to have either a combined committee of the Senate and the House or a combined defence and external affairs committee because as our troops embark on this operation, with Christmas coming, the House will unlikely be sitting for another month and one-half. I believe that calls into necessity more than any other time the need for a standing institutionalized system of parliamentary watch on this operation.

My next point is that we must have defined goals. Clearly the immediate goal is for humanitarian aid, to deliver medical and emergency supplies to those who are trapped without it. Otherwise we are looking at the death of two million people.

That will be achieved within a certain time frame, but beyond that, and this is why I support the amendment to the motion, where do we go from there? Do we get rid of all the arms? What about the refugees? What happens to them?

Are we going to develop a new society for Somalia? I do not want to cut into my colleague's time and so my final concern is that at a time when we are at the highest for peacekeeping, at the highest for risk taking operations in Canadian forces, the operations budget is being reduced: $225 million this year, $375 million next year and $740 million the year after.

I would not want to think that defence policy was being made by the Minister of Finance. I hope that this operation will not be impeded in any way shape or form by the reduction in the operation of the national defence budget.

In closing, I once again, as I said at the opening, share the concern of those loved ones who are sending their husbands and wives, friends and sons and daughters on this operation, particularly at Christmas time. I can assure them that we will do all we can to ensure that they have the proper support and that the Canadian forces will, as usual, do this as a totally professional operation.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the situation in Somalia is very grim. The picture is very grim. This point has been made by other speakers and it does not need to be reinforced.

Let it only be said that according to reports coming from the International Committee of the Red Cross, Africa Watch and Physicians for Human Rights, the situation there is of such a nature that the world community must intervene and carry out humanitarian action.

The second point that must be made is that in supporting this initiative on the part of the Government of Canada, and as to the role that Canada should play in Somalia, something must be said about the fact that this is a new type of intervention. This is a major change in policy and therefore when this takes place, as it has been customary in Canadian politics and particularly in external affairs policies, the public should be consulted and involved.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs did not inform and did not consult Canadians. No debates took place before this decision was made. The issue is not a new one. It has been burning for a considerable length of time.

We have now crossed a threshold from peacekeeping to peacemaking. Having done so, we will be facing very soon questions as to what we do in the conflict in Bosnia or in Liberia or in Kurdistan, Haiti or in any other parts of the world. That question will have to be addressed by the present and subsequent governments of Canada.

The third point that needs to be made is there is a strange notion on the part of the government benches that this will be a brief intervention. Far from it. Peacekeeping has been engaging Canadian troops for sometimes 10, 20 years and even longer as the experience in Cyprus has shown, as the experience at the border between India and Nepal has shown. Certainly peacemaking can take up the same time, if not more time, than peacekeeping. Therefore we have to approach this new policy in a different manner than so far.

Fourth, the point has to be made concerning the budget. Are the funds available for a peacemaking action of this nature which may take much longer than anticipated? Only a few days ago the Minister of National Defence was expressing doubts as to whether he would have sufficient funds available to carry out a measure of this nature.

If the government cannot give assurance that there are enough funds, that the budget is not adequate, we are in serious trouble. The Secretary of State for External Affairs tonight did not touch on budgetary matters and did not give assurances, thus dispelling any sense of doubt on the ambiguity created a few days ago by the Minister of National Defence. The question of budget is very central and very important.

Finally, I would like to ensure that my colleague from Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke has time to make an intervention. Our thoughts also go to the Canadians of Somali origin in Montreal, Toronto and other centres who are very anxious to have family reunification brought about. They have gone through incredible hardships and sacrifices in the last year and even longer, sometimes two, three and four years.

The reunification of married couples has to be brought about by the Department of Employment and Immigration. We urge the government to take the necessary steps to bring this unification about.

To conclude, what we are witnessing tonight is an important step in the development of Canada's foreign policy. Having crossed the threshold from peacekeeping to peacemaking, we are seeing a new dawn emerging in international relationships. We are seeing probably the transfer of sovereignty from individual nations to a larger body called the Security Council in the United Nations. This may bode well for the world community but it is also fraught with uncertainty and hardships.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to thank the hon. member for Davenport for giving up some of his time, and I would like his constituents to know that I am very grateful to him for that.

I want to put a personal note on this debate tonight because I live three miles from the Canadian forces base gate in Petawawa where 900 troops are now ready to go to Somalia. It is just a short time ago that I went up to say goodbye to 150 that went off to Cambodia, another 50 off to Kuwait to explode the munition dumps and the shells lying around in that country after the gulf war.

Canadians have tremendous expertise to offer the international community. This exercise upon which they are about to embark is going to be a great challenge and a much different challenge than we have been used to having within the United Nations ambit.

I want to say something about our personnel in the Canadian forces and to follow up on the comments that have already been made. As Canadians we cannot continue to be the great moderation force and the people who go out and build bridges among groups, to keep peace in countries, to tone down international fires so they are not going to become big fires.

• (2130)

We cannot do that unless we have the numbers of personnel in the Canadian forces to do it. I want to say tonight, very strongly in support of the Canadian forces, that if there ever was a time in history, Canadian history and world history, when Canadians have the talents they have to offer the international community and to tone down trouble spots in the world, it is now that we should be supporting a stable number in the Canadian forces to go out to do this job.

Our Canadian forces are professional soldiers. They are professional politicians because they know how to make deals, and they are professional diplomats because they can get along with almost anybody.

I want to say a word about military families. When we send these troops off to these various places in the world to keep the peace we forget about those who have been left behind. Our hearts must go out to the families of these soldiers who are going away at Christmas and others who are serving this country around the world in peacekeeping missions under the UN. Let us remember them. Those families are also contributing to Canada.

I want to say that this Parliament of Canada, tonight and in the days ahead, must support our Canadian forces in numbers, in morale and in realistic terms. Then we will have the ability to send soldiers out into the world to do the great things on the international scene that must be done to maintain peace in this world. We can no longer allow little battles here and there in this world to simmer into big battles and lead into a third world war. It is inhumane, it is just impossible to even imagine it.

If civilization is to survive we must cultivate the science of human relationships, the ability of all peoples of all kinds to live together in the same world at peace. That is what our Canadian peacekeeping forces and our Canadian military are all about. Let us all support them in their efforts across this nation and be proud of what they are doing for this country in every trouble spot in the world to which they are sent.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, since I was a child I can remember pictures of Ethiopia and Somalia, the two poorest countries of the world. I can remember those terrible pictures and those images. This is not a new problem. It did not start with this particular round.

In 1980 I was made aware by the Somali community of the crisis at that time. I got together with a non-governmental organization and we raised $200,000. We got some milk powder and we headed over to Somalia. We landed in Mogadishu and then we drove for eight hours out through the camels and out over the desert. We bumped along until we came to 60,000 people huddled in little bush shacks. They had denuded the sparse desert to put these together around a little mud hut that was not higher than four or five feet tall. In these little huts were largely mothers and children.

We took them the food that we had, the powdered milk, and they started pouring out of these little mud huts. They lined up 10,000 mothers and children but we only had two trucks. That is all there was. So they weighed each child as the mother stood there hoping that her child would make the weight per age according to the standard, and the child was given back to the mother again, again and again. She took them back to die.

When I see these things on television day after day I have to turn away because that reality is so intense for me. I came back to Canada and said we must do something about it. I talked to CIDA and was told that it was not a program country. I talked in the committee and I questioned all the then ministers at the time.

I have to say that there were one or two compassionate ones on the immigration side sitting across from me who did their best to help but it was not a country program. We could not add another country. It was not French. It was not British. It was just the poorest country in the world. We could not add it to the country program. We have not added it since.

They were dying then and they are dying today, and they have died by the thousands ever since then. They will keep on dying.

What do we have to bring to them? We bring them weapons and soldiers. Probably we have to do this to make the peace now, when we should have made the development funds available 20 years ago.

It is a tiny little country. There are only five or six million people. It has some mining resources. It has some fishing resources. It had an opportunity. Sure it has a repressive government so nobody wanted to touch it with a ten-foot pole back then. I met that supposedly repressive president, President Barre. At 2 a.m. he scheduled his appointments. Corrupt as he may or may not have been at least there was a semblance of order that could have started the process and could have meant some hope.

Maybe this is hope that we offer today in the form of trying to make peace.

If we move all of this big equipment in there, and all of these people from all over the world, if we make the peace and then move out what have we done? What have we done? I urge that this House think of the vision that I have, it is so indelible in my mind and I have never felt this way before, of dying children, of mothers carrying their children who have to die. This is the beginning of an enlightenment, a recognition of the future of Somalia, and the beginning of the planning for the development programs, the free market system and so forth, and even democracy, that can give hope to Somalia.

I thank the House for this debate. I thank the members for their participation. Now let us have a comprehensive look at Somalia in its present and its future.
