Why has the minister not put in place new management procedures for the EH-101 helicopter, as recommended by the Auditor General, so as to save the Canadian taxpayer billions of dollars?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this is more or less the same question I was asked before.

The hon. member may wish to take a careful look at the Auditor General's report, which says that one of the problems with big projects was the fact that some members would insist on having part of the work done in their ridings.

The Auditor General does not encourage the policy of using the department's big projects to do regional development. I hope the hon. member will read this particular chapter very carefully.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence along the same lines. However, I assure him it is not the same question. It goes from the general to the specific.

In this report the Auditor General reveals that the difficulties observed in the management of defence programs is related to problems generated early in the project life cycle during project initiation.

Given the magnitude of the EH-101 helicopter program, $4.5 billion, the third largest program for the government ever, will the minister have the Auditor General review the program at this stage of its life cycle?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it may not be the same question but the spirit is the same, so the spirit of the answer will be the same as well.

We have already followed up on some of the Auditor General's comments, including his suggestion to tighten procedures.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In his statement this morning, the Minister of Transport outlined the government funding that was sought by Canadian Airlines in order to complete its transaction with its employees and American Airlines.

My question is this. Is the giving of the loan guarantees which were sought by Canadian still under consideration by the government or is the $50 million offered today the only and final assistance to be given by this government to Canadian Airlines?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I outlined in my statement this morning the hurdles that were in the way for the Government of Canada to be able to intervene in this matter.

I have said many times in the past that we were very impressed by the desire of the 15,000 or 16,000 employees of Canadian Airlines to save their airline. It is for that reason we came to the table. We have put our proposal on the table and it has been accepted. Both the company and the employees are already saying that they are very satisfied with the government's response to their request.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt the employees are pleased to receive any assistance they can get from the government. However, my question was a very specific one.

The minister outlined the conditions that were sought by Canadian Airlines in the proposal that was put to the government last week. The minister's statement reveals a willingness to contribute some money but does not respond to the loan guarantees that were requested.

Will the government consider giving the loan guarantees that were sought in order to complete the American Airlines transaction, or is this the last and final offer of assistance this government is prepared to make to Canadian Airlines?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the obvious conclusion is that the hon. member did not really read the statement I made in the House this morning. I explained that responding to the proposal in its present form would expose both Canadian taxpayers and the employees themselves to losing their investment outright because we do not control one of the fundamental conditions of this proposal, which is that PWA is to leave the Gemini system altogether before the other conditions set by American Airlines can come into play. An affirmative response in this respect would mean putting considerable amounts of taxpayers' money at risk, as well as the personal contributions of employees.

FISHERIES

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of fisheries about some tired old clam beds in my riding.

I have heard from over 500 constituents along the Bay of Fundy shore and the Northumberland Strait shore through meetings, letters and petitions requesting that the government establish conservation measures to protect the clam stocks along these shores.

I would like the minister to tell us if under section 43 of the Fisheries Act the department can establish these conservation measures, and will it?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am never too tired to pay attention to the siren call of the soft-shell clam.

I understand that the hon. member is tired of waiting for a solution to the problem to which he alludes. The existing regulations do not provide us the tools to properly manage and control the clam fishery. New regulations are being prepared. We expect to have them in place during the early part of next year. They will require all persons fishing clams, tired or not, to be licensed and will also deal with persons fishing clams recreationally.

I think that the hon. gentleman's problem will be resolved early next year.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the plight of Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who are held in Brazilian prisons on 28-year jail sentences.

Last week the House of Commons justice committee again strongly and unanimously urged the minister to request the expulsion of Chris and David from Brazil, noting that in addition to the earlier miscarriages of justice they had documented, their lives are now threatened because of violence in Brazilian jails.

My question for the minister is very straightforward. How much longer is she determined to wait, how much longer must the lives of Christine and David be at risk before this minister finally listens to the voices of the justice committee and thousands of Canadians and seeks their expulsion from Brazil?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that it is important to repeat once again that the process of expulsion in Brazil is neither automatic nor easy and in fact it would be unprecedented in modern times, particularly given the legal process that is going on at the moment.

I am sure the hon. member will be glad to know, because of representations on behalf of the Government of Canada, we have been able to obtain some information about the state of the process that is going on at the moment. The case is under active consideration in Brasilia. The appeals are before federal judges. They have had advice from the Attorney General.

We are optimistic that these cases will be heard in the very short term and we will have some answers on the length of the sentences about which we understand the Attorney General of Brazil has stated he would like to see some differentiation.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, through you to the same minister. David Spencer in a letter from prison in Brazil said: "The important thing for fair-minded souls in Canada to understand is to say we are waiting for local remedies to be exhausted is to say we will do nothing".

• (1500)

In view of the fact that the lawyers for both Christine and David in Brazil and Canada have made it very clear that the process of appeals and transfer could take many more months, if not years, I want to ask this minister specifically why is she continuing to wait? How much longer will she wait before she finally acts on the unanimous report of the justice committee, before she finally recognizes that their lives are at risk because of the violence in Brazil? How much longer will this minister continue to fail to live up to her responsibilities as minister on behalf of these Canadian citizens?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that I and the people in the embassy have more than lived up to our responsibilities with regard to Mr. Spencer and Miss Lamont.

I should point out that the lawyers for Mr. Spencer and Miss Lamont do not have anyone in Brasilia, whereas the embassy does have people there. They are very close to the appeal process that is going on and is under very active consideration in Brasilia right now. We believe and have every reason to believe that our information is correct.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

IMMIGRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Valcourt that Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the suspension of the debate the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood had eight minutes remaining.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying before Question Period began, we on this side of the House were disturbed by the fact that all of the amendments put forward by our critics in committee were rejected by the government side of the House.

A lot of those recommendations were as a result of listening to many experts from across the country, as well as the experience we have had as members of Parliament. Constituents would come to us from time to time on highly sensitive issues or on issues and problems that could not be addressed by the Public Service or situations where the Public Service, in the opinion of our constituents, was not really giving a fair judgment or a fair evaluation.

As I have said, the rejection by the government of all of our recommendations is not really working in the true spirit of amending the bill in a constructive way.

This is a very complex bill. I have not read every line of this bill, but I want to refer to the section we have to deal with on a regular basis in our constituency offices. That has to do with the section relating to the minister's ability to suspend the normal process and let people come to our country by way of a ministerial permit. Quite often the minister will act on the advice and information presented by a member of Parliament.

There have been many, many times in the last four years where the minister of immigration, including ministers previous to our current minister, the hon. member for St. Paul's, when minister's permits were approved for those people whose names were given to the minister by members of Parliament.

What concerns me about this bill is the fact that we are delegating more responsibility to the front line officials which would create a situation in which a member of Parliament would not be in a position to even put forward a request for a minister's permit on humanitarian and compassionate grounds.

I have known of many examples where officials in the department have either not reviewed all of the information in their possession or even if they did have the whole file at times their judgment was debatable. Hence, as members of Parliament we would present this to the minister's office and often we could get that decision reversed. This bill works against the ability of members of Parliament, especially those in urban areas, to do their job properly and effectively.

There is no mention and no recognition in this bill for members of Parliament to have any special support or ability to appeal on behalf of those people who have been rejected by senior officials.

I notice that section 121 states:

> The Minister or the Deputy Minister, as the case may be, may authorize such persons employed in the public service of Canada as the Minister or Deputy Minister deems proper to exercise any of the powers and perform any of the duties and functions that may be or are required to be exercised or performed by the Minister or Deputy Minister, as the case may be, under this Act or the regulations, other than the powers, duties and functions referred to—

Then there is a list of subsections. It concerns me that we, as elected members, are often put in situations in which we use our judgment as to whether or not a particular person has the credibility and conditions to be allowed to stay in Canada on humanitarian and compassionate grounds. This section works against our individual ability to try to use our own offices to try to help these people. That is my interpretation of the bill.

I had a situation just three weeks ago in which a senior business person was coming to this country. He had been here three months previously. We worked hard to get him into the country. He came from Bangladesh, but this particular time because he came via New York and he could not speak English, the officials in our immigration section in New York wanted to turn him away.

I called as the member of Parliament appealing to let the man in. Business meetings were already arranged. I finally had to write a formal letter guaranteeing that if I did not make sure this person returned, I would give up my seat. That was the only way I could get this person into the country. In other words, the immigration officials were not respecting the judgment and the information we had on our end and they were quite cocky about it.

Nothing in this bill shows any respect for the individual judgment of the representations being made in the individual offices of MPs. I continue to voice my objection to that particular aspect of the bill.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have been anxious to respond to my friend from Broadview—Greenwood. There are two points in particular to which I would like to respond.

I will come back to the question of the role of the member of Parliament as protected by the legislation or inferred by the legislation in helping determine immigration cases. I think that is something we want to discuss in this House as a principle, particularly as we look at long lines of people who want to have immigration dealt with either through family unification or other processes.

The comment my colleague has made a number of times is that the government has rejected all opposition amendments. I want to point out first of all that the legislative committee in sitting for 61 hours discussed what at one point was about 200 amendments.

As the government brought forward its 70 amendments, some of which were technical, a number of which responded to concerns of witnesses and opposition members, opposition amendments were withdrawn. They were withdrawn with consent by the way which did not need to be given, under which there was no obligation for the government to operate to give that consent in allowing them to be brought back into this House.

It is important to recognize that the minister in his speech and in the process has acknowledged this in terms of amendments. The government has responded in a number of areas setting dates for the tabling of the immigration plan and changing it. With respect to provisions on mobility, terms and conditions, and obligations, changes are provided to that.

There is the whole question of fingerprinting information. There is the question of ability in carrier sanction, protection for medical reasons against public health and safety, offences being offences in Canada and abroad. There is the role of the minister being reinserted in terms of people being returned from Canada and in terms of certification.

We have amended the whole question of detention reviews. The provision concerning senior immigration officers in some areas has been tightened up. Confidentiality of hearings has been tightened up. We have responded to the question of split decisions and the whole area of permanent residence and war criminals.

To say that the government has not accepted any opposition amendments is not correct and I just wanted to correct that. The government spent 61 hours in the legislative committee, its members of the committee, in terms of negotiating with members of the opposition addressing their concerns. Government was there and was responsive.

I want to respond to the question of the role of the member of Parliament with the minister. First of all, the government has made it very clear that the question of the humanitarian and compassionate grounds process is not visible and therefore is not properly accessible. Gordon Fairweather has been asked to design regulations and consult on how to make that process accessible because that is the place my colleague and I access the system for refugees.

If my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood is suggesting that as members of Parliament we should have a priority position in terms of our ability to affect the immigration procedure I do not think he would find support for this. Thousands of our constituents—more his than mine—have been waiting for years to have the system bring people into this country to reunite families. If he is suggesting that we should have a system, not necessarily in a priority, but a system more capable of responding to us and that the role of political interference in the system should be enhanced, I do not think there would be support for that across the country.

Yes, as representatives of the people we do have a responsibility to make the case. But to expect that we would have a role that would influence the system to benefit one over the other is something we should be very cautious of, particularly in the use of minister's permits. I would love to hear his comment on exactly that point.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the member's response to the point of amendments. I was quite specific when I mentioned that my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce had specific amendments which were rejected last night one by one. Not one of them would have hurt any aspect of this bill. Every one of them would have improved it. That is the point I was making, that there was a rejection of an honest attempt to improve the bill.

I want to go back to the point about the role of members of Parliament. I am not talking about political interference, but when I have a woman in my constituency office who has been a victim of violence, when she shows me a file that states a senior official wants to deport her and put her back into a situation where her life is in danger, as a member of Parliament I should be able to assess that crisis situation. I can tell you that it was not the first letter, the second letter or the third letter that brought results, it was when the member for Trinity—Spadina, the member from Hyde Park and myself—and we all know the case that we are talking about—did a full frontal assault on the government that we got some action.

That was just one case. I can tell you, and I say this with respect, in downtown Toronto we have a lot of immigration problems. We have situations where there are family trust opportunities, where people have a business. They expand and start another one and want to bring in a relative from another country. It all looks legitimate to me, but they get rejected by the officials. As a member of Parliament, what the heck are we here for if we are not to take those cases where people feel they are not getting proper justice from the Public Service?

I have a situation right now where I have written to the ambassador in South Africa about a young married couple, the Korolia family. The daughter is Canadian and married to a South African gentleman. She is pregnant. The father who is back here runs a successful business. He has offered him a job so the family can be reunited but the department has rejected giving him a work permit.

When that person comes in my door and asks for help, are you telling me I should say: "I am sorry, I cannot help you. Go and deal with the bureaucracy."

Mr. Reid: I did not say that.

Mr. Mills: No, but you started off by saying that I am trying to interfere with the system. You are darned right I am trying to interfere with the system.

If the act is delegating to unelected officials the ability to make judgment calls without any kind of a judicial process, then surely to goodness they should understand that MPs, who are publicly accountable to the people who either support or not support that MP, should be given some respect.

I would suggest to the government that by and large I am with most officials in the Public Service of Canada all the way. I do not care whether it is in business or in government, but every now and again you run into some bad apples. There is nothing more frustrating than when you run into a bad apple when you are trying to represent somebody in a legitimate case. I do not care if you are an MP, you get crisis situations and that is what we are here for.

I just wish there was some kind of directive in this bill, as there is designated some kind of special judgment in respect to officials, that when members of Parliament are representing special cases, fully accountable, that they be properly heard on behalf of their constituents. I do not think the member for St. John's East really objects to that.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly like to identify with the remarks of the member for Broadview—Greenwood.

On the issue of a member of Parliament having access to that process, the process is so basically outrageous and unfair that there needs to be some public representation made to the minister's office.

I just did a quick consultation with several of my colleagues and I cannot identify with the remarks of the hon. member when he said that the minister's office deals in a fair and equitable way with interventions from members of Parliament. I would use the example of many Indo-Canadians of the Sikh persuasion who live in the area that I represent. Parents are trying to bring children into the country. It takes years and often fails.

In the case of two brothers, the mother had gone to India. As tradition requires she had gone to arrange a marriage of the one who had become engaged. The majority of the family were all Canadians. The other brother gave up because of the outrageous time period. He wound up marrying the woman in India and the individual who became engaged is still waiting to have that ceremony conducted in Canada.

A Sikh member of our community, a Canadian citizen, and his wife had gone back to India. He tried to come back to visit his family, the majority of whom are British Columbians and Canadians. The immigration department refuses him a visitor's visa. It says: "You cannot visit. We think you are going to try and bring your wife into Canada to stay here". They had been long-time residents.

This process is so outrageous, it stinks so badly that it needs the intervention of members of Parliament to make sure there is fair play and justice. There ought to be a visa office in the Punjab. It is so overdue just on family unification and basic decency that this government ought to be putting that visa office in.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, my response to the member will be short.

I have a situation in my riding today and I am almost embarrassed to admit that I cannot do anything about it.

A Greek family has been here for 11 years. He got bad advice on his landing papers. He has two children, nine and eleven years old. Three weeks ago, after many representations from my office, the government deported the mother and family. Now the kids are living as wards of the state. When we have an immigration system that is acting that way and rejecting solid political advice, there is something wrong with it.

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, before I begin, I would like to indicate that I am splitting my time with the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, five minutes and five minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member has 10 minutes maximum with five minutes questions or comments.

Mr. Chadwick: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to debate a topic of such importance to the future of our immigration program.

The objectives of Bill C-86, the reunification of families, the protection of refugees and the promotion of economic growth were in fact in danger of being seriously compromised by the system's increasing inability to handle the convergence of pressures and by the related erosion of confidence Canadians were expressing toward our immigration programs and objectives.

In this climate, the government understood from the outset the urgent need for a constructive and open examination of the methods, processes and criteria we use to select and bring people to Canada. We understood as well that this examination had to involve as many Canadians as possible. That is why the government undertook the most broadly-based and yet focused consultative and educational immigration strategy in Canadian history.

These open-ended consultations dealt with such critical issues as the number of immigrants we would accept over a five-year period to meet our domestic needs and international goals; the speed with which we should bring immigrants to Canada in the context of our ability as a nation to handle the increase and the best way to integrate newcomers into our society.

As well, the past eight years have seen other significant developments, including a gradual and controlled increase in over-all immigration levels, a parallel expansion of the services essential to integrating new Canadians into our way of life and a long-overdue overhaul of our refugee determination system in response to historically unprecedented pressures on the program.

These amendments clearly provide Canada with the tools to manage change in the 1990s. A common thread running through all the consultations, deliberations and debate on Bill C-86 has been an acknowledgement of the need to manage our immigration program more effectively, with greater fairness and with greater relevance to the needs of Canada as a whole. This is what Bill C-86, as now proposed, sets out to accomplish. Specifically, the proposed amendments offer a rational, workable formula to manage change in three distinct but interrelated areas of immigration policy.

First, Bill C-86 provides the means to further streamline our refugee determination system to ensure that fair decisions are rendered and rendered quickly.

Second, Bill C-86 would better protect Canadian society by tightening enforcement and control measures to defend the integrity of the system and protect the public from those who would abuse our programs or break our laws.

Third, under these amendments we could select effectively those who come to Canada through improved management of the categories and numbers of immigrants, thus ensuring that immigration continues to contribute to our social development and economic prosperity.

If I may, I would like to touch very briefly on each of these three crucial areas.

I believe everyone here today and most Canadians understand the need to streamline our refugee determination system. Quite simply, the time required to process claims and make decisions is still too long and that is not fair to legitimate claimants.

The speed with which we can remove rejected claimants remains slow and that erodes the effectiveness of the system. The consequence of all the delay is further pressure on costly support programs and that certainly is not fair to taxpayers.

The co-ordinated changes proposed in this bill will serve to create a more workable, clear-cut and streamlined refugee determination system. These changes include, among others, the elimination of the first level or credible basis hearing which was proving ineffective, improvements at the immigration and refugee board level to accelerate processing, cuts to administrative costs to allow genuine refugees to more quickly become part of the community, new procedures to expedite the landing of convention refugees with cuts of up to six months in the waiting time for landed status, and more timely, effective and fair removal procedures in cases where claims have been rejected.

The impact of these changes, including faster family reunification and a more efficient decision-making process will only enhance the special position Canada has in the world for its work on behalf of refugees. Complementing these changes, Bill C-86 proposes measures to better protect our immigration system from abuse.

At our borders we will give immigration staff the power to search individuals and to seize documents and vehicles used in smuggling operations. We will expand the authority of our immigration officers to fingerprint and photograph refugee claimants and increase the penalties for people caught smuggling. The net result of these efforts will be to more clearly distinguish between those who should benefit from Canada's generosity and those who should not.

Clearly, in a decade that promises continuing international volatility, large-scale movements of people and economic uncertainty, the ability to more effectively manage our immigration system is a priority. The changes Bill C-86 proposes will ensure that our immigration program can deal with change while fulfilling its time-honoured role as a contributor to national growth and prosperity.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have taken part in debates like this over the years. In 1975 I was a member of the green paper committee to examine the total reorganization of immigration legislation at that time. It was a major project because it had not been done for many years. The government of the day did a thorough job issuing study papers and providing background papers on the subject of immigration.

I also worked on this matter in 1987. I was the parliamentary secretary at the time when we were dealing with Bill C-55 and Bill C-84 and now as a member of the committee that dealt with this matter on Bill C-86.

I have had some continuity on the subject and I would like to offer some of my observations. As I say, in 1975 when we were debating this legislation and it came into effect in 1978, one of the fundamental tenets of that legislation was the determination on the part of the then Liberal government—and I agreed with its determination—that Canada is a sovereign country and coming to Canada is a privilege and not a right and that we as Canadians need to preserve the authority of our sovereignty.

In that mix we should never forget our commitment historically and to the present and contemporary days to compassion for those who have not had the advantages that we have today and to preserve those. In those days we designed refugee legislation that was to accommodate a flow of 300 refugees a year. That was about 1977, 1978.

The House will remember what happened when the boat people and their trauma came to our attention and Canada opened its gates. After that the idea of refugees took a dramatic turn in our consciousness in Canada. We have continuously wanted to maintain that posture of compassion and understanding, openness and hospitality to those people who are genuinely in need.

When we redraft legislation we have also to take a look at the process. The government drafts legislation on the basis of the information it has, on the basis of the agreement of its caucus. It drafts the legislation and then it is exposed to the opposition. The opposition does what it ought to do as good opposition parties do. It exercises its role in examining and opposing those sections that it believes are wrong. Any good opposition will do that and it will do it with all of the energy it possesses.

To give maximum exposure, to make sure that process works, we move into a committee system and, to speak frankly to it, in most cases the witnesses who come before the committee are brought there by and large, not exclusively, by members of the opposition. That is fine.

It is only as you sharpen the examination by people who oppose certain sections that you refine a bill. If everybody agrees you get very little refinement. I applaud that system.

Members of the opposition in this bill did an excellent piece of work. I commend the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and the member for Spadina with whom I sat in committee who were thorough and persistent and who put forward amendments. They did very good work and I enjoyed working with them.

They opposed certain sections. They did not always oppose and that is what I appreciated about their work. They opposed where they thought they should oppose and agreed with those sections they thought were positive in their view.

If the member for Edmonton will be quiet for a minute I will carry on.

Mr. Kilgour: Save us the clichés.

Mr. Friesen: I have learned a few from you.

The committee did its work but in order to bring these witnesses we brought witnesses who opposed but what struck me in going through these processes, through these several stages that I have seen in my time here in Parliament, was that the same witnesses appeared several times and said the same thing each time, even though we were adjusting previous legislation.

For example, here is what Mark Schelew of Amnesty International said in 1987 when we were debating Bill C-55: "It is an about-face on Canada's humanitarian record that may place people fleeing persecution in jeopardy".

In 1992 when we were debating revisions to Bill C-55 he said: "We strongly urge you to stick to the status quo".

What made the difference? In 1987 he opposes Bill C-55 and in 1992 he supports Bill C-55 and he says: "Do not change it. Keep it where it is. Do not do what you are going to do now in terms of adjustments".

I suggest that if we are going to have witnesses, they ought to be credible. To be credible, one ought to say something consistently. If one believes it in 1987, one ought to believe it in 1992, unless something has changed and it did. Reality set in.

While he condemned it in 1987 as being the end of compassion, he saw that in the intervening years between 1987 and 1992 the bill actually worked, that the refugees did come, that they had access, that the system was operating and that refugees were lining up to come to our shores. It was not exactly what he had thought it would be in 1987.

The Canadian Bar Association came before us this time, members like Lorne Waldman of immigration fame. The Canadian Bar Association says the system is working. It says it in 1992 and Bill C-55 has done all right. Lorne Waldman does not always agree with that and Lorne Waldman in 1987, when he was opposing Bill C-55, said: "The long-term aim of the immigration department is to eliminate all refugee claims within Canada. The government has spent millions of dollars and innumerable hours consulting on this problem and everybody's recommendations have been ignored altogether".

It has not been so. Since when have we turned off the taps regarding the refugee flow? What Lorne Waldman said in 1987 did not happen in the ensuing years. There is an old adage that if a prophet prophesizes and it does not come true, you ought to get rid of the prophet, at least the prophet's standing.

We had Gunter Plaut appear in 1987. He said: "If C-55 would have been applied to me when I was coming to Canada, I would not have been allowed into Canada. In 1992, I have read the bill several times and sometimes it occurred to me that it would be easier if the clock were turned back to admit Nazis to this country, as we have done in some profusion, than to admit those they persecuted".

In 1987 he says not to do C–55 and in 1992 says that it would be easier for Nazis to come in than for Jews. Can we accept the credibility of witnesses who say things like that, first of all that are not accurate and second that do not happen? As I say, the old adage is if the prophet prophesizes and it does not happen, maybe we ought to examine his prophecy status.

More than that, I want to point out that for all of the doom and gloom that has been sent our way regarding Canada's position on this issue, it has not come to pass. I point out that in 1987 the member for Vancouver—Kingsway at that time said this is a government that has cut back on immigration. When we came into office the flow was 89,000 and today it is 225,000 and he says it has been cut back.

When we want witnesses we ask them to be credible. To be credible they have to say things that are consistent. The fact is that Bill C–86 will strengthen our immigration system, it will keep out those people who are not interested in the welfare of Canada. I speak specifically to section 19(1)(k); people who are not interested in Canada's welfare but have other ulterior reasons for coming here. It consolidates Canada's sovereignty.

I confirm what the Liberal government passed in 1975, that Canada is a sovereign country. It is a privilege to come to this country. We want to extend that privilege to as many people as possible, to those who have the welfare of Canada at heart.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley for his comments which were mostly accurate, especially the parts that were so favourable to the opposition members now and the opposition members when he was in opposition.

However, I would ask him if he would acknowledge two points that he did not make but that were relevant. When people condemned Bill C–55—this was one of the major objects of condemnation—it had the principle of safe third country in it. When the witnesses came before us, that safe third country principle had not been amended.

It was partly amended within the committee and I believe the member will remember the day I came over to ask whether the word "any" could be introduced there. I am told that word has made it a great deal better. I do not know whether the member thinks so.

What I am pointing out is that the condemnation was expressed before the amendments. Second, it was expressed before the minister of the time decided not to proclaim that safe third country section of the bill so that all the people who might have been sent away under the provisions of that were not sent away. They were allowed to have their claim examined.

Is it not true that the present bill restricts the safe third country provision further as it does not include the caution that was included five years ago; namely, that the person shall not be sent back there by the IRB if he or she has a well-founded fear of persecution in the country where they had refuge?

Those are two circumstances that the hon. member did not mention but that considerably changed the minds of some of the people I know who were concerned with refugee law and I am wondering if he would comment on those.

Mr. Friesen: I would simply say to the member from Spadina that there are a lot of things about the bills that I did not mention, both Bill C–55 and Bill C–86.

I would say also that I would agree with him that he has proposed amendments that have perfected the legislation, and I think members of the department would agree. I do not say this with any sense of gratuity or anything else. I say it and I have said it to him privately that what he has done in committee has been very good work.

When he says that he included the word "any", I take his word for it. I believe he has made some good suggestions to the legislation.

Mr. Heap: With your help.

Mr. Friesen: Enough of the accolades now, right Dan? With regard to the safe third country concept, the difficulty with discussing this is that we lock ourselves into time periods. Safe third country was a concept which in 1987 and 1988 had an impact that it does not have today. The world has changed.

Take a look at the iron curtain, take a look at what is happening in Latin America and in all other places in the world that have undergone very large changes. I subscribe to the safe third country concept because underlying the safe third country concept is the doctrine of refoulement on which the United Nations has spoken very straight forwardly and very eloquently.

I might say parenthetically that the Canadian representative of the UNHCR has endorsed this legislation, as the member will agree. The doctrine of refoulement is at the heart of what that convention is about and safe third country incorporates that concept so that refugees who had a genuine fear of being brought back into the area of persecution from which they had come should not be and would not be sent back.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some general comments about the legislation before us today and about the operation of immigration facilities in particular.

It is interesting that over the years it has been one of the most difficult agencies for people to deal with. It also is one of the most poignant and heart-rending experiences when in a constituency office you are dealing on a regular basis with people who have come to Canada, set up homes, built businesses, got jobs and contributed to this country and then they attempt to reunite their families by bringing them to Canada.

Over the term I have been here, the government has professed to put family reunification up as a priority. I for one have to say that this is not a priority the way it is working when there are long, long separations between family members, between parents and children. When that occurs, it is very sad indeed. The first item is the problems that are as a result of enormous bureaucratic red tape. This is an agency that is absolutely overwhelmed. The resources to handle these cases in an expeditious manner are not in place and it becomes very difficult to tolerate. Tempers flare and there is a kind of sadness that pervades the entire process.

I have been working with a family on the sunshine coast for going on eight years where there has been an attempt to reunite a mother with her two children. Of course, as time goes on the children qualify at one point and they do not qualify at another. There are extensive delays. That occurs in the Philippines. There definitely needs to be some additional resources, especially applied to family reunification.

The most difficult area I have found is working with Indo-Canadians, Sikhs who live on the west coast of Canada, immigrated to this country, made a tremendous contribution in terms of the work and to the community where they live. The people are hard-working, industrious, well thought of. They try to bring children into this country and there is just an enormous period of time before they are able to effect those reunifications.

In a lot of cases some minor medical ailment prevents the reunification altogether or there is a situation where the process drags on so long that because of the age of the child, the reunification cannot be carried out.

The member for Broadview—Greenwood mentioned an outrageous situation of an Indo-Canadian and his wife who came from the Punjab many, many years ago. He had become a citizen of Canada and his wife had not. They had raised their children in Canada and they are all Canadians. He went back to India after he retired. He wanted to pay a visit to his children in Canada and he was denied the opportunity. He could not even get a visa. The argument by some immigration officer who handled the case was: "What if he tries to stay in Canada. He is a Canadian and if he tries to leave his wife in India, that would be an outrageous thing". Such thoughtless and inhumanitarian approaches to immigration outrage everyone who touches that case. It is almost an argument that the motivation is racism that is putting those decisions in place. It goes on and on and on. There are many, many cases in a similar vain. It causes enormous frustration.

When you are dealing with the minister's office you invariably wind up with the folks for immigration who have been assigned to that office. I am absolutely assured that they handle what they can but they are overwhelmed by the task.

This is especially true for those that have been assigned to handle the work of 290-odd members of Parliament whose constituents are constantly raising these kinds of concerns. In that process of being overwhelmed, the file falls down and then it goes to a busy immigration office somewhere and it falls down. Months and months go by before you hear back. Usually it involves another process and more months go by.

It is an extremely frustrating situation for members of Parliament and for the families involved. These are not the marginal cases where there really is some question or doubt. These are legitimate family members who are known in the community, whose children are known and established in another area and it is simply a push for the reunification of that family.

For example, we have had situations with Chilean refugees where we could not make no headway. At that time it was not the Conservative government that was in power. It was a Liberal government. The minister at that time was the member for Winnipeg South Centre. The office was as difficult if not more difficult to deal with when the Liberals were in power. I guess it is probably the same thing; understaffed, no resources and maybe a difference in attitude if it is an Indo-Canadian family rather than another family that is trying for unification.

I recall when the member for Winnipeg South Centre was the minister of immigration how outraged the community of Campbell River in British Columbia was. There was a longstanding Chilean family who had come to Canada because of the tremendous conflict in Chile. They had established themselves working in the mines in this country and eventually in western mines outside of Campbell River. It wound up that a brother and his family had to leave Chile. The only place they could get to was Switzerland. They were being threatened with expulsion from Switzerland back to Chile.

It was virtually impossible to get any kind of co-operation from that minister's office or its staff. They came up with 10,000 reasons why that family could not be removed from Chile. One of the Chileans who worked in the mine there actually happened to be a high ranking officer in the police before he left Chile. The father used to be a general in the police force. When this family left Chile, the friends within the police force had said: "Hey, it is time to get out of this. Your union activities are not putting you in a very favourable light here and you are in serious personal danger".

It was a clear indication to him from his friends that they were not going to have a choice. Bad things were going to happen to that family. That family was out of there in a shot to Switzerland. We fought like crazy. Finally almost every person in the city of Campbell River had to sign a petition and letters and go after the minister to say: "We know these people. We respect them and they are hard working members of our community. Family reunification is a legitimate thing to do". It took forever, but eventually that happened. This is a ridiculous thing to have to do.

These people were in clear personal danger. They were entitled to come as refugees. They had a very large family who were prepared to support them. That individual today is working in that mine as a constructive member of the community, well thought of and held in high regard like the rest of the family and does a tremendous job. Every person in that community who had known that large and extended family knew that would happen. Yet, you could not convince in any kind of a timely way the immigration office to do that.

Certainly the minister is busy. I do not say that in a derogatory way. The staff are overworked, but there are some very useful things that could be done. One of them is to provide more resources in the office so that when a member of Parliament's complaint is brought up, it can be handled in an expeditious way. These are not frivolous complaints.

The second thing is that there really does in some areas of the world need to be additional Canadian immigration or visa offices. The Punjab is an example. You get this crazy situation where it is thousands of miles to travel from the home village to New Delhi. You get to New Delhi. It takes forever to deal with them there. Month after month after month goes by. A medical that was valid at one period of time is no longer valid at another. By the time you get your appointment, your medical is gone. There should be a visa office there where the resources are easily within reach. It would certainly cut down the time if we are serious about reunification and we can put some of these families together that have been waiting for years to get together.

It is a simple matter of resources. I know the government has its program of cutting of government services, user charges for it, but these in many cases are really inhuman when it comes down to the family level.

There is a person in Campbell River right now waiting to marry a woman for the last couple of years to whom he is engaged in India. His brother finally gave up the ghost, managed to go to India and marry the woman there without any of his family present but felt that he had to do it. He expects his wife to be in Canada much sooner than the other.

We have got some tremendously difficult situations where families cannot even visit. I have three quick suggestions that could make this a lot easier and a lot more humane. The first one is the government would respond. The government and the minister of immigration's office should respond quickly and effectively to the interventions of members of Parliament. These are not interventions for political purposes or to jump the queue. They are often to try and put parents and children or brothers and sisters back together. Those are the ones that really motivate people to act and make them extremely angry when they do not. Those interventions should be facilitated.

The second thing is that in the minister's office, and I bear no grudge against the people who work there, I think there needs to be more of them so they can move through these interventions more quickly.

If my riding is typical of many other ridings, there seems to be enormous log jams in the Philippines, the Punjab and India as a whole. There really does need to be some resources put into those areas so that visas are issued to parents wanting to visit their children, family members wanting to visit Canadian citizens. They are citizens like any citizen of Canada and yet they are being deprived of the opportunity to visit.

Nobody from Britain has this kind of difficulty. Nobody from Europe or any other area of the earth has this problem. In my experience, these two locations are a critical element.

Another thing seriously concerns me. I would just mention this. As we watch people leaving certain countries of the world, I wonder what is being done. I do not have the information. I raise these simply as flags. Certainly the tension and the difficulties in South Africa are creating enormous news today. We have watched people who we would consider as war criminals being given amnesty. Certainly they are not going to be able to live in their own communities.

I would expect that we are going to get a situation where there is an enormous demand for a place like Canada to accept these individuals. I would ask what is being done to make sure that we do not accept these people as citizens in this country.

We have the situation in El Salvador in Central America where people who have committed just horrible offences against humanity have been given amnesty by the government which inflicted many of these problems. I wonder what is being done to make sure that we do not get these individuals as citizens in this country. There are indications that process is under way and that has already happened.

With those remarks let us get greater attention paid to family reunification problems within the minister's office. Let us get more resources within those offices and in certain key bottlenecks where family reunification is probably the highest priority in immigration, concerns such as the Punjab and the Philippines. Let us get some resources into that area so that these visits and these reunifications can be obtained, where families can maintain contact and if possible be brought together.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer a few comments with respect to people from far away lands who want to visit Canada because you really wonder whether some of these cases are being handled fairly.

I know that immigration people are overworked, there is understaffing, but there are some cases that raise serious questions.

For example, there is a couple who has lived in my riding for more than 20 years. They are of Pakistani origin. They want to bring a nephew to Canada, just to visit for a few weeks in the summer. To secure that visitor's visa they are prepared to post a bond and pay a two-way aeroplane ticket to get the nephew to Winnipeg for a visit.

However there is no way they seem to be able to convince the minister's office and the Canadian authorities in Pakistan to provide that visitor's visa. They point out in a telex to me that the boy is about 15 and only in the ninth grade, although I do not understand the relevance of that. He has never travelled before, and I do not understand the relevance of that. The father of the nephew earns about $230 Canadian a month. I know it is not a lot of money for Canada but over in Pakistan I hear it is not that bad.

The Canadian authorities in Islamabad, Pakistan, point out that given the economic situation, the lack of any previous travel and the commonly held belief that education and future opportunities are better in Canada, the visa officer was not convinced the boy would only be a visitor to Canada. We really have to wonder whether that is fair adjudication. Would they treat a case in this way if the nephew lived in France, Germany, England, Iceland, Sweden or Norway?

This family who lives in my riding is absolutely crushed. They consider themselves to be honourable and honest people. I want to read just a line or two from the letter that the uncle wrote to me: "Indeed myself and my wife love Kashif", the nephew's name, "very dearly and my only wish is to have him visit and experience the adventure of travel and see this country which would be an educational experience for him".

I have dealt with this case for months and I cannot get it moved. I just find there is something wrong. This is a young boy. The uncle and aunt simply want to bring him to Canada for a few weeks. They are prepared to offer anything to underline the fact that they are honest and not trying to play any games.

I feel that as a member of Parliament I have to bring this forward because I just do not think it is fair. It is these kinds of cases that make us wonder what is really going on.

If I could ask a question, I would like to ask the previous speaker whether he feels these cases are common in the area he represents.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I never seem to remember everything that has to go into a speech, but I identify completely with the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James.

Over the 13 years I have been here I do not know how many times we have asked immigration if we could put up a bond and to name the amount; we would get numerous people in the community. We know the families well. They are honest and have integrity. They would never break their word. Yet immigration will not even let a nephew or another relative visit. Many times I have offered to put up a share of that bond and have said: "I know these people. I have known them for 20 years. They are an honest, fine and upstanding group of people. I would trust them with anything". Yet immigration accuses them of conniving and trying to bring people into Canada illegally.

If there were to be another addition it would be a fourth item. If nothing else, let us put up a bond for people who we know and are trusted members of our community. We would put up the bond to endorse that these people are honest and upstanding and that we know they will live up to every letter of the conditions laid down by immigration.

I am very thankful the hon. member raised that, it is such an important point.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to comment on this bill.

We have seen this afternoon a theme developing on the examination of immigration problems in Canada that a disproportionate amount of time in the office of every member of Parliament is focused on the problems of immigration and visas and the heart-wrenching stories from constituents and families trying to bring in their relatives from other countries. I am hearing echoes in this Chamber from my colleagues on both sides of the House.

The system is not working. What is at stake is Canada's reputation as a humane and caring society. If this government cares for Canada's reputation in that regard, I urge it to reallocate the resources necessary to do the job properly.

I know immigration officials in my constituency are overburdened. I phone them on a regular basis and usually there are more clients in the office than there is staff. If we have anything to do with that, as members of Parliament we have to expose this inadequacy. The morale in the immigration department is at a low ebb, and quite rightly so. They are the ones who are being targeted for all the criticism. It is not the immigration officials; it is the government that should be targeted for criticism.

Canada has a reputation of being a humane and caring nation. We do need immigrants of the kind that has been described in this House, hard working people. We do need a humane policy where families can be reunited even for a visit.

I know of two sisters originally from Sri Lanka who wanted to bring an auntie over who had served as a maid. But if one is not a white Anglo-Saxon, one is suspect; that may not be the reality but that is certainly the perception. As a Canadian member of Parliament, that perception eats at me because that spectre of racism is something that should be fought on all fronts.

I urge this government to reallocate the resources to address the problem in a real way so that Canada's reputation will stop being tainted.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Just to terminate my remarks, I identify as well with the remarks of the previous speaker that the immigration officers in the field are overworked, absolutely overwhelmed by an incredible task. There are many attempts at fraud and attempts to circumvent Canadian law, but in the process of defending that with resources that are too few and too far between a lot of honest cases get thrown to the wolves.

The point raised by the member for Winnipeg—St. James, the possibility of being able to put up a bond to allow somebody to come in on a visit, just a visit to keep family contact together, would be useful. More resources, greater attention to things like family unification items with the pleas of members of Parliament, visa offices and extensions of the visa offices into areas such as the Philippines, the Punjab and other hot spots with a tremendous build-up and where people get lost on the waiting list, would be very useful additions.

It would make honest Canadian citizens a lot happier in a more humane process.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, if possible, I should like to split my time with another member of my party. I will not use up the total time allotted in saying a few words on this bill.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak. It is a very important piece of legislation, perhaps one of the most important pieces of legislation Parliament will pass. It touches an area that goes deep, to the heart of what we think of ourselves as Canadians and what we are as a nation.

I would start off by saying that this country has had a wonderful history of helping people and welcoming people to its shores. When I think of all the people on earth, I do not know which country has been more open and more generous over the years than the people of Canada. When there have been problems throughout the world, and there have been many, Canadians have responded.

I remember when I was a teenager there was a brief moment in the history of Czechoslovakia under communism when people were able to escape from that country. I remember many people coming to Canada and being welcomed. They were legitimate refugees escaping a tyrannical system in their own country and Canadians were glad to help them out. There are many examples in our history where people fleeing persecution have been welcomed to Canada's shores.

One thing I believe about Canadians is that they do not want their hospitality abused. They want a system of immigration and refugee determination that works. There is a perception—and I believe it is a correct perception—that the system has been breaking down in this country, that the system has not worked well.

Several years ago Bill C-55 was brought in by this government. It was designed to deal with a number of aspects of Canada's immigration and refugee determination. Many of the same arguments I have heard in this Chamber for the last couple of days I heard then. People were saying that Canada was closing its doors and that Canada was turning away legitimate refugees. I remember at the time having to look at the bill and thinking it was a reasonable response to a very difficult situation. As I say, I do not think my comments cooled down any of the rhetoric on either side.

I remember being at a meeting in Welland with the previous Minister of Employment and Immigration, now the minister of health. There must have been 20 or 30 people outside protesting with signs and handouts that Bill C-55 was going to do a number of terrible things.

All I can say is that did not come to pass. The bill was a reasonable attempt to deal with a very difficult problem. I would suggest that we have the same thing today with this bill. I do not agree with the critics who say that Canada is turning its back on legitimate refugees and that Canadians are setting up a hostile environment for people who want to come to this country.

It is just the opposite. One very frustrating aspect is the widespread belief, and I believe there is basis to it, that the system is breaking down, that the system is being abused. I get this all the time from individuals very close to Canada's refugee determination system. They will tell me that our system is a mess, is not working and is open to abuse.

As a member of Parliament I make considerable use of surveys I take of my constituents. There is always a danger when we send out surveys that we will skewer the result one way or the other. I cover a wide range of topics when I send out surveys, but it came back loud and clear that the concerns of the refugee determination system were not limited to people very close to the system. It is a perception in my case of the people of Niagara Falls and Niagara–on–the–Lake who write to me and return my surveys. They say there is something wrong with a system that takes so long to process refugees or does not move quickly against individuals abusing the system.

That feeling is out there. These are ordinary Canadians, Canadians who I know are a part of the generous and open country I believe is Canada. I believe it is incumbent upon us to respond to those legitimate concerns.

This is why I have said personally to the Minister of Employment and Immigration when I have seen him that he was on the right track and this was an opportunity to put in a place a system that worked better for everybody.

This is a step in the right direction, removing individuals who are blatantly trying to abuse the system. At the same time it is fair to the individuals who are legitimate refugees. One very frustrating fact that every member of Parliament faces are individuals who get caught up in the system and are waiting for years. The huge backlog militates against them trying to get established in Canada and getting on with their lives.

The minister's bill that attempts to try to streamline the process, expedite the process, is in the best interest of everybody. That is one of the reasons I welcome it. I ask hon. members to remember the arguments that were made five or six years ago with Bill C–55, that those things did not come to pass; that in fact Canada did not close its doors in 1986 and we are not going to be doing that here with this bill.

I was talking with the parliamentary secretary just before this about the subject of safe third countries. I live in a border community. This comes into play in my area.

I can say quite frankly after I was elected in 1984 I had a group of individuals come in to see me, wanting to talk about the refugees from Buffalo. I said: "From where?". They said: "The refugees from Buffalo". I know they have trouble paving the roads over there and I know they have some difficulties, but I never quite heard of refugees coming. I was told the refugees were not exactly from the United States. They were from other countries, came to the United States and then they came to Canada. In my ignorance of the particular circumstances I said: "Why come here? They are safe in the United States". They said: "They don't like it, you know, the Reagan administration and all these things are very difficult for them".

I see Mr. Clinton has indicated in some of his campaign speeches that there will be a change of direction in the United States. I say that without having specific knowledge of the American refugee determination system except to say I believe they have a system. They subscribe to the same laws as we do.

I have to disagree with those individuals who say to me that there is no third party, there is no safe country, we cannot accept people staying anywhere. I always say to them that if the United States is not a safe third country, I am not going to argue with them. They may not like the Reagan administration or its successor but how about other countries of the world? How about Britain? Britain has a system of law that as far as I know is very similar to Canada's. Can they stay in Britain? Is that a safe third country?' I am told the best idea is to have them all here in Canada. All the refugees should come to Canada.

There are many Canadians, myself included, that say no. I can see where an individual is at risk in his homeland, but I cannot go the next step and say it is not good enough if they have been to Britain to have their case decided, or any other country in the world. I cannot buy the argument that Canada is the only place, particularly when some of these critics were telling me six years ago that Canada was becoming a terrible place, that it was closing its doors. I disagreed with them then, I disagree with them today.

I see my time is just about up and I certainly want to share it with my colleague, Mr. Speaker. I ask members of Parliament to talk to their constituents, even talk to the individuals who are legitimately wanting to immigrate. It is a frustrating thing when people say to me: "I'm trying to bring in my relatives from the old country but the delay is horrendous" because much of our resources are directed toward security in the refugee determination system and it becomes very difficult for them to bring in their relatives from the old country.

It is in all our interests to support a bill like this which I believe strikes a reasonable compromise. There are many members of the New Democratic Party and many members of the Liberal Party who say this bill is not reasonable. I think it is. If we turn our mind back to just six years ago, that was a reasonable bill. I suggest this is a reasonable attempt to correct what each of our constituents is telling us is a problem.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the remarks of the member from Niagara Falls. I just want to say that when he talked about the issue of abuse, I do not think anyone in this House would disagree with him. We certainly are not promoting in any way an abuse of the system, for that matter an abuse of any system.

What we are trying to communicate to the government, as we debate this very complex bill, is the fact that we are being presented with cases on a regular basis where the system is abusing the individual. The judgment that the system is abusing the individual is being presented to us and as MPs, it is our job to make an evaluation whether or not the person is abusing the system or the system is abusing the individual.

I have had many cases where I have believed that the person was abusing the system and I told them that I could not help them. What we are concerned about is when we have a legitimate case and we need a mechanism to plug into that humanitarian and compassionate ground spirit which exists in the bill. We need a system that will react to that in an expeditious manner and respect the judgment that we are making on the individual cases.

Does the member not feel this is a reasonable request, when MPs are being presented with cases and are putting their own accountability on the line concerning whether it is a good case or a bad case? Let us assume that it is a positive one and we go to bat.

Does he not think it is reasonable that there should be some respect, that the system should react to our judgment in an expeditious way?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, the member touched on a couple of things.

He talked about the question of whether in some cases it is a question of the individual abusing the system or whether it is the system abusing the individual.

Let me say that I disagree with any system that takes years for there to be a determination. I agree with that in the refugee determination system, I agree with it in the criminal system and I agree with the idea that justice delayed is justice denied. It would be wonderful if we all lived until we were 300 and would have time for these things.

However, people's lives are short and a reasonable determination with safeguards is what we need. To that extent, I believe that a system that cannot cope within a reasonable period of time is a system that in a sense abuses the individual who was a part of that. I hope this bill will expedite that. I believe it will.

On the other hand, the member has said that he has seen examples. Certainly in my riding of Niagara Falls, from individuals close to it I have heard the opposite, of individuals abusing the system. What we want to do is strike a reasonable balance and that is why I support the bill.

With respect to the last part of the member's comments which he turned into a question: Should the opinions of members of Parliament be respected? Should they be listened to in the system? Of course they should be. We are in the business of trying to help individuals. None of us who has appointments each week in our ridings can escape the fact that people come in to see us and they want help.

They want us to expedite their case. They want us to cut through red tape. They want help from the system and therefore, to that extent, I agree with the hon. member that the system should take into consideration that members of Parliament have a legitimate concern in helping the people who live within their constituency and that their views should be taken into consideration in the system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, Linguistic Duality; the hon. member for Mount Royal, Employment; the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, Christine Lamont and David Spencer; the hon. member for Davenport, Substance Abuse; and the hon. member for Comox—Alberni, Human Rights.

Resuming debate, the hon. member for St. John's East for 10 minutes maximum.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I take your very subtle hint very subtly.

I find it interesting as we look at the conclusion of this debate that we have come to view the bill from the perspective of the member of Parliament. In most cases I think many of us would have an aversion to doing that. It speaks very much about the role that members of Parliament play in the immigration and the refugee determination system, partly because of the frustration so many people feel, partly because we are seen in many cases as the front line of government, partly because those that need our help with the system have a different type of political culture than we do.

I have been quite involved because of the influx of Bulgarians and eastern Europeans to St. John's and other parts of Newfoundland and I have quite willingly and actively made their case before the minister, before the IRB and certainly before the department in the agency process.

I can tell you with some pride that we have had small but very important results. The one I take the greatest satisfaction from is the Neuman Boykoff case where the minister in the national interest granted a minister's permit.

We have heard a number of comments about the minister's office and the department and their ability to respond. We have over the last few days heard a litany of cases. I too could stand here and rhyme off a series of cases that I am not satisfied with but it is important to recognize that we have a perspective problem sometimes.

The department deals with over one million applications a year from all over the world to come to this country. This year we are expecting to admit 250,000 people. My view on those numbers is well known. I hope it can be increased. It benefits our country, particularly the regions and provinces like mine.

When we look at the concerns and the numbers of problems, it is important that we look at it in the perspective of the volume that is being dealt with, not only inside Canada but by those who represent this country on the front line around the world.

My friend from North Island—Powell River raises some concerns about our ability to be responsive in different parts of the world. It is important that we recognize that not only the flexibility but the initiative to be responsive is one the things that is important and is contained in Bill C-86.

Before I leave the minister's office—and God forbid that I defend the Minister of Employment and Immigration, particularly after what he has put me through in the last five months—but one great frustration the minister's office and the department has is the Privacy Act. A number of times I have found myself standing before the minister making a case when he quite simply was only able to say no to me. I was able to find out after the fact that the base of the case I was making was erroneous. I was factually wrong. The position of the minister and the department is that they are unable to make a case. I have been part of that. I suspect I will be part of it again. However, it is a situation they find themselves in and that we all find ourselves in.

We have heard about the most difficult problems we as members of Parliament face and as members of Parliament we reflect what our constituents see and that is the question of visitors' permits. One thing this legislation does is remove an assessment of the whole family whether they are coming to this country on a visitor's visa or not. We have discussed a series of amendments on how best that problem can be dealt with. One of the problems of setting criteria is that it becomes a condition against what we must give a visitor's visa for. Despite the fact that criteria are met and we know the visitor may be inclined to stay in the country, we are not able to say no.

One of the better suggestions came from my colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River who talks about the bond. However, one downside is that the bond becomes something that is either not able to be collected upon or becomes a fee. I believe there is a nub there that should be pursued. People that want to come to this country are repeatedly denied access, quite often after coming here successively with no problem. It is something we must be able to respond to over a period of time.

One of the other great concerns that has been expressed is the question of family reunification. That continues to be a concern. We have heard a number of things said about it. There is no question that the ability to process applications more quickly is going to benefit those who have a focus on family reunification. The change in the assessment of applications from a post by post basis to a global basis not only will make the assessments faster for most people, but it will make them fairer. Whether you apply in Delhi or apply in London, your application will be assessed relative to all the other applications, not just those in the post that you have applied to. The busier posts will not demand applicants wait longer.

The flexibility that we talk about is also found in the minister's ability to set up centres of excellence. He has made it clear this will not apply in areas such as family reunification, but it will allow us to move our resources around to respond to the needs of demand, be it in the Punjab or wherever. Perhaps because there is a real focus for investor applicants in a certain area, we will be able to set up a focused processing centre, a centre that specializes in one particular area.

In terms of family reunification, I think it is important to recognize that Bill C-86 says that in the case of refugees, dependent children or family in that sense will be assessed with the refugee. Medical provisions that would normally apply will be waived and it is hoped that will allow for family reunification of refugees in as quick a period as six months.

There was a comment a little bit earlier that involved the question of race and ethnicity and preference in the system. I thought I did not need to remind this House about the application of the charter to the government as it relates not only to people in this country, whether they be citizens or not, but people around the world.

I think it is very important that we recognize the source of immigration into this country. In order of source, they are in January to December 1991 Hong Kong, Poland, China, India, the Philippines, Lebanon, and Vietnam. Seventy-five per cent of the immigrants into this country are coming from Asia, South and Central America, Africa, the Middle East or the Pacific. Three per cent come from the United States and 21 per cent come from Europe. I think it is important that Canadians not have a misconception about the source of immigration and the focus of the immigration policy around the world.

We have heard a lot about this bill. One of the great frustrations for those of us who have tried to deal with this bill is coming to understand how immigration law works and how the law and sections in the act relate to each other. I expressed concerns in the very beginning, particularly about the refugee determination system, and the role of the SIO. I was also, frankly, quite concerned about the appeals process. I expressed some concern about the provisions it would provide for fingerprinting. No, I am not 100 per cent satisfied. I never will be. Frankly, if that was able to be done in the designing of legislation, I would be worried about it.

There is fear whether we can guarantee as best we can refuge to those that come to our shores demanding it that do not have refuge elsewhere that we can give them that, that the system is fair in terms of our ability to make proper assessments about refugees and about immigrants and that we are not keeping people out of this country merely on a whim or on a trumped up reason.

I believe at this point that Bill C-86 is a legitimate attempt at balance, protecting the interests of Canadians and our tradition of responsibility around the world.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief question for the member for St. John's East. He has referred to the need and the possibility of speeding up applications and processes and so on. I would like to ask him whether he believes that the telephone and mail-in system proposed for Vegreville, Alberta, will overcome the backlogs that I have been told—I do not claim to have seen them—exist in the Toronto and Vancouver offices where the pilot projects are.

I understand that in Vegreville they will have good supervision, from the Deputy Prime Minister if necessary, but can the member comment on the status of possible backlogs in the pilot projects and whether that new system will work according to schedule.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, as my friend knows—and I thought he had a legitimate question until he put in the political dig—there are no guarantees, quite obviously.

I go back to one of the first things I said in my comments a moment ago; we tend sometimes to lose perspective. The perspective that I would bring him back to is so much of the application process and the processing is pro forma. I have been dealing with a man here in this city who was trying to have his family come in from Africa. He has to go to Cornwall to physically sit down and fill out the application. Why, I am not quite sure. His response to me was that it was quicker.

I think the process in terms of being able to clear off the majority of the things that can be dealt with and have been done in a system that responds to the ability of the officers to deal with it, when there is no need for a face-to-face meeting, will cut down the time. I think that processing and that process will, in fact, allow us to separate the easy from the tough.

The minister talked about perhaps evolving a system where there would be automatic approvals without any process. Where it is very evident in a refugee determination case that this person is indeed a refugee, you do not need to have a hearing; go straight ahead and avoid all of that problem. I think if we can do that, if we can focus the system such that that which does not need our attention and our resources in any complicated way is speeded up, so that the resources are available for the things that are difficult, that are tricky, that are going to take time, either in terms of work or in terms of thinking, we in this country will be much better served as well as those who depend on that system to do exactly that.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the member was telling us he was not going to defend the minister and then proceeded to defend the minister.

Would the member tell us, since my experience has been extremely negative with this minister in terms of granting cases on the compassionate discretion which all ministers have, if he knows just how many cases this minister has approved under his ministerial discretion since he took office. My experience in Edmonton, and I believe it is the experience of members in every part of the country, presumably including St. John's East, is that this minister has been reluctant to allow any case on a matter of ministerial discretion.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, we may be mixing it up. I know my colleague across the way does not do it deliberately. There is a process for appeal under humanitarian and compassionate grounds to officials in the department. There is also the process that would allow the granting of a minister's permit, which is separate.

I have had a number of cases that I have brought to the minister's attention. On the largest and most controversial, the minister made a decision that was positive in terms of a world renowned sculptor who had come to St. John's and had set up in St. John's, both at university teaching young people and doing unbelievable sculpture in the constituency of our friend from Burin—St. George's in commemoration of miners at the St. Lawrence mine.

What I think is important is that the minister recognizes that the system does not work and has not worked. The key reason it has not worked is because it is not visible and it is not transparent. He has asked the now retired first chairman of the IRB, Gordon Fairweather, if he would design regulations in consultation with the community to provide for criteria against which a humanitarian and compassionate appeal can be made. One of those clearly is the question of changed circumstances. Another is the question of the IRB not being as responsive as it should be or where conditions are the same. These are the sorts of things he is doing.

That is because this minister recognizes that that process and the pressure upon him and his successor and predecessor ministers is something people have a great deal of difficulty with and that process with Mr. Fairweather is in fact in response to the community who has asked him to do exactly that.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by making a few comments about why we need immigration to Canada.

I am sure all of my colleagues on both sides of the House as well as Canadians in general will agree that if we are not to allow immigration to Canada, by the year 2011 we will start to see a decline in terms of our present population.

To that extent that will pose a tremendous challenge to both the government as well as to the people of Canada in terms of the shrinking tax base in Canada. Simply put, by the year 2010 we will have almost double the amount of people on the retirement role in terms of people who are receiving pensions. We will have a shrinking in terms of the work force and, as such, we will have less taxes being paid to the government coffers.

That by itself is a good reason why we have to look for means and ways in order to do two things: first, continue to provide the quality of services to the people that they are accustomed to. At the same time, that will be good reason for us to say that without immigration, we will not be able to survive as a nation for very long.

The hon. member mentioned the fact that the vast majority of immigrants to Canada come from Third World countries. That is true and I want to tell him why. Simply put, it is because historically immigration to Canada has always been from countries where they have depressive regimes, a lack of economic opportunities, civil wars and so on.

All these people who have come to this country since the very early days up until now have come from countries where opportunities were not available. Certainly another factor why we are not getting immigrants from Europe is because Europe is faced with the very same situation we are faced with. That is a decline in terms of the population in Europe. The birth rate in Europe is in the same category as that in Canada. They do not have enough production in terms of population in order to sustain the population growth.

That is why we do not see many people coming from Europe to Canada. The other reason is that they have good opportunities in Europe and there is no reason for them to emigrate.

A cohesive immigration policy would be good from both the outside as well as the inside. In other words, if somebody is to look at it as a package, they will look at the input and find the input to be going well and working smoothly and find the output also going well and working smoothly.

From the input in terms of the people who are coming to Canada, the system is not really working efficiently. I am not saying this because I want it to be personal or because I want to attack the government. Sometimes the government has not put enough resources on the outside in terms of the immigration offices abroad, around the world, in particular in countries where there is a lot of demand on our immigration offices.

As such, there is a big overload there. We are finding more and more people trying to jump the queue, jump the system and find shortcuts. That is why we are seeing some people taking the risk of trying to buy their way into Canadian society and dealing with the problems when they are here. To help alleviate and solve that problem the government has to provide more resources. Another thing is that once those immigrants arrive in Canada, it does not matter whether we are talking about family class, government sponsored refugees, business class or the independent applicant, they just get into society—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It being 4.45 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made Monday, November 23, 1992, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the third reading of the bill now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

VICTORIA CROSS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): moved that Bill C-305, an act respecting the award of the Victoria Cross, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to finally be able to rise in this House to speak to my private members' bill, Bill C-305, an act to restore the Victoria Cross. It seems to have taken a long time to get to this point.

I presented Bill C-305 for first reading in this House on October 2, 1991. In the interim, I have been very encouraged by the support that the principle incorporated in this bill has generated across the country. It is also most gratifying to see the support that the Victoria Cross has received within this House.

I have members on both sides of the floor offering support and encouragement for the reinstatement of the Victoria Cross as Canada's premier military decoration. The Victoria Cross is a simple piece of bronze suspended from a crimson ribbon. The bronze is cast in the shape of a cross with the royal crest and simple inscription for valour. The cross is made of bronze taken from a cannon captured during the Crimean War.

The decoration is older than the dominion of Canada. It was first instituted by Queen Victoria in 1856. One of the first Victoria Crosses issued was to a Canadian. Lieutenant Alexander Dunn from Toronto won his Victoria Cross in the Crimea in 1856 during the famous charge of the light brigade. Since then, 93 Canadians have received the Victoria Cross.

Lieutenant Colonel Fred Tilston of Toronto recently passed away, leaving two living Victoria Cross recipients in Canada, Charles Cecil Ingersoll Merritt and Ernest Smokey Smith, both of whom live in British Columbia. They earned their Victoria Crosses during the Second World War.

Across Canada we hear of many stories about the heroes who have won the VC. It is interesting to note that the third Canadian to win a Victoria Cross was William Hall. William Hall was from Nova Scotia and he was black. His award for gallantry was presented in 1857 at a time when members of his race in the United States were still in slavery.

Canada Post recently did a beautiful vignette on Valour Road in Winnipeg. The nation notes with sadness the passing, and reports on the health, of any recipients of the Victoria Cross whenever they fall ill or pass away. The Victoria Cross has a significance that is too important to lose.

If we allow the Victoria Cross to disappear, our nation is diminished. For that reason, the debate this afternoon is extremely important. The Victoria Cross is a prominent symbol for Canadians. It is a symbol of our history, our heritage and respect not only for those who have earned the Victoria Cross through their gallantry but for those who fought along side of them. They fought in defence of liberty, freedom and peace.

It is also important because there is a proud tradition in this country, a military tradition, that most Canadians do not know or understand. Canada is a peace loving nation. We have never initiated a war and, God willing, we never will. It is not the Canadian nature to attempt to take by force of arms that which is not our own.

We have answered on several occasions the call to arms in defence of liberty and freedom. What is important in this debate and important in this House is that we understand that the courage and bravery recognized in the 93 Canadians who have received the Victoria Cross still exist.

We still have brave, courageous men and women who even today serve under the flag of the United Nations, proudly wearing the Canadian flag on their shoulders. They are willing to undergo personal risks and exhibit extreme bravery. Canadians make a contribution to peace and freedom far in excess of the expenditures of our country, but that is another story.

For those who serve today, the premier military decoration ever awarded to a Canadian is not at this time available. It is not recognized in the Canadian honours and awards system.

Canada has evolved on the road to independence. The evolution of a Canadian system of honours and awards began in 1967 and was implemented in 1972. At that time, through an omission, the military decorations awarded to Canadians were all basically dropped, deleted or ignored.

• (1720)

It was suggested that separate Canadian military decorations would eventually be established and the Victoria Cross may be replaced by a distinctly Canadian decoration. Twenty years later no decision has yet been announced.

The Prime Minister rectified one oversight when he indicated that all Victoria Crosses won prior to 1972 could still be properly worn as the premier decoration. However, no provision has been made for any such medals to be awarded after that date. That is why we are here today engaging in this debate.

I became aware of just how seriously Canadians consider this problem when I was talking to a Royal Canadian Legion Branch in Sylvan Lake. At that time I explained why it no longer existed in the Canadian honours and awards system. It indicated to me in very strong language that it did not want just an explanation, it wanted the medal reinstated. It challenged me and asked me to do something about it. It is because of that branch and because of the hundreds of other veterans who have been encouraging me that I stubbornly persisted in pushing this bill forward.

This bill is written to establish a Canadian Victoria Cross. It proposes that it be distinctly Canadian, the premier decoration for bravery and would be incorporated into the orders of precedence of the Canadian honours as the senior gallantry award. Victoria Cross records would be maintained at the chancellery at Government House and costs associated with administration would be assumed by the Canadian government for Canadian purposes. Any future changes to the royal warrants would be issued by the Queen of Canada.

I feel very strongly that the principle of retaining the Victoria Cross not only has my support and the support of a majority of members of this House, but the support of all veterans' organizations, many serving members of the Armed Forces, the Monarchist League of Canada and the support of thinking Canadians.

The Royal Canadian Legion at its convention in 1986 passed a resolution petitioning the Prime Minister to restore the Victoria Cross as an award made to members of the Armed Forces for valour. Again, this year at its convention in Quebec City it unanimously endorsed a similar resolution asking the Government of Canada to retain the Victoria Cross as the highest available decoration for valour. It added that the responsibility for recommending and awarding the Victoria Cross should rest with the Government of Canada with the investiture made by the Governor General as the representative of the Queen in Canada.

Bill C-305 has been endorsed by many members of this House. I thank the many members who have written in support and offered encouragement of the bill. I am also encouraged that the Prime Minister is on record in the Legion's magazine as recognizing the special place of the Victoria Cross in the history of the Armed Forces. The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has also written in support of it, as has the leader of the New Democratic Party.

By presenting this bill I implore the government to heed the call of Canadians to respect our military tradition and our heritage, to establish military awards to recognize potential bravery and courage on behalf of our serving military personnel. I encourage it to follow the lead of Australia and, with the consent of the monarch, to re-establish the Victoria Cross of Canada as the premier military decoration. In so doing we are honouring the 93 brave Canadians who have been recognized. We also honour those who fought beside and in the tradition of them. We honour an award that was first presented by Queen Victoria to a Canadian.

Many times we debate in this House bread and butter issues, issues that have to do with the stomach and the wallet of the nation. We are talking here of an issue that affects the heart and soul of that nation. This is not an expensive issue. It costs this country very little to recognize bravery, courage, commitment and sacrifice. It costs very little. To those who have been recognized with Victoria Crosses, the cost to them in many cases has been horrendous.

Last week I paid tribute to the late Colonel Fred Tilston who, while showing extreme bravery at the battle of Hochwald Forest in 1945, was wounded three times and eventually lost both his legs. It cost the nation very little to give him the Victoria Cross and recognize his extreme bravery. What it cost Col. Tilston is far more than that.

We all pray that no Canadian ever need face armed conflict or go to war against another. It was just two years ago that Canadians joined other forces of the United Nations to free Kuwait from Iraqi occupation. Today Canadian peacekeepers are active in 12 countries and those brave men and women in many cases face danger on a daily basis. We do not have a military decoration to recognize any who show extreme bravery in those circumstances. It is reprehensible that we are in that situation and it is reprehensible that we have not done anything to rectify it.

An argument has been made that this is perhaps not a proper topic for a bill before the House of Commons. A valid argument was made that honours and awards are properly established by the royal prerogative rather than a bill of the House of Commons. I have been convinced that this might be so and I would not want this bill to detract in any way from the significance of the Victoria Cross, but I do feel it is important that all members in this House have the opportunity to express themselves.

I would offer that nothing can detract from the significance of the Victoria Cross and it should be re-established.

By carrying on with this debate I want to indicate very strongly the arguments and reasons for reinstating the Victoria Cross. I do not intend to let my efforts to get this medal reinstated as the premier Canadian military decoration stop at all. I intend to pursue the matter with the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Veterans Affairs and whoever else need be contacted.

The Victoria Cross is an international honour. It is available still to members of the Commonwealth. Like other international honours such as the Nobel Prize, the Victoria Cross has transcended geographic and political boundaries. Ninety-three Canadians have been awarded the Victoria Cross for conspicuous acts of bravery and daring. This links us to a tradition going back to the Crimean war. It is older than our nation. The Victoria Cross will always have a special place in our honours and awards system and that place should be front and centre.

I will try and be short because I know there are several other members who want to address the issue as well.

The Victoria Cross is very special to Canadians and nothing that we can say or do in this House is necessary to embellish the bravery of those Canadians who have been recognized with it. Likewise, we cannot diminish the significance of those that have been awarded. It is going to stand throughout our history as the premier military decoration ever awarded to a Canadian. Even if through some mishap we fail to restore it to the forefront of the Canadian honours and awards, we cannot diminish its significance. Our failure to do so will diminish our significance because no nation that aspires to greatness, and Canada is a nation that has the potential for greatness, will ever achieve it if it refuses to honour those who made that greatness possible.

It would be our shame if we were to sit back and let this important part of our history and heritage be lost. Canada should have its own military honours. The fact we do not is a ludicrous oversight and it makes no sense for us when establishing military honours to discard the tradition of an award that has been revered by all Canadians; a tradition that reminds us that when we are called to battle Canadians have always conducted themselves with honour and with bravery.

I have been very inspired by reading the reasons for the awarding of several of the Canadian VCs. Canadians do not know enough of our military history and heritage. Perhaps that is one of the reasons that we have allowed the travesty that this bill attempts to correct to occur.

In my riding alone there are three items that are connected to the Victoria Cross. Canadian Forces detachment in Penhold has recognized with Mynarski Park the bravery of Pilot Officer Andrew Mynarski who lost his life during the Second World War while attempting to save a comrade who was trapped in a burning Lancaster bomber. The medal that his family received was small consolation for the supreme sacrifice that he bravely paid to attempt to save a comrade.

I have also been watched very closely by members of the R. L. Zengel V.C. branch of the Royal Canadian Legion in Rocky Mountain House. Sergeant Ray Zengel was a native son of Rocky Mountain House. He won his Victoria Cross in the First World War and his medal is a prized possession of that branch.

Why do Canadian youth not know the stories of our heroes? Why do we not celebrate their accomplishments and thank God for their contributions and sacrifices? If we as a nation truly appreciate what they did, we would all understand the significance of this piece of bronze and we would all join in demanding its reinstatement.

Stories of valour extend into every province and area of Canada. I attended a 100th anniversary in my riding last summer and one of the most significant elements in that family's history and anniversary was the Victoria Cross, won by one of the members, Corporal Alex Brereton.

Two weeks ago during remembrance services in all corners of this nation we listened to the intonation: "At the going down of the sun and in the morning, we will remember them".

We all replied then, along with millions of grateful Canadians: "We will remember them". Yet every year fewer Canadians can remember the sacrifices of those who served in wartime and even fewer who can remember the faces of those who paid the supreme sacrifice.

• (1730)

To lose the Victoria Cross is to lose the faith of those who selflessly sacrificed and contributed so much to our development as a nation and earned us the freedom and strength of the nation we enjoy.

I am asking in this bill that we not allow the symbol of recognition given to the bravest of the brave to be diminished. I am asking that we restore the Victoria Cross and all it symbolizes to its rightful place of predominance in Canadian honours and awards.

The time allotted today does not possibly allow for all members who would like to speak on this topic to do so. It is an important issue, one that many members should be participating in. Therefore I would ask the unanimous consent of the House to make that possible by designating Bill C–305 as a votable item.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to take part in this debate. I congratulate the member for Red Deer on his initiative in bringing forth this private member's Bill C–305 to reinstate the Victoria Cross.

I have long advocated that Canadians should take more pride in themselves, our institutions, our history and our heroes. The Victoria Cross, even though it was originally an award from the British government, has long epitomized Canadian heroism. People from around the world admire and respect those 90–plus Canadians who have been decorated with the highest military award that could be possibly be won by a Canadian serviceman or woman.

The Victoria Cross is the stuff of which legends are made. As has been mentioned by my hon. colleague from Red Deer, the names on the honour rolls, including Billy Bishop, Smokey Smith and one person from my home province, Frederick Thornton Peters, the only resident of my province to win the Victoria Cross, summon up the vision of selfless heroism in the face of danger. To read the stories of these people who were awarded the Victoria Cross, one cannot imagine what they went through in the face of so much danger. It was not uppermost in their minds at the time; certainly they had no thoughts of receiving the medal. A year ago I had the opportunity to travel to Italy on a pilgrimage with veterans. One of the men I spoke about, Smokey Smith, was there and we visited the area where he received his medal.

It is my sincere wish also that the young people of Canada could see these heroic figures in the same light as they see many of the heroes of other countries, especially the United States. I believe that we in this country are far too quick to look beyond our shores and ignore many times the people and much of the heritage of our own country. The reinstatement of the Victoria Cross as a Canadian award would help to alleviate this problem.

I strongly support the reinstatement of the Victoria Cross as the highest Canadian award for valour and would urge members of this House to support this private member's bill. We are certainly mature enough as a nation to retain this honour with its historic name and have it remain as the greatest symbol of Canadian heroism.

I agree that the medal could be awarded along the lines it is in Australia, with Canadians making the determination as to whom should receive the medal. It will therefore take its rightful place as the greatest honour a Canadian could possibly receive. I hope each of us in the Chamber will take the stand on this matter that our conscience dictates.

Since I have been in the House I have been troubled by the relative lack of importance which sometimes is attached to private members' bills and to the whole process of bringing private members' bills before the House.

I feel the executive branch of government does not always attach much importance to the backbenchers on either side of the House. A very talented group of members have been elected to the House of Commons, but under the constraints imposed by rigid party line and party discipline many of their good ideas never come to the floor of the House of Commons.

I had sincerely hoped that during the constitutional discussions and all the parliamentary hearings the message would have come through loud and clear that members of this House should be given a greater role in the formulation of legislation.

To my mind one of the major reforms which must be carried out in this country is the strengthening of the role of members of Parliament. From talking to other members in this House, I know there is widespread support for this particular piece of legislation, the one we are discussing today. It is one of the many good ideas that can come from the ordinary member.

Whether or not this legislation ever passes will depend unfortunately on whether or not the executive branch of government wants it to. Individual members of Parliament should have more input into the drafting of legislation and should in my view be able to initiate more legislation from the floor of this House.

It was mentioned this afternoon on another piece of legislation that maybe we should not have that say. I believe that members of Parliament, members of this House, have to play a more vital role in the running of this country because Parliament is the very essence of democracy.

The people who are here have been sent to the House with a specific job to do. I believe they could be doing a better job if they felt more freedom in the matter of introducing and supporting legislation, wherein committees could play a bigger role in amending legislation and legislation coming back here. It could all be part of the process.

The people of Canada have grown cynical about the political process and about politicians as a whole. Perhaps part of the reason is that they see us many times blindly following party discipline when we should be speaking and voting as our conscience dictates. That would be good. We should be speaking and we should be voting that way.

This is a good piece of legislation. It will help us redefine and re-emphasis the things that make us proud to be Canadians. I am very proud to support this bill and I urge other members to do likewise.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before giving the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden the floor, I would like to point out that the Chair has been informed the hon. member is having some health problems. I can assure him that the House will bear with him and that he should feel free to remain seated, if he so prefers.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party in supporting the private member's bill put forward by the hon. member for Red Deer and supported by the hon. member for Hillsborough. I want to congratulate the hon. member for bringing the bill forward. If there is anybody in this place who is opposed to it, I would sure like to know who it is.

The Victoria Cross is recognized as the top medal for valour in Commonwealth countries and is even shown that kind of regard in other countries. I do not know what the honours and awards commission was thinking about when it completely removed the Victoria Cross from the Canadian list of orders of precedence. They could not have been thinking.

In 1972 the Victoria Cross was left out of the Canadian system of honours and awards. In 1990 another sequence of medals was introduced, for example the Cross of Valour in the highest position. The Victoria Cross is no longer in the sequence but is validly worn if it was won before 1972.

It is very possible that one of these times a Canadian will do something of the order that earns the Victoria Cross, carrying out his duties under the United Nations flag. If that should happen and that person's exploits were of the kind, quality and calibre that has happened before with other recipients of the Victoria Cross, then it should be issued as the first order in Canada. It should lead the list of the orders of precedence. I do not know why they had to meddle around with this, if you will pardon the expression.

I was somewhat noted for being a Canadian nationalist. I swore an oath when I became a member of this House to bear allegiance to the Queen. She is the Queen of Canada and there is no reason on earth why, if there is another award of the Victoria Cross because it can be won in peacetime as well as wartime, she cannot present the award or the Governor General as the Queen's direct representative here.

The Royal Canadian Legion has made it very clear, very plain. Last April Comrade Fred Williams wrote to the Prime Minister and stated that the Royal Canadian Legion most strongly requested that any new bravery award system included provision for the permanent retention of the Victoria Cross as Canada's highest military award for valour.

We can do no less. I urge my colleagues from all parties to put this legislation through without any wrangling about it, and I do not think there will be. This is one area where all parties are unanimous in support of this bill. The only other thing I would like to see happen is some improvement being made to the small pension, the small honorarium awarded with the VC. It is a carryover from before the First World War. I sure would like to see something done with that, not so much in an effort to repay them, because we can never fully repay the recipients, but to put something a little more material behind the award in addition to the award itself. I would like to see the minister and his department come up with improvements in the awarding of a pension in conjunction with the Victoria Cross.

I had the great pleasure, as my hon. friend from Hillsborough mentioned, of being in Holland, Sicily, and Italy on the 40th anniversary of the liberation of Europe, and many parts of it liberated by Canadians. We had in our group with the minister Fred Tilson and Smokey Smith who never did anything or said anything to draw attention to themselves. However, when others found out there were two VC winners with us, it was interesting to see how many people went to see them just to have the honour of meeting them and getting their autographs.

You have to hear Smokey Smith's version some time of how he won that medal. His version was that a German soldier filled his brand new battle-dress tunic with holes after he had just had it tailored with box pleats and dry-cleaned. This soldier shot him and put holes in his jacket. He said he got mad and took his Sten gun and stitched him from bottom to top. You ought to hear him tell it. He is very funny and a very good person.

It was also a pleasure to meet with Col. Merritt, who mingled with all of us. I was only an OR during the war and always looked up in awe at majors and colonels and so forth, but he was one of us. We were proud to have both him and Smokey Smith with us. I will never forget that trip if I live to be 1,000.

I want to leave this in the hands of the House in the hope that there will be no question about supporting the bill. Like the hon. member for Red Deer, I appreciate the indulgence of the House to make this a votable motion which means it gets another couple of hours debate. I hope then other hon. members will take the opportunity to get up, even if it is only for five minutes, to say things about this and put their support behind it.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to have the opportunity to speak in favour of the private member's bill before us today. It addresses an issue that has been of concern to many members of this House for some time now.

For 20 years Canadians have not been eligible to receive what has traditionally been the highest award for valour bestowed in time of war, the Victoria Cross. As a seconder of this bill, I am anxious to see it passed into law so that the situation may be rectified.

Many of us have worked with individual veterans, legion branches and constituents on the issue. I believe there is a strong desire among the public to see members working to pass a bill such as this one. Public confidence in Parliament is strengthened when members are seen to be responding to the clear wishes of thousands of individual Canadians.

Established in 1856 by Queen Victoria, the Victoria Cross was, for over a century, the highest award for gallantry available to Canadians in time of war. Since that time only 93 Canadians have ever won the VC: four before the Boer War; four in South Africa; 69 in World War I and 16 in World War II.

As a unifying symbol for this country and others throughout the Commonwealth, the VC is unsurpassed. Canadian recipients have come from all walks of life, from every province and from a wide range of ethnic backgrounds but the common denominator for all of them was their shared loyalty and sacrifice for this country.

When my hon. friend's bill was introduced here in October of last year there were three surviving recipients of the VC in Canada. Since that time one has died, leaving two living reminders of our past and of our duty to ensure that their heroism is not forgotten.

I need not remind hon. members of the place the Victoria Cross holds in the hearts of tens of thousands of Canadian veterans. Over the past few years many veterans have felt that their contribution to the country has been forgotten or demeaned.

The reintroduction of the Victoria Cross into the Canadian honour system will go a long way to confirm our respect for Canadian veterans and for the men and women who serve today in our Armed Forces.

Why was the VC eliminated? I believe that a grave error was made in 1972 when the Trudeau government deleted it from the honour system. It was a decision that outraged veterans and non-veterans alike. Why, many asked, would the government want to remove one of the most potent symbols of our nationhood? Many have said: "Because it is a foreign award".

Tell that to the Canadians who won the VC in World Wars I and II. Tell that to the families of those who died in the defence of our country. I do not believe for a moment that they saw themselves as anything except Canadians answering the call of their country.

Although Canada was born out of compromise, her maturity as a nation came in battle. Vimy Ridge, Dieppe, Normandy all were battles in which we fought alongside our allies: Britain, France and the United States. We did not enter these conflicts as a vassal state. We entered out of commitment and loyalty to our friends in World War II, out of recognition that war was necessary to rid the world of a monstrous evil.

I am not trying to glorify the horror of war. The suffering and sacrifice that came from our involvement wounds us to this day. It is true that the Victoria Cross was introduced by Britain in the aftermath of the Crimean War. Indeed, VCs were forged from the canon barrel employed in that conflict.

The VC is truly an award that cuts through national borders. Soldiers from many Commonwealth countries ranging from Australia to Pakistan and New Zealand have won the cross. So is its British origin an argument against reinstatement? Certainly not.

We have retained countless traditions that date back to past years. In Quebec, the civil law code finds its origins in the Napoleonic code. Our country's most distinguished lawyers are honoured with the designation Queen's Counsel. The Governor General represents the Queen in Canada. Tradition and the continuity of symbols is part of what binds a country together.

By reinstating the Victoria Cross, we are acknowledging not only the value of our history, but also are expressing confidence in our maturity as a nation. This bill provides for a Canadianized Victoria Cross. We would not be alone in this.

In 1989, the Australian government officially incorporated the Victoria Cross into the unique Australian honours system. If the Australians, who occasionally display far more of a republican sentiment than Canadians ever have, feel culturally secure enough to reinstate this symbol of their Commonwealth heritage, then I can see no argument against our doing so.

The proposed system would see the Governor General bestow the Victoria Cross on the advice of the Canadian government of the day. All responsibility for the cross would rest in Canada, the administration, ceremony and so forth. In this way, there would be no doubt as to the true nature of this decoration, an honour conceived in an era long past, but preserved and strengthened with an eye to the future.

By voting for this bill, we are sending a very clear message to the Canadian public. We are listening to their concerns. They have told us that we have an obligation to conserve that which is most noble in our past, to respect the wishes of those veterans who sacrificed so much, to maintain an honours system that both reveres our Commonwealth traditions and at the same time is uniquely Canadian.

I look forward to this House joining us in working to make Bill C-305 law. We owe our Armed Forces and our veterans no less.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise in this debate. I want to thank the hon. member for Red Deer in bringing forward this bill to Canadianize the Victoria Cross.

This is a very important matter. It has been discussed and debated for 20 years in Canada. I find it incredible that we allowed the Victoria Cross to be dropped from the awards and honours Canada gives out. I find it incredible that we allowed the Trudeau government in 1972 to drop it from the awards.

I have stood up on several occasions in the House to encourage the government to reinstate the Victoria Cross. I also co-sponsored the bill of the hon. member. He deserves a lot of credit, as do other members of the House, for pushing this issue to the point where now we have a votable bill before the House of Commons. I hope that members of the House of Commons will see to it when this does come to a vote that it is passed.

On June 9, 1992 I rose on a statement pursuant to S.O. 31. I would like to read into the record what I said at that time:

> Mr. Speaker, I strongly believe that our government should Canadianize and restore the Victoria Cross medal as the highest accolade for an act of valour in the face of the enemy.
> In 1972 when the previous government brought in the new Canadian orders of bravery the Victoria Cross was omitted. I believe it is time this policy be reversed. The Victoria Cross should be reinstated and awarded by the Governor General on the advice of the government of the day.
> After listening to the many views of many veterans on this issue, I strongly believe the Victoria Cross should once again resume its position as a distinguished part of Canada's awards for gallantry.

I still hold that position very strongly today. A few days later, I got up and asked the Associate Minister of National Defence if she would Canadianize the Victoria Cross. I want to read into the record my question and the answer. I was very disappointed with the answer and I urge the government not to interfere with this private member's matter and to allow members to vote on it as they wish. I would hope and I think that most members will vote in favour of this bill to Canadianize the Victoria Cross.

The question I asked on June 12, 1992 was:

> Does the minister support the restoration and Canadianization of the Victoria Cross as Canada's highest medal for valour in the face of the enemy?

The minister responded:

> I know my hon. colleague's interest in this subject, but I would like to point out to him that the Victoria Cross is a British medal bestowed by the Queen. It is not a Canadian medal. Obviously Canadians would still be eligible to receive it. It is given for extraordinary valour in the face of the enemy. We hope we do not have to face such an enemy.
> But, at the same time, within Canada we have been developing our own system of honours and awards over a number of years. The final component of that would be to develop our own awards for valour in the face of the enemy. That work is not complete but it is ongoing.
> I am sure that the hon. member would agree that it is important that we have within Canada a method of recognizing bravery of Canadian men and women in the Armed Forces.

I want to say we can have that method and that method is to bring forward a Canadian Victoria Cross. That is what we should do. We can Canadianize it. We can recommend through the right channels to the Queen that this Victoria Cross be awarded to particular people rather than put aside this tremendous symbol of courage, tradition and history that is so esteemed by so many veterans across this country.

Earlier this year in the Legion magazine of March 1992, the Victoria Cross was discussed. It pointed out that Australia has become the only Commonwealth country to nationalize the Victoria Cross. The Legion magazine states: "The Queen signs letters patent authorizing the Governor General to award the VC on the advice of the Australian government. The Queen has made it clear that even the Commonwealth republics can advise on the Victoria Cross". That is what the Monarchist League of Canada chairman, John Aimers, said. "The Victoria Cross could be made more Canadian. Certainly we would want it given out only on the advice of the Canadian government. I think all the royal societies are united on this one." The article goes on to talk about how the Legion for years has been calling for the previous government and this government to Canadianize the Victoria Cross and to pay a little bit of attention to this very important matter.

Canada is a young country but we have traditions and symbols. This is a part of our history and perhaps it is time to Canadianize the Victoria Cross, to retain it as a part of our history. It is so important. Too often in our society we devalue the symbols and traditions of the past, but this is one that is important to not only veterans but I am sure it is also important to those members of the Canadian Armed Forces who are serving today. I am sure they would like this award to be there for their valour if it is needed in times of conflict.

In closing, I just want to say that I support this whole-heartedly as I believe many members do. I want to pay tribute once again to the member for Red Deer who, with courage, presented this even though there were indications that the government and others in society wanted to do away with the Victoria Cross. He persisted and his efforts have been laudable and admirable. I hope that we can see in the next short while the announcement that the Victoria Cross will be Canadianized.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, no. I think it is very important that the opportunity be provided to other members who are not able to be present in the House tonight to have the opportunity to debate this very, very important matter. By having the question put now, that would be foreclosed.

I salute the hon. member for Red Deer for his initiative in introducing this item, and his persistence in seeing it through. I congratulate him in having had it been made a votable item. It is so important that the House have the opportunity to vote on this item. I too hope to see the day when the decoration is—

LINGUISTIC DUALITY

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, further to a question I asked on May 5 this year, the Secretary of State informed me that they were in the process of completing agreements with British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario and that it was expected the conclusion of these agreements between the provinces and the federal government would be announced very shortly.

This was six months ago and there has been no announcement so far either by the government or by the provinces and I wonder what is happening.

It is rumoured that an agreement in principle was concluded by the federal government and the provinces. This agreement, worth $177 million according to some people, is about to be approved by the federal cabinet, and the minister is expected to make an announcement a few days from now.

Meanwhile, we are still waiting, and I wonder what this government thinks about the promises it makes, the expectations it raises and how it has disappointed certain groups, especially official language minority groups which are greatly dependent on the federal government for their survival.

Young Franco-Ontarians are still waiting for the minister's official announcement on the Cité Collégiale, a post-secondary institution, the Collège du Nord, the Collège du Sud and the Collège du Sud-Ouest. Franco-Albertans are still waiting for the announcement concerning their community centre in Edmonton. Franco-Manitobans are still waiting for an announcement about infrastructures and institutions that will help guarantee their survival.

For the past 10 years, our Constitution has granted Canadian parents the right to educate their children in minority language institutions. Although these are legal rights, governments lack the political will because they have no way of making these institutions, these minority-managed school boards a reality without the assistance and support of the federal government.

On August 31 I wrote to the premiers of all the provinces, including Ontario, British Columbia, Newfoundland and Labrador, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta to ask about the status of this constitutional right of francophone minorities to manage their own educational institutions, as they do in New Brunswick and Quebec.

Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia have yet to answer my letter. The premier of Alberta informed me of a bill, now in second reading, which deals with the issue of school boards for the language minority in Alberta. Saskatchewan mentioned a bill tabled before its legislature adjourned. The Newfoundland Minister of Justice told me that a report would be submitted by the end of the school year on structures for the administration of schools by the francophone language minority in Newfoundland.

Despite these few rays of hope, here in Ontario a number of municipalities have passed resolutions against establishing French schools in Ontario. They include Georgian Bay, Campbellford, Hudson, Petawawa, Elliott Lake, Brampton and other municipalities which have endorsed a recommendation to oppose the creation of francophone school boards in Ontario for financial reasons. These municipalities refuse to recognize the constitutional rights of Ontario's francophone minorities. This is a deplorable example of intolerance and lack of understanding on the part of the majority.

It is not always easy to live in a minority position. It is not always easy to survive in provinces where there are groups that are fiercely opposed to the very existence of a Canada that sees itself as the very expression of linguistic duality.

Time is of the essence. Today, November 24, 1992, I want to ask the parliamentary secretary: when can we expect a clear and specific announcement of the Conservative government's position on establishing minority school boards and thus providing the possibility of establishing certain institutions that are essential if we want to survive as a minority and as Canadians in our province?

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier. When he says that it is difficult to live as a minority, I must tell him that I fully agree. Believe me, I have been there and I know something about it.

I can also say that the promotion of linguistic duality as a fundamental characteristic of Canada has always been a basic principle of this government. We have never backed away from our leadership role in this issue and we never will.

Our actions speak for themselves and eloquently and precisely illustrate the seriousness of our commitment. In the last few years alone, these actions have produced tangible results in supporting official language minorities.

We can mention in particular the opening of the Maison de la Francophonie in Vancouver and Cité Collégiale in Ottawa and the creation of no fewer than six school and community centres in eastern Canada, the building of a new campus for Heritage College in the Ottawa Valley and the funding of 10 community radio stations serving English and French speaking minority groups.

I will remind hon. members, if need be, of another program that requires no actual construction but speaks to the hearts and minds of young Canadians. It is Voyageurs Canada 92, a program in which most of us had a role to play this past year; 27,500 young Canadians travelled all across our country. This project, an original idea of the Secretary of State, is one of the largest youth exchange programs ever undertaken in Canada's history.

It is no doubt the most spectacular event, but there are others which are just as important in their own way. I am thinking for example of Hospitality Canada and the exchange program of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, both sponsored by the Government of Canada.

We are asked whether linguistic duality is really a priority. Of course the answer is yes. We showed it when we passed the new Official Languages Act in 1988 and also when we allocated $1.5 billion over five years to minority language education—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I must interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary, since the rules for this debate are very strict.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, there is a crisis in Montreal. Between one-quarter and one-third of the people in the city are living on some form of social assistance. When I walk along the streets, almost one in every five people I meet is unemployed.

In some areas of my riding, like Snowdon and Côte des Neiges, every fourth person is out of work. Taken together, the unemployed people in Montreal could fill the Olympic Stadium more than five times. Retailers, manufacturers, builders, industrialists, as well as our people, have been touched by the massive unemployment in the city. There is not a family who does not have a sister, friend, brother, mother or father who has not lost a job as a result of the made-in-Canada recession, brought on in large part by this Conservative government's poor fiscal and economic policies.

In particular, the anglophone and allophone communities have been extremely hard hit by the recession. They have not been encouraged by the report from the Conseil de la langue française showing that even fully bilingual members of their communities suffer discrimination in the work force, including the public sector despite section 15 of the Official Languages Act.

The recession has spared no one in Montreal. It has hit both men and women. It has hit people from all walks of life, be they professionals, managers, sales people or construction workers. It is hitting young people and old people.

I am deeply concerned about the welfare of the people of Montreal. I have often asked ministers in this House what they intend to do about this crisis in Canada's second largest city and the motor of the Quebec economy.

On May 15 the Minister of Employment and Immigration answered by flaunting a job training program that he supports out of the unemployment insurance fund. Today people who have started this program are unable to finish it because this government refuses to continue to contribute to this fund.

Since July, people who applied to this program have been turned away. This Tory policy for upgrading our work force is just a sham and these people who themselves contributed money to this fund while they were working on the understanding that there would be some money for them when they needed it. These people are honestly trying to improve their own job prospects and this government is letting them down.

In fact, a recent Conference Board of Canada report has concluded that this Conservative government's economic policies are responsible for this recession. This government's policies are, in large measure, responsible for the number of people out of work in Montreal. The government's policies of high interest rates, high taxes and deep spending cuts have made the recession in Canada longer and deeper than anywhere else in the world. Its policies have actually added to the deficit and contributed to unemployment by killing economic growth in this country. Now, with 204,000 people out of work in Montreal and 1.5 million in Canada, we learn that the finance minister plans to cut government spending yet again on unemployment insurance, Old Age Security and family support. This will not stimulate the economic growth and will not help the people who are in Montreal to find work.

When will this government produce and fund concrete measures to help people get back to work? That is a very serious problem and it is time this government undertook something.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I wish to respond in greater detail to the question of May 15 by the member for Mount Royal.

The government shares the concerns of all Canadians with the effects the economic slowdown has had on job creation, unemployment and ultimately the increase in those receiving social assistance.

To reduce Canada's growing social assistance caseload, the government is undertaking several different initiatives. First, the government has negotiated agreements with all provinces to enhance the employability of social assistance recipients. These agreements marshall a combined federal and provincial effort of $400 million to give social assistance recipients priority access to employment programs.

Second, a $50 million pilot project has been established with the provinces of British Columbia and New Brunswick to help social assistance recipients obtain employment and achieve self–sufficiency. This project is breaking new ground in government's approach to helping those on social assistance and will hopefully pave the way toward a more effective income support system in the future.

Third, the government's current strategy in the area of training will ensure better opportunities for all Canadians, including those at risk of ending up on social assistance. Under the labour force development strategy, actual spending for labour market programming is expected to increase by 62 per cent over a four year period, from $2.5 billion in 1989–90 to $3.55 billion in 1992–93.

This year federal labour market assistance will help about 900,000 unemployed Canadians. This assistance, combined with a growing economy, will contribute toward reducing welfare rolls and lead to economic self–sufficiency for many Canadians.

CHRISTINE LAMONT AND DAVID SPENCER

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise to follow up on questions I asked in this House earlier this year and, indeed, as recently as this afternoon, of the Secretary of State for External Affairs with respect to the plight of Christine Lamont and David Spencer, two young Canadians who are currently serving 28–year prison terms in Brazil.

Christine Lamont and David Spencer went to Central and South America because of their deep commitment to social and economic justice for the poor, the powerless and the dispossessed in that region. In 1989 they were caught up in an appalling nightmare which started on December 17, 1989, with their arrest.

The subsequent trial of Christine and David was in many ways a miscarriage of justice, conducted under conditions of extreme politicization. Indeed, the judge himself indicated that he was under tremendous pressure from police and politicians to convict all 10 of the accused.

Cardinal Arns, the Archbishop of Sao Paulo who has been intimately involved from the beginning of this whole affair, has spoken out on his profound conviction of the innocence of Christine and David; indeed has written a letter to the Canadian Prime Minister in this regard.

Christine and David were convicted and then to compound the injustice, to change from miscarriage to in fact travesty of justice, the Court of Appeal increased the sentences to 28 years. As foreigners under Brazilian law, they are not entitled to parole. This indeed is far worse than a life sentence in Canada.

Under Brazilian law, indeed the Brazilian constitution, there is provision upon the request of a foreign government for the Brazilian government to expel foreign nationals in its prison. This is a power which has been exercised in a number of occasions. The minister today in the House suggested that somehow this was unprecedented. That is absolutely false. There are many precedents for this. Indeed, just recently a Chilean national was expelled pursuant to the request of his government.

In June of this year, the justice committee unanimously urged the government—unanimously, all parties—and the Secretary of State to call for the expulsion of Christine and David under Brazilian law. They said that waiting for appeals, waiting for a transfer of offenders treaty, was unacceptable and placed them at risk. That risk is even greater now, particularly after the tragic riot and deaths and murders of 111 prisoners in a Brazilian jail in late September.

The justice committee last week reiterated its unanimous appeal to the minister to seek the expulsion under Brazilian law of Christine and David. The Prime Minister said that he has spoken with the President of Brazil, now impeached, seeking justice for these two people. We do not know if he sought expulsion, but certainly we hope so.

I want to take this opportunity to once again call upon the government and the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister to wait no longer, to stop their shameful stalling, to listen to the justice committee, to listen to the voices of Canadians, to listen to the families and to seek the expulsion of Christine Lamont and David Spencer under Brazilian law.

Their lives may be at risk. Certainly a grave miscarriage of justice has been done, and the time is long overdue for this minister to act on behalf of these two Canadian citizens.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister confirmed in his response to the hon. member's question on June 17, he did indeed raise the matter of Christine Lamont and David Spencer with the President of Brazil during the earth summit in Rio de Janiero. He raised it again in letters to President Collor when he was still in office, and more recently to President Franco. The position of the government in this case has been guided by respect for the due process of law. At the moment there are two appeals pending in this case before the federal courts in Brasilia, one on whether the trial court had jurisdiction to hear the case and the other on the length of the sentences.

At the direction of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, our ambassador in Brasilia has been actively pressing to ensure that the judicial process continues without delay. He has learned that a decision on whether the appeal on the sentences will be heard, and indeed perhaps a decision on the appeal itself, will be forthcoming in the very near future.

He has also learned that the Brazilian Attorney General has submitted an opinion to the court that the sentences of the individuals involved should be differentiated according to their degree of involvement in the kidnapping. This could result in a reduction of the sentences that Christine Lamont and David Spencer received.

We understand that the opinion of the Attorney General is given considerable weight in these cases. Should there be undue delay in this appeal, however, or should it be denied, the situation would be reviewed again.

I would also point out that a transfer of offenders treaty with Brazil was signed on July 15 which when in force would enable the return of Miss Lamont and Mr. Spencer to serve any remaining portion of their sentences in Canada with the benefit of Canadian provisions.

Our ambassador has been actively lobbying Brazilian ministers, the leaders of the two chambers of the Brazilian Congress and the chairmen of the legislative committees responsible for reviewing the treaty to move it as quickly as possible through the Brazilian approval process. All have assured him that there are no problems that might delay ratification.

Finally, I would like to assure the House that everything possible is being done to ensure the safety and welfare of Miss Lamont and Mr. Spencer while in prison. The Consul General in Sao Paulo has visited them frequently and made numerous representations to the Brazilian authorities to improve the conditions of their imprisonment.

SUBSTANCE ABUSE

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, this week a cargo plane bringing $2 billion worth of cocaine was seized in Quebec, thanks to the superb effort of the RCMP, the Canadian Air Force and other agencies.

Let me congratulate them and the thousands of officers who each day try to keep these terrible drugs out of Canada. Yet for each shipment that is caught, untold other shipments of illegal drugs slip through our border, move into our streets and ruin the lives of thousands of Canadians.

Countless reports and statistics tell the story of this tragedy. A recent survey conducted by the Children's Aid Society of metro Toronto found that 12 per cent of parents use crack. An estimated 156,000 Canadians use cocaine and 36,000 use LSD.

The fact is stronger drugs like the comeback of heroin in the streets of Toronto are on the increase. The recent study by a major health insurance company found that the increase in cocaine use in Quebec ranks number two in all of North America, second only to Washington, a city fraught with street crime, drug wars and abuse.

We know that alcohol and drug abuse are responsible for between 70 to 90 per cent of all crimes committed in Canada. The Addiction Research Foundation recently estimated that drug abuse costs the Canadian economy $11.5 billion each year. Our youth in particular are becoming victims of drug use.

In the face of the alarming increase in hard substance use like heroin and crack we need measures that tackle the program twofold: to help cut off the supply through tougher policing and air surveillance with seizure of drug profits and second, and most important, to look at choking the demand.

The fact is we cannot succeed in addressing Canada's drug abuse program by getting at the suppliers. It does not work in the United States or in Europe and it is not working in Canada. What we need and what we are waiting for from this government is a coherent policy that looks at demand, that builds drug education programs for youth, that builds rehabilitation programs to get users off drugs and help them rebuild their lives; in other words, prevention and cure.

I urge this government to improve programs and to look also at the serious rise in the measure of prescription drugs. The reports from constituencies across the country, especially in Montreal and Toronto, are to the effect that the money, the programs and the educational initiatives must work together. We know that $270 million has been put into the substance abuse program, but we still do not know, six months later, how this money is being spent. Is it spent with community groups and volunteer associations in building drug prevention and rehabilitation programs that deal with the cause as well as the symptoms of substance abuse?

I am anxious to hear from the parliamentary secretary tonight, not some round-up of general statistics, but specific examples on what this government is doing with and for the people affected.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Davenport for raising this most important issue, one which concerns all Canadians, especially those with children. It gives me the opportunity to tell how the government is dealing with harm caused by substance abuse.

In 1987 we announced Canada's drug strategy. Phase one brought $210 million over five years. Seventy per cent of this money was directed at prevention, education, rehabilitation and treatment. Communities right across the country have been mobilized.

The results were that first-time alcohol use by youth between grades seven to 13 has dropped from 84 per cent to 65 per cent. Between 1987 and 1991, 1,100 native communities participated in addiction awareness week, compared with only 84 communities in 1987.

At the end of March the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare confirmed this government's long-term commitment to reduce harm caused by substance abuse. Two hundred and seventy million dollars, an increase of about 18 per cent over phase one, was allocated to Canada's drug strategy. The strategy still emphasizes community participation. Once again, over 60 per cent of the strategy money is geared toward prevention in which the hon. member is interested.

This government continues to be determined to tackle alcohol and drug abuse. Canada's drug strategy continues to provide both financial and technical assistance to local communities.

Thirty million dollars over five years will be given to community action programs and $77.5 million will be allocated to cost shared treatment programs in partnership with the different provinces. These moneys will target groups that our nation-wide consultation recommended.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I gave notice of my intention to transfer this question to debate on the adjournment motion because it sat on the Order Paper for eight months without the courtesy of a response.

The question concerns the International Year for World Indigenous Peoples, an idea originally advanced by the Grand Council of the Crees of Quebec through its ambassador at the UN, Ted Moses.

1992 has marked the 500th anniversary of Columbus landing in America, the beginning of the colonial era which saw the annihilation of aboriginal people by disease, wars, starvation and slavery. More recently governments have followed a more subtle process of cultural genocide using annihilation of self-esteem, destroying of people's roots or their contact with the land.

Around the world this has resulted in social problems such as chemical abuse, suicide, dependency on welfare, problems that colonial powers could easily argue are self-inflicted or based on character flaws of the oppressed.

There were many people, myself and my party included, who hoped that 1993 could mark the era or the end of an era of idolizing colonizers and the beginning of a period during which the injustices of the colonial period would be recognized and redressed.

There are some 300 million indigenous people in the world, but how many will be represented at the United Nations during the inauguration of the international year? How many will Canada be assisting to travel to New York to participate in the deliberations? How many is Canada consulting on the draft of the resolution which Canada has lobbied to present, proclaiming the official beginning of the international year on December 10? Indeed, how many have been involved in planning with the Government of Canada its activities at home and abroad during the international year?

When I attempted to find out the answer I was embarrassed. No wonder the minister's office called my office yesterday and asked me not to raise the question in the House.

In 1990 Canada assembled a disinformation crew from External Affairs and Indian Affairs to travel around Europe sanitizing the Oka crisis. More recently this bunch intercepted a report of the transnational corporation subcommittee of the UN working group on indigenous peoples on the James Bay Cree and circulated it to government departments for comments prior to its publication. The Cree of course were not one of those consulted.

Unfortunately the same wrecking crew has been put in charge of Canada's participation in the International Year of Indigenous People which is turning into a whitewash of Canada's record on aboriginal people while trying to maintain an international image of sanctity. The result is that Canada is contributing perhaps $90,000 to $100,000 to the UN voluntary fund and its over-all budget for the international year is so small that it will have no impact whatsoever on indigenous people around the world.

Canada says it has no money to assist Canadian aboriginal organizations to send their representatives to New York. Canada even tells them that their speeches would have to be vetted by the government if they joined the Canadian delegation so that they would not embarrass the government. Canada is only taking one aboriginal person, Chief Wendy Grant of British Columbia, to be a part of its federal team at the inaugural meeting.

Canada is paying to have representatives of the departments of External Affairs and Indian Affairs to argue full time against the collective rights of world indigenous people and against the principle of self-determination, even though these principles are enshrined in the United Nations charter. They are working on a resolution proclaiming international year which Canada is going to present, and according to one international participant Canada's resolution is getting weaker and weaker, draft four is worse than draft three, draft five is worse than draft four. Canadian aboriginal organizations have not been consulted in the resolution until the last possible minute.

The worst result is that Canada has used the international year as an opportunity to divide and conquer aboriginal people at home.

The whole process is one which—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's remarks on this subject.

I was prepared to provide an answer to the questions that he has raised until I listened to his vitriolic and unconscionable caricatures of the government's work with aboriginal people. Therefore, I would not dignify his remarks by a response.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to be adopted. The House therefore stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to the subject of Canada Post closing or cutting back post offices in rural areas. Since 1986, when Prime Minister Mulroney appointed Donald Lander president of the corporation, 1,300 post offices across Canada have closed or their services have been reduced.

This is an attack not only on rural Canada but also on the 3,000 or so postal employees who lost their jobs. Canada Post says that the purpose is to reduce the corporation's costs and improve customer service. The facts contradict this.

[English]

I call upon this government to instruct Canada Post Corporation to immediately abandon its policy of closing rural post offices. It is time to put a halt to this blatant disregard for the fundamental nature and character of rural Canada.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, since I was elected in 1984, I have been asked to advise many small business owners throughout my riding. I have been able to advise them with the help of resource people in various departments and Crown corporations.

I would like to pay special tribute today to the management and staff of the Federal Business Development Bank. This organization, created in 1944, was the first bank in Canada to provide term loans to small and medium sized businesses.

Now that many sources provide such loans, the FBDB complements private sector institutions by lending money to companies that cannot obtain financing elsewhere on reasonable terms. It provides funds for business expansion, capital acquisition, the purchase of existing businesses and loans to increase working capital in support of sales growth and also advises more than 100,000 entrepreneurs a year.

I congratulate these remarkably capable managers!

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the Tory government is determined to prevent the legislative committee from having a full and thorough examination of Bill C-91, a bill which will result in higher drug prices for families, seniors and provincial drug plans.

The government directed the committee to restrict witnesses in order to end hearings by next Wednesday and report back to the House by next Friday. This is a complex bill. Over 80 individuals and organizations, including ministers of health, seniors, industry spokespersons, unions, consumer groups, health professionals, as well as federal ministers and officials wish to appear.

The New Democratic Party demands that all significant witnesses be heard. We will not facilitate the government ramming this bill through committee against the interests of consumers, seniors and provincial health plans.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the legislative committee on Bill C-91, a bill to extend the patent protection for new drugs, I want to get on with the business of hearing witnesses.

Government members want to get into the serious work of the committee. We want the bill to be the best possible bill at the end of the hearing. Investments are at stake. Jobs are at stake. Researchers from the University of Alberta are eagerly waiting to be called. At meeting after meeting I have been urging my opposition colleagues not to disappoint Canadians by making a mockery of the committee process. Let us get on with the business. Let us hear some witnesses. We need the $500 million in investment. We need the new jobs and we need to study this thoroughly.

HEALTH

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, one in every 10 Canadian women will receive during her lifetime the devastating diagnosis of breast cancer. More than 14,000 women will be so diagnosed this year alone. Half of those diagnosed will die from it. It is the leading killer of Canadian women aged 35 to 54.

In spite of these figures, the incidence and survival rate for breast cancer have remained relatively unchanged for the past 20 to 30 years. The subcommittee of this House on the status of women reported: "There are big gaps in knowledge about breast cancer, the causes, the solutions, the appropriate treatment. This lack of knowledge exacts a price which is far too great".

This government has said that it will soon be announcing major spending cuts. On the eve of these cuts, I urge that more, not fewer, resources be devoted to the prevention, detection, cure and ultimate elimination of the disease breast cancer.

AUDITOR GENERAL

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General's Report tabled yesterday in the House of Commons reflects his commitment to focusing on the real problems.

As the Auditor General admitted himself, there is no easy solution to some of these problems. However, he stressed the need for a better understanding of their impact and for taking constructive measures to deal with them.

I would like to read to you what he said in the first paragraph of his introduction, and I quote: "For several years now, Canada has experienced slow economic growth, business closures and high unemployment. Canada is not unique: other industrialized nations have experienced similar downturns. As Auditor General, and as a Canadian, I am deeply concerned about the economic challenges Canada faces both nationally and internationally, and about their impact on individual Canadians. Canadians are very worried about the impact of annual deficits and the accumulated debt on their standard of living and that of future generations of Canadians. At the same time, they expect the government to provide more, not fewer, services. The government's dilemma, which is not really new, is that its financial resources are constrained, while demands on those resources increase".

The Auditor General is the government's watchdog for the administration of our public finances, and that is as it should be.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, there has been a lot of talk from government about cutbacks on spending and social programs. More than ever older Canadians are worried about the future of the programs they rely on.

Seniors are concerned about the future of medicare, old age pensions and independence programs.

The Minister of Finance should realize that money spent today on seniors independence programs could save millions or billions of dollars in the future. Money spent on housing programs would not only create jobs for unemployed Canadians, it would provide older Canadians with decent affordable housing.

Seniors still remember the government's attempt to deindex their pensions.

I call upon the Minister of Finance to give seniors the guarantees they need that valued programs will not be cut by this government.

GUN AMNESTY

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the Minister of Justice for extending the November gun amnesty.

For the sake of safety, the minister is right to encourage Canadians to surrender prohibitive weapons and those no longer in use.

• (1410)

However, Canadians have long assumed that they have the right to own and enjoy property. Under the new firearms regulations, some have been required to turn in firearms that were legally purchased in Canada. I ask the minister to seriously consider the possibility of compensating individuals for voluntarily turning in newly prohibited firearms that they legally own.

No one has a greater stake in ensuring public safety and proper firearms use than law abiding gun owners. Providing compensation would demonstrate in a concrete manner the government's repeated statements that gun control laws are aimed at those who break the law and not those who follow it.

PAKISTAN

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, last week former Pakistan Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto and many of her supporters were arrested for taking part in a long march to protest against the government of Nawaz Shariff.

Canadians were appalled at the sight of unarmed peaceful demonstrators being clubbed by Pakistan's security forces. These actions were an affront to basic human rights. In any society that calls itself a democracy, the right to have freedom of both association and expression cannot be denied.

The Canadian government should summon the Pakistan Ambassador to Canada and express Canada's outrage at the arrest and beatings of the peaceful marchers. By not vehemently expressing our anger, Canada risks being seen as condoning those actions.

Human rights have no borders. Any relations that Canada has with Pakistan and indeed with all countries must be considered in this context.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise today as one of the sitting members on the legislative committee studying Bill C-91.

This week we have been trying to organize and arrange meetings so that we can accommodate the many witnesses that want to come and appear before this committee, speaking for both sides of this issue, whether they are industry, labour or corporate interests.

These meetings are being filibustered. These meetings have been obstructionist. We are not getting anywhere with these meetings. The opposition is not co-operating at all. We have put forward the names of ministers, of many people to come before this committee. We have offered to sit around the clock. We have offered to sit on weekends. This is no good for the opposition.

It is time to put this kind of nonsense aside. This kind of thing is not respected in the House of Commons. We must get on with hearing witnesses, making this a better bill and getting on with the investment, thus making a better economy for this country.

OZONE LAYER

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the thinning of the ozone layer is costing Canada millions of dollars in lost productivity, damaged crops and increased health costs. Thousands of Canadians are developing skin cancer and cataracts and millions more are exposed to radiation levels that will result in illness and death.

Yet today in Copenhagen, the environment minister put on his rose-coloured glasses and did the scientific two-step so he could reassure Canadians about the ozone destroying compound, methyl bromide.

I quote from the June 1992 United Nations report on methyl bromide and the ozone layer: "scientists and governments have also identified methyl bromide as the major contributor to stratospheric bromine. Bromine is directly involved in the catalytic destruction of ozone". The best solution this minister has to offer Canadians is a mere 25 per cent reduction in methyl bromide use by 1998.

I urge this government to show some real leadership. Take off your rose-coloured glasses, put on your UV protected sunglasses and ban methyl bromionde.

COMPETITION ACT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the Competition Act demands that merchants sell goods at advertised prices. Yet right across this country merchants today are advertising goods, knowing that there are taxes and other charges ranging from the GST, the PST to the gas guzzler tax and the tire tax and other taxes and charges that materially affect the ultimate price of the product.

This advertising of products is deceitful and almost bordering on the fraudulent.

I call upon the government to immediately produce amendments to the Competition Act to force merchants to sell goods at the advertised price unless the ad specifically sets out that the price is plus taxes and charges and sets out exactly what those taxes and charges are.

EMERGENCY RESPONSE PLAN

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the report of the Auditor General has given the government a failing grade in preparing Canadians for the event of an emergency.

Since 1987 the Auditor General has been calling for improvements to Canada's Emergency Response Plan. Five years later, we see that longstanding problems in federal emergency planning have not been addressed.

The proposed national earthquake plan is still not complete. There has been no follow-up on the recommendations of the 1986 report on the Bhopal chemical disaster. A review on the Chernobyl nuclear disaster recommending major improvements to Canada's nuclear emergency response plan has been virtually ignored.

Last year, a number of my B.C. colleagues and I visited the Hanford nuclear reservation in Washington just south of the B.C. border. We learned that the Canadian government had failed to develop adequate co-ordinated emergency response measures in the event of a chemical or nuclear explosion at Hanford which could affect B.C. communities.

The Auditor General's report is vindication that my colleagues and I were right. Canada is not adequately prepared in the case of accident or disaster, be it nuclear, chemical or natural.

ARTS AND CULTURE

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, with virtually all sectors in Canada the cultural community is experiencing severe financial, pressures.

In fact, in many budgets, both public and private, contributions to the arts have become the most tempting targets to cut. Unfortunately, the threshold of cultural funding is already too low for survival in many instances and a number of Canadian institutions, both large and small, are now in serious jeopardy. As they are compelled to close their doors, there will be a special kind of pain to this recession.

As budget priorities are reordered, we must not too quickly forget that the performing arts, the cultural industries and indeed even the CBC are among the most important ties that bind our country together.

Neither should we neglect the reality that culture is an area of significant potential for economic growth representing close to 3 per cent of our gross domestic product and growing as an important export industry.

It should also be remembered that the cultural threshold is so low to begin with that even marginal increases in cultural investments will pay disproportionately high dividends in terms of public spirit and economic return.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance.

In the past three weeks, interest rates have increased nearly three percentage points and the consequences are very obvious. For every point more in interest rates, the government has to spend virtually $2 billion. It is adding to the deficit all the time. In turn, when business people borrow money they have to pay much more than the, business people with whom they are competing in the United States.

Jobs cannot be created and in not creating jobs, the number of unemployed is increasing. When will this government understand that the policy of fighting inflation at all costs is the wrong one and the time has come to have a policy that will create growth and create hope in our nation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I share the view of the hon. Leader of the Opposition that high interest rates are certainly having a dampening effect upon the economy and economic recovery.

I also point out to him that in order to maintain low interest rates over the long term we have to get at the fundamentals. That is essentially to bring inflation down and to keep it down. That has been one of our primary objectives.

There are concerns as a result of the volatility in the exchange market and indeed concerns in the financial market with respect to those who hold Canadian bonds and bills. There is a degree of concern as a result of the referendum. There is concern about the extent of the deficits, both at the federal and provincial levels. There is concern over the current account deficit.

This has all been focused on, particularly as a result of the focus which has been placed in Europe with respect to the United Kingdom, with respect to France, with respect to Italy and a number of other industrialized nations.

Really what is happening is that market forces are forcing up interest rates, and I think the hon. member understands that.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is trying to find all sorts of reasons, but we have noted that the interest rates started to go up the day the Prime Minister said that he was to stay the course. People abroad know that staying the course is a disaster for Canada.

Why does the government have a policy of doing nothing when the community today is meeting, or there is a meeting of finance ministers to be held very soon, to decide on an approach to economic policies in Europe that would be oriented to growth and stop that problem of fighting only inflation? They all have fiscal problems, but they know that fiscal problems get worse when there is a depression and no growth in the economy.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I understand it is a legitimate policy position that the Leader of the Opposition takes. He is suggesting that we borrow more, that we spend more and the heck with inflation, the heck with the deficit.

Mr. Harvard: He never said that, Don.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is not the position we will take. We have charted a macroeconomic course over the medium term of price stability, fiscal consolidation and economic restructuring. Those are important and vital. It is a vital policy stance to take for the medium term. That is what we intend to follow. It is important for the hon. member to understand that and it is also important for the people of Canada to understand that.

Mr. Peterson: It's disastrous and did not work. Shame.

An hon. member: Good prescription for a depression.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is pretty obvious this government is totally paralysed, but he says this is just the opposition's opinion. For months we have made it clear that we are in favour of a policy that encourages economic growth and lower interest rates, and if the dollar is weaker, we can live with that. We are not alone. The Quebec minister of industry and commerce, Mr. Tremblay, said the same thing yesterday.

I would like to quote the editorial writer of La Presse, who said this morning:

> Brian Mulroney will have to decide whether he wants to maintain the dollar at any price, which means more unemployed workers, more people living in poverty and more businesses down the drain, because the economy will not recover as scheduled. Is a 77-cent dollar worth the price in broken lives and lost hopes?
> It is time Mr. Mulroney opted for economic recovery.

When will the government wake up?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition knows very well that you cannot isolate yourself from the reality of the global financial markets.

A trillion dollars changes hands every day in the financial and exchange markets.

Mr. Chrétien: They have no confidence in the government.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member says they do not have any confidence in the government. Quite frankly, he is absolutely wrong, because the policy stance we are following is endorsed by the G–7, the OECD, the World Bank. It is the only course we can follow. We cannot borrow our way out of this particular difficulty. It is going to require a balance to contain the deficit, to maintain those fundamentals which will keep inflation down. That is the long–term menu and agenda for bringing about a strong economy with job creation and hope and confidence for the future.

REPORT OF THE AUDITOR GENERAL

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): I want to ask the Minister of Finance about the affair of the untaxed Barbados billions. The Auditor General says that offshore schemes like surplus stripping in Singapore and upstream loans in Liberia amount to a legally sanctioned tax rip–off by the Canadian government.

Why does the minister think this tax evasion is so good and why is he promoting a policy of international tax piracy for multinational corporations?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the dual objectives being followed are to ensure that we maintain international competitiveness while at the same time protecting the tax base of Canada.

My predecessor closed a number of these tax loopholes and introduced the general anti–avoidance rule which is being implemented. The government also monitors on an ongoing basis the tax regimes of other countries. Also, there are policy decisions that are taken from time to time which sometimes are perceived as tax loopholes but are really incentives to encourage economic growth and activity.

Furthermore, as the Department of Finance outlined in its response, there is really no conclusive evidence that the amount of money identified as being lost by the Auditor General can be substantiated. I invite the hon. member to read the response that the Department of Finance provided in the Auditor General's report.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, listen to the tired old answers of the Minister of Finance. The problem is he is not listening to the fresh evidence of the Auditor General.

Yesterday the Auditor General said that letting the rich enjoy the fruits of tax evasion on the beaches of Portugal or under the palm trees of Barbados was grossly unfair to Canada's unemployed.

Why is the minister more interested in supporting these international buccaneers than in announcing employment policies for Canadians?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the department's response contained in the Auditor General's report the point is made that the claim is unsubstantiated. It goes on to indicate that "the Auditor General has failed to indicate that most of these concerns are the result of policy decisions. Moreover, he also overstated the impact of the rules on revenue collection while understating the degree to which any problems have already been addressed by existing legislation".

While there may very well be a fundamental difference in the point of view on this, what really has to be indicated is the fact that there is a response. This is a matter that can probably best be exposed during the committee hearings. We would be glad to have our finance officials appear to make the case that has been contained in the response included in the Auditor General's report.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance continually cites the general anti–avoidance rule as a measure that the government has taken to avoid this kind of tax evasion. The Minister of Finance used this yesterday. I had hoped that by today he might have read the Auditor General's report and noticed that the Auditor General says that no reassessment pursuant to the GAAR has taken place as of 1992. The fact is that this is not working.

Why does the Minister of Finance think it fair, when the taxes for the average Canadian family have gone up some $3,000 since 1984, for a select few to be able to take advantage of this kind of tax rip-off? When is he going to act on this? What he has done so far is not working.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General is an officer of Parliament. I respect his position and I respect him very much.

However, I have to say there is no solid evidence which supports the contention that hundreds of millions of dollars in revenue have been lost under this particular provision. I say that in all sincerity. There may be a difference of opinion on this, which would not be the first time that has occurred.

I say to the hon. member, that is our view, that is what we have said in the response and that is what we stand by.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Finance not know? Just look at yesterday's papers. There is an entire industry out there inviting Canadians to pay money to attend seminars where they can learn how to rip off the Canadian tax system, pursuant to some of the very things the Auditor General pointed out.

I ask the minister to look at yesterday's papers. Also, does he think it is fair that a Canadian company should be able to borrow money in order to invest in a foreign country and create jobs there, deduct the interest from that loan, make profits in that country, not pay taxes on those profits, then bring those profits home and have that money exempt from Canadian taxes through the dividend tax credit?

The interest deductibility rule and the dividend tax credit are two things I have raised time and time again in this House. When is the government going to do something about these rip-offs?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I repeat there is no solid evidence to support the contention that hundreds of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money have been lost in this particular exercise.

The hon. member knows very well that Canada's tax system has to be competitive with other regimes in the world. International competitiveness, while preserving the tax base, is clearly the objective of the Department of Finance. It is clearly my objective and I will continue to work toward achieving that.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Finance not realize that this points out the moral flaw in this whole issue of globalization? He gets up and talks about having to be competitive and what he means is we have to have a tax system that is as corrupt and as loose as everybody else's tax system. That is what is wrong with globalization and the free trade agreements.

Mr. Tobin: Ask Bob Rae.

Mr. Blaikie: The Minister of Finance constantly talks about the deficit. Will he show that he is serious about distributing the burden of deficit reduction fairly and give a commitment to this House today that he will not, as he plans to do this afternoon, take one step further in extending the tax exemption that exists for private family trusts in this country?

An hon. member: Right on.

Mr. Blaikie: Why does he want to continue to protect the richest families in this country, as the Liberals did before him?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would be very interested to learn how the hon. member is going to single-handedly, or perhaps with the assistance of his colleagues, fight globalization, fight trade liberalization and fight international competitiveness.

How will he be able to do that and still maintain Canada as a viable place to do business, in order for it to be a global trader, a global trading partner that will provide jobs and economic opportunities for all Canadians? That is the way the world is unfolding. I wish the hon. member would get on board.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I too have a question for the Minister of Finance but first I would point out to him that the Auditor General says in his report that he "analysed National Revenue's taxation 1990 information return data base". He concluded that hundreds of millions of dollars are being lost through tax loopholes based on foreign tax havens.

The Auditor General reported yesterday the cost of implementing the GST has risen to a total of some $1.7 billion. Why was this money not spent instead on improving the health care and skills of Canadians, and above all, on creating more private sector jobs through getting the economy moving instead of holding it back with the dead hand of the GST?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member wants to quote from the Auditor General's report I will do the same thing with your permission and read the response to the observations about the so-called loopholes.

The finance department's response is as follows: "The audit note alleges a number of concerns with respect to the taxation of foreign affiliates and foreign source income. In particular, the Auditor General claims that hundreds of millions of dollars in tax revenue are being lost. This claim is unsubstantiated".

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the minister has not explained what the Auditor General found in the 1990 Taxation Canada data base. He has not answered my question about the GST so I am going to ask him another one.

The Auditor General also indicated the government has hired 4,000 more people to administer the GST. Why has the government hired all these bureaucrats to enforce an unwanted tax when the country has such a desperate need for improved health care, skills training, environmental protection and above all more private sector jobs? Why has this government got such a twisted sense of priorities?

An hon. member: Do a spin for us.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the only twisted sense of priorities is in the context of the hon. member's question. When he is referring to the Auditor General vis-à-vis the GST, the Auditor General said quite clearly that the government's spending on the GST has been duly authorized by and and fully reported to Parliament.

If the hon. member had been awake over the last three years, he would have known that this government, through estimates over a period of three years, has laid out the figures, both PY and dollar wise in detail so that they match exactly that of the Auditor General's report.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. The Auditor General was critical of the government for its management of the GST and in allowing tax avoidance through foreign investment.

Will the government now admit that the GST rebate, for example, designed for low and modest income Canadians with a single maximum $33,000 a year was paid in 1991 to 12,481 people with reported incomes over $100,000 a year, some of them over $200,000 a year, and that it was partly because of allowable deductions for investments in foreign nations compliments of this government.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I cannot match the hon. member's showmanship unless I put my skates on.

My hon. friend knows that the GST credits are based on net income and treat all Canadians fairly and equitably. As far as the Auditor General's report is concerned, I think the hon. member should have stayed in the lock-up longer yesterday instead of depending on media reports.

If he reads the Auditor General's report he will note that the Auditor General is not in any way, shape or form critical of GST spending by this government. What he did was add up the costs of three years which we report to Parliament on an annual basis. It does not take a rocket scientist to add up those three figures and I know that there are no rocket scientists on the other side or in the media, as a matter of fact.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the minister is suggesting that there is no special deal here for the wealthy when it applies to the GST rebate.

I point out to the minister that the only deduction he talks about for ordinary Canadians involve the number of children. In other words, you have a maximum of $33,000 a year and for each additional child you can make an additional $2,000 a year.

Does the minister not realize that in order to get the GST rebate, if you were making $100,000 a year, you would have to have 35 children under the age of 18? That would have to be some man or some woman.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if we are talking about 35 children in one family, my hon. friend is a better man than I am, I will tell you that.

The member knows that the GST credit is based on fair and equitable treatment of all. It is based on net income and provides for deductions, not only for children, but for charitable contributions, for pension contributions, for research and development, for business investments and business losses—the list goes on.

If the hon. member is suggesting that this government take away the incentive for business investments and take away the write-offs for ordinary Canadians then we do not agree with him.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The minister announced the $50 million package for Canadian Airlines yesterday, an amount, by the way, that could buy 90 per cent of the company on the open market at the close of trading yesterday. The government disclosed to this House that American Airline's proposal will give the American company complete control over who runs Canadian Airlines, their business plans, their capital expenditures and any mergers or acquisitions.

Is it the policy of the Government of Canada to allow an American company to take control of one of Canada's national airlines?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Definitely not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's statement by the minister in the House and remarks to the media, in conjunction with some contradictory statements by his cabinet colleagues, have really muddied the public's understanding of what policy direction this government has taken the airline industry in.

Is the government prepared to finally reintroduce some form of pricing controls and some form of routing controls in order to assist both carriers to survive in the long term? Is the government prepared to take that necessary step?

• (1440)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in my statement yesterday I indicated that if there was no self-discipline imposed by the companies themselves, that we were actually working on some solutions to have some calibration measures introduced in legislation.

REPORT OF THE AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The Auditor General said that in the case of the Westray mine project, the federal loan guarantee provided by the government covered, and I quote: "about 103 per cent of pre-production costs".

Why did the minister and the Government of Canada go to such lengths to accommodate the promoters of the Westray mine project?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, in his report the Auditor General talked about theoretical possibilities, and he has every right to do that. In fact, in the actual world of Westray and Curragh what he suggested did not happen.

What happened was that the tax sweeteners that were to be there never materialized. Also, the Auditor General failed to mention that if ever they had materialized, there would have been a pay down of the loan, which he forgot to acknowledge. As we stand here today we have a company which has already lost $28.5 million.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the government House leader. He will know that 26 men have lost their lives. Management fees which had been paid to the promoter in this particular case have totalled $9.9 million. There was a federal loan guarantee the equivalent of 103 per cent on pre-production costs and there is no enquiry in the province of Nova Scotia.

Will the government House leader indicate to the House today that he and his government are prepared to have an inquiry on the Westray mine project and stop covering up all of the facts surrounding this particular deal? Will he give us that undertaking today?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I reject absolutely any accusation of cover-up. I remind the hon. member that all of the documents released pertaining to all the federal government activity are available. He need only go over and read them.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday in the foyer outside the House of Commons the Minister of Justice stated that there may be more loan guarantees for Canadian Airlines International. Was the Minister of Justice manoeuvring in the Tory leadership race?

Will the Minister of Transport tell us what conditions and what timetable he has for giving additional loan guarantee assistance to Canadian Airlines.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member for Ottawa West that in a statement yesterday, the president of PWA said that the $50 million financial assistance will provide the corporation with funds sufficient to meet its current operating requirements. I think you have the answer there.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the minister did not hear the question.

Yesterday he said there would be no further assistance and the Minister of Justice said there may be further assistance. Could we please have a clear statement on at least one thing from the Government of Canada? Will there or will there not be more assistance to Canadian? If so, under what conditions?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I did not understand the first question, but surely the hon. member did not understand the answer I just gave him either.

We agreed with PWA and the employees that we would give them $50 million in financial aid. The employees and the company said that was enough and that is the agreement on which we consented to participate.

COMPETITION ACT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The minister will know that every time he goes to the store to buy something, the price that is advertised is not the price he pays. He has to pay the GST, the PST, and in many cases other charges and taxes on top.

Will the minister amend the Competition Act or introduce amendments to the Competition Act to make merchants sell goods at advertised prices, or in the alternative specifically set out the taxes and other charges that are in addition to the price advertised in the advertisement?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend raises a very important element. It is the responsibility of any store to get the right information to the consumer. It is very important.

I know in some circumstances there are different approaches. Some are with GST included, the PST included, and some other taxes included like in Ontario, but in co-operation with my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, I would be ready to look at maybe delivering some guidelines to the stores to make sure the information is available.

We will ask the director of the Competition Bureau to look at this matter closely.

SMALL BUSINESS REPORT

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have noticed that the recent annual report of the minister responsible for small business lacks the glossy lustre of reports of the past.

My question to the minister is: Can we conclude that this new look also represents savings for the government coffers?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the cost of the new report is 25 per cent less than the costs of previous ones.

What was particularly innovative this time was that we tabled a diskette. For another 25 cents one can buy a diskette, download the diskette and disseminate the information hundreds of times virtually without cost.

I should like to see this reform used for other annual reports in Parliament because it will save the Government of Canada and the people of Canada a great deal of money.

In this particular case we were helping to give strategies to small business to increase its exports.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The minister has announced that processing of immigration applications which has slowed down since he downsized the department staff will be handled by a simple processing unit at Vegreville.

The Globe and Mail reports that a similar system in the United States has caused new delays.

Can the minister assure us that the Vegreville system will not cause a further decline in client service?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can give that assurance to the hon. member.

We have been experiencing with mail-in applications in our immigration centres in Toronto, Montreal, and Vancouver for the last couple of years clients of employment and immigration having faster service under this scheme, and taxpayers will save $6.5 million a year, which is not negligible.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a memorandum that the director of inland operations, Ontario region, wrote in September to all managers in the CEIU in Ontario. It says that all five models of the new system will cause backlogs of client applications, backlogs of administrative functions, and that client service will suffer.

Can the minister explain to this House why he did not heed the advice of his senior Ontario official and whether he will stop this new system now until a more workable system can be found?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will not stop trying to give Canadians better service. This is exactly what this new case processing centre will do for Canadians who deal with immigration.

For the information of the hon. member, the officials of my department have recommended to me that we proceed in that fashion. After having taken full cognizance of this case processing centre and the technology that will be used, I have recommended it for approval. The government has decided to go ahead, again with a view to saving Canadian taxpayers at least $6.5 million a year.

HOUSING

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

During 1992 the government introduced two programs to help Canadians purchase affordable housing. The first was the 5 per cent down payment for new homes and the second was the RRSP provision to assist in the acquisition of homes either new or existing ones.

My question pertains to the RRSP. Has there been a measurable impact upon the RRSP with respect to the stimulation of the new housing market? Based on present experiences, would the minister be willing to consider extending that program beyond the present expiry date of March 1, 1993?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

As of this date I believe some 130,000 withdrawals have been made under the RRSP. We do not have accurate statistical data as to the number of homes that were actually constructed as a result, but we are satisfied and comfortable with the fact that at least 100,000 homeowners have been helped in this particular process. At least 6,000 new homes will have been built as a result of this program.

In so far as the latter part of his question is concerned, I think it is fair to say that this has been a successful program. I will take the latter part of his question as a representation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Last night on the Fifth Estate we saw the horrors in Brazilian jails. Military police invaded the prison with guard dogs. The police fired over 5,000 shots leaving 238 prisoners dead. The threat of death and violence hangs over Christine Lamont and David Spencer every day.

The minister said yesterday that Brazil may not expel, but just this year a Chilean prisoner was sent home under an expulsion order. Why will the minister not request the expulsion of David and Christine?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the term expulsion is used to apply to a lot of things in Brazil that have nothing to do with expulsion as the hon. member understands it.

The Chilean who was expelled from Brazil was actually extradited. Our understanding of the term is that he was extradited home to stand trial for offences that he had committed in Chile. He was not expelled under the provision that is being looked for or that would be said to apply under these conditions. It is actually an extradition.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Premier McKenna said last night that he was very concerned about the safety of Christine and David and he characterized the judgment as extraordinarily callous and cruel. The Prime Minister has said that he was profoundly troubled by this case.

Canada is known world-wide for its compassion. Will the government honour the Prime Minister's commitment to Premier McKenna and compassionately request the expulsion order to bring them home?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have all expressed our concern about the length and severity of the sentence that was applied to Mr. Spencer and Ms. Lamont. I have said so myself. I think the sentence is excessive.

That is why we look to the appeals that we believe are about to be heard on the length of the sentence; and we are looking forward to seeing the results of this in the very short term. We are hoping those sentences will be reduced as a result.

SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, last year two Halifax women employed by the Public Service of Canada lodged a complaint of sexual harassment against their supervisors. Two internal investigations found that sexual harassment occurred.

My question is for the President of the Treasury Board. I want to know what that minister is prepared to do to ensure that sanctions are applied in this case and that retaliation does not take place.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that I will look into the particular case of which I am not aware. I can assure her everything will be done to ensure there is no harassment.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I hope I can depend upon that but I have fears.

Yesterday one of the complainants was terminated by her supervisor. Another of the complainants has also been refused any attempt at a transfer and is consequently out of a job. I raised this matter last Thursday in the House and I raised it yesterday.

Again I ask the President of the Treasury Board: What guarantees does the minister have in place that there will be no retaliation like this again?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is aware of the process we have in the Public Service to address these issues. I am sure they have been followed.

However, in this particular instance I will look into it, as I have told her, to be sure there is no retaliation, of course.

HUMANITARIAN AID

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence, I will direct my question to the associate minister of defence or the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have given notice of the question.

In view of the dirge of bad news out of former Yugoslavia this might be a glimmer of some hope to a good many people still there. I have a letter from a constituent whose grandson is a sergeant with the peacekeeping force in Yugoslavia. He wrote to his grandmother who happened to be a constituent of mine.

As a result church groups in my area collected over two tonnes of used clothing. Through the bureaucracy of the Red Cross and Defence there does not seem to be any way to get this material to Belleville, hopefully to get it over there to help some of the children caught in that quagmire.

As a matter of humanitarian need, I am just asking them to break through the bureaucracy. At least one of the ministers could get a co-ordinator to find out how best this could be done. I understand this spontaneous grass-roots interest of citizens to help is spreading to many churches in Atlantic Canada. There is more than two tonnes of used material and clothing right now in one church alone.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have stated in this House before that the policy of the government in terms of humanitarian assistance overseas is that we urge Canadians who wish to help, and we know that many Canadians do, to work with the international agencies in the position to assess needs in the region and the uses to which things can be put. We urge them to work with agencies like the International Red Cross and other organizations.

We do not have the capacity as a government to provide transport for the goods that people choose to send. I have warned Canadians before—and I would ask the hon. member to pass this on to his constituents and to his church groups—that international organizations are not in a position to use much of what is being collected. There are very particular needs; they have to be co-ordinated. Indeed we have hard evidence of goods having been collected and shipped to other parts of the world that have not been able to use them.

It is such a disappointment, I know, to those who want to give, but it is far better to work with the international organizations. I have a pamphlet on this that I would be prepared to give the hon. member for his groups.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I understand the minister's answer in part and I appreciate the bureaucracy involved.

My constituent, this 80-year old grandmother, Reverend Vaughan of the church and other churches have been in touch with the International Red Cross that has told them, much to my amazement, that the International Red Cross would help if it were money or if it were new clothing.

Surely used clothing in the horror of Bosnia, Croatia, and all the other places over there including Yugoslavia, could be of some help since we do have transport going over there from time to time. It might help to have at least some officer either in Defence or in External Affairs to be the co-ordinator to talk to the citizens of Canada and tell them the answer, that there is no hope or they might be able to do something rather than meet the stone wall they have met until now.

Mr. Speaker: We will get on to the answer, if the minister wishes to answer.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is not the bureaucracy. This is the result of careful planning in which those of us at the political level have been involved.

I had asked my department to look at all the ways and bring all the imagination that it could to how we could best help. Through working with international agencies the conclusion we have come to, not once but many times as we were examining this issue, was that we had to assist the international agencies in the way they advise us and they advise what is the most appropriate.

We do not have free transport or free space in transport going over. When our planes and our transport go to places like this it is because they are full, because they are being utilized. They do not have empty space.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the Toronto Star she claims that her top two priorities are the defending of democracy and the promotion of human rights.

Amnesty International condemns Mexico for widespread torture, abuse of human rights and political corruption.

I wonder if the minister could explain to this House why we are involved in a free trade agreement with Mexico, and would she be prepared to appear before the subcommittee on international trade to explain this contradiction in the policy of the government.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is not a contradiction in the government's policy.

In fact, we have worked very closely with the human rights' people in Mexico in an effort to assist the objective of their government in improving the human rights' conditions in Mexico. It is something about which we have been in regular touch with Mexico. We know that the president has made great strides toward improving the judicial system and the democratic systems within Mexico.

It is in the interest of Mexicans, as they move forward economically, that some of the assistance and the work that we do with them helps them also to move forward democratically.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question for the minister: Is Amnesty International through its last three years of reports on widespread torture lying or is the government's policy complete hypocrisy?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government's policy is certainly not complete hypocrisy. We can see that through the stands that we have taken in a great many countries.

We already trade with Mexico through the GATT and through other organizations, as well as bilaterally. Is the hon. member suggesting that we shut all that down?

EXCISE TAX ACT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–377, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act (books and reading material).

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to apply a zero rate of tax on books and reading materials with respect to the goods and services tax. It is not unlike a previous bill which I introduced which had a similar intent, but which was blocked by the government.

The House will know that I have received thousands of petitions on this issue and I am anxious to proceed. Hopefully I can get co–operation from all members of all parties this time.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Duhamel moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I move:

That the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General be authorized to travel to Halifax, Nova Scotia from November 29 to December 1, 1992; and to Vancouver, British Columbia from January 17 to January 20, 1993, in order to hold public hearings on crime prevention, and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

FORESTRY AND FISHERIES

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I move:

That five members and the necessary staff of the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries be authorized to travel to British Columbia and hold public hearings for three days during the last week of January, 1993 in relation to a study on salmon fisheries.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, a point of order on the motion put forward by the parliamentary secretary. My understanding was that the hearings in British Columbia were going to be more than three days. Has there been some further consultation to limit the hearings on fisheries to only three days?

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, my understanding was—

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Point of order, Mr. Speaker, would it be possible to—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment, please. I wish that hon. members would just wait a moment to be recognized. The hon. member for Skeena rose and put a question. His colleague has an addition to that question? I recognize the hon. member.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the question of the urgency of these hearings is absolutely critical. Continuously moving them back is going to create a great deal of hardship. I wonder if there is a possibility to do two things; first, to reconsider the time and to give it a closer proximity to the time of the problem, and second, to extend those hearings longer than three days? There is an illegal commercial fishery going on at the Nimpkish River at this time which we would like to see the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans address and shut down forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to hear the hon. parliamentary secretary in a moment. I listened carefully, as I am sure hon. members did, to the motion. The question raised has its own legitimacy, I accept that, but I have some doubt as to whether this is the place to be arguing this particular point.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I greatly appreciate your advice on this. I would go further to say that customarily these motions are agreed upon by the Whips of the various parties and I would recommend to both hon. members that the points they raised should be raised within their own caucuses or within the committee.

This is a recommendation that, as you are well aware Mr. Speaker, comes from the committee, was dealt with by the parties and consensus was arrived at among the parties. Any difference of opinion appears to exist in that quarter.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can be helpful. We should proceed with this motion and if there are other concerns that need to be raised to extend the period of time or the mandate, that could be done in the appropriate committee and then we could reconsider the motion. However, I think it would appropriate to move forward now and perhaps consider some additions to reflect the reality of British Columbia later.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Kamloops, because I am concerned that we are getting into a discussion on two things which, while connected they are different. I will recognize the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, just so that the record is clear, I want to concur with the comments of the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader about the usual procedure.

• (1510)

I believe that the suggestion made by my hon. colleague, the House leader of the New Democratic Party, is worth pursuing at this time. However, the record should show very clearly that was the understanding which was reached yesterday by all three political parties.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member. The House has heard the hon. parliamentary secretary. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

FISHERIES

CLOSING OF ILLEGAL FISHERY ON NIMPKISH RIVER

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I seek unanimous consent to move a motion that would have the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans immediately close an illegal fishery that is occurring this day on the Nimpkish River on northern Vancouver Island.

Mr. Speaker: The House would have to give unanimous consent to that. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

PETITIONS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to rise today on behalf of a large number of British Columbians who petition this House concerning Bill C-91 which seeks to end the licensing of further no-name generic drugs at an additional cost of at least $1 billion a year to Canadians.

Since the price of both new and existing drugs has already increased substantially to individuals, provincial and private drug plans since 1987 when Bill C-22 allowed up to a 10-year period of no generic competition, the petitioners pray to this House not to proceed with Bill C-91 and repeal Bill C-22.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of people from the west coast of Canada. They draw to the attention of the House the fact that the United States has unfairly imposed a duty on our softwood lumber exports to that country, and has engaged in numerous other trade practices which amount to harassment of Canadian producers.

The petitioners also note that the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States has resulted in lost jobs and devastation to the Canadian economy while not providing the promised benefits.

The petitioners therefore call upon Parliament to request that the Prime Minister and the Minister for International Trade take any necessary action to defend the interests of the Canadian softwood lumber industry against the unfair duty. They also request that Parliament act immediately to effect the cancellation of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to file pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first petition points out that family-class and assisted-relatives historically have been an important part of Canadian immigration and that family-class and assisted-relatives have people in Canada to help them find employment, housing and learn Canadian customs and language.

The petitioners pray that the government undertake a change in policy direction that will give family-class and assisted-relatives first priority in immigration.

INDIA

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my second petition points out that 75 per cent of all services in the immigration office in New Delhi are from people seeking assistance from the Punjab. They point out that it is very difficult for people to travel from the Punjab to New Delhi.

The petitioners call upon the government to immediately open a new Canadian consular service in the Punjab to provide not only immigration services but services for visitors' visas.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and the privilege to present a petition on behalf of hundreds of Albertans, many of whom live in my riding in places like Sherwood Park, New Sarepta, Beaumont and South Cooking Lake.

The petitioners ask that Parliament review the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated Juvenile Delinquents Act with a lowered maximum age of 13 years.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have another petition today on the Court Challenges Program which, as we know, was abolished by this government.

The petitioners urge the government to restore this program, and as of yesterday they are supported by a report from the Commissioner of Official Languages which shows the significant achievements of the program and the effect that abolishing it has on linguistic minorities. The Commissioner of Official Languages and the signers of this petition recommend that the government find a way to make it easier for Canadians to defend their constitutional rights in court, because it is fundamental in a democracy to be able to go to court. Thousands of people like these have already signed this kind of petition. I therefore ask the government to act as soon as possible.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition signed by many hundreds of people from Winnipeg who join many hundreds of thousands of Canadians in their concern about Bill C-91, which is now being fought in committee.

These petitioners ask Parliament to not proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22, which was passed in 1987, so that Canadians will have the full benefit from lower priced generic drugs and so that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees and provide less coverage.

JUSTICE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise in this House once again to present more petitions regarding the murder of Nina de Villiers and containing suggestions by many of my constituents that the justice system in Canada be changed.

These petitioners believe that crimes of violence against the person are intolerable and that they are the most abhorrent crimes facing society. The petitioners are asking that sentencing in crimes of violence more appropriately reflect our society's abhorrence of violence in order to act as a true deterrent.

They also point out that too often the risk to society posed by the early release of a violent offender appears to be a secondary consideration to the rights of the individual criminal. These petitioners are from many communities in my riding and are added to the thousands of constituents who have already raised their voices on this important issue.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have a petition requesting that the goods and services tax on books and reading materials be removed. These petitioners point out that literacy is a cornerstone of a democratic society. It contributes to productivity and competitiveness, which are clearly objectives of Canada.

These petitioners ask that this tax on books be reviewed and, if at all possible, eliminated immediately.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would like to table a petition from people in Val-d'Or, Abitibi. The signers say that violent movies on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they incite violence.

They say that all toys that incite violent games are unacceptable and should not be made. They also say that the freedom of the press to report acts of violence should be limited and information on violent acts that is repeated too often on all television stations and on radio can incite others to commit the same acts of violence.

Therefore the petitioners humbly ask Parliament to legislate on the above-mentioned points to eliminate violence in our society in order to protect our children more and give all our fellow citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions from signatories throughout my riding presented in conjunction with a number of petitions throughout the province of British Columbia.

These petitioners are concerned about a project proposed by Multinational Resources which intends to dam a portion of the flow of the North Thompson River and divert that water into the California market.

The petitioners are concerned about the export of Canadian waters. They have urged the Government of Canada to state categorically that it will not permit our freshwater rivers to be dammed or diverted into the United States and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

JUSTICE

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition signed by more than 1,000 residents of Calgary in memory of Ryan Garrioch.

These petitioners draw the attention of Parliament to the following: That the majority of Canadians support equal treatment of criminal offenders but with legislative age shelters from criminal law for very young adolescents; that chapter 15 of the Charter of Rights guarantees the equality of rights.

Therefore your petitioners request that Parliament revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated Juvenile Delinquents Act with a lowered minimum age of 13 years.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition signed by hundreds of people from Nova Scotia to B.C., including many from my own riding. These people believe that we do not know enough about aboriginal cultures in this country and that we do not give enough recognition to their diversity and strength.

Therefore they are calling on Parliament to enact Bill C-268, an act respecting a national solidarity day for the First Nations of Canada. This would be a day of recognition of Canada's original inhabitants, a day on which to honour their native cultures. It would take place on June 21 of each year.

UKRAINE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by numerous residents of Kingston, one resident of Bath, Ontario, and one of Enterprise, Ontario. They are concerned about the widespread and very dangerous diphtheria epidemic which has occurred in Ukraine.

This medical crisis, compounded as it is by medical shortages and the risk of further economic difficulties in that country, is of great concern to them and to other people who have friends and relatives in that country. They call upon this House to adopt a resolution providing for immediate consultations with the public health authorities in Ukraine and with the Government of Ukraine to determine the best means by which Canada could most expeditiously provide diphtheria vaccinations and other necessary medical supplies to alleviate the crisis caused by this epidemic.

I would like to indicate that perhaps there could be some arrangement whereby such a resolution could be adopted by unanimous consent on motions tomorrow.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am honoured to submit a petition from people concerned about Canada's health care system and the assault that Bill C-91 is inflicting upon it.

They are also asking the government to not proceed with Bill C-91, which is now in committee, and to repeal Bill C-22, which was passed in 1987.

People are concerned about the costs of drugs and the increased cost passed on to the provinces. Canada's health care system is under assault and the signatories to this petition want it stopped.

TRADE

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to table a petition today from residents in different parts of Canada who are concerned about the impending legislation to implement the North American free trade agreement.

The evidence is in and growing daily that the North American free trade agreement does nothing to improve the trade situation between Canada and the United States. In particular for those communities dependent on lumber exports, issues like the softwood lumber tariff are hurting this country.

We do not need the North American free trade agreement and these Canadians agree with us.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I too wish to present a petition from a large number of individuals who complain about the government's introduction of Bill C-91, which is a bill to eliminate generic drugs and allow the brand name drug pedlars to exploit the people of Canada.

These citizens are absolutely outraged that the government would allow this kind of theft from senior citizens and low income Canadians to occur.

They also point out the possibility of the destruction of provincial pharma-care systems by this outrageous legislation.

TRADE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege, and indeed honour, to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from greater Kamloops. They point out their strong opposition to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and now to the Canada-U.S.-Mexico trade agreement.

They are concerned that it is going to result in major water transfers between Canada and the United States and northern Mexico as part of the North America water and power alliance program.

This now brings the total number of signatures received on this particular issue to well over 30,000.

POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, on another unrelated matter I would like to present a petition concerning what these petitioners see as the increasing sense of lawlessness in their communities. They believe that there is an increasing number of break and enter thefts, and an increasing number of petty crimes, violent crimes, and extremely serious crimes of all sorts.

They are asking the Canadian government to ensure that adequate funds are set aside to ensure proper policing of western Canadian communities.

JUSTICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): I would like to present another petition. The petitioners point out that crimes of violence against the person are intolerable and constitute the most abhorrent crime society faces.

They point out that the risk to society posed by the early release of a violent offender seems to be of secondary consideration to the rights of the individual criminal.

They are asking Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against a person are serious and abhorrent and that the government amend the Criminal Code of Canada and the Parole Act accordingly.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[Text]

Question No. 384—Mr. Peterson:

With respect to the Canadian Human Rights Commission, (a) what is the total number of cases tried by the Canadian Human Rights Commission since its inception (b) how many of these cases have been decided against the complainant (c) how many of these decisions against the complainant have been overturned on appeal?

Mr. Robert D. Nicholson (Parliamentary secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): (a) The Commission has considered 5,629 cases.

(b) There have been 1,398 cases dismissed and a further 578 "no further proceedings" decisions.

In general, dismissals coud be viewed as having been decided against the complainant as could a certain (unspecified) proportion of "no further proceedings" cases.

(c) Strictly speaking, none. If a complainant wins an appeal, the commission may be asked to reconsider the case but the decision is not overturned.

In the past three years, we estimate that approximately five cases per year were appealed after having been dismissed by the commission after the investigation was completed. Prior to 1989, there were even fewer appeals.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. Last week the hon. parliamentary secretary will recall that I had asked what progress had been made on Question No. 207, which basically asks how much money had been collected by the goods and services tax and how much would be applied to the deficit, the debt and what the start-up costs had been for the goods and services tax.

While the Auditor General's report is somewhat helpful with the latter I would very much look forward to receiving an answer to that question of December 1991.

The parliamentary secretary did say that he would pursue it personally. I am wondering what progress has been made.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I anticipated my hon. friend's question because I discovered to my chagrin that the material was not ready today when I had hoped it would be.

I made inquiries and I am confident that before another week is out we will have the material he is looking for.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, last Thursday my House leader requested information from the parliamentary secretary on the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act and he indicated that he would get back to the House. I wonder if he can report to the House on what is happening with the 30 required amendments for word changes between the French and the English text and on what date Canadians can expect the final promulgation and Royal Assent to that legislation.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the reminder from my hon. friend from Skeena. I can inform the House and the member that his inquiry and my follow-up have resulted in galvanic action taking place. He can be assured that what he is looking for will be accomplished in the very near future.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Motion for the Production of Papers No. P-17.

P-17—Mr. Milliken:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all expense accounts of all persons who travelled with the Prime Minister on his trip to Calgary on April 21 to 22, 1991.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, this motion is acceptable to the government, subject to the usual reservations concerning personal information, and the documents are tabled immediately.

I would ask that other Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the parliamentary secretary for the efforts that have resulted in this document being produced. I am very pleased and it looks to be a thorough report. We will see what has been excised.

I wonder if, while I am on my feet, I could ask another question. I am like his boss, the government House leader, who once he gets something always wants more. However, I do have another motion standing in my name dated June 3 on the Order Paper, which asks for a simple copy of some studies commissioned by the Department of National Defence in connection with the relocation of the military supply depot in Montreal.

I am wondering if, as a result of his diligent enquiries, he has brought forth any light as to when we might expect those reports.

Mr. Edwards: Unlike Oliver what my hon. friend has offered is not a new twist at all. He constantly wants more. I will with all diligence chase the material he is seeking.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining motions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

AN ACT TO DISSOLVE OR TERMINATE CERTAIN CORPORATIONS AND OTHER BODIES

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–63, an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think you will find that there is unanimous consent to the following:

That, in relation to Bill C–63, an act to terminate certain corporations and other bodies, the remainder of this sitting day should be allotted to report stage and one sitting day should be allotted to third reading stage of the bill;

That, if necessary, the debate at report stage shall continue tonight beyond the hour of daily adjournment, but no later than 9 a.m. on Thursday, November 26, 1992, until all questions necessary to dispose of the report stage of the said bill are disposed of, provided that no dilatory motion or quorum call shall be deemed receivable during the extended sitting, and that any requested division shall be deferred until 10 a.m., Thursday, November 26, 1992;

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order, on Thursday, November 26, 1992 the House shall proceed with the third reading stage of Bill C–63.

That, if necessary, the debate at the third reading stage shall continue beyond the hour of daily adjournment on Thursday, November 26, 1992, but no later than 10 a.m. on Friday, November 27, 1992, until all questions necessary to dispose of the third reading stage of the said bill are disposed of, provided that no dilatory motion or quorum calls shall be deemed receivable during the extended sitting, and if a recorded division is requested, it shall be deferred until 6 p.m., Monday, November 30, 1992.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, the parliamentary secretary is correct. There have been some discussions among the House leaders and their representatives with regard to this particular motion and the debate on Bill C–63. It is likely we will not run all that late this evening, but there are a number of speakers from all parties who wish to participate, both at report stage as well as on third reading. I give the official consent of the Liberal Party.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I too want to concur that there have been discussions. I want to make two points. One is that we do have a number of speakers but I too do not anticipate that we will be sitting that late.

I do want to take this opportunity to express my appreciation to my hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, for the degree of consultation that occurred to make this possible this afternoon. It is that kind of co-operation which makes this House of Commons very productive.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): I would like to add that we were also consulted or at least informed, and that we agree with this proposal.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I understand that there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Motion agreed to.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-63 be amended in Clause 1 by adding immediately after line 16 at page 1, the following:

"(3) The Minister of Employment and Immigration shall

(a) identify property, including intellectual property, data bases, models or library materials, that were created or acquired by the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council in the fulfilment of its mandate and that have a capital or commercial value; and

(b) transfer that property, with or without valuable consideration, to a federal, provincial or non-governmental body to be used to pursue that body's mandate."

He said: Madam Speaker, I congratulate you on your grouping of the motions for debate. There is a certain mathematical symmetry in how the motions have been grouped now. That will probably make it easier for us here in the House. But mathematical symmetry is not what we are dealing with in this government bill this afternoon.

The particular motion we are dealing with identifies what I believe is a gap in the government's treatment of the way in which agencies and Crown corporations are dissolved and dispensed with, privatized. It is not immediately apparent why the government has failed to give attention to this.

One could accept that over the last dozen years or so there has been some initiative to reduce the size of government and make it more efficient, to privatize areas of activity that are perhaps more appropriately dealt with in the private sector and the business sector.

In developing the field, the lexicon and the procedure of privatization and dissolution, I am not so sure we have it right yet.

The amendments take note of the fact that there will likely have been—I would be very shocked if it had not occurred—a development within the agency, here the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, of a certain amount of knowledge and expertise. Some may call it intellectual property, which was often referred to in the committee hearings, but computer-stored data and information, all of which was relevant to the original existing mandate of the agency. When the agency was about to be dissolved, no one gave much thought to the value, if any, of the accumulated expertise, intellectual property, data bases, and information libraries of the particular agency.

What often happens in the private sector when a business goes down is that the ownership interest departs, locks the doors—maybe they do not even lock the doors. Suddenly, the scavengers, the vultures, the auctioneers and those who work in the field of bankruptcy swoop down, scoop up and take away. They sell the stuff for the best price they can get, but it is often at a fraction of the original market value of these things.

In this particular case the government is dissolving an agency that it feels no longer can serve a good public policy purpose. While some of our colleagues opposite are convinced that it can no longer fill the purpose and that other agencies can, the government is going to proceed. I believe the government has not taken account of just what assets there were in this category and how the government proposes to protect them. Certainly we would not want to see them destroyed.

I want to point out in this particular case, as I will point out in relation to some of these other agencies as we debate this bill today and tomorrow, we must take note of the stark reality that the government has already dissolved and liquidated the agency.

There is something that does not ring quite right about that. I had an assistant attempt to locate these agencies on the map, by telephone, by fax machine, and we have come up with precious little. I am puzzled when the law clearly requires a statute of this House to dissolve and liquidate an agency like this how it is that the agency, as I speak now, has already disappeared off the map.

As we make what I believe to be a constructive proposal here in disposal of the assets, maybe it is all for naught. Maybe the government has gone ahead of its authority to do so and dissolved the agency and liquidated it. Maybe what we are doing in this House just does not matter any more. I feel I have to note whether what the government has done or not done is legal or illegal.

In any event, the debate on this must be here if for no other reason than to lay constructive groundwork for dissolutions and privatizations in the year to come because undoubtedly there will be some no matter what government is in power. When we do it, we want to do it right.

To recap, this particular amendment would require, by statute—not just by policy or by someone's good judgment in the department—that the minister responsible for the agency identifies property including intellectual property, data bases, models, library materials, et cetera, that were required and developed in the course of the agency's mandate. The minister will protect them, keep them together and transfer them to a successor agency or the ministry involved. In that way they would be protected as an asset and would continue to serve the public in the domain for which they were originally created.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I would like to speak just briefly to this particular section.

I echo the words of my colleague with respect to the divisions that have been made concerning the remaining motions. With respect to this particular agency however, the Canadian Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, the position that we took in committee and here in the House on second reading was that it did seem to us that this was an agency which could be replaced. Its work was in fact being done by other agencies within the government and it therefore was not serving a function for which the money contributed by taxpayers represented a valuable contribution and a valuable return to those taxpayers.

For that reason, it seems to us that to transfer the property associated with the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council to other federal, provincial or non-governmental bodies is questionable.

I look, for instance, at something like the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre. It seems to me that they are handling much of the work which the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council was looking at. To continue therefore with this particular council's activities would represent, in our view, a waste of taxpayers' resources at a time when those taxpayers' resources need to be marshalled as carefully as possible to achieve the wider social and political objectives that we have in our economy.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak on this motion concerning Bill C-63. This motion talks about the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, which was created in 1977 to advise the Minister of Employment and Immigration of the time about the department's policies and programs.

You will understand that since 1977, this function has been replaced with a much broader consultation structure in the Canadian Labour Force Development Board. The council costs the federal government $200,000 a year. The government decided that the Department of Employment and Immigration, with what is now in place, no longer specifically needed the council and that is why it is being abolished. This will save Canadian taxpayers $200,000 a year. I think that is important.

Madam Speaker, you must understand that legally, the boards and commissions mentioned in Bill C–63 continue to exist, as legal entities, but they no longer have any money to spend. Therefore they no longer cost the federal government anything. That is what you must understand: the board still exists as a legal entity and there is no reason to believe, as my colleague would suggest, that Parliament has acted illegally by ending these boards before Parliament has decided the issue, because they continue to exist, legally.

As for all the assets and property of the various boards and commissions to be discussed this afternoon, a plan was submitted to Treasury Board which approved the liquidation or transfer of these various goods and services to already existing federal agencies or departments. All the intellectual property, as mentioned in the motion, and other assets are already transferred to some department or other. In the case ot the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, it is transferred to the department; in the other case, it will be transferred to the National Library, the National Archives, et cetera. Everything is being done to ensure that all the data and other resources in these various boards and commissions remain for the needs of the Canadian government and at the same time Canadian taxpayers can save money by closing and abolishing some councils.

This is how it has to be looked at. In closing, let me point out that since all that is now in place and Treasury Board has already made the necessary arrangements, I think that many of the motions before us are not applicable since the work they ask us to do has already been done.

Therefore I hope that Bill C–63 will be passed as soon as possible.

He said: Madam Speaker, this particular piece of legislation carries through the government's intention of eliminating a number of important institutions and agencies which have provided valuable assistance to Canadian policymakers and valuable ideas to the Canadian public in the period since they were variously established.

The particular set of amendments we are dealing with at the moment attempts to restore to the legislation and therefore to restore to life the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security.

We heard testimony about a great many of these institutions as we went through this bill in committee earlier this year. Frankly, the case for some of the institutions, as I suggested with the Advisory Committee on Employment and Immigration, was not strong. However, the case for this particular institution was especially strong. This is partly because this was one of the most recent institutions to be established. It was established by legislation in 1983. This was an institution which reflected and represented, to the Canadian public and to policymakers in the government, some of the newer thinking in foreign policy debate and consideration throughout the world. It was not an institution which reflected the old-style belief that that you could somehow maintain peace through massive arms build-ups and through the philosophy of the deterrence. It was not, on the other hand, an institution which took the polar opposite position of saying that the solution is complete disarmament.

Instead, this was an institution which sought through collective co-operation and collective security to establish a new approach to our thinking about international affairs. It was an institution which operated very successfully and at a very limited cost to the federal government. A measure of its success is the tremendous list of names of people who were in touch with the legislative committee that looked at this piece of legislation. They tried to persuade the committee that this was at least one institution that should be maintained because of innovative approach, its thoughtfulness and its excellent leadership.

I could go through the many names of Canadians who wrote to the committee. It is perhaps even more interesting to recognize the international reputation which CIIPS, as the Canadian Institute of International Peace and Security came to be called, had managed to establish throughout the world.

We received letters and representations to maintain this institution from the Brookings Institution in the United States, ABC News in the United States, the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, the Congressional Research Service, various representatives from the faculty of Harvard University, the Centre for Science and International Affairs at Harvard University, Princeton University's Department of Psychology, the United Nations Development Program, the U.S. Institute for Peace, and the University of Michigan. Outside the United States we received representations from a great many Canadian institutions and from a great many international institutions.

Some of those international institutions that were in touch with the committee included the University of Southampton in the U.K., Western Australian Health Promotion Foundation, the Asian Peace Research Institution, the German Society for Foreign Affairs, the National Institute for Research Advancement in Japan, SIPRI in Sweden—which is one of the foremost institutions dealing with international peace, and the United Nations Institute for Disarmament Research. I could list a vast number of institutions.

The arguments which many of them put forward are perhaps best summarized in a letter which I have received from the Department of Political Science at the University of Windsor in my own home area. Let me just read this into the record if I could: "We are shocked and dismayed," the writers of this letter indicate, "by the government's announced intention of disbanding the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security. If Canada is to have an effective voice in this time of new alignments and unexpected problems on the world scene it can only be based on independent research of high quality done from a Canadian perspective".

The writers of the letter went on to say: "The Department of External Affairs by its nature is not well equipped to do research designed to find innovative solutions to unprecedented problems. We would therefore urge your committee to oppose rescinding the existing legislation which created CIIPS and to urge the government to provide it with funding as the legislation provides".

I would like to quote from the institute's original act: "Increase knowledge and understanding of the issues relating to international peace and security from a Canadian perspective with particular emphasis on arms control, disarmament, defence and conflict resolution".

In pursuit of that to: "(a) foster, fund and conduct research on matters relating to international peace and security; (b) promote scholarship in matters relating to international peace and security; (c) study and propose ideas and policies for the enhancement of international peace and security; and (d) collect and disseminate information on and encourage public discussion of issues of international peace and security".

It is especially important in our changing international context that we have an institute that can create the possibility of promoting discussion and debate among the public about international peace and security. It is especially important that we have new approaches to collective international security being discussed, studied and debated in this country.

It is especially important that we in Canada have new approaches to some of the age old questions that our Department of External Affairs has looked at. It is especially important that we bring into this debate and permit to contribute to this debate some of the younger scholars, some of the newer approaches, and some of the more innovative institutions throughout our country. That is what CIIPS did. It reached out to new people, it reached out to new ways of thinking, and it reached out to the public in a way, frankly, that the Department of External Affairs does not do.

This was a valuable institution. It was an institution led by people who, when they talked to the committee, were most impressive in terms of their concern about getting value for the money for the taxpayers of Canada.

I regret very much that the government has chosen to wind up this institution. I therefore urge the House to support this series of amendments by taking out of this bill the points dealing with the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security. That would see to it that CIIPS would continue as an institution able to give good service to the people of this country.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, in speaking to this series of amendments that the member from Essex has put forward, which are similar to those which I introduced, I would like members for a moment to think about what they saw on the news last evening or what they read in their papers this morning: major questions about our peacekeepers in Bosnia-Hercegovina; negotiations about a new agricultural agreement, an international arrangement for rationalizing our farm products; problems dealing with the environment that affect the supply of our cod stock off the Newfoundland coast; and the deposit of Soviet nuclear waste in the Arctic Ocean which will immediately spread into our own arena.

I mention only a very small sample of issues to prove an obvious point, which is that no such thing as domestic politics is left in Canada. In effect, we are all internationalized. Our jobs, our security, our well-being, and our welfare are all very dependent on and very conditioned by what happens in the world around us. We do not live in a fire-proof house.

What is essential for responding to this incredible turbulence and jungle of developments is that Canadians be informed, understand, and have knowledge so that they can make proper judgments about where this country will go and the kinds of stands we should take in responding to this multitude of global requirements and needs.

In a column that appeared in the Toronto Star this week by Carol Goar, in which the external affairs minister was defending her record as a minister against attacks that had been levelled in that column the week before, the minister said that people do not get enough information about Canada's activities around the world to make reasoned judgments. She went on to say that one of the primary requirements under her ministry would be to ensure a much broader based level of information and a more open discussion and debate about our options and choices.

It comes as some surprise that we arrive in the House of Commons on a Wednesday afternoon to find out that after the minister had made this proper assertion of the need for debate, information and understanding we now have a bill in front of us which will exterminate the most significant agency in the country providing that information, that debate and that understanding. It would be an understatement to call it a total contradiction.

The Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security was established in 1983 as an outgrowth of the then Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau's world peace initiative. However, it is important to recognize that it was supported by all sides of the House. All parties in the House supported it because they understood that we needed the kind of institution that would have an independent base of operation to develop ideas, to disseminate information, and to participate in and create a marketplace of ideas.

Far be it from me to lecture members opposite about the marketplace. They are the experts on it. However, surely if they believe in the free marketplace of the economy they should believe in the free marketplace of ideas which means that a product must be generated to create a free exchange.

Yet what are they doing? They are exterminating, cancelling, and shutting down the source of these ideas in the crucial area of our international arena. I refrain from using the word "international" because that creates barriers in peoples' minds so that they say that the real gutsy things to talk about are what is happening here on the domestic level. However, as I tried to say earlier, there is no distinction between what is happening in the world around us and what happens here. Just ask the fishermen in Newfoundland, the grain farmers of western Canada, or the steel workers in Hamilton about how what has happened internationally has affected their own livelihood.

We are told this is a cost-saving measure. In fact, it is not a cost-saving measure because most of the budget of CIIPS has been transferred to the Department of External Affairs. That is what we were told.

The minister made announcements this summer that the Department of External Affairs would set up scholarship programs, and a new program of co-operative competitions to start research.

There is a difference, a very significant difference. The decision as to what those areas of research and debate will be are now going to be controlled by the Department of External Affairs. It will make the decisions on what is done. There will not be a free marketplace of ideas, and scholars will not be encouraged to search out new thinking but more to act as a rubber stamp for government policy.

We do not get innovation by simply trying to respond to the status quo. We do not get debate and new ideas by simply echoing official lines set out by the department.

Perhaps more tragic is the total cancellation of some of the most experimental and innovative work that CIIPS is doing. Let us return to the comment by the Secretary of State for External Affairs: "People do not get enough information about Canada's activities around the world to make reasoned judgments".

What was CIIPS doing? First it had a school program that supplied materials, speakers, lecture notes, videotapes, and other forms of information to the schools of Canada, to the young people of Canada, those who will have to live most directly with the impact of international events.

That has disappeared, I guess on the assumption that it does not help our young people to understand the world around us. Therefore the primary source of material to educate young people in our schools about world development has been shut down, cancelled.

More interesting is that CIIPS had just begun a joint project with the CBC and Radio Canada to develop televised programs on our national television networks discussing a series of problems on peacekeeping, environmental problems, global warming, security issues, and economic rearrangement. That would allow a two-way dialogue which Canadians could watch on their TV screens. It would provide an exposition of these problems. There would be a system through which various schools and universities could act as a means of providing a forum in which feedback could be received by members of Parliament and government.

An interesting exercise in public education on a massive scale using new technology is wiped out, disappeared, and gone. How can the Secretary of State for External Affairs, with any shred of integrity, any scintilla of honesty, state in a column in the Toronto Star that we need more information, more reasoned judgment, more debate and more dialogue when she is one of the authors of this bill eliminating the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, which had a mandate to provide the very same thing?

I do not use the word lightly, but hypocrisy immediately comes to my lips when I think of what the minister said in this statement and what the government is doing by eliminating this program.

The minister cannot with any degree of honesty make these kinds of statements about the need for informed and reasoned public information and dialogue and at the same time be a member of a government that is cancelling, eliminating, and exterminating the primary agency that supplied it.

Even if external affairs itself said: "Well, trust us. We have no politicized agenda", the fact of the matter is that the department has already received a number of budget hits from the finance minister, the latest one last week of 2 per cent. What will be left of its so-called research information program?

If we are to believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if her own members are to believe her, then we and they have no option but to vote for these amendments and stop the cancellation of the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, following the sterling remarks of my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre on the dissolution of the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security I would like to make three short points.

The first concerns my perception that the government has acted prematurely to dissolve, liquidate and kill the agency before it had the authority to do so from Parliament. Someone on my staff today tried to reach CIIPS and eventually got through to someone. They were told that apparently all the employees, with the exception of five board members, were laid off and given severance packages between June and July of this year. The person on the phone indicated that the only reason the phone lines were still open was because of a legal opinion that the operation must continue until the legislation had been approved by Parliament.

What is the government doing? It seems the right hand does not know what the left hand is doing. If the minister was here I would want to ask the minister—I am sorry, we are not supposed to comment on the presence or absence of the minister who does not have to be here now. However, in the event the opportunity arises to ask the question I would want to ask what the heck the government is doing dissolving, liquidating, firing and severing when the agency has apparently received a legal opinion that the government should not be doing this until it had authority from Parliament? The government does not have authority from Parliament. That is why we are here today.

I just wanted to make that point as clearly as I could.

My next point concerns Motion No. 7, which is being grouped for debate in this grouping. That motion deals with the protection of the assets of the agency upon the dissolution or winding up of the agency to ensure that the assets are protected, kept intact and moved to another agency or another non-government agency, or at least some body, that could make use of the accumulated expertise of the agency that is being dissolved.

I note that in this particular case the library collection of this agency, which was extensive and valuable and noted at committee as being unique in Canada, I believe, has been transferred to the Canadian Forces Command and Staff College in Toronto.

I acknowledge that. It is exactly the kind of thing that the amendment had in mind.

Second, some of the program has been transferred to a new program which apparently has an annual budget of $2.1 million. This flies in the face of the purported cost-saving motive of the government in dissolving this agency.

Even though it transferred the assets and kept intact this valuable library which all Canadians own, I want to point out that there was never anything in the statute that required it to do that. I think that that kind of a direction should be in the statute when the agency is dissolved. That is why the amendment is there. The government has done it in any event, in relation to the library. We do not know what other assets may have been lost in the move, shall I say. I hope nothing has been lost, squandered or destroyed in the move.

The amendment is there. It should have been there on day one and I think it should be there for every agency dissolution. I wanted to make that point as well.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to pick up on the comments that my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre made.

First, I consider it totally incomprehensible that the government would dissolve an institute like the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security. Even though there are many Canadians in this country who are suffering and even though we are in deep economic pain, there would not be too many Canadians who would really support the dissolution of this if they really knew the full extent of the service that this organization provided.

My colleague talked about the school programs on world development that the institute has been providing and was continuing to expand. I can recall periods of time when this particular institute would supply speakers for town hall meetings. Sometimes there would be organizations or conferences that would not want a speaker who was advocating any particular partisan point of view. That was one of the unique things about this organization. It was perceived as an independent thinking operation. It was an independent service. With all the concerns and lack of trust in terms of partisan politics today, it seems that to destroy an organization that has such a fine reputation is not good logic.

I want to pick up on this issue of the library. Madam Speaker, I appeal through you to the government that this library that the institute has built up over a number of years is a very valued asset. Even though I am from Toronto and we all fight for our constituents and our communities, I think it is a mistake that that library goes to the Military Staff College in Toronto. That library should be here, somehow connected to our own library. I would be deathly afraid if one day I saw that library on the Crown assets list of DSS.

There is no guarantee that it could not happen. Obviously the government will use its force to ram through this legislation. I wish there would be some kind of a directive given that the Department of National Defence might find themselves running short of space one day and not realize the full extent and the value of this treasure that has been built up over many, many years.

I regret that in the excuse of debt reduction that we are cancelling this agency. It is a sad day. We obviously are appealing here in the last hours for the government to reconsider and all we can do is hope.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would like to respond to some comments made by hon. members opposite.

First of all, it should be understood that in his February budget, the Minister of Finance announced that certain councils and committees would be dissolved. He said this would be done in June. Administratively speaking, starting in June, the operations of these committees, councils and agencies were reduced to a minimum.

The official termination, however, will not take effect until the bill before the House today is passed. In other words, the process reflects due respect for the Parliament of Canada but also an understanding of the financial problems of the government and the responsibility this government has to Canadians.

Perhaps I may say a few words about the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, which was established in 1984 to increase knowledge and understanding from the perspective of arms control, disarmament, and other aspects of international peace and security. The institute also has a research role.

When preparing for the February budget, the Minister of Finance and the government realized it was more economical to ask the Department of External Affairs to do the work currently being done by the CIIPS. When I say more economical, I am talking about a savings of $2.5 million annually. It will cost the government $2.5 million less annually, because instead of having the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, we will have officials within the Department of External Affairs doing the same job.

The February budget did not raise taxes. It did, however, announce cutbacks. What we are talking about this afternoon are those cutbacks. They are an important part of our fight against the deficit and our constant struggle to stop Canada from getting deeper into debt. The opposition will probably say that $2.5 million annually is peanuts for the federal government. That may be. However, if every time a $2.5 million cut is feasible, and we do not cut, by the end of the day it all adds up.

All the files and assets of the institute have been transferred to the Department of External Affairs. For instance, the institute has transferred its library to the staff training college in Toronto, with the appropriate funding, so that external affairs officials can take over this responsibility.

It is important to realize that the work done by the institute will be carried on, but at lower cost, within the department. That is the message we must get across to our colleagues opposite.

Again, I think this bill should be passed as soon as possible to put the legal seal of approval on these administrative changes. Since by the end of June, these committees and institutes had practically wound up their activities.

[English]

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I will defer to my hon. colleague for Windsor—St. Clair with your kind indulgence.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, I had not really expected that I would be involved in this part of the debate. However, if the hon. parliamentary secretary represents the view of government, then we have stupidity compounded by innumeracy. He has tried to convince this House by standing up on this debate—which he recognizes is on television—that the expenditure of $2.5 million and the cancellation of that expenditure represents a part of the government's attempt to economize on this expenditure to a significant degree. He maintains that this fight against the deficit makes necessary the elimination of the Institute for International Peace and Security.

He says at the same time that the bureaucrats in External Affairs are going to do the job.

I say innumeracy because even the parliamentary secretary and this government ought to know that this government spills more money in taking polls than the cost of this. It spilled more money than this in its prosperity initiative charade. It spent far more than this in sending propaganda to Windsor alone on NAFTA. He has the audacity, the nerve, if not the stupidity, to believe that the country and the electorate believe that we are to take him seriously when he says that we have to save $2.5 million on an institution that is studying peace and security in a world that is constantly threatened by insecurity and division and the prospect of war that has been accounted for by those who have preceded me in this debate.

It is absolutely outrageous that we have to be subjected to this kind of argument, that could do nothing but reflect upon the government in the worst way possible. That is the way in which it ought to be reflected because it is perhaps the worst government that this country has ever seen. To listen to this particular example of a misleading and stupid argument is something that the population should not be subjected to for very much longer. I just wanted to put that intervention on record.

To suggest that external affairs is a place where we are going to get independent judgment, where people are going to obtain information, is to belie the very character of the bureaucracy. The studies occurring at external affairs have one purpose and one purpose only. They are to reflect the policies of a government that, in the absence of this kind of institution, is not going to be subject to the kind of critical judgment, examination and research that ought to be available to it and to the people of Canada. What this government does in external affairs can be critically analysed and rejected or accepted depending upon its inherent merits and not the propaganda that is now going to be substituted for the institute that we are now abandoning.

If I sound angry, I hope it communicates to you, Madam Speaker, and to the government that I am not the only angry one about the garbage we hear in this House meant to justify the garbage that the government does.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I would like to commend to the House, at the risk of appearing boring by comparison, a question of perspective, because that really is what is before the House. As the hon. parliamentary secretary said, it is the intention of the government that the tasks previously discharged by the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security will now be undertaken and discharged by the bureaucrats of the Department of External Affairs.

I have nothing against the bureaucrats of the Department of External Affairs. I am certain that they are wonderfully competent, dedicated, well-trained, intelligent and well-motivated people. They are the products and exponents of a system of diplomacy and international relations that has just about come to the end of its tether.

• (1720)

The days in which we could find our security and the world's peace in a system of counterbalancing alliances netting the globe have passed. They have passed for a number of reasons but they have most certainly passed.

We are entered in an extremely perilous time on this planet, a time in which the extremes of wealth and poverty have never been greater and a time in which those who are caught in the extremes of poverty have never had greater access to the representation of wealth in which people like us live.

This is a recipe for the most violent and protracted forms of planetary social confrontation. It is these extremes more than any other factor, augmented it is true by climatic catastrophes and gradual changes but rooted in the maldistribution of wealth on our planet, which constitute the greatest threat to our security and the planet's peace, to the degree the planet can be said to know peace at any time this century.

What is required to meet these new challenges, especially for a comparatively wealthy middle power like Canada, is a complete rethinking of the precepts on which we base our international relations. With all due respect and compliments to the bureaucrats of the Department of External Affairs, they are singularly ill placed, not ill equipped, to undertake that absolutely vital ongoing reconsideration.

That being the case, it is simple good sense for the Canadian government on behalf of the Canadian people to create institutions which can foster, promote and disseminate that reconsideration.

The Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security was one such body, a very important body, in fact in these regards probably the pre-eminent body in the country. That was recognized at its establishment in 1983 when it was given, as I understand at the time, unanimous support of this Chamber. That was a prescient move on the part of this Parliament at that time in the early 1980s. It is unfortunately an extremely blind move that is being contemplated by this Parliament now as it contemplates the eradication of the institute.

I would only ask members present and those who may be brought in for the vote to consider very carefully the needs that we have in a changed world, the requirement placed upon us as a comparatively wealthy society to use in part our wealth to find the means to foster peace and security around the planet. If we do not find those means they will not be found and the consequences will be dire indeed.

Motion No. 40.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 23.

He said: Madam Speaker, this set of amendments tries to overturn the government's intention to eliminate the Economic Council of Canada.

The Economic Council of Canada had a proposed budget of about $10.3 million for this year. It had 118 full-time people working for it. It also had a council of 28 members, three of them full time and 25 part time.

It is striking that the House of Commons in this session before Christmas was said by the Prime Minister to be focusing especially on the economy of this country. We dealt with the divisive, difficult question of constitutional reform. It was rejected by the people, and the Prime Minister said that we would concentrate on the economy.

What is the very first legislation that in fact deals with the economy? It is of legislation which does away with the independent body designed to provide advice to governments and to the people on what we should do about the economy.

One would think that any sensible government, any sensible Prime Minister, any Prime Minister who had thought things through at least a little, would have recognized that to get such independent advice not just from the professional researchers at the Economic Council but from business people, labour representatives and representatives of different social groups making up the council membership itself would have been absolutely paramount in the concerns of that Prime Minister.

What do we find instead? We find that the government is doing away with the Economic Council. Why? It is not to save money as the government will claim. There will be a speech made that it is to save money. In point of fact, as I can demonstrate and may do if I have enough time, there will not be any savings of money whatsoever in this fiscal year and very little in future fiscal years from doing away with the Economic Council of Canada, because every task the Economic Council is putting into effect and has been putting into effect will continue.

There has been a whole transfer of the projects of the Economic Council to a new institute at Queen's University for which, guess what, the Government of Canada is paying. It is not to save money. It is because the government could not face the fact of receiving independent criticism from the Economic Council. It could not face the fact that an independent group of business people, of economists and of labour people would actually say that the government was wrong, as this council has said consistently as this government has put us further and further into an economic mess in the past three years.

That is why this council is being eliminated. It is a question of shooting the messenger because the government did not like the message. That is what is at issue here.

The reality is that the institution has done and is doing excellent work. It has done work on health care, how to develop a more efficient, economically effective method of dealing with our health care problems, one of the crucial issues faced by every provincial government and this federal government. Yet the government is doing away with the institution.

It is an institution which is tracking Canadian poverty. Perhaps that is something that made the government angry at the institution. The Economic Council showed in its studies that poverty was increasing under the government. Maybe that was the mistake. Maybe it was the mistake that this council committed when it said that the high interest rate policies of the government and the high value of the Canadian dollar were causing the tremendous increase in unemployment. Maybe that was the reason.

It could not have been because the Economic Council was wrong about free trade. Mark my words, the Economic Council was wrong about free trade. It predicted that in the first five years of free trade there would be hundreds of thousands of new jobs. We have seen in the first four years of free trade a loss of something close to 500,000 jobs in this country.

The government refuses to admit that. The government refuses to criticize free trade. The government refuses to change its mind about free trade. It cannot be that the Economic Council was wrong about that subject which disturbs the government. In fact the government used to quote the Economic Council day after day in the last election campaign because it liked the message then. It liked the message because it seemed to be something that was supportive of what the government was trying to promote.

I want to leave the people of this country as they watch this debate with two quotations and a final set of realities. The first quotation is from the president of the now defunct Economic Council when he spoke to our committee. The president said, summing up what would happen with the elimination of this council: "We are losing our capacity to build our knowledge of Canadian society by testing theories against Canadian data".

I also want to quote from an independent research institute which makes its money not from government but independently. The president of Informetrica said: "The council is indispensable for its ability to assign teams of economists to big projects. University researchers and private sector firms cannot mount the long-term, large-scale projects the council undertook". That is what we are losing.

However, I have to admit that I thought in the past when we first heard the debate around eliminating the Economic Council that maybe the government actually did believe it was going to save some money, no matter how little, and it justified eliminating this independent voice which would help us reform, change and improve our economic policy. I thought the government might actually have been telling the truth.

What emerged from the government was the prosperity report inventing our future. It was called "An Action Plan for Canada's Prosperity". The action consisted of recommending the establishment, believe it or not, of not just an economic council, but six new economic and social institutions which would fill exactly the same roles as the Economic Council.

I conclude by listing these because what is being suggested is staggering. We will get rid of the Economic Council and replace it with a national quality institute, a centre for excellence for sustainable development, a Canadian forum on learning, a federal-provincial body which is supposed to examine economic prospects and propose fiscal stances, another federal-provincial body, and finally a prosperity council. How is this prosperity council to be formed? In exactly the same way as the Economic Council of Canada was formed.

This government is trying to hoodwink Canadians. It is trying to get rid of the Economic Council. It is trying to replace it with far more expensive institutions which will simply parrot the government's line as opposed to the independent advice which the Economic Council has provided this country so valuably in the past.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, may I say first of all that for once I agree almost entirely with what my colleague from Essex-Windsor has said in his comments on the Economic Council of Canada.

The hon. member and I served together for a long time on the finance committee and received many submissions from the Economic Council of Canada. There were many appearances by the chairman of the council as well as members of the council before us to discuss a variety of issues.

It causes me some sadness to be participating in a debate about the demise of the Economic Council of Canada. I suppose the situation in which the government finds itself, having again failed to estimate properly its revenues for the current year, running a deficit which is going to be somewhere in the order of $35 billion after having estimated something less than $28 billion in their budget last year; in other words, having achieved a deficit that exceeds the prediction by something close to 30 per cent, is unsettling.

I understand why it may say it needs to save money, but as the member for Essex—Windsor has just pointed out, in fact the effort here is not one to save expense. If it were a matter of saving expense, many of the other initiatives introduced by the government in order to talk economic policy would not have been on the table. We would not have just spent a pile of money on something called a prosperity initiative study which has produced yet another volume of reports and information which is entirely redundant, together with what was already produced. That, as my friend reminds me, was on untendered contracts.

My purpose in speaking is really to say that the Economic Council of Canada is an institution for which Canadians should have a large degree of pride. I would like to point out the work that has been performed by the council before the announcement was made.

The council was preparing, at the time the budget was released, an important study on education in Canada. That report was issued shortly after the budget, a study called A Lot to Learn: Education and Training in Canada.

Canadians should be aware of this work because not only does it have a great deal to say to us about where we are and where we should be going, but it is an indication of the valuable work that a body such as the Economic Council of Canada can perform.

As we all know, education lies within provincial jurisdiction. We also know that we as Canadians cannot stand by impervious to what is happening outside our borders. We must begin to find ways to equip our people to deal with the competition that we face and the production of goods and services not only in the United States and Mexico, but in Europe, in Japan and increasingly in the developing world.

Again and again we discover that it is in our ability to equip our most important resource, the human resource, that we need to focus attention. If we fail to prepare our people for the global competition in which our nation is engaged, we will fail to maintain the standard of living that our people have every right to hope for and to expect and we will fail to perform our role as a developed and resource rich country in aiding in the alleviation of poverty elsewhere in the world.

The council's study discovered, among other things, that 30 per cent of Canadian adults who have completed their secondary education have difficulty reading and try to avoid situations that require reading. Thirty-six per cent of adults in the same group cannot perform simple sequences of numerical operations that would enable them to meet most everyday demands. I am quoting from the report A Lot to Learn: Education and Training in Canada.

From the same report are results for science and mathematics, which can be summarized as follows: At age 10, Canadian children compare favourably with those in most industrialized countries. By age 13 or 14, Canada's relative position deteriorates somewhat, though evidence on this is somewhat mixed. By the end of secondary school, Canada's achievement is weak when adjusted per years of schooling, retention rates and freedom of subject choice. The result is particularly pronounced in science but it seems to hold for mathematics as well.

This information is of crucial importance to Canadians in determining how we face the challenges of the future. This is the work produced this year by the Economic Council of Canada. It is able to do this on a budget which is not overly generous because of a broad mandate to study issues related to the economic welfare of Canada.

An existing institution such as this can be redirected, retooled, re-equipped far more effectively, efficiently and with less waste of money than the government has engaged in by disbanding the existing organization and trying to redirect the finances into other efforts that are primarily intended for show rather than for the product they will produce.

I would like to cite another 1992 report. It is again by the Economic Council of Canada: The New Face of Poverty: Income Security Needs of Canadian Families.

I cite these two as examples of the breadth of work that has been undertaken by this important council. I am sure people hearing of the disbanding of the Economic Council of Canada have given it very little thought other than to think, well good, perhaps government is cutting back, saving a few dollars here and there.

It is crucial that government have this information. However, it is unusual that an independent agency funded by the Government of Canada can say this, the opening words of the foreword. "The war against poverty stalled in the 1980s".

How important is it that an agency be able to make that statement in the face of the rhetoric that we hear on a regular basis from the other side of the House of Commons? We have been told since this government was elected that poverty has declined when in fact, according to the council, the war on poverty stalled in 1980s.

This is the kind of critical analysis that it is crucial for us to have in order to be able to make the proper policy judgments that are needed as we move through this decade.

The projects, the papers, the work that was ongoing are enormous. This is a council that was extremely productive. Publications alone from 1989 to 1991 include three annual reviews; four council statements on reports, one on Globalization and Canada's Financial Markets in 1989; Good Jobs, Bad Jobs: Employment in the Service Sector in 1990; From the Bottom Up: The Community Economic Development Approach in 1990; New Faces in the Crowd: Economic and Social Impacts of Immigration in 1991.

Research reports; Globalization and Canada's Financial Markets, 1990; Employment in the Service Economy, in 1991; Economic and Social Impacts of Immigration, in 1991; Conference Proceedings, two of those.

Monographs; three on labour markets, two on agriculture, five on other topics. A discussion paper on the proposals to reform the Bankruptcy Act. A list of working papers and an annual publication: Au Courant which contained discussions of many other topics. This was a very well-spent dollar by the Government of Canada. Its loss will be felt and will be noted because we will be deprived of valuable, independent and useful advice, advice that can be replaced at a cost, advice that is not always something that the government or the opposition agrees with, but advice that has been useful and that has ensured that the level of debate has been vibrant and has been worth while.

I think the notion, and I conclude on this, that private sector agencies can provide all of this commentary is one that is particularly misleading. Most of the private sector research is funded for a purpose in order to determine certain results.

What we have with the Economic Council of Canada is the ability to mandate an agency to provide what is truly independent advice on subjects of importance in the economy. That advice, I suggest, has not only been valuable but is essential in a democratic environment such as ours.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I was wondering if the member realizes that the whole question of the Economic Council and its validity was explored by the finance committee in 1984 and explored by the finance committee every year after then as it came to the finance committee to study its estimates.

Does the member also understand that when talking of councils, this council does cost or did cost the country about $9 million? The real issue is whether you can get the same advice from people who work for the Department of Finance, the Bank of Canada, the C.D. Howe Institute, the Conference Board, the Niagara Institute, the Fraser Institute and away you go one after another, with every bank having its own economist.

Surely the member would realize that another Government of Canada institute is always suspect. He will know that when the free trade agreement was entered into, the Economic Council of Canada supported the free trade agreement and that council was criticized and railed against by his party day after day in this House because the report of the committee was said to be influenced by the government.

What is the point of having an economic institute that is an arm of the government, so to speak, so that its decisions, claims and investigations are always suspect because they are part of what the government might do? Why is the member so interested in defending an economic institute that is there as an arm of government? It is not really independent. After all, the government appoints people to it. The government gives it the space. The government tells it what to do.

Therefore, I am wondering why he wants to defend that expense or does he just want to defend that expense because he and his party do not want us to cut expenses of government? Is he really interested in just bigger and better government, more government, more expense, more borrowing, more, more, more? Do they not ever take a look at these institutions and say: "We do not need this institution any more"?

As far as the Economic Council is concerned, we have lots of places to get advice on economic matters. The government does not need advice from another economic advisory council. The opposition can get its advice from lots of places other than the government's economic council.

Therefore, why would the member, other than just to feather the nest of more accountants or more economists, or make sure that more economists are employed, want to keep this institution going when the government could save, if it is abolished, some $9 million to $10 million a year?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. Just a second, there seems to be some confusion. I think the hon. member thought there were questions or comments on that. No, there were not. It is a 10-minute debate.

I will recognize the hon. member for Essex—Windsor if the hon. member would kindly sit down for a moment. The hon. member for Mississauga South may continue with his remarks as there is a 10-minute period. If the hon. member would allow me though to take the point of order from the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, I will return to him in a minute.

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, part of my point of order was simply to point out to the member that this was not the usual 10-minute question and comment period. I also wanted to ask the member as he continues his comments if he could explain why, if he felt as he now says he felt in his years as finance committee chairman, he never sought to eliminate the expenditure on the Economic Council of Canada.

Mr. Blenkarn: What is going on here?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that he has gone much further than pointing out what could or could not be a point of order.

At report stage, as the hon. member for Mississauga South should know or should remember, there are only 10-minute speeches with no period of questions and comments. There must be close to five minutes remaining that the hon. member could use.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is interesting. I guess the question is whether they really want to cut the deficit of this country, whether they really want to cut the spending of this country, whether they really want bigger and bigger government or smaller and smaller government. We happen to believe in smaller government. We happen to believe that we have to cut down the cost of government. This bill is about cutting down the cost of government. This bill is about eliminating those things in government that are no longer required. Organizations are developed, they blossom, and there comes a time when the sun should set on them. There are some 40 institutions here.

Mr. Funk: Point of order. Now that the Speaker has pointed out that time is brief, I was wondering if the member might address his thoughts in this brief period to the actual question that was asked by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

An hon. member: Oh, come on, that is not even a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has risen on debate for 10 minutes. As the subject is quite large, accusing him of not being on the subject is not quite fair at this time.

Mr. Blenkarn: My friend wants to know what we were doing in the finance committee. Let me tell him that on a number of occasions, as the chairman of that committee, I spoke to the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board concerning the institutions that we were examining. You do not always make your reports in the House of Commons when you are a chairman; you often make your reports directly to the minister on a personal basis.

I was delighted to see the Economic Council of Canada being terminated. I make no apologies for that. It did not have to be a report in this House. There are other ways of handling the affairs of the country. Those affairs can often be handled much better, not by reports to the House but by quiet conversations with ministers. That is how things get done, and that is what members on this side of the House are doing. They are all the time examining the problems of the country, looking at how institutions and other activities of government are running and trying to make sure that those institutions of government run more efficiently and effectively and that taxpayers' dollars are protected.

I am listening now to the member across the Chamber who claims to be in business. Of course, if he really is interested in making sure Canada works effectively, he would be doing exactly the same. We do not have to make a House of Commons speech or make a House of Commons report to influence how governments operate, how bills are prepared and how bills pass in the House.

The members of the New Democratic Party might well understand that. They might well know that if they really worked the system properly, if they really got to know what the problems were and made sensible suggestions, those suggestions would probably be reflected in government legislation. They know they have to play politics and that is why they are here tonight. That is why they are here tonight debating, opposing and speaking out on this bill. They know in their hearts of hearts the government is doing the right thing. The government is eliminating expenses of agencies and activities of the government that are no longer required.

It is my hope that when the Minister of Finance addresses this House on December 2—

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I must protest. The hon. member is being too modest when he says the government is doing the right thing. In fact, it is doing—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not think the hon. member really knows what a point of order is. The hon. member for Mississauga South.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, he really does not know what a point of order is. He does not know very much about this House, Parliament or government.

The issue really is, what are we going to do to cut back expenses. As I was saying before I was interrupted, it is my hope that the Minister of Finance in his statement next week will also find other places and other activities of the government that perhaps should be restricted or eliminated to eliminate the cost to the people of Canada of too much government.

This House ought to realize that we presently have very severe problems. We have revenue that is away off the original projections. We have bills that must go on. We have people on pensions, activities and transfers, all of those things that must be paid. We can continue to spend on every item that is in this bill, but those expenses are not necessary for my constituents and they are not necessary for yours, Madam Speaker. They can be eliminated. Without any ripple in the water at all, we can eliminate those expenses. That is what we are doing here in this bill.

My hope is that the Minister of Finance on December 2 will eliminate more of these expenses. We cannot continue to carry on activities that are no longer required, that are no longer essential for the peace, order and good government of Canada and this bill ought to pass now and this debate ought to end now.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member for Mississauga South. There are many times when I agree with the member and some of his ideas, but on this particular issue I think that the member is off track.

I would like to read for the House and for our viewers the introductory paragraph of the latest Economic Council of Canada estimates: "The Economic Council of Canada fulfils its role as an independent adviser to Parliament by providing objective analysis of Canada's economy. Acting at arm's length from the political process, the council provides policy advice and technical information and contributes to the national debate on economic policy ideas. Its goal is to contribute to the well-being of Canada and Canadians by providing rigorous analysis and pertinent advice to policymakers on national, provincial and regional issues. The council's principal clients are provincial officials, legislators across Canada who can request that the council undertake research on their behalf".

I believe the government must concede one thing at a time when our economy is going through such a difficult period. It seems that no matter what formula the government tries in order to put our economy back on track, nothing seems to be working. It seems to me that more than ever we need an independent think tank that would bring forward policy ideas for the purpose of advancing debate on economic issues.

For the life of me, I cannot figure out why the government at this particular juncture would not be supplementing the budget of the Economic Council of Canada. Through you, Mr. Speaker, to the member for Mississauga South, I say he knows of the difficulties. He knows that the Department of Finance is in a gridlock when it comes to advancing ideas or allowing the creative process to move forward. When I tried to fly a couple of ideas past them on tax reform it did not get very far because finance officials are locked into their own programs.

When one moves away or dismantles the Economic Council of Canada, one loses an independent form of audit or accountability on the Department of Finance. The Department of Finance does not have all the answers for developing a strategy of economic renewal for this country. The track record shows that. We need independent ideas that are well researched and that have networks of access.

This Economic Council of Canada is respected all over the world. They can plug into systems of evaluation and systems of analysis on a whole range of issues, not just in terms of our own country, but through other comparable systems right around the world. That is one thing we are forgetting in this debate. This institution has an international reputation and a history and a library of information that not only this legislature but other legislatures across this country can call up on an as-needed basis from time to time.

For the sake of $9 million we are going to dismantle this organization. How much of the resources or the people in the Economic Council will be packaged to other departments of government? Therefore, what is the true saving? Is it a couple of million dollars, maybe, and we are giving up the independence of this unit?

I am totally opposed to this unit in the bill. It shows a lack of appreciation and a lack of respect for the many men and women whose credentials over the years have made this institution one of the finest in the world. I believe the government will really regret it. At this time when we need ideas to debate, it shows once again that when it runs into a problem in terms of the economy, the best thing it knows how to do is cut or dismantle and it is wrong.

• (1810)

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I was really quite amazed by the intervention of the member for Mississauga South.

I wondered whether he might in fact have been a prototype for a character who was a senator in Li'l Abner some years ago. He is not old enough for that to be true, nevertheless, in his bluster, he certainly does remind me of that character.

I was rather taken by what he said about the Economic Council being dispensable because there were so many sources of advice for government. I suppose that to lengthen his list he should have emphasized those sources of advice that have been most influential for this government.

I suppose he might have included on the list the Business Council on National Issues. The Chamber of Commerce undoubtedly would have been on that list. Perhaps more tellingly, Mr. Bush would have been on that list along with Madam Thatcher.

He accuses us of not understanding government and yet he tells us that the Department of Finance provides for all intents and purposes, all the advice that the government needs. I wonder if the hon. member considered himself to be a waste of time as chairman of the House finance committee when he was proffering so much advice which was so consistently rejected. Part of the advice that he provided was that there should be a change in monetary policy and an easing of interest rates out of the consequent lowering of the exchange rate on the dollar.

As I understand it, he did not get that information from the Business Council on National Issues. He did not get it from the Department of Finance. As a matter of fact, I find a wonderful historic concurrence between the advice that he was offering as chairman of that committee and the advice that was being provided by the Economic Council of Canada which he regards as so dispensable.

Maybe it is dispensable because he is no longer chairman of the finance committee. It is clear from the record that the hon. member for Mississauga South had the Economic Council appear before his committee with great frequency to bolster his own arguments.

We have heard mention of a report by the Economic Council on learning in Canada which revealed the catastrophic state of education for too many Canadians. The essential import of that report was the recognition that the competitive environment in which Canada now exists in the global economy puts a great deal of priority on knowledge, skills, education, innovation, research and development, technological diffusion and so on.

I just want to remind the hon. member for Mississauga South that there has not been the slightest significant thrust from the Department of Finance or from the former Minister of Finance to improve Canada's performance with respect to high value-added initiatives that are a reflection of the knowledge, skill and an innovation-intensive economy.

As a matter of fact, this deficit that he talks about that will not allow us to spend $2.5 million on peace and security or $10 million on independent, badly-needed advice that the Economic Council of Canada could have provided, is a result of bad economic planning.

By the way, at least to a significant degree, it is a reflection of the failure of the Department of Finance that he lauds so much when it follows his advice on monetary policy. In fact, 35 per cent of the deficit is made up by payment of interest and lack of revenue. Why is there is a lack of revenue? It is because we had 75,000 bankruptcies this year. We have 1.5 million people unemployed. We have 2.5 million on social assistance and he wonders why we have a deficit. It is because he got bad advice from the finance department.

Some hon. members: We can't hear you, Howard.

Mr. McCurdy: I think they and everybody in this country do hear me and understand thoroughly what I am describing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. Order, please. I cannot hear the hon. member, please. The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair has the floor.

Mr. McCurdy: I heard pleas from those on the other side who ordinarily have difficulty hearing that they did not hear me. They will hear me because what I am saying is not just about me. They better not pretend to be deaf because the people of Canada are saying they have had enough of this. They have had enough of members such as the member for Mississauga South on the government side saying the whole world is going on as it should and that this is the best of all possible worlds as provided by the neo-Conservative agenda, the know-nothing agenda and the Senator Foghorn agenda.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak this afternoon to the report stage of the legislation before us which deals with cutting back certain agencies which have been appointed in the course of deliberations in the House of Commons.

We are talking about eliminating the Economic Council which was mandated in 1963 to provide advice and ways to increase economic growth and improve the quality of life for Canadians.

With a multisector body of 28 members, a staff of 118 and an annual budget of $10.3 million, the council has produced over the years numerous studies and reports, including an annual review of medium and long-term economic prospects and problems.

The budget announcement to wind up the council was made in light of the government's need to carefully assess the priorities for the limited funding available for arm's length research and advice.

As I said before, the council had been established in 1963 at a time when the infrastructure for research was far less developed than it is now. Today, there are many other sources of such advice in places such as universities and think tanks like the Conference Board, the C.D. Howe Institute, the Fraser Institute and the Institute of Research and Public Policy to name but a few.

The government can no longer afford to support a separate organization for these purposes.

Of the studies under way at the council at the time of announcing the closure, the government decided that five studies should be completed. These studies deal with the government and competitiveness—this was initiated by the council at the Prime Minister's request I might add—human resources management in Canada, cost effectiveness of the Canadian health care system, Canada's changing industrial structure and adaption strategies and Canada's commercial relations with the Pacific rim.

Three of the studies are now being completed through a contract with the University of Ottawa and Queen's University and are being overseen by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. CIDA and Statistics Canada are handling the other two studies.

Funding has been provided by Treasury Board for these contracts. The savings estimated at budget time for the closure of the agency are coming to fruition. The government will save $10.3 million annually, minus the cost of finishing the existing studies that I have just outlined.

In conclusion, the closure of the Economic Council will result in the government achieving its goal of saving taxpayers' money, rationalizing government and better targeting of funding for economic research and advice.

As with all other agencies to be wound up, the government requested the council and the Department of Industry, Science and Technology to prepare a wind-up plan. The aim was to ensure that the assets of this organization were protected, that the employees were treated in a fair and a humane manner, and that arrangements were made for existing contractual commitments.

In a letter dated June 10 of this year the chairman of the Economic Council wrote to the legislative committee on Bill C-63 confirming arrangements that were made regarding its assets. The letter indicated the library collections were turned over to the National Library pursuant to the National Library Act. The electronic data holding including the economic models were disposed of pursuant to the National Archives Act. The method of operating and manipulating the models was documented and the models were then transferred to the archives.

We have before us tonight the legislation reported back from the legislative committee without amendment, permitting the government to move forward with this piece of legislation which flows from this year's budget to completion. I trust we will be able to vote on it now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 21. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

Motion No. 44.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 24.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 25.

Motion No. 48.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 26.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved:

That Bill C-63 be amended in Clause 26 by adding immediately after line 35 at page 5 the following:

"The Minister shall

(b) transfer that property, with or without valuable consideration, to a federal, provincial or non-governmental body to be used to pursue that body's mandate."

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

Motion No. 51.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 27.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 28.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 29.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at this stage we are dealing with a third institution which the government has sought to eliminate. We on this side of the House feel it has been serving a useful purpose and has been, in this case, an important institution for Atlantic Canada in particular.

The International Centre for Ocean Development is the institution with which these particular amendments deal. Again the attempt is to eliminate the clauses of the bill which seeks to wind up various institutions, dealing with winding up the International Centre for Ocean Development or ICOD.

ICOD is an organization which was announced in 1981 at a Commonwealth Head of States Conference. It was incorporated following the 1982 signing of the UN Conference on the Law of the Sea. It therefore was something that very much followed on an objective for which the Canadian government had fought for many years: the establishment of a Law of the Sea treaty.

The centre became a Crown corporation in 1985. As of 1992-93 it was costing the people of Canada something in the order of $13.3 million. Of the 74 people who worked for it, most of them were in Halifax, some were overseas and some were in Ottawa. It also had a board of directors including a chairman, a president, seven directors from Canada, and up to five directors internationally.

This centre, as we discovered in our discussions in committee, was of importance for two reasons. First, it was of importance because it dealt with many of the serious concerns not just of Canada but of many countries in trying to manage the ocean's resources effectively. We in this country of all countries should be aware of the immense potential problems which exist in ocean management.

We have seen the Atlantic coast fisheries devastated by the failures in ocean management. We have seen the complete shutdown of large parts of the Newfoundland fishery. We have seen the near shutdown of large parts of the gulf fishery. This is just one example of the tremendous cost to the country of not managing ocean resources properly.

This institution was established to help Canada and to help poorer developing countries throughout the world carry forward such ocean management successfully.

Again the government will claim that it is saving money by shutting this institution down. Yet every bit of activity which ICOD is undertaking is being transferred to CIDA and to funding by CIDA. This means that in practice we will be spending virtually the same amount of money. We will probably find ourselves having to spend even more money in dealing with some of our domestic oceans management problems as a consequence of winding up ICOD.

The second point however which is important about this institution is that it is one of the few institutions located in Atlantic Canada. It is one of the few government bodies established there on an independent basis providing inputs, professional jobs and specialized activities for scientists in Atlantic Canada. It is some way in which this government offers to the people of Atlantic Canada a chance to participate in trying to develop policy and work with the Government of Canada on ocean management questions which are important to Atlantic Canada and important throughout the world.

We had testimony in front of the legislative committee indicating to us these very significant contributions to the Atlantic Canada economy, especially for professional employment, especially for the scientific employment which ICOD provided. Yet we have the government eliminating this institution despite the fact that much of the expenditure will continue to be made. The difference is that the expenditure will not be made in Atlantic Canada. It will be made in central Canada. There will be a shift in resources contributing to the well-being of Atlantic Canada from the Halifax area to Ottawa.

I cannot see how it makes any sense, in a country already marked by inequalities of opportunity and inequalities of government activity in Atlantic Canada compared with central Canada, to shut down this institution and have its work carried forward by CIDA located in central Canada.

I would therefore urge the House to accept these amendments, not just because of the value of ICOD but because the government in its prosperity report—and I mentioned earlier in the House of Commons this legislation is to eliminate various institutions—is suggesting the establishment of six new institutions.

I listened with amusement to the member from Mississauga, the former chairman of the finance committee, who suggested that the government wished to save money by eliminating institutions. The government, having moved to eliminate these institutions, brought forward a report to establish six new institutions, many of them duplicating the work of the institutions being eliminated here.

These institutions which will be newly established in 1992 or 1993 will be far more costly than keeping the present institutions going. I hope the member from Mississauga, the former chairman of the finance committee, will explain to the House how establishing six new expensive institutions, as the prosperity report recommends—a quality institute, a prosperity council, an institute for sustainable development, a centre for learning, a forum for learning, and new federal-provincial bodies to help in different areas of our economy—will somehow help the expenditure position of the federal government.

Of course it will not. The government is eliminating institutions which it did not set up so that it can set up new institutions and spend new money, probably more money, to establish new institutions which undoubtedly will be staffed by Conservatives.

Undoubtedly these institutions will provide new patronage opportunities for Conservatives. That is at the heart of what is taking place. This is not a story about saving money; this is a story about eliminating good important institutions in parts of the country like Atlantic Canada and establishing six new institutions which will be sources of patronage for this dying Conservative government.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have always listened with rapt attention to my good friend for Mississauga South. This man is known by reputation and by some of the sentiments he expresses, not just in this Chamber, but is known particularly in my home province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

The hon. member for Mississauga South is remembered there for very good reasons. In Newfoundland, no man's return is more anticipated and looked forward to than the gentleman from Mississauga South. They are ready for him and they want to have a party for him. They have picked the site. They have the refreshments all ready and indeed, they have the rope all ready. The rope is ready and they cannot wait.

Mr. Blenkarn: They didn't even bring it out.

Mr. Simmons: If he was there this summer, it was the best kept secret in Newfoundland. I can understand why he would go incognito. He has some concerns.

Mr. Blenkarn: I went there bold as brass.

Mr. Simmons: He might not know much about government but he knows a lot about survival. What I say to him is that they are all ready. Anytime he is ready to go incognito, I will take him to the site.

Why do I treat my friend from Mississauga South so charitably today? Because I wanted attention drawn to the one who tells us about downsizing government. He is the one who has expressed some fairly lively opinions about Newfoundlanders. He did that. When he paints, he paints with a fairly broad brush you understand. I had a professor at Boston University who used to say: "All natives walk in single file; at least the one I saw did". That pretty well sums up the approach of the member for Mississauga South.

Let me come now to something he said today. I do not know why I get exercised about this because he usually says very outlandish things anyway. But to show the consistency of the man, let me tell you what he said today.

We had a great oration from him about downsizing government. As I listened and watched him today I had some difficulty reconciling his position on the matter of downsizing with the position that he adopted during the GST issue, because the Auditor General's report is now out and it confirms exactly what we said in the GST debate.

The Auditor General said yesterday that the government talks about downsizing government out of one side of its mouth and has just proceeded to bring 4,000 more people on staff just to collect another tax.

This is the government that was going to replace the old manufacturers' sales tax with the GST because it was going to simplify things. It was going to simplify the administration. It simplified it all right, at a cost of $1.7 billion and that is just the money to set up the new machine to collect the tax. It cost $1.7 billion to take the tax from people who can ill afford to pay. How is that for downsizing government? There are an extra 4,000 employees to collect the tax.

• (1840)

Think what that could do, Mr. Speaker, in your riding or mine in terms of industry. Just think of what industries you might have in your riding or I might have in mine. Four thousand people. Who is paying for it? All the people who are paying the GST. The member for Mississauga South says it is all right because it is all part of downsizing government you understand. My, what you can justify in the name of downsizing. Now we come to this.

An hon. member: Chickening out.

Mr. Simmons: It is all right. He is just going to make a call to make sure he can get the next plane to Newfoundland. He got so excited about that reception I told him about he wants to get there. He has taken the view that: "If t'were to be done, t'were best it were done quickly". However, I say to him, Mr. Speaker, that he should wait for my company because I have a better rapport with some of those people than he does. The bit of mercy in me says that perhaps I should be there too, because a rope can be used for all kinds of things and I would not want it to be put to the wrong purpose, although the motive might be well-intentioned.

As part of the government's downsizing effort it wants to wipe out the International Centre for Ocean Development. Who is it that wants to remove from the scene an organization that since 1981 has provided technical assistance and information and training programs to improve management and utilization of ocean resources? Who would want to do that? Who wants to do it at this particular time and juncture in our history?

I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that this juncture in our history includes the worst crisis in the Atlantic fishery where the whole area is on its knees. Community after community is facing the threat of extinction. People who have traditionally worked for eleven and a half months a year are now walking around, not because they are too lazy to go to work, but because there is no work to go to and no fish to catch. That has to relate to the kind of management we have had of the ocean resources.

Who in their right minds would want to wipe out an organization with that mandate? You got it, sir. You guessed it. The same crowd that put those people in Atlantic Canada into that mess by mismanagement of the ocean resources. Why do they not want any advice on how to manage ocean resources? Because there is always the fear that the advice might actually tell them they are doing something wrong. If there is one thing the crowd on the other side of the House cannot stand, it is having someone tell them they are doing something wrong. To put it differently, even when they are told they are doing something wrong they do not much care. Remember, 85 per cent of Canadian people told them they did not want the GST but they got it anyway.

Without seeking to defeat my own argument, what is the point if government gets advice on anything? It is not followed anyway. That is why the fishery in Atlantic Canada is in the mess it is. That is why the fishery on the west coast of Canada is in the mess it is. It is because the management of the ocean resources by this administration has been absolutely abysmal and shameful.

If that were just a bit of rhetoric, if that were just a few words, what difference? There may be a few people watching television or some people here, but what is the difference? Behind those words is the reality that thousands upon thousands of people in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and P.E.I. are suffering tonight. Thousands of families are suffering tonight. Thousands of heads of households, men and women, are faced with great uncertainty tonight throughout Atlantic Canada. They can no longer do what they were traditionally able to do because of the bungled management of the ocean resources by this administration.

Then, government has the gall to come in here and ask me because I represent the people of Ramea and the people of Burgeo, Grand-Bruit, Grey River and those other dozens of communities that are being devastated by the mismanagement of the cod stocks: "Would you agree to putting out of existence yet another agency dedicated to the marine environment and ocean resources?" My answer to that government on behalf of those people in those communities is: "No, I will not agree to that. No, I will not agree".

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, just a short recap on what these motions are about.

In the February 1992 budget, it was decided to wind up the International Centre for Ocean Development. ICOD was doing some of the same functions being done by CIDA, the Canadian International Development Agency. The role of ICOD does not require that it be a separate organization. This is why the government decided to wind up ICOD and transfer its resources to CIDA.

The resulting savings in overhead, some $3.3 million, will be redirected within the official development assistance envelope for programming. CIDA will take the appropriate measures to ensure that assistance in relation to ocean resources continues to be provided to developing countries.

The work of ICOD has been accomplished with a staff of 74 and an annual budget of $13.3 million. At the government's request, ICOD and CIDA have prepared a wind-up plan for approval. The plan which was approved by Treasury Board outlines a fair and humane severance package for ICOD employees and the transfer of necessary working files to CIDA and the arrangements for ICOD's existing contractual agreements. For example, ICOD has contracted its programming activities to the Consulting and Audit Group of Canada pending parliamentary approval of dissolution. After dissolution, CIDA will assume this contract.

In conclusion, the government's decision to wind up ICOD will mean more aid for international programming for developing countries. It will mean less overhead and a rationalization of the government's department and agency portfolio.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I want to add a couple of points to the debate from the submission of the hon. member opposite.

The assets and the surviving program of the International Centre for Ocean Development are being transferred or rolled over to CIDA. One can only hope that CIDA will pursue the objectives, the mandate and the functions of the international centre with as much vigour as the international centre itself did.

There are not too many other things that I can usefully contribute to the debate, other than quote a statement made in 1985 by the Hon. Stewart McInnes who was then parliamentary secretary to the minister for international trade.

At that time, the international centre was in business. It was in the process of undertaking projects aimed at developing food resources in the sea in underdeveloped countries. I gather that has gone on in some 35 countries. It did a good job. It is still doing a good job even though it appears as though the centre is out of business now.

In 1985 Mr. McInnes said: "We believe that the International Centre for Ocean Development will add an important new dimension to our efforts to assist less fortunate nations. Canada, a great maritime centre, will use this centre to share its long experience and expertise in maritime resource management. As we are all aware, the ocean is a potential major source of food that needs to be developed as soon as possible".

I will close by noting that at a year in this century when Canada appears to have mismanaged its own cod stocks on the east coast, creating a desperate situation there, it is the same year that this government decides we should no longer be in the business of providing expertise through the international centre to the less developed countries. Maybe it is an appropriate year to dissolve.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 30.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved:

Motion No. 58.

That Bill C-63 be amended in Clause 30 by adding immediately after line 30 at page 6 the following:

"(3) The Minister of Justice shall

(a) identify property, including intellectual property, data bases, models or library materials, that were created or acquired by the Commission in the fulfilment of its mandate and that have a capital or commercial value; and

(b) transfer that property, with or without valuable consideration, to a federal, provincial or non-governmental body to be used to pursue that body's mandate."

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 31.

Motion No. 62.

Motion No. 64.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 34.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will simply move the motions. I would like to permit my colleague to actually speak on it since he is our justice critic.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I thank all my colleagues in the House. I have been watching many of them debate these motions on television. I must be a little bit masochistic to sit there and watch them when there are so many other choices.

However, it is a good debate. It brings, through the member for Mississauga who is on the government benches and is always, even though I disagree with him most of the time, controversial and engages the debate. He is truly one of the best exponents of the Conservative philosophy. It is not my philosophy but he puts it forward very well.

The hon. member for Essex—Windsor, the NDP finance critic, has really made the point in the debate for our side. One of the points he made, and it is an important point and it certainly pertains to these amendments on the Law Reform Commission, is that the government is really not going to save money in the long run. It is just taking the money that it would spend on some of these problems and shifting it over to other bodies or other ways of doing it. It is the same amount of money, but the difference is that it will control the other bodies, it will control what is being said. In other words, these will not be independent bodies.

The member gave the example of the Economic Council of Canada. The council was a bit of a thorn in the side of the government; that is gone. Now we have studies by an institute at Queen's and other studies through the finance department, and so on, which will, of course, be controlled by the government because it pays the piper.

I want to talk about the Law Reform Commission. These amendments deal specifically with the Law Reform Commission. I am the justice critic for the federal NDP and as a lawyer I have been involved over many years. Actually I became a lawyer about the time the Law Reform Commission was established in 1971. The Law Reform Commission is 20 years old.

It was established by the Law Reform Commission Act and it reports to Parliament through the Minister of Justice. Its mandate was to provide an ongoing review of the statutes of Canada to make recommendations for improvement, modernization and reform of legislation. It undertook some research in-house, contracted out other work to consultants on a full or part-time basis, held seminars and conferences, visited universities and schools, published articles and learned journals, et cetera.

If I can put it in plain English, the Law Reform Commission looked at changing the law in a systematic, very intelligent, rational way and it has produced good results. Recently we were forced by the courts to pass new legislation on mental health because the old law was against the charter of rights. On abortions, on juries, the courts in fact threw out parts of the law and we had to come back to Parliament and revise it so that it would be within the charter of rights. In some of those cases the Law Reform Commission had long recommended this reform before it happened.

We dealt with a bill called the Contraventions Act. It took a number of minor federal statutes like speeding a boat, minor pollution laws, trespassing on federal property in a national park, being in the park without a permit or licence and so on and put forward a very simple procedure to deal with them, much as we do with the highway traffic acts when one gets a speeding or parking ticket in the province or city in which one lives. The Law Reform Commission had recommended that awhile ago and we in Parliament followed what the Law Reform Commission had recommended.

The Law Reform Commission was working, it was independent and it was producing these reports that were useful. We were spending about $4.8 million a year. What is going to happen now? We are going to do the research in-house. We are going to do it by contracting out of the Department of Justice and so on.

Does the House know what that will mean? It will mean more bucks for some big, fat Vancouver law firms. They are already making a lot of money from this minister. It will be more contracts to their friends and reports that the government can live with. If it does not like the report, it will not make it public, whereas the Law Reform Commission reports were always public because it reported to Parliament.

One of the commission's highlights for 1992 to 1993 was to continue a comprehensive study of the Criminal Code. Several recommendations by the commission have been used by the Supreme Court, other courts, lawyers or incorporated in government and private members' bills. I am a member, along with my colleague from the Liberal Party, the member for Cape Breton on the justice committee. Part of the subcommittee of that committee is considering revisions to the general part of the Criminal Code and we have used the work of the Law Reform Commission.

Here we had something that was working, something that was not too expensive, something useful and something that was independent of this government. That is the rub. It does not want an independent body. It wants to do the research in-house. It is going to spend the same amount of money and control the research.

I am concerned about some of the reactions to the demise of the Law Reform Commission. J.J. Camp, president of the Canadian Bar Association was quoted in The Ottawa Citizen, March 11, 1992, as saying: "I have had it reported to me by some sources that the Law Reform Commission was too independent. I bridle at that because I do not believe there is such a thing as being too independent". This did not come from the justice critic of the NDP, or the justice critic of the Liberal Party who is in the House tonight. This came from the president of the Canadian Bar Association.

• (1900)

Also, Vincent Del Buono, the president of the Society for the Reform of Criminal Law, is quoted in The Ottawa Citizen as saying: "The Law Reform Commission, both in terms of the legal talent it has nurtured in Canada and abroad and the prestige that its recommendations hold, has had a far greater impact than the simple mechanical assessment of its legislative implementation record would suggest. The fact of the matter is that this is a small change and what we are doing is taking the engines of new ideas and future thinking in the government and cutting them off". That is a serious charge that Mr. Del Buono makes.

In other words, here is a place where there are fresh and new ideas and we are cutting them off. Also, the president of——the Association des avocats de la défense de Montréal said in La Presse, and I quote: "The federal government used its latest budget to terminate the Law Reform Commission of Canada, an agency whose relevance to the Canadian legal system was recognized across this country. We feel this so-called austerity measure is entirely unjustified".

[English]

He said that this decision, taken supposedly for economic matters or to save money, was unjustified. I did not say that. It was the President of the Montreal Defence Advocates Association. They are lawyers in Montreal and independent, outside sources.

A lawyer working for the Law Reform Commission who is not quite so independent, put it very well. She is Susan Zimmerman and one of the few people who did this. Some people in the Law Reform Commission managed to get some nice jobs out of the government. They sort of got paid off so that they would not make comments about the demise of the commission. This woman had some courage to do it.

She said: "The commission was created to provide a vehicle for lawyers and occasionally philosophers to reflect on the law as it stands and as it ought to be. This is not an idle pursuit. It is a vital part of the life of a healthy democracy which is founded on the rule of law".

The Minister of Justice made a famous speech. Perhaps it is not as famous as her Madonna-like posing in the recent coffee table photograph book. In her more serious endeavour, she said earlier this year that politicians were too often letting the courts make tough decisions for them. She called this "an abdication of Parliament's role as the primary agent of social change".

The Minister of Justice says that Parliament should be making the social change and changing the law. In fact, what we should have been doing in this Parliament, in the time of this Minister of Justice who is spoken of now as the next Conservative leader, is looking at the record. The record is that we have been responding to the courts that have told us we have to change the Mental Health Act and the abortion and juries part of the Criminal Code and so on. It refers to a number of acts along with the abortion part of the Criminal Code.

We have not been carrying this out the way we are supposed to. The Minister of Justice was right originally. We have to be the agents of legal change in this Parliament. We need independent advice to do that. We had it from the Law Reform Commission of Canada. It cost us $4 million, but we are going to spend the money anyway. We are going to spend it in contracts.

Instead of sending it to fat law firms and to consultants who are in the pocket of the Department of Justice, I say that it would be better to keep the Law Reform Commission of Canada. There are only two other countries in the industrialized world that do not have a Law Reform Commission. This is a false economy and I challenge my friends to get up and defend this saving because I say that this is indefensible. If you want to save money, there are lots of ways you could save money. This is a small amount and it is an important amount. It created an independent commission which we do not have any more.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to follow up on the last remark of my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam when he talked about the money for the Law Reform Commission as being a small amount, but an important amount.

What we mean is that relatively speaking it is a small amount, $4.8 million, considering the good that this funding has done. This funding has acted as a cement to our legal system in Canada, along with our Supreme Court of Canada.

The member from Mississauga, who would have no more idea about the rule of law than he would about a turkey shoot, would not know the difference. His philosophy is that if you do not like somebody take them out and tie them to a parking meter, if there are not any stocks available in your community.

The Law Reform Commission goes back centuries in Great Britain. It goes back in this country to 1968 when the Canadian Bar Association actually requested that the governments of this country enter into these organizations so that we would have a means of projecting the needs of our legal system into the future. In this way our law would always have something to look to in terms of important writing and original thinking, and we would be able to take not a whole book, not a whole concept, but various ideas from one writing, from one periodical, and bring together new laws that reflect the needs of society at a particular time. This was done when the Law Reform Commission was set up in 1971.

It has existed and done excellent work since that date. In fact, all of the provinces in Canada have Law Reform Commissions. The only government jurisdiction of the 11 federal and provincial governments that does not have one now is the federal government. All the provinces have Law Reform Commissions but the federal government does not. In a federal system of government that is absolutely incredible, absolutely stupid. Not only that, but in the British Commonwealth of Nations, Canada now joins Bangladesh and Zimbabwe as the only three countries in the Commonwealth without a Law Reform Commission.

There are those who say that the Law Reform Commission has not done anything because it has never had its ideas put into law holus-bolus. Well, that is not the way it works. Not any piece of writing, not any organization, not any person has all the right concepts needed to formulate the law for the future, but the concepts have to be there. Some will be chosen, some will not. The idea is that there be some thinking ahead into the future.

The importance of the Law Reform Commission is reflected in the fact that work of the Law Reform Commission has been cited in 255 court decisions in this country, including 44 decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada.

As my friend from Port Moody—Coquitlam has said, what the government hopes to do in closing down the Law Reform Commission is do this work itself, which is an entirely different idea than allowing the Law Reform Commission to do it.

As the member mentioned, J. J. Camp, the former president of the Canadian Bar Association, said: "I have heard it said that they were too independent",—meaning the Law Reform Commission—"I do not think that is possible".

If the government takes it over and does it in-house it will, as my learned friend from Port Moody—Coquitlam has said, probably wind up spending as much if not more. The difference will be that it will not be original thinking. The government will be able to bring forward the ideas it wants brought forward. It will be engendering its own thinking as it wants to impose it. What a terrible situation in a free country like Canada. What an odious procedure.

The Department of Justice is too prosecutorial. It looks at one side. The government departments, and the Department of Justice in particular, will have a conflict of interest because they will be bringing forward ideas in which they are engaged or plan to be engaged. That is like allowing the lawyer for the plaintiff or the defendant in a case before the courts write the decision. It is absolutely incredible and totally unacceptable.

As well, a policy paper may be used by the opposing side against the government. If the government introduces an idea, a concept, then that is forward, front and centre, as the thinking of the Department of Justice.

In a subsequent case, what is to stop a lawyer from taking this position of the Department of Justice and putting it before the court, from saying: "My lord, the Department of Justice is advocating this position, which I am now advocating in this case against the Department of Justice".

What a stupid position for the Department of Justice to put itself in. What an absolutely ludicrous procedure. Not only that, but we may never even find out what the writings are and what they state. We may never actually see the reports. The government may decide it wants to use the reports itself and therefore will not release them for others to benefit from them. No more will we have the courts relying on and quoting the work of the Law Reform Commission.

This whole procedure is totally offensive. Not only has the Law Reform Commission been quoted but in the 20 years since its creation it has produced 33 reports to Parliament, 61 working papers and 76 study papers.

A lot of that work will never be used. Some may say that it is frivolous, useless work. People could say that certainly about this House, and particularly about this government, yet its salaries and budgets go on.

I would say categorically that the work of the Law Reform Commission has provided much more benefit, generally speaking, than the work of this government, which has decimated the economy of this country.

It has been done because this government does not like criticism. This government does not want independent thinking. This government is totally and utterly afraid of new ideas. This government is an unmitigated Neanderthal. The reason for this is not cost cutting. The reason is the government does not want criticism.

I just want to read a couple of quotes. In Washington, the Solicitor General, the former Minister of Justice, stated that we in Canada are proud of the work of the Law Reform Commission. That was the former Minister of Justice. The present Minister of Justice stated in May 1990 that the commission's draft Criminal Code, which has been the subject of so much favourable comment both in Canada and internationally, would be of great assistance to the committee in its review, which is presently going on, of the general provisions of the Criminal Code.

The present Minister of Justice praised the work of the Law Reform Commission on the Criminal Code. No one except this government applauds the demise of the Law Reform Commission. We on this side of the House and members of the legal profession would say that this is a dark moment for law and legal thinking in Canada. We can only hope, although we have no precedent for this, that the government will show some intelligence and change its mind on this matter.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say a few words in this debate.

I will agree with the hon. members who have spoken when they said that the Law Reform Commission has done good work. Yes, it has done good work. It was created in 1971 to help governments overhaul their laws and certainly it has done good work. Various governments have listened to its advice on many occasions and we have overhauled laws.

It costs $4.9 million each year. It has five full-time commissioners and a staff of 36. That is a lot of staff and a lot of commissioners, and it costs a lot of money.

It is my belief that in Canada we have created too many commissions and too many boards, and in a certain way we have devalued Parliament. I would rather see work of this nature done by parliamentary committees.

The member for Windsor—St. Clair has spoken so eloquently in committee meetings about the value of Parliament and how Canadians want to change. Part of that change should be that we should do more work like that done by the Law Reform Commission in the past.

It is too easy to spin out regulatory agencies and advisory bodies and so on. However, what is the role of Parliament and the role of committees but to give advice to the government? History since the McGrath commission in 1986 has shown that committees have given very independent and very good advice.

The laws that have emanated from Parliament after the reforms have been better laws than they would have been before House of Commons reform.

I ask my opposition colleagues where Parliament should fit in. Do we always have to spin off things that Parliament should be doing? Do they not believe in parliamentary reform? They talk a good story. Yet they want to create commissions and spend money and only do the politicking, but not the serious business of looking at policy in an analytical way, creating public policy and coming up with new ideas, which is what we should be doing.

Parliament has a role to play. The justice committee, of which I am a member as is the previous member who spoke and the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, is involved, and has been, in several major studies. We have had an impact. Perhaps what should be done is to generally beef up the research bureaus of parliamentary committees and empower them to come forward with policy positions and papers.

Some committees have appended draft laws to their reports and have suggested the House leaders consider these draft laws and the government adopt and introduce them. Private members have come forward with their own private members' bills to improve the laws in the country.

I say to my colleagues in response, we have had an independent agency that has done a lot of good work but it is time we ourselves did this work and brought some prestige back to Parliament. Let us not devalue Parliament by giving its role to outsiders. We can do that independent work.

There is also a fiscal argument here. It is an expenditure of $5 million a year. We have had a deficit over the past years of roughly $30 billion a year, now $34.6 billion has to be borrowed. We have to borrow that money each year and then we have to borrow money to cover the interest on that money each year. It is a vicious cycle.

The government has had to take a hard look at where we spend our money. Some of this work will be contracted out but there will be a net saving. There will be a net saving this year of $300,000, and $2.1 million annually in the future.

Some work will be contracted from the Department of Justice but it is my hope that the justice committee itself will be able to do some of this work. The people involved in the Law Reform Commission have been placed elsewhere. I understand that most of them have jobs.

The government has been quite responsible in looking after the people who were affected by this. The library and research material has been transferred to the Department of Justice. I am sure, as the justice committee or as individual members of Parliament, if we asked to see some of that research, we would have access to that material too.

I support this bill to streamline a number of agencies, of which one is the Law Reform Commission. The Law Reform Commission has done good work but it is time for Parliament to regain its role as the maker of policy. It is time for committees to come forward with new ideas and reforms. I believe we can do that. It is time to get our fiscal house in order and this is one small part of it. Five million dollars a year is not insignificant. Opposition members think that money grows on trees. Everyone pays taxes and that is a lot of tax dollars, $5 million.

I believe we are doing the right thing.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I have one short comment on the issue of independence of these advisory bodies. At the moment we are speaking about the Law Reform Commission of Canada.

Have we ever thought about how absolutely difficult it is, maybe even impossible, for career civil servants in one of the ministries—let us take the Department of Justice—to do some original research. They make an original, independent proposal to the minister. I say that this just does not happen any more, that individuals in the Public Service have a career and their job is basically to do their job, to do what the minister wants them to do.

When the minister and the government say they want to embark on a certain path, the department will simply do that. I do not want to call all civil servants yes men and yes women, but basically they are going to do the job they are asked to do. They are going to do it in the way that is most consistent in the eyes of the minister, so that the minister will smile and indicate that they are a great workers and have done a great job and they will go a long way in the department.

The problem is that there does not exist enough mechanisms, if any, within the Public Service to generate the independent approach that is absolutely critical in giving government some guidance for the future. That is the kind of advice and research that the Law Reform Commission has been carrying on for a couple of decades.

Members opposite may even acknowledge, some of them will not, the leading role in independent advice that this agency has given. Other agencies—and we are dealing with six here today—have done that same kind of independent research and to government and given advice to Parliament. We are now going to be without it.

It is naive to believe that the justice department is going to commission some original work or research or drafting that is going to give it a product that varies one iota from the product that the justice ministry wants or that they wanted when they started out.

We need a mechanism like the Law Reform Commission. I regret that we are losing it.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I do not have a long speech to give. The House will appreciate that I like to keep my comments concise. I was encouraged to get to my feet after the remarks by the member for Edmonton—Strathcona suggesting that the justice committee of the House is now going to take over the work of the Law Reform Commission. That is pure, unadulterated smoke and mirrors.

I came to this place from the criminal justice system and I know of the work that has been done over the last more than 20 years by the Law Reform Commission. We need an independent body that can take the time to do some future thinking, to look at the Criminal Code, to look at how laws are evolving, to look at how juries are dealing with certain matters, to look at how different judges in different areas of the country are dealing with things, to look at what is being said by the public, to hear what the public interest is saying.

We need an independent body that can do that kind of futuristic analysis and reporting to the Minister of Justice and to Parliament.

When we hear a member of the justice committee on the government side suggesting spuriously to this House that the justice committee is going to pick this up and carry it, he is doing a disservice to this House and a disservice to all Canadians who are interested in this. He might think the justice committee is actually going to do it but it cannot. It is functionally impossible, no matter how much you reform it.

Let us look at the last couple of months. The House was sitting in June. It was closed in July and August. There was the referendum in September and October. There is a four month period, one-third of the year, gone where the justice committee never sat one day, one hour, one minute on a single issue. During that whole period of time an independent body like the Law Reform Commission can carry on its ongoing investigations and research into changes that this Parliament needs to enact over time.

Earlier today we heard one of the members on the government side saying it costs $200,000 a day for the House of Commons to sit or maybe he even said $200,000 an hour, some preposterous sum at any rate. The total budget in the most recent 1991-92 fiscal year for the Law Reform Commission was $4.9 million for 36 person-years.

If the government side were really serious, that its serious intention was to put an adjunct body attached to the justice committee, do you not think the justice committee would have seen some kind of a work plan, that Whips and House Leaders would have had some discussions about a multimillion dollar adjunct body being attached to Parliament? It might have been a good idea if the government had been serious about it.

I still do not think it would have been as good as an independent commission. I do not think smoke and mirrors and charade-like arguments should be put on the floor of the House. I do not think anyone who has been associated with the Law Reform Commission for a moment thinks that anything other than the one comment that the member did make is likely to be true and it is that this kind of work is to be contracted out to law firms that are friends with the government or firms that are likely to deliver the kind of report back the government would like to implement on hot topical criminal justice issues.

Whether we are talking about capital punishment, abortion, firearm's issues, violence or about a lot of the more serious community sensitive law issues, there are political sensitivities. Of course it is easier for a government to shrug off independent advice and take advice that follows along in the same ideological rut as that party is in.

I do not bar my own party, the Liberal Party or any other party from that natural near politically instinctive role of trying to head off any kind of serious political heat that is coming toward you, whether it is in the case of someone like Philip Ng in terms of an extradition proceeding or whether it is in relation to some terribly complex and difficult issue such as some of the issues of violence that this House has to deal with in terms of reforming the Criminal Code.

I reject the facile arguments that have been put before the Chamber tonight because I do not think anyone with any interest in the law or anyone who has ever had any association with the Law Reform Commission would buy it for a moment, but the justice committee is going to do it because there is no work plan, there has been no suggestion in the committee. The chair has not come to our critic. There has been no money put forward. There have been no researchers hired. The library of the Law Reform Commission was not sent over to the justice committee so they could set up this body and start doing it.

I think it is disreputable and dishonest to try to bull the public on these kinds of issues that have significance over time. We have one of the highest rates of incarceration in the western world. We have some endemic and epidemic problems within the justice system. There are very high levels of incarceration of aboriginal people. There is extraordinarily unusual sentencing procedures that affect people of certain income levels, backgrounds, education and employment opportunities.

I used to write pre-sentence reports for a living. I used to be a parole officer on contract to the National Parole Service. I was a full-time probation officer and family court counsellor.

• (1930)

I look back on it with interest. I know the problems that were endemic then and I look at the problems of now. Whether it is the Young Offenders Act or the Criminal Code, this Chamber has enormous difficulty in ever even getting these issues before the House, past the minister, through the bureaucracy, past cabinet and so on.

Having had one of the independent arms of serious analysis cut off in such a cavalier way leaves me with a chilly feeling about what is the real agenda. This is not an expensive operation. This is about five minutes of interest on the national debt.

I looked through the Auditor General's report. I listened to the member for Mississauga South going on about why it was great to get rid of the Economic Council of Canada; that it was too expensive; that we should dump this one in the trash barrel, get it out there into the landfill and bury it over; and that we could not have these things lurking around.

The bodies giving independent advice that the government did not want to heed or found embarrassing have found their way to the trash can. In a democracy that is a frightening revelation of a government afraid of accurate research, afraid of any kind of independent academic or intellectual evaluation over time.

What is the government afraid of? Does its ideological paranoia of Presto and the Reform Party go so far as to say: "When we go into the election campaign we need at least 30 organizations that we have dumped or cut their budgets in the last six months"? That is how we will take on Presto.

The jaw that walks like a man does not need to have these kinds of phoney excuses: "Oh, we are going to give it to the justice committee". Government members should be forthright, come forward and tell the truth about why these are being cut.

The Law Reform Commission is being cut because they did not want to take its advice. In a complex democracy we need these kinds of independent bodies because they act like the canary in the mine; they act like the bell on the deck of a ship. This body has done a lot of important work. It was nationally recognized and respected. It was internationally recognized and respected for the work it was doing for this Parliament and for the people of Canada.

No member on the government side should callously say that there is a body of this Parliament that will take it on, because that is not true. The government should admit that many of the difficult legal issues that come up will now regrettably have to be farmed out to big, overcharging law firms. We will never get this kind of broad, reasonable cost research and delivery of product from private sector firms. It has not happened in the past and it will not happen now.

I urge the member for Mississauga South and others to read the Auditor General's report. If they are looking for areas to cut, they should look within their own incompetence and neglect of departmental budgets which have been occurring for the last eight years under their administration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 57. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

We will now turn to the sixth grouping.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Even as I rise and speak now, the hon. member for Essex—Windsor is racing to the Chamber. He has been temporarily inconvenienced elsewhere but, with the kind indulgence of the House, can be expected here momentarily. In fact, I would imagine that if I were to tell one brief joke—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Do we have unanimous consent to have the member for Skeena move the motions for the member for Essex—Windsor?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Jim Fulton (for Mr. Langdon): moved:

Motion No. 68.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 35.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 36.

Motion No. 72.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 37.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved:

"(4) The Minister shall

(b) transfer that property, with or without valuable consideration, to a federal, provincial or non-governmental body to be used to pursue that body's mandate."

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 38.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 39.

Motion No. 79.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 40.

Motion No. 87.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 44.

Motion No. 89.

That Bill C-63 be amended by deleting Clause 45.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, this section of amendments deals with the Science Council. I wonder if I could have Your Honour's permission and the permission of the House to permit my colleague who is responsible for our science and technology policy to speak to the motion.

An hon. member: Let's hear your pearls of wisdom.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my colleague giving me the opportunity to speak to the issue of the abolition of the Science Council. I am especially pleased by the enthusiasm expressed on the other side of the House to hear this intervention.

The hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona is not in the House at present, but I do appreciate his reference to what he described as my eloquent interventions in favour of committee reform. However, he has had a complete misapprehension of my opinion about how parliamentary reform can be translated into the work of committees.

I would like to use the example of the committee on industry, science and technology vis-à-vis the issue of the abolition of the Science Council to demonstrate how vacuous, empty and unproductive is the proposal that committees such as that replace institutions such as the Science Council.

I would like to point out this is a committee that started out with a great deal of optimism about the capacity of well informed and interested parliamentarians to engage in research, discussion, debate and reflection on issues such as the issue of science policy in Canada. We had a good start.

One of the unfortunate truths of the present Parliament is that as soon as that committee with its members from all three parties began to reflect seriously on the failures of government policy with respect to science and technology and research and development, the committee has been hijacked by those who absolutely refuse any engagement that would precipitate any kind of criticism of government policy.

There is no use our looking to committees to get the kind of reflection at arm's length and independent of government views that this country so badly needs. There is no use looking to the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology which is allowed to speak only directly to the Prime Minister whose reports may occasionally be sneaked out of the library. Science policy cannot on an arm's length basis be gained from the Department of Industry, Science and Technology. It carries out the job, it administers, it overrules the endeavours of government and relate to what is going on in industry.

In terms of an independent, objective examination, such as has been provided by the Science Council, not only of science and technology policy in this country, but also of scientific, technological and industrial success related to technology, only the Science Council has and can provide it.

This institution was established some 25 years ago. There has been so much attention to the cost of these bodies that are being abolished in this bill, I should point out that the Science Council has a budget of $3.2 million. Yes, you heard me correctly, Mr. Speaker, $3.2 million. A piddling sum, particularly at this time to spend on having the government and the people of Canada, I will repeat that, not just the government but the people of Canada, provided with advice that will have an impact on Canada's capacity to make the kinds of decisions, both government decisions and otherwise, that are necessary for Canada to compete in the new global economy.

We hear a great deal about the new global economy. What characterizes the new global economy are the importance of knowledge, the importance of science, the importance of technology, the importance of innovation in economic success for any nation.

If there was a necessity to demonstrate the need for good science policy and changes in science policy in this country, all one has to do is look at the performance of this government since it came into office in 1984.

On the basis of every objective criteria, not only has Canada failed to advance in its relative position with respect to research and development and technology, it has also fallen behind. There has not been one single net increase in the devotion of resources by this country to improving the scientific condition of this country needed to advance our industrial and economic growth, not one.

Of course, one of the problems with the Science Council is that it recognized that. It said so. One of the things that occurs to me about the execution of all of these institutions is that old legend about the monarch who, displeased with his advisers, said: "Off with their heads". This is what has happened here. The Economic Council disappointed, off with its head; the Science Council dared to criticize, off with its head; the Law Reform Commission dared to be critical, off with its head.

A very important Canadian had something to say about this. John Polanyi, the Nobel prize winner, expressed it this way: "In our concern that the size of the ship is too big, we are removing the rudder". At a time when we need, desperately need, the work of the Science Council, off with its head. Buried completely.

For the information of those across the aisle who look so mystified, let us give them a few examples of the things in which the Science Council was engaged. It was in the process of doing studies of 15 of Canada's industrial sectors in respect to their research and development performance. It was looking at the role of women in science. It has looked at the environment. It has looked at science in the north. It has looked at community economic development. That is a study which has been only slightly recognized. It is a very important series of studies and fora in the municipalities in this country which relates to how one goes about generating new jobs, new industries, and bringing about economic development in a sieve.

The council looked at biotechnology. It looked at education. It looked at a whole host of things which were necessary to straighten out if we were going to come to grips with the need for new science, new technology, and new innovation, and real high value industrial growth and economic growth in this country.

Now we are left with one of our most prestigious institutions eliminated. We are left with a government that remains rudderless. As my colleague has said, it has eliminated the Science Council and the Economic Council and it is inventing things like the prosperity council out of the prosperity initiative.

I would like to quote the words of a member of Parliament to whom I am very close and who summarized this very well. This is in reference to those who attempted to convince the government that its decision was wrong-headed. It goes as follows: "No matter how little support there may be for the elimination of the Science Council or the Economic Council or other bodies that were eliminated, and how little justification there might have been for the government to carry out these executions, you are likely going to find what too many Canadians have found: No matter how legitimate the claim, no matter how perfect the point of view, no matter how important what it is you have to say for the guidance of this government, it will be ignored. Your head will be cut off".

That is one of the reasons we have such disrespect and cynicism about politics. It is because the democratic process is not working. It cannot work if the government continues to disregard not only the voices of the people but also the voices of those who know more than this government is capable of understanding and whose advice is rejected. It is advice that would be in the interests of Canadians at a time when, particularly in science and technology and research and development, we so badly need a voice that is listened to.

This government is condemned by its actions. It will be condemned by the people. It will be condemned by those who continue to lose jobs and who continue to fear losing their jobs because this government is too stupid to know that it is stupid and that it needs advice.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will not speak long but I do want to respond to one of the comments that the member made. He spoke quite forcefully about the need to make sure we are prepared to participate in the new world economy. I take it he does mean the new world economy and I agree with him. We need to and for that we need up-to-date technology and up-to-date industry to be able to compete.

I understand from him and his party that they are opposed to the free trade agreement. They are opposed to NAFTA. Yet they want to be part of the whole new world trading arrangement.

Maybe he wants to have an updated technology and an updated manufacturing sector to make sure that our inventory shelves are all stocked up, but we are not trading with anyone if we are not trading with the United States and with Mexico. We will have a surplus that we cannot handle because most of our trade is with the United States and hopefully our trade will build with Mexico.

Surely one of these days members of that party are going to have to get it together. If they want to have an updated technology, an updated market and an updated industrial sector, I guess it is not unfair to ask if they want to sell a product. If they want to sell it, to whom do they want to sell it? Maybe the best customers would be the United States and perhaps even Mexico.

If he wants to have a world trading economy and he wants Canada to be part of it and he thinks that the national science council is important to it, that is fine. Then he also has to agree that it would be best to build the kind of trading arrangements that would enable us to sell those products and to deal with disputes, if there are trading disputes between those two countries. Sooner or later they will have to get together and come to a conclusion.

• (1950)

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the words of the last member who spoke from the government side of the House put in stark relief the difference between members of that side and members on our side. To him the major problem is, who do we trade with, where do we get the markets.

This has never been the problem. The problem is what do we trade with. This is represented today by one of the most shocking statistics about our current economic plight.

Today we have a $15 billion trade deficit in high-tech goods. This deficit is increasing every year. It means that we do not have the capability of producing the modern, technologically sophisticated goods that this world is demanding.

Small wonder that our standard of living is sinking. Small wonder that in two years our ability to compete, according to the World Economic Forum, has fallen from fourth to eleventh position.

What is the reason for this? The world community has condemned our economic performance on the basis that we do not have the technology. We do not have the science. We do not know how to obtain it. We do not have a science culture, a technology culture. We are not educating our people in these areas. We are not training them in these areas. We do not know how to obtain it from elsewhere and apply it to Canadian production.

If we are going to compete in this global community, it is incumbent upon us to make sure that we have the goods and services that the world demands. They are no longer demanding our abundance, our natural resources. That is a very competitive market. The advantage we had from our natural resources no longer brings us wealth. We are going to have to create it out of our heads, out of our human resources, out of our minds and our efforts and our talents. This is a challenge for our young people, to adapt to that new global requisite for creating wealth. What has this government done?

In 1984 the Prime Minister promised that we would double research and development. We started to approximate world standards. From 1984, when we had 1.4 per cent of our gross domestic product invested in R and D, we are now at 1.3 per cent. We are going backwards.

Our competitiveness, our ability to compete is declining annually. Our high-tech trade deficit is going up. We are in trouble. What has this government's response been? As the member said, and I take it at face value, its major economic thrust was to get us into the new markets of the world, but it never found out what it was going to be with. It was not going to be with the goods that created the jobs and the value added here in Canada. Why else since free trade would we have lost 375,000 or 18 per cent of all our manufacturing jobs?

It is because of its free trade policy, combined with its obsession with inflation rather than dealing with the fundamentals of what make a competitive economy in the goods and services that we are going to have to trade.

Today, in this bill, we are asked to perform the final rites for the burial service for the Science Council of Canada, an institution which this government killed off some months ago. The Science Council of Canada was doing more work than any other body in this country to deal with the questions of technology, developing a science mentality in Canada, getting our younger people interested in science, transfer of technology, ways to diffuse it throughout our economy. It had done more work in this area than any other body and it cost us only $3.2 million a year. The $3.2 million is a lot of money, but not when we consider that it had some 25 of Canada's best professionals on its staff, not when we consider that the prosperity agenda of this government cost us seven times that. What did it produce? Yes, some good recommendations, a few pages, but not the volume of detail, scientific and economic research into science and technology. Where is this government's priority?

Why would the government kill off a body which, it admits, was doing work that was critical to our future? Our government pays lip service to science and technology, saying we need to have more of it, meanwhile cutting its commitment to science and technology.

Just look at its cuts to bodies such as the NRC. Look at the way it cut out completely the Economic Council of Canada. What happened? The government abolished the Science Council of Canada, not because it was not living up to what the government hypocritically is saying Canada's future needs, but because that Science Council was the only body, through its chairperson, Janet Halliwell, to say: "Government, you must not be cutting back, particularly when you are saying that Canada should be increasing in these areas". That person had the temerity to criticize publicly the government, unlike other persons who have come before our industry committee in the past, such as Mr. Perron from the NRC who said, no, he would never as the head of the major research body in Canada have the temerity to criticize the government; oh, no, that was not his role. The government could keep cutting as much as it wanted. Janet Halliwell had the guts to tell it the way it was. What happened? Today we are here to perform the final rites on Janet Halliwell and the Science Council of Canada.

Let me say one more thing. Not only is this government hypocritical, ill-informed and misdirected in what it has been doing in terms of science policy, it is continuing to pervert this process. When the government a few months ago abolished the Science Council of Canada, killed it, the industry committee, the standing committee of this House, through the opposition members, said we should at least have the Science Council here to have a report on what it has done, what it has accomplished and to get the benefit of its wisdom, even though it is no longer here, as to what we should be doing in the future.

Would the government House leader allow that Science Council to at least impart its wisdom to a committee consisting of all members of this House? No. Absolutely not. The Whips were on. This government was too embarrassed to have any more publicity on this shameful issue. At least the finance committee was able to get the Economic Council before it.

Let us not continue with the approach being adopted by the government. It is trying to throttle debate on Bill C-91, the drug bill, when all we want to do is have witnesses who can tell us whether its drug policies are working as it promised. The government is afraid to have the light of day shed on what its measures entail. It is so ashamed of its acts of cutting the Science Council, of trying to change the drug legislation through Bill C-91, that it is trying to scupper debate. It knows when the Canadian public hears these witnesses, they will rise up in further rebellion against the economic mismanagement, economic incompetence and the totally dictatorial and misdirected attitudes of this government.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words on this motion. I am not someone who would claim to be particularly familiar with the Science Council of Canada, but I recall that two or three years ago there was a gentlemen from Edmonton by the name of Ron Grantham, a distinguished engineer, principal in major engineering firm in western Canada, well known person in the community who was appointed to the board of the Science Council.

I recall seeing a letter he wrote after a period of time on the board. I believe it was addressed to either the Prime Minister or the minister—I received a copy of it—where he suggested that the Science Council was simply redundant, duplicating what was being done otherwise, and generally his recommendation as a board member was that it should be abolished. I was quick to contact him after the announcement and let him know that he was now out of a job which he, frankly, was glad to hear.

The mandate of the Science Council was to assess Canada's scientific and technological resources and requirements and to increase public awareness of science and technology issues. It had 30 council members, supported by a staff of 29 and a budget of a little over $3 million a year.

When the council was established in 1966 there were no other forums to provide independent advice on science and technology issues. However, with the establishment of many other institutes and centres of research and science and technology there are now many sources of information and advice available on those issues.

Clearly, government spending must be examined to increase its efficiency and effectiveness. In particular, resources in support of science must be rationalized to target research and minimize overhead. The closure of the Science Council will accomplish this with savings of $3.1 million annually starting in 1993-94.

The Science Council and the Department of Industry, Science and Technology have prepared a wind-up plan to predict Canadian taxpayers' investment in the council's assets, to prepare a fair, humane, severance package for its employees, and to outline its intentions for work in progress.

Almost all the work in progress at the time of the February budget announcement has now been completed. Furthermore, Industry, Science and Technology has assumed responsibility for printing and distributing final publications to the public once the council becomes dormant.

The National Library, pursuant to the National Library Act, has arranged for reassignment of the Science Council's library collections, and archival collections have been handed over to the National Archives as per the National Archives Act.

To conclude, the decision to close the Science Council was the right one as it achieves fiscal savings, rationalizes the government portfolio departments and agencies and redirects science resources from overhead to researchers.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have an opportunity to speak on the Science Council because it is a body of which this government and this Parliament was and still is in great need.

I think of the words of Canada's Nobel Prize laureate, John Polanyi, where he said: "In our concern that the size of the ship of state is too big, we are removing the rudder."

We are not talking about a great deal of money. We are talking about $3.2 million. I know the member who just spoke said he was not too familiar with the Science Council of Canada. He is probably not aware that it was wrapped up in July. They are not actually working on a wind-up plan now but shut its doors a number of months ago.

In speaking of Nobel Prize winners, I am reminded that two days ago, 1,600 scientists representing almost every country in the world, 100 of them Nobel Prize winners, held a press conference and warned all of the government's of the world of the impending dangers of ozone depletion, in part because of the meeting going on in Copenhagen where our Minister of Environment is at the moment.

They have come to a new conclusion, one that I think Parliaments such as ours needs to take a look at. A body like the Science Council of Canada would have borne the message to this Chamber, to the Prime Minister and to the cabinet. These scientists have come to some conclusions over the combining effects of ozone depleting substances over the Arctic; this is over northern Canada. When you get carbon dioxide into these super cold air masses higher up above the Arctic, the super chilled carbon dioxide does the same ozone depleting as do CFCs and halons and all of these other substances that we have heard about. These 1,600 doctorate level scientists world-wide are now predicting that the ozone will disappear entirely over the Canadian Arctic.

It seems to me that this is the kind of thing that should be debated in this Chamber. Perhaps it is not because as David Suzuki discovered when he provided a questionnaire to a sampling of this Parliament, he discovered that the average level of comprehension on science issues is grade 4. My son is in grade 5. He is 10 years old and he has a higher level of comprehension than the majority of members of this Chamber. I do not denigrate the Chamber for that. Individual constituencies elect members from many different backgrounds. But one of the things that members of this House have not been doing and should be doing is regularly reading scientific periodicals and getting briefings from independent bodies like the Science Council of Canada.

It is just beyond me. This government likes to practise what I call voodoo economics, and this is an example of a book-burning mentality. The Science Council made a number of recommendations on research and development; that we should be going forward on R and D from 1.4 per cent forward and yet under this government we have been going from 1.4 per cent of our GNP backwards. When recommendations saying: "If you are going to get anywhere, you are going to have to get some serious financing into the science community; you are going to have to start going on some of these high-tech ventures and high-tech products, and you have got to have a skilled, trained work force and a skilled, trained academic work force which is capable of staying at the cutting edge." We are not doing that, Mr. Speaker.

We heard my friend from Surrey—White Rock talking about the issue of the Science Council and the expenditures, the need to save money. We heard from the member for Mississauga South saying that we need smaller government, not bigger government. That is no longer the debate in this country or in the world. What we need is better government. We need reasonably intelligent and reasonably well-educated and reasonably with-it people who are involved in the process of governance, in the Public Service and in the work force.

I am appalled. Of the 295 members in this House, there is only a handful who could pass a grade 5 exam on what the depletion of the ozone is all about, who could really tell you what sustainable development is, who could tell you why there are 70 endangered species in Canada, who could tell you why it is important to protect 12 per cent of the endangered spaces in this country.

An hon. member: How do you know, did you run tests of members of the House?

Mr. Fulton: Tests have been done. Yes, a test has been done, and the average level of comprehension on science issues is grade 4.

There is 39 or maybe it is 49 members of the cabinet. Most of the members on the government side, at any rate, are in the cabinet so we know the average comprehension level in the cabinet is grade 4 or less on science issues.

We have book burning. Right? That is what you do when you do not like advice coming from people who are educated, you burn the books and you shut them up. Get a big sock and jam it in the mouth of those members of the Science Council. For God's sake, do not let them tell you that there are serious issues out there; do not let them talk about Great Lakes water quality, long chain organo-chlorines; do not let them talk about the problems of plutonium; do not let them talk about what is going on in the atmosphere. Just stick in there and worry about the bottom line. Make sure you get lots of ink—with this government it does not seem to matter whether it is red or black, just make sure you have lots of ink.

An hon. member: It's all red.

Mr. Fulton: It's all red. We have never had it this bad.

Let us compare, Mr. Speaker. The cabinet, these experts on science, decides to buy $4.4 billion worth of helicopters. Then it says: "We are going to put them on our new frigates. We have 10 ordered and we have had one delivered", but the helicopters have too wide a swath to land on the frigates. So it says: "Well, we bought them anyway; we'll use them for search and rescue". Out go the cabinet, riding across the land saying "We bought these for search and rescue".

• (2010)

I have talked to the search and rescue guys who actually jump out of helicopters to rescue people off mountains, out of the ocean and from sinking boats. They say that you cannot perform search and rescue out of the new EH-101's because the down-wash is 160 miles per hour. It would blow their eyeballs out on the pavement.

They cannot get away with that. They have 50 helicopters. They cannot land on the frigates so they cannot go offshore, they cannot chase subs, they cannot go out and check on the fishing fleet because they cannot carry enough fuel to go out, and they cannot conduct search and rescue missions because the down-wash is too strong.

It is like the subs. This is the same cabinet that was going to buy 10 or 20 nuclear subs and keep them under the Arctic ice to count polar bear tracks. We need the Science Council of Canada.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, speaking about significant down-drafts I want to address one more item in this bill. I want to note that we are dealing with a number of sections involving the dissolution of the Science Council of Canada. Clause 36 says:

> The council is hereby dissolved.

I want to point out that this section is not yet passed. That is what we are debating here.

Subclause 3 of clause 37 reads:

> The minister may do and perform all acts and things necessary for and incidental to closing out the affairs of the council.

Today my office attempted to reach the Science Council of Canada, which is still not dissolved. The minister has not been given the authority to close out the affairs of the council. We found that neither Bell Canada nor the government operator had a listing for the Science Council of Canada. By dialing both of the old numbers we found that the numbers had been disconnected. When my office called the general inquiries number at Industry, Science and Technology we were advised that "the council has been shut down and no longer exists".

Why are we here? Why are we debating the dissolution of the Science Council if the minister's department is saying that it no longer exists? Why are we authorizing the minister to do things when he has already done them? Could it be that he has done them without authority? Someone from the other side has to explain this in this continuing debate. Help us out a little bit on this question.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I listened to some of the debate about scientific illiterates in grade 4 and I felt I had to come in to defend some of my cabinet colleagues. I thought that I would defend the Minister for Science, who has a Ph.D. in metallurgy. He probably understands as much about science as the hon. member for Skeena's 10-year old son who is in grade 5.

Maybe the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who has a Ph.D. in aeronautics, might understand a little bit. Maybe the government House leader, who has a Ph.D. in chemical engineering, might understand. Who knows?

What really brought me in here was that I heard a glimmer of hope when I heard about the necessity for research in Canada. I heard members of the Liberal and New Democratic parties talk about more research. Right now before this Parliament there is an opportunity to pass legislation that will bring forward a billion dollars in incremental research in pharmaceuticals, biotechnology and all those important areas.

I hear the professor from Windsor talking. I would ask him to talk to the biochemists, the biologists, the pharmacologists and the medical researchers in his university and ask them what they think about Bill C-91. I have at least 100 letters from researchers across this country who say that passing Bill C-91 is the most important thing we could do to help research and development in this country. I was delighted to hear the concern about research and development from the opposition parties and I look forward to their support on that important legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 68. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

Motion No. 91

That Bill C-63 be amended in Clause 46 by deleting lines 41 and 42 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"come into force on July 1, 1994."

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved:

That Bill C-63 be amended in Clause 46 by striking out line 42 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"by order of the Governor in Council but no earlier than one year after the date that the Act receives Royal Assent."

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, this has been an interesting debate. In many ways it is not a bill that we really expect to see change because, as the representative from the Liberal Party has pointed out, these institutions have already been wound up despite the fact that we on this side of the House have not had a chance to debate even the report stage of this bill in the House of Commons. There has not been final passage of the bill in the House of Commons and yet all of these institutions are dead for all practical purposes.

The reality is that this government has not respected Parliament on this issue. This government has simply ploughed ahead despite the fact that Parliament passed acts in the past to establish these institutions. Now these institutions no longer effectively exist, despite the fact that these acts are still on the books.

This is as clear a demonstration as you could possibly want of the contempt for democracy which infects this Conservative Party, a contempt for democracy which leads this party to continue to hold office despite the fact that the Prime Minister of the country stated before he was elected that there should be an election every four years. Yet this government stays in power despite the fact that it has been well over four years, five days or four days over. It has been over four years and there is no prospect that this government has any intention of facing the people within the foreseeable future.

The Prime Minister has stated that he will probably be thinking about an election next August. That also shows the contempt of this party in power, as far as the democratic process is concerned.

The reality is that six institutions are being eliminated by this bill, including the Advisory Council. There are six institutions being eliminated and at the same time a prosperity report is being brought in by this government to establish six new institutions which I am certain will cost far more than these six that are being eliminated. The difference will be that these new institutions will be six new sources for Conservative patronage, six new chances to put people into positions at the public trough before these people are booted out of office. This is not the way a decent, democratic government in this country should run. A decent, democratic government in this country should have resigned after the referendum defeat of October 26. A decent, democratic government should now be facing the people. They should be facing the people. They should be receiving all the portents of defeat which are certain to face them no matter when they face the people.

They can delay. They can put it off. However, they have a date with the guillotine and that guillotine is going to come down. It is going to be, as some of them tried to suggest during debate the other night, a chop-chop ending to this government. This is an ending which is deserved, an ending which is long overdue, an ending which we will help to bring about, an ending which will, in the end, lead to their replacement by a social democratic government that will put into effect a decent, democratic government that will serve the people in this country. It will be a decent, democratic government which responds to the needs of the country and is not interested in simply establishing patronage positions. It will be a decent, democratic government that will act in an honest, straightforward way instead of trying to hoodwink people as this government is trying to do by eliminating six institutions so it can set up six more that will cost this country even more in the future. Let us throw these people out as fast as we possibly can.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex—Windsor was doing very well in his speech until he got to the bit about social democrats replacing the government and then I realized that his head was in the clouds where it usually is with his fellow friend and premier, Bobby Rae, who we all know has been a total disaster in Ontario. Indeed, almost everyone in this House realizes that if we had any other government in Ontario except the Rae government, Ontario would be out of the recession and the country would be on the road to prosperity again.

The only thing stopping that is this bunch opposite with their high interest rate policy and this kind of legislation which is doing untold damage to the fabric of the central government and only aggravating matters which are made worse by Bobby Rae and his group in Ontario. If these members beside me on my left would smarten up and tell Bobby Rae what to do and help get this government out instead of pandering to the government the way they do, we would all be better off.

If there was an election tomorrow it would not be just the government that went down the tubes. We would get rid of the NDP as well because Canadians are sick and tired of the pious nonsense they utter in this House on a daily basis.

What we are talking about in this bill is an attempt—

An hon. member: Don't count on it.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says: "Don't count on it". I say call an election. We will find out. I urge him to look at the polls. At 14 per cent they have big trouble.

I want to say that the bill before us has chopped six venerable institutions in Canada. The amendment we are faced with tonight is one that deals with a date on which this act is to come into force. It is clause 46 of the bill.

I am disappointed in the amendments that have been moved, frankly. Had I realized the amendments were so brief in their import, I would have moved ones that were a little longer myself. The hon. member for Essex—Windsor was prepared to let this bill come into force on July 1, 1994. Why 1994 for heaven's sake? It is only two years away. It is ridiculous.

I would have put this off for 15 years. Why would we ever agree to a bill that came into force that chopped all these agencies right away? As my good and learned colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River has said, the government has implemented this bill before we even started debating it.

It chopped the Science Council of Canada even before today. The hon. member tried to phone them today and could not get an answer. Where did he phone after that? He called the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

He has been proven incompetent. We read the other day in the Auditor General's report how he was letting out contracts of $700,000 without tender to all his Tory fat-cat friends. That is what was going on there.

As for the prosperity initiative, we know who got prosperous as a result of the prosperity initiative. It was a pack of Tories. They were the ones who got prosperous as a result of the prosperity initiative. It has been a total disaster for Canada.

My distinguished colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell asked an intelligent question on this subject the other day and he got absolutely no answer whatever from the government. I am not surprised.

If the government is prepared to chop the Science Council and the Economic Council because it does not like their advice, clearly it is prepared to do anything and to go to any length to make sure that it does not suffer at the hands of the electorate. The best way to do that is to give good contracts to your fat-cat Tory friends who will give you back the money in spades and campaign donations. That is what we see going on right now. That is what is going on in this country at this moment.

The hon. member looks shocked and pretends he is shocked. He knows perfectly well what is going on. We see it on this side of the House every day. We may point it out. Hon. members opposite laugh. Listen to them laugh now, Mr. Speaker. They laugh. They think that wasting the public funds of Canada on lining the pockets of Tory fat-cats is a good policy or something that they should laugh about.

We on this side are not laughing. We think this is a disaster for this country and the sooner we have an election so that we can get this bunch out the better it will be for all Canadians.

Let us look at this bill. Let us see what the government has done in this bill. The Economic Council of Canada was headed by a very distinguished economist in recent years, Ms. Judith Maxwell. Queen's University in my constituency has hired Ms. Maxwell to assist them as assistant director of the school of policy studies at Queen's. They have taken her on primarily so that she can complete the very important research that was being done by the Economic Council of Canada before this government announced that it was terminating the Economic Council in the last budget.

An hon. member: It is being done at the expense of Queen's University.

Mr. Milliken: I believe the Government of Canada is paying some money to complete this research work. Therefore, it is not all at the expense of Queen's University, although I have no doubt the university is picking up some of the cost.

An hon. member: It is patronage in your riding.

Mr. Milliken: It may be an advantage in the riding. I would not say it is patronage. Normally, when research is done by universities as he must know, universities themselves pick up some of the cost. That cost is being absorbed by Queen's. I have no doubt that it is absorbing some cost in having this done.

Nevertheless, it has the advantage of having the good advice and the instructional capability of Ms. Maxwell whose ability is well known and well recognized across this country because of the excellent work she did for the Economic Council of Canada. Yet the government decided that it did not need this kind of advice. Why not? Because it did not like the advice. That is why not.

The advice was contrary to the rather stupid policies the government has been following in this House which have cost Canadians dearly every day and month of the year. We have paid handsomely for having this government in office.

The questions that were asked by the Leader of the Opposition today and by the member for Windsor West and even the one by the opposition House leader on the Westray situation all indicated a complete and flagrant abuse of the use of public funds in Canada since 1984 and certainly in the last couple of years. That is a subject that should be the subject of intense discussion in the course of an election campaign.

I cannot believe that there are only two minutes left. Have I spoken for eight minutes already? I find this hard to believe.

An hon. member: See how time flies.

An hon. member: It is too long.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says: "It is too long". I can understand his discomfort. I can understand how uncomfortable he feels hearing these true remarks about his government's disastrous record for Canada.

Let us turn to the Law Reform Commission. That is another good one. The Law Reform Commission has provided excellent service to Canadians over the years. I have talked, on second reading of this bill, about when I was in South Africa some months ago with some colleagues from the other side who unfortunately are not here tonight. They have been fleet of foot and I can understand because they must be terribly embarrassed.

• (2030)

In South Africa, we met with a senior representative of their Law Reform Commission. He was not the chairman but he was very senior member of the commission. In the course of our trip, he sat down to a very nice lunch with us to talk about the Law Reform Commission and the work it was doing in South Africa in trying to end apartheid in that country.

His first remark was how much he appreciated the work of the Canadian Law Reform Commission. The reports they received from Canada were among the best in the world. That is what he said. I said: "Well of course". This was in March. The budget came down in February and the government chopped the Law Reform Commission. I said to him: "Well, of course you realize our Law Reform Commission is being terminated". He said: "What?" I said: "Oh yes. In the latest budget the Minister of Finance gave it the chop".

My two colleagues, who are both Tories, good friends of all my hon. friends opposite, went: "Oh no, you would mention that", as though this was something that had gone wrong. Well, it had gone wrong. They realized that their government had failed them badly. Their government had let them down. Their Minister of Finance had done something he should not have done. They knew it but they are not here to vote against this bill tonight. I bet you they will not be here tomorrow to vote against it either. They were so ashamed. They almost went blue in the face they were so shocked.

If the hon. members opposite had any sense of shame, any sense of decency, they would also stand up and vote against this bill and get this government defeated in this House so that we can have an election and then see who wins. Because if they really believe that what they say is right, if they voted against the government, they might win their own seats. The five or ten that are here might win their own seats and the rest of them can go down to defeat.

The government would be thrown out. We would get a good Liberal government in Canada and Canadians would rejoice. They would rejoice. Canadians would be so pleased that these members had voted their government out they might elect them again.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I truly regret the day the Government of Canada announced it was terminating these institutions. There was one in particular that meant a lot to me and still does, and I am referring to the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security.

I would like to go back very briefly to April 1984, when, if I remember correctly, we had a debate on second reading of the bill to establish the institute. If I am not mistaken, the bill was referred to the standing committee on external affairs and national defence which I had the privilege of chairing at the time. There were many hurdles to overcome, and I must admit a number of parliamentarians made clever show of ostensibly supporting the bill, because they realized the Trudeau era was drawing to a close and did not want to be accused of preventing the establishment of this important institute. It was important to the people of this world, to Canadian pride, to the young people in our universities and to those who believe that Canada has a major role to play in this area because of our exceptional reputation on the international scene, a reputation I wish Canadians would be more prepared to recognize, because I often notice that foreign nationals take greater pride in Canada than Canadians do themselves. When I say Canadians, I also mean Quebecers, because to me, Canadians include Quebecers.

In 1984 we managed to do the impossible. We were able to report the bill back to the House on June 28, when it was passed. The next day, the Right Hon. Prime Minister at the time, Mr. Trudeau, had the extraordinary kindness to thank the chairman of the committee. I must say I was not in the habit of being thanked by the Right Hon. Mr. Trudeau. Since he assumed I was in the House, he was particularly cordial, but unfortunately I was on the telephone in the lobby, trying to clear up an immigration problem, so I did not hear a word of what he said. I do know that at the time, there were several members like my friend, Stan Darling—even if it is against the Standing Orders to refer to him by name, I will take that liberty—who was involved in those issues, and I am sure he will remember.

[English]

The Prime Minister of Canada at that time said: "This is one of the nicest things that happened to me on my last day, the 29th of June, 1984". It was also the last day for the minister of foreign affairs, Allan MacEachen, who announced also that day that he was not going to run again and went to the other place, as we like to call it.

Now, today, the peace institute is disappearing, the pride of Canada, because of a few million dollars.

This institute was created to try to understand the changes in the world. Now the government thinks that communism has exploded, it is finished. Well let me tell you otherwise. This institute would be as important now as it was then to study the world at a very low cost to the taxpayer.

I am known as Mr. Scrooge in my party. I do not like to spend money in a frivolous way. However I have to be on record not because I have given much of my life to that institute, not because with my friend, the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka, we believed at that time that we should have that institute, but it is because of the good that it could still do today.

I am telling you that if I stay in this House longer, if the gods of the day, the ladies who sit in heaven, are kind to me and if I do come back here and if there is a chance, I assure you there will be a reinstitution of a peace institute of that kind.

The world is becoming more and more difficult. Canada has the reputation in the world of being sensitive and understanding. People look to us as a breath of fresh air.

The whole world sees us as a glimmer of hope in an increasingly complex world. People think that if Canada can find some solutions, there may be some hope at the United Nations. The institute analysed all these issues and invited people from all walks of life. You are aware of my support for the Palestinian cause. The institute organized meetings between the people of the country I recognize, the State of Israel, and the people of a country that should exist, which was and will be called Palestine, to try and understand the motivation behind their mutual hostility. I see the hon. member for Outremont, a psychologist who knows that if we understand what motivates people, if we understand the motivation behind love and hate, a solution can be found.

The institute provided a dispassionate analysis of the international situation in a world that is changing fast, too fast. We need people with this kind of dispassionate view and an insight, and I admire them. I would like to name all the directors of the institute, but I will name the first one, Mr. Pearson, the son of the man who brought me into politics, Lester B. Pearson, a man of peace, who incidently was the first secretary and the first director general, and the last director, Bernard Wood. No partisan politics here.

Like all the people who wrote to me and whose letters I am still answering, I don't understand. I can find no rational explanation.

• (2040)

[English]

I wish to give a rational explanation to people who ask me why it was cancelled. I cannot find one because it was good.

We talk about a new world order. The United States says that there is a new world order. I do not want to live under that kind of definition of new world order. I want—and this is what the Peace Institute was trying to do—more than one superpower in the world. This is known. I want Europe to be one. I want Asia to be one. It is very dangerous if we do not understand the definition of the new world order as defined by the United States of America, our friend and our neighbour but certainly not my patron or my boss. The Peace Institute was trying to——analyse these complex situations.

So I wanted to put this on the record, and I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your kindness and I also want to thank one of the committee's survivors, the hon. member for Parry Sound —Muskoka—

[English]

He has been the pillar of the committee on foreign affairs. When everybody was talking nonsense, he was the only one who could come to the committee and say: "That is enough, Mr. Chairman, they are out of order". That would include his own colleagues and at times my own colleagues. I was happy because I felt I had the confidence of my colleagues.

First, I regret. Second, I do not understand. Third, I would hope whoever is in government would reconsider the good that was created by that institute and reconsider the re-establishment of that institute some day. That is why I wanted to be on record.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I will not take up too much of the House's time, but this is the first chance I have had since the beginning of this debate to address the termination of these agencies.

[English]

It is important for all Canadians to realize just what it is that the government is trying to shut down tonight. When I say trying, I know it will ultimately succeed. It is not that I want it that way but for the time being, albeit temporarily, we still have a majority of Conservative members in Parliament. They want to shut down the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council at a time when issues involving immigration are, shall I say, probably at the top or close to the top of the political agenda of our country.

The Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security is proposed to be shut down. The hon. member for Saint-Denis put the case for retaining that institution so well that there is little I could do to embellish the very good argument he has already put forward.

Turning to the Economic Council of Canada, here we are in the depths of a recession, the worst one we have seen since the great depression of the 1930s by far. There is higher unemployment and the toughest economic situation I have ever had to live with. Yes, I was there in the previous recession of 1982 and in my riding this one regrettably is far worse. At a time when we could be listening to constructive suggestions to get out of the recession, the Economic Council of Canada is all but non-existent save and except a telephone line.

Next is the International Centre for Ocean Development. Last night we were hearing about environmental issues in the Soviet Union. We learned that tonnes of radioactive waste had been dumped in the Arctic for years and none of us knew about it. The new Russian authorities are now making us aware of the environmental disasters created by previous administrations.

On the Law Reform Commission I read a submission some months ago in a newspaper article which indicated that Canada without a Law Reform Commission would be right up there with underdeveloped nations of Africa. I believe the example used was Rwanda. That is now where we are.

I am not a lawyer, not that I apologize for that of course, I want to tell my colleagues over here particularly, but I have read extensively the reports of the Law Reform Commission on a number of issues. I can think right now for instance of the reports it did on such controversial issues as abortion and others, not that I have always agreed with everything that was said. As a matter of fact, I have agreed with dissenting reports but it does not matter. I had good, sound, unbiased information provided by great legal minds that I as a legislator could use. I am not the only one; the courts and others read them. How many people have read reports of the Law Reform Commission? The former Law Clerk of Parliament sat on the Law Reform Commission. I am speaking of Joe Maingot whom you probably know quite well, Mr. Speaker.

We are at a period when we are talking about the future of our country being in research and development. We as a nation are in the process of establishing a space agency. We are debating a bill right now—and I do not happen to agree with the government on its merits—on research issues such as pharmaceutical products. Yet the Science Council of Canada is being abolished, an agency that could give us and give Canadians good and sound advice.

What are we doing it for? I want all Canadians to know that we are doing it to save $22 million a year. I am not saying that is a small amount. That is a lot of money.

An hon. member: Yes.

Mr. Boudria: Now that we have all acknowledged that is a lot of money, including the member for Mississauga South, let me give a few instances of money not so well spent.

I just happen to have a copy of the Auditor General's report tabled in the House yesterday. Let us read a few excerpts from this report. It is quite good stuff. I recommend it. It is good reading.

Let us talk about the industry, science and technology department. We are closing down the Science Council. Presumably there must be some sort of affiliation. The industry, science and technology department entered into 22 contracts worth $3.3 million for such things as advertising and organizing public meetings.

Guess how many of them were correct. Guess how many of them were approved by Treasury Board. Zero. Guess how many contravene Treasury Board regulations. Twenty-two out of twenty-two. Guess how many of those contracts were untendered and went to friends of the government. Twenty-two out of twenty-two.

Let us look at the health and welfare department and its income security programs. This is a cute one.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Boudria: I hear the member across the way asking questions. I tell him to be patient. We will enlighten the member. We can even ask him questions later.

The Auditor General is not a member of the opposition, but an independent officer of the House and one appointed by the present Prime Minister, I might add. He said: "The department failed to properly administer contracts valued at $5 million during the planning phase of the Income Security Program redesign project". Let me give you just a bit more information on this, Mr. Speaker, because I know that I have now aroused your curiosity. "While they spent on these contracts, some $350,000 were given in untendered contracts." Do you know how they did it to give untendered contracts? They broke them down in $10,000 slices and gave a whole bunch of contracts to the same people to contravene the Treasury Board rules. This is what we are told.

I have just enumerated two examples. I could go on and on and tell you about hundreds of millions in government waste. I have just read a few lines in this very thick document.

I say to the members across, if it is $22 million they want to save, why not do some reasonable things like reducing the size of cabinet and having some integrity in contracting procedures? Why is it that this government has no money for these councils, no money to improve the lot of Canadians but it has enough money to renew the lease on a building which the Auditor General says the government does not even need? Why? Why? Those are the questions those members who are heckling right now will have to answer.

They will have to answer to the people of Canada soon. We are into the fifth year of this government's four-year mandate. I hope that they answer very soon.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to give some wind-up remarks on Bill C-63. We saw the government House leader come zinging in here, saying that there were a couple of people in the cabinet who had an education. That is great. I am glad there are. However, one thing the government House leader did not talk about is why the Minister of Employment and Immigration did not have anything to say in this debate to those people who had something to do over the past few years with the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council. If it is such a good idea to get rid of it, you would think the minister would want to stand up for it.

Why did the Minister of Justice not come and say something about the demolition of the Law Reform Commission that served this country and this House well for 20 years? What about the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, CIIPS as it is known? Where was the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Why did she not having something to say about why this was such a good idea and that the replacement body was where people could find knowledgeable, internationally respected researchers they could communicate with and give their ideas to?

What about the International Centre for Ocean Development? Why did the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans not come and have something to say? Perhaps he could have made some remarks as to the issue that was raised with him so directly in Rio at UNCED on why Canada has not ratified the Law of the Sea, something that is important to countries around this world. We are within a couple of countries of having the necessary numbers for full ratification and yet Canada is still hiding in the weeds.

The Science Council of Canada. What about the minister of science and technology? One would have thought that if the demolition of the Science Council of Canada was so good that surely the minister of science would want to put on the record what these great ideas are for getting rid of it and where scientists are to place their opinions so they can be heard and parliamentarians can find out the independent, collective wisdom of the scientific community.

We do not have that. Here we have the methodology of the book burners. We have the lip-zippers. You do not want anybody talking because they might be talking against your government and you cannot have that.

Of course what it really comes down to is what I describe as the implementation of the flat earth theory from the government benches. It is that these small independent bodies had some influence. They had some power. If we learned anything from the referendum, surely we learned that the collective initiatives of elected members do not have a great deal of influence on certain very important issues in this country. What we should have learned from that is the desire for more local control, more local input, and for these kinds of arm's length institutions where people have some serious feelings that they are going to be heard.

I know lots of peace activists who think the last persons in this country they would ever bother to write to any more, bother to try to call or try to get a meeting with, are the present Minister of National Defence and the present Secretary of State for External Affairs. They know that is a dead end. They do not want to come and play around the skirts or the edges of Parliament. The places they were going, because they knew they were being heard and they knew they were avenues to the international community were places like the Peace Institute and CIIPS. People knew there was good quality research, good quality information. It was a place where they could be heard and it was a place where they knew at least parts of their message would be carried to parliamentarians.

That had to be muzzled. It had to be shut down. I see the bloody fingerprints of political handlers all over this. This was not decided by the Minister of Finance alone. We know something, for example the proposal to put the new immigration operations in Vegreville, Alberta. The government is saying that it is putting it there because it will be better; it is the high-tech age and we have to centralize and to do it all there.

We know enough about computers now. Those 200 people who would be placed in Vegreville could be anywhere. They could be in Iqaluit, Yellowknife, White Horse, Prince Rupert or Toronto. They do not need to be all in the same building, in the same place. Those same political handlers are putting it in Vegreville for crass political reasons. It is the Deputy Prime Minister's seat.

You are nodding Mr. Speaker; you know that. You are a member from Alberta. You know how these things work. You are responding to those vibes from Presto. Presto is saying: "Watch out, Maz" so we have to respond this way or that way; there are too many institutions.

The horrific part of the termination of these particular institutions is the cold, hard, political eye of the handlers. They got their fingers on the jugular of these institutions. The Economic Council of Canada had bad things to say about the government's interest rate policy, its policy on the dollar and what it was doing on research and development. So out comes the hands of the political handlers to strangle it down. They say: "If all you other independent institutions want government funding—see what we did to this one—say nice things about us or you are next".

CIIPS says something about something the minister of external affairs does not like and out comes the hand of the handlers. It strangles it down. There is the end of another independent voice. The Science Council of Canada with Nobel laureates gives advice to the Prime Minister and to the country. They say: "There is not enough research and development going on. Canada is going to start to fall behind". Out comes the arm of the Tory political handlers and strangles it down.

At some point this whole institution, members who can still think, has to say: "What kind of messages are we sending out of here?" This is dictatorial. My colleague is going to enlighten the House on something he knows a great deal about in terms of the entirely undemocratic nature of what is being done here.

These were acts of Parliament. There were votes by every member of this place to initiate them. Their throats were slit. The government treated them like some kind of economic aneurysms. They say: "Give them all a lobotomy. Get rid of these people". Who are these people?

They are not average, run of the mill Canadians, the people who donate their time. I know some of the lawyers who have worked on the Law Reform Commission. They stepped down from the big bucks to donate some of their time, sometimes a few months, sometimes a few years at a time, to move a legal ball forward, back into our court, because they know we kick it out because it is politically sensitive.

It is the same with the Science Council of Canada. Most of these scientists donate their time. I spoke earlier this evening about the 1,600 scientists who two days ago gave an alert to the world. Was is ever debated in this House, that the potential for life on this earth is threatened by something that we are doing? Are we doing anything about it? I think it is one of the problems with this place. There is not a collective, intelligent voice coming out of here any more. I think there was when I came here but we have been battered back, badgered.

We talk about parliamentary reform but every single power that an individual member had when I came here in 1979 has been stripped away. Even private members' bills, what are your chances of ever getting one of serious value voted? You have to win a lottery, then you have to convince a bunch of government members, then if they get a phone call from the government House leader they will not be able to do it. It is preposterous.

The fingerprints of the demands for power are all over this place. It has been corrupted. I think that these are the symptoms of serious corruption and an election could not come soon enough for me. It really could not.

I hear my friends to my right—and frankly I quite often think the Liberals are to the far right of the Tories on many issues, on the FTA and NAFTA. They do not have the moxie to stand up in this House and be honest. They do not believe what the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra said, that they would tear up the FTA. They voted here on May 11 against abrogating. They voted with the Conservatives. It is the same with the North America free trade agreement. In the committee they voted against going to members' constituencies. They voted against going to most of the provinces and the territories of this country.

They do not want the Liberals to be exposed to the reality of their position on NAFTA, that they support NAFTA, they support the free trade agreement. They do not have any plans to change it.

And they have the pomposity to stand up here in the coachman's uniform of the previous speaker and rattle and prattle on about Bob Rae. Bob Rae is a very fine politician. People in this House should have the decency on all sides to say good things about people when they are good. I did that in my constituency and throughout the referendum about the member for Yellowhead. I am proud that I did and I would say it in here any time about someone of that cut of cloth.

I will not say it about the Prime Minister because the Prime Minister did not play fair during the referendum. He knew what he was doing. He knew what he was crafting, and asking in Quebec. That is why the polls are being hidden. We wonder why $3 million in polls are being hidden after the court rules they have to be released. Taxpayers' money was used for partisan political purposes.

It is the same kind of crap in here and it galls me to the bottom of my soul that not a single minister had the guts to come in here and tell the people of Canada why they slit the throats of these independent institutions.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, to steer us back into the section we proposed, this particular amendment would postpone the implementation and proclamation of this statute for a period that I hope would be a very long time.

What we have behind this bill is an initiative to streamline and privatize and reduce some of the spending. While the expressed motives may be laudatory it is my perception in this case this is not a question of government as in an ordinary privatization of government getting out of business. In this case it is a question of government getting out of government. There is a whole lot of government that has to be done and which, in my view, is not being done. I think Canadians feel that way now.

By cutting these agencies the government says it is going to save some money. The last estimate we heard here on the floor was $22 million. Although the government is cutting these agencies, as my friend from Essex—Windsor said earlier, it has created another six agencies this past year covering the same territory.

I can only note cynically that the creation of these new agencies, or new initiatives, doing things in the same areas happens in the year running up to an election. It is very odd. I resist the urge to be more expressively cynical than that, but the point I am trying to make is that really the government is not saving money here. It says it is, but it is not. It is a very small example, big numbers though.

Just a very few years ago the Law Reform Commission undertook on its own a comprehensive study of the law and reproductive technologies. The cost of that exercise and the report which many MPs have in their offices was $250,000.

Right now a Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies is going on and the estimated cost for that—hold on to your hat—is $30 million. On one hand, we have a reproductive technology study costing $30 million and on the other is $250,000. Make the calculation and figure out which was better for the taxpayers.

The Law Reform Commission was better by far. The expertise, all of the information and data was right there in the Law Reform Commission, and it would still be there had the Law Reform Commission stayed.

This government has acted with regard to these agencies without a law to back them up, as I pointed out earlier. I could say that the government was lawless, acting without the benefit of the statute. In any event, it has proceeded and I regret that very much.

The adoption of this amendment would serve Canadians well.

Mr. Blenkarn: Oh, no.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I have just received the ultimate compliment. The member for Mississauga South said: "Oh, no" when I got up to speak.

I just wanted to make a few comments on this bill. A great deal has already been said that I concur in, particularly by the hon. member for Skeena. However, the one thing that struck me is something that when I first came to this Chamber I would have heard Tories saying, but we do not hear them saying it anymore.

This particular bill has two things in it that augur against the spirit of true parliamentary debate. One, of these various councils, institutes, et cetera that are being shut down, many have been shut down before this bill was even considered by Parliament and passed by Parliament.

I can remember the so-called old days when people would have railed against this usurpation of the power of Parliament. Would it not have been more parliamentary for these institutes and councils to have maintained their existence until such time as there was a real debate in Parliament, and maybe even a debate in Parliament during which members would have been freed to have voted their own particular judgment on this issue because the Science Council of Canada is not a matter of confidence.

We hear a lot of talk about free votes and that sort of thing. Most of these institutions were established by separate acts of Parliament and they should have been disbanded, if they were to be disbanded, by separate acts of Parliament so that we were not greeted as we were tonight with something else that the Tories made a big fuss about many times when they were in opposition, which is basically an omnibus bill.

One time when they were faced with an omnibus energy bill they rang the bells in this place for 16 days and precipitated a parliamentary crisis.

Our fundamental objection to this bill is not that it is an omnibus bill. We object to the whole bill. It is not as if there are some parts of it that we want to vote for. It is no wonder people are cynical because the fact is that we see the Conservative Party in government doing time and time again the very things that it made a political and parliamentary career out of criticizing when it was the opposition.

It was good at it. I have to confess I believed the Conservatives. There was a time when I thought they might actually be different in some respects. There was a time when they were different in some respects—very few, very little, not much, but in some respects they were. For instance, there was a time for a while when ministers took the House more seriously. They came in here and made policy statements.

The member for Yellowhead was pretty good at that, and the member for Skeena has already spoken well of him. There were a few others like that, but what have we seen in the last few days? The Prime Minister makes a major economic speech to whom? He made it to the PC Canada fund at $500 a plate.

Here we are. That same day we asked the Prime Minister as representatives of the people, as people who have been elected by the people: "What are you going to do about the economy?" We did not get any answers at all. We were not even told to wait for the evening. We were not even told that anything was going to be said. We had to read about it in the newspaper the next day.

We read about what the $500 a plate people got to know about the Prime Minister's plans that members of Parliament were not told. Just today the Minister of National Revenue outlined a new plan for streamlining Revenue Canada and the collection of taxation in Canada. Did he make it in the House of Commons? Oh, kid me not. Why would you want to do that? Who cares about the House of Commons any more on that side of the House?

He makes a major statement to the Canadian Tax Foundation, and the examples go on and on and on of the systematic contempt in which this government has come to hold Parliament.

There are people on that side of the House who should know better. Some of them are in the Chamber tonight. Some of them would have complained about this had the Liberals done it and yet we hear nothing. If we hear anything at all, we might hear some kind of sophistic defence of this particular kind of activity on the part of the government.

We have come a long way from those heady days of 1984 and 1985 when there was some reasonable expectation that the great parliamentary reformers would actually act in such a way, through the McGrath committee and so on, as to bring Parliament out of the disrepute into which people thought it had fallen then. I look back on 1984 now as a golden age of Parliament when I compare it to what it is now after eight years of Tory rule. It is after eight years of rule basically not by Parliament, not even by the Cabinet, but by the Prime Minister's Office and by the praetorian guard that gathers now around leaders wherever they are. In some sense this is a function of modern political leadership regardless of party. Here, though, we have its finest example, whereby members of Parliament, the elected representatives of the people, just keep getting more and more marginalized.

It is no wonder that people are mad at politicians. Their anger, however, is in some sense misdirected because they are angry at the powerlessness of their politicians, of their members of Parliament and of their MLAs. The roles that we collectively used to have, have been eroded by Prime Ministers' offices, by nameless anonymous staff, everywhere you turn. They are making the real decisions in political parties, in the bureaucracy and in the ministries wherever you go. It is eroded by pollsters, eroded by the courts, eroded by federal-provincial conferences and by executive federalism. You name it. There is hardly anything left for members of Parliament to do except to engage in various forms of surrogate political activity.

We fill our days with busyness as a substitute for power. It was not that members of Parliament ever had a lot of power, but they had some and they could make some things happen because this used to be a more human place where making a case to a minister or to some key person might have made a difference on behalf of a constituent or on behalf of an issue.

Look at tonight as we debate the demise of the Canadian Institute for Peace and Security. I was here when that was formed and it was formed out of the concerted effort of a number of members of Parliament on all sides of the House.

I think tonight of the former member from New Westminster—Burnaby, Pauline Jewett, who was very instrumental in setting up CIIPS. If she were here tonight, the rage that I have expressed and that the member for Skeena has expressed would pale by comparison. That is because there was a recognition at that time that we needed something like the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security to provide independent and objective reflection on a variety of issues.

The end of the cold war does not bring an end to the need for that kind of reflection. In fact, the post-cold war era in many respects might make the cold war look like a picnic if we don't get a handle on the rise of neo-Nazism in Germany and the proliferation of nuclear weapons sold in every corner of the earth by desperate Russians, Kazakhstanis and Uzbekistanis and so on.

We have big problems and the last thing we need is to shut down a think-tank that was trying to give some systematic reflection to these kinds of things. We would not want that, though. Just let the bean counters rule the world. Well, their day will soon be up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Normally at this time the House would proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the bill now before the House. However, pursuant to an order made earlier this day the recorded divisions will stand deferred until Thursday, November 26, 1992 at 10 a.m.

It being 9.15 o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 o'clock a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 9.15 p.m.

POINT OF ORDER

BILL C-91

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise this morning with some reluctance. I do not believe that the behaviour of a legislative committee chair has been brought to the attention of the House before.

I want to say that the hon. member for Ontario, who is the chair of the legislative committee for Bill C-91 looking into the Patent Act is, of course, the Speaker's delegate appointed by the Speaker, was not elected, and reports through the Speaker to the House.

This chair is charged with maintaining the same role in committee as the Speaker is in the House. He must remain impartial. This is important. He must sustain the will of the majority while safeguarding the rights of the minority.

Very briefly I want to refer to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, sixth edition, section 168, where it says:

> Confidence in the impartiality of the Speaker is an indispensable condition of the successful working of procedure, and many conventions exist which have as their object, not only to ensure the impartiality of the Speaker but also to ensure that there is a general recognition of the Speaker's impartiality.

It is with a heavy heart that I have to report to the House that last night, and also this morning, the chair of the legislative committee spoke in a very partisan way to the media about the proceedings of the legislative committee regarding Bill C-91.

The fact that he spoke to the media is perhaps open to some question but that he made a number of comments—I will not read them out to the House this morning—that were very partisan, very critical of certain members and very critical of the opposition's role in the proceedings, is not carrying on the tradition that we have come to know and respect in this House through you, Mr. Speaker.

I ask if you would review this situation. It is most unacceptable. Because of the now common use of time allocation and closure, much of the important debate on bills goes on in the various legislative committees since it does not occur in the House.

Therefore to maintain the impartiality of the chair, as you do in this House, Mr. Speaker, is perhaps even more critical than ever considering the need for open debate and the chair ensuring not only the will of the majority but the fact that the role of the opposition is recognized.

I wonder about the appropriateness of the member for Ontario continuing on in that role because of this breach of impartiality.

I would ask that in order to enable that committee to proceed as a legislative committee ought to proceed, you look into this matter at your earliest convenience.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge that my friend from Kamloops said this was a very unusual thing to be doing. He is seeking to do in the House what ought to remain within the committee.

I do not think it is appropriate to comment on the substance of what he is alleging. What is before us is whether it is appropriate for you to deal with the conduct of a legislative committee. As the House is well aware the committee has been striving to deal with this legislation for a number of days now and is encountering what I can only describe as filibustering from the other side.

To come to the heart of the matter, the problem is not time allocation. The problem is the committee dealing with the issue of the bill before it. On the matter that my hon. friend has raised I would just draw his attention to Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 760(3):

The Speaker has ruled on many occasions that it is not competent for the Speaker to exercise procedural control over the committees. Committees are and must remain masters of their own procedure.

The matter begins and ends there.

Mr. Speaker: I may not need very much more advice on this matter, but I will hear from the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, let me confirm what my colleague from the New Democratic Party has said concerning the behaviour of this particular committee chairperson.

The parliamentary secretary opposite has made a timely intervention but the only appeal that we have is to you, Mr. Speaker, who presides over this Chamber. As indicated previously, this particular chairperson is a delegate of yourself.

I hope you will reflect on the comments which have been made with regard to this particular chairperson. The activities that are taking place in the committee are highly unusual in view of the large number of witnesses which have been requested.

I do not want to get into a substantive debate on that particular point, but I think the Chair should make a careful examination as to exactly what is taking place in this particular instance.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has raised a matter rising out of a legislative committee and he has cited to the House some appropriate procedural law with respect to the role of the Speaker. He has reminded the House that particularly the chairman, who is the subject of this intervention is, of course, appointed by the Chair.

However the hon. member for Kamloops has restrained himself, and I think properly so, from getting into substantial debate here on the floor of the House as to what was said. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has also constrained himself and I appreciate that. I thank him for not getting into the substance of the debate.

The hon. parliamentary secretary has pointed out that generally speaking the Chair does not interfere with the affairs of a committee. I understand because I have been apprised of this and I thank the hon. member for Kamloops for saying that the matter has been at least partially raised in committee this morning.

The proper course is for the committee to deal with it further if the committee so wishes. I would hope that the matter would be satisfactorily resolved there. At least for now that is where I am going to leave it.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, it is normal practice in the Chamber that when a member's behaviour is brought up on the floor of the House, that member be notified and generally would be present. I think the record should show that the member in question is not present and has not had an opportunity to make comment, if that member feels aggrieved in some way.

Mr. Speaker: That certainly is the usual custom and I thank the hon. member for reminding the House of it. However, in view of what has been said and in view of my response, that is where the matter should be left at the moment.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to pursue this matter but I want to seek clarification.

Since the matter was raised earlier today in the committee at the appropriate place, and the chair of the committee simply ruled out any further discussion, I take, not from your ruling but from your suggestion, that this ought to be pursued in the committee as opposed to the floor of the House of Commons. If we still have a grievance with the Chair that is the place where it should be raised. Is that correct?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops is correct. I have been apprised of how far it has gone in the committee. It is up to the committee and up to members to decide whether they wish to take it any further in the committee. For now that is where it should be left.

Again I am very conscious of what the hon. member for Calgary West has said. Ordinarily, if we were going to get into the substance of the complaint, I would not have proceeded without the chairman being here. Under the circumstances that is where we ought to leave it for now.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

MURAL CITY OF CANADA ACT

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-378, an act declaring the city of Welland to be the mural city of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Parent: Madam Speaker, with all this applause I am encouraged to proceed with the bill.

Welland, one of the cities in my riding, features an amazing outdoor art gallery made up of 28 huge murals around the city, some as big as 20 feet by 40 feet. Every year we get bus loads of visitors, literally thousands of people regularly coming to Welland to see the murals.

It all started in the early 1980s when the city was in economic trouble and the downtown core was in decline. At that time a group of citizens formed what they called the promote Welland task force which was headed by Mr. Ken Jensen and Mr. John Van Kouten. Hundreds of volunteers, 12 committees and 17 Canadian artists later, and we have a unique Canadian project in our city and a dream which is fast becoming a lasting reality for all of us in Welland and in the riding.

I heartily recommend this bill to all my colleagues in the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Parent moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE STATUS OF DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am wondering if my colleague, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, could perhaps intervene in a situation which I think may require the guidance of the Chair.

The Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship has had in his hands for quite some time a report from the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. That report is entitled Paying too Dearly and is with regard to the Court Challenges Program.

Under the rules the minister has so many days in which to table a comprehensive response. However, as a result of the referendum and the House being closed and cabinet not being in session, the minister was unable to do that.

• (1100)

I raised this matter last Thursday, October 19, in the House. The minister was present and gave an answer, and I am quoting from Hansard at page 13659:

> Madam Speaker, consistent with the policy of the government and the House I am now waiting to consult my cabinet colleagues. The appropriate appearance will be taking place before a cabinet committee at a very early opportunity. I am now waiting for that appearance to take place.

I am seeking guidance from the Chair. I appreciate that the minister had difficulty. I think we have been more than reasonable in terms of allowing the minister to try to meet with his colleagues in order to present his report and thereafter his response to the House.

I do not seek a ruling at this point in time, but I seek guidance of the Chair in that it is in conflict with the Standing Orders as I read them. I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary could not undertake to come back to this House later this day to give us a specific day as to when the minister will give the response as he is supposed to under the provisions of the Standing Orders. I ask that of my friend and colleague, the parliamentary secretary.

At the same time I seek guidance from the Chair as to what the Chair might be able to do in terms of facilitating this process and receiving that important report.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I just want to clarify. I thought I heard my hon. friend say that the exchange between himself and the minister had taken place on October 19.

Mr. Dingwall: November 19.

Mr. Edwards: November 19, of course, because the House was not sitting on October 19. This was precisely one week ago today. It would not be unreasonable to give the minister a little more time.

I am aware there are numerous meetings of cabinet going on. I believe there is one going on today. I have no idea whether or not this matter is on that agenda. However I will undertake to my hon. friend, the opposition House leader, to make inquiries and to get back to him just as soon as I practically can.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the response of the hon. parliamentary secretary. I would imagine that he will come back to the House as soon as possible, as he has said he would. I am sure the hon. opposition House leader will get the answer that he is expecting shortly; if not, I am sure he will bring it that to the Chair's attention.

In the meantime I do not think the Chair has to interfere at this point, but we will be waiting patiently for the parliamentary secretary's answer.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I thank the Chair and I thank my colleague opposite for the undertaking, but I do want to share with the Chair that time is of importance here. Although we in the opposition have been very reasonable in awaiting this particular report from the minister's office, we are not prepared to allow this matter to go on for an indefinite period of time.

The parliamentary secretary quite categorically said that he would get back as soon as he could. I would like the parliamentary secretary to be a little more specific as to what the earliest time might be. I clearly got the impression, not a statement, from the minister's intervention on November 19 that we were just around the corner in terms of this report being tabled.

Madam Speaker will know that this House is due to adjourn on December 11. There are many bills which have to come before the House. There is an economic statement. This is a very substantive report with regard to the Court Challenges Program and we believe that the minister ought to respond immediately.

I just give notice to the Chair that this is in breach of the Standing Orders. The parliamentary secretary should take the House into his confidence and tell us when the minister will report to the House. Earliest time is just like saying the cheque is in the mail. I am not prepared to accept that.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, we can debate about words. The phrase that I actually used in responding to my hon. friend, and I chose it very carefully and I thought with maximum helpfulness, was that I will report back to my hon. friend and to the House just as soon as I practically can. I cannot do better than that.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to introduce a petition signed by many residents concerning child poverty. In November 1989 this House expressed its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and also committed itself to seek the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

The petitioners are calling on the government to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of child poverty by the year 2000.

SOCIAL SCIENCES AND HUMANITIES RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have before me a petition which reads as follows. The petitioners point out that the greatest challenges facing our society are not only political and economic but also social, for example, poverty, unemployment, abuse of the elderly, women and children.

They say that we need the humanities and social sciences to solve these problems. They also indicate that the government's proposal to merge the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council is an inappropriate setback. They ask that this decision be postponed and in-depth consultation undertaken.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to present a petition signed by a number of my constituents. Pursuant to Standing Order 36, it has been certified correct as to form and content.

This petition is presented with sadness and also a degree of frustration because I know it was signed by many in anger. In memory of Ryan Garrioch, the signatories from Innisfail, Red Deer, Blackfalds and Sylvan Lake call on this Parliament to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquent act with a lowered maximum age of 13 years.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition from people in Manneville, Sainte-Gertrude, Launay, Malartic, Guyenne, Lebel-sur-Quévillon and Val-d'Or in Abitibi. The petitioners say that violent movies on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they incite more violence.

They mention that all toys which incite violent games are unacceptable and should not be made. They also say that the freedom of the press to report acts of violence should be limited and that information on violent acts which is repeated too often on all television stations and on radio can incite others to commit the same acts of violence.

Therefore the petitioners humbly ask Parliament to legislate on the above-mentioned points to eliminate violence in our society in order to protect our children more and give all our fellow citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, this is another petition in the growing number of petitions that I have submitted recently regarding the proposal by Multinational Resources, a company which has intentions of damming a portion of the flow of the North Thompson River and diverting that flow into the California water market.

The residents of Falkland, a community in my riding of Okanagan—Shuswap, are concerned about the impact of this water diversion proposal. They urge the government to state categorically that it will not permit our fresh waters to be dammed and diverted into U.S. and possibly Mexican markets and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege to table a petition in the House today regarding the question of water exports. It relates specifically to a project in northern British Columbia, a proposal to divert a portion of the water from the North Thompson River into what is referred to as Kinbasket Lake for eventual piping out of the Columbia River into California.

Water is the life-blood of our country. These Canadians are expressing their concerns about these water export and diversion proposals. They call upon the Government of Canada to state categorically that it will not permit our fresh water rivers to be dammed and diverted to the U.S.A. and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today and present a petition. It is signed by people from all over the province of British Columbia and throughout Alberta who are concerned with the intention of the United States to divert water from Canadian rivers into the United States for use in the San Diego, California, area and other parts of the United States and northern Mexico.

They are concerned that these diversions have not been specifically prohibited either in the free trade agreement or in the proposed North American free trade agreement. They ask this government to specifically and categorically state that it will not permit our fresh water rivers to be dammed and diverted into the United States of America, and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

HOUSING

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions. One is signed by approximately 300 petitioners from Moosomin, Saskatchewan, Vancouver, B.C., and Okotoks, Alberta.

These people are very disappointed that this government in its ideological frenzy gunned down the most cost effective and socially useful housing program this country ever had, the co-op housing program. They are calling on Parliament to recognize housing as a shared provincial-federal responsibility, to support the federal non-profit co-operative housing program and to maintain the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, the second petition is signed by approximately 600 residents of my own constituency of Prince Albert—Churchill River. These people are surprised that the drug multinationals should be in a panic thinking that perhaps President Clinton will bring in a drug program much like the Canadian one. Therefore they want the puppet regime opposite to move quickly in the Canadian generic drug industry and Canadian drug plans.

These people are calling on parliamentarians not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22 passed in 1987 so that Canadians will have the full benefits from lower priced generic drugs and so that provincial and private drug plans can service Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees or provide less coverage.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents who point out in their petition that crimes of violence against the person are intolerable and constitute the most abhorrent crimes that society faces.

They point out that sentencing for crimes of violence does not appropriately reflect society's abhorrence toward violence in order to act as a true deterrent and to protect the public by removal of the offender from society.

Therefore they are asking Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against a person are serious and abhorrent and that Parliament amend the Criminal Code of Canada accordingly.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, my second petition points out that progress toward true equality for Canadian women continues to be very slow. They are asking the government to introduce legislation that would end wage discrimination in the federal Public Service.

POVERTY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, on another matter, the residents point out again the very sad fact that over one million young Canadians live in poverty and that the government should take action immediately to ensure that all children have an opportunity to live a full and complete life beyond the element of poverty.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, petitioners from western Canada and throughout the prairies, British Columbia and the Yukon are pointing out their deep concern with a company's intention to divert water from the North Thompson river at Valemount, British Columbia, in an effort to divert the waters into the San Diego basin in California to sell it.

They feel that water ought not to be sold like fish or wood. They point out a renewed interest in the North America water and power alliance and the fact that a firm has just announced its intention to hold hearings in February in California and later in the state of Texas to renew interest in the United States to divert Canadian water to the United States on a grand scale. They are simply pointing out that they oppose this approach. They oppose this project and are asking the Government of Canada to state categorically that it will not permit our fresh water rivers to be dammed, diverted into the United States, and to state clearly that our rivers are not for sale here in Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the other questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

AN ACT TO DISSOLVE OR TERMINATE CERTAIN CORPORATIONS AND OTHER BODIES

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-63, an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I rise today with not the easiest job in the world but one that is very necessary. That is to proceed now with third reading of Bill C-63.

I say that for a couple of reasons. Hon. members are all aware of the government announcement in February 1992 in the budget that a total of 46 government agencies, boards, commissions, corporations or advisory bodies would be eliminated or consolidated or perhaps deferred or privatized.

This bill, the Corporate Dissolutions Act, is the first legislative measure giving effect to this commitment. It dissolves six agencies: the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council of Canada, the International Centre for Ocean Development, The Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, the Law Reform Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council.

In order to fully understand the rationale behind Bill C-63 it is very necessary to look at the bill in the broader picture. By this I mean looking at it in terms of the principles that underline the government's decision to restructure and streamline its own operations. This bill is part of the government's initiative to streamline government. In the consolidations leading up to the budget Canadians told us they wanted government to be leaner, more efficient and less expensive, and we have responded.

The government has taken a hard look at how it can eliminate overlap and duplication in its own operations. Bill C-63 is part of this initiative. This bill is also consistent with the thrust of the Nielsen task force which was set up shortly after our government came into office in 1984.

I firmly believe, as do my colleagues on this side of the House, that governments have a fundamental obligation to ensure that their financial resources, the taxpayers' money, are effectively employed. Like the private sector, government must also ask itself tough questions about whether it can afford to do everything it does now. The slow economic growth this country is experiencing has put substantial pressure on the deficit. The recently released numbers for the fiscal year just ended show a deficit of $34.6 billion, the highest in six years.

While the government managed to maintain operational surplus revenues less program spending of $6.6 billion, the interest charges we must pay on the debt are more than six times greater than that surplus; they are $41.2 billion. The total debt itself stands at $422 billion.

The burden of debt has grown from the legacy we and all Canadians inherited from the previous government. Since 1984 we have run an operational surplus of more than $20 billion. All the growth and the debt since then have come from compounding interest charges on the debt we inherited.

Clearly measures must be taken to reduce spending and bring our fiscal situation back on track. The savings we will see from the winding up of these six organizations are only small steps in that direction, but they are necessary and very important steps.

The critics of the actions called for in this bill have not really offered very many meaningful alternatives and the public is tired of hearing politicians and interest groups say: "Do not cut here", because the bottom line ends up not cutting anywhere.

If we enjoyed better economic times than we do currently, or if we had inherited a sounder fiscal balance when this government came into office in 1984, an argument could be made to keep these organizations in operation. However, at a time when businesses across Canada are having to make hard decisions about the priorities in their operations, the government cannot hold itself aloof or exempt.

When Canadians in every part of the country are forced to make tough choices as they balance family budgets in the light of financial hardships, we cannot pretend that government need not make difficult choices as well. It is this understanding of the financial reality facing Canadians that has led us to put forward Bill C-63.

Simply put, Canada can no longer afford to maintain these organizations given our heavy national debt and the high taxes this brings with it. This is doubly true when the key activities these organizations perform can be and will be addressed by existing departments and private sector resources.

In context Bill C-63 is clearly not an arbitrary measure. It is part of a long-range strategy by the government to reduce its size given today's fiscal realities.

The government believes that Canadians generally will welcome the initiative that we will save taxpayers dollars by eliminating functions that are not essential and by reducing overlap and duplication wherever possible.

My colleague, the parliamentary secretary, in his speech to the House yesterday outlined the savings we expect. Let me just recap the numbers. For the full 46 agencies and bodies we are eliminating, restructuring, deferring or privatizing, including the six covered by this legislation, the saving will be $22 million this fiscal year. This will increase to $71 million in 1993-94 and the total saving over the next five years is estimated to be in the range of $310 million.

The organizations affected by Bill C-63 have all given valuable services to the people of Canada. No one is denying that. I know that many Canadians have been wondering what happens to the invaluable work that was being done by these organizations and also how the tasks performed by these organizations will be continued.

The assets of each organization being wound up are being transferred to the appropriate department or other body. This means that all valuable files and the resource libraries established over the years will be maintained. The bottom line is the government has made sure that these valuable resources are kept intact.

As well the activities performed by the organizations being wound up have been reviewed. Those that are consistent with the government priorities and that are not being performed by other government organizations will be continued.

Already ongoing projects have been taken up by the department or organization best able to see them through. In fact, in many cases public policy actually can be better served by organizations that balance competing interests within themselves, rather than by single interest agencies.

This is particularly true at a time when funds are scarce and people in every sector need to pool resources and work together rather than compete against one another. It makes little sense to incur expensive managerial and administrative costs by dividing functions among individual agencies simply because of different interests.

We deeply regret any personal dislocation that has come about by the phasing out or elimination of these organizations but government and those who work for the Canadian taxpayer cannot expect to be immune to economic reality. Every day the business sector and its employees face the obligation to increase efficiency and at the same time make every effort to control costs. It is high time that the government did likewise.

I should put this another way. I want to emphasize that this legislation is part of a wide-ranging commitment to reduce the burden of government on this economy. This includes ensuring that taxpayers receive optimum value for the resources they entrust to us.

To deliver this value, we have to recognize that government agencies and organizations must be judged by tougher, more competitive standards than was the case in past decades. If we do not accept this obligation, then we as elected representatives are failing in our duty to all Canadians who must work in a tougher and much more competitive world in the 1990s. I urge my colleagues to give speedy passage to this bill.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I listened carefully to my hon. colleague opposite in his listing of the reasons the government has felt it necessary to dissolve these six agencies. He has referred to other agencies that were listed and enumerated in the throne speech and which the government feels at this time it must dispense with.

I cannot agree that it is appropriate or even that it is cost saving in the end to do this. I have reasons for saying that it is not going to save us very much money.

The government believes and has characterized this initiative as one which will streamline and reduce government and which will save money. It is really killing off agencies that would have continued to provide very important functions to the Government of Canada.

I want to point that the government is coming to this House and saying that it must dispose of agencies and the initiatives it manages and co-ordinates. At the same time the government is doing that, it is sometimes coming to this House—and sometimes not—and embarking on new initiatives just as costly but all in the same realm.

The one which comes to mind immediately is the government's so-called prosperity initiative on which there are millions of dollars being spent, not just on substance because prosperity cannot be implemented by legislation or by policy. This is something that the people, the country and the communities generate. The government is also advertising hand over fist to show Canadians that prosperity is attainable, that they can be a part of it and let us all join together to produce it.

That kind of prosperity initiative is one of several which have been announced this year. This is at the same time as the government is saying it has to get rid of the Economic Council of Canada which has itself recommended initiatives similar to the prosperity initiative. It just does not make sense to me that the money the government wants so badly to save and the streamlining it wants so badly to implement are counterbalanced by increased spending and less streamlining embarking on all these new initiatives.

I do not see the cost saving. What I see is that the government has saved enough money by killing off these agencies in a way which will enable it to spend funds and create new initiatives of its own. Keep in mind that all of the agencies which are being killed off here were initiated just prior to the date in 1984 when this government took office.

One element of the initiative I want to make sure is on the record at third reading is the disturbing procedure of the government in embarking on the streamlining, on the killing off and the dissolutions without the authority of Parliament.

It is clear from the statute that this bill does not ratify previous actions of the government. This bill does not say we agree that the government should have killed off or dissolved this agency. It says that the government may dissolve the agency and wrap up its affairs. In fact the bill authorizes the minister to do the things necessary to wrap up and dissolve the agency.

What we found here over the last few weeks, in fact since the end of June, is that the government has already wound up the affairs of these agencies. It has terminated employment. It has terminated leases. It has liquidated equipment and inventory. It has done all of the things that would be done upon a dissolution or wind-up and it has done it all without the authority of this bill.

I do not understand why we are even going through this exercise if the government is so embolden that it would take on an initiative and complete a task before the authority has been given by this House.

In any event, I could ask what would happen if this bill were not passed or the act never proclaimed. What kind of a situation would we be in then? Canadians would be entitled to ask and be entitled to accuse the government of acting without legal authority. While I am reluctant to say now that the government has acted unlawfully, it has certainly acted without law. The law simply was not in place and it is still not as we debate it now.

A theme that has dogged this debate and one we cannot lose sight of is that most of the agencies the government is dissolving were providing a type of advice, guidance, direction and research to the government that we characterize as independent.

These agencies were set up to provide independent, non-governmental advice and direction to government. It was done because it was recognized that a lot of times in government once a decision is made or once a high official has some idea in his or her head, that is precisely what is going to happen.

There is ex post facto a desire on the part of the bureaucracy and the minister to justify, after the fact, that everything has occurred exactly within the mandate and the prescription of what was originally ordained. A lot of time government digs itself a great big hole trying to justify what the minister has decided one, two, three or four years ago. For that reason the government of the day, pre-1984, recognized that independent advice and research were extremely healthy and maybe even integral in assisting the government to make decisions on epolicy, marshalling resources and spending taxpayers' dollars effectively and efficiently.

In the natural course of things there is not enough incentive on the part of public officials, bureaucrats and administrators to provide advice and leadership to a department in a way that could be seen as being adverse to the views of the minister or the people who are higher up on the ladder of authority in the department.

Once a chunk of the department begins its work and starts down the road in a certain direction, it does not have a hope in hell of changing direction because everybody in the system is going to say: "Yes, minister, we are heading in the right direction and I am doing my job. We are a great team". In the worst case scenario the unfortunate minister has no idea what is going on and does not realize things are heading in the wrong direction because he has not had good, independent advice.

Another problem occurs if we dispense with all the independent advice giving, the independence and objectivity. Let us get rid of it all and let the government and the officials proceed on their own. The public has a problem as it monitors what government is doing. Parliament monitors government and asks: "Mr. Minister, what advice are you getting on this? What are you doing? Ten times out of ten the response is: "I am sorry, I cannot tell you what we have recommended to the minister because it is confidential". Advice to ministers is guarded and secret, therefore the public does not get a chance to know what advice is given. The debate is all behind closed doors.

Through the use of independent agencies there is an opportunity to see some of the advice the public sector is receiving. I want to give an example because I think it is a good one. Just recently the Economic Council of Canada, one of the agencies that was being dissolved on April 29 this year, concluded a study on a topic of extreme importance to Canadians at this time. I am sure everyone in this House will agree it is a matter of extreme importance. It had to do with making recommendations for a coherent education system which would link employers, schools and governments, boost the standards and produce graduates better equipped for a more competitive work world.

Those words reiterate what we have been hearing from the government. I do not know who put the words together first, but this was an excellent report on our national system of education, its effectiveness and its cost-effectiveness. That independent report stated the system then in place was a failure. Those are the words. It said: "This is a sign of failure". I could not imagine an official of the minister's department publicly releasing a document that said: "This is a sign of failure". It simply would not happen. I hope I have made the point here that it is only through independent advice giving agencies the public has an opportunity to see the ebb, flow and interplay of ideas and initiatives government will undertake.

We are simply going to be without it in relation to the work of the Economic Council of Canada, the Law Reform Commission, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, and the other agencies we are dealing with here.

The government has said it wants to be more efficient and it can do that by dispensing with these agencies. I do not see the rationale or the linkage. I do not understand how it can become more efficient by getting rid of the agencies that provide it with an objective road map of where it wants to go.

The government has said these agencies do overlapping work of other agencies or other non-governmental organizations. That may be true in some cases, but maybe it is more appropriate to say the other non-government agencies may also be overlapping the work of these agencies. In this debate the government has not given examples of the overlap, so we are unable to judge just how important the fact of the overlap is in the government's decision making.

In relation to the Law Reform Commission, for example, let us say there is some overlap in the work it is doing. Let us say the justice department, a university faculty of law, or some other agency, is doing work that is overlapping.

That is a possibility, but if that is the case then almost every other developed and lesser developed country in the world has the same darned problem. As we look at dissolving the Law Reform Commission we could only find two other countries that did not have a law reform commission or similar body. I think they were both in Africa. One of them was Zimbabwe.

We are going to get rid of overlap while Zimbabwe perhaps never had overlap. I do not think that is a great club to be in. All of the other nations of this world recognize how important it is to have a law reform body as a guide light, as a road map to the future in terms of legal reforms.

This government has said it is getting out of business and privatization seems to be the theme. With what we are seeing here, I say to this House the government is getting out of government. It is getting out of essential aspects of modern day government, the facilities by which we use independent advice.

Every one of these agencies has facilitated the decision-making process of government. Drawing an analogy between government and a ship at sea, if I were a captain of a ship I do not know why I would throw my most effective, objective navigator overboard. I would want a navigator on my ship who was not going to say yes to me just because I was the captain. I would want a navigator who would tell me if I were steering a wrong course, and do it boldly and objectively.

I feel that is what the government is doing by ditching the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council of Canada, the Law Reform Commission, and the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security. It does not want to hear objective navigators any more. It just wants to hear its own advice. It will decide what it is going to do. It will make the decisions. All of the bureaucrats do their best from inside the cocoon of government to advise the decision-makers in government what is going on. It is just not enough in this very complex world.

There will be others here today who will rail against how government has grown out of control in terms of its size. I hope the members of this House will listen to those who objectively and calmly tell the government these agencies help government and have not made it grow out of control. They may actually add some efficiency to government.

At the end of the day I hope the bill will not be adopted by the House. I say this knowing in almost every case the government has already killed, dissolved, sold off, or liquidated the agency involved. We cannot even get them on the phone.

One individual, I think in the Ministry of Science and Technology, indicated they did keep their phone number because they were legally advised to keep the agency alive until Parliament passed the bill. It was heartening to hear that, but none of the other agencies could be reached. They were gone. The leases were expired. The furniture had been moved out.

The cost savings hoped for by the government perhaps have not begun quite yet. It probably has to settle some leasing arrangements with landlords. It is starting to save a little bit of money, but it is embarking down the path of losing the independent advice these agencies have so well provided the government, in some cases for 30 years. I will close here and hope members will vote against this bill.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on third reading of Bill C-63, which is the government legislation to wind up the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, the Law Reform Commission of Canada, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, the Economic Council of Canada, the International Centre for Ocean Development and the Science Council of Canada.

I had an opportunity yesterday to speak on what it meant for Canada to wind up some of these commissions, institutes and councils. As I said last night, there are six ministers who used to receive advice from these institutions. I find it strange during this debate not a single one of them has held a press conference. It seems to be standard for the government to hold one at a $500 a plate dinner, or somewhere outside the House. Not a single one of them has come in and spoken in the House to explain to Canadians why this institution or that institution is no longer necessary.

Last night members on the government side suggested institutions such as the Law Reform Commission were no longer necessary because the justice committee of the House of Commons was going to be taking on this enormous task. Yet no money has been proposed to go to the justice committee. The library of the Law Reform Commission has not been transferred into the custody of the justice committee of this House.

The government members on that committee have not suggested a timetable or a way of dealing with the duties that were performed by the Law Reform Commission. I suggest that is a fraudulent argument being used by the government side in terms of the Law Reform Commission and the other five agencies.

In terms of the arguments we have just heard this morning, the Neilsen task force was to restructure and streamline government, make it leaner, more efficient and end duplication. I think in a matter of minutes I can lay all of those arguments entirely to rest. In each single instance of these institutes, commissions and bodies that gave independent advice to government, this government has not moved to replace them or make other arrangements with bodies that could at least be considered arm's length or potentially independent.

Instead as in many other cases with this government, it pork-barrels contracts in each of these initiatives out to friends of the party.

When the Prime Minister has $500 a plate dinners in Toronto; they have a list. Who is on the pork-barrel hit parade just phone them up. You need 500 donkeys, you phone 500 donkeys who had their snouts in the trough. You say-we gave you a contract for $50,000, we want you to buy a table, 10 seats at $500. This is called legitimate fund raising now by the government while it is in office.

The argument that these bodies, some of whom received a couple of million dollars, had a couple of dozen bodies doing research and so on for their institutions—the Science Council of Canada at $3 million, the Law Reform Commission at $4 million—the government claims there just is not that kind of money around any more.

Let us take a look at what the Auditor General had to say. He has now concluded that the prison built in the Prime Minister's riding at a cost of $68 million was totally unnecessary. This is not NDP research, this is not Liberal research, this is not the prisoners' complaints bureau of Canada. It is the Auditor General. He said it was unnecessary. We argued in this House that it was a bad location. We received phone calls and letters from people in the criminal justice system who said it was crazy.

I raised last night the movement of the immigration headquarters to Vegreville, Alberta. People who are actively involved in immigration issues in this country know that the overwhelming majority of immigrants that come to Canada come in through Vancouver. They come in through Montreal and they come in through Toronto. Why would any government in its right mind withdraw all of those positions from those offices, slash them by 10, 20 or 30 per cent and move them all to Vegreville, Alberta, in this day of high technology?

Computers can talk to each other. All the people do not have to be in the same lunch room, in the same building in Vegreville so that they can do all 400,000 immigration applications for the whole of Canada. It is pork-barrelling at its very worst. It is just like the penitentiary built in the Prime Minister's riding.

This is an incredibly old-fashioned pork-barrelling attitude, that you have to bring the bacon home. If you are in trouble politically, you have to build a prison or you have to open a new UI centre or you have to do this or you have to do that. This has to be stopped.

An hon. member: We can't afford it.

Mr. Fulton: That is right. The government cannot have it both ways. We know it is going to fill the hotels in Vegreville and God bless the owners of the hotels. They will make piles of money because all the families who are involved in immigration cases will have to go from Montreal to Vegreville. They will have to go from Vancouver to Vegreville. Lawyers involved in getting access to cases will have to go from wherever they are, from Edmonton, Moose Jaw, Quebec City, or St. John's, Newfoundland, to Vegreville, rather than having immigration officials available in Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, Prince George and Prince Rupert the way they are today.

It is an act of madness and I hope Preston Manning gets on it pretty darn quick, pointing out that this is not just your average pork-barrelling activity. This is stupid: s-t-u-p-i-d. You do not move people from all over the country to a given location to protect somebody politically.

I have never asked for such a thing in 14 years. I cannot imagine that the Deputy Prime Minister is such a cock-a-doodle-do that he has to have it. He is a good speaker. People trust him in Alberta so far as I know. Does he need a chunk of pork that fat and that thick?

Let me tell you what else the Auditor General had to say about this government. He told it years ago to do something about the purchases of the Department of National Defence bullets. What did the government do? It bought 12 million bullets that will not fly straight. That is typical of this group over here.

It cannot go in and audit and say: "Stop buying crooked bullets", but "get rid of the Science Council, get rid of the Law Reform Commission. We cannot have independent bodies; no, of course not". In the Ministry of Employment and Immigration 800 bureaucrats were cashed out, given $30,000, $40,000 and $50,000 to just go home and smoke rope, read the newspaper, have a couple of cool beers and then the same department hired them all on again. The minister has not fired a single person for it.

I tell you, Madam Speaker, if I were the minister responsible, there would be heads lolloping down the street in this city for that kind of crap. We have to get rid of the Science Council they say.

What else does the Auditor General have to say? There is $3.5 billion in loan guarantees and in other aid that Ottawa provided on Hibernia, on Lloydminster's bi-provincial heavy oil upgrader and Regina's new heavy oil upgrader.

What does he conclude about this brilliant cabinet? This is $3.5 billion. We are talking about $3 million to wind up the Science Council of Canada. The government chops it off. There is not $3 million, but on $3.5 billion the Auditor General for Canada says that the cabinet made all of these financial arrangements "without having any clear idea what economic benefits the megaprojects will yield". Just dump'er down the hole, eh? They will get headlines for a while. What is a few billion of the taxpayers' dollars? What is a few billion? The government never bothered to assess whether anything at all will come back out of it.

An hon. member: What is the return to the PC Canada Fund?

Mr. Fulton: What about the debt? The Tories love to travel around and say: Debt, debt, debt. It is all the Liberals' fault; debt, debt, debt. He points out in 1971, 13 per cent of every dollar in this country went to payments on the debt.

What is it under the Tories? It is 33 cents and it will be 34 cents before the end of this year. They will go out and cackle and gaggle during the next election: "Oh the debt, the debt, the debt". The debt doubled under these donkeys. The Tories will probably try to blame it on the NDP. They will say: "Oh, it is the New Democrats. They forced us to do it. We had to get rid of the Science Council of Canada to deal with the debt".

Just while I am speaking, the amount of money to pay on our debt will be as much as would have been required to keep the Science Council of Canada for a whole bloody year. However these guys over here have wax a foot thick in their ears.

Let us take a look at a couple more. "Wealthy exploiting GST loophole". This was raised in the House yesterday by my friend from Newfoundland. He pointed out that you would need 35 children under the age of 18 to comply with the tax requirements to get your GST kickback.

More than 12,000 Canadians, making more than $100,000 were found by the Auditor General to be getting GST rebates. They do not have 35 children under the age of 18. They very cagily move their money out of the country. They make certain deals out there. They do not have to pay any tax on their profits outside the country and then they bring the money back in and of course they get their GST rebate anyway.

The Minister of Finance says: "No, no, the Auditor General does not have accurate figures on how many hundreds of millions this involves". The reporters who are not dumb walk across the street to see Mr. Desautels, the Auditor General, and they say: "The Minister of Finance says you do not have accurate figures on Canada losing a couple of hundred million a year". The Auditor General says: "Of course we do not. That is a very conservative estimate". He cannot get the accurate figures out of the Department of Finance because this is for all these rich monkeys, right? They make more than $100,000 a year. They hire a tax lawyer. The tax lawyer says: "Do this and that in Florida. Do this and that in Georgia. Hide your cash here. Hide your cash there. Make sure you go to these $500 a plate dinners. Make sure you stay on the right side of the governing party. Make sure you do that and nothing will happen".

That is hundreds of millions. They are losing hundreds of millions, and they are cutting the Science Council of Canada at $3 million a year because it was giving independent advice and we know why. This is politically motivated by the hatchetmen, the Praetorian Guard, as my friend from Winnipeg pointed out last night, who now surround the Prime Minister.

I honestly believe now that my friends on the government's side, most Tories have nothing to say about government policy. They come in here and try to defend it once in a while, but not very well. They try, but they know they do not have anything to say. Most of them were surprised when the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance announced that these institutions were being cut.

They went: "Oh, my God, they are really doing that". Then they realized: "Oh, we are part of the zipped lip party. Keep that lip zipped. Zip that lip. Do not talk about anything. Be quiet in caucus and quiet on the street. Be quiet in the riding. Do not let anybody know that it is out of control".

There is this little group across in another building running the whole damn country. One day they say: "We have to have 10 nuclear submarines, $100 billion. We got to get up there. There are polar bears eating too many seals. We got to get up there. Away we go. Get these nuclear submarines fast".

Canadians go: Could it be true? The government realized that Canadians did not want nuclear submarines. We do not want them in B.C. Every mayor, every MLA and most MPs say: "Get them out of here. We do not want the American ones. We do not want anybody's".

Finally the government says: "Okay, we will not do the nuclear subs; we will do $4.4 billion in helicopters". I reminded the House last night about these helicopters. Since then I have spoken to reporters and they still cannot believe it. My friend behind the curtain cannot believe that any government that is reasonably rationally sane would buy $4.4 billion worth of EH–101 helicopters so that we can look for those nuclear submarines out there. We are not sure whose. I guess the American ones because they will not tell us where they are. They are our ally.

These helicopters cannot land on the frigates. The decks are the wrong size. They do not have enough fuel capacity to do long offshore work so they are no good for offshore fisheries work. They cannot look for subs. They cannot land on the frigates.

The public needs to know once again they cannot be used for search and rescue. They have 160 knots downwash. Can you imagine. You are hanging on the edge of a mountain. Your plane has crashed. There you finally see it, search and rescue, there is the DND coast guard. Ah, they are coming to save you. They are coming to save me. One hundred and sixty knots downwash, that is more than 100 miles an hour. Have you ever stood up in a convertible at 100 miles an hour? Your eyeballs are in the hair at the back of your head.

You would be hanging on the edge of the cliff and whoops, down you would go. You are in the water. Your boat has sunk. Oh, fantastic, here comes the chopper. DND is going to save me. They pull over to pick you out of the water and it drives you 30 feet below the surface. Your last breath is under water. The incompetence goes beyond one's wildest imagination.

Let me give you a couple of other examples of the hundreds of millions that we are losing in taxes because this government will not collect from the wealthy. We lose billions from profitable corporations, from 12,000 Canadians who earn more than $100,000 a year. According to the Auditor General they collected the GST anyway even though they did not have 35 children under the age of 18 each. That was what was required if they were going to collect it.

Let us look at the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Carelessness at Indian Affairs costs 10,000 jobs a year and $200 million a year for some of the poorest people in Canada. Do we have anything done in the Department of Indian Affairs about it? It has been told about this for years and years and years. Did it do anything? Talks have been held for the past 15 years.

You wonder why unemployment rates are high among aboriginal people and why they cannot get any income. The department still does not have in place a proper means of legally stopping people from stealing the wood off the reserves. There is no way of doing anything about it. Logging companies just pull up, cut the trees down, load them up and drive away. The bands cannot do anything because the lands are held in trust by the Crown and the Crown has not prosecuted a single case.

Let us take a look at military spending. The government says that there is not enough money for these six agencies and that it is going to slash another 40 more. What does The Financial Post say? "Almost every federal project to buy new military equipments studied by the Auditor General either went over budget or took longer to deliver than planned. A detailed study of just 11 procurement projects worth $5 billion found that none followed the management system". None, and the government is telling us that the Science Council of Canada with a $3 million budget, with people like John Polanyi, a Nobel laureate, giving independent advice to the government, is too expensive.

When the sacred cow, the Department of National Defence, is squandering billions, hundreds and thousands of millions, the government will not do anything or say anything.

Let us take a look at the Auditor General's report because we deserve to lay to rest this balderdash coming from the government's side that this is making the government leaner, that this is efficiency in getting rid of duplication.

The Auditor General says: "We noted that direct pay and allowances alone cost the department $3.3 billion or 29 per cent of its 1989–90 budget". This is after the revelations last year that our Department of National Defence has more commissioned officers per non–commissioned officers than any other force in the world. The icing is six feet thick and you have a private down at the bottom. There is a general, a lieutenant–colonel, a major and a sergeant above him and the list just goes on and on. For every private there are about 800 generals. Is anybody doing anything about it? Has the Minister of National Defence called in a few of the generals and said: "Hey, guys, what about a few heads rolling?" This is a sacred cow. Of course the government would not want to do anything about it. The department spends between $18,000 and $47,000 per student per year and this is for cadets. All the Auditor General wanted was some kind of benefit evaluation. Will the department do it? Of course not.

Official languages training is a real sacred cow. No one in this country is supposed to want to talk about this stuff. In our 1990 report we recommended that National Defence redefine the goals of its official languages program in terms of the number of bilingual positions required and proficiency levels needed to meet clearly defined operational requirements. That is not unreasonable. Just identify how much you need.

We reported this program cost the department $500 million since 1980 and was expected to cost $1.4 billion over the next 15 years. There were 7,600 individuals on the language training in 1990–91. In 1989 the 9,000 anglophones at the language level closest to becoming bilingual were not given priority access to resources that would have enabled them to become effectively bilingual. In 1990–91, 75 per cent of the student population was still registered at the beginner level of the program.

I am sure one of my colleagues will have an intriguing question to put to me if I am able to complete this set. Canadians have the right to know about this kind of thing.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): With an invitation like that I am anxious for my colleague to let us in on further secrets within the Auditor General's report that would have meant these important institutions we are talking about today could have been preserved.

Mr. Fulton: My colleague brought me back to the pith of my argument here today. There are many areas a government that was seriously managing government and the taxpayers' dollars would have gone to and drawn dollars from to protect these kinds of agencies.

We have 9,000 anglophones in the Department of National Defence involved in training, but the Auditor General finds they were never given access to the necessary resources. They still got the dough and the program still ran, but they were never given access to it. Therefore 75 per cent of them were still beginners three years later. It seems to me you could give them $20 on a Friday, tell them to go down and hang out in a beer parlour for 24 hours and they would learn more than they would by taking this kind of program which costs $500 million.

It gets worse. I know this is a sensitive area, but listen to the facts. Only 24 per cent of the candidates who took the 1990–91 non–commissioned member basic French course qualified as bilingual. Do you know what it cost, Madam Speaker? DND has not implemented our recommendation to incorporate bilingual posting priorities. Although this course lasts a full year and costs over $80,000 per person, in 1990–91 only 66 per cent of its graduates were actually assigned to a bilingual position. Now you cannot tell me this is competence. Bring me the generals and I will sign the firing slip. Bring them to me. I am sure even the government House leader would like to sign a couple. It just does not seem possible they were not placed after spending $80,000 a person for the year. You have 9,000 anglophones taking the course at $500 million and after three years 75 per cent of them are still in the beginner's course trying to figure out how to print. Give me a break. There is $500 million for this and this government says it had to get rid of the Science Council because it cost $3 million a year. What about $80,000 a year to give someone language training? I get $62,000 a year and I get beaten over the head with baseball bats in my riding for being over–paid. Where are these guys on language training? What are they doing? Are they only learning the words: "Caviar, champagne please, where is my Cadillac, give me the keys, how soon do I get to retire?"

Give me a break. This government calls itself conservative. Conservative, my foot. It should be CI for conservative incompetents, not PC.

Let us look further to what the Auditor General had to say because there are plenty of areas to save money. Let us take a look at training.

The Auditor General says: "We recommended in 1990 that the department compare costs between its own school system, civilian colleges and institutes of technology". That is not an unreasonable request from the Auditor General of Canada on behalf of Parliament and the taxpayers.

By way of example, in 1990 we reported it cost $265,352 for a Canadian forces fleet school to train one marine engineering technician, while it cost $71,923 in the community college system just down the street.

Now who is kidding whom? Maybe these are the people who attend the $500 a plate Tory fund raisers. Did that ever cross your mind, Madam Speaker? It costs seventy thousand bucks to be trained at any college or technical training school in the country. What is the government allowing? These are Tory years, 1990, 1991, 1992. It costs $265,352, another two hundred grand, or 300 per cent more for Tory training. Canadians have to be outraged that the Science Council of Canada and the Law Reform Commission have been cut.

As I have said before, we know why a couple of the people in these institutions and on these commissions had harsh things to say about the government. This government is not fond of democratic institutions. We know that. Members' privileges are constantly being eroded. The rights of Canadians to have access to institutions they feel secure are at arm's length from the political process are being shot like ducks out of the sky by this government.

Where is it leading, we have to ask ourselves in this House? At least it is broadcast to a few people, and occasionally a few reporters watch this place and a few people listen and talk. But we have to ask, what is the underlying philosophy behind a political party that starts pulling the funding from independent institutions all over the country? We are doing six today and there are another 40 to go. We are talking lobotomies, guillotines, throat slitting and gut shooting.

Why is it doing this? It is not doing it for money. I just found the government somewhere in the neighbourhood of $20 billion in savings. I did this research this morning and found $20 billion. Where is the Minister of Finance? He should come in and give me one of the 125th medals so I could wear it around. They cost $1.86.

How can this government think Canadians are so gullible, stupid, unplugged and uncaring they would accept this kind of crap being peddled to us? Oh, we are getting rid of duplication. What about the 12 million crooked bullets? Can that not be stopped?

The Auditor General said: "Well, let us look again on medical care. This is something Canadians do care about". The DND medical support system costs at least $230 million per year. This is the Auditor General speaking. "Our 1990 audit recommended the National Defence determine the minimum dedicated medical support system needed in peace time". Now that is not unreasonable. Just figure out what your minimum needs are and start funding to that level. He found the department's peacetime medical system costs in our sample were 86 per cent higher than the average for similarly sized civilian hospitals.

Now you cannot just kick that under the rug and say it is because it is military. It seems to me that is inconsistent with what I have always been told by my father and my uncle who were both in the military. The whole idea of military systems is to run them as cheaply, efficiently and effectively as possible. And yet everywhere we look, after eight years, the Tories are lavishing and squandering. It is enough to make you economically bulimic, to think these guys are pursuing these kinds of completely irrational expenditures across the street.

Let us take another look at training, efficiency and economy. This is the Auditor General speaking: "In 1990 we found that 62 per cent of individual training delivered by the Canadian forces training system was not relevant to the trainees present jobs or it duplicated what they already knew". The training cost $165 million a year. We are training people who have already been trained. They already have their ticket. They have already been paid at that category. The military says: "That is kind of boring. What are you, an auto mechanic? Okay, go take an auto mechanics course and we will pay you to do that".

Does it not sink in? This is from the Auditor General. The training cost $165 million a year and these people are talking about increasing the level of expenditures to DND. I could go over there today and carve out $1 billion. I could probably carve out $6 billion of their $12 billion a year. It is incredible that this sacred cow hangs around.

The purchasing would make you gag. The department purchases the parts from the same company it buys the original equipment from. No one does that anymore. Just because you happen to buy a tank that has a Ford motor in it and you get sort of chummy with the guy who cut the deal, does not mean you have to buy all the parts from him forever and a day. It is like the rental of this building over in Hull. The Auditor General says it is crazy to have 10 and 20 year contracts for space where there is no competition. You just do not do that.

These are the people who are always saying: "Oh, Bob Rae, Mike Harcourt, Roy Romanow. Oh, scandal, New Democrats, incompetent". It is time Canadians knew the truth about the nine governments we have held in four provinces and Yukon. We have always done better than the governments that came before us and those that came after us. The years of Douglas and Blakeney produced balanced budgets, which are unheard of under the Tories and Liberals. Barrett in British Columbia, produced a balanced budget. However, the Socreds, Liberals and Tories say: "Watch out for the New Democrats. They have wild spending habits".

An hon. member: What about Bob Rae?

Mr. Fulton: What about Bob Rae? He is running a heck of a lot better government in this province than there ever was before.

An hon. member: He was deceived by the Liberals about the debt.

Mr. Fulton: Let us look at merit boards. It is obvious the Tories do not want to hear about their own incompetence. This is from the Auditor General. This is not NDP research.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry that I must interrupt the hon. member. The time for questions and comments has now expired.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, an hour ago the parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Peterborough was quite right when he said he had a hard job putting forward the first speech on behalf of the government in defence of this bill. This is corroborated by the fact we do not see a long line-up on the government benches of subsequent speakers on this bill as it is customary we rotate speakers from side to side. Obviously it is an extremely difficult bill to defend and I congratulate the member for Peterborough for his courage.

He based his whole reason for proceeding with this measure on the government's desire to restructure and streamline government, making it more efficient and eliminating overlap and duplication. One has great difficulty understanding how the government could be streamlined or made more efficient by eliminating the Science Council of Canada, the Law Reform Commission, the International Centre for Ocean Development, the Economic Council of Canada, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council. It really boggles the mind that these are the objectives to be obtained and the goals to be reached by way of the premise given to us by the member for Peterborough. He went on to say that meaningful alternatives had not been offered at the time of second reading and in committee by those who oppose this bill.

Meaningful alternatives are offered every year. We just heard a moment ago of the reports produced by the Auditor General who every year points to the mistakes, sometimes in good faith, sometimes because of administrative shortcomings, sometimes because of inefficiency or incompetence, which are inherent in large institutions at times. Nevertheless the Auditor General points out every year and has pointed out to this government since 1984 opportunities to eliminate inefficiencies, to reduce overlaps, to deal with inefficiencies and duplications and to streamline government. The latest report by the Auditor General is a clear indication of that.

Alternatives do exist and for the life of me we cannot understand why the government has to proceed with Bill C-63 in order to achieve objectives that cannot be achieved through this bill. There is a contradiction here in terms.

What can be achieved in terms of efficiency by eliminating the Law Reform Commission? What can be achieved in eliminating overlaps and duplication by removing the Science Council of Canada? What can be achieved in streamlining government by eliminating the Economic Council of Canada? What is the logic of the government in terms of efficiency that can be achieved by eliminating the Canadian Institute of International Peace and Security or the Employment and Immigration Advisory Council? It does not make sense.

One has to conclude that what one is dealing with is a mind-set of a government which has decided that the role of government is to be compared to the role of a business and that the role of government has nothing to do with the public interest. It has decided that the role of government is not to pursue long-term goals and long-term public interest. It has to eliminate, where it can, institutions which may cause criticism, perhaps alternative viewpoints and produce them. It has to be obsessed with only one thing and that is the bottom line. That is not what the majority of Canadians expect the government role to be.

I suspect that the role the majority of Canadians expects the government to play is one of looking at the long-term, providing policy, doing the research that is necessary, and keeping the country united by way of very intensive intellectual work which is in great competition with other countries.

I would like to know of any G-7 country, which are the other industrial nations with which Canada is grouped, or any other country that belongs to the OECD, to which we also belong, that has done away with their economic council, or has done away with their science council, or has done away with their law reform commission.

No modern industrialized nation in its right mind would take a step like this. We are becoming the laughing stock abroad. Nobody understands why we are doing these things.

Let me give an example, one that I have not mentioned yet, and that is the elimination of the International Centre for Ocean Development. It was very revealing at the time of the announcement of this bill what its vice-chairman said in Halifax. Mr. Vandermeulen is quoted by Canadian Press as saying: "This is the only international assistance group in the world that was working in the fisheries field with small island states. The agency was founded in the early eighties to help developing countries in the South Pacific, the Caribbean, and Indian Ocean to manage their ocean resources after the Law of the Sea conference established the 200-mile limit".

Since fish do not respect political boundaries, if stocks are mismanaged by one country then the whole community pays the price. This was the role of the International Centre for Ocean Development: to help in the South Pacific, Caribbean and Indian Ocean states to develop their policies and it is gone.

In eliminating the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security our critic, the member for Winnipeg South Centre, commented that the government "is intent upon snuffing out any kind of serious analysis of what is going on in the world". He may perhaps have attributed motives here, but one must say in all fairness that this institute has performed an extremely valuable role in providing government, Parliament and any agency interested in foreign affairs with in-depth analysis and alternative policies. We will not have that benefit any longer.

My colleague for Scarborough—Rouge River was quite right when he stated on March 10 of this year: "Agencies like the Science Council, the Economic Council, the Law Reform Commission, the Institute for International Peace and Security have provided valuable advice to the government and at a time when this country should focus on making Canada more competitive and better equipped and up to date, the last thing we should be doing is getting rid of them". Those are very wise words.

One has to put Bill C-63 in a broader context, and that is what has happened to Canada in the last eight years. It is part of a pattern, part of the Prime Minister's commitment to change Canada's face, as he stated back in 1984. He is certainly changing Canada's face. He is certainly maintaining his promise of doing that.

One has to look at this measure together with other measures that have been gradually introduced over the years. It started very slowly and unobtrusively with the cancellation of programs for youth. I must remind members of the cancellation of Katimavik which was very strongly resented by some of our most distinguished colleagues in the other place. It went on with the cancellation of Environment 2000, a youth employment program for the summer. Over the years it escalated into a number of other initiatives of which this bill is the last.

I just have to remind my colleagues about the virtual cancellation of social housing in our urban centres. Just to quote another example, I remind them of the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program. The list is pretty long.

Coupled with the cancellations were cuts and a reduction in responsibilities that were gradually put into place. Let my remind everyone of what has been done in reducing the role of VIA Rail in placing an immense burden on its operation, in reducing its ability to tie together communities across the nation, as only VIA Rail could have done. However it did not stop with that.

It reduced the mandate of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation when it was announced by the government that the CBC should not pursue in its mandate the unity of Canada. That was a mind boggling announcement. The CBC was denied that mandate at a time, particularly after going through the referendum, when we very badly need institutions like the CBC and Radio-Canada to perform that bonding role of promoting and pursuing a sense of unity in the country. Its role is stressing what brings us together, what unifies us, rather than what makes us different from each other. The CBC and Radio-Canada could not perform during the weeks and months preceding the last referendum as a result of a decision by this government.

Might I remind members of the cuts which were introduced in late 1984 and subsequently to the National Research Council which today operates on a very limited budget. Might I remind them of the fact that government contributions have been cut from the Unemployment Insurance Commission, thus severely limiting the funds available for the training of the unemployed, for the assistance to those who cannot find employment and may want to have an extension to the benefits they receive. In other words, the number of those who exhaust their unemployment insurance benefits and do not want to go on welfare has been reduced.

As a result of the cuts by this government, the unemployment insurance fund now can rely only on contributions by the worker and by the employer and no longer on the tripartite system we had of contributions coming from employer, employee and government.

The cuts and the denial of absolutely necessary budget increases to key departments like the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Secretary of State in charge of citizenship courts, the postal services, are just other indicators of how the government has gradually and systematically reduced the capacity of the federal government's employees to perform their jobs. What we have in our major urban centres are federal government offices, particularly in immigration, which are badly understaffed and badly overworked.

We have seen considerable cuts in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in the field of research and development, particularly in the field of research on renewal sources of energy. We have seen a shift almost entirely in favour of increasing Canada's dependence on non-renewable sources of energy which, as the name says, will exhaust themselves in due course. Also we have a very dangerous shift away from research and development on sources of energy that rely on biomass, solar energy and wind.

We have closed the consular offices in large numbers and reduced Canada's presence in a number of ways. We have reduced the support that the Government of Canada gives to non-governmental organizations. We have reduced the capacity of CIDA to perform its mandate with adequate funds in helping developing countries in relation to the problems of mounting poverty, famine and disruptions abroad.

In other words, the promise the Prime Minister made in 1984 to change the face of Canada is being kept. Bill C-63 is an emanation, an expression and a fulfilment of that promise.

What this particular measure does to the Canadian taxpayer must be put on record. The average Canadian taxpayer will be deprived of some valuable and important initiatives once this measure goes through. We will oppose it inevitably but the numbers will not be on our side.

The five-year plan by the Science Council of Canada to influence the direction of science and technology for Canadian prosperity and Canadian well-being has been abandoned. Its study and the plan which commanded attention were extremely well received when published and would fit perfectly into any long-term economic policy of any government. With the abolition of the Science Council, we can kiss this five-year plan goodbye.

Then there are a number of studies which were also launched and were in process by the Science Council, namely, a study on genetics in health care, the role of venture capital in financing new technology, and the relationship between technology and economic development.

I will conclude by referring to the fact that the Economic Council of Canada had published just before its abolition a study on the economics of health care, a study on the economics of education, and an analysis on the impact of government on competitiveness.

The Law Reform Commission by virtue of its abolition has had its ongoing recodification of the Criminal Code of Canada frozen. The ongoing recodification will no longer be carried out as well as the completion of studies related to human rights, protection of life and administrative law.

Time does not permit me to elaborate on what is going to be lost as a result of this measure. I have no doubt that Bill C-63 will do profound damage to the fibre of Canada and to its ability to renew itself and to face emerging problems.

Not only that. It is also putting Canada in a position of great weakness. By the disbanding of these very important bodies we are losing the intellectual power and intellectual capital that these bodies represented and were able to produce on behalf of and for the benefit of present and future generations of Canadians. This is a very regrettable step. It is our hope that the government will reconsider it.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, this is a wonderful opportunity for me to put a question to the member for Davenport. He may be in a very special, if not unique, position to answer it. It has to do with the role of independent advice to government. That independent advice and direction are products of many of these agencies we are dealing with.

The hon. member for Davenport has been a government minister as well as an opposition member. The opposition in Parliament, not being as well resourced as government is on a day-to-day basis, benefits as much from the independent advice and spade work of these agencies as does government.

I would like the member to comment on his own experience. As I have never served as a cabinet minister, I am curious about just how realistic my view has been that this kind of independent advice is useful to government. How effective is it? Is it money well spent? Maybe government never listens to these things. Maybe just the opposition does.

I would like to ask the member in his experience, with reference to, for example, the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, the Economic Council of Canada, the International Centre for Ocean Development and the Law Reform Commission, any of these, how has he viewed the function of independent legal advice? Is it useful? Is it essential? How would he respond to that question?

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, the answer is yes, it is extremely helpful. It is helpful both directly and indirectly.

It is helpful directly because it has an impact on the bureaucracy and the members of cabinet of the day. Collectively they have to take into account very seriously alternative proposals and plans that are being made by independent agencies of the kind the member mentioned.

It has an effect indirectly because these reports impact on the composition of editorial writing of the intellectual and political community across the nation and not just in Ottawa. They provide food for thought, so to speak, for all those who are interested in policy development. Therefore, the policy development process is enhanced, enriched and widened. In the end the policy product the government announces is much better than without this kind of advice.

I would like to congratulate the member for Scarborough—Rouge River. In his statement of March 10 from which I am reading, he did stress the importance that governments should be nurturing and taking advice from these valuable agencies.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I am very happy to take part in this debate particularly having had the opportunity to listen to my colleague, the hon. member for Davenport, and to say that I agree most whole-heartedly with the remarks he has made.

We on this side of the House are not opposed to the elimination of those bodies that no longer serve a public policy purpose. That is sensible and that is the norm for governments. However, we do stand opposed to Bill C-63 and to the elimination of a number of bodies in this country that not just serve a public policy purpose but serve a crucial public policy purpose.

In a country such as this one where literally all of us, even the native peoples, came from somewhere else originally, one of the unifying factors of this country is the desire for knowledge, the pure desire to know if you will, the respect for learning, the respect for lore that is garnered through experience, through research, through academic endeavour, through think-tanks, whatever. It is one of the things, I believe, and I know my colleagues on this side of the House believe, that makes Canadians again just a little bit different, just a little bit distinct from our neighbours on this continent.

All of us in this small country of ours, small in the sense of population, have been justly proud of organizations such as these that we now preside over the dissolution of.

There is a reason for everything this government does. It may not be a particularly good reason and as a matter of fact it usually is not a very good reason. However, I think the reason behind Bill C–63 and the dissolution of these bodies is particularly pernicious.

It is widely perceived that the elimination of organizations such as these which continue to serve a crucial public policy purpose is an attempt by this government to silence its critics on the right, most particularly its critics in the Reform Party. Indeed, many of this government's actions have been and continue to be guided by the desire to recapture the votes and loyalty of their own disaffected members who moved, yet again, to the right. What is happening because of this? As a country we are becoming hostage to a fringe party on the outer edge of the political spectrum.

Let us talk about the specific organizations we are going to lose when this bill becomes law because of the government's majority.

Let us first of all look at the Law Reform Commission. What kind of a country does not have a law reform commission? What can we expect in the area of developing legislation, in the area of far–seeing legislation, in the area of legislation that might anticipate our movement toward a global economy, toward a very different kind of life that Canadians are going to be dealing with in the 21st century, when the Law Reform Commission which is set up to develop and to bring forward the kinds of ideas that can help us make these transitions to the incredible speed of change in our modern society, is being thrown out, being wasted, being closed down?

What can we say about a government that deems all of the references to the commission to be references of the Crown, that confers the authority to close out the affairs of the commission to the responsible ministers and that repeals their constituent acts? We can say it is a government that is afraid to be told what it needs to do for the betterment of its people.

An hon. member: Shoot the messenger.

Ms. Clancy: Are you referring to me?

An hon. member: No, no.

Ms. Clancy: Good. I will come back to the Law Reform Commission later in my remarks.

I want to speak a little bit now about the dissolution of another organization that is particularly close to my heart as the member for Halifax, because this act also dissolves the International Centre for Ocean Development.

Again this is something that is going to be extremely hurtful for Canadians and has already been hurtful for Haligonians in the loss of jobs. We have lost people and not just from the region. I know a number of people who were involved with ICOD have left Halifax and gone to other organizations in Canada, but worse than that, a number of people have left ICOD and gone to organizations in other countries.

We have lost people with a specified area of expertise in ocean studies. We should be one of the ranking countries in the world leading the way in ocean development and we have lost these people. I have friends who were with ICOD in Halifax and are now in the South Pacific, in Australia, in the Far East, where governments are prepared to spend some money on the theory of ocean development. Here we are, a country with three oceans, and what are we saying? We are saying we are closing it down. It is a shame and a scandal but it is exactly what one has come to expect from a government that does not merely wear blinkers but a blindfold.

The Law Reform Commission has been totally shut down. It no longer exists. It is inconceivable that a government that is as committed to making Canada more competitive as it says it is would axe those agencies which provide us with an edge, which provide us with the data, analysis and direction which a modern country like ours so desperately needs.

Let me talk about two other bodies we are losing through this bill, that we have already lost: the Economic Council of Canada and the Science Council of Canada. They were years ahead of politicians in tracking economic and scientific trends world–wide, in illustrating the consequences of these trends for the Canadian economy and Canadian society, and in offering solutions to deal with the problems that would be created.

They are gone. Why? Why are they gone? What does the government see that will replace the development in policy areas of these organizations? With the greatest of respect to my colleagues on the other side of the House, is it going to come from their caucus? Is it going to come from that cabinet? I do not think so. I have not seen anything that would lead me to think that we could get anything in the realm of public policy that might help from that side of the House.

I might add that on this side of the House we would never be so presumptuous as to think that could happen. That is not what we are for, that is what these organizations are for. The fact that Canadians will no longer have the benefit of these organizations is a shame and is tantamount to public scandal.

It is deceptive and downright irresponsible for this government to deny that Canadian society reaped tremendous benefits from the small amounts of money that were channelled into these agencies.

There is an old expression: penny wise and pound foolish. This government has been pounds and pounds and pounds foolish.

Let us go back to the Law Reform Commission for a moment and look at some of the things that the Law Reform Commission did in 22 years, from 1970 to 1992. It put out 32 reports, 61 working papers and 76 studies containing a vast spectrum of recommendations covering Criminal Code reform, hate propaganda, plea bargaining, safeguarding genetic heritage, pornography, euthanasia, sexual assault, arson, mental illness, and on and on and on.

As of 1990, Law Reform Commission studies have been cited in 211 Canadian court decisions, 39 of which were in decisions by the Supreme Court of Canada.

That is hardly an example of minimal impact on the people of Canada. That is hardly an example of an organization that did not give value for money. That is hardly an example of an organization that is not vital to the continued health of the legal system in this country, of the judicial system in this country, and indeed the continued health of the citizenry of this country, in a legal sense.

As a result of the dissolution of all these bodies Canadians will be deprived of the following studies that are of great importance to the development of our country: studies relating to the relationship between technology and local economic welfare, a study entitled the "Economics of Health Care and the Economics of Education". How many times have we sat in this Chamber and heard our colleagues on all sides talk about the absolute necessity of education if we are to compete in a global economy?

How many times have every one of us heard, from the Prime Minister on down, about the sacred trust of our social programs? What is the jewel in the crown of our social programs but health care and medicare? Yet an organization that gives us a study on the economics of health care and the economics of education is trashed by this government. That does not show a whole lot of sense. I am not sure what it does show. I know that it does not show a true concern and care for what is in the best interest of the people of Canada.

Another study that we are losing from the Economic Council of Canada is an analysis of the impact of government on competitiveness. I can imagine why the government dissolved the Economic Council given the title of the study and given the impact of this government on every aspect of the economy in this country. It is an old and tired government that does not want to hear the bad news and does not know how to create any good news.

Another study, from the Law Reform Commission, concerns the ongoing recodification of the Criminal Code of Canada. Where does that leave us? There are studies relating to human rights, to the protection of life and studies relating to administrative law, again from the Law Reform Commission. A vacuum has been created and there has been nothing from this government to show that there will be anything to fill that vacuum.

With the proposed elimination of the Law Reform Commission of Canada we will become one of only three Commonwealth countries without an independent law reform body. The other two are Bangladesh and Zimbabwe.

The Minister of Justice has been trying to silence the Law Reform Commission since 1990 by leaving it without a quorum for two years, which has made it impossible for the commission to approve any reports that would have suggested changes to federal legislation. That shows a level of irresponsibility that is almost unique in the history of this country. Yet we are told by that minister and by other ministers that the decision to close this think-tank is simply a dollars and cents decision.

The minister has said that we have to ask ourselves at this time and in our fiscal situation what can we afford to do. She refers to the Law Reform Commission as a Cadillac approach to legal research. She may call it a Cadillac approach but she has not even left the people of Canada with a horse and buggy approach to law reform.

We have to ask ourselves questions parallel to that question posed by the Minister of Justice. Can we afford not to have a Law Reform Commission? Can we afford not to have an International Centre for Ocean Development? Can we afford not to have an Economic Council? Can we afford not to have a Science Council? Can we afford not to have a country? Can we afford not to have those component parts that decide public policy? Is this government so bankrupt of ideas, so bankrupt of memory of the traditions of this country?

Mr. Volpe: Yes.

Ms. Clancy: The hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence says "yes", and he knows I agree with him.

The answer is yes, this government is just that bankrupt. This government is just that cavalier about taking these component parts of the public policy process in this country and throwing them out. It is a cliché to talk about throwing out the baby with the bath water, but that is clearly what the government has done in this case.

The government is not doing anything near an adequate job in dealing with the economy. Everybody knows that. President-elect Clinton had a big sign in his office in Arkansas that said: "It's the economy, stupid". We all know that. Somehow that message has not got through to the people across the floor.

We cannot create legislation or policy in a vacuum. This government has created an intellectual vacuum in this country, and I suggest that in days to come the members of this government led by these ministers will be referred to as the intellectual Luddites of Canadian history.

It is a tragedy that Canadians will not be able to recover quickly from the devastating policies, the ridiculous decisions and the terrible cancellations that this government has hoisted upon us.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, this government continues to claim that it is fighting for accessible post-secondary education. Yet the Auditor General's report tells us otherwise.

Here is just a sampling of some of the areas of the Canada Student Loans Program in which the Auditor General gives the government a failing grade.

[Translation]

In 1990 the Auditor General noted that national post-secondary education objectives had not been clearly defined. Two years later these national objectives have yet to be set. The department has not produced an annual report on the Canada Student Loans Program since 1988. While the department has taken some minor remedial steps, much remains to be done to officialize and implement federal-provincial agreements and improve the management information system for student loans.

[English]

I strongly urge the government to undertake a full review of the Canada Student Loans Program and take action toward making education accessible to all Canadians.

COMMUNITY HEALTH SERVICES

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, I would like to report to this House the findings of research on community health services users.

The study revealed an underuse by young women from financially underprivileged families of the services provided such as prenatal programs. While teenage girls are more vulnerable, they do not show a marked interest in the content of community programs. They seem to consider that this model fits neither their values nor their ideas.

I think it is essential to create awareness for people to know what means are at their disposal.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, some bad ideas never go away.

Mr. Frank Dale, president of the Los Angeles based Foundation for Water and Power for North America, has started promoting the old idea of flooding the Rocky Mountain Trench to provide water to the United States. The plan is to direct water from Alaska through the river systems of British Columbia to the U.S.

I spoke to Mr. Dale last night and he is proceeding with plans to hold a conference on February 15 of next year in California to promote this idea.

Along with this issue there are other water diversion projects we are concerned about like Alcan's Kemano project and the plan to divert water from the North Thompson River in B.C. into the Columbia River system.

This government has already sold out our forests, our farms and our fish. Water is our life-blood. I call on this government to state categorically that our water is not for sale.

BILL C–91

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, one of the very positive aspects of the drug patent bill, Bill C–91, is the significant impact it will have in the area of medical research. I am especially encouraged to learn of the positive effects it will have on research facilities such as the University of British Columbia.

In 1987 changes made to the Patent Act under Bill C–22 triggered one of the largest research and development expansion programs in medical research history. Annual research and development spending by the pharmaceutical industry soared from $102 million in 1987 to $286 million in 1992.

Recently following the government's endorsement of the GATT proposal to eliminate compulsory licensing and the tabling of Bill C–91, forecasts for new research investments are over $400 million.

Bill C–91 will mean more R and D jobs for companies, hospitals and universities like UBC. More and more of our Canadian university graduates will be able to find research jobs in expanding Canadian fields. It will also increase the odds for Canadian people suffering from medical ailments for which there are no cures. We must step up our efforts in medical research and Bill C–91 will certainly assist in this regard.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Canadians and the world have watched with deep concern reports of racist, anti–refugee, anti–ethnic, anti–Semitic attacks in Europe. While it is unfair to let the violent actions of a few characterize a whole society, these unprovoked acts remind us of how important it is that racism be turned back wherever it rears its ugly head.

As we learn from history, if such attacks go unchecked they inevitably lead to far greater consequences. Remember, silence breeds complacency and it must not be left to stand.

Reports that neo–Nazi violence in Germany has resulted in murder arouse terrifying memories. Where will it stop? Along with all Canadians, let us be vigilant at home and abroad against racism of any kind. It goes against basic Canadian values, respecting differences of race, religion, gender and language. As Canadians we must speak out against acts of human hatred wherever they occur in this world.

CRIME

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, Canadians in general and the residents of the federal riding of St. Albert in particular are becoming increasingly concerned about the rising crime rate in our neighbourhoods.

At the national level we have been working hard to make Canada a safe place to live, implementing the national drug strategy, firearms safety regulations, the Young Offenders Act, the rape shield, the Extradition Act, and corrections and conditional release acts.

This is not enough. This past summer I convened hearings on law and order in my riding. The consensus: There is a great deal of work to be done to ensure our criminal justice system is more responsive to the needs of our citizens. There is a great concern for the victims of crime and the inadequacy of the Young Offenders Act.

On behalf of the constituents of the St. Albert riding, I urge the provincial and federal governments to act.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the deregulation of Canada's airline industry has not worked. In fact the Tories' vision of cut-throat competition has brought both Air Canada and Canadian Airlines to the brink of disaster.

Deep in his heart the Minister of Transport knows that the airline industry must be re-regulated, but tragically he cannot bring himself to say the r word. Instead, he suggests that they might recalibrate the transportation policy framework within which the airlines operate.

According to Roget's Thesaurus two of calibrate's synonyms are grade and measure. Does the minister want to grade or measure the airlines? To grade is to classify, differentiate, incline, level, order, size, smooth or sort. Which of these does the minister have in mind for the airlines? If the minister is to measure the airlines, does he want to calculate, compare, fit, gauge, judge, number, quantify or average them?

I have a suggestion for the minister. He should admit that deregulation has created chaos and then admit that whatever word he uses, the airlines must be re-regulated so they can compete and survive on a rational basis.

OSTEOPOROSIS

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, November is National Osteoporosis Awareness Month.

A number of people, and I am one of them, are familiar with this health problem, while others are not. Osteoporosis thins the bones and makes them brittle so that they fracture easily. In many cases it can cause serious incapacity, and it can even be fatal.

Educating the public is important, and the Osteoporosis Society of Canada has been doing this since 1982. The funds collected by this organization are also spent on the research that is essential to fight this disease.

The federal government also supports the Osteoporosis Society of Canada through its subsidy program for national volunteer health organizations.

The many volunteers who play an important role in our society are to be commended for their dedication. Thanks to them, the quality of life of people afflicted by this health problem has improved. I urge you all to take part in the activities organized this month to increase public awareness of this health problem.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call on the federal government to shelve the report of the royal commission on transportation.

This report is an insult to every Canadian outside the central Canada corridor. This report ignores the essence of Canada and will put this country, which was once united by the national dream, to the point when we were little more than isolated pockets of population forced to look south rather than east to west.

If a family of four left P.E.I. by car today to go to New Brunswick, it would cost approximately $50 to take the car ferry. If this government implements this report, who knows how much it will cost tomorrow.

Canadians have come to believe in the sharing of responsibility and the sharing of costs which are necessary if this country is to continue as a united entity. It will not do so if the federal government allows the weaker and poorer regions of Canada to wither and die.

• (1410)

I call on the government to reject this report out of hand and reaffirm to Canadians that by living in this great nation they will continue to receive the same rights and privileges regardless of where they reside.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Canada comprises less than 1 per cent of the world's population, and yet at this moment our brave troops are fulfilling 10 per cent of all peacekeeping missions around the globe.

While we are very proud of the thousands of men and women who are on those duties, saving lives and sometimes even saving countries, Canada is serving beyond its capacity. If we are to continue in this role then a few common sense things have to happen. First, the United Nations should immediately pay Canada the millions of dollars it owes us so that we can keep our troops in place. It is unfair to ask Canadian taxpayers to do it all. Second, it is high time other countries paid their fair share. Large and wealthy nations which do not now supply the UN troops should not only do so, but they should help underwrite the major costs of Canada's efforts.

Finally, it is also time that our peacekeepers got the heck out of Cyprus. For 28 years now Canadian taxpayers have kept troops in place there and that is surely long enough.

I call on the government to end this mission now to make sure that Canada's brave troops are used efficiently, effectively and in a manner that is fair to the citizens at home who support them.

STUDENT GRANTS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Today the NDP government has decided to scrap the Ontario Student Association grant program. This action is shameful. Without these grants many students will be forced to abandon their education.

During the last provincial election the NDP government promised to increase funding for education. Once elected, the NDP betrayed the students and their families by reducing funding for education.

I call on my colleagues to deplore this brutal NDP attack on Ontario colleges and universities and this horrendous assault on access to education. This policy shows that the students are not a priority of the NDP. It simply shows that the NDP do not understand the needs of the students.

Canadians must be aware of the NDP strategies. They make promises to the people but they never follow through with action.

Shawn Rapley, a Carleton University student president, is outraged and Ken Craft, chairman of the Ontario Federation of Students, is appalled at the decision. He said: "They are supposed to have vision, but this vision ends at the end of their nose".

The NDP plan to put an end to student grants is socially and morally regressive and irresponsible. This is another NDP action against something they once said they supported.

If the NDP think this is a solution to bringing its debt under control, they are mistaken. This is not a solution, it is a short-sighted abandonment of our young people, of our educational institutions, and of this province's future.

VICTORIA CROSS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, this week has not provided many examples of co-operation in this place. Indeed visitors and those watching our proceedings may question if there is ever any co-operation here. Well, there is, and I would like to thank all members for one good example.

Earlier this week members of this House gave unanimous consent to declare votable my private member's bill seeking to re-establish the Victoria Cross.

In addition to speeches of support from colleagues on the government side of the House, both the Liberal and New Democratic critics for veterans affairs spoke in favour. The New Democratic Party's critic, the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden, felt strongly enough that he made an impassioned speech even though he was in considerable physical distress. I understand the hon. member's back pain required his admission to hospital the very same evening. I suspect that he is going to be following the proceedings from his hospital bed. I want to thank him for his support and I am sure on behalf of all members of this House also extend our sincere best wishes for relief and recuperation and an early return to health.

BAHA'I

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, this week over 30,000 members of the Baha'i faith from around the world have gathered in New York City for the second Baha'i World Congress and to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the passing away of their founder, the Baha'u'llah.

Central in the Baha'i teachings are the unity of religions and the unity of all peoples. The Baha'is believe that all of the great religions teach an identical and universal truth. They also believe in the equality of the sexes and the oneness of all people.

The Baha'is take great effort to live their lives in accordance with their beliefs. They work selflessly for the eradication of racial, class and religious divisions and prejudices.

Due to their beliefs, they have suffered much persecution in the 100 years since the founding of their faith. Yet in the present world of terrible racial and religious wars and strife, their message is one of hope. They have faith that a new world order of equality, social and human justice, will prevail. They have faith in the inherent goodness of all people and the awakening of that goodness in us all. It is a very contemporary message needed to be heard in these troubled times.

SEXUAL OFFENDERS

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I was outraged to read on the front page of today's The Globe and Mail of the planned release of convicted paedophile Wray Harold Budreo.

This dangerous offender is to be released tomorrow as a result of the decision by the National Parole Board despite the fact that this decision was not supported by Budreo's case workers. These professionals are as aware as I am that sexual offenders are highly likely to reoffend.

Children are the most valuable and vulnerable citizens of our country. As such we must make every effort to protect them from threats to their safety.

The parole board seems willing to acknowledge that this paedophile with a 30-year record of repeat offences may again reoffend, but it seems to believe this will not cause serious harm. When a child is molested serious harm is done.

Our Solicitor General has said that "protection of society is more important than giving another chance to these individuals who just cannot be rehabilitated". I strongly urge, even plead with him, to do everything in his power to overturn this decision of the parole board and to do what he knows is right.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

A lot of people thought there would be economic instability after the referendum. For two weeks it was very stable. Suddenly, 10 days ago, the Prime Minister made a speech and said he would stay the course. Then confidence went away completely. The dollar has fallen and interest rates have gone up by almost 3 points.

When will the Prime Minister instruct the Minister of Finance to stop this crazy policy of fighting inflation at all costs and introduce a policy that will create growth and hope in our nation?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): The idea of suggesting that we should stop fighting inflation is one that would only be applauded by the Liberal backbenchers. In point of fact, in any of the great trading nations that have enjoyed economic resurgence, be it in Germany or in Japan, their success has been built on low inflation.

When my hon. friend was the minister, inflation went to 12.9 per cent. It bloody well just about killed the Canadian economy. That is why we have had to fight and work so hard to bring it down to 1.3 per cent.

Low inflation is an important pillar upon which economic resurgence can take place. Growth and productivity, which is up 5.2 per cent this year, is another important one. Relative unit costs are down by almost 5 per cent over last year. These are all very important factors.

If my hon. friend has some specific ideas as opposed to these easy slogans, let him stand up now, stop the criticism, and give the Minister of Finance the benefit of his wisdom.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, going back to the years when I was Minister of Finance, I am the only one who, over 20 years, had no growth at all in expenditures over a two year period. However, I am not here to talk about 1978 or 1869. I am here to talk about 1992 and 1993.

In case the Prime Minister thinks I am alone in what I am saying, yesterday I quoted La Presse. Today I will quote, not a socialist rag, but The Financial Post and not Bob Rae's economic adviser, but Diane Francis: "High interest rates have been killing enterprises, strangling the economy, aggravating government deficits, boosting our current account deficit, causing higher taxes, and throwing people out of their jobs. Individuals and businesses, big and small, are being crushed in a vice".

When will the Prime Minister realize the time has come to swallow his pride? When will he realize it is time to have a policy that makes some sense and that will be conducive to creating growth in Canada so that the Canadian people can work and have the dignity of working?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): What would that policy be? My hon. friend criticized low inflation in his first question. Now he criticizes interest rates when he was part of a government that had interest rates at 22.75 per cent and we reduced them very substantially to 9 per cent.

As my hon. friend knows, the genesis of the problem in public finances is overspending by governments. There is no question about that. When governments spend too much money, much more than they bring in, eventually the problem grows and it suffocates economic growth.

My hon. friend made a statement that there was no growth at all in public expenditures when he was there. He was President of the Treasury Board between 1974 and 1976 and spending increased 33 per cent. Government spending increased 33 per cent in two years and in that time he entered the history books by saying that a 16 per cent spending jump was great restraint.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, at the time my neighbour here was not even a Canadian. He was in Lebanon. I suggest we stop talking about the past and concentrate on what is happening today.

In the same article in The Financial Post, it says that because of this policy of fighting inflation at any price—I never said we should not fight inflation at all—more than $50 billion has been added to Canada's debt, which means that today, the government has to pay $5 billion every year in interest charges because they fought inflation at the wrong time.

Is the Prime Minister finally going to realize the kind of situation the country is in today? When will he wake up and give Canadians jobs, with a policy based on economic growth?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the International Monetary Fund says that next year Canada will have the highest rate of economic growth in the industrialized world.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: But that is not important, of course.

The International Monetary Fund also says that next year, the inflation rate in Canada will be the lowest of any major industrialized country. And far more important, the International Monetary Fund states that next year, the rate of economic growth, the rate of job creation in Canada will be the highest of all the G-7 countries.

I think that today my hon. friend will have to admit that despite all the problems in the industrialized world, despite the major problems facing Japan, France, Great Britain, Germany, and other countries, despite this international trend, Canada is comparatively well off, and I say comparatively. It is basically thanks to our focus on policies to maintain inflation at manageable levels while constantly improving our rate of growth, and it works according to our national indicators.

REPORT OF THE AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General in commenting on loopholes in tax rules for foreign affiliates of Canadian corporations states that "it is reasonable to conclude that hundreds of millions of dollars in tax revenue have already been lost and will continue to be at risk".

Does the Minister of Finance realize that in saying, as he did yesterday, that there is really no conclusive evidence that the amount of money identified as being lost by the Auditor General can be substantiated, that he is doing an enormous amount of damage to the credibility and integrity of one of the most important institutions in the Canadian parliamentary system of government: the Office of the Auditor General?

Is the minister prepared to review those comments in the light of the kind of damage he can do to one of the few remaining respected institutions in this system?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member and all members of the House that I in no way want to undermine the integrity and the importance of the Office of the Auditor General.

I agree whole-heartedly with the hon. member. I was simply quoting from the departmental response contained in the Auditor General's report which says that the claim as yet has been unsubstantiated.

We are prepared to sit down and review this situation with the Auditor General. Obviously this issue will be before the public accounts committee where it can be fully explored.

If there are some realistic proposals that can flow from this particular finding, I am prepared to look at them. However, I want to reiterate that the Office of the Auditor General is an important one in our parliamentary system of democracy and I in no way want to be associated with undermining the integrity of that office.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, in light of the minister's response, would he then be prepared to acknowledge to the House that unlike the response contained in the Auditor General's report from the Department of Finance, this Auditor General is not the first Auditor General to bring up this matter?

In fact Auditors General have been requesting these changes to the tax legislation since 1987 to reassure Canadians that at least the Office of the Auditor General still retains the respect of the government.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, indeed so. The government Whip has just indicated to me that this issue has already been raised in the public accounts committee. I think there is general agreement to proceed with a full examination and to explore all the evidence and all the background with respect to this. We will certainly co-operate fully.

DRUGS AND PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister who often comments on the value of competition in the effort to keep consumer prices in line.

Does the Prime Minister really believe that it is in the best interests of Canadian taxpayers and Canadian consumers to have a policy that would see the foreign multinational drug companies have an exclusive monopoly on the discovery of new drugs enabling them to charge excessive prices then to consumers? Does he really think that this is in the best interests of Canada, Canadian consumers and the Canadian health system?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised to listen to that because when Bill C-22 was put in place in 1987 there was an increase of 2.9 per cent in patented drug prices and we had a price index increase of 4.4 per cent. We were far below this increase.

I must also say that there are more than 2,000 patented medications now on the market which can be copied because their patents have expired. Fifty to seventy patents expire every year and the drugs can then be copied by generic drug companies.

That being so I think that increases in the price of patented medicine in Canada have been kept below the rate of inflation. In my opinion this has been a fair and equitable policy for Canadian consumers.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would think the minister would know that as far as Canadians are concerned, all they see are drug prices escalating. They are continuing to go up in spite of the kind of rhetoric he is able to perpetuate here in the House of Commons.

The right hon. Prime Minister will know that for decades the American drug lobby has been pushing Canadians to give away our fair generic drug programs. Finally, with the Canada-U.S. trade agreement they got there half way.

Now under NAFTA one of the conditions is that they go the rest of the way. As a matter of fact, the other half is being sold out in section 1709 of the impending North American free trade agreement.

Will the Prime Minister confirm that section of the North American free trade agreement will prevent any future Canadian government from changing legislation and restoring the right to issue licences for generic copies of patent medicines?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, everyone knows, and the hon. member should know, that compulsory licences were an exception to patents which throughout the industrialized world are valid for 20 years.

Because the government instituted a fair policy to match that in other industrialized countries, drug companies have invested over a billion dollars since 1987. When we announced changes through Bill C-91, $500 million in investment and job creation were announced.

Last night on the television news Mr. Durivage of Radio-Canada said: "Five years after Bill C-22 passed, the gloomy scenario predicted by this bill's opponents has not occurred. The price of patented medicine increased by only 3.3 per cent". That is the reality.

• (1430)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister. Only the minister, his government and the pharmaceutical industry would refuse to admit that the anti-generic drug policy will cost the already beleaguered health care system across Canada hundreds of millions of dollars.

The ministry of health in the province of Ontario calculates that its taxpayers in that one province will be loaded with an extra billion dollars in extra costs over the next decade. Will the minister and his government, rather than trying to support the multinational drug companies, stand up for the health care of Canadians and say no to the multinational drug companies?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is incredible that a member of this House cannot use more accurate information when he talks about health care costs. He should know that patented medicine accounts for only 3 per cent of all the medication used in Canada, so 97 per cent is not subject to the bill he is referring to.

[English]

Before saying anything about the health care system, make sure you have good information, please.

TAXATION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Since 1986, the Auditor General has recommended that the Minister of Finance eliminate tax loopholes for affiliated foreign corporations. In 1988 when general anti-avoidance measures were introduced the minister did not deal with the problem.

Why does the minister continue to say that he has no money to announce an infrastructure program that would give thousands of Canadians work, while he continues to make gifts to multinationals that do not pay Canada a cent of tax?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question and I have nothing further to add.

I thought I responded to his colleague indicating that we are prepared to sit down and examine this in full detail with the Auditor General. As I said, in the Auditor General's report there is no substantiation of this. We will sit down and co-operate fully with the committee in exploring this issue.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, this has been going on for six years, since the first report on this matter from the Auditor General. In 1988 the government did not address this issue. In 1992 the Auditor General tells us that $92 billion in investment was given and interest was deducted from those investments which created $4.2 billion of dividends without paying one cent of tax to Canada. Why do ordinary Canadians have to pay high taxes and multinationals pay no taxes?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday and earlier, the government has introduced the general anti-avoidance rule into the income tax system. There have also been a number of loopholes closed that were left by the previous Liberal administration which were costing taxpayers billions and billions of dollars. We took action on that. We have closed loopholes and we will be prepared to close further loopholes if there is clear evidence.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Transport concerns the $50 million in financial assistance offered to Canadian Airlines this week.

I would like to know why the government will not disclose the conditions that have been imposed on that loan. Why has the government not tabled a copy of the loan agreement in the House of Commons? I would like to know whether the real purpose of that loan is to buy the silence of PWA Corporation while the government pursues a one airline objective?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the member is really intent on saving 16,000 jobs in a region of this country, he should be very careful about what he says. This is not a joking matter. This is a very serious matter.

We have gone into this to save that company by asking them to take some very drastic action. In order to get access to mathematics and figures of the company we entered into a confidential agreement which we will not divulge until the appropriate time.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, we are treating this very seriously. Clearly if this loan was given on the condition that PWA will not ask for any further assistance, then it is the largest payment of hush money in the history of Canada.

Two days ago the Minister of Justice acknowledged outside the House that it may be necessary for further loan guarantees to be given. If that is the case, why will the Minister of Transport not acknowledge that more has to be done if there are going to be two profitable national airlines competing in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we made it quite clear that our main reason for deciding to intervene was the strong employee involvement in efforts to save the company. We agreed to provide one-time financial assistance totalling $50 million, so that the other partners, provincial governments and creditors would also be involved in a solution originating from inside the company, through restructuring and reducing debt, making this a concerted effort on the part of all those concerned about saving Canadian Airlines/PWA.

[English]

TAXATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of Finance a question about legislation that was tabled in the House today. He was distracted by something else that I said and did not get around to answering my question. I want to give him another opportunity today.

Would the Minister of Finance be prepared, in order to show credibility when it comes to deficit reduction and to sharing the burden of that deficit reduction fairly, to withdraw the legislation which was tabled today having to do with extending the 21-year tax exemption for private family trusts in this country, what some of us have come to call 'the Upper Canada College clause', and show Canadians that this government does not exist just to give tax breaks to the wealthy in this country but that everyone is expected to pay their fair share?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the implication of the question is totally and grossly distorted and I disagree with the observation that the hon. member has made. Therefore on the basis of that illogic, I would not propose to honour his request.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, time and time again I have asked this question in the House and I have not been able to get any Minister of Finance to directly address this particular loophole, to justify it or to even mention it.

Do you know what? It is a big, dirty, dark secret what is going on in this country, the way the rich are looked after particularly by this government as they were before by the Liberals.

The money estimated to be tied up in these trusts is in the billions and billions of dollars. If he is serious about reducing the deficit, will he not withdraw this legislation? These people have had 21 years to get ready to pay this tax and they should bloody well pay it as of January 1, 1993.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is serious about getting the facts of this issue, why does he not allow the bill to go ahead and let Parliament decide? Maybe after the debate commences on this bill, the hon. member will be enlightened and he might find himself agreeing with the proposition as well.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The establishment of a centralized immigration centre in Vegreville, Alberta, to replace face-to-face interviews in all parts of the country including the west by a paper review and computers is another crazy move by this government to save an electoral seat.

The pilot project showed that this new system caused longer delays, was inefficient and opened the door to fraud and criminality.

I want to ask the minister how he can justify such a program which so poorly serves both immigrants and the Canadian public and will lose thousands of jobs both in the west and the east? Why is the government giving us such a nonsense proposition?

• (1440)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I see that the Liberal member took his cue from the NDP question of yesterday. That question was answered yesterday.

I saw the hon. member on Newsworld reciting a list of, I hope it is parlementaire falsehoods about this move. This is about taking an office that is open from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., five days a week, and using technological breakthroughs to give the people of Canada 24-hour a day service, seven days a week. This is about trying to reduce the cost to taxpayers of government services.

The big joke of the Liberals is that they talk about security and fraud. Just this year the department issued 31 million cheques of UI out of a system that will be similar to this one and we have not been defrauded by Canadians.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have had conversations with several immigration officials from his own department and I have been told that this proposal is tragically flawed.

Decisions that once took two days are now taking five and six weeks and the door is wide open to fraud and criminality in the presentation of those applications.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

[Editor's Note: Disturbance in gallery.]

Mr. Allmand: I want to ask the minister when will the government learn that policy should be based on what is right for the country and not what is right to elect the Deputy Prime Minister? When will the government cancel this ridiculous program?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Warren, next time leave your fan club outside.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister wishes to answer the question he should do so.

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, on a serious note, the issue at stake here is whether or not the department can take advantage of new technology to give better service to Canadians.

He points to long delays. Obviously the member is not lining up in an immigration office at five in the morning. They line up and they wait maybe three, four or five hours just to put in a little application to an immigration officer. They could obtain the same service by filling in a form which can be processed by a computer which will give quicker service to the person.

This is about better service. This is about less taxes for Canadians and I think they will support it.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, it is depressing to see a government that seems paralysed and totally at a loss about how to deal with the economy. The recession continues and the deficit keeps building up despite what the government says.

Can the Minister of Finance give us the assurance that his economic statement will contain accurate and reliable forecasts with respect to the deficit as well as concrete measures to create jobs now for our unemployed? Canadians really want to work.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would argue with the hon. member's contention that we are still in recession. We have had five consecutive quarters of growth, certainly not robust, but it has not been negative growth.

As a matter of fact, in August, we had our strongest performance in over a year. The composite leading index is up, continues to increase and has been continuing to increase over a 17–month period. The help wanted index is up. We have had increases in employment in five of the last six months, 64,000 new jobs created, 83,000 permanent jobs created in the months of September and October.

I will admit that the recovery is not as buoyant as we would like to see it, but Canada is part of a global community. Canada's rate of growth relative to the other global economies is right in line. We see some pick–up in the United States. We are seeing some pick–up in consumer demand. We are seeing some pick–up in department store sales.

I think my statement on Wednesday will help in providing further encouragement and further optimism and hope for the future.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, obviously the government does not understand what is happening with the Canadian economy.

I ask the Minister of Finance: Seeing that municipalities have sewer and water projects ready to go, will this government's economic statement include an infrastructure program shared not only with the provinces but with the municipalities so that Canadians can have jobs as soon as possible?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, one of the biggest expenditures the Government of Canada makes is in the form of transfers to provinces. In terms of cash and the transferral of tax points it amounts to $39 billion a year.

The other major transferral is transfers to people, to people who receive old age pension, veterans allowance, family allowance, unemployment insurance. This amounts to almost $42 billion per year.

What I am saying is that the transfers to the provinces are specifically for programs which come under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Municipalities have a responsibility and are creatures of the provinces. Why would the hon. member want us to invade provincial territory?

What we have to do is work together in co-operation. We have had discussions with the provinces. We will try to do what we can, but we will not unilaterally interfere—

Mr. Speaker: I think we should move on.

NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, many small business operators in my riding think they spend far too much of their time filling out government forms when they would rather be taking care of business and creating jobs.

Now the Minister of National Revenue has announced yet more changes concerning how small businesses are taxed. Will these changes actually help our entrepreneurs, or will they just make it easier for the government to tax them?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the restructuring exercise which I announced to the Canadian Tax Foundation yesterday was designed to make things easier for the small business community particularly. In a nutshell what we are doing is dovetailing all the operations of Revenue Canada into one—customs, excise, GST and taxation—which will make it simpler, more efficient and easier for the small business community.

For example, instead of three auditors, there will be one. Instead of three or four tax returns, there will be one. There will be savings to the business community in the hundreds of millions of dollars and elimination of tonnes of paper which prompted John Bulloch, President of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, to say yesterday: "Jelinek's announcement will be significant for small companies because of the benefits of one-stop approach".

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds.

This year's Farm Credit Corporation survey shows that the combination of giveaway prices and the 4.2 per cent increase in farm debt has resulted in a further big drop in the net worth of Saskatchewan farm families. This means that since this government was elected the value of farm assets in Saskatchewan has fallen by over $8 billion.

As if this was not bad enough, the changes to the method of payment to the Crow benefit which are being flogged by this government at the present would cause another huge drop in the value of these same farm assets.

Therefore I would like to ask the minister to explain why his government is trying to railroad changes to the Crow benefit which would result in a further undermining of the market value of farmland, threaten the viability of thousands of communities and drive hundreds of farm families from the land.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the premise of the hon. member's question is just not accurate.

There are discussions under way as to how to use the $720 million that is available. Nobody is talking about taking that away from farmers. If there is a change—and I will get to the second part of his question in a minute—the same amount of money will be transferred to the farm community. How he can suggest in any way that is going to lower the price of farm land is beyond me?

• (1450)

Second, there have been all kinds of discussions. We have had four or five meetings federally and provincially with ministers of agriculture to discuss the process. The most recent one was 10 days ago in Toronto. It was agreed then that every government would go back to take a look at a set of draft proposals for discussion and come back some time around December 1 to make some more decisions.

Nobody is attempting to railroad anything. There have been discussions with full public consultation and, above all, with a very good working relationship with the provinces. That in no way can be construed as anybody trying to railroad anything.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister.

The discussions that really count have already taken place, and that is those that occurred with the farmers of Saskatchewan who would be most affected. Over 70 per cent of them said that they did not want to see any change in the payment of the Crow benefit.

Along with promoting the changes in the method of payment, the government is also floating ideas about restructuring the Department of Agriculture and deregulating the industry starting with a wide open free-for-all in the export of barley.

Therefore I would like to ask the minister: Why in heaven's name is this government applying the same model of restructuring and deregulation to agriculture—it has been so disastrous for the airline industry—when what farm families really need is some stability?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, again the hon. member really does not know what he is talking about. As usual it is high propaganda and very low validity.

Let me tell him what has happened since the free trade agreement when we gave producers, and the Canadian Wheat Board included, a better chance to sell into the United States without worrying about the Americans closing their border with their section 22 of the agricultural adjustment act. I will send him over the numbers just so he does not ask these kinds of questions again.

Our exports to the Americans in the last three years since the free trade agreement have almost doubled. That means we sell enough to make them our fourth largest customer. They are the biggest exporter of grain in the world. More important, they are the second highest priced market in the world after Japan. Not a bad record for some opportunity for people to do business on a set of rules. That is all we are trying to do by looking at regulation in general.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Instead of obstinately maintaining a monetary policy that is strangling the economies of Quebec and Canada, I suggest the government face the facts, and the fact is that it is unable to control and reduce the deficit. The easiest and most obvious way to reduce the deficit and cut spending is to get rid of overlapping jurisdictions, starting with manpower.

Why does the government keep refusing to transfer full jurisdiction over manpower to Quebec, which would save $300 million annually right there?

Mr. Blais: That is what you call being consistent.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if that is what you called being consistent, he spent two months telling everybody not to go along with that, and now he wants us to do it.

With regard to the manpower issue raised by the hon. member, I admit that manpower training is a matter of concern, not only to the Government of Quebec but to all Canadian provinces. I am referring to the desire to avoid duplication and overlap. I am sure that no one on either side of the House is particularly keen on duplication because we are all taxpayers.

What we want to do, and this will happen in January when I meet the provincial ministers, is look at ways to maximize harmonization and co-operation and avoid undue duplication and overlap, so that taxpayers get their money's worth.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, the minister has just proved that in addition to not understanding the referendum question, he did not understand the answer given by the people of Quebec and Canada. He was never given a mandate to continue with the current overlapping and the attendant outrageous waste of resources.

How long does he intend to ignore the legitimate request made by his friend, Mr. Robert Bourassa, to transfer manpower policy to Quebec?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of Canada's economic situation, it is important that all levels of government work together to revive the economy and create the jobs which our people need, and that depends on training. What we need to do is not keep our heads in the constitutional clouds like the hon. member but to get involved with those who are in the market-labour, management, the provincial and federal governments, to and see how we can give our labour force the best training possible so that our economy is competitive throughout the world. That is what we will do.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The minister will know that the Ontario NDP government will be cutting student grants, moneys needed by college and university students to get jobs. On several occasions the Secretary of State has said in this House that there would be a new student aid program. Last year a government study indicated that the 1984 criteria which have not been updated were totally inadequate.

When the minister makes the economic statement on December 2, will there be a plan to address this particular issue of student assistance, student unemployment? Will the students be forgotten again, or will they simply be treated as the NDP has treated its own students, with more cuts?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for the program is not available today, but I can assure the House that he has been studying the issue of student loans very carefully and has a plan in mind.

From what I recall, about a quarter of a million students are assisted each year and it is a very important program for all Canadians.

I might add that in the year 1991-1992 some $330 million were provided to Ontario students. That was up $100 million from the previous year.

At the moment officials are examining the implications of what the Ontario government has announced. I am sure the minister on his return will be addressing that matter in the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. I hope that a decision will be made shortly because students have been waiting for a long time already.

In his annual report the Auditor General said:

> We stress that amendments to the Canada Student Loans Act and Regulations are urgently needed.

Urgently needed. Can we expect immediate follow-up that will meet students' needs and aspirations? Yes or no, and when?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the minister will answer soon that a study has been done on the subject and you will have an answer once the minister is ready.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for International Trade I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

The final negotiations of the GATT round are about to begin next week. Last month the Minister for International Trade met with his counterparts of the European Economic Community and from the United States and did not even raise the question of Canada's supply management system.

I want to know why. Why, with this special opportunity right in Canada, did the minister not raise this important issue to try to influence those ministers to be sure that we got the maximum consideration in the final negotiations of the GATT round which is about to begin?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at my hon. friend's ill-informed question.

In fact a number of ministers went just a few months ago, a number of them took the same occasion to be there to speak on behalf of article XI and to call for clarification of it and strengthening of it.

This has been the government's position all along and virtually every minister that touches the trade file has articulated that position.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I simply quote the minister from the Canadian Press report.

Last February 40,000 farmers stood on Parliament Hill to protest the lack of action by this government in the trade negotiations. The chief negotiator for the agricultural sector said this morning that Canada had only two countries supporting its position. Last February when the rally occurred there were five.

How can the minister say that this government is serious about negotiations when it only has half the support from other countries around the world that it had six months ago? How can it really say that it is fighting for the farmers?

• (1500)

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, Canada has always done its utmost to defend farmers. Since we received the farmers who came to support us in February, we, the ministers and members here, perhaps not on your side, have received several thousand letters of congratulations and thanks to the government for the position it took to defend farmers.

We are aware that the arrangement reached between the Americans and Europeans will change the Dunkel report. Canadians will be there next week when the negotiations resume in Geneva and we will defend the Canadian position with all our energy. We met all the representatives of the farming community this past Tuesday in Saskatoon to inform them of the changes and they will be with us to the end to support Canada. That is how we have acted for nine years, by co–operating very closely with farmers, and we will continue to do so.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to see the Prime Minister last week commit to deal with violence on television as he signed a petition presented to him by Virginie Larivière.

You may recall my private member's motion that was unanimously accepted by this House last February which called upon Parliament to review the media's role in the portrayal of violence against women and children.

I and all members of Parliament have a significant interest in this subject, one I know will take a great deal of perseverance to resolve and one I know we cannot resolve on our own.

My question for the government is therefore: Can the government tell Parliament if it is prepared to give this item priority consideration during an early visit between the Prime Minister and the President of the United States?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member mentioned, the Prime Minister last week signed his name when he met with Virginie Larivière to add his name to the other 1.2 million Canadians who are concerned about this problem.

We have already indicated to Canadian broadcasters that we expect to seek concrete proposals from them at an early date to reduce the level of gratuitous violence on television.

In addition to that, I can inform the hon. member that the chairman of the CRTC will be directly contacting his counterpart with the federal communications commission in the United States to raise this issue as well as raising it with senior people in the American production industry.

I have asked my staff as well to draw up a number of names of potential fora in which we can raise this issue internationally to try to secure the support of other countries as well.

PRIVILEGE

MEMBER FOR CROWFOOT

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, it has now been eight months since I have been away from Parliament and it has been almost five months since my heart transplant surgery.

I missed this place. I missed all of you and I missed what this place is about. I missed the honourable activity of politics. I have noted that around here some things change, and others never do. I note, for example, that when you come to the exit door, the green bus still pulls away just as you are approaching and 80 per cent of my mail still has a big red tab on it that says: "Urgent, for member's eyes only" and inside is a magazine subscription.

However I missed being here to help shape public policy and to be effective with my constituents in Crowfoot and for Canada. I want to pay a special thanks to my staff for the very special way in which they took over, helped constituents and worked on behalf of our country.

I want to pay a very special thanks to my wife and my family who were so tremendously supportive, so extraordinarily helpful. They were there not just frequently, but always. I do want to counsel my seven-year old son that I do hope that when he asks the question about when is my next biopsy he will get it straight, and not ask me when is my next autopsy.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I want to pay special thanks to the heart transplant team of the University of Alberta in Edmonton. It is a marvellous pool of competence, talent and sensitivity. Here I am. We have the technology, the ability and I am now Parliament's $600 man.

You will notice some changes in me. Obviously, after transplant surgery you are on a number of drugs. Some of them are fairly potent, one of which causes very rapid and different hair growth. I say to the hon. member for Churchill or Notre-Dame-de-Grâce or Fredericton—York—Sunbury that I am not in the retail business and they need not come to me. I now have a set of eyebrows that look like they are made from prairie sagebrush. When I come out of my farm home, the great horned owl that nests in the big spruce tree out there dances and gets a little excited. It thinks I am one of them.

One thing that happens when you are away is that you come to see this place differently. I want to mention just two things. One I will take just a moment on. One thing about Parliament that is seen different is that of course as political parties we are different in this House. Of course our ideologies are different. Of course our policies are different. Of course we disagree and of course, that is right. That is what Parliament is all about. That is why we are two sword lengths apart.

Mr. Speaker, I got from you, and I thank you for it, a very lovely note as I did from all of my caucus friends. The support was so generous and overwhelming that I was in disbelief at the support. Somehow I expected that too, but I was also surprised. People outside of this place do not know the enormity of comment I received from the Liberals and the New Democrats who said to me: Best wishes, good health and hoped that I would be back soon. I want to thank each and every one of them and Parliament for what all of Parliament is and how we have learned to have civilized debate here.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Malone: I want to take a moment to just steal another thought. When I was away I came to where I saw news broadcasts in a different light. What I saw was that they appeared as manifestoes of truth. They took on a new predominance. Forgotten was my privilege of being a member of Parliament where I had an inordinate other range of sources by which I could seek other opportunities for research and knowledge. I found out that when the media prepares the seed bed of knowledge, it almost always harrows and seldom ploughs. Moreover, when it does plough it is usually looking for worms rather than for turning up more fertile soil.

By and large the news is too negative. While I was away, I watched dead body TV news broadcasts, features where bodies from Yugoslavia, Somalia, South Africa, airline crashes, convenience store hold-ups or wherever else they might be found. No one would deny that these subjects are newsworthy, but news ought not to be limited to being a catalogue of misery. News disseminators must go beyond presenting an index of what went wrong on a given day. We have a legitimate right to ask: Where are the achievements, the advancements, the excellence, the happiness, the joy, family, camaraderie, peace, opportunity, heroics and a thousand other positive dimensions of human life? I am 55 years of age. Apart from funerals, I have seen one dead Canadian body in my life. In the news death is a daily diet.

I am a member of Parliament and I have witnessed excellence and achievements from groups such as women, men, youth, educators, scientists, industrialists, agriculturalists, new Canadians, established Canadians, senior citizens, artists, musicians, across a spectrum of trades and a host of other categories. News tends to be an overemphasis of graphic treatment of violence and disorder. Too much attention is given to champions of wrong.

Many Canadians, unfortunately, are becoming drop-outs to news observers and I found it very amazing, the number of educated people that I associated with in hospital who said they no longer watched news. I say to the media: "Scrutinize we who are politicians because you should, but note you enjoy a special privilege. You are uniquely immune from formal criticism. If there is to be hope and happiness, we need a free press but we need one that balances good and evil, hope and despair".

I want to make three quick comments that reflect on my surgery and then take my seat.

I am feeling well. I feel very well. I am also cognizant of the fact that it is only by the coincidence of luck that I and my needs were able to be attended to and corrected because I was among the fortunate whose needs and this technological moment in history coincided. This is not a situation I planned or made happen; it is purely a fact of existence beyond my control. I am grateful for my fortune.

Second, though I have realized this before, now more than ever, I am thankful for being Canadian. Not only am I a citizen in a nation of medical excellence, but also one who was privileged by the reality of our medical affordability. Some other nations as wealthy as ours cannot make that claim.

Third, my present existence is a blessing that is not in disguise. My family's relief flows from another family's sorrow. My opportunities continue because another's ended. My gratitude toward the family of an unknown donor is daily and it shall be life-long. To whomever those persons are and all others who are willing to become organ donors, I express my thanks.

I want you to know, Mr. Speaker, that I would never, even after my inordinate advantage, ask all Canadians to become potential organ donors. First, there is not such an extensive need. Second, there are many who for personal and moral and sometimes religious reasons have cause to resist being organ donors. This is a legitimate opinion and it must be respected.

However for those who upon examining their consciences are willing to allow themselves to be organ donors, I appeal to them now to talk about it with their families and loved ones, affirm their conclusions, and then sign the donor permission card and carry it on their person. Importantly I say: "Don't do it this weekend or over the Christmas vacation or some other time in the near or distant future, but make a note now and do it at your very first opportunity".

In a survey done by the Kidney Foundation of Canada, 90 per cent of respondents expressed a willingness to be organ donors, yet only 20 per cent have talked it over with friends and family or signed organ donor cards.

Today the need for organ donors is much larger than our available capacity, yet our need could be met if only 50 per cent of potential donors had provided an affirmative signal to be one. The need is most acute and most unfortunate among children.

It is an interesting irony that I come from a small community in Alberta, the community of Camrose with only 13,000 persons, and two of us from that area within a month required transplant organs. The two differences between us, significant differences, are that she required a liver and I required a heart. The other difference is that I was nearly 55; she was just 5. But her situation was very critical and very urgent in terms of the amount of time she had left. An organ was found from another community, from another province, and Jenny, a beautiful, ambitious, active child, is healthy and well today. But she is so, again because a program was available.

For the hope of Canadians, and there are so many, I simply plead: "If it is within your conscience to sign an organ donor card, do so because you are being so helpful to so many others".

As I take my seat, I want to restate how pleased I am to be back among all members and to be working together on behalf of Canada and Canadians. I wish to share with them that they are as lucky as me for while I have benefited directly from the marvels of modern medicine, all of us as members of Parliament and all us as Canadian citizens have the assurance that Canada is a caring place capable and willing to help should we ever be in a situation where that need occurs.

I say, Mr. Speaker, thank you, Canada; may we always stand on guard for thee.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege to raise with you, but before I do so I want to congratulate and to thank the hon. member for Crowfoot for his very positive remarks and to say how pleased we are to see him back in the House.

During Question Period the Minister of Employment and Immigration associated me with the demonstration which took place in the south balcony. I want to say very emphatically that the demonstration came to me as a complete surprise as much as it did to anyone else in the House. The minister indicated that these were my friends or a fan club. I must tell him that as far as I know I do not know any of them. I did not organize any such demonstration in the balcony and I did not know that one was to take place.

I would hope that the minister would withdraw the suggestion that I had anything to do with that demonstration.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in the honourable tradition to which our friend Arnold just referred, I absolutely want to withdraw any such insinuation. I said that in jest. I never meant to imply the hon. member had arranged that, not at all.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I seek unanimous consent to revert to the presentation of committee reports.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has asked for unanimous consent of the House to revert momentarily. Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

PRESENTATION OF 10TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITHEE

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the 10th report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

[English]

This report deals with the 1992 Auditor General's report. This morning the committee met and agreed to recommend to the House that the Department of Finance and the Auditor General of Canada meet as soon as possible in order to clarify their positions on the issue of tax arrangements for foreign affiliates of Canadian companies.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109, this committee requests a government response to this report.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, perhaps the government House leader could indicate to the House the business for the remainder of today and for tomorrow, as well as far as he can see into next week. There have been some additional discussions earlier this hour in terms of certain business which may come before the House. I am wondering if he could indicate that.

Second, I am wondering if there might be unanimous consent among the parties that should the House sit late this evening for the completion of the third reading of Bill C–63 we preserve the adjournment debate from 6 p.m. to 6.30 p.m.

Third, I am wondering if the government House leader could indicate when he might be coming forth with a House order on the provisions of the economic statement to take place next Tuesday.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as the Table has indicated we will complete third reading of Bill C-63, the dissolution bill this afternoon.

I have no problems with the suggestion made by my colleague in terms of interposing what normally would have been the adjournment debate at the end of the day, should that be to the convenience of members.

Tomorrow we will be completing third reading of Bill C-26, the PS 2000 bill. In terms of Monday and Tuesday we are still having discussions about what we might proceed with in that regard. One of those days will be a supply day, probably Tuesday.

I would like to inform the Chair that I will be giving the formal word on that tomorrow. I will look at the possibility of some accommodation in terms of a couple of bills flowing out of last year's budget, Bill C-76 and Bill C-93 having to do with the same subject matter, to see what progress we could make on them.

On Wednesday and Thursday time will be provided for the discussion of the economic statement to be made by the Minister of Finance on Wednesday. I will be putting down a motion to provide the basis for the discussion on Wednesday and probably use Thursday as the first day of debate on a borrowing authority bill that will be brought forward.

As we indicated in our discussions, we will carry on our usual discussions in respect of a House order that would allow us to sit later on both Wednesday and Thursday so that we will have the necessary time for that important debate in which a lot of members will want to participate. I will get back to the hon. members in that regard.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to hear the comments of my hon. friend, the government House leader. I wonder if I could ask for a clarification on the land claims bill. Is it the intention of the government to move on that next week, or would it like to wait until the following week?

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, we are prepared to proceed on it. My understanding was, through the usual channels since there was some interest on the part of the New Democratic Party, to have a few more days to consider it before we brought it forward.

I know that in an earlier discussion I talked about Monday but apparently there was a desire to have a few more days for caucus discussions. We could certainly amend that if that is now not true.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, earlier today I raised a point of order regarding the legislative committee hearings on Bill C-91. I have not read the transcripts from this morning, but I understand there are ongoing difficulties and problems and there has been a suggestion that the committee sit right through the entire weekend.

I simply want to give notice that until I read the transcripts I would rather not proceed now but wait until later.

AN ACT TO DISSOLVE OR TERMINATE CERTAIN CORPORATIONS AND OTHER BODIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-63, an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies, be read the third time and passed

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will now proceed with the period of questions or comments following the intervention of the hon. member for Halifax to the House.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, during the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax she mentioned on two or three occasions the circumstances lying behind the dissolution of the Law Reform Commission.

I can recall that during committee hearings on the subject of this bill we were definitely made aware of very unfortunate implication, as we saw it, in the dissolution of the Law Reform Commission. Judges across Canada at all levels have an interest in reform of the law in some way. Let us keep in mind judges have a unique window on the legal system in this country. They do not have an obvious vehicle for their views on either a collective or individual basis. The Law Reform Commission had evolved into a vehicle capable of listening to and accommodating the views of our judges with respect to law reform in a non-partisan comprehensive and appropriate way.

Now that the Law Reform Commission is to be dissolved, I suspect many of the judges across this country who want to participate are losing this very unique vehicle. I wonder whether my colleague from Halifax has a perspective on that in her own experience as an MP and as a lawyer.

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, I do have some thoughts on that.

There has been a great deal of discussion both here and outside of this Chamber, regarding the role of judges in our legal system. They have very little or no opportunity in their current incarnation to have input into public policy in the research and development way. They have the ability to write decisions on those questions put to them in the courts and in the normal way if they happen to be appellate court judges. Obviously there is a limiting factor there.

Other levels of the judiciary, particularly those at the most active level in dealing with the public, which are known in my province as provincial magistrates, have no opportunity of the kind my hon. colleague mentioned.

I have risen many times in this House and discussed the need for mandatory training of judges, for example, in gender sensitization. I would hazard a guess that if the Law Reform Commission were still in existence, a number of judges would see the problems with gender sensitization, not just within their own brethren and sisterhood, but across the board in our society because of the cases they face. Indeed, they have now lost the opportunity to input this kind of data into a body such as the Law Reform Commission.

There is another area of great concern to Canadian women that would have been an area the Law Reform Commission would have studied. That is the whole area of sexual harassment. There is not a woman in this country, Madam Speaker, and I know you agree with me on this, who has not had to deal with this pernicious development at some time in her existence.

This week I have twice raised a situation in this House relating to two of my constituents, members of the Public Service of Canada, who have lodged a complaint founded on sexual harassment. I also raised this point last week.

It is absolutely clear to women within or without the public policy area of this country that the whole question of sexual harassment is not fully understood by many of our male colleagues, males in managerial and senior positions and many department heads. It is my strong impression, particularly following the problems with Anita Hill, Clarence Thomas and the Senate judiciary committee in the United States, that the area of sexual harassment is the newest area for deep response from organizations such as the now defunct Law Reform Commission of Canada.

It is a tragedy we no longer have this vehicle. It is a tragedy for the judiciary in this country. It is a tragedy for lawyers, but most particularly, it is a tragedy for the people of Canada.

I would hope that before any of us are very much older we will see a resurgence of a body similar to the Law Reform Commission of Canada through some form of intervention .

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I want to enter into the last stages of this debate. I think the discussion which has taken place with respect to elimination of these institutions has ranged across a wide number of different areas, but deserves to be focused as we come close to the end of the debate.

We really have a question before us as a country, as a Parliament, as members of this House of Commons, whether we are prepared to invest a small number of resources to ensure expert continuing input is provided to us on an independent basis as policy making goes forward.

As things stand at the moment, for instance, in the area of economics and economic policy, there is not a single institution in this country that has the responsibility to act independently to provide policy advice to governments across this country or, in other words, to fill the role the Economic Council previously filled.

We can look at some of the institutions the government has talked about as being able to fill this role, such as the Fraser Institute. It is very much shaped by a specific ideological view of the world and very much supported by large scale private business.

The C. D. Howe Institute has a slightly different perspective of the world and is again supported by private business. There is also the Conference Board of Canada. These are all reputable institutions and contribute important viewpoints which are helpful to government, but not from an independent perspective because of their source of funding.

In the case of the Conference Board, for instance, the funding again comes entirely from private business.

The University of Toronto Institute for Policy Analysis provides some policy advice, but at a very arm's length basis from political reality in many cases. It is funded partially by the private sector and partially by the public sector but through the university mechanism.

There is a problem with all these forms of institutional support and policy advice. There is not a large enough gathering together of resources to support the detailed research and large scale projects that are often needed in a much more complex world to get at the heart of economic issues which have to be understood in this relatively small country in financial and population terms. The same thing is true of many of the institutions we are talking about eliminating with this piece of legislation.

The Science Council of Canada has provided important advice in the past to government, not just about science and how to deal with science, but advice about the economy and how science should be brought into a more powerful and contributing role in our economic growth in Canada.

We can talk about institutions like the Law Reform Commission, and the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security. All of these institutions have filled a tradition in this country which governments have previously been proud of. It is a tradition where institutions have the freedom to act and yet are provided with financial support on an arm's length basis.

This tradition is not just limited to this country. We can look at other countries in the world and see they too have institutions of this sort which play a similar role. For instance, France has a social and economic council with 200-plus members who meet twice a month. It has a large research staff. It provides important information and advice on economic and social issues to the government.

Japan has the Japan Economic Research Centre. The United States has the Council of Economic Advisers, which is again supported by various research staff. The United Kingdom has the National Economic Development Council.

It is true we have some institutions in this country that still live. We have institutions like the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre and the Canadian Labour Force Development Board. They are able to operate with some independence and provide some advice, but frankly not with the depth of financial support some of these research institutions which we are winding up with this legislation have had to contribute in the past.

What if we were being asked to judge these institutions by the government and it said it was not certain whether they were contributing to the country or not? Perhaps the government would have an independent inquiry, or even a parliamentary committee probe their contributions and give some kind of independent assessment of what these various institutions have been and could contribute to the country.

If these independent inquiries and reviews had come back and said to Parliament these institutions were costing too much money, were not providing independent advice or contributing to better policy making and therefore they should be eliminated, that would have been a sensible route for a sensible government to take in policy analysis.

Instead, we had a government stand up on budget day, having given at most two or three hours warning to these institutions, and simply decide to eliminate them without any assessment, without any review, and without any chance for the people of Canada to analyse the contributions that these institutions have made to our country.

I have to make the assessments myself. It seems to me, from what I know of it and I have not had an independent review to help me, that it does make sense to eliminate the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council.

It seems to me we have other institutions that can provide independent advice and help, such as the Canadian Labour Force Development Board and the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre.

When I look at the other institutions I do not see that. I do not see the way in which their work is going to be replaced, and I do see immensely valuable contributions that these institutions have made in the past and could make in the future.

For instance, I think of the work of the Science Council in analyzing some of the problems with multinational corporations and their activities in this country. It is work which led to new approaches on the part of policy makers to try to push multinational subsidiaries in this country to begin using their branch plants in Canada as bases for development and export of particular specialist product lines.

I think of the work of the Economic Council of Canada in examining the question of our relationship with developing countries in a very detailed study called Toward a Common Future. It developed a set of recommendations which in many ways have led government to recognize that trade, and trade relations, with developing countries is the most important way in which we can help poor countries in the world to expand their economies and to achieve development success.

Those countries have benefited as a consequence of the Economic Council's work. I think of the work of an institution like CIIPS which has been out in the high schools providing information to our secondary school students so they have a better understanding of the complex changes taking place in the world.

I think of the International Centre for Ocean Development which, as well as contributing to Atlantic development, to the development of our Atlantic provinces, made useful suggestions and developed and administered useful projects in various Third World countries to help them build up their fish resources for the future.

At no stage has the government ever justified the elimination of any of these institutions. At no stage did the minister appear before committee and attempt to explain why the Economic Council should be guillotined or why the Science Council should be put before a firing squad.

At no stage were these kinds of explanations given, either to the House of Commons or to the people of Canada. Instead the government simply moved ahead and eliminated a whole set of institutions; a set of institutions whose one common thread seems to be the fact that they were established under the auspices of another political party. The Economic Council of Canada, the Law Reform Commission, ICOD, CIIPS, all of these institutions were established under Liberal governments. Despite that, I say as a New Democratic that they have done useful, non–partisan work.

However, this government, a Conservative government, decided that it had to get rid of them. It has justified that by saying that this was going to save people in Canada tremendous amounts of money. My colleagues this morning and last night clearly demonstrated that there were other immensely more profitable areas to tackle if the government wanted to save money. It could have saved millions by enforcing taxation more effectively and it could have saved billions by seeing to it that family trusts were not given a free ride in tax terms in the future.

Did the government choose those areas to move in? It did not. Instead, it chose to move in what can only be analyzed, in the end, as a partisan means of eliminating institutions to which it objected for reasons that could only be understood, it would appear, in political terms. It is shameful that this was the approach taken by this government.

What is even more shameful is that having decided to eliminate these six institutions the government then brought before policy makers of this country the so–called prosperity report which recommends the establishment of six new institutions in this country. They are six new institutions to deal with the economy, to deal with the teaching of science in our schools, to deal with questions of quality in the production processes of our country—many of the issues which these institutions being eliminated were already dealing with.

It is unforgivable to see stupidity being implemented for partisan reasons. It is even more unforgivable to see that stupidity revealed for the hypocrisy it is by suggesting a short seven months later that we establish a whole new set of expensive institutions which I am certain will cost us far more money than the minor amounts to be saved by killing off these institutions that provided a forward guidance system for the policy-making process in Canada.

I stand in the House as somebody who worked, before I joined this House of Commons as an elected member, with the Economic Council of Canada and the Science Council of Canada. I have seen them from close up.

• (1550)

They are non-partisan, thoughtful institutions trying to contribute to the betterment of this country's future, and they have been butchered. They have been butchered by a government that has not seen the responsibility it has to maintain independent thinking in the future of our country's government.

I hope that this piece of legislation will be rejected. I hope that it will be possible for us to recognize fairly and independently the value contributed to this country by these institutions that this government is seeking to kill.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, I would like to contribute to the debate today by pointing out what Canada will lose when the Science Council of Canada goes. The council was created in 1966 when Mr. Pearson was Prime Minister of Canada. When the council was inaugurated, Mr. Pearson said that it was in the interest of governments and Canadians to receive advice from an independent body on establishing constructive links between science and technology on one hand and economic growth, resource development, health, the environment and national infrastructure on the other.

He charged the new agency to draw upon all the wisdom of the natural sciences, pure and applied, as well as the social sciences and humanities. He stressed how important it was to apply the scientific talent of Canadians to social problems that affect the whole world and to evaluate the impact of science and technology on society. That was in 1966.

Since then the Science Council of Canada has met Mr. Pearson's challenge. According to its last chairman, Janet E. Halliwell, the production of the Science Council of Canada is rich and multi-faceted. We need only consider the publications following more than 25 years of study: working papers, workshops, lectures and studies. These publications are a solid collection of summary documents, analyses and policy papers, widely recognized in Canada and abroad, as the frequent references to them in national and international literature attest.

The council's most important function perhaps has been education, not in the sense of acquiring knowledge but of helping people to rethink old problems in new ways and to identify new issues and new challenges. The council had about 20 members who came from all parts of the country and all backgrounds: the private and public sectors, industry, government, education, medicine and so on. Of course the council brought together French and English speaking people. I would like to return to the Science Council of Canada's national vocation in a moment.

I should also point out that with the exception of the chairman and vice-chairman of the council, members worked without remuneration. The Science Council gave them an opportunity to discuss the various problems being analysed by the council and consider possible solutions.

[English]

In a letter to members of the committee which studied this bill to dissolve the Science Council and the other commissions such as the Law Reform Commission and the Economic Council, Janet Halliwell, the last chairman of the council, observed that while the council's work extended to many subjects there were perhaps two themes which dominated and influenced Canadians over the course of the past 25 years and the understanding that we have of science and technology and society. These two subjects are what is today called competitiveness and sustainability, words which were not in vogue perhaps 15 to 20 years ago but which nonetheless have preoccupied the council for the past 25 years.

From its beginning the council consistently stressed the need for Canada to become more innovative. I believe that Ms. Halliwell is right to say that the council's work has had a profound impact on the national agenda and that the council's thinking underlies the government's current prosperity initiative. Witness the fact that Ms. Halliwell was asked by the government to co-chair the task force on science, technology and related skills which was one of the task forces which made up the prosperity initiative.

With respect to sustainable development, the Science Council anticipated the Brundtland report by more than 10 years in a report entitled "Canada as a Conserver Society".

With this record, it came as a shock to many people that the Science Council would be unceremoniously dissolved by the government. Of course this decision was announced in the February budget. The decision to abolish the council was taken without formal evaluation of its work or consultation with the chairman or the members of council. Indeed, the chairman was advised that the winding down of the affairs of the council should not be considered a negative comment on the work of the council.

The Minister of Finance has said that other groups can do the council's work. Perhaps he had in mind the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology which is chaired by the Prime Minister. NABST does not operate independently from the government. On appointment, the members of that board take an oath of secrecy. Its reports are not always made public or are often made public after considerable delay.

Professor John Polanyi, the 1986 Nobel prize winner in chemistry, who has been a member of the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology, appeared before the legislative committee studying this bill and explained that governments must have not only in-house sources but arm's length sources. "Why is that", he asked. He answered that in-house advisers have to deal with immediate crises. They often cannot afford to take a longer view and are subject to political constraints. They do not report directly to the public and sometimes they do not report at all to the public. That is why we need independent, arm's length bodies.

Canada is left with only two independent long-range research organizations that are examining science policy and innovation and both happen to be located at the University of Quebec in Montreal. Neither has the integrated strength, national purview or scope of the Science Council. I believe it is accurate to conclude, as did Ms. Halliwell: "The demise of the Science Council will sharply reduce access to independent in-depth analytical work in science and technology policy, the underpinning of good decision making".

• (1600)

The government has said the motive for terminating the Science Council is to save money. This is a motive we all share. However as Professor Polanyi put it: "The money being saved by the dissolution of the Science Council is about $3 million per year". It sounds like a lot of money but as he said: "It is a trivial sum compared to the cost of just one technological error".

Dr. Polanyi also told the committee that if we abolish the Science Council we will have to recreate it, and he listed a number of considerations which we should look for in the existing and in the future Science Council. I would like to review three of these considerations.

First, he said it must be credible, which means it must be in touch with the scientific community. It also takes time to establish credibility and that is why it is such a tragedy we are losing the 25 years of experience we have in the Science Council. Credibility is item one and the Science Council had that.

Second, the Science Council must be fair and recognize a range of views and that is exactly what the Science Council did.

Third, the body must be visible. On this point Dr. Polanyi felt that the Science Council may get less in the way of good marks. It has to be visible he said to scientists, to scholars, the public, the media and decision-makers.

I would like to add a word or two on this point. I am concerned that MPs are not organized to benefit from the work of the Science Council or other groups that provide similar advice such as the groups at the University of Quebec or the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology. I believe we will have to make changes if we wish to benefit from a future Science Council.

Let me explain what I mean. Until 1986 the miscellaneous estimates committee dealt with the scientific and technological activities of the Government of Canada. It was that committee which reviewed the work of the Science Council and its reports, studied the activities of the National Research Council and the government departments that deal with industry, science and technology.

In 1986 as part of parliamentary reform, the Standing Committee on Research, Science and Technology was created. One of the major features of reform was to give more power to committees and part of this power was the ability to undertake a study independently without a reference from the House of Commons. Also committees with a smaller membership were supposed to lead to specialization.

I regret to note that the enthusiasm for reform lasted about two years. By 1988 most of the smaller committees that were established in 1986 were merged into larger ones. Research, science and technology were lumped together with industry, regional and northern development. The committee's work I must say is hampered by changing membership.

In the United States the membership of congressional committees operates under rather strict rules of seniority. Adopting rules of that nature might improve the effectiveness of our own committees.

What I am trying to say is that while we might want a future science council to be more visible and to have the ear of decision makers, it is for decision makers, including members of Parliament, to listen and to organize themselves in a fashion that we are able to listen to the advice and to understand the reports that come from groups like the Science Council.

In closing, I want to add just one word about the national vocation of the Science Council of Canada. As I said before, we are left really with no national body to look at science and technology policy issues from a national perspective and from an arm's length perspective.

As I mentioned also, the Science Council was unique in being a national body in that it brought together anglophones and francophones from all over the country. By its mission and composition the Science Council helped secure both as prosperous and harmonious future for Canada.

I would like to quote Mr. Goyette, who wrote to the Science Council of Canada when it was announced the council would be dissolved. Mr. C. Goyette is president of a company in Montreal called Corestham. Mr. Goyette said that the Science Council provided a vision of technological and scientific development commensurate with the reputation of this country, and capable of steering us successfully through the critical nineties. The council also had a unique network of scientists and engineers who, as reflected by their ties with the business and academic world across Canada, proved that the various regions of this country can work together and also reach a consensus on a vision of the future".

In concluding Mr. Goyette said: "On the basis of my experience, I can state that the Science Council was an essential component of Canadian unity".

The dissolution of the Science Council not only deprives us of an agency that would help us prepare for the future through an understanding of the challenges of science and technology, but also of another agency and institute that brought Canadians together and contributed to national unity. That is why all Canadians should and indeed must regret the dissolution of the Science Council.

[English]

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the member's speech. I just wonder if he would comment on where one might find the necessary funds to keep these institutions going.

The government side has indicated that their principal purpose in doing this is to make a leaner, meaner government. I know in his remarks the hon. member was just drawing toward telling Canadians where the funds to keep them going were going to come from.

Mr. Berger: I thank the member for Skeena for his question. I guess in the months leading to the actual closing of the Science Council, in the time between the budget and the end of June when the Science Council had to close its doors, the chairman, Janet Halliwell, prepared a proposal to revive the council known as the Phoenix Project. She hoped this new institute would be modelled after the Carnegie Institute in the United States. Funding would be provided by a number of sources, including the private sector and provincial governments, but certainly required a commitment from the federal government.

On April 8 I asked the Minister for Science when he appeared before the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology whether the federal government would be prepared to participate in the funding of such a new institute. His answer was no, flatly no, no interest whatsoever from the government.

We learned that the Phoenix Project would never see the light of day and that the government was not interested in preserving the council in any form.

Perhaps at some point such a council can be recreated as a purely private initiative. I am somewhat doubtful. I have spoken to people who have been close to the council and people who are in the private sector. They do not feel that the funding can be obtained solely from the private sector for this kind of initiative. There will have to be some kind of government funding if we wish to recreate the council some day. Such a council would perhaps be housed at a university or some other institution where it might be on firmer footing than as just an agency of the federal government, as it was in its first incarnation.

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, may I say to the hon. member that some people over here were impressed by his speech. I am frankly surprised at what he has just said.

If the member wants to send to some of us over here the notion that a phoenix can arise out of this situation which may require some matching support there are some people over here who would like to help him.

Mr. Berger: Madam Speaker, I thank the member for his willingness to look at this proposal to revive the Science Council. Certainly, I will be in touch with him. We will get to work on it and see what we can do.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C–63, an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies.

Canadians should know, and I want to repeat for them, the organizations that we are dissolving this afternoon: the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, the Economic Council of Canada, the International Centre for Ocean Development, the Law Reform Commission and the Science Council of Canada.

When the rest of the world is talking about training, retraining and creating centres of excellence we in this country are dissolving six institutions that contain some of the best and brightest minds that our country has ever seen. They have been producing ideas on a whole range of issues.

I think specifically of the Science Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada. These two institutions have been generating ideas for debate not only for this legislature but for every other legislature in the country. They have also provided specific information to those in the private sector who were interested, some of it concerning corporate development in the business sector and the education sector.

What bothers me most is that the government is suggesting that this entire operation is being done in the interest of addressing the deficit and debt of this country.

This government does not understand that as it proceeds on this course of cutting and dismantling these instruments it is weakening the galvanization process of this country. That is one of the things that really affects confidence.

I remember in 1961 when John F. Kennedy said: "We are going to put a man on the moon". That one sentence triggered a reaction which galvanized the will of the American people. That one sentence triggered a reaction in the grade schools, high schools, colleges, universities and think–tanks all over the United States. They said: "Yes, when we work together, when we have a hopeful thing to look forward to we can raise our productivity levels and we can become creative". These exercises in creativity produce all kinds of spin–off opportunities for job creation.

I believe that President–elect Clinton will be a catalyst for galvanizing the will of Americans once again. That is what we are missing in this country. We are missing that one big idea that will pull us all together, that idea of hope that will make us all feel good about ourselves and cause us to have the level of confidence that will cause us to spend again and will cause our job creation mechanisms to start kicking into place again.

If one good idea came from these institutions, I refer specifically to the Economic Council of Canada and the Science Council of Canada, that could trigger a change in the mind–set of this country then that alone could pay for all these institutions for the next 10 years or 20 years.

I am totally sympathetic with the notion that we must be cost efficient, that we must not waste and that we must not abuse taxpayers' money. I will not argue any of those points. However, what is really lacking in this country right now is the feeling that it is a good thing to be creative, that it is a good thing to unleash that creative process.

These institutions were internationally respected think-tanks. They did not always come up with ideas that could be used. They have not always come up with ideas that I have agreed with. However, they were instruments for advancing the debate, which is what is lacking in our country today.

The whole exchange, the whole concept of advancing debate is really stifled. It is only when the best and the brightest of minds are fully exercised in debate that we will generate ideas that hopefully will put this country back on a path to economic prosperity.

When I think of these organizations being dismantled I just cannot understand where the government is coming from. How much are we truly going to save? What are we going to do with these minds, with the human capital that exists in some of these institutions?

I am sure that some of this human capital, this great talent, is going to be transferred to other sections of government so that they will still be an expense to the taxpayer. Their data bases and libraries are being dismantled. They are moving some of them to Toronto. I do not know where all the data bases are being moved, but I am sure they are going to be parked in different sections of government, in different parts of the machinery of government.

Think of the cost we are going to incur when we bring similar think-tanks back. We are going to have to reconstruct all the dismantling that is going on. I just cannot figure out where the government is coming from on this particular question.

I listened to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology talk about the prosperity initiative. I listen to the government when it talks about the fact that we must become globally competitive, must put more dollars into training, and must stimulate the community and stimulate the idea process to create new products at more competitive prices. I hear all these statements, but this action flies right in the face of them.

I refer specifically to the Science Council and the Economic Council of Canada. These are two of the finest think-tanks anywhere in the world. To chop them is the type of retreat by national governments that I am ideologically opposed to.

In the private sector we are encouraging people to put money into research and development. Two and a half years ago one of our more successful companies in this country, Magna International, which I had the privilege and experience of working with, had a very difficult time because of the downturn in the economy. The levels of profit had vanished and there was pressure from financial institutions to try to get this organization back on track.

Yes, there were some streamlining initiatives and steps that were included in the revised business plan but the one thing that salvaged Magna International, put it right back on track and made it once again one of the most profitable organizations in North America, employing close to 20,000 people, was the fact that it had a solid research and development centre. It was able to diversify its products because there were creative minds in that company who were given the resources to create new products at better prices and with better quality. That is what brought it out of the depths of this tough economic period.

What I do not understand is that when there are creative centres of excellence like the Science Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada, if anything, we should be supplementing their budgets because right now we are looking for one or two ideas that will galvanize the will of this country, pull this country together, and give us the confidence to start moving again.

This government once again is not demonstrating the vision it should when times are tough. In my opinion, when times are tough we should not promote less but more. We have think-tanks with the best and brightest minds in the country working in a non-partisan manner for the good of the nation. When instead of encouraging them and giving them the tools and necessary environment to come up with something to give us guidance and lift us out of this demise the government writes them off it shows me that it is missing the very point. The government is missing the very thing that is required to help pull us all together and help put us back on track in terms of this economic malaise we are in.

I can only hope that something happens between now and the time when the final axe is dropped. Maybe there will be some kind of death-bed conversion. I salute the Prime Minister for admitting just a few days ago that he had made some mistakes in the last few years. Well, maybe for the sake of $3 million or $4 million he could admit that this is one of his mistakes and keep these fine institutions going.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I listened to my hon. friend's speech with great interest because he is very thoughtful on these questions and I respect what he has had to say.

I will begin with a little story. Two weeks ago, a page approached me and she asked: "Are you related to the Tom Hockin who wrote this boring book that we have to read in our political science class?" I said: "Well, I am that Tom Hockin". She came back two days ago and said: "Oh, I was so embarrassed. I have read the book again and it is not so boring after all. There are some good ideas in there".

Mr. Mills: There are some good ideas in that book.

Mr. Hockin: Maybe she was just apologizing. I mention my book because I know the hon. member has written a book too. It is on taxation, on the flat tax. As far as I know, he produced that book the same way I produced the three books I wrote. I did it without an institution funding me, without an economic council or a science council funding me. I did it as an individual.

In fact, this government's $168 million publishing program is going to allow publishers to seek out people, to get all sorts of new ideas into the public conversation of Canada. We will have a tremendous proliferation of ideas and debates on a number of things.

Why do we have to have institutions for the hon. member to write his book? He would agree with me. Institutions are not needed; he can do it on his own. A publisher will approach him and his ideas can be disseminated.

I am in no way being critical of what the Economic Council of Canada or the Science Council of Canada produced, but sometimes institutions can slow down publication. Sometimes they can to some extent smooth out the hard edges of an idea because one is writing for the institution. Sometimes the ferment of ideas is more likely to come forward in an autonomous fashion, the way the hon. member wrote his book, the way I wrote mine.

I just wanted to tell my hon. friend that I do not agree with this approach that without these councils we are not going to have a ferment of ideas. Of course we will. In fact given our publications policy brought in by the Minister of Communications, we are going to have just a tremendous number of ideas that will attract the attention of Canadians.

The hon. member said that what we are looking for is the one big idea which will pull Canada together and pull us out of whatever it is we are in, I would say our economic troubles or constitutional troubles. I have to say that the Toronto Blue Jays did not win the World Series with one big home run. They won it with a lot of singles, doubles, stolen bases, good relief pitching and not with one big idea. They did it with a whole range of small, medium and a few big ideas.

This government is being asked to lead the Canadian people, and any government would be asked to lead the Canadian people, not in search of one big idea, but a whole range of ideas. When I look at the front bench and the second bench here, every minister represents different ideas to help restore the Canadian economy. Every minister has his or her own approach. There is not one big idea. The positions of the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister will always attract the most attention perhaps, but all ministers are contributing.

It is wrong to try to put in place councils that will somehow miraculously come up with the one big idea that will solve all our problems, be they medical, sociological, economic or political.

It is much better to have the ferment of autonomous thinkers in academic institutions and elsewhere, writing and dialoguing, attending seminars, producing their ideas that way. In fact the $168 million for a publications strategy will probably do far more for producing that ferment of ideas than maintaining these councils which frankly are expensive and whose participants generally will still produce their ideas in different formats for academic institutions and maybe for government and the private sector.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I did read the hon. member's book when I worked in Mr. Trudeau's office. Actually I found it quite helpful. It was a well-written piece and enabled me from time to time to effectively use the machinery of government. I have never forgotten that.

I did not use the Science Council of Canada or the Economic Council of Canada when we did our work on the single tax issue. We continue to advance that idea. Hopefully one day this government will be receptive to doing a detailed analysis of it and considering it for Canadians because most Canadians would like to see this government take a shot at comprehensive personal and corporate tax reform.

I found that it was only after the Canadian Tax Foundation did a critique of our work on the single tax that we started getting some response in terms of having a viable idea.

An hon. member: They are not government financed.

Mr. Mills: That is not the point. The point of the matter is that this particular organization, the Economic Council of Canada, has a data base of information and research that assists all kinds of operations from other legislatures, corporations and educational institutions across the country. So one should not think that they are just self-sufficient. They give information to all kinds of agencies across the country that are doing their own creative thinking.

That is the point I think the government is missing. They represent a solid service. A service that has credibility for some of the research going on in fields in so many different sectors.

When I talk about the one big idea, I am not talking about just a single idea. I am talking about an equation that will pull everyone together. I mentioned the example of John F. Kennedy saying: "We are going to put a man on the moon". It was not the actual event of a man being put on the moon which pulled everybody together. It was the fact that the objective got everyone working together. It stimulated everybody, those in grade school right through to those in the think-tanks, research centres and corporations all around the world. He gave the people a vision of hope. That vision of hope was partly given to him by some of the best and brightest surrounding him.

That is the whole purpose of these think-tanks. It is for the Prime Minister and his cabinet to listen to some of these people from time to time. He does not have to agree, but they are instruments for advancing debate. They are instruments for helping people move to a new level of hope and a new level of opportunity.

It may not necessarily be the Economic Council of Canada which comes up with an idea but its service and work on a particular idea might motivate some think-tanks in a university in some other part of the country to come up with some ideas. The whole notion of sending out a signal that we are going to do away with the idea generating institutions is counterproductive.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in the debate on Bill C-63.

I do not take exception to everything that the hon. member has just said, but we are debating Bill C-63 which really gives effect to a commitment we made in the February budget of this year in order to streamline government, make it more efficient, make it more effective. What we are talking about is the elimination of six bodies only in Bill C-63.

I want to remind the House that those bodies are: the Economic Council of Canada; the Science Council of Canada; the International Centre for Ocean Development; the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security; the Law Reform Commission; and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council.

In a debate like this we can drag in everything and I think the opposition has effectively done that. We have to focus on what this bill does. What it does is to respond to a need expressed by the Canadian people. That need was pretty evident last year during the minister's pre-budget consultations.

From one end of Canada to the other Canadians are talking about streamlining government, making it more efficient and more effective. At the end of the day they want less money spent on the delivery of services.

Mr. MacWilliam: It is about silencing your critics. Shoot the messenger.

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, the hon. member hollering from across the floor hopefully will have a chance to speak. If he could give me the opportunity, I will say what I have to say and hopefully he will have a chance before the evening ends as well.

To put this in perspective, we are talking about six organizations only in this debate. I want to remind the House that the federal government currently maintains more than 400 separate organizations and advisory bodies. At the end of the day, there is a great cost to that. Also included are 26 statutory government departments, 80 departmental agencies, 54 Crown corporations and over 200 boards, tribunals, councils and other advisory boards.

As we often say, you do not have to be a rocket scientist to calculate the cost of that. The cost is immense to the Canadian people. They have told us they want less government, not to say that they want less service, but they want less government and good service at the end of the day. I am not convinced that we are going to achieve that by maintaining the status quo. We have to take action at some point and I think we have taken constructive action.

To prove what we are doing is correct, I want to step through each and every one of those organizations and think-tanks we are talking about today.

The first one is the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council. The role of that council is to advise the Minister of Employment and Immigration on matters of concern to that department. That advisory capacity has been replaced by the Canada Labour Force Development Board with parallel regional and local boards. What we have again is a duplication in government and an unneeded cost to the Canadian taxpayer. It is an expense we do not need and we are taking action to eliminate that waste of money.

The Law Reform Commission is another one where its duties are being replaced free of charge by other organizations.

• (1640)

In fact, the minister and the department are taking advantage now of the Canadian Bar Association as well as federal and provincial government departments to develop proposals for law reform. Why keep a commission that is not needed? No reason. Let us not get lost in the rhetoric of the day.

The Economic Council of Canada was established in 1963 at a time when governments had money to spend and when balanced budgets were commonplace or at least were possible if you attempted to achieve balance in expenditures and revenues. That is not the case today. If it were, I am sure we would achieve it.

A great deal of its work is being replaced by the universities, public policy think tanks such as the Conference Board of Canada, the C. D. Howe Institute, the Fraser Institute, and the Institute for Research on Public Policy and private sector groups. Those institutions are doing the same work as the Economic Council of Canada. Certain federal organizations and federal departments do that very work today and they are being paid again by the taxpayers. The Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada are the institutions I am speaking of.

An overlap exists between the mandate of the Science Council of Canada and the programs of those of other organizations.

Let us take a look at those organizations that are doing the very same work. They are departments and agencies with science and technology mandates. The National Advisory Board on Science and Technology and non-governmental policy organizations are doing similar work, as are more specialized sectoral commentators, institutions and centres of research on science and technology.

The International Centre for Ocean Development was set up in 1983 under the previous regime. The government has concluded after nine long years that these functions can now be fulfilled more economically by assigning these activities to the Canadian International Development Agency. Again, duplication. Is it necessary? Absolutely not.

The Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security was established in 1984. We concluded that these functions can now be fulfilled more economically by assigning these activities to the Department of External Affairs.

If we stepped through all six of these agencies, their work is being duplicated by others inside and outside government. We have to exercise the responsibility that has been handed us. Is it not important that we recognize this duplication in government and the extra spending of taxpayers' money?

The argument used on the other side of the House is simply that the moneys saved are minuscule. Is that not the case in everything we attempt to do on this side of the House? No matter how much we save it is never enough. No matter how much that is, it is always affordable if you are in opposition.

Take a look at the dollar value attached to this movement to exclude or eliminate those agencies. Let us look at the total cost. I am speaking now of the 46 agencies targeted during the budget presentation in February of this year. It is estimated that for the 46 agencies and bodies mentioned in the budget speech, including the six covered by the legislation of which were are speaking today, the saving will be $22 million this fiscal year. In the words of the opposition that is just a minuscule amount of money. It does not mean anything, $22 million.

An hon. member: That is not what we said.

Mr. Thompson: If we look at the over-all cost of government maybe it is not, but the accumulation of $22 million here, $22 million there, or $22 million some place else adds up at the end of the day. In fact, it will add up to about $71 million by the 1993-94 fiscal year if we had done nothing. The total savings over the next five years will be $310 million. That is significant.

Do you remember the old phrase, what is a million? I guess today it is, what is a billion, but $310 million is still a fair chunk of change. It is a chunk of change that the taxpayers cannot find because as members on both sides know, whether it is an provincial NDP government or it happens to be Liberal, or a federal government that happens to be Conservative, at the end of the day no matter where you are in this country of ours, from Newfoundland to B.C., times are tough. Attempting to find $310 million is pretty difficult. The only way we are going to find it today I would suggest is to borrow money and we have done too much of that in the past. We are not going to do more of it.

I do not think the issue should be confused. When the member across the way spoke about galvanizing the Canadian people, trying to instil confidence in Canadian people, moving the economy down the road in the direction we want to see it move, I am not sure we can do that by maintaining agencies that are there at the expense of the taxpayer and are unnecessary. That is what we are talking about. I do not think we should allow the issue to be confused. We are not talking about anything else other than ending some duplication.

When they are talking about ripping the heart out of the Canadian economy, destroying confidence in the country, taking away the ingredients that might move our economy down the road in the right direction, I do not think we can buy into that logic because it is illogical to think that eliminating duplication in government has anything to do with jump-starting or moving the economy along.

Do not let that argument get in the way of common sense. What we are doing in regard to the elimination of these agencies is the correct thing to do.

As I mentioned, each one of these bodies, each one of these organizations by its actions, its deeds, and what it accomplished is already being accomplished by another level of government or another agency outside of government. That is the argument. Let us not confuse the issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, further to the agreement made earlier this day, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at 6 p.m. are as follows: the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso—Fisheries; the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond—Westray coal mine.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the member opposite that we do not consider $29 million a small amount of money. No one said that here today. We were not being disrespectful of a sum of money.

If the Tories really do believe that these institutions are not serving any policy objective, then why did they not cut them a quarter of a billion dollars ago? Why did they not cut them in 1985 if they were so committed to this? Why did they, if they consider these institutions a waste today, not consider them a waste in 1984? Why did they not make the decision then when they could have saved taxpayers a quarter of a billion dollars?

The discovery in year eight that these institutions were a waste of money is not logical. It seems to me if their logic holds, then they should have made the cut then. The thing that makes this operation so distasteful for me is the fact that there are so many other departments, agencies and services of government that are going through budget cuts, and I salute those budget cuts.

Many corporations, many families are making budget cuts because we are in a period of economic pain. What bothers me about this particular case is that the Tories are not turning to the Economic Council of Canada or the Science Council or the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security and the others and saying: "Listen, we have all had a tough time here. There are very few resources because of the downturn in the economy. The debt and the deficit is high because of unemployment, therefore we want you to take some cuts like everyone else".

Would that not be a more logical way to go, more consistent and more fair? That way we would still retain the core strength, the history and all the resources that these institutions have. I believe the economy will come back on track soon. I happen to be one who shares the view of Tom McCormack that the 1990s are going to be better than the 1980s.

I am not speaking here as someone who is negative. I am trying to appeal to your common sense. Just tell these organizations that they have to cut back, they should not get any increases in salaries. In fact, in many corporations these days people are taking cuts in salaries, as many families are doing.

Why can we not apply the same test to these organizations before the door is shut on them and before they are dismantled?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, how much time do I have to respond to that question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You have eight minutes.

Mr. Thompson: That is all the time that is required. It is a very broad question but the member started out by suggesting that if we were serious in 1984 about doing what we are doing, why did we not do it then.

That is a pretty fair statement. He was not a member of this House at the time, nor was I, but if I had been I would have suggested it then and not now. That is easy for me to say, is it not?

Mr. Keyes: It is on the record now.

Mr. Thompson: That is right. The fact is that no matter whenever one decides to do something like this, it is never easy.

I know there are some members on this side of the House who are not in total agreement with some of the decisions. There is no question about it. For every decision, there is always someone who is railing against it. No matter how good it sounds to you and me, there is always someone who is hurt by that decision.

That is the difficulty when you form a government. Perhaps the government should have, in 1984, taken a look at some of those institutions and made the tough choices back then but that did not happen. I guess that is hindsight. It did not happen. Maybe it should have but it did not.

Going back to the member's question, if he is saying it would have been a smart action by the government then, it is even smarter to do it now and all the rest is hindsight. Unfortunately we cannot return to pre-1984 days.

It was suggested maybe we should have taken a broader look at more agencies and departments of government and just cut back a little. By doing that we may not have had to eliminate some of those agencies. I think the suggestion within the question was we would not have had to do as much radical surgery.

In terms of duplication of government, I have tried in a very systematic way to step through all six of those agencies and explain why they are not needed. Again the basis of my argument is duplication in government. If we can save money and still maintain services to the Canadian people it is incumbent upon us to do that. I do not regret supporting the elimination of duplication in government.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, just before I begin, I wonder if you can give me some guidance, because it is very near private members' hour. Will the debate cease in one or two minutes and pick up again after private members' hour?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes.

Mr. MacWilliam: This evening we are speaking on Bill C-63, which is an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies. I want to say I am standing up along with my colleagues to oppose this draconian piece of legislation.

Let us just have a look at what this legislation purports to do. It will affect some 1,200 employees, cut some 500 jobs and proposes to save a mere $22 million per year. That is not chicken feed. We all know $22 million is a lot of money, however I hope I can demonstrate there are many other areas in the federal service where we can save a heck of a lot more than $22 million and still maintain the viable and very valuable programs these particular institutions, which are going to be chopped entirely, do provide.

Let us have a look at the institutions which are affected. The Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council is gone. The Law Reform Commission of Canada has been deep-sixed. The Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security is gone. The Economic Council of Canada has bitten the dust. The International Centre for Ocean Development, another world-class research institute has also bitten the dust. Finally, the sixth casualty of this administration is the Science Council of Canada.

I want to submit the reason this government has chopped those bodies has nothing to do with budgetary restraint. It has nothing to do with saving $22 million. It has everything to do with silencing the government's critics because every one of these institutions at one time or another has been critical of the policies and initiatives of this government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have 18 minutes left in his speech plus 10 minutes questions or comments.

It being five o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(6) the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved that Bill C-350, an act to amend the Criminal Code (hate propaganda), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to move second reading of this important but very short bill.

This bill is an amendment to section 318.(4) of the Criminal Code of Canada. That section prohibits the incitement of hatred against an identifiable group. I quote from the words of the act: "distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin".

The bill would amend this section of the Criminal Code by adding to the list of persons or groups of persons, those who are distinguished by age, sex, sexual orientation or mental or physical disability.

This bill is based on a resolution which was passed last February by the Kingston Police Services Board. The board prepared this resolution after receiving complaints from members of the public who were upset with various comments in the press particularly, but comments these persons believed promoted hatred against segments of society which were not protected by the wording of the Criminal Code as it now stands.

The citizens were upset with statements which suggested, for example, persons infected with AIDS or HIV should be cast out from society and somehow excluded from the normal living standards the rest of us have come to expect because it was some kind of punishment they deserved for having contracted this disease.

It was felt that by changing the words of the act this kind of nonsense could be stopped because it would constitute hate literature and would not be published.

I believe this particular section is important in our country. It is a hole in the law, notwithstanding the fact that prosecutions under section 318(4) of the Criminal Code have been exceedingly rare. I do not want to go into the history of prosecutions under this section particularly. I do not think they are terribly relevant today, but I must say prosecutions have been exceedingly rare under this section either successful or otherwise. I understand very few have been launched but I do not have precise figures on that.

By expanding the wording of the section I believe we can help create a fairer society for persons who suffer as a result of the publication of hate literature. I also believe some of the material I have seen occasionally must come very close to, if not constitute literature that does promote hatred against one of the identifiable groups I have listed in Bill C-350.

I want to thank the Kingston Police Services Board for drawing this hole in the law to my attention. I was pleased to be able to have this bill drafted and submitted to the House and that it made its way through the tortuous process of Private Members' Business to be drawn and made available for debate today. Unfortunately it was not chosen as a votable item. I would hope at the conclusion of the debate today there might be unanimous consent to allow the bill to receive second reading, notwithstanding that it is not votable, and have it referred to a legislative committee so it could be studied there. I do not think there would be general objection to the bill or any aspect of it in the House.

Looking at the history of this bill, section 318(4) of the Criminal Code was introduced into the code in 1970. The debate that took place then was a fairly vigorous one. There was considerable opposition to including hate literature as something that should be prohibited in Canada. The argument was very clear, that it was an infringement on the right of freedom of speech. There is no doubt it is an infringement on that right. It was introduced as such an infringement and it was clear the purpose of the infringement was to limit people in their exercise of their right of freedom of speech from carrying on in a way that was harmful and incited hatred for others.

I had a brief glance through the debate. I found a speech by the hon. Lincoln Alexander who was then the member for Hamilton West. I know my colleague who seconded the motion today is now the member for Hamilton West and certainly would be very familiar with the hon. Lincoln Alexander, the former Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario who also served a very distinguished record of public service after he left this House.

In any event he made a speech in the course of the debate on Bill C-3 as it then was, the bill that in 1970 introduced this section of the Criminal Code. I thought it might be insightful if I were to quote from various aspects of the hon. member's speech. He said, as reported on page 5610 of Hansard for April 7, 1970:

> I do not know whether the bill is perfect. Perhaps it is not perfect. Maybe it is contrary to the thinking of some of us—.We as Canadians and parliamentarians must discuss this type of legislation. Perhaps this legislation would not have been necessary had we followed, as I indicated in my maiden speech, the advice of one Adele Florence Corey. I should like to quote from Hansard of September 20, 1968—but remember that when I first spoke in this House I was more nervous than I am now. As recorded at page 291 of Hansard for September 20, 1968 I mentioned that this woman had said a long time ago, I said:
> > She said that men should be judged not by the colour of their skin nor by the way they fight, love or sin, nor by the gods they serve or vintage they drink, but by the quality of the thoughts they think.

The words that Mr. Alexander quoted at that time are relevant in the debate today. They indicate that the judgment that we pass on others is not to be based on outward appearance, apparent illness, apparent disability or age, but rather on the quality of the thoughts they think. He has typified the kind of generosity of spirit that I believe this bill tries to inspire in our fellow citizens.

He went on later in his speech, quoting the former member for Hamilton West, Mr. Alexander, as reported at page 5611 of the Commons Debates for April 7, 1970, to say in discussing the same bill:

> Then, Mr. Speaker, last but not least we come to legislation. When all else fails with the good intentions of mankind and with the background man professes to have in Christian love and brotherly love, and that cannot arrive at the necessary solutions, I respectfully state it is my public duty as a parliamentarian to start thinking about legislation.

It was an excellent speech. Mr. Alexander displayed on that occasion the kind of generosity of spirit that was important. He said that we were not able to overcome people's hatreds and the way they express them just by encouraging people to expand their horizons and broaden their views. Sometimes we had to do it by legislation, resort to legislation to prevent people in our society who wish to expound this kind of hatred from doing so. He was prepared as a legislator then in 1970 to agree to the section of the code that is now section 318(4).

Why are these changes that I propose today so important? Frankly I think the world has changed since 1970. In 1970 the House was prepared to agree to a list that included colour, race, religion and ethnic origin. Since that time we have become much more aware of the women's movement, for example, of the importance of the elderly and of young people and the violence that is done to both age groups in our society. We have been through the International Year of the Disabled and our awareness of persons with disabilities is far greater in 1992 than it ever was in 1970.

We have changed our approach in dealing with these people in a host of ways. We have allowed them and encouraged others to raise awareness of the problems that are confronted by persons who fall into these categories. In so doing, we have not made the law sort of catch up with the way we feel about these kinds of groups and the way we have reacted to these kinds of groups and responded to their concerns. Because the groups have become vocal and are expressing the needs, wants and desires of the members of their groups, they naturally have raised their profile and have become subject to attack. It is that kind of attack when it takes the form of hate literature that this legislation is designed to prevent.

The purpose of the legislation is to protect these groups from this kind of hatred, from this kind of publication. The need was simply not there in 1970 because these groups were not as active, were not as vigorous, and were not promoting the rights and responsibilities of their members the way they are today.

Some may say it is unfortunate that we have groups promoting their rights, that it is very divisive in our society. It may be. However I am prepared and I think most members of this House are prepared to live with those divisions. We have all become accustomed to those divisions. What we have tried to do is say: "Yes, we recognize that you have a legitimate role to play as an advocate for the group that you represent". The interests of the members of that group are very important. We try to balance those interests and create a situation where all citizens are treated fairly, regardless of the distinction that is based on the items I have listed.

By seeking to protect those differences, those different rights, and the specific rights that belong to each one of us, I think we are safe in saying that we should protect those rights by ensuring they are not made the subject of hatred by reason of the publication of hate literature. That is why I think this amendment is so important.

Our society has aged and perhaps that has something to do with why we would want to include age in such a list. Certainly sex has been a subject of considerable debate for the past decade at least. I am sure, were my colleague from Halifax here, she would want to say something on that subject and the importance of the changes that have taken place in women's rights in this country in the last 10 years or 15 years. That was not an issue in 1970 to the extent that it is today. Public awareness was simply not there.

These changes, while they may seem very simple and very basic, are ones that frankly are moving to bring the law into the latter part of this century, certainly into the 1990s. Had these issues been simmering at the point they are now simmering or boiling, however we want to describe it, in 1970, they would have been included in the original amendments to the Criminal Code. But they were not and so we are faced with a situation where I think the code should be brought up to date and that is what I have sought to do by this amendment, having been urged to do so by the Kingston Police Services Board.

I do not think there is much I can add to explain the bill to hon. members. As I say, perhaps at the conclusion of the debate we might look at the possibility of expediting the bill, giving it second reading and forwarding it to a legislative committee. At this point it would be appropriate if I conclude my remarks.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to address the proposals which have been advanced in Bill C–350 by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I know the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and I know his interest in legal matters and reform of the legal system. I have had the opportunity to serve with him on the privileges and elections committee. I enjoyed that very much and I am pleased to take part in this debate today.

Bill C-350 proposes that the definition of identifiable group as found in section 318 of the Criminal Code be expanded to include the terms age, sex, sexual orientation or mental or physical disability.

The issue embodied in this bill is one of fundamental importance. Parliament in the past has seen fit to provide for the prohibition of hate propaganda against an identifiable group as is currently defined in the Criminal Code.

The hate propaganda provisions restrict at present the freedom of expression in Canada, but they do so in order to prevent injury to members of the identified group and to the public at large. They do it in such a way as to be viewed as a reasonable limit on the guarantee to the freedom of expression.

I note the hon. member introduced this bill last June. In August the Supreme Court of Canada held in its decision, Regina v. Zundel that section 181 of the Criminal Code, spreading false news, violated paragraph 2(b) of the charter which protects freedom of expression and was not justifiable under section 1 of the charter. Section 181 of the Criminal Code prohibited knowingly publishing false statements causing or likely to cause injury to a public interest. Accordingly it was ruled by the court that this section was unconstitutional and of no force and effect.

The finding of the Supreme Court of Canada that section 181 is unconstitutional may have some impact on the hate propaganda provisions of the Criminal Code. One wonders whether this decision has created a gap in the law, in our ability to deal with hate propaganda, in the sense that conduct which would have previously been prevented or deemed illegal by virtue of section 181 would no longer be caught by that section which has been overturned.

It would be useful to study this decision of the Supreme Court of Canada and then assess its implications for government policy in the area of criminal law generally and on the issue of the relationship between freedom of expression and hate propaganda in particular.

It is important to remind the House in this regard that attempts by accused to have the courts strike down the hate propaganda provisions of the Criminal Code have been successfully resisted.

In the case of Regina v. Keegstra the Supreme Court of Canada by the narrowest of margins upheld subsection 319(2) of the Criminal Code, otherwise called wilfully promoting hatred, as a reasonable limit of the guarantee to freedom of expression within the meaning of section 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It agreed that there is a societal interest in prohibiting hate propaganda.

In examining the definition of identifiable groups in section 318 of the Criminal Code, in the context of whether the subsection could be a reasonable limit the majority of the members of the court in a five to four decision, a narrow decision, noted that the provision of the Criminal Code was targeted against the intentional fostering of hatred against particular members of society as opposed to any individual.

Subsection 318(4) defines the expression identifiable group as meaning "any section of the public distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin". Expanding the definition would broaden the type of speech that would be caught by the hate law and therefore could potentially put the hate propaganda provisions at risk.

In view of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Keegstra case, subsection 319(2) was designed to extend the measure of protection to visible and religious minorities so as to prevent their being exposed to hate messages and to promote racial and religious tolerance and understanding.

Expanding the definition of identifiable group to include other characteristics such as those proposed in Bill C-350 would significantly extend the narrow purpose of protecting visible and religious minorities approved by the Supreme Court of Canada in Keegstra.

Any amendments resulting in a broader range of speech caught by the legislation could give rise to the argument that these provisions no longer represent a minimal impairment of the freedom of expression. As a result, the hate propaganda provisions as amended by Bill C-350 could be more vulnerable to a finding by the courts that they constitute an infringement of the charter guarantee of freedom of speech and that they are not a reasonable limit prescribed by law in a free and democratic society.

To broaden the definition it would probably have to be established that there is a pressing and substantial objective in Canada of a significantly substantial amount of hate propaganda aimed at particular groups. Such findings would likely have to be made and sustained with respect to groups of persons characterized by age, sex or physical or mental disabilities for the proposals in Bill C-350 to be found constitutional.

As a result it may be a more prudent course of action not to amend the definition of an identifiable group unless and until there is evidence of the existence of a significantly substantial amount of hate material to cause harm to a group not now covered by the definition. It is expected that federal–provincial territorial ministers responsible for justice will examine a wide variety of issues associated with the hate propaganda provisions, including the issue of how the identifiable group in section 318 should be defined at its next meeting.

A thoughtful and extensive review of the hate propaganda provisions of the Criminal Code is well under way. In the interests of bringing about a comprehensive and sound law reform in this very important area, it would in my estimation be preferable to allow this process to conclude before the House considers any amendments to section 318 and section 319 of the Criminal Code.

The hon. member should be congratulated, however, for taking an interest in this very important matter and for advancing a proposal for change which is serious and very topical.

I would like to congratulate the hon. member on bringing forward his bill. It is a very important issue but, as I have said, it may not be prudent at this point in time to expand the definition because it could put at risk the hate provisions in our law at the present time.

I will conclude with that remark. Once again I want to congratulate the very eloquent member for Kingston and the Islands. He has done a lot of work in bringing forward various private members' bills to encourage discussion and debate. It was timely that we discuss this one today. I hope that the provincial, territorial and federal ministers will conclude their discussions on this issue and come forward with some reform in the law.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, as the justice critic for the federal New Democratic Party, I am pleased to stand and respond.

I want to say this before we lose the hon. member from the government. The government members always amaze me. Be careful when they start congratulating you. They will kill you with kindness. He just said that the hon. member who presented the bill, the member for Kingston and the Islands, was a wonderful member, then said how he has contributed so much to the House, and congratulated him. There was just one little problem: We are going to talk out your bill, or we are not going to refer your bill to the committee.

If I were putting forward a bill, I would prefer that the government got up and said that I was a terrible rogue but my bill had some substance and it was going to consider my bill and put it to the committee. I will take that and thanks for the congratulations. I cannot speak for the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, but perhaps if he had a chance to speak again he would say that. Thanks for the congratulations but no thanks. Don't kill me with kindness. Just send my bill to the committee.

I do thank the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona for putting forward some serious legal considerations. He mentioned the recent Zundel case in the Supreme Court of Canada which dealt with section 181 of the Criminal Code and that is spreading false news. The court said that was against the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and therefore falls.

This of course deals with hate propaganda. The government member for Edmonton—Strathcona, who just spoke, raised a good question as to whether the recent Zundel case dealing with section 181 on false news affects this section on hate propaganda.

We still have this section in the law on hate propaganda. It is in the Criminal Code in section 318. I will come to that in a minute. He asked the question: "Will that affect it? Will the court decision affect this section?" That is a good question.

It seems to me that is why we should take this member's bill and put it into the committee. Let the committee have a look at that and analyse precisely that question. If you are going to wait for the federal, provincial and territorial ministers of justice—I love all of them to the last man and woman—you will wait until hell freezes over before they make a few decisions. They are still working on facilities for juveniles. They are still working on areas for better gun control. They are still working on native justice measures. They are working on them, but they work pretty slowly.

If you are going to wait for them, you will be waiting for a long time. The position of my party is that we will agree to this bill today going to the committee because I think the principle of the bill is right. Indeed, it advances some very interesting principles. We would agree with that now so that it could be done. I did not want to disturb the hon. member, but I just wanted to make that particular point to him.

Let me say a couple of things about the bill, and put it in the right context. This bill deals with section 318 of the Criminal Code. It is worth having a look. I have the Canadian Criminal Code here. Section 318 calls it "hate propaganda" and it says "advocating genocide". Section 318(1): "Everyone who advocates or promotes genocide is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years".

"(2) In this section, genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy in whole or in part any identifiable group, namely: (a) killing members of the group; or (b) deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction". That is of the whole group, the whole people.

"(3) No proceeding of an offence under this section shall be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General, and (4) In this section, identifiable group means any section of the public distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin".

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands brings his Bill C-50 and proposes to add in section 318(4) age, sex, sexual orientation and mental and physical disability to the list of characteristics that may distinguish an identifiable group for the purposes of this section of the Criminal Code.

There is another bill in the House from my colleague for Burnaby—Kingsway. His bill received first reading on June 19, 1991. This bill received first reading on June 10, 1992 but the 1991 bill, the previous bill of the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, just deals with sex or sexual orientation.

What has happened here is that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has gone further and has added age, mental and physical disability to the list of characteristics. This is very interesting. This is open to a lot of debate and a lot of thought.

I am trying to picture in my mind a group advocating the genocide of a whole group based on their age, perhaps old people, perhaps killing old people or killing disabled people. That is a very big debate in Canada today, as members know. There is the woman from the west coast who is suffering from Lou Gehrig's disease who wants to be able to terminate her life.

We do not have yet the debate of people actually getting criticized or charged who are advocating that a group be terminated. That is what this bill would deal with. I find that a very interesting question. It is hard to pronounce on the question without some serious debate in the committee on that. I think that is what we need. Also sexual orientation is in there. We have seen the extent of gay bashing and the calls from different people for eliminating that group of people. Most Canadians do not share that. It is a very small minority. Again it would fit in the context of the hon. member's bill.

I just want to say a couple of other things on the general subject. The member for Kingston and the Islands and the House know that the issue of freedom of speech versus restrictions on the dissemination of hate propaganda has really been at the centre of the two most notable cases, the Eckville, Alberta high school teacher, Jim Keegstra, and the recent case of Ernst Zundel. Zundel was originally convicted of distributing racist literature through the mail, publications that question whether the Nazis killed six million Jews in Europe during World War II.

These are not academic questions. Watch the news and see what is happening with the neo-Nazis in Germany coming back. I personally am a civil libertarian. I belong to the Civil Libertarian Association, Amnesty International and other associations. I really do not want to see Nazis back. There is only one way to deal with Nazis. They have to be dealt with toughly. That is why we need to have these kinds of laws.

When people say that the holocaust did not happen, they are essentially rewriting history and trying to pave the way for the return of Nazism and fascism. That is what it is all about. We should not be fooled. It is not a question of civil liberties. It is a question of fascism and hatred and Nazism, ultimately.

I want to point out to the House that in March 1984 there was a special parliamentary committee on visible minorities in the Canadian society. They had a number of interesting recommendations. Section 35 called for the deletion of the word wilfully from that definition in the code. This would remove the difficulty that the Crown has in having to prove that the accused specifically intended to publicly promote hatred against an identifiable group. That is a very hard thing for the Crown to prove.

Recommendation No. 36 called upon the Department of Justice to amend the hate propaganda section of the Criminal Code in order to remove the necessity of having the Attorney General consent to prosecutions. That is not in the member's bill, but he might consider those two further aspects of the bill. If it went to the committee, it could look at that.

In July 1984 the Canadian Bar Association had a special committee on racial and religious hatred. It produced a document favouring stronger curbs on hate propaganda. I just want to refer to that: "After evaluating the conflict between egalitarian and libertarian values, the committee concluded that the weight of argument rested with the view that the law does indeed have a role to play in curtailing racial and religious hatred in the dissemination of hate propaganda".

Noting that the framers of our constitution supported the concept of legislative intervention, the special committee of the bar stated: "We ought not to shy away from strengthening the convictions which we have already put in writing in the Criminal Code".

The debate in Canada as to whether you like freedom of speech or laws that restrict freedom of speech is continuing and is at the core of these kinds of bills. As the member knows, we already have laws against libel, slander, defamation, contempt of court, obscenity and laws against incitement to riot. You do not walk into a theatre and yell fire. In other words, we do restrict freedom of speech in some ways in the extremes. This is a case advocating genocide as an extreme that must be regulated.

I want to cite the cry that was attributed to Voltaire: "I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend with my life your right to say it". Voltaire is saying that you can pretty well say anything and he will defend your right to say it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Your time has expired by two minutes. I will allow one sentence.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had longer. I would just like to say that this bill is very interesting. It is very important at this time. This is a huge debate in the country and the world. The bill is well thought out. It should go to committee. The House should put it through today on principle, and we should deal with some of these issues in the committee. That is where it should be dealt with.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a privilege to have the opportunity to not only second the motion put forward in the House by my colleague the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on Bill C–350 but also to speak to the bill for what brief time I have.

There is a bit of déjà vu because it was just last week when an attempt was made by myself on behalf of constituents in Hamilton West to have a Private Members' Bill move from second reading stage to committee stage so we could deal with amendments I had proposed to the Criminal Code with respect to parole and bail. I attempted to bring it to committee stage in order to have a complete, thorough, frank, and open discussion on a particular matter concerning the Criminal Code.

That is really what we were elected for in the first place, was it not? We were elected to bring the concerns of our constituents forward to the highest court in the land, as the member for Kingston and the Islands has done through his private member's Bill C–350, so that they can be put to a committee where there can be open discussion.

What we are dealing with here, as has been so eloquently put forward by the previous member and the member for Kingston and Islands, is the amendment the member seeks to section 318 of the Criminal Code, specifically subsection 4.

The hon. member is asking that the phrase identifiable group now mean:

> any group of persons who are distinguished by colour, race, religion, ethnic origin,

And here are the additions:

> age, sex, sexual orientation or mental or physical disability.

We say to the government: "Welcome to the 1990s". I would like to remind the House of a speech made in this House by the former hon. member of the riding I now have the privilege to represent. The Hon. Lincoln Alexander said in a speech on the original section 318:

> You cannot legislate love, nor can you legislate against prejudice. But, Mr. Speaker, surely you can legislate against the overt act of discrimination. I do not know whether this bill will work, but I hope it will. It can work in this area, in that it is a form of education. But it is a form of education the hard way.

It is a form of education.

What does Bill C-350 do? It updates us to the 1990s because today we are talking about, as the member's bill states, age, sex, sexual orientation, or mental or physical disability.

Back when the hon. member for Hamilton West, Lincoln Alexander, made his remarks in 1970 they were very applicable. In 1970 we did not realize the difficulties facing the disabled in our society. We did not appreciate what the physically disabled in our society had to put up with.

That is really what they did. They had to put up with the lack of services that affected them in everything from entering a grocery store to dialing a phone in a phone booth. In the 1990s we can say we have recognized their concern, in part because of the hard work by those organizations representing the disabled. They have come forward to us and said: "Look, here is our problem, help us out", and we acted to help them out.

This is an opportunity today for the Criminal Code to be updated to incorporate their concerns.

The member for Kingston and the Islands expressed very eloquently how the Criminal Code must be updated. There are many sections in the Criminal Code. It is a pretty thick book. There are many aspects of this book that do need to be brought up to date. We can only accomplish that if we can allow an initiative to get to committee stage.

There is no ulterior motive on the part of the member for Kingston and the Islands. This is not a press grabbing issue. This is not something that the member for Kingston and the Islands is trying to get some headlines with. He has just taken a piece of the Criminal Code, on behalf of the constituents he represents, and he said: "Look, all we have to do is get with the times here, folks. Get with the times. Age, sex, sexual orientation or mental or physical disability should be added to the list of those identifiable groups already found within the Criminal Code in section 318".

The hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona said that the government has proclaimed that the job of expanding the definition of section 318 is somehow vulnerable in the courts of our land. He certainly has not demonstrated to me or anyone on this side of the House exactly where it is vulnerable.

He referred to the Keegstra decision. The Keegstra decision was on section 319 not section 318. The hon. member is presenting a bill dealing with section 318. To broaden the definition, says the member for Edmonton—Strathcona, would be to identify the existence of a greater problem. Glory be, no kidding. That is exactly why the hon. member wants to put forward this amendment.

Where can we do it? In this place there must be an appreciation that the government should not always be responsible for all change. Tragically, I am seeing more and more that other members, who are caring and sensitive, on the other side of the House or even in their own party, who sit on the backbenches or in opposition have legitimate issues to bring forward through a private member's bill or a private member's motion, but time and time again there is a thin, narrow, weak excuse to kill the bill or the motion. That is a shame.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is not asking for this amendment, through his Bill C-350, to become law today. It will not become law if we say: "Yes, we are in favour of this idea". It is a request to have it moved to committee stage so that we can have an open and frank discussion. That is all he seeks the floor to do today.

We ask the government to give him, an opposition member working hard on behalf of his constituents, the opportunity to do just that.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I too am privileged to speak on this Private Member's Bill and answer some of the points raised by the previous three speakers.

I must say at the start that I am going to smother my good friend with more kindness. I am unable to give unanimous consent to this bill, but for some very good reasons.

First, on private members' hour, my good friend knows that this is a valuable debate to have. It goes into the general discussion pool. It will be discussed by the ministers of justice from all the provinces and territories and the federal government. It will go into that mix. They will take our discussions today into consideration. There is no doubt about that.

This bill, far from being a criticism of the current law, really endorses the current hate propaganda provisions. It does so by extending the groups to which the provisions would apply by adding groups defined by age, sex, sexual orientation, and mental or physical disability. It will not even be lost because it will come up again as a private member's bill. Unfortunately, it was not one of the five chosen to go to a vote in this session of Parliament. However, even going to a vote is a very unique provision. The power that we now have as private members of Parliament has been augmented dramatically, in a geometric fashion, with the Parliament passing those changes to the Standing Orders which permit five Private Members' Bills to come to a vote.

I wish my good friend who just spoke had been here five or ten years ago with a private member's bill. Nothing got anywhere. Therefore, we are still a major step ahead.

With respect to the intervention by my friend from Port Moody—Coquitlam in which he said that the ministers of justice are perhaps too busy and therefore it should be sent to the justice committee, I would like to say that at this point in this Parliament the justice committee is very busy too.

We are doing a major study on crime prevention for which some very interesting witnesses are appearing. A subcommittee of the justice committee is looking at the national security, as well as the codification of a new general part of the Criminal Code which raises those issues of consent to death and euthanasia.

We are currently reviewing two cases of parole that resulted in the death of police officers. Then there are the usual annual reports and GIC appointees. Therefore, the justice committee itself is really pressed at this moment.

Parliament is going to recess in a couple of weeks from now on December 11. Given the need to have an election by next November it is quite possible that the House would come back in February, there might even be a prorogation. We might then go out and have an election straight away.

Therefore, the likelihood of a committee being able to do much work on a practical day-to-day basis is quite small. That is not to say that this is not valuable though. The reason I want to speak is so that my comments will also go before those ministers of justice.

Section 318 of the Criminal Code right now prohibits the advocating or promoting of genocide against any section of the public distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin. Inciting hatred against a protected group by communicating in a public place statements which are likely to lead to a breach of the peace is dealt with in subsection 318(1).

Communicating statements other than in private conversation which wilfully promote hatred against a protected group is dealt with in subsection 319(2).

I want to make a comment for my friend opposite, and I wish in the next round to hear from him on this. As we know, at least if my recollection is correct, when it has heard these cases the Supreme Court has declared that these parts of the code are prima facie a contravention of the Charter of Rights, but they are saved by section 1 of the charter because they are a reasonable limit on our fellow citizens' fundamental rights.

It is important to consider whether, if this bill were to pass, it would expand section 318 so far that the court would not save it under section 1 and we would therefore be doing what none of us want to do, which is to wipe out the whole section. Therefore we would then be faced without a law dealing with the incitement of hatred against a protected group by communicating in a public place or with statements likely to lead to a breach of the peace or that advocate or promote genocide against any section of the public distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin. It is a very interesting point. I am not sure in my own mind what I think about that, other than I know we want that section to be in the code.

In this day and age, these very powerful special interest groups totally lack the ability to see the world in its broad context. They are very much caught up in tribalism, whether it is racially or ethnically motivated or just in their ideas and have no ability to realize that other people's ideas are equally valid and their ideas are really wrong. We accept the fact that we are all human beings in this world. Surely there are not many people who would deny that, but I guess there are a few.

Till South Africa started to move, the fundamental basis of apartheid was the acceptance by people who believed in apartheid that the majority were not human beings. That is the whole fundamental underlying basis of apartheid, that another group of humans is not in fact human.

It is the same with fascism, nazism. They just deny the reality that some people are human beings, based on their religion and their ethnic origin. It is absolutely an abominable thing. The point is that we do not want to put in words at this early moment that which might lead to the whole section being struck down.

In addition, the Criminal Code provides for the seizure and forfeiture of hate propaganda kept in the premises for sale or distribution. That is section 320(1) and (4).

A person charged with advocating genocide is liable to five years imprisonment if charged with the offence of the public incitement of hatred or of the offence of communicating statements which wilfully promote hatred.

A person is liable is two years imprisonment if prosecuted by way of indictment or to six months and/or a $2,000 fine if prosecuted by way of summary proceedings.

The Criminal Code also provides for four special statutory defences which an accused may raise if prosecuted for wilfully promoting hatred. These are: (a) the statements communicated were true; (b) the statements expressed or attempted to be established by argument in good faith and opinion upon a religious subject; (c) the statements were made on a subject of public interest which on reasonable grounds are believed to be true; and (d) pointing out in good faith for the purpose of removal, matters producing or tending to produce feelings of hatred.

Except for the offence of public incitement to hatred, the consent of the provincial attorney general is required to obtain a seizure or to initiate a prosecution under the Criminal Code's hate propaganda provisions.

Mr. Speaker, I guess that is my final point. You are signalling that my time is finished. That is the final reason why it should go before this group of provincial ministers, the federal minister and the territorial people. I am sure they will come back with recommendations that are very reasonable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In light of the support shown for the bill, I wonder if there would be unanimous consent to allow it to receive second reading at this time and be referred to committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent.

An hon. member: Did we call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): For the hon. member's purpose we did call it six o'clock. We were trying to get most of the members in here so that we could continue on with debate without suspending the sitting.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to a question I asked on May 11 concerning an extraordinary meeting of the fisheries commission of NAFO, the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, to deal with blatant overfishing by the European Community, principally by Spain and Portugal, on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. That special meeting of the NAFO fisheries commission, which was called at Canada's request, ended in uncertainty. Canada came away with little more than proposals for reform or, worse still, the EC's flat out rejection of their role in the stock crisis.

At that time my colleagues and I told the government that this situation was far too serious to leave solely to diplomacy. We urged the government to act, to introduce legislation now, to extend Canada's custodial management zone to include all of our continental shelf. The fisheries minister said no. He did not want to "howl and bawl and use exaggerated rhetoric". Extending jurisdiction is not a new or wild notion and calling upon the minister to implement such a policy is not wild rhetoric.

Much has happened since I asked my question on May 11. In June governments across the world met in Brazil for the UNCED. This impressive international meeting of state leaders offered our government another chance to change things. To its credit, Canada joined about 40 other countries in sponsoring the resolution on high seas fishing conservation and management, a resolution which passed.

We still could not convince influential countries like the U.S. and the EC to support it. We will have an opportunity to follow up on the UNCED when a special international conference late next year addresses fisheries issues, especially those regarding straddling stocks.

It certainly cannot happen soon enough for Atlantic fishermen. In July the minister imposed a domestic moratorium on the Newfoundland northern cod fishery, putting over 20,000 Canadians out of the fishery, some for the length of the moratorium and many others forever.

Also in July government scientists released their domestic stock assessments and quota advice for all 1993 Atlantic fish stocks. It calls for drastic cuts, in some regions up to 80 per cent. Frustrated fishermen, plant workers and communities everywhere are bracing themselves for a rough ride next year.

Some hope arose from the September NAFO meetings when the European Community made a solemn promise to follow NAFO quotas in 1993, something which it has never done.

At the same time the EC scuttled Canada's attempt to change the objectors clause, the very loophole through which EC overfishers have jumped for years. There is absolutely nothing stopping the EC or any other NAFO country for that matter from using it again, except perhaps the knowledge that Canada is fully prepared to extend its jurisdiction if they do.

I hope the federal government will make it perfectly clear that it is prepared to act in this matter should it be required. Canada spends about $400,000 annually in membership dues to NAFO. The minister of fisheries must ensure that this money is well spent.

The Liberal Party has decided to recognize the small steps that have been achieved on the international front. Progress has been made but much more will be necessary to ensure the future of our fishery and the future of the individuals in communities that depend upon it for their livelihoods.

Fishery communities in my riding are watching this government. Fishermen are realistic and most recognize that domestic catch reductions and other restructuring measures may well be necessary to sustain the fishery in the long term through this crisis.

They also know that the federal government must stay tough with its international friends. Unless it does, fishermen will find it extremely difficult to accept the tough quota cuts and jobs losses being imposed on them.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to respond to my hon. friend from Cape Breton who, by the way, represents the area where I was born.

At Canada's request, the fisheries commission of the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization, NAFO, met in a special session at Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, last May to discuss Canada's proposals to improve surveillance and control of the NAFO regulatory area outside Canada's 200-mile limit.

New measures developed by the special session were reviewed and adopted at the annual meeting of NAFO in September. All NAFO members, including the EC, have agreed to put them in place. Together these new measures represent yet another important step forward in ending overfishing on the Grand Banks outside Canada's 200-mile zone.

The measures adopted in September include a pilot project for an observer program of the NAFO area. Canadian fisheries managers have found the use of observers to be an effective surveillance measure inside the Canadian zone. Beginning in January 1993, observers will be placed on vessels outside 200 miles during 10 per cent of the fishing days.

Important new measures were been adopted to eliminate fishing for undersized fish. Minimum mesh sizes and minimum landing sizes were established. A one net rule was adopted whereby vessels would not be permitted to have nets on board with mesh smaller than the minimum size. These measures will apply to all groundfish fisheries in the area which will help considerably to reduce catches of juvenile fish. In addition, the adoption of minimum landing sizes will make it illegal for undersized fish to be sold to EC and other markets.

This government, in working with the industry, is doing its utmost to help solve a very severe problem facing the fishing industry.

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on several occasions I have risen in this House to ask questions concerning the Westray coal mine, and in particular with the disaster which occurred in Pictou county killing 26 men.

It has become abundantly clear in the last number of months that with the evidence that has been put on the record, and the information that individuals now have that one of the most important things that we could do as a national government would be to have an inquiry into this particular operation.

It would be an opportunity for the government to present its case, both with regard to the financial dealings surrounding this particular mine as well as some of the political interference which obviously ran rampant through the Westray coal mine project.

I received a letter recently which I wish to table and I will read it in part. It says: "We were shocked and outraged to read in today's Chronicle Herald that the Commons industry committee voted four to two not to proceed with an inquiry into the financial dealings surrounding the Westray mine project".

"As residents of Pictou county, we can assure you that their decision does not sit well with the majority of us if what people are saying on a grassroots basis is any indication. The talk in Tim Horton's coffee shops, our local garages and on the streets is that we are all amazed that six months after a horrific mine disaster in which 26 young men lost their lives not only are we back to square one but we may never get to first base again".

"We want some accountability from the Nova Scotia Department of Labour, our premier, our Prime Minister and the federal MPs and bureaucrats involved. In the meantime, why do not we invite those committee members who did not see the need to look into this matter any further to come down to the Christmas parties of the children of the 26 dead miners".

That is signed by Mary Gorman and Percy Hind, Jr., and I wish to table that.

The evidence is there for everyone to review and to examine. What is needed is an inquiry by the national government in order to fully address all of the concerns of the people who have been involved in this tragic occurrence. It is not sufficient enough for the Government of Canada to say: "Well, maybe Nova Scotia will have an inquiry". It was found by a Supreme Court justice that their inquiry was unconstitutional, but the justice did state that there was an opportunity here for governments, if you will, to have an inquiry.

I urge the Government of Canada to stop the cover-up, to have the inquiry, to produce the evidence, to respond to the charges and the concerns of many individuals, to give a thorough examination of all of the evidence, all of the witnesses regardless of one's political fate.

I believe strongly that the Government of Canada has a moral responsibility as well as a political responsibility, if not a legal one, to proceed with an inquiry either through the auspices of the Standing Orders of this House or indeed, to have the three political parties come together and agree on the mandate that would be taken.

It is irresponsible for the Government of Canada to turn its back on those dead young miners in Pictou county, their families, their loved ones and the community. I urge in the strongest possible terms that the minister afford himself of the opportunity in order to have this matter heard in its fullest possible way.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the area of occupational health and safety is the responsibility of the provincial government and is not the jurisdiction of the federal government.

Notwithstanding this fact, the Government of Canada, consistent with its role as a financial guarantor, took several measures to ensure the Westray project was technically viable. The initial environment assessment, the Acres report, pointed out the key health and safety issues associated with coal mines and the methods the company was putting into place to overcome these concerns.

All concerns, including those pointed out by the Devco report were deemed to be modifiable with known technology. The CANMET review deemed that the Westray project had no technical failings. It only spoke briefly of mine ventilation and spontaneous combustion risk. It concluded that in spite of these technical uncertainties, I repeat, the proposal had no major technical failings.

Westray was required to comply with all provincial coal mining regulations in Nova Scotia, including those dealing with mine ventilation and spontaneous combustion matters. It is been shown that the regular provincial mine inspections were indeed carried out.

According to the mining industry, the causes and mechanisms of coal dust explosions are well understood through past research. It is the responsibility of operators and regulators to apply that knowledge base in developing control strategies. We put the steps in place consistent with our role as financial guarantor to ensure the company was in full compliance with the provincial regulatory standards on health and safety.

This was monitored on a monthly basis by an independent mining consultant.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): By unanimous consent, the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been withdrawn.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

AN ACT TO DISSOLVE OR TERMINATE CERTAIN CORPORATIONS AND OTHER BODIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–63, an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I want to point out the six commission boards that have been effectively killed by this legislation have been very valuable and viable services for this government.

The Law Reform Commission's mandate was to provide ongoing review of the statutes of Canada and make recommendations for improvement, modernization and reform of legislation. It undertook some of the basic research and contracted out other works to consultants to try to modify and amend shortcomings in Canada's laws. It has been a very valuable service. We save $4.8 million by cutting this service.

Let us have a look at the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security. This institution had a mandate to increase knowledge and understanding of the issues related to international peace and security from a uniquely Canadian perspective. We save about $5 million by killing this institution.

The Economic Council of Canada was established some 29 years ago and has served admirably in its capacity. This council's objective was to provide advice on how Canada could achieve the highest possible level of employment and efficient production so the country could enjoy a high and consistent rate of economic growth and all Canadians could share in rising living standards.

This council had 28 members. The estimates indicate about $10.6 million in terms of its annual budget. One hundred and eight person years have been chopped to save about $10.3 million.

These are not major expenditures for the amount of work these organizations do.

The International Centre for Ocean Development focused exclusively on the oceans. Its mandate was to provide assistance, information and training programs for developing countries to help improve their management and utilization of ocean resources. We save $13.3 million by killing this program.

Let us have a look at the Science Council. It has been a particularly valuable institution for defending the need for research and development in this country. I think it is being killed because it has been very critical of this government. As this government has done with virtually every institution, it wants to shoot the messenger. It does not want to hear the bad news, so it has deep-sixed these organizations.

The Science Council had a mandate to assess scientific information and technological resources and increase public awareness of scientific and technological problems. The council had 30 members. Its budget was about $3.2 million and that has been killed by this legislation.

The Science Council of Canada has been a vocal critic of the government. The government has not responded to the criticisms. Instead it has chosen to shoot the messenger.

I just want to read a quote from John Polyanni who is the winner of the 1986 Nobel prize in chemistry. He said: "Killing the Science Council of Canada is short-sighted and will leave Canada without an independent voice on the future of science and technology. In our concern that the ship of state is too big, we are simply removing the rudder".

Killing all six of these very valuable institutions saves us $22 million for the fiscal year. Members of the government have said $22 million is not peanuts and we have to look at every avenue of savings. I want to point out there are a lot of other areas where we could save a heck of a lot more money than simply $22 million.

I am referring to the 1992 report of the Auditor General of Canada. These are follow-up recommendations that were the issues of previous reports and have not been attended to by the government. Under the title of "Military Conditions of Service", the Auditor General points out they examined a range of services and benefits intended to either adjust for special military conditions or develop military commitment and military ethos. The direct pay and allowance alone cost the department $3.3 billion, 29 per cent of the 1989-90 budget, almost $3.5 billion, to adjust for special military conditions and develop military commitment. That is a heck of a lot of money and $3.3 billion is a lot more than $22 million.

Let us go on to where it talks about the commissioning plans for officers. It states: "In the 1990 report the Auditor General recommended national defence periodically evaluate the efficiency and effectiveness of its commissioning plans. It pointed out at that time the department spends some $18,000 to $47,000 per student per year, depending on whether the officer cadet is sent to a civilian university or a military college". It gets worse.

Let us have a look at follow-up recommendations with regard to the Department of National Defence official languages training. I have been a long-time supporter of the official languages policy, but I am not a supporter of the flagrant misuse of public funds for the inefficient utilization of these policy directives.

Again the Auditor General's report states: "We reported that this program had cost the department about $500 million since 1980 and was expected to cost some $1.4 billion over the next 15 years". There were 7,600 individuals on language training between 1990-91. It also points out "the department's plans still do not focus training resources to address the shortage of bilingual anglophones. We noted in 1990 the Canadian Forces language system is designed to offer a low level of training to many, rather than train fewer individuals to maximum proficiency. In 1989 the 9,000 anglophones at the language level closest to becoming bilingual were not given priority access to resources that would have enabled them to become effectively bilingual". It goes on to say the Department of National Defence has not implemented recommendations to incorporate posting priorities into its language training. There is still no departmental posting policy to assign trained individuals from all courses to positions designated as bilingual, while respecting operational task priorities. The current departmental bilingual manning policy affects only 250 or so graduates. Although this course lasts a full year and costs over $80,000 per person, in 1990 and 1991 only 66 per cent of its graduates were actually assigned to bilingual positions.

There is more of a horror show here. Again the Auditor General reports the Department of National Defence should identify where Canadian forces schools cost more. This is under training efficiency and economy. It says: "We reported that the Department of National Defence should identify where Canadian forces schools cost more and should use this information to reduce costs".

It gives the following example. In 1990 the Auditor General reported it cost some $265,352 for a fleet school to train a single marine engineering technician, whereas it cost only $71,000 in the community college system. That is an outrageously inflated cost for something that could have been handled much more effectively in the community college system.

I want to move on to another area where this government could and should be saving money. Rather than cutting the fat and waste out of these particular programs it chooses instead to cut these six very valuable councils. They no longer exist and the services they provided have now bitten the dust.

Let us go again to the Auditor General's report. Under the Department of Finance it mentions outstanding loan guarantees amounted to $5.7 billion in 1990 and 1991. He also points out ongoing loan guarantees with lender risk sharing arrangements covered only 26 per cent of the total outstanding. In other words, three-quarters of that money loaned by the federal government has no arrangement in terms of shared risk or equity. It is just money that has been given out to the corporate sector by the government. In 1990 and 1991 that amounted to some $5.7 billion and the total authorized amount stood at $13.7 billion.

It just gets worse and worse as you look through the Auditor General's report and see where the government could have saved money or should have saved money but chose not to.

Again, let us go back to the Department of National Defence major capital projects. It says in the Auditor General's report: "We obtained a listing from the Department of National Defence of all initial provisioning contracts", purchasing contracts, "in effect at the time of our audit. The contracts date from as early as 1982 with a total cost of some $657 million". It reads further: "We focused only on the first comparison and limited ourselves only to those parts where price comparisons could easily be made. This involved some $158 million in spare parts contracted out over a 10-year period. We then compared the prices paid by the Department of National Defence with the listed prices of the same items available for sale or actually paid by the U.S. Department of National Defence". Lo and behold what do we find? The difference between the prices paid by DND, our Canadian Armed Forces and the prices indicated in these other sourcing alternatives varied widely. In the majority of cases it exceeded 50 per cent.

I know you cannot see the small graph on the page but in some cases it identifies overexpenditures of between 500 and 1,000 per cent greater than the comparable cost of the item. This is an outrageous and completely unconscionable waste of taxpayers' money in purchasing items for the Department of National Defence that were substantially cheaper using other purchasing sources.

The report goes on to say that even a 10 per cent reduction in procurement costs could result in savings in excess of $20 million each year. A 10 per cent reduction in the procurement costs would have saved Canadian taxpayers over $20 million.

That number is very significant because this legislation in front of us is talking about saving $22 million by cutting six very very important institutions and organizations including: the Law Reform Commission; The Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council; the Economic Council and the Science Council.

All six councils bite the dust at a savings of only $20 million. By a 10 per cent reduction in procurement in the Department of National Defence we could have exceeded those savings and it is right here in the 1992 Auditor General's report.

That is not all that is in there. I want to go over another item and the more one reads this, the more amazed one gets. This is with regard to the Canadian Armed Forces. It says that the vast majority of both militia and communication reserve units have no assigned roles or operational tasks and have been organized on the model of regular force operational units.

What is he talking about? Let us have a look. A militia lieutenant colonel, for example, supposedly leads a unit of some 200 to 300 positions, but in actuality it only averages about 100 people. In the regular force a sub unit of 100 people would normally be led by a major while a lieutenant-colonel would be in charge of about 600. There are no instructions requiring unit commanding officers to fill their units efficiently, wasting again, administratively, the taxpayers' money of Canada.

Again, under the project costs for the Department of National Defence, the Auditor General comments that the department bought two used offshore supply vessels for approximately $10 million. This in response to the minister's request in late 1987 that naval reservists be provided with the means to commence mine counter measures training for that summer. Although officials sponsored the project, they told the approving authorities that the vessels were in excellent condition based on an initial survey. It was found that an additional $16 million was needed for unplanned repairs after the purchase was made.

The purchase of a remote operative vehicle, called an ROV, cost the taxpayers some $955,000 to train reservists in mine hunting. It was not adequately evaluated at the time and proved to be too complex for use. At the time the audit was done the total costs had escalated from the original purchase price of $955,000 to well over $2 million. That did not include unplanned costs for facilities and the development of a training package.

Another point is that the department purchased 199 Bison armoured vehicles and 22 specialized M-113 armoured vehicles required to meet militia needs for $161 million before there was even maintenance personnel and facilities available to service them. The Auditor General points out that he estimated the Department of National Defence has incurred a loss costing $17 million to the Canadian taxpayer which could have been avoided if the programs had been set up before actually purchasing these vehicles.

The horror stories that are in the Auditor General's report, and I have only pointed out a few, indicate there are many avenues in which this government could have and should have been able to save far more than the $20 million it is saving by chopping these six institutions.

The record speaks for itself. The government has chosen to silence its critics by killing these institutions. It really has nothing to do with saving taxpayers money.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, who else but an NDP member could suggest that the saving is only $20 million? Well $20 million is a lot of money but I will correct his figure because it is more like $22 million. That in itself I guess is not as important as the over-all principle of what we are attempting to do, but I want to remind him that the saving this year would be $22 million. That will increase to $71 million by 1993-94. In five years it is going to be over $310 million.

What is $100 million here or there to the NDP? I guess it is nothing. One of the luxuries of being in opposition is that one does not have to be accountable to the taxpayers. That is an easy thing for him say. Why does he not ask Premier Harcourt, the NDP premier in British Columbia, as to what comes with assuming office? What comes with assuming office is responsibility to the taxpayers.

In a debate like this the beauty is if you are in opposition you can drag in everything including the kitchen sink and the member has done that. Everything can be dragged in no matter how irrelevant to the debate. However, what we are talking about specifically is the elimination or dissolution of six government agencies. It has nothing to do with the Auditor General's report. That is a debate for another evening. It has nothing at all to do with the Auditor General's report.

We are talking about the elimination of six agencies that cost us something as taxpayers. I have gone through the numbers, but the six agencies specifically are: the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council of Canada, the International Centre for Ocean Development, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, the Law Reform Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council.

The point I want to make, aside from the savings for the taxpayers of Canada, is that every single one of those bodies is duplicated some place else in the country. Sometimes it is by the federal government itself and sometimes it is by the private sector, but most certainly by the universities and other think-tanks throughout the country. We have gone through those, such as the C. D. Howe Institute and the Fraser Institute to name just a couple.

An hon. member: Now there is an honest perspective for you.

Mr. Thompson: The truth is when I debated this earlier in the evening, I stepped through all six of those agencies. I can do it again if you will allow me the time to do it, Mr. Speaker—and he is indicating that he will not—but I addressed each one of those specifically. I indicated what they are presently replaced by, but it is duplication which the taxpayers of Canada have told us they do not want any more. It is costing them too much and it is costing us too much, to the tune of $22 million a year.

The NDP is the only party in this House that can tell us and I suppose afford to say that $22 million is nothing. It is something. It is too much and the Canadian people have told us it is too much.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian taxpayer wants this government to save money and at the same time preserve jobs. By killing these councils the amount of money that is saved and the amount of jobs that are lost are not defendable. The services that are lost through the killing of these six national councils are not defendable.

I want to submit that there is no duplication. These councils were national in perspective. There are provincial science councils for example, but there was only one Science Council of Canada that took a national perspective. The Law Reform Commission of Canada was a national body. Sure there are provincial bodies, but we as a country also need a national perspective on these issues.

This has nothing to do with saving money. It has everything to do with silencing the critics of this government, that have told this government time and time again that it is doing a lousy job and instead of responding to the criticisms the way this government should—

Mr. Thompson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. That statement is totally inaccurate because those same bodies he is suggesting criticized the government in fact supported the government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that is not a point of order. It is a point of debate.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, these organizations are being silenced because the government cannot handle the heat and it does it under the auspices of budgetary savings.

In my presentation I pointed out well over a dozen areas in the 1992 Auditor General's report where these savings, savings far in excess of $22 million, could have been initiated by this government had it simply listened to the recommendations the Auditor General had made time and time again. It chose not to listen to those recommendations. It chose to ignore those recommendations.

Here we have a report that calls the government short on numerous fronts, where savings could have been effected by simply better and leaner administration and a better understanding of how to implement budgetary controls. There could have been savings effected far in excess of $22 million without a single job lost.

Canadian taxpayers want to see responsible action. Yes, they want to see the government saving money, but they do not want to see the government carving the guts out of organizations and throwing people out on the street in order to effect their budgetary control.

There are different ways to skin the cat and this government has shown absolutely no sensitivity in deep-sixing these valuable organizations.

I say again the only reason the government is doing it, the real reason for killing these national organizations has nothing to do with saving the money. It has everything to do with silencing the government's critics.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-63 is another example of this Conservative government's drive to stifle free expression and thought, including independent research and policy development.

Here we have a bill which abolishes the major independent—and I emphasize the word independent—research councils in Canada, ones that have existed for a number of years including: the Economic Council of Canada, the Law Reform Commission, the Science Council of Canada, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council. Today I want in particular to speak about the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council because that is the one I have been very close to over a number of years.

For the past year I have been the opposition critic for immigration and for the previous seven years I was the opposition critic for employment. I must say that the reports of the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council were extremely helpful and useful to me in that opposition role. They were very helpful as well to non-governmental organizations and other outside groups. In addition, prior to the change of government in 1984 I was the chairman of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration and, once again, had close contact with the work of this advisory council.

The mandate of the Employment and Immigration Advisory Council is to provide the Minister of Employment and Immigration with independent—and I stress that word again—private sector advice on policy issues pertaining to immigration, labour market issues, and unemployment insurance.

The council was structured in such a way that it had 21 members drawn from business, labour and other non-aligned groups. It was the only independent body directly reporting or advising the minister that was not part of his public service, part of his department.

This advisory council put out some extremely important reports over the last number of years. For example, in April 1990 it put out a report on full employment entitled "Full Employment is an Achievable Goal". The year before they put out a report on structural unemployment entitled "Regional Unemployment in Canada: A Nation out of Balance". It was published in November 1989. Prior to that, in 1985 it published a report entitled "Older Workers: An Imminent Crisis in the Labour Market". It also had reports on the Atlantic fishery and on single industry communities.

Previous speakers in this debate have been absolutely correct. The real reason the government is abolishing these six independent advisory councils is that it does not like criticism. I can recall very well, with the Canadian Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, when the government was putting through its bill, its major reform on unemployment insurance in the last Parliament, the advisory council which for the most part had been appointed by the minister, the men and women on the council had been designated and appointed by the minister of the time, took a position against many sections of that bill. It criticized those sections. It did it in a very scientific and diplomatic way, but in fact it stated positions of major disagreement with the minister. Its information and its statistics were very legitimate but the minister did not like it.

I can recall standing in this House and raising the issues put forward by the advisory council in opposition to sections in those unemployment insurance cuts which were very controversial at the time, and the minister tried to slough them off and put them aside.

It is like previous interveners in this debate have said. It was a question of when you do not like the news you kill the messenger. The messengers in this case were from business, labour and the university sectors. They gave their best advice on many of these issues. When the minister did not like them, she put a black mark against them.

I am thinking of the minister of the time, the hon. member from Kingston who I think was defeated in her constituency in Kingston for the terrible, insensitive reforms that were made to unemployment insurance which cut people off the unemployment insurance rolls and made unemployment insurance more difficult to obtain.

By that reform—and that was stated by the advisory council—by the federal government cutting back on unemployment insurance, all they were going to do was shift this entire group of people to the provincial welfare rolls. That is what has happened.

I can recall very well stating that at the time, citing the different paragraphs in the advisory council report. We said: "If you go through with the cuts, sure, it might look good for you at the federal level; but as far as the Canadian taxpayer is concerned you are simply going to shift the burden to the provincial and municipal welfare rolls". That happened.

The municipal and provincial welfare rolls increased considerably. That advice was given. The minister and the government were pre-warned, but they did not like the advice. They had their own agenda and they pursued their own agenda slavishly, and we have seen what happened. The country is in a terrible mess today where there is massive unemployment, where there are not sufficient resources to take care and retrain the unemployed, and so on.

I was just listening to the hon. member on the government side who was trying to argue that the real reason for these cuts was to help with the deficit and to reduce expenditures in order to reduce the deficit. You never reduce your deficit with respect to programs that could help you increase your productivity as a nation.

They say that today, in the 1990s and as we move into the next century, the greatest assets a nation can have are know-how, ideas, technology, scientific research. These are the things that will make nations great, which will make nations stand among the leaders in the world.

In times of difficulty you do not cut back on your educational systems as this government has done. You do not cut back on your training programs as this government has done. You do not cut back on your major institutions, major agencies that do research and development and provide independent, alternate advice on economic matters such as the Economic Council of Canada did; legal and social matters such as the Law Reform Commission did; the Science Council of Canada; on questions of peace and security such as CIIPS did; or the Advisory Council on Employment and Immigration.

In this modern age, just having resources in the ground and having a large nation with a lot of people do not mean we are a powerful, number one nation. Once again, when we look at a country like Japan, it has built its greatness as an economic power on its ability to develop, research, science, knowledge, know-how, new products, and so on. When the government says it wants to reduce its deficit by cutting back on these institutions that develop new ideas and develop alternative ways of doing things which give us the basis for know-how, it sounds rather shallow and without support.

The hon. member from the government said as well: "We were able to cut these institutions back because the work they were doing was being duplicated in other areas". He mentioned as an example the Fraser Institute and the C. D. Howe Institute. I will deal with that.

Some members have cited, for example, that the functions of the Canadian Employment and Immigration Advisory Council have been absorbed into the ministry. Let me deal with that first. In the ministry the research and development that are done are subject to the political agenda of the government of the day, of the minister of the day. I know because I was a minister for seven years and I had to deal with the research and development wings of my department.

You are not getting what I would call independent, critical research. You are getting good research on some matters. There is no doubt about it. You are getting excellent research, but it follows in support of or pursues the government's political agenda. That has to be done and I respect that, but it is not covering the entire field.

With respect to private sector research, many of these private sector research bodies are dependent on their financial resources from large business, the corporate sector, the multinational business sector, and many of them serve their agendas. Once again one wonders whether we are getting the full range of independent research and development we need. I think not. Whether it is the C. D. Howe Institute that has published some good reports or the Fraser Institute for which I have less esteem but has published some good reports, they still do not provide the independent, critical research we had in this country when we had the Economic Council, the Science Council of Canada and the Advisory Council on Employment and Immigration.

It is a sad day when a country such as this, on the pretext of saving money, cuts back those institutions that provide us with independent thinking, ideas and know-how. It is a very sad day. We in this party are objecting to these cuts. We think it is the wrong way to go.

There are many areas the government could cut in order to reduce the budget. I raise again the Auditor General's report which states where there has been a lot of waste, a lot of money siphoned out of the country. Those are areas where money could have been saved. We do not save money by cutting back on the institutions that give us high powered knowledge and information.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member when he talked about us silencing our critics.

I would like to remind him, for example, that the Economic Council of Canada predicted that the free trade agreement would bring, if I remember the figure correctly, either 200,000 or 300,000 jobs over the course of many years. That figure was used by the government, by business and so on, in support of arguments for the free trade agreement.

The Economic Council of Canada—and certainly it may have criticized the government in some areas—was supportive of the government in many other areas. This is not an issue of silencing critics. This is more an issue of Canada being a mature nation with mature universities today, many of which are over 100 years old. The university from which I graduated, the University of Alberta, celebrated its 75th anniversary a few years ago. It is probably celebrating its 80th anniversary now. There is a source of research for us and we have other institutions.

My question for the hon. member has to do with the role of Parliament. For years and years Parliament and the governments of the day have created these external agencies asking them for advice, but it seems to me that Parliament itself should be a policy-making body or policy should emanate from Parliament. We do not have enough committees studying the role or producing policy recommendations.

We have reformed Parliament. The McGrath commission in 1986 reformed Parliament. It would seem to me appropriate that maybe we should now consider beefing up the research bureaus of our committees, unleashing the potential of members of Parliament and restoring some of the esteem the public should have in Parliament, rather than always devaluing Parliament by spinning off policy-making agencies and think-tanks and people looking to those groups as agents for social change and other things rather than to Parliament. I think Parliament should regain its role as a policy recommending body and committees should try to increase their stature in that manner, and many have done that.

Does the hon. member think that Parliament's role has been devalued by having this plethora of different agencies? Might we now re-assert ourselves as parliamentarians, give our committees extra power and produce policy recommendations in that way?

My next question concerns the economic argument here. These agencies cost a lot of money; $5 million is a lot of people paying taxes. We have to borrow that money. Then each year we have to pay interest on that borrowed money and we have to borrow money for interest. There is a never-ending, vicious cycle of compound interest, debt and so on. Certainly we could pay heed to some of the recommendations of the Auditor General, but that would not solve the problem of our massive debt and continuing deficit.

The Liberal Party and the NDP have called for increased spending every day. I sit in the House of Commons and every day I hear calls for massive programs, economic stimulus and so on. All that does is create inflation in the long run and devalue our currency and productivity.

We have to think seriously about the economic course of the nation, about the public purse and about keeping things on an even keel so that people have productive jobs.

We certainly have eliminated these agencies, but how do we get the deficit in check? What suggestions does he have on the big ticket items? His party seems to be saying: "Spend more, spend more, spend more". I will leave it at that and ask him to respond.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to respond. There are really three questions here.

First, with respect to whether the creation of these independent research agencies demean or take something away from Parliament's ability to do research, not at all. It is not a question of one or another. I fully agree with the hon. member that we should beef up and improve our parliamentary research capacity.

In the years I have been in Parliament, it has improved considerably. We now have in every committee one or two researchers who help us with our work. It is still not enough. There is a very excellent research branch with the parliamentary library which helps committees as well but let us be frank, when the committees do serious studies, they get their information not just from the research branch of the Library of Parliament, but by calling as witnesses the major industrial, labour, university, think-tank bodies in this country and we ask for their views. They do the research and then they input that research into our parliamentary committees. The good parliamentary committee is one which listens to many points of view.

I have just finished doing the work on the legislative committee for Bill C-86, the immigration bill. We heard from the section of the Canadian Bar Association that deals with immigration. We heard from the social agencies that dealt with immigration. We met with the various ethnocultural groups which did work on immigration. We got our information from many sources and from sources that did considerable research.

I might say that when I was with the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration, we used to have very often before us the Economic Council to give us its advice on some of these major issues that were before Parliament and on which members of Parliament had to take a position.

I believe you can do both. You can have independent economic research agencies such as the Economic Council and the Science Council of Canada and improve your research capability within Parliament as well. I do not think it is duplication.

The member referred to the fact that the Economic Council supported free trade. Yes, it did support the concept of free trade. I was very much involved in that debate. I was on the committee prior to the election in 1988 that dealt with the free trade issue. The Economic Council also issued two reports which said there would be losses of jobs in several industrial sectors and something should be done about it, and that advice was not followed.

It also made major recommendations for retraining, upgrading and restructuring in areas that would be hit hard by the free trade agreement and that advice was not followed as well. While the Economic Council supported free trade in general, it had something to say about the details of the free trade agreement and what had to be done to properly implement it, which was not followed.

The last question the hon. member asked was about these institutions costing a considerable amount of money. They cost money. The saving here is supposed to be $22 million. It is a sizeable sum of money but I look on money spent on developing ideas, developing scientific know-how as an investment in the country and in productivity and not as money being simply thrown out the window on consumption.

If we carry the argument of the government to the logical extreme and if we want to really save money, we could cut back all our funding for universities, we could cut back our public education system. We would save a lot of money, but we would end up a pretty ignorant country. I put these agencies in that area.

These national councils contribute to our national ability to produce at a high technological level, which is essential at this age in the 1990s and into the 21st century. This is not the kind of thing we cut. There are many areas where we can cut but we do not cut our ability to produce ideas, know-how and scientific first class information.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, as has happened all too often in this Parliament of Canada, I am standing again this evening to express my sincere dismay at yet another foolish piece of government legislation. Today the disheartening legislation in question is Bill C-63, an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies.

I had the opportunity to speak on this bill at second reading last May. At that time I outlined that the government had announced in its budget of February 1992 its intention to eliminate, consolidate, defer or privatize 46 Crown agencies, corporations and commissions, all for a projected savings of $22 million.

This bill here this evening deals with only six of those 46 agencies. Those six agencies are the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security—better known as CIIPS—the Economic Council of Canada, the International Centre for Ocean Development, the Law Reform Commission and the Science Council of Canada.

We on this side of the House agree that some of the 46 agencies are extravagant and need to go. Many of these were established by this same government. Furthermore, while I am not opposed to privatization, I am opposed to limitations being placed on organizations which continue to usefully serve the public policy process. There are several among the 46 which continue to provide such a service. In particular, the six agencies due to be axed by the government in this bill provided an invaluable service to Canadians.

All the government is accomplishing with this bill is more closely aligning itself with the far right Reform Party. I am embarrassed for this government. Will it stoop to any level to cater to a regional party which is equal only to the Bloc Quebecois? Before taking a closer look at a couple of the six agencies about to be given the heave-ho by the government, I want to first draw the House's attention to the blatant disregard this government has for Parliament.

Yesterday an effort was made to contact each of the six agencies mentioned in this bill. It was quickly discovered that the government had already closed five of the six agencies. I repeat, five of the six agencies have already been closed by this government. This is well before Parliament has even voted on the legislation to do so. Such a total lack of respect for the Canadian parliamentary system is an absolute disgrace. Furthermore, closing the organizations before the bill is passed could be against the law.

An official at the Canadian Institute of International Peace and Security, which is the only agency of the six still open, said that it is only open because it received a legal opinion which indicated that the operation must continue until the legislation is passed. If this is the case for CIIPS, why is it not the case for the others?

It is also important to note the callousness with which this government informed the employees of the various agencies about their closure. Judith Maxwell of the Economic Council indicated to the legislative committee on Bill C-63 that she was advised at 12 p.m. on budget day that the council would be dissolved. At least three of the four were treated in the same way.

Has this government no shame? At least Conservative government members will have 60 days from the time an election is finally called to begin packing up their boxes before the Canadian people fire them. I do not know why you could not have given the agencies the same kind of treatment that you yourselves will be treated to by the Canadian public when you lose your seats in the next election. You have 60 days to pack your bags.

In my previous address in this House on this bill, I outlined the importance of each of those six agencies. Now I would like to take a closer look at two of them which will certainly have a significant impact on human rights, the area for which I am the critic for this party. The first agency is the Law Reform Commission.

Established in 1971, one of the commission's mandates was to maintain an ongoing review of the Statutes of Canada, to make recommendations for improvement, modernization and reform legislation. In its almost 22 year existence, the commission issued 32 reports, 61 working papers and 76 studies containing recommendations covering Criminal Code reform; hate propaganda, plea bargaining, safeguarding of genetic heritage, pornography, euthanasia, sexual assault, arson, mental disorder and on and on. As of 1990, the commission's studies have been cited in 211 reported Canadian court decisions, 39 of which were Supreme Court of Canada decisions. Yet, this government thinks this commission is so unimportant that it is getting rid of it.

This commission has played a vital role in the advancement of human rights in Canada. All of the issues I have just mentioned are matters of considerable importance today and most will, without a doubt, be debated in greater detail in the coming years.

The commission is an important element of the public policy process on which our laws are based. Indeed, a claim to a human right is very often advanced as a justification for public policy.

Often, as we can see by the aforementioned matters the commission has addressed, certain issues are controversial and the government must seek the advice and counsel of non-partisan bodies which can evaluate the given matter without political interference. By abolishing the non-partisan commission, the Conservative government and, in particular, the current Minister of Justice are trying to silence their biggest critic. The minister has been endeavouring to do so since 1990. At that time she left the commission without a quorum. This made it impossible for the commission to approve any reports which would have included suggested changes to federal legislation.

The second organization being closed by the legislation that I want to talk about today in the context of its effect on human rights is the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security. Established in 1984, CIIPS mandate is to increase knowledge and understanding of the issues relating to international peace and security from a Canadian perspective with particular emphasis on arms control, disarmament, defence and conflict resolution. In today's ever-changing global environment, what could be more important than these issues?

I have sat in this House on several occasions and listened to the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the Conservative Party talk at great length about the need to make every effort to bring about a more peaceful world for our children and our children's children. Wonderful words. Unfortunately this government is high on words but low on action.

We are standing here today to debate an issue which should not even be on the agenda for debate. We have an Institute for International Peace and Security and this government is saying: "No, we do not need that". By voting to abolish CIIPS, this government is saying that we do not need an institute which will increase knowledge and promote understanding of issues relating to international peace and security.

By voting to axe CIIPS, this government is sending a clear message to Canadians that it is not committed to limiting the out of control arms trade. This morning's Ottawa Citizen outlined just how out of control the arms trade has become, detailing the role that Canada played in the arming of Iraq in the years prior to the gulf war. In fact, this government allowed a company supplying munitions to Iraq to test artillery and special shells at Canadian military bases just months before Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait.

By voting to abolish CIIPS, this government is saying that we do not need an institute dedicated to discussing issues which could ameliorate the deplorable crisis we are witnessing in Yugoslavia. East Timor, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Mozambique, Liberia, Cambodia, China, Burma, Iraq, Iran and the list goes on and on. By voting to do away with CIIPS this government is acknowledging that it lacks a real commitment to doing its part for a more peaceful world.

In conclusion, this bill is not about saving the government some money. If it really wanted to do this, it could take steps to implement some of the recommendations of the Auditor General. We all know that there are more than a few. Bill C-63 is not about fiscal restraint, it is about abolishing agencies which have always acted in the interest of Canadians. This government is embarrassed by these agencies because it does not always do the same. Rather than debating the issues this government has chosen to kill the messenger. It may be easier but in the end we all suffer because of the loss.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, we are debating Bill C-63 but, as my colleague mentioned a little earlier, all of the agencies have been closed since June 1992. One would ask, what is the point of a member of Parliament standing up in the House to defend an agency that is no longer in existence. The doors have been closed. In some cases the telephones do not even exist. They have been disconnected.

I was wondering what the fairness is when we have a situation like that. Legislation is introduced and even before the legislation is passed action has already been taken. It is quite intriguing. Our role as members of Parliament has been minimized if not ignored in this case.

The organizations that the government in its wisdom decided to close down are the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, the Economic Council of Canada, the International Centre for Ocean Development, the Law Reform Commission, and the Science Council of Canada. All six agencies have in the past provided government, as well as interested groups, with great third party opinion that was not influenced by government or special interest groups. Most of those opinions come from experts, from people who know and who are willing to listen to both sides before they make their recommendations.

To shut down these organizations for the mere sake of saving $22 million when we are losing this excellent advice and are laying off in excess of 300 employees is a shame.

Just recently the NDP government in Ontario dedicated close to $1 billion in the hope of creating up to 100,000 jobs. I was informed about a week ago that after it spent in excess of about $20 million it was able to create only 200 jobs.

An hon. member: They need advice, don't they.

Mr. Harb: The NDP does not listen. That is its problem.

There are people who are trying to create jobs but they do not know how to do it because of lack of experience and lack of talent. However, there are already agencies in place that have been doing a great job in providing a tremendous amount of service and support to the government and to people at large, yet we are closing them down.

What has intrigued me the most is the closure of the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security. This institute was established in 1984 with one thing in mind, to provide that third perspective or advice.

To close it down in the time we are in is really shameful. It is inappropriate and it is very ill-timed. All we have to do is look at countries around the world, look at the former Soviet Union, look at the disintegration of Yugoslavia, look at what is happening in Somalia, look at what is happening in certain parts of the Middle East, look at what is happening pretty well in every part of the world.

If anything, what we should have done is enhance the role of this institute, and encourage it to go even further and try to deal with world disputes and find resolutions to those issues and those disputes.

We have seen a tremendous amount of pressure coming toward Canada on the international scene and international community. There is more and more demand for our peacekeeping forces. There is more pressure on external affairs. There is more pressure on the minister herself.

The world views us as being in the best position to provide neutral advice, advice that is well balanced and moderate. As Canadians, this is something that we should be very proud of. Canadians should be proud of the fact that the whole world is listening to us as a middle of the road power. Canada is not a big power and not a small power but a mid-sized power. We are in the best position to provide leadership, ideas and suggestions to countries where there are problems and disputes.

I thought this particular agency would have been one of the tools that the government could have used and could have promoted world-wide to help solve some of these problems. I say this because when people look at Canada from the outside they see a Canada that is compassionate, caring and willing to help. I do not think we should take that for granted, nor should we ignore the fact that it is one of the best assets we have.

Our image is one of our best assets, not only to the outside world but to the inside world. The outside world looks at Canada with an admiring eye and the inside world, from time to time, wonders about the wisdom of our government when it comes to institutions such as this one. We wonder why the government is closing it.

It is my hope that the government will see the wisdom and reinstate some of these agencies. If it were up to me I would reinstate all of them. However, it looks like the rest of the agencies, with the exception of the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, have given in. They have decided that it is time to close down.

I want to commend those people who are answering the telephone at CIIPS. Obviously they have decided to stay there until the bill goes through the House of Commons and the Senate.

It is my hope that we will have an election before the Senate approves those bills. It is my hope that my party, in which I am confident, will have a second look at those agencies and try to inject life into some of them to ensure that Canadians who have been accustomed to the quality services of those agencies will continue to receive them.

What has also particularly intrigued me is the situation of the Science Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada. What a couple of organizations. We can see the correlation between the two: science and the economy. We cannot just divide the two because when we think about it if there is any one single tool that is necessary to succeed it is the educational tool. Unfortunately we do not have it right now. Our work force is not fully equipped to produce the kind of wealth that we are interested in.

First, on the international scene we are not scoring as high as we should in terms of productivity. Second, the production of our universities, schools and so on compared to the production of other schools and universities around the world is not as good as it should be. We do not seem to be scoring high in terms of the quality of education our graduates are receiving.

The same is true when it comes to applying those degrees in the work force. We do not see the output that we should be seeing, and that is not the fault of the student. The student will learn what is taught in the curriculum. That is a fault of the system. We must have a system that encourages, creates and graduates the kind of students who are willing and capable of being fully productive in society.

Not only that, we must give them the tools to do so. That is why I would have hoped that rather than closing them down the government would put more emphasis on agencies such as the Science Council and the Economic Council.

I do not think members will disagree that unless something is done with our educational system over the next few months we are going to see ourselves lagging behind the rest of the world.

I am amazed, and it does not matter which chart I look at, that when we compare ourselves to the big G-7 countries we seem to always be hitting the bottom, whether we look at productivity, investment in research and development, our level of output in terms of students who go into high school, or the level of literacy. No matter how you slice it or look at it we seem to have a problem.

The solution is extremely simple. We should, and we must, have a national standard for education all across the board. We should and we must work with the industries a little more closely than we have been doing in the past. More important, we must listen to advice, which is what the Science Council and the Economic Council were doing in the past. They were trying to provide that third party advice to the government, which the government did not seem to be listening to.

We have to go to industry and listen to it to see what it wants us to do with the government rather than trying to complicate the tax system, increase the red tape, and trying to drive industry away from provinces such as Ontario. When it comes to attracting industry from the outside we seem to be scaring it off so it is not coming in.

The savings that the government is getting in the short-run are going to cost us in the long-run.

That is why I would like to join with my colleagues in calling on the government to have a second look at these agencies, in particular agencies that have provided quality service in the past. I do not see why the Law Reform Commission has to be shut down. I do not see why the government has to close down the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council when we are accepting, on an annual basis, in excess of 250,000 immigrants to this country and when there is a shortage of public servants.

Today I was at a rally of public servants from Employment and Immigration. I heard, over and over again, that they need more staff. They need more resources if they are to deal with and support the level of immigration that we have.

The International Centre for Ocean Development, the Law Reform Commission, the Science Council of Canada, the Economic Council of Canada, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, all these agencies are fine, fine agencies. I wish and hope that the government will listen to the opposition and reconsider its position.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to rise in the House to discuss this particular bill.

I want to be as objective as I can. I want to address the issues honestly and directly. This is a bill about dismantling many research facilities that are available to government today. They are research and development facilities and ones that give expert advice on a host of issues.

The government ought to realize that there is some contradiction here. First, the government talks about competitiveness, it talks about increasing productivity. It has the tools at its disposal to help it do that. I shall try to prove that case. What does the government do? It decides to dismantle these essential organizations.

Why would the government attempt to do this when this is the situation that we in Canada face today. I said earlier in the House that some of our greatest challenges were the social problems facing us. Yes, there are political problems and economic problems, but the social problems are Canada's greatest challenges.

There are over 1.6 million unemployed Canadians as we speak. There are in this country more than 2.2 million Canadians who will be receiving social assistance this year. There are over 2 million Canadians, 40 per cent of whom are young people or children, who are going to be nourished at food banks this year. There are close to 5 million Canadians who are at the level of poverty or living in poverty. There is abuse in our country that needs to be investigated so that we can come up with policies that will reduce this kind of situation, which is completely unacceptable to countries such as Canada.

We have problems of aging and I do not say that in the pejorative sense. We have a population that is growing older which will necessitate different solutions in the future. We have environmental challenges—and we could be a leader if we chose to be—that are virtually insurmountable if we do not have these tools working for us.

My colleagues have mentioned the role we have in peacemaking. We have been, perhaps continue to be, but certainly should aspire to be, first in the world to be involved in peacemaking around the planet.

Just in case people are not completely aware of some of these organizations and what they do, I want to quote from some government papers. The Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council is an advisory board to the employment and immigration minister. It provides the minister with advice from those affected by the department's policies and activities. Surely that is important. It acts as an independent institution. Surely this is extremely important.

Let me share with you some of the things that the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security is intended to do, that it will no longer be able to do. Here is part of its mandate: To increase knowledge and understanding of the issues relating to international peace and security from a Canadian perspective. It undertakes research in order to assist in peacemaking.

Let us look at the International Centre for Ocean Development. This organization's prime objective was to improve the management and utilization of ocean resources as a source of food for those nations that do not have enough food to nourish their people.

Another organization, the Law Reform Commission, has a bit of a stuffy title but it did have an important mandate. It was going to make recommendations for improvement, modernization and reform of legislation. It undertook research in order to assist.

Let us look at the mandate of the Science Council of Canada. It was to assess scientific and technological resources, requirements and potentialities of Canada and increase public awareness of scientific and technological problems and opportunities. It undertook research, published studies, reports and provided advice to the minister.

Let me deal with the final one, the Economic Council of Canada. What was its mandate? It was to achieve the highest possible levels of employment and efficient production in order that the country may enjoy a high and consistent rate of economic growth, that all Canadians may share and have rising living standards. It undertook research. It was a departmental corporation operating at arm's length from ministers to provide independent advice to the minister.

Every single one of those organizations I have mentioned provided expert advice and research so the government could do a better job.

When I look at what the Economic Council of Canada produced in this booklet which is called: A New Face of Poverty I can understand why a government might be loathe to continue to support it because it gets to the root of a problem when it examines the face of poverty in Canada.

I mentioned just a few moments ago that we have close to five million people living at or below the poverty level, over one million of those are children, the vast majority of whom are women. Let us look at this booklet and give a couple of examples of some of the things they say that might in fact make governments shudder a little bit: "Unemployment insurance does not serve the needs of some of the unemployed. Good jobs have become difficult to find, creating economic difficulties", and it goes on to talk about economic stress and what have you.

I can understand why governments would be nervous about that kind of advice. On the other hand, if we are committed to try to improve the human condition, if we want to wrestle our problems to the ground, to make Canada a better country, surely we should not shy away from hearing the truth from experts who have worked long and hard in trying to determine what it is that needs to be done.

What are the reasons for dismantling these organizations? We have heard about the economic reasons. We know they are not true. Of course there will be some savings in a way, but if we look at the losses as a result of the dismantling, what are the real savings? No one has come up with that figure. Savings are not the real reason. That is a smoke screen. That is to camouflage the dismantling. That is simply to try to find an excuse to explain it in away to Canadians.

We know that some $20 million is a lot of money. I do not want to minimize that. But I suspect that $20 million could be saved by reducing the size of cabinet. Let us start with cabinet and some of the perks that its members get.

An hon. member: Get rid of those Tories.

Mr. Duhamel: We could reduce the size of the ministerial staff and save much more than $20 million. We could cut down on the polling and government advertising and already we have saved several millions more. If the intent was to save $20 million, there were some targets which were much more appropriate that would have been much more acceptable to Canadians and would have been much more honest.

Saving money, no, but government is attempting to get closer to this reform agenda. Why? Because it has noticed that the reformers are in fact crowding into its boat. What do you do? You adopt some of their stances, some of their policies or you get as close to them as possible without getting burned.

There is a lesson to be learned here by government members and by the people of Canada. This kind of cutting, this kind of slashing without regard for the human condition, for the workers who were there, without looking at the real cost that is going to be incurred because of the lost research and the lost expert advice, just looking at the superficial $20 million is what the Reform Party would do. That is what it is all about. It is skimming the surface. It is taking complex problems and giving simple little solutions in 30 seconds or shorter clips. That is exactly what it is all about.

Let me tell you another reason why there is dismantling here. You will recall that the government cut down the civil service. When I ask how much money was spent on contracts because some of that work still had to be done, lo and behold, there were no records. I must confess, I find that surprising.

There is deep suspicion that there is even more money being spent today than before those civil service cuts took place. Where has the money gone? Where has your money, my money, my colleague's money and other Canadians' money gone? I suspect that it has gone to private firms and to private agencies.

What is going to happen over here? We know full well the governments, no matter their political stripe, will need to continue to have expert advice. We know full well that the money that was supposedly saved will be going to corporations, firms and friends of government. I am going to be watching closely and my friends will as well.

If that is what happens, then it is hypocrisy of the highest kind. I see a similarity between these reductions here and the reductions that took place in the civil service.

[Translation]

They cut organizations. It could be said of most of the people involved who know the problems and were trying to solve them that they did an excellent, thorough, enlightened job that helped us parliamentarians look as objectively as possible at our society's problems and come up with much more flexible, sensitive solutions.

• (1930)

Why did they do it? It was not to save money. It was mainly to make Canadians believe that they were reducing the size of government and trying to cut government spending. But, as I already said, that is not the case. They are just shifting some expense items around. I am willing to bet that this money will be spent somewhere else as they did with the Public Service. Admittedly some positions were abolished, but the work was contracted out. I would really like to have the answer to this question. I would bet a year's salary for a doughnut that the government spends more now than it would have spent if it had kept those positions.

It looks good to some people. Some people have accepted this government propaganda, and I find that unfortunate. As I said a little while ago, if the government really wanted to save, there are advertising budgets and all sorts of surveys ordered by the government that could have been cancelled and they would have saved much more.

[English]

I am willing to have my colleagues from the other side ask me all kinds of questions and challenge everything I have said. I encourage them to do so. What I would like to propose is that the government consider setting up a third party blue ribbon committee of outstanding men and women who will look at this government decision and who will determine whether or not these agencies were in fact providing useful services for what it was costing Canadians. Surely that should not be too difficult to do.

[Translation]

What I would like—and I will say it in both official languages to be sure that I am well understood—is for the government to promise to set up a very credible committee of men and women from all across Canada to review the government's decisions and tell the Canadian Parliament whether or not it was a good and wise decision.

[English]

Surely that is not too threatening.

In closing I would hope that my colleagues would be sufficiently shocked by what I have said, because they are all supporting this bill, that they would rise in their place and ask profound questions of me to see whether or not Canadians believe what I have said or what it is that they say, or what it is that they propose to do.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I too am surprised that the members opposite have not asked questions of my colleague, the hon. member for St. Boniface. That is incredible.

Mr. Keyes: They are speechless.

Mr. Milliken: As the hon. member for Hamilton West just said, they may have been left speechless.

[English]

I can understand why they do not want to debate this bill. They have remained silent all day. In fact, I think it is safe to say that they are hanging their heads in shame at the fact that the government is proceeding with this legislation and destroying a series of agencies that have been extremely helpful to Canadians and to our country.

I had occasion to speak on this bill before as recently as yesterday in the course of debate at the report stage, and I certainly had something to say at second reading on this bill. My opposition continues unabated. What has really been shocking is that in an effort to arrange for a suitable debate today, the government has chosen to remain virtually silent. I do not believe any government member has spoken on third reading, unless the minister spoke when he introduced the bill at that stage.

Mr. Duhamel: It is a shame.

Mr. Milliken: It is a shame, as the hon. member for St. Boniface says.

Mr. Duhamel: They are ashamed.

Mr. Milliken: They are ashamed and they should be ashamed because the bill is doing untold damage to the fabric of our country. One of the extraordinary things about the government—I know the hon. member for St. Boniface, who has a particular interest in this subject will know this—has been their alleged enthusiasm for research and development. Research and development has been carried on in virtually all of the agencies that are the subject of the debate today and the subject matter of this bill.

The Economic Council of Canada did a great deal of research and development. The Science Council of Canada helped foster research and development. The Law Reform Commission did all kinds of work to assist in legal research in Canada and help our country develop new laws. Indeed, the Law Reform Commission, as I indicated in my speech yesterday, was in fact very highly regarded by foreign law reform commissions that carried on similar work in their own countries.

We had an outstanding organization the government is now throwing out with the stroke of a pen with this bill. The shocking feature of the whole thing is it has done it without waiting for the bill to pass. In other words, we have become a rubber stamp for government action that followed on the budget. It is scrapping all these organizations and all but one of them does not even have a telephone line any more. The government has just decided to let them have it and has given them the old boot the chop. This is what it has done in a most undemocratic and irresponsible way.

It is fine to plead this is an attempt to save money. We all recognize Tory times are hard times and we have to save money. We do not have to go about giving these organizations the heave-ho without a very careful look at how much we are actually saving. What is the record? The government announced in the budget it was closing down 46 agencies and corporations at a saving of $10 million? As my hon. friend from Halifax West knows, it is peanuts for the number of agencies being closed down.

We should look at the total cost for the agencies. For example, the total projected savings for the Economic Council of Canada was something like $22 million a year. Half of it could be saved on the Economic Council alone. Add up the others. There is something wrong.

The government has moved a whole lot of the work these agencies were doing into other organizations. I do not know this for a fact, but I can only speculate they have moved them in so they can shift these responsibilities to government departments where they can be under the thumb of a minister. You know how they like to put the thumb to them and make sure their reports comply with the minister's wishes. Instead of independent and valid reports that reflect reality, the government wants something that backs up the minister's view of reality. That is what the government is after. I think that is what it is trying to do in this case. It is transferring the responsibility from an independent arm's length agency to a government department where it can put the screws to people if they do not come up with the report the government wants.

If a report is unsatisfactory in a government department, we know what happens. It gets buried. It never sees the light of day. The minister does not release it. An independent agency releases its reports and the public gets to read them and understand what is really going on. So it was with the Economic Council, the Law Reform Commission and the Science Council. All these bodies had the right to release their own reports.

Yesterday in the House one of the members of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Skeena, was making a speech and got a bit carried away. He referred to the cabinet in less than flattering terms. He spoke about their educational qualifications in a general way that was not polite or accurate. Understandably the government House leader, a Ph.D., the hon. member for Calgary South I think it is, came into the house and listed some of the outstanding qualifications of some of his cabinet colleagues. We were very pleased to see that. It was an enjoyable speech. It is unfortunate he is not here tonight to participate in the debate because he would enjoy it if he were. We would enjoy it.

As he knows, he was provoked into action last night. I see, Madam Speaker, you are threatening to wring my neck.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Yes, and I would hope the hon. member is not saying whether someone is in the House or not, which he knows is unacceptable in this place. I hope he would not provoke the minister into having to come down again tonight when everything is very quiet and everyone is having a very healthy debate. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, of course I would feel a lot better if a cabinet minister were here to hear this speech since this is a government bill. There is some responsibility under the traditions and practices of this House that a cabinet minister be here when a government bill is under debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member does not have to say which of the ministers he would wish to see in the House. The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Milliken: I would be happy to see any one, but of course if the government House leader were here in particular, I would be thrilled. He is an outstanding debater. He has a Ph.D. He is much better qualified than I am to speak on subjects like the Science Council of Canada. My degrees are not in sciences. They are in the humanities and social sciences perhaps, but not in the very distinguished and stratified atmosphere of a Ph. D. like the government House leader.

I see my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona is now getting a bit overwrought. I urge him to control himself. If he would like to make a speech or ask me a question at the conclusion of my address, I would be more than happy to hear from him.

What I wanted to say is we had the government House leader come last evening and tell us about how some of his cabinet colleagues were particularly well qualified to deal with these issues. The issue he did not address in his speech that sort of surprised me, was the fact all these people with Ph.Ds. and qualifications in science and engineering were abandoning the Science Council of Canada willy-nilly.

You would think if they had all this expertise in the cabinet and knew about these things they would say: "Well, we are grateful to have somebody like the Science Council of Canada give some independent advice on which way we should go".

But no. I guess they figured they had enough of them in the cabinet that they could make up their own minds. Yet all of these cabinet ministers have made speeches supporting R and D. I remember hearing the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology at a meeting of the Royal Society of Canada a couple of years ago at a conference. He made a speech saying how Canada was so short on research and development, how we had to get more government funding for research and development. Research and development was absolutely essential for the continued growth of Canada and our economic development.

Yet here we have the government giving the chop to organizations that fostered and sponsored research and development in Canada. There is no sense to its arguments. There is no sense to its rhetoric. There is no sense to its logic. It says one thing one day and does something else the next.

This government is frankly a disgrace. It has failed to address the issues that confront Canada. I would like to turn briefly to its economic record, which explains why we are going through these painful chops.

The government came into power in 1984. It is getting so long ago now it is hard to imagine. You would think it was yesterday from the way it complains. It's big theme was it was going to solve Canada's problems. It had all the answers. It was going to solve the deficit. It said the deficit was Canada's number one problem of 1984. It is still Canada's number one problem but not because it was in 1984. It is because the government has doubled the debt in the meantime and increased the payments so much. It has become a problem that is almost beyond solving thanks to the incompetent management we have witnessed from the government opposite for the last eight years.

Yet every time we ask a question in the House today in 1992, the same answer is given as was given in 1988 and the same one I know was given from my reading in 1984. That was, if we had not inherited this huge debt from the Liberals, we would not be in this pickle today. It is in the pickle today and it is not because of what happened eight or ten years ago. It is what happened over the last eight years. In every single one of them, the deficit has been enormous because of the government's mismanagement of the economic affairs of this country.

Now the government is getting rid of one of the principal organs of advice it had to give it advice, and that is the Economic Council of Canada.

The Science Council of Canada throughout its 15 year history did all kinds of things for this country. Let me read a brief list of its accomplishments. It recommended the creation of a Canadian space agency. It urged Canadians to recycle. It published reports on sustainable agriculture, water supply, biotechnology and technology for cold regions. These are just a few of the outstanding areas in which they moved to provide leadership for Canada.

The Economic Council of Canada is well known for its annual review, which focused on one of the problems confronting the economy.

A few years ago I recall the review—I have forgotten the title of it—that dealt with the problems of the deficit and national debt in Canada. Legacies, I believe was its name when I come to think of it. Perhaps Your Honour read it. It talked about the evils of the deficit and the debt, how large it was and how it was making it increasingly difficult for Canadian governments in future to provide for the necessary services and policy options that should be available to any government in this country. It spoke about the need for bringing the deficit under control. The study fitted in entirely with the government's avowed intention.

However, what it said was one thing and what it did was quite another. Deficit control has remained at the bottom of this government's list of priorities. It keeps announcing these little chops. I think it has announced that it will save $22 million a year on this deal, but where has it been spent? It has all been spent already. Every cut that was announced in the budget last February and all the savings that resulted from those cuts have been re-spent. It is all in the supplementary estimates that were tabled in the House of Commons this week.

You know that, Madam Speaker. I know that and the hon. members opposite who are left know that, even if they do not have a cabinet minister here to tell them about it. They know perfectly well that is what has happened. All the money has been spent recklessly because they have failed to manage the economic affairs of Canada properly.

I could go on at great length. I know I do not have the same time restrictions that I suffered from last night. I must say the first eight minutes of my speech went terribly quickly and I found that I was running out of time. However, tonight with the additional time of the 20-minute speech I have the option of speaking a little more slowly and enjoying the comments of my colleagues opposite a bit more.

The Science Council, the Law Reform Commission, the International Centre for Ocean Development, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, the Canadian Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, and the Economic Council of Canada all have contributed to this country over the years.

Mr. Harb: Tremendously.

Mr. Milliken: As my hon. friend from Ottawa Centre says: "Tremendously" and now we are to say good-bye to all these organizations.

We put before the House a series of amendments to this bill yesterday. There were 50 or 60 amendments. This morning the government and its backbenchers, all its supporters in this House, voted against everyone quite mindlessly. There was no explanation tendered as to why these amendments were unacceptable. Some of them were quite good, but they just sat there and voted them down one after another, obviously they were quite unthinking and very much uncaring.

Some of the amendments deleted the inappropriate sections of this bill and every single one was voted down. I regret that the government has shown a complete unwillingness to show any flexibility in this case. It has clearly shown a lack of compassion in dealing with the importance of these issues for Canadians.

There is one reason for introducing a bill of this Draconian nature, and that is because it has allowed the deficit to get out of control and it is trying to save it. For $22 million, the government is getting rid of organizations that are costing a good deal more.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, it is attempting to move the work those organizations are doing into government departments where it can control the work and control the result. It is regressive. It is unfair. The government should be ashamed of itself for proceeding in that way.

I would only hope, even at this late date, the members opposite who have the opportunity would cast their votes against this government or absent themselves from the vote on Monday night if they had any sense. I say to them: "If you cannot vote against the bill, go out of town and stay out of town, stay away from the vote and maybe we will be able to solve this problem by defeating this bill and putting it in the trash-can where it should be".

That is the position of our party. I am pleased we have been able to rise and participate all day in this debate. We have frankly carried the debate. We have had no assistance from the New Democratic Party either.

Mr. Harb: Why would they be here? They are busy cutting grants for students.

Mr. Milliken: Yes, they are probably off licking their wounds after their provincial colleagues have cut and slashed the grants for students. I do not know, but it is a shocking thing that they have abandoned this debate. The NDP has abandoned these organizations and have left it to the members of this party to try to carry this debate, to convince members opposite that what they are doing is wrong and that the government should recant, change its policy, and withdraw the bill.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I wish to give notice that I will raise a question of privilege or a point of order tomorrow concerning an oversight, and I am sure it was not more than that. I spoke last night and my speech was attributed to another member. Perhaps it was because I bored some of my listeners. As usual, I talked about Israel and Palestine, very briefly, but I have been thinking about this since this morning. I do not want to bore the people who listened to us last night, or the members who are still in the House, by repeating what I said yesterday.

I am sure thousands of Canadians, and especially young Canadians agree with me. I do not like cut and dried speeches that put the blame squarely on the other side's doorstep, but what I really do not like is this government's decision to dissolve the peace institute we created in 1984.

Perhaps I may recall—since last night it seems some people did not realize this—that the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau had launched a peace initiative in 1984. Subsequently a bill was tabled by the Hon. Allan MacEachen, minister of external affairs, to create an institute that, as you all know, examined these very important issues. The external affairs committee, which I had the honour to chair at the time was then called the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. The fact that both departments were handled by the same committee had always been a bone of contention. I say this as an additional bit of information for our listeners. In fact I received a lot of calls since last night about the short speech I made on this very important subject. We can talk about the economy, but if there is no peace, if the whole world is in a turmoil, the economy may be important but we still have to provide a solid foundation and that foundation consists of peace, international understanding, and so forth.

In 1984 it was agreed we could establish an institute. Unfortunately the Trudeau era, as they say, was drawing to a close and we were racing against the clock I am doing this from memory. I did not want to speak this evening but when I saw last night's mistake I decided to join in the debate again. In April 1984 there was second reading of the bill standing in the name of Mr. Allan MacEachen, whose is now a senator and was at one time leader in the Senate. After second reading, as we say here, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. Last night I paid tribute to Mr. Stan Darling, who had always been a pillar of this committee, often at odds with his party colleagues.

At this point, perhaps I may mention that it was important to have the committee covering both external affairs and national defence. However, the Conservatives who are now in the government, had always wanted to separate them. Perhaps I should explain why I was against separation. It is quite simple. I think it is very sad when we see members who specialize exclusively in peace issues and foreign affairs, while other members concentrate only on national defence, without any dialogue between the two.

Some members say: "Oh, it is like social affairs. We will appoint all the women MPs to social affairs. For issues like foreign aid, we will appoint the good souls in Parliament. For national defence we will appoint the tough guys".

Personally I always combined the so-called tough guys with people who had some sense of internationalism and the two groups had to listen to each other. People who believed only in defence, defence and attack, had to listen a bit to the concerns of Third World countries which were represented by another group of members.

The external affairs committee had to race against the clock, because several members did all they could to sabotage the Institute from that time; they said it was a gift the Liberals wanted to give when Mr. Trudeau left office. At that time he had already announced that he was going. I was the poor chairman, caught between my colleagues, national defence types and people whose main concern was external affairs and foreign aid. I had to make my way through that and I made everyone work day and night. That is how we got it. I reported to Parliament on June 27, 1984. Imagine, Parliament was dissolved. The Trudeau era ended on June 29, 1984 and I reported it to the House for approval on June 27, 1984. I explained it last night but I will repeat it. Some say that for the first time in Mr. Trudeau's life he said what he thought of me. He said that it was thanks to the committee chairman's patience that we had the peace institute. I was away from the House because I was busy on the telephone solving an immigration problem for someone who had been denied entry to Canada; there was a big international conference on the Middle East in Montreal.

To get to the heart of the matter and not take too much of the House's time before we vote, I must say now that it is regrettable. This institute had 40 employees and a budget of $5 million. The first director general, a great diplomat, was the son of former Prime Minister Pearson. It was all peace people who had an idea of international security. For $5 million, we got a tremendous reputation throughout the world.

[English]

I will repeat and repeat for the young people sitting in this House and those listening the word Canada is too important in the world. The world talks about us in terms that Canadians sometimes do not even use and I regret it. I regret it in both languages. We are more popular outside Canada. I do not understand why Canadians do not realize and do not take more pride in this great country. We are perceived in the world as a country where, at the end of the day, we always find a solution between French Canadians, of which I am one, and English Canadians, which some others are, between the first citizens of this land and between the new Canadians who are now helping to shape this country. The rest of the world looks at us and says: "If Canada can succeed with all the young people of various origins living harmoniously together, there must be something special in that country".

The peace and security institute was an element of that, studying what goes wrong in the world. Imagine. It brought together here in Ottawa, as I said last night, people with a devotion for the survival of the state of Israel with people who are Palestinian—what a dangerous word in North America, a word I am familiar with. That was the kind of role the peace institute played, to bring these people together in a forum, in a debate, in a weekend discussion so that we could find a solution in order to live on a more harmonious planet. That was part of the role of the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security.

On top of that, the board of directors had to be approved by various leaders and rightly so. It was not a packed political patronage or what have you. Names had to be submitted for acceptance to sit on the board and foreigners could sit on the board. It is quite exciting that foreigners could sit on the board. All that for $5 million.

Every modern country in the world has pride in that kind of an institute for many reasons. Canada had that institute. Knowing Mr. Trudeau, and let us say I have known him since I was 17 years old. I sat here with him for 20 years. I know he was so proud of that institute that brought together such a variety of people with various opinions.

As I said last night, and I repeat, it is regrettable. I do not want to attack because it solves nothing, but it is regrettable that we do not make the nuance between what is essential, what is the pride, what creates pride in young people to make them understand how complicated the planet is.

For those who believe that the world is all right now, think of the Soviet Union which I knew by heart. It has fallen. Now we have a new world order. Do not count on me to be applauding too much because I am afraid more of one dictatorship as benevolent and as friendly as the United States of America may be—and I am a friend of the United States and its citizens—but it is not healthy that there is only one dominant master in the world.

The peace and security institute was about to study all these matters. Those who are ready to go to sleep and to say that at long last we can sleep in peace because communism has fallen, as I said last night, I have news for them all.

This planet is more dangerous maybe than ever before because the death of communism has opened something unbelievable. It has opened all kinds of nationalism, confronting each other with hate and passion and producing what we see every night on television, the horror we see under the new world order. We have to study very carefully these new movements, these millions and millions of people who will not remain in their countries.

Canada may look like a do-gooder. We do not have major problems. We do not have many boundaries. We have two oceans. We have the north. We have the United States that can always be a buffer.

However think of Europe, think if you were a 19-year old Ukrainian or Polish person, or of any of the eastern countries, you would take your chances and go to Europe. The worst that could happen to you is that you would be shipped back. But that means the frontier. Now the problem of the frontier in Europe is very dangerous. Look at what is going on in the Balkans. That is exactly what the peace and security institute at times was studying.

Graciously organized parliamentary organizations came here. I will produce a report next week on parliamentary associations if the management and members' services committee does not produce it. The time has come to say what this is all about and the importance of parliamentary associations.

We worked closely with the peace institute. Members of Parliament of Canada are not provincial members. They have to have international preoccupation, but in order to have an international preoccupation. There must be a variety of informants or a variety of sources. Yes, you could count on the very devoted people at external affairs to inform you. But this kind of institute is also an extraordinarily good source of independent thinking. The sadness is that sometimes we say we will deregulate, that we will privatize everything because it looks good. It looks politically rentable. I do not know how you translate rentable. Can anyone here say that quickly for me?

It pays politically.

[English]

It pays to look like you are for privatization but to talk about transportation, you are for privatization, of course. For those whose philosophy is anchored in one word, it looks good to have abolished all these institutes and everything else that my colleague spoke of tonight, and very more ably than I. I see them all here. They all spoke about that. Other members of other parties spoke about the dismantling of all these institutes.

Personally I want to be on record to say as strongly as possible, without the slightest partisanship attached to my comments, that we will live to regret the dismantling of the Institute for International Peace and Security. My colleagues across the aisle understand that it takes years to build something and before its reputation spreads around the world. Scholars of the world were talking about this peace institute of Canada, as were military minded people and the experts in defence, experts in security and experts in internationalization of conflict. We are talking about the peace institute.

Madam Speaker, you have great experience in these matters. I must say that you are a great credit to Canada. You represent our country, some macho would say with charm, but I would say not only with elegance but with knowledge. You do honour to Canada when you go abroad. We do not have to be scared by the press or other people who think that when members travel, it is a travelling agency. It is important because we are inter-related in this world, on this planet. We must know what is going on around the world before we vote for fisheries and wheat. We are inter-related not only in this country but in the world.

The Institute for International Peace and Security was about to become a jewel in something Canada has always done well in. Many other countries were glad and even envious to see that a country could take such initiatives. How could you expect an old parliamentarian like me not to say openly how sorry he is.

Come next election I assure you, as I said last night, if thanks to God—and God may be a woman—I am re-elected I will try to convince the new government of the day that it may have been a fatal mistake and we should reinstitute the institute. I see a lot of good in this institute on a troubled planet.

[Translation]

Young people must understand that Canada is for me perhaps one of the last beacons of hope for humanity in difficulty, where we can find solutions together while respecting our differences.

[English]

The peace institute was always studying and teaching all of those who came to study at the institute that you cannot have peace, you cannot have a harmonious world if you do not accept and respect the differences that exist in each one's country.

Canada has shown the way, and suddenly, sadly, for all kinds of reasons, we have disbanded the institute. I want to be on record as saying that I profoundly regret it.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I want to apologize to one of the hon. members on the other side for an apparent error I made in my speech that he has drawn to my attention. The hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte apparently did make a speech today on this bill. I am delighted to hear that he did and I am very sorry that I missed it. I was in a committee this afternoon and I dare say it happened then. I am sure it was a wonderful speech and I am pleased that he got up and spoke on his side because there were only apparently two that did. I inadvertently misled the House by suggesting that there had not been any speakers from the other side. I understand there were two. I am only sorry there are no ministers here to vote for the bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will make sure that he reads Hansard tomorrow to know what the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte said.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

PRIVILEGE

BILL C-91

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, last night my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, gave notice of a question of privilege based on misinformation given to the House in connection with Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act.

My colleague and I were prepared to argue this question of privilege today, which by the way is based on nine affidavits that have been made available to the Table and to the ministers concerned.

I understand that one of those ministers is unavailable today. Because of the serious nature of this question of privilege, my colleague and I are certainly prepared to postpone the presentation of the matter until a convenient time can be offered by Your Honour next week.

Mr. Speaker: I have received notice of the question of privilege to which the hon. member refers. The best thing to do would be for the Chair to make some inquiries and then in consultation with all concerned, select a time in the early part of the coming week, Monday or Tuesday, when it is convenient for all parties to be present. I will proceed with it at that time.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, on a point of order, since the government is unable to proceed and since this bill is under time allocation, I would suggest that we abandon the day to Bill C-26, suspend the sitting of the House until eleven o'clock and we will have to count this as the first day of the debate on Bill C-26 at third reading, if the government is able to find a minister after Question Period to move the third reading of the bill.

As was demonstrated the other day, our ministers are fleet of foot. I can assure you, Madam Speaker, and the entire House that we will be properly constituted in very short order and will be able to proceed.

The legislation before us needs to be addressed with all seriousness and it will be. The very notion of delaying the business of the House because of what my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands is advocating is mischievous and somewhat impertinent in my view.

What needs to be done is not to dispense, but as the people of Canada would expect us to do, we should proceed with all dispatch so that we are able to deal with the bill before us, Bill C-26, the Public Service reform act, in the appropriate way.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE REFORM ACT

Hon. Harvie Andre (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, before my colleague begins his remarks, I have two points to raise.

First, my colleague from Kingston and the Islands when he rose in his seat earlier was not being mischievous as implied by the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader.

Second, out of general courtesy, I would hope that the time which has been lost because ministers could not be here would be added to the time under which we are operating today.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure that Bill C-26 will be given third and final reading today. It has been almost three years since the Prime Minister announced PS 2000, an initiative to renew the Public Service of Canada from which this legislation has flowed.

Canadians expect and are entitled to a professional and highly qualified Public Service, one which is committed to serving Canadians and recognizing the excellent work of Public Service employees. Nearly every provision in Bill C-26 relates to meeting these goals either directly or indirectly.

These include initiatives to improve the speed with which jobs can be filled and cut the red tape in order to assign more resources toward the primary goal of the federal Public Service serving the Canadian public. This goal, I emphasize, will be reached with no reduction in the level of fairness and transparency in the staffing process.

This bill is the first major piece of Public Service legislation in 25 years. Once passed it will significantly affect the lives of 218,000 employees. Needless to say, it is not a bill that was drafted overnight.

Shortly after the Prime Minister announced Public Service 2000 and before one clause of Bill C-26 was drafted, ten task forces took eight months to closely examine almost every aspect of Public Service management.

Task force members drawn from senior ranks of government consulted extensively with all levels of employees, with unions, with other governments and with interested groups outside the Public Service including the Public Policy Forum and the Conference Board of Canada. They communicated with thousands of employees through workshops, group surveys and discussions.

Many suggestions for improvement came from the employees themselves. Some Public Service unions did not feel a part of the process and they complained, perhaps with some justification, that they had not been adequately consulted. That is why in the fall of 1990 it was decided to delay the introduction of legislation for some months to allow for more consultations. I am pleased to say that those additional consultations did not slow the process of reform.

Major initiatives to streamline systems and improve service are now underway in every government department and agency. More decisions are being made at local levels and employees are playing a greater role in determining how best to do the work. Although there is still a good way to go, progress is being achieved.

Revenue Canada Taxation, for example, with a clientele of 18 million people and one million businesses, has established new performance standards. Callers from anywhere in Canada will now be connected to a taxation agent within three minutes. Clients requesting personal service will not wait more than 20 minutes. Revenue Canada tax managers can now decide on the spot whether a taxpayer has a legitimate reason for filing late. Until this year, taxpayers had to apply formally through the Minister of Revenue to have late filing penalties waived.

Counsellors in the district offices of Veterans Affairs can now handle most low to moderate health risk claims under the Veterans Independence Program on the spot and thereby speed up decisions for their clients.

As promising as these and hundreds of other improvements are, critical reforms in the areas of staffing and staff relations can only go forward once Bill C-26 is passed into law.

It is not my intention to go into the details on the bill at this time. We have already done that in previous sittings. However, I would like to touch on one or two other important reforms contained in Bill C-26.

Deployments or lateral transfers will allow managers more freedom to move employees in order to respond to operational needs and enhance service to the public. These deployments will be under the control of a deputy minister and guided by policies and guidelines approved by Treasury Board.

Deployments will not be, as some unions have suggested, a management ploy to exile poor performers or out-of-favour employees into the frozen hinterlands. On the contrary, there will be developmental opportunities to allow employees to take advantage of a move to learn new skills in order to expand their career opportunities while at the same time permitting the public to be better served.

Except where deployments are considered a condition of work, such as in the foreign service, these moves will only be made on a voluntary basis.

The concept of deployment does not, as some unions have suggested, violate the principle of merit. People will continue to be hired and promoted based on a competitive process that awards positions to the best qualified candidate.

Deployments are transfers, not promotions. They are horizontal moves specifically designed to fill gaps in the service to the public. They also encourage learning, provide job opportunities for employment equity groups and result in greater career development.

Employee rights are also carefully protected. Where an employee thinks that there has been an abuse of authority with respect to a deployment, he or she will have the right to seek redress, including a third party investigation.

Bill C-26 recognizes, and in some cases such as apprenticeship and training programs or reclassifications, that merit is best served by measuring an individual's competence against the standard established by the Public Service Commission rather than in a competition against other people. Introducing some flexibility in the way the merit principle is administered will in no way compromise its integrity.

With a Public Service of over 218,000 employees and staffing systems that in the recent past resulted in approximately 100,000 appointments a year, there is never-ending pressure from taxpayers to cut the costs of internal administration. This is particularly so in an age of fiscal restraint, greater global competitiveness, and increasing demands from the public for service.

The issue of deployment and merit as well as other important issues such as employment equity have been intensely scrutinized over the past several weeks by the legislative committee examining this bill.

Over the past two months 19 witnesses have given testimony before the committee. The President of the Treasury Board appeared before the committee, as did several government officials and representatives from the Public Service Alliance of Canada, the Professional Institute of the Public Service, the Economists, Sociologists, and Statisticians' Association, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and other public service unions as well. Representations were also made by a number of academics, lawyers, and individuals with specific interest in the bill.

During the first month, committee members listened to presentations, questioned witnesses and examined 11 briefs which were submitted during testimony. This was followed by three weeks of clause-by-clause analysis of the bill in which all 109 clauses were examined in detail, debated, and voted upon. During the process over 100 amendments were examined by committee members.

As a result of this scrutiny, which has significantly strengthened the bill before us today, the government has introduced substantive amendments which would enshrine in law its commitment to employment equity. I am happy to say that these amendments were developed in partnership with committee members and the Liberal critic for the Public Service, the hon. member for Ottawa West.

The government is committed to ensuring the Public Service better reflects the public it serves. Visible minorities, aboriginal people, women, and persons with disabilities must have the same recruitment and advancement opportunities in the Public Service as other Canadians.

As a result, the government through Bill C-26 has proposed to bring its employment equity policy under legislation. This will replace employment equity requirements on Treasury Board comparable to those placed on other federally regulated employers.

Under the proposed provisions, Treasury Board will have a legal obligation to set goals and timetables, and report annually to this House on government progress on employment equity. The Public Service Commission has a strengthened role in implementing equity programs. Spelling out our obligations in law should leave no doubt as to how seriously this government is committed to employment equity.

The government is equally committed to moving forward with public service reform. As our population grows and diversifies, so do the demands on government for essential services we as Canadians have all come to expect from our Public Service.

If we are to maintain and improve our standards, efficiencies must be brought in to increase productivity. If we cannot hire more people to do the work demanded of us by the public, then we must at least remove those inefficient rules and regulations which impede the fine work our public service employees are committed to doing.

Bill C–26 would do just that. It would also mean more opportunities for employees, more varied work, a more simplified classification system which would allow for more career movement, particularly for women and other employment equity target groups. It is no secret that years of downsizing, of curbs on wages and spending and less than harmonious labour management relations has affected the morale of the Public Service.

Public Service 2000 proposals should improve morale by removing many of the obstacles that are frustrating for everyone, but morale and services can only improve if employees feel they are being fairly treated, their opinion is of some value to the organization and that they are appreciated for the job they are doing.

In Atlantic Canada, for example, Supply and Services Canada found itself facing severe resource constraints and increased client demands. The regional and district offices responded by introducing new management styles, improving internal communications, tackling problems in teams and seeking employee suggestions on how to improve services. Some 500 suggestions were received and many were implemented. In just two weeks the money saved from introducing some of these changes paid for the whole exercise. Productivity and labour relations improved and employee stress levels dropped.

Similar efforts to involve employees in decision–making, delegate more authority to them, and encourage teamwork and a sense of pride and ownership in their jobs are going on all across the country. These reforms must continue if Canada is to keep its place at the table of the great industrialized nations. They will continue once they are provided a sound legal basis through Bill C–26.

I would like to take a moment to express my sincere appreciation to the chairman, the hon. member for Cambridge, and to all committee members who put so many hours into ensuring that we had before us today a bill which I believe achieves a most important balance between protecting employee's rights, while endorsing common sense and modern management practices. I applaud all members of the committee for their reasoned and clear arguments on so many critical issues. Although our approach has often differed on many of these issues, there is no doubt that the bill has been significantly strengthened through their efforts.

In conclusion, I would like to encourage hon. members of the House to take a moment to reflect on the recent dramatic changes that have taken place at the world level. As we know, the Soviet Union has ceased to exist and the emerging east bloc countries are struggling to develop democratic traditions and a professional and dedicated public service. These are the same democratic traditions and dedicated professional Public Service that Canadians already enjoy.

The Public Service reform act, Bill C–26, would strengthen these traditions by allowing the Public Service to improve, adapt and provide the kind of service that will keep Canada competitive in the 21st century. It is the same kind of service that propelled Canada to first place in the United Nations ranking of human development among 160 nations. Bill C–26 is a key to ensuring that we can continue to build on this tradition of excellence. The key is in the hands of the hon. members here today and I urge them to pass this long overdue bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, as countries throughout the world undergo drastic changes in the structures of their social, political and economic institutions, Canada feels the impact of these changes as well. It is therefore important to look carefully at all our national institutions which will have to face the challenges of the 21st century, and at how they can best serve Canadians.

[English]

The Public Service of Canada is by far our most important institution. It offers us a wide variety of services which affect every aspect of our lives. Yet the food that we consume, the pharmaceutical products that we use, the roads and airports that we build, or the television programs that we watch, we know that a part of the Public Service has played a certain role, if not a major role, in those fields and many more.

Furthermore, contrary to popular belief, it is not all of the departments and not all of the employees of the Public Service that are located in Ottawa. In fact, only 33 per cent of all employees of the federal government are located in the national capital region. Therefore, over 65 per cent of federal public servants in our country are located in places other than the region of Ottawa–Carleton and the Outaouais.

When we looked over the work force, we quickly realized that the Public Service of Canada is not just any ordinary employer. Contrary to what our Conservative members of Parliament believe, the Public Service should not be completely managed like a private business. It is true that it is preferable for certain sectors of the federal government to follow characteristics of a commercial enterprise, but it is also true that we cannot fully apply the business philosophy to the whole of our Public Service.

The reason is simple. Our government services are not out to make a profit. As the name Public Service suggests, it is to provide essential services in an innovative fashion while keeping in mind the changing needs of our society.

That being said, I think we all realize that after a quarter of a century, it was time to review the legislation that regulates the operations of our government services. However, after having read and discussed the government's proposals, I think it is clear that any opportunity for positive reform will be lost for another quarter of a century.

The authors of Bill C–26 maintain this legislation will further simplify the administration of the Public Service by reducing the number of employment categories and will give senior officials the flexibility they need to manage a modern administration as it goes into the 21st century.

The Liberal Party agrees that revitalization of the Public Service to meet the changing circumstances of the future is absolutely essential. However, it should also be understood that changes are not acceptable at any price.

[English]

The Liberals consider that change is best managed in an atmosphere of respect, trust, co–operation and genuine consultation with employees and clients. The government promised to consult its employees about this reform, yet this bill was roundly condemned by employee representatives.

The House's most recent consideration of the Public Service Employment Act and the Public Service Staff Relations Act followed a lengthy process of co–operation and consultation in which parliamentarians and the general public, as well as the public servants and managers affected, have taken part.

On August 14, 1984, the Prime Minister had told the Professional Institute of the Public Service that a Conservative government would negotiate directly with the public service unions and associations in order to establish a better collective bargaining system in accordance with the provisions of the Canadian Labour Code. Unfortunately the process used by the architects of Public Service 2000 has undermined the government's original objectives.

Furthermore, those architects thought it advisable to ignore the recommendations of the public accounts committee on this subject. This parliamentary committee's report dated November 5, 1990, recommended that the government consider tabling a discussion paper before introducing legislative amendments or administrative changes. It then recommended referring the discussion paper to a special committee of the House on reform of the Public Service so that it could hold consultations involving employees, the public service unions and other interested parties.

The public accounts committee, on which I sit, also took responsibility for studying the information found in Part III of the Estimates which is made up of each department's parliamentary budget documents. What we were able to conclude on that committee is that Part III lacked clarity and that utter confusion was commonplace.

Another problem raised by the Auditor General is that sometimes a manager's unbridled initiative had caused serious problems of waste. For example, the Canadian on-line secure information and communications systems, referred to often as COSICS, at the Department of External Affairs proved to be a more complicated business than managers had foreseen.

COSICS is a communications system that links Canadian missions abroad and transmits information in coded and classified form. As it was drawn up in 1986, this project was supposed to be developed in two phases over a five year period at a total cost of $208 million. In the end, this initiative on the part of managers in that department will have cost $316 million and be seriously delayed. In fact, phase one of this project, a communications system in North America was completed two years later. Phase two, now nicknamed SIGNET, the communications system for all the other diplomatic missions is still not completed.

Another good example of waste appears in chapter 7 of the Auditor General's 1992 report which was presented in the House last Tuesday. Following the Conservative government's 1985 decision to reduce the size of the Public Service by 15,000 person-years over a five year period, it adopted a program of payments to employees under a workers adjustment policy.

Between 1986 and 1991, the Auditor General found that 64 per cent of these payments were either without foundation or called into question. That percentage equates to a wastage of $166.4 million.

The Auditor General attributed this loss to weaknesses in the management framework and weaknesses in departments. Furthermore, he alludes to a parallel of this incident and the Public Service 2000 program which advocates greater devolution of authority to departments and managers. Here is what he concludes: "We believe there are important lessons to be learned from this experience and significant improvements that need to be made, notably to the management framework".

Interestingly, the Auditor General stresses the fact that the government should be more concerned about doing away with duplication than about downsizing, since this practice has undesirable consequences such as a reduction in the quality of service to the public.

An excellent example which bears out the Auditor General's concerns about the government's arbitrary cutbacks may be found in a letter dated November 19, 1992, which was sent by the Secretary of the Treasury Board to all departments in the Public Service. The Secretary of the Treasury Board is asking departments to immediately cut an additional 2 per cent from their total budgets, which they may do arbitrarily. He admits that ministers realize that cuts of this size—especially with only four months left until the end of the fiscal year—may in some cases translate into deterioration of the level of service.

[English]

Here we are with a bill which institutionalizes the Auditor General's most recent and important preoccupations regarding the Public Service of Canada. In short, always lacking in both of these cases was an appropriate control mechanism that would have ensured that departmental operations and information were transparent.

The Office of the Auditor General presented an organizational plan for Part III that the government could adopt. This plan proposes that the relevant information parliamentarians seek such as departmental objectives, operations and missions be found in future versions of Part III.

The fact that there are management problems now, as pointed out in the Auditor General's annual report, makes me realize that in future with Bill C-26 there will be even more departmental problems to report. There will be as many operational mechanisms as there are departments. That means that the Public Service will be deprived of an over-all cohesiveness.

The foreseeable result is that the work of the Auditor General will only increase and that future Auditor Generals' reports promise to be quite voluminous.

If managers will have more freedom to manage as they see fit, I consider that Part III of the Estimates will have to clearly reflect departmental objectives and operations more than ever. Otherwise, in future the principle of departmental accountability to Parliament will be seriously weakened.

I would now like to read a few comments made by witnesses who appeared before the legislative committee on Bill C-26. Regarding the Public Service Alliance, it was said and I quote: "We fundamentally believe that this approach to the employer-employee relationship is flawed. Moreover, it will inevitably result in an increased level of frustration that can only undermine the already abysmal morale in the Public Service. Such an outcome will adversely affect service to the public".

The Economists, Sociologists and Statisticians Association, ESSA, told us that in fact this legislation if passed in its current form will lead to a further breakdown in labour-management relations, employee alienation and a public perception that patronage and favouritism are alive and well in the federal Public Service.

A third witness, Professor Barbara A. Carroll of McMaster University, stated to the legislative committee that, and I quote: "This proposal has the potential for creating individual department fiefdoms. It places employees at the whim of the individual department deputy head, creating a new form of centralization within the departments without clarity, without accountability or the much vaunted business advantage of economies of scale.

I want to discuss four points of particular concern to me, which are the merit principle, contracting out, deployment and, finally, collective bargaining.

But first of all, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Ottawa West on her amendment on employment equity, which was accepted as an amendment to clause 5 of Bill C-26. The government's original proposal was very weak, not to say ineffective. In fact, under the original provision, Treasury Board may provide employment equity programs, thus restricting that possibility. This clause seemed to have been designed more to improve the government's image than to guarantee fair representation of target groups, including women, aboriginal people, visible minorities and the disabled.

The Liberal amendment will oblige the government to apply to its own employees the employment equity rules that have applied to the private sector since 1986. Because of this amendment, Treasury Board will now have to develop a plan for identifying and removing barriers to employment equity for women, aboriginal people, visible minorities and the disabled; set a timetable for achieving a degree of representation of these groups that is at least proportionate to the representation within the general population, and to report annually to Parliament on the state of employment equity in the Public Service.

Thanks to this provision drafted by the Liberal Party, minorities need no longer be concerned about waiting for years until amendments are made to the Employment Equity Act. However, there are still a number of shortcomings which the government has decided to ignore. A major issue which is still up in the air is the role and responsibilities of the Public Service Commission in this area.

The Liberal Party proposed an amendment that would have defined the commission's role. The purpose of this amendment was to ensure that the standards and criteria used in competitions and appointments are completely non-discriminatory. In addition, the Liberal Party presented amendments that would have required the commission to investigate any complaint of harassment or abuse of authority. Unfortunately, the government completely ignored these proposals. It will take a Liberal government to properly complete the Liberal Party's initial proposals on employment equity.

[English]

On the question of the merit principle, at the moment we have a system based on competitions and appeals that, despite all its shortcomings, prevents abuse and ensures that the best qualified persons are appointed.

When a Public Service competition is held, the qualifications of one candidate are always compared with the skills of the other candidates. Clause 10(2) of Bill C-26 changes this method, thus allowing a candidate to simply be measured against the Public Service Commission's prerequisites.

From now on, the best possible candidate will no longer be selected to fill a position. All that managers will have to do to accommodate their needs is to team up with a favoured candidate who meets the commission's requirements.

Unfortunately, with this change proposed by the government, we can already justifiably state that the merit principle has been sacrificed to the whim of the managers.

ESSA is quite right to quote that in substance this change to section 10 will revert the Public Service to what we perceive as Public Service 1900, a time when managerial authority was absolute. Despite all the justifications we heard on the subject from the Treasury Board representatives, it is nonetheless true that while studying this bill, the legislative committee's legal adviser noted an ambiguity in the wording of this clause. It is therefore not surprising that several groups are worried about this amendment and the repercussion it will have.

I would like to share the assurances provided to us by Mr. Robert Giroux, chairman of the Public Service Commission, in his letter to ESSA dated May 8, 1992. He states:

> Subsection 10(2) has been drafted as an exception to the more general provisions of subsection 10(1). We are currently proposing that the situations will be apprenticeship and occupational training programs approved by the commission. We believe as long as certain conditions are met, the new provision is the fair and sensible approach in these situations.

Frankly, I do not see how these words can reassure anyone. For all practical purposes, we are being asked to believe in the Public Service Commission's goodwill and as long as certain conditions are met, everything will work out for the best in the best of all possible worlds.

If we must trust the commission's goodwill, the fifth report of the joint committee on the scrutiny of regulations will not promote this feeling of trust. This committee made the following comment:

> The Public Service Commission is more preoccupied with avoiding the imposition of binding rules of conduct on department administrators and on itself than it is with meeting the need to implement an appeal system that is both fair and seen to be fair by participants and that furthers the commission's duty to uphold the merit principle.

In addition, PIPS concludes that Bill C-26 grants the commission even more discretion not to apply vigorous tests of merit, thus raising the prospect of further exploitation of the commission by the interest of senior management. Bill C-26 will further erode the ability of the commission to serve as a legitimate third party.

• (1050)

Finally, the Public Service Commission's credibility is very much called into question since the government and the commission admit that clause 10(2) should be subject to certain conditions because of the potential for abuse. Furthermore, they accept no amendment to this clause which would limit its application. Instead, they offer us vague, fuzzy promises.

We must therefore conclude that this government proposal which is supported by the commission is designed so that the courts and Parliament can interpret the meaning of the merit principle differently.

[English]

On the subject of contracting out, Bill C-26 encourages contracting out by allowing deputy heads to lay off professional public servants as a result of the transfer of their work or function outside the Public Service.

Particularly disturbing is the fact that we still do not know the total amount that the government has spent for contracting out. There is no mechanism that provides this figure for Canadians and oddly enough there is also no system that demonstrates the cost effectiveness of this practice.

Furthermore, there are many instances of contracts that are poorly carried out and have duplication of costs. All this is at the expense of jobs.

[Translation]

All the efforts of Liberal members on the public accounts committee to obtain a total amount ran into government obstruction. Nevertheless, it has been calculated that for the 1991-92 fiscal year, the government spent $5 billion on contracting out. Treasury Board cannot or will not account for the volume of work done outside the Public Service. Neither can it guarantee that this practice is cost effective; now it puts in the law that employees can be laid off when their work is given to an outside agency. From now on, employees will always live in fear of losing their job to an outside contractor. Now that is a good way to continue developing a professional public service.

It is interesting to note a second time how the government defied the public accounts committee's recommendations. In its report of November 5, 1990 to the House, the committee recommended that the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Office of the Comptroller General ensure that departments and agencies disclose what they spend on contracts to replace the work done by public servants. Moreover, they should ensure that departments and agencies report on the services of people hired on contract. I find particularly interesting the last words of the public accounts committee on this subject:

> It would appear that the government should only use outside contractors to replace public servants where cost-effectiveness has been clearly demonstrated, taking into account the negative effects on public servants' morale.

Unfortunately, the public accounts committee's recommendations were never addressed by the government.

[English]

It must be stated that clause 19 of Bill C-26, which permits contracting out, was designed to do no more and no less than nullify the January 30, 1992 court decision which ruled that the government's use of contracting out while laying off its employees was illegal. This new provision is certainly the height of cynicism and shows how little compassion this government has for its employees.

On the question of deployments, the problems to which deployments give rise are found in clause 22 of Bill C-26. From now on deputy heads or directors will have the exclusive right to deploy employees in the sector for which they are responsible.

At present, deployments are subject to the merit principle and may be appealed. Once Bill C-26 has the force of law managers will have the right to deploy employees where they see fit and without taking the merit principle into account. If employees intend to dispute their deployment, they will find the procedure quite complicated since the right to appeal has been seriously limited, if not eliminated.

The legislative committee's clause-by-clause study of the bill clearly shows that it is the deputy head, the same person who makes a decision to deploy an employee, who has the ultimate authority to settle disputes.

PIPS argues that clause 22 will create an environment in which favouritism and abuses of power will prevail with no possibility of appeal. Employees' careers will depend on managers' goodwill, so much the better for cliques. Under Bill C-26 a deployment will not constitute an appointment and thus will not be subject to the merit principle.

There is no review process and no appeal. Decisions are made quite arbitrarily by public service executives and the employees have no protection.

Here again the history of this issue before the courts is far from reassuring. On January 30, 1992 the Federal Court of Canada ruled that the order allowing ministers to deploy an employee from one department to another was ultra vires because this practice clearly ran counter to the merit principle. The judge who made this ruling stated that accepting the government's position would be defeating the whole purpose and object of the Public Service Employment Act which is to ensure that appointments to the Public Service are made on the basis of merit. Two years ago, when it stated that it could deploy persons as it saw fit, the government had acted illegally by exceeding its authority.

In order to eliminate this minor judicial obstacle, the government is amending the existing legislation so it can deploy its employees at will.

The Liberal Party presented amendments to try to correct some troubling sections in this clause. Above all, we asked the government to ensure that promotions and demotions in the Public Service would not be done through transfers. Thus, the requirements of bilingualism and the merit principle would be respected.

I believe that the government's refusal to accept these reasonable amendments clearly shows the direction in which it wants to take the public service, namely to make it a place where patronage, and even incompetence in some cases could prevail.

As for collective bargaining, Madam Speaker, in 1967, Parliament adopted the principle whereby Canadian public servants, with some exceptions, have the right to collective bargaining. Bill C-26 takes thousands of employees back to the situation that existed before 1967.

It is incomprehensible that the federal government continues to refuse to extend the right to collective bargaining to all its employees, especially when this right is granted to employees of other levels of government, private-sector employees and even temporary employees.

[English]

ESSA is right to be indignant that while the Canadian government is a signatory to conventions of the International Labour Organization, whose purpose is to protect employees' collective bargaining rights, it is proposing to limit those very rights where its own employees are concerned.

Last, PIPS maintains that limiting the right to bargain collectively should be subject to a single criterion. Only when there is an actual conflict of interest between being a union member and carrying out duties and responsibilities on behalf of the employer may this right be denied.

I would like to conclude this speech by noting the words of Barbara Wade Carroll, a professor at McMaster University and an expert in the field of public administration: "It is a clear tenet of organization theory and management that the way to achieve organization changes is by changing it not from the top, but at the top. Yet neither Public Service 2000 nor Bill C-26 addressed the need for such change except—"

CYPRUS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Madam Speaker, UN chief Boutros-Ghali denounced Turkish Cypriot leader Rauf Denktash for the lack of progress in the recent round of UN-sponsored Cyprus peace talks in New York and called on the Turkish side to review its position.

In his report he suggested several measures that would contribute greatly to the success of the negotiations. These included a reduction of the Turkish occupied troops, the handing over of the Turkish occupied town of Famagusta to the UN, the promotion of contacts between the two communities, less restrictions of foreign visitors, communal co-operation with the UN for the resettlement of Turkish Cypriots, proposals for bi-communal projects and a Cyprus-wide census.

The report takes a harsh stand against Mr. Denktash, noting that the solutions he is seeking are incompatible with the UN set of ideas to provide a bi-communal, bi-zonal federal Republic of Cyprus with a single sovereignty, citizenship and international personality.

Hopefully, when talks resume again in March, some concrete results will be forthcoming for the betterment of Cyprus and all its people.

CORNWALL CORONARY HEALTH IMPROVEMENT PROJECT

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, the Cornwall Coronary Health Improvement Project is an innovative community health project which has obtained fascinating results.

During a four week intensive intervention program, 500 participants lost a total of one and a half tons of excess fat. Those with elevated cholesterol levels obtained an average drop of 16 per cent. In addition, 36 smokers quit, the group collectively walked 12,000 miles, and many participants obtained marked reductions in medications for the control of angina, hypertension and diabetes.

The projected 62 per cent reduction in coronary risk was accomplished without any government funding. The results obtained by the CHIP program and the potential savings similar programs could have makes this project a very valuable method for improving the health of Canadians while also contributing to reducing the mounting financial burdens being placed upon Canada's health care system.

DIABETES MONTH

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Madam Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that November is diabetes month.

Over one million Canadians have diabetes, with over 60,000 new cases diagnosed each year. In fact, the theme of the diabetes campaign is "One million Canadians have diabetes—half don't know it".

The cost of not knowing is high. Diabetes is a major cause of adult blindness, it doubles the chance of a heart attack or a stroke, and the annual cost of diabetes to the Canadian health care system is in excess of $2.5 billion. The Canadian Diabetes Association, through education, wants to alert those who may already have it and to reach those who may be at risk for the condition.

The discovery of insulin by Canadian researchers Banting, Best and McLeod in 1921 provided new ways of managing diabetes, and has meant a longer and healthier life for those suffering from the condition. But it did not provide a cure. Continued research is necessary.

I would like to commend the efforts of the Canadian Diabetic Association and all those who share their work, and wish them well with their campaign.

EAST TIMOR

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, a week ago today the Indonesian news agency Antara reported that Xanana Gusmao was arrested by Indonesian military forces in Dili, East Timor. He is the leader of East Timor's independence movement and a key player in the negotiations currently under way under the auspices of the United Nations regarding the future of East Timor.

Xanana is currently being held incommunicado in detention and there are fears that he may be subjected to torture or ill treatment by the Indonesian security forces. They have admitted that Xanana is undergoing intensive questioning and have rejected calls for the Red Cross to be allowed to visit him.

The Canadian government should take steps to ensure that Xanana Gusmao is released immediately; that he is afforded the minimum protection provided under the relevant UN conventions; that the Red Cross is granted immediate access to him; that his lawyer is allowed to be present at all times during questioning; and that he is able to participate in the talks about the future of East Timor with the UN.

As I outlined in a speech at the UN last year—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but your time has expired.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, with the coming into force of the Young Offenders Act, Canada's treatment of criminal activity by youth underwent a marked change. The Young Offenders Act recognizes the special needs and the vulnerability of youth, but also places emphasis on the protection of the public. However, society is changing and unfortunately so are the crimes of our youth. I want our government to re-examine this legislation and make the necessary changes so that the law accurately reflects the reality of our society.

In discussions I have had with chiefs of police, law enforcement officers and members of the public, there was a consensus that changes must be made. First, being 18 years old and falling under the Young Offenders Act is too old. Also, there is a problem with under-12 year olds not being charged under the act.

In addition, youths 15 years old and over who have been convicted of first degree murder should automatically be referred to the adult court for sentencing. Finally, records of violent youth criminality should be made available to principals of schools at which a young offender is in attendance.

If our system of justice is to be fair, equitable and effective—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Your time has expired.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, it is unconscionable that Chander Grover should have had to enter a complaint against the National Research Council. It is worse that the findings of the Human Rights Commission demonstrated the discrimination at NRC had to be the subject of the strongest indictment measured against anyone in the entire country.

It is worse when another complaint has been brought before the Human Rights Commission because the National Research Council has refused to follow the directions of the Human Rights Commission.

Mr. Perron, who is the president, has refused to recognize his obligations. The minister has refused to ensure that he follow his obligations. Both should be held responsible. Mr. Perron should not be allowed to continue leading NRC and if the minister does not do his job, he should resign as well.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Madam Speaker, this is further to comments I made at the beginning of this week on manpower training.

What is the challenge facing parliamentarians after the constitutional setback? We must show Canadians that federalism is still viable. We must prove we can make changes for the benefit of Canadians, and administrative agreements are one of the ways we can do this.

The first test will be manpower training. At the conference of employment and immigration ministers in January, our colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, will make it clear that it is possible to eliminate overlap and duplication in manpower training and that administrative agreements can and must be used to improve effectiveness for the benefit of users.

OLDER WORKERS ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, had a textile mill for well over 115 years. The branch mill of Dominion Textiles closed its doors last July 31, 1991, putting 350 employees out of work. Approximately 30 people qualified for the Older Workers Adjustment Program. It was my understanding and theirs that when their unemployment ran out the older workers adjustment benefits would be in place.

We are now at the end of November, 16 months after the closure. I have written the minister and spoken to the department. The province of Nova Scotia says it sent this particular matter up months ago. Unfortunately, in order to live some of the people involved have had to go to welfare, some have had to get credit from local grocery stores and some have had to find other sources for funds.

Surely no program that is supposed to help people who have been laid off should take this long to come into force. If this is the way the program—

PAROLE

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, I was relieved to hear this morning that the release of Ray Boudreau, a paedophile who has completed only two-thirds of his sentence, has been delayed while new information is assessed by the National Parole Board.

While I am pleased with this development I am disappointed in the process that seems to have prevented the Solicitor General from taking direct action to overrule the board.

The board still seems confused about the issue of serious harm. As I said yesterday, when a child is sexually molested, serious harm is done. This incident provides a good example of why we need to revise our laws related to child sexual abuse by allowing indefinite incarceration for offenders who cannot be rehabilitated. We also need much better rehabilitation programs.

I urge the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General to take immediate action on these pressing issues.

ROGERS CABLE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I want to speak about cable rates. The council of the district of Coquitlam, soon to be the city, just passed a resolution on cable rates which states as follows: "that the council write a strong letter of protest to the CRTC regarding the proposed rate increase sought by Rogers Cable and advise them of our displeasure with this monthly 19 per cent increase in their basic monthly rate".

My constituents are angry. They are not just displeased, they are angry. This notice is what you get at your door. This tells you about the increase in your cable rate. However, what does it really tell you? It is called negative option marketing. In fact, cable rates for certain channels are going up about $2.30 and they do not tell you that you do not have to take them.

I say to the people of Canada, say no to Rogers, phone your cable people and say: "You are not going to pick our pockets. We do not have to take these rates and we do not have to take this". If you just phone and tell them you do not have take it you do not have to—

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, Canada's competition laws are inadequate. Our competition laws were unable to prevent the recent predation clearly going on in the airline industry where one airline tried to take over another by engaging in predatory pricing practices.

Our inadequate competition laws have cost Canadians dearly and put at risk the stability of our airline industry. The Director of the Competition Bureau has been powerless to intervene. It is too difficult to prove in a judicial setting that predatory pricing is occurring.

The law should be strengthened to lower the burden of proof. The Director of the Competition Bureau should be able to threaten companies with fines if they appear to be engaging in predatory practices.

I call upon the government to strengthen Canada's competition laws and to enhance the role of the director as an advocate of competition.

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, the government in January announced new rules for reviewing foreign takeovers of Canada's book publishing companies. Canadian publishers expressed grave concern opposing any retreat from the government's objective of seeking Canadian control of both book publishing and distribution.

The government denied it had backed down under American pressure and insisted that as a condition of any foreign takeover that the net effect would be beneficial to Canada and the Canadian owned publishing industry in both cultural and industrial terms.

Recent news reports state that after three and a half years, Investment Canada is to allow the sale of Harper-Collins Canadian book distribution business to foreign interests. A letter from Michael Wilson to Rupert Murdoch's News Corporation says: "We welcome your decision to invest in Canada".

Questions need answering. Is Investment Canada to allow the sale of a Canadian company to foreigners? Is there a net benefit to Canada and the Canadian–owned publishing sector? Have Canadian publishers been told to zip their lip if they oppose this deal, that they will put $100 million in federal grant money to their industry in jeopardy? Is the government covering up yet another sell–out of Canadian culture?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I regret the time has expired.

SANTOSH SIRPAUL

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Madam Speaker, I rise this morning to express on behalf of many members of Parliament a sincere thank you to one of our most senior and distinguished clerks, Ms. Santosh Sirpaul.

As members know, Ms. Sirpaul some years ago came alone to Canada as a young immigrant from India. She has spent her entire professional career serving all members of Parliament on many committees and bills. She worked many years as clerk to the transport committee, including the huge national transportation bill. She clerked the free trade bill and just this week completed the massive C–86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Thank you, Ms. Sirpaul, for another task very well done.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, the free trade deal requires an end to subsidies. This deal is supported by the Liberals, Conservatives, Reform and Bloc Quebecois.

The Royal Commission on Transportation has tabled a blueprint for full user–pay air, road, rail and ferry travel in Canada. Here is what it will do to travel in my constituency. I drive from Masset to Skidegate and pay $7 at the new road toll booth. I get on the ferry to Prince Rupert and the fare has doubled, thanks to the cancellation of the $19 million federal subsidy. I drive from Prince Rupert to Terrace and pay $11 at the new road toll booth. There is no VIA Rail any more, instead there is a passenger car once a week at the back of a freight train and it is empty. As I leave Terrace I pay $14 at the new road toll booth on the way to Smithers. At Smithers I board a plane and thanks to the new user fees, it is $300 one way to Vancouver. That is a 500 mile flight. In the Vancouver airport I notice that a 2,500 mile flight to Toronto is now only $79.

Yes, removing subsidies might give better and cheaper service between big cities, but this user pay will kill rural Canada.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, I rise today on behalf of one of my constituents, Mr. Harold Bliss.

Mr. Bliss has suffered a great deal both physically and psychologically as a result of his experiences as an employee of Public Works Canada.

Mr. Bliss was attacked and his attacker was found guilty of assault in provincial court. An internal investigation by Public Works Canada dealt with such issues as anti–Semitism and harassment directed at Mr. Bliss.

This assault occurred over two years ago but despite clear indications that Mr. Bliss was the victim in this affair, this case still has not been resolved. Mr. Bliss is under a great deal of physical and emotional stress and he continues to suffer as he waits in vain for settlement.

I have learned recently there has been some movement toward a resolution. I am pleased that some progress is being made but I urge the government to do all in its power to right this terrible injustice.

ETHANOL

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, a recent announcement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Agriculture to encourage the production and use of the fuel ethanol in Canada could not have come at a better time.

In British Columbia, Dr. Laszlo Paszner has been working on his technology for converting wood waste to ethanol. Hopefully this will lead to a pilot project and, ultimately, to the full scale production of ethanol in British Columbia.

This is a good complement to the forest industry and by using wood waste to create ethanol not only do Canadians benefit from an alternative fuel source but the environment benefits from less harmful automobile emissions.

The federal government has truly shown leadership and a vision.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance.

On October 10, 1991, the Minister of Finance said that the recession ended in April 1991. Yesterday in this House the minister said that the recession is over but this time he did not give us a date on which the recession ended.

I would like to say to the Minister of Finance that for the 10,000 employees of CN Rail who are losing their jobs, the recession is not over. For the 2,000 employees of Dofasco in Hamilton who are losing their jobs, the recession is not over. For the 500 employees of Pratt and Whitney in Montreal, the recession is not over. It is just beginning.

When will the minister realize that his policy of fighting inflation at all costs is the wrong policy? When will he introduce a new set of economic policies that will create growth in Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I said in the House yesterday or the day before, the economy has experienced five consecutive quarters of growth, modest, but not negative growth. The hon. member should recognize that.

There has been job creation. Some 64,000 new jobs have been created. There has been an improvement in the job situation in five of the last six months. Some 83,000 permanent jobs were implemented in September and October. There is an improvement in confidence. There is an improvement in departmental sales. What the hon. member is clearly overlooking—he is a world traveller and he understands global economics—is that we are really going through a major restructuring, a massive restructuring, a transition of the economy, and there are adjustments that have to be made.

What we are trying to do is implement programs and policies to facilitate that transition, to ensure that Canadians who are displaced as a result of the newly emerging economy can train and upgrade their skills so that they can take advantage of these new opportunities.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, it is really incredible the Minister of Finance is so far removed from reality, although we understand that he may try to make a short presentation on economic policy next week in the House.

Will the Minister of Finance consider what he has refused to consider so far: starting a job creation process by inviting municipalities, provincial governments, and the federal government to invest together in the infrastructures that badly need improving in this country?

• (1120)

Does he intend to give the private sector new incentives to invest in expanding their industries and purchasing equipment, in order to create jobs?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that the challenges we face cannot be met by one level of government or the other. It will require the close co-operation of the federal government, the provinces, the municipalities, the private sector, the workers of this country, the unions and the learning institutions.

One of our major thrusts will be to invest in people, to invest in a strategic way in capital investments, to invest in some infrastructure in a way that would be affordable, recognizing that we have very little fiscal room, by working with the provinces and, of course, encouraging those partnerships which the hon. member suggests.

Next week we will have the opportunity to hear what the opposition parties have in mind in terms of their outline for economic policy for the future, how they would build an economic foundation for the 21st century. I will be very interested to hear what they have to offer.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister has just said that he is ready to do something in the program of infrastructure. It is something we have been talking about for more than a year. We would not be this deep into a recession if the minister had listened to us. I will give him another little bit of advice because he seems to need a lot of it.

One of the biggest problems in our economy today is that small businesses cannot get loans from the banks. The banks are taking the savings of Canadians and buying Canadian bonds with them and they are not investing in businesses any more. The minister for small business said the government would talk to the junior clerks of the banks. That is not what we should do. The Minister of Finance should call in the banks and tell them to lend money to the Canadians who want to invest right now to create jobs.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I would like the Leader of the Opposition to really bring himself up to date.

I met with the senior officials of all the banks just two weeks ago and asked them to report to me on the very question that the Leader of the Opposition is speaking about because I had information confirming that credit restrictions were still very strong. I told them that they have to open up their credit still further. We are going to do our part through helping to improve the Small Businesses Loans Act, something else the Leader of the Opposition is also not aware of.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Less than a month before Christmas, 10,000 workers at CN, 2,000 workers at Dofasco, 500 workers at Pratt and Whitney, 1,500 miners in Cape Breton, thousands of fishermen in Atlantic Canada joined 1.6 million Canadians in telling this Minister of Finance that the recession is not over.

Will the minister accept the evidence of this human misery? Will he acknowledge the depth of the recession and will he bring in a budget to fight it?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's concern. He will recognize that there is hardly a sector in our economy that has not been affected, either by the slowing down of the economy or by the global slowdown, by the restructuring and transition period we are going through in adjusting and adapting to a newly emerging economy.

In his own particular area of Atlantic Canada and particularly off the coast of Newfoundland, the depletion of fish stocks is a phenomenon that has to be dealt with. Human misery and suffering are occurring there, but this government has responded.

When de Havilland was in trouble, the government sat down with the workers, with the company, with the provinces and tried to put together a plan of action. In the case of Algoma we did the same thing. We have continued to work with the various sectors and the provincial governments involved, the workers and the unions to try to deal with these particular issues. They are very difficult issues that have to be faced. The steel industry is undergoing a situation where there are massive stocks in the global market. That is a reality of life and we have to deal with it. We will work with all the interested parties in trying to deal with this very difficult and sensitive issue.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, does the Minister of Finance not realize, in light of everything he has just said, that Canada's unemployed and indeed Canada's employed find it offensive when the minister continues to insist in the face of all that human misery that the recession is over?

They find it bitterly ironic that the only Canadians who have been given reassurances about job security this winter are Tory members of Parliament who have been told that there will be no election until next fall.

Will this Minister of Finance cancel his plans for a mini budget and will he bring in a major change of economic policy and begin the process of putting Canadians back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have always acknowledged that the Canadian economy was not recovering and was weaker than we had hoped for and that we had anticipated, but so is the global economy.

There is such a thing as global interdependence. That is a fact of life. We are part of the global community. We export and we trade with many other countries. When demand is reduced in the global sense, it affects Canada. We cannot be immune from these realities.

I repeat, there has been five consecutive quarters of growth. There has been job creation. There have been indicators that show we have become more competitive. Our productivity has increased, our exports have increased and departmental sales are improving. It is a slow turnaround.

I hope that the statement I make next week will add to the confidence, the hope and the optimism that the hon. member is so anxious to receive. I hope he will be supportive of it.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In answers just given, he has talked about the world global economy. That is the problem as far as he is concerned. However, in the airline industry, in VIA transportation, there are 10,000 people who will lose their jobs. Those are Canadian problems. What are the Canadian solutions?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member has been the last few years because what we are seeing in the airline industry is a global rationalization.

Perhaps he should consult with his transportation critic because he would find that there has been a consolidation of carriers, not only in the United States but in Europe. The consolidation and the alliance of carriers has produced economies of scale with a certain amount of job dislocation.

It is a fact of life. It is part of globalization. It is part of the keen competitiveness we are going through. It is part of the transition, adjustment and restructuring that is exacerbating the difficulties in the slowness of the economy and the hon. member should understand that. No one can be immune from global realities.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance knows that the only keen transportation competition were the buy-outs that occurred under deregulation.

We have fewer air companies now than we did when deregulation was started by the Liberals and the Conservatives. We know that. However, in the rail industry, 10,000 jobs being lost at CN alone. What is the government going to do for those workers? What is it going to do for the communities that are affected?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, is the hon. member suggesting that we should artificially inflate prices for CN, for CP, for Air Canada and for Canadian Airlines, and price ourselves right out of the world market? What kind of nonsense is that, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, my question is again for the Deputy Prime Minister.

He said that exports have increased and new jobs have increased. Is it in fact true that our greatest increase in exports are the new jobs we are producing in the United States?

Take, for example, Dofasco, where 2,000 jobs are going to be eliminated while at the same time 600 jobs are going to Kentucky by virtue of state and municipal subsidies and incentives. When will the government act and what is it going to do to protect those jobs, particularly in the steel industry, where it can act?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I cannot imagine why the hon. member would be opposed to the increase in exports that are being delivered to the United States of America.

Exports to the United States under the free trade agreement have increased by 10.5 per cent in the first nine months of this year. There has been an increase of over 16 per cent since the free trade agreement was signed.

• (1130)

Whether it is agricultural products with a 30 per cent increase, whether it is pharmaceuticals, industrial machinery, aerospace machinery, software or clothing, all of our exports to the United States have gone up and that means jobs.

INFRASTRUCTURES

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister told us yesterday that we are no longer in a recession. Today we hear there will be 500 lay-offs at Pratt & Whitney. We also heard that the vacancy rate in the Montreal area is the lowest it has been in 30 years.

When will the minister introduce an infrastructures program to kick start the economy and create jobs for our workers who need the money? They do not even have enough to pay the rent.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I repeat that this country has had five consecutive quarters of growth. It is modest, but we have had five consecutive quarters of growth.

In August, the composite leading indicator was up. Growth in August was at the rate of one-half of one per cent for the month. That is a very major increase. The help wanted index is up. Employment and jobs have been created.

The hon. member wants an infrastructure program. I would appreciate knowing what kind of an infrastructure program he wants, how much money he is going to borrow or how much he is going to tax. Where is he going to get the money to get it done?

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, we have been discussing this program since January, and if the minister had been listening, people would have been back to work.

According to the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, there are 35,000 housing units vacant in the Montreal area. That many vacancies, would accommodate the entire town of Saint-Léonard. Will the minister give us the assurance that in his economic statement on December 2, he will introduce an infrastructures program, supported by the provinces, the municipalities and the federal government, so that Canadians who need work will be able to get it? Does he realize that in Montreal, unemployment in the construction industry has reached 50 per cent? Is he going to wait until it goes up to 100 per cent?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the government is very much aware of these facts. That is why it wants to concentrate on the real solutions. My colleague, the Minister of Finance, explained a number of facts which the Liberals don't seem to want to understand. Next year in the OECD countries, which are the largest industrialized countries in the world, there will be 42 million unemployed. These people are our customers, and they must be in good shape if we want to sell them our products. The government cannot act as a substitute for the real economy. It must create a climate that is favourable to job creation, the lowest possible interest rates and the lowest possible rate of inflation. That is what the government must do, and that is what we will do.

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for small business to whom I have given notice of my question. He will be aware of a very serious water situation at the Lingan colliery. There have been massive lay-offs at the failing colliery and other operations of the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

On behalf of the families of the miners of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, will the minister exercise his responsibilities and work with the Minister of Employment and Immigration to see whether or not the provisions of the advance payment system under the Unemployment Insurance Act can be utilized? This would allow those employees to secure some benefits before the Christmas holiday season.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his question and advance notice.

The situation is really quite serious. The water pressure on the Lingan colliery remains very strong. It is stable and we are concerned that the failing colliery which is below it could be put at risk as well. We are monitoring this very carefully.

This morning I talked to the management, the board and also the union. They are very pleased that there are thorough briefings going on hourly between union and management. No miner has been injured. No miner is down there. They are not working today.

I would like him to know that multi-seam mining experts are coming from Europe. They are going to look at the safety of the Phalen colliery which is so important for future jobs in Cape Breton.

In terms of the immediate future for the miners, it is very important that nothing be done until it is totally safe for them to go there and therefore we have to look to unemployment insurance. They were registering yesterday and the day before. They will do so again today.

Ordinarily, they would have to wait two weeks, until the middle of December, before they could receive their unemployment insurance benefits, but I have spoken to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. He is looking to see if there is a way under the act to have an advance payment.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the minister for that comprehensive answer with regard to that situation.

The minister is well aware that previous governments have made substantial investments in preparing for the opening of a new project, namely, the Donkin coal mine.

As a result of the Lingan situation, is the minister and the Government of Canada prepared to work with the province of Nova Scotia to assist Devco in getting this mine into operation, thereby securing the jobs of the individuals who work there? Will the government allow Devco, a federal Crown corporation, to honour its domestic and international commitments so that it can be known as a reliable coal supplier? Can the minister give us that undertaking?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): It is quite true that Devco's performance in the last two years has established itself very strongly as a reliable coal supplier, not just to the Nova Scotia Power Corporation but internationally. There has been good union–management co–operation. We want to see that continue.

It is premature really to talk about Donkin. We have to see whether we can save the 13 east wall in Lingan and whether the international experts can make sure that we can move into Phalen which is below it.

There is some reason for hope. Apparently the water pressure is like a hockey stick. It is going up rather than down. It could be that one could stabilize that pressure permanently and the experts will tell us that. The experts will also tell us about the future of the Phalen colliery and that is our immediate concern.

ENVIRONMENT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. As is widely known the residents in my area recently rejected proposals for municipally financed sewage treatment, the high cost being a major factor.

Victoria is not alone, as the minister knows. More than 1,000 Canadian communities dump raw sewage into our lakes, rivers and other bodies of water.

Will this government show some national leadership to clear up our waters? We will co–operate fully at all levels and on all sides of the House. This is not a partisan issue. This is an issue which is important to all Canadians.

Would the government be prepared to institute a national cost–shared program to upgrade our water and sewage treatment facilities in Canada?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the member would call on the federal government to show some national leadership in this regard. In fact, on environmental issues and sustainable development issues we have done exactly that through, among other things, Canada's national green plan.

I have been made aware of the issue of sewage treatment in Victoria several times. In fact, it would be important to note that this is a matter which is raised systematically by American representatives. Two successive ambassadors representing the United States have raised this matter with me. I have also raised this matter with the Government of British Columbia several times. I understand the referendum was not successful.

We are having discussions now with the Government of British Columbia. At the end of the day, however, I think the member will also accept that on issues of infrastructure we usually recognize that municipal governments and provincial governments are responsible first in that area. That is also consistent with the polluter–pay principle that this government has adopted.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, as the minister knows, the capital regional district and the people of Victoria have contributed an enormous amount to cleaning up many of the problems in the area. The provincial government has been prepared to put up money. The federal government put up nearly $200 million for sewage treatment in Halifax. It would assist enormously if the government would be prepared to come along with a national program and contribute to cleaning up this most important waterway.

I ask the government again: Will it give some leadership in job creation in cleaning up the environment and cleaning up our international reputation by taking action in this important matter?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I understand there are ongoing discussions with the government of British Columbia on this matter. We intend to pursue this matter with it. I want to remind the hon. member that from time to time there has been federal participation in certain projects of this nature, but it is the exception rather than the rule.

From an environmental point of view, it is also important to recognize that whatever the issue may be it is the people involved, the people who are in that area who are first and foremost responsible for these types of activities. That is certainly the premise upon which we are operating as we enter into these discussions.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of Transport if, as a condition for the $50 million of financial assistance given to Canadian Airlines, the government had sought from Canadian Airlines a promise that it would not ask for any further financial assistance. The record will show that the minister failed to answer that question.

I would like to ask the government one more time: Has the government forced PWA to promise that no proposal will be put forward which demands financial support from the federal government following completion of the transaction?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, as the minister responded to that question yesterday, we are doing everything we can to assist PWA to come to a solution for its problems. We will continue to work with it as is necessary.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, next Tuesday the employees of Canadian Airlines International begin to contribute from their own pay cheques in the hope and belief that their government has a two airline policy.

Is it not the case that what the government sought and obtained for its $50 million is a gag order on PWA Corporation?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, the employees certainly have worked very hard in order to help their company survive. This is something that is important to the future of Canada as companies and employees work together. Their contribution toward keeping up survival of the airline is very important and our help toward the airline is also intended to help them survive.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The Auditor General has accused the Department of National Health and Welfare of contract splitting in which $5 million worth of contracts were awarded "with repeated disregard for the control and safeguard of public funds".

Quite apart from any other investigation, what is the President of the Treasury Board doing to restore confidence in the government tendering process?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I would like to tell the hon. member that the case to which he is referring is under investigation. I would rather not comment at this time.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I know about the criminal investigation. That is not what I was asking. I was asking what this minister was doing.

This is the second time in four days that departments are caught circumventing Treasury Board's contract regulations. Why are contracts awarded without tender? Why are contracts shared? Why are bills paid before the work is finished? Why?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the government has some very specific rules, and I must say the vast majority of managers abide by those rules. The government manages a budget of several hundred billion dollars, and the hon. member is talking about mistakes involving two or three million dollars. Incidentally, these cases are now being investigated.

AIRPORTS

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

The House knows the leasing arrangements between the Department of Transport and the small tenants at Canadian airports across Canada are archaic and unfair, and I believe border on the edge of theft.

I know the minister, along with myself, has received a number of requests to have these leasing arrangements brought forward and changed so that there would be a true business-like arrangement.

Maybe the minister could tell me if anything has been done to re-evaluate these leasing arrangements.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, I thank the member for his interest in this topic. I know he has been working on it, as has the member for Regina—Wascana.

I am pleased to say that as a result of some new factors represented primarily by the recently enacted Federal Real Property Act, the department is currently finalizing proposals for my consideration. A draft paper will be available by the end of the year. It will go out to all interested parties. We will then be able to sit down and get their input and I am sure we will be able to solve this problem.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport.

The Auditor General reported on search and rescue in Canada this past week and concluded there was a political opportunity to eliminate all search and rescue patrol vessels because they only save people 20 per cent of the time.

There is a very real danger in having bean counters from Ottawa making policy recommendations on the availability of life saving vehicles.

Does the minister support the Auditor General's analysis and the Coast Guard agreement to recommendation 8.57 to "decommission all search and rescue patrol vessels and discontinue all search and rescue patrols"?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): I am really surprised, Madam Speaker. One day opposition members are accusing us of discrediting the Auditor General and the next day they are saying the Auditor General has made a mistake in this particular recommendation. They cannot have it both ways.

As far as this particular issue is concerned it is a recommendation that has been brought forward, but what is first and foremost with this government is to ensure there is safety when it comes to search and rescue.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. On the northern B.C. coast we have two type 500 cutters, a couple of smaller craft and an F-61 helicopter, all Coast Guard. We have no Department of National Defence vessels or aircraft based north of Vancouver Island.

Will the minister assure the House that before any of our Pacific coast Coast Guard vessels or helicopters are cut from service in any way there will be full formal public consultation with all users in Prince Rupert, in Kitimat, on the Queen Charlotte islands, and in the coastal communities that are affected?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): It would be rather nice, Madam Speaker, if we had more helicopters that we could use on search and rescue.

Mr. Bosley: In his riding.

Mrs. Martin: Yes, as my colleague says, in the hon. member's riding.

Certainly we are very conscious of the need for search and rescue on the B.C. coast. We have always been conscious of that within the Coast Guard, and they do an excellent job on the west coast.

FUR INDUSTRY

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Callous, uncaring and insensitive mostly foreign financed animal rights campaigns have unfairly targeted what is left of the sealing and trapping livelihood of the Inuit peoples and the people of Newfoundland.

Is the minister prepared to protect the livelihood of these people by launching a counter ad campaign? Will he give financial support to the Indigenous Survival International to provide a public voice for aboriginal people to defend themselves?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, since 1987 the federal government has supported the fur strategy and Indigenous Survival International had been supported, as well as the Aboriginal Trappers Federation in Canada.

We have recently agreed to extend and renew the fur strategy. We are very conscious of the pending moratorium in 1995 in the European Community for countries that have not adopted humane trapping methods.

Trap research and the education of the Canadian trapping community as to how we would comply with these regulations are all devoted to encouraging an increase in opportunities for the marketing of furs, particularly those produced by indigenous peoples, in the European Community. I will be happy to learn of additional proposals such as the one the hon. member has advanced today.

• (1150)

Mrs. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister for International Trade. This has clearly become an international trade issue.

A full year has passed since the European Community passed its fur input regulation in November 1991. For Canadian wild fur exporters to meet the European Community's import requirements which come into effect in 1995, Canadian wildlife regulations must be in place before the 1994 fall trapping season begins.

Will the minister commit to renewed funding for the Fur Industry Defence Program so that Canada can remain in the forefront of international trapping research and technology?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, the Minister for International Trade was present a week ago at a meeting attended by ministers and some members of Parliament with representatives of the Canadian trapping industry, fur processing industry and exporters.

The minister is very well aware of the request the hon. member has made. As part of the federal government's fur strategy, all departments are looking at their financial resources with a view to ensuring that Canada is prepared to comply with those regulations. The Canadian fur industry will be the major beneficiary of our preparation to market furs trapped by humane methods.

VICTIMS OF CRIME

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, the Canadian Resource Centre for Victims of Crime held a press conference this week in this building.

Will the Minister of Justice, in the absence of the Solicitor General, tell the House why rank and file police officers across Canada have to fund this centre at $150,000 a year rather than governments? We are now spending about $6 billion a year on the criminal justice system.

While she is doing so, will she tell the House why the victims of violent crime, very often women and children, are the truly forgotten people in our criminal justice system?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, with regard to the hon. member's question about the funding of that particular centre, I am not in a position to answer it and will take it on notice for my colleague the Solicitor General.

However, the hon. member knows well that this government introduced legislation precisely to enhance the status of victims of crime in the trial procedure. My colleague, the Solicitor General, has recently brought in legislation to enhance the rights of victims of crime in the parole procedure.

I think this government has nothing to apologize for in our efforts to balance the process of criminal justice to make sure the interests of those who are the victims, and therefore the raison d'être for the trial and incarceration, are not forgotten in the process but are remembered as being those who bear with them forever the burden of those offences.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I wish the minister would go out and talk to her constituents. I think she would find that in the lower mainland of B.C. the fear of crime is now the major public issue in that part of Canada. It certainly is in Alberta as a result of some moronic decisions by the parole board and correction officials.

Mr. Hawkes: Question.

Mr. Kilgour: The new head of the victims centre told the press conference that the Government of Canada in its statement of defence to an action filed by parents of one of Mr. Gingras' murdered victims said that it had no duty of care to the victims.

Mr. Hawkes: Question.

Mr. Kilgour: The Whip, Madam Speaker—

Mr. Prud'homme: You are making them nervous. You are annoying the system.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Will the hon. member please put his question.

Mr. Kilgour: Does the Minister of Justice think that the parole board, the correction service, has a duty of care to the parents of murder victims when offenders are pre-released?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I think that question is an inappropriate one.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Why? One of your own colleagues asked the same question.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): That hon. member is a lawyer and she should know better as well.

I am sure my colleague, the Solicitor General, will be pleased to address the questions of the hon. member on the workings of those bodies. As to whether there is a duty of care or a legal liability, that is a matter before the courts and not something that I as Minister of Justice would comment on. It would be in fact an abuse of my position to do so.

KEMANO PROJECT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Recently released Fisheries and Oceans memos and letters point to political interference within the Department of Fisheries and Oceans over its decision to allow the controversial Alcan Kemano project to proceed without an environmental review.

The RCMP in British Columbia is now investigating the allegations in one of the memos that expert witness testimony was changed under pressure from supervisors within that department.

I have provided the government with copies of these documents. Will the minister speak to his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, and release the over 83,000 pages of information that are in the files of this department on this particular issue? Will he do that so the truth can come out about this particular issue?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the member is asking me to convey a question to my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I will be happy to do that.

He said he has conveyed the information to the government. I have not received information to that effect, but I will be happy to convey the question to him as he has requested.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I think it is pretty clear to people, certainly in northern British Columbia, that this government's failure to conduct a proper environmental assessment of the Kemano project makes a mockery of this government and this minister's so-called commitment to the environment under the green plan.

The Liberals opposed a public review of this project, and despite the Prime Minister's earlier promise of a review the government has done everything it can to block such an inquiry.

The B.C. government and the B.C. environment minister are currently reviewing its options for a public review of the project. Will the minister join today with the B.C. Minister of the Environment and announce a joint federal-provincial environmental assessment of this project?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the member refers to the existence of the green plan. The project he is referring to if I remember correctly—I do not have the file in front of me—started in the 1950s. The green plan started two years ago. I would be cautious in trying to make any link between them.

As the member will remember and you will recall, Madam Speaker, there was some court action on the issue of whether there should be an environmental assessment done through this project. The Federal Court of Appeals has recently rendered a decision to the effect that the legal requirements have been met in terms of the government's responsibilities.

The Government of British Columbia, I understand, has made some commitment during the provincial campaign that it would do a review. I imagine that it will be rendering a response on its own commitment soon.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Over the past year, the national capital region has lost hundreds of public servants, especially with the move of the National Energy Board to Calgary and the Farm Credit Corporation to Regina, in western Canada, and the opposition parties in this House concurred in this.

Recently we learned that the Minister of Finance would move some 200 federal public servants from the department of immigration to his home town, in order to restore his image and plummeting credibility—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member put his question?

Mr. Rocheleau: —with western voters.

Madam Speaker, my question is this: I ask the minister to account to the people and explain to the House on what rational economic basis this patronage decision was made by the government, given the huge costs involved in such moves.

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, since it is a specific question concerning immigration, I would reassure our colleague and assure the House that the decision was made in the context of Bill C-86, where we decided to make management more efficient. This decision will save us $6.5 million a year and improve the efficiency of our processing.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport.

In spite of assurances given to me in the House on June 12, the work force of the Canadian Coast Guard in Prescott has been reduced approximately 20 per cent. That is 20 per cent of the work force of the biggest employer in Prescott.

Can the minister assure me that there will be no further cuts or transfers in such areas as the shops, the helicopter services and all those other services working for the Coast Guard out of the town of Prescott, and can the remaining employees at Prescott feel that their jobs are now secure?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, there have been changes made at Prescott and there has been a lot of discussion with the employees there.

I can assure the hon. member that at the current time there are no plans to remove the manufacturing or the maintenance facility at Prescott.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is for the government House leader.

In the last throne speech the government promised to increase the time allotted to Private Members' Business. It also promised to increase the number of votable items allowed. Other than confirming recommendations already in place which were put forward by the privileges and elections committee and tinkering with the draw system, nothing has happened.

Will the government bring forward these reforms?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, virtually the first thing the Prime Minister did after the election in 1984 was appoint the McGrath commission, which brought forward extensive recommendations for changes, most of which have been implemented.

In my first 12 years in opposition there was only one private member's bill ever passed. Since 1984 there have been private members' bills passed on numerous occasions.

Committees have the right to set their own references which they never had prior to 1984. They have extensive budgets. The amount of authority given to private members to pursue interests on behalf of their constituents is orders of magnitude more than it used to be. Of course we are always looking for ways to improve things even further.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION ACT

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-379, an act to amend the Canadian Environmental Protection Act (phosphorus concentrations in laundry detergents).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. MacWilliam: Madam Speaker, among the most serious causes of pollution are laundry detergents containing high levels of phosphate. Most of the detergents sold in Canada are used in the home and detergent rich sewage is a major source of phosphate pollution in our lakes and rivers.

The Canadian Environmental Protection Act currently sets the maximum phosphorus content of laundry detergents sold in Canada at 5 per cent expressed as phosphorus pentoxide or 2.2 per cent expressed elemental phosphorus. This level, which is set by cabinet and not laid out in the legislation, is too high and must be reduced.

My private member's bill amends the Canadian Environmental Protection Act and dramatically lowers limits for phosphate content currently in place.

Based on similar legislation in the state of Ohio, the bill would prohibit the sale of laundry detergents whose phosphate content exceeds 1.14 per cent by weight expressed as phosphorus pentoxide or 0.5 per cent by weight expressed as elemental phosphorus.

The bill is a major step toward the preservation of our fragile environment through the reduction and eventual elimination of excess phosphorus from our inland and coastal waters.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. MacWilliam moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

Motion agreed to.

CONCURRENCE IN 56TH REPORT OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, if the House gives its consent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West, that the 56th report of the Standing Committee on House Management presented to the House earlier this day be concurred in.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would move:

That, in relation to the 55th and 56th reports on the Standing Committee on House Management presented to the House and concurred in earlier this day, and not withstanding any special or Standing Order of the practice of the House or its standing or standing joint committee, the incumbent chairmen and vice-chairmen of the standing and standing joint committees, except for the Standing Committee on Transport, shall continue in office until the committee concerned shall otherwise order;

Provided that those standing or standing joint committees whose chairmen or vice-chairmen cease to be members of the committee as a result of the concurrence in the said report, shall proceed to the election of a new chairman as their first order of business and such vice-chairmen as the committee deems necessary.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

PROUD TO BE CANADIAN

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present a petition signed by the members of the Kinsmen and the Kinettes Clubs of Sarnia. This petition has been certified correct in form and content by the clerk of petitions.

These constituents give their support for the Proud to be Canadian project. This project is a worthwhile opportunity to nurture a positive lifelong relationship for their heritage and our flag and to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles and to promote pride in being Canadian.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I have a petition here to promote pride in being Canadian signed by individuals from communities in Glace Bay Reserve, Dominion, Donkin and throughout Sydney River, Sydney and other parts of Cape Breton.

The Kinsmen and Kinettes Clubs of Canada have created an opportunity for all Canadians to participate in the Proud to be Canadian project during the celebration of the 125th anniversary of Confederation.

The petitioners hereby support the Proud to be Canadian project as an opportunity to nurture a positive lifelong relationship with our heritage and our flag, to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

AIRPORTS

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a number of copies of a petition this morning from citizens in my constituency who are concerned that the Department of Transport may amend its present airport policy which has insulated the citizens of Calgary North from the noise generated by the airports since 1986.

They therefore petition and request that Parliament urge the Department of Transport to maintain the present airport policy regarding run number 28 which requires that all departing flights make a 15 degree turn to the north.

I might add that I am aware that the department has been working actively on this file and that the solution to the problem is near.

THE CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I have four sets of petitions from my constituents and others to present to Parliament, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first set is a request that Parliament amend or remove from the Criminal Code section 462.2 so that the freedom of Canadians to discuss and consider the possible beneficial uses of hemp and other substances is in no way inhibited or prevented by the provisions of the code.

BILL C-55

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, the second set of petitions deals with an issue that was in one form before Parliament earlier; namely, the question of the pension credits splitting for the divorce spouses of federal employees of various kinds.

Some of the issues that the petitioners were concerned about were not fully dealt with in Bill C-55. This petition is therefore helpful and relevant to the House.

THE REFERENDUM

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, finally I have a set of petitions which is dated but this is the first opportunity I have had to present it to the House. It deals with the infamous referendum.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, poverty among children inhibits learning and preparation for employment constituting a cost to future national productivity. That is why we need sound national financial management that prevents poverty.

I join with my constituents today in introducing this petition in the House of Commons, calling on the government to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of child poverty by the year 2000.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions again to present. These petitions come from individuals throughout my riding. In looking through some of the petitions there are signatories all the way from Victoria to Edmonton, Calgary and Red Deer.

These petitioners are very concerned about the proposal by Multinational Resources Limited to divert a portion of the flow of the North Thompson River and to export that water out of Canada and into the California market. They have asked the government to state categorically that it will not permit Canada's freshwater rivers to be dammed and diverted into the U.S.A. and to state that our Canadian waters are not for sale.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I have two sets of petitions to present. One is backdated to June and this is the first opportunity to present it. It is signed by 100 persons from the Nepean–Ottawa area.

They are indicating their concern for the human rights of all people in the world which cannot be ignored. The carnage continues, they say, in the Punjab, in China and in many other areas of the world.

These petitioners urge the Government of Canada to express its disapproval to the Indian government of the continuing human rights violations in the Punjab.

The second petition is of a similar nature. The petitioners feel that Kashmiri people have a consistent pattern under India's illegal occupation.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to condemn the crimes against humanity in Jammu and the Kashmir and demand that the Red Cross be given access to those two provinces to provide the badly needed food and medicine that they require.

CRTC

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, these petitioners want the Parliament of Canada to ensure that the CRTC controls the use of foul and inappropriate language on radio and television. They believe that some of the things that are broadcast on radio and television really counteract the efforts of the family and they point out that foul language is not necessary to entertain.

The petitioners are also very insightful because they underline that the use of certain language is a form of abuse and there is additional need to be sensitive in our society today with regard to abuse in general.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): I have some other petitioners who ask how one increases competitiveness, productivity, and how one ensures that more people are involved in the democratic process. They point out that by removing the goods and services tax on books and reading materials we would increase additional literacy, additional productivity, additional competitiveness.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, if Questions Nos. 304 and 369 could be made Orders for Return, these returns would be tabled immediately.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Questions Nos. 304 and 369 be deemed to have been made orders for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Question No. 304—Mr. Marchi:

For (a) the period of November and December 1988 (b) 1989 (c) 1990 (d) 1991 (e) 1992 to date, have any departments or agencies spent money or provided grants in the constituency of York West and, if so, in each case (i) by which department or agency (ii) in what amounts (iii) under which categories and programs was the money spent?

Return tabled.

Question No. 369—Mr. Robinson:

For each year since November 1988, have any departments or agencies spent money or provided grants in the constituency of Burnaby–Kingsway and, if so, (a) by which department or agency (b) in what amounts (c) under which categories and programs was the money spent?

Return tabled.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Edwards: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary who gave an undertaking yesterday to confer with the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship would be in a position to provide an answer today as to when the minister will live up to the provisions of the Standing Order and submit a comprehensive report after the standing committee had given the minister a number of days to prepare. The parliamentary secretary was kind enough yesterday to suggest that he would get back to the House as soon as possible. A reasonable period of time has now elapsed and I wonder if he could provide us with an answer today.

• (1220)

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the assiduousness and the application to duty of my hon. friend.

I did have an opportunity to have a chat with the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and I am informed that he has been in communication with the Clerk of the House in connection with the response to the report. I am prepared to table his letter to the Clerk, if that would be helpful. The gist of the response is that the minister says:

"Let me first emphasize that the government recognizes its duty to respond to this report and certainly shares the committee's objectives. However, as you know, any response must be approved by cabinet and during the referendum period no cabinet committee meetings were held. We have, therefore, been faced with an unavoidable timing problem.

You have my assurances that a response to the standing committee's report will be tabled in the House of Commons as expeditiously as possible.

Thank you for your co-operation in this regard."

Further to that, the minister has been in touch with the chairman of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, the hon. member for Oxford, and has indicated further that the cabinet committee which was seized of the matter, the cabinet committee on human resources, social and legal affairs, held a meeting on November 23. While the response was on the agenda to be dealt with, it was unfortunately deferred to the committee's next meeting which is currently scheduled for Monday next, November 30.

The minister assures me, and I am sure he would want to assure the hon. member opposite, that he is doing his utmost to get the response into the House. I believe that there may be two cabinet committees that need to deal with the response. I can assure my hon. friend that my commitment remains intact; I will stay seized of this brief and report to him on a regular basis, as I am sure he would like to have happen.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I am overwhelmed both by the eloquence and by the comments of the parliamentary secretary. I hope that he will table the letter which he has referred to so that members can see what the minister has written, if he would be kind enough to do that.

However, I still give notice to the Chair that this is a procedure which is very unusual, and to forewarn the Chair that there may be members rising on a point of privilege in due course to debate this.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I am happy to table the two letters involved. I would counsel my hon. friend opposite to contain his vessel because the response will be forthcoming.

PUBLIC SERVICE REFORM ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, be now read a third time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We resume debate. The hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester has nine minutes left to complete his speech.

[English]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I would like to conclude my speech on Bill C-26 by noting the words of Barbara Wade Carroll, a professor at McMaster University and an expert in the field of public administration. She states:

> It is a clear tenet of organizational theory and management that the way to achieve organizational changes is by changing it not from the top but at the top; yet, neither Public Service 2000 nor Bill C-26 addressed the need for such change except to the degree to which they provide two central agencies, the Treasury Board and the Privy Council Office with greater control over departments.

[Translation]

The best example given by the government of this tops-down approach to change is its contemptuous attitude to the legislative process during the consideration of this bill. On many occasions, the Conservative majority on the legislative committee imposed unrealistic time limits for the consideration of clauses and amendments proposed by the opposition. This combined with the many time limits imposed in the House by the government, turned the debate into a joke. One might even say that this so-called democratic debate turned into a cynical monologue on the part of the Conservatives.

In spite of the marked opposition to Bill C-26 displayed by the vast majority of the 18 witnesses that appeared before the legislative committee, and in spite of the 85 amendments tabled by the Liberal Party, the government thought it better to shut its eyes and its ears and go ahead with this shameful legislation. I must conclude that the Conservative members did not have the courage to face their conscience. This is unfortunate because if the government had shown a better attitude and had taken this bill a little more seriously, we could have restructured our public service in a positive fashion, so that it would have been able to face the great challenges ahead. We need a Liberal government for this change, which everybody has been anxiously waiting for.

[English]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak to Bill C-26 on behalf of our party, and in particular in the place of the member for Mission—Coquitlam who is unavoidably absent today. She wished she could have been here. She has fought a strong and good fight on this bill since it was first introduced and will be here to see it through at the end.

I am also pleased to rise because in my constituency and area of Victoria, perhaps to the surprise of many, even in Victoria, the federal government is the largest single employer. We are a provincial capital, yet the federal government number of employees is larger than that employed by the provincial government in Victoria and of any other employer in the area.

Bill C-26 purports to deal with the needs and requirements of the Public Service. It is a long bill, 108 clauses, and it amends the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada.

The bill purports to implement Public Service 2000, a project which was born of the desire to improve the efficiency and operations of the federal Public Service. The project began with high hopes. There was widespread agreement that it was important to try to improve the workings and operation of the Public Service of this country, notwithstanding the fact that we all agree that Canada has an excellent Public Service.

However there were problems, problems of morale, problems of hardening of the arteries in management style and management approaches, a glass ceiling for too many women in the Public Service, a reluctance of public service managers to effectively manage.

• (1230)

Unfortunately the process that has lead to this bill has gone askew. The result is a setback for the objective of efficiency in our Public Service. It is important to understand that this bill is developed in the context of a government that has been seeking as a matter of public policy to destroy the Public Service. Certainly the government must be assumed to intend the consequences of its acts, and the consequences of its administration of the Public Service is sad to behold.

We saw the Public Service strike. We saw the refusal to proceed and the continuing refusal to proceed with pay equity. Most important, we see continuing cutbacks in vital public services that put real pressure on those who are in the front lines of public service in this country.

All of us as members of Parliament deal with federal public servants in our area, and those public servants for most of us are invariably women and men of quality and dedication. Those of us who were just elected in 1988 have seen in just that short period of time the continuing deterioration of public service morale, ultimately at the expense of public service to the people of Canada.

We see that as a deliberate move of this government, capped just the other day by the totally cynical move of putting the new immigration facility as far away from the centres of population as it could find, Vegreville, Alberta, the home of the Deputy Prime Minister. It is the grotesque pork barrel and a final nail into any conceivable reputation this government had for its caring for the public servants in this country.

Instead of dealing with the puffed up bureaucracy in the Department of National Defence and the visions of grandeur that they have had for helicopters and other equipment, totally outdated already as a result of the end of the cold war, we see the government trying to save money on the backs of the public servants. Even at the upper levels, the government has gone after civil servants rather than take the heat itself for decisions for which it ought to be responsible.

A close examination of this bill reveals the fundamental fact that this government knows nothing about labour relations. It has no concept of the proper approach as an employer, particularly in a large institution such as the Public Service of Canada, to bringing out the best in its public servants, getting the most efficient return for the dollar spent because of a good management style in labour relations.

Just a few weeks ago, the International Labour Organization responded to complaints made by our public sector unions about the collective bargaining tactics of the government. The ILO recommended that this government stop its use of back to work legislation and implement a collective bargaining structure that more closely follows the norm in the private sector.

I submit that this bill, just as the back to work legislation of a year ago, finds the government incapable of understanding the distinction between its responsibilities as an employer and its responsibilities to introduce legislation in this House on behalf of all of the people of Canada.

What it has done is give to itself through its majority in this House, as manager, tools which no other unionized employer in the public or private sector in this country has available. Those tools will be used, mark my words, by managers in the Public Service to discriminate against fellow workers, to undermine public efficiency and to destroy morale in the Public Service of Canada further.

Let us just look at the key provisions of this bill. First, the bill will give Treasury Board the authority to determine bargaining units unilaterally. Everywhere else an employer who wishes to propose a change in bargaining units has to go to a labour relations board or some other similar body. An independent third party responsible to the legislature or to Parliament for the fair and proper administration of labour relations is given the responsibility to decide, not the employer, on what are the appropriate bargaining units. This bill violates that simple principle.

Second, the bill gives to Treasury Board the unilateral power to define classification, an absolutely unheard of right in any other sector and one which will undermine the continuing morale problems in the Public Service.

Third, the bill gives to managers the right to deploy, or to transfer more precisely at the discretion of the managers, employees at the same level. This has a facile attractiveness, particularly to any business manager who wants to be able to pick and choose who she or he wishes to move around. In any large institution there must be a scheme that ensures merit is at the heart of the principle of shifts and moves, and further that employees have an opportunity through the collective bargaining process to have some say in the classification system that affects them, in particular the system of transference within their work place.

Transfer within the work place is of vital importance to the individuals involved. It affects promotion. It affects a sense of well-being in the work place that is crucial for an efficient employee. This bill opens up the door to managers having the unguarded right to move their favourites into jobs at the expense of those who are best qualified for those jobs, and this can be done without review.

Hugh Winsor in The Globe and Mail earlier this year said that this clause "opens a loophole that will give civil service managers a major new opportunity to play favourites and dispense their own form of patronage". If for some reason they are not fans of Mr. Winsor, how about John Edwards, head of the Public Service 2000 exercise, who said: "Bill C-26 gives managers the authority to appoint and bypass the system"?

Representatives from the vast majority of workers appeared before the committee and condemned this addition as an attack on the merit principle in the Public Service of Canada. Those included the Public Service Alliance of Canada, the Professional Institute of the Public Service and the Economists, Sociologists and Statisticians Association, ESSA.

This is not all. The bill further provides the government with the ability to eliminate jobs in the public sector through contracting out. There is already a huge problem in our Public Service through the government's use of contracting out. Through this bill it will be able to do it even more easily. Again there is a superficial sense that this will help us manage. However, as a result of the way the government has operated two things have happened. Billions of dollars have been spent for which there has been no proper accounting. Over $5 billion a year is spent on contracting out and there is no proper accounting for this expenditure. The government has either been unable or unwilling to come forward with any fiscal rationale for contracting out.

We all know that government has not used contracting out to deal with the purchase of very specialized services for short periods of time, a legitimate use of contracting out, but rather as a way of controlling the employees terms and conditions outside the collective agreement and the legislation that afford them rights. For example, this provision is an attack on the fundamental rights of workers of the Government of Canada.

Contracted out employees are completely at the mercy of the government. Most of them have no rights to pension plans or other things. They have no right of security. They have no right to appeal promotions. Yet, more and more the government is reverting to this, I would say, virtually illegal but certainly immoral use of contracting out. With this bill it now wants to extend it.

Finally, the bill excludes Treasury Board staff from the collective bargaining process, again in violation of the legal rights of those employees. The government is going to use its majority in this sovereign Parliament to take away from Treasury Board staff that which the charter purports to give them: the right and freedom of association. That right goes back to the early years of this century. It has been enunciated over and over again that workers have the right to decide whether or not they wish to be associated together for purposes of collective bargaining. Over the years legislatures and parliaments have provided the systems for achieving that right. It leaves the choice of whether they want a union and want to bargain collectively with the employees.

This bill takes that right away. It does not leave it to the Public Service Staff Relations Board or other similar bodies to decide what is appropriate in the circumstance, to balance the rights of the employer to have some employees excluded from the bargaining units, or for example requirements of confidentiality and so forth, legitimate reasons for exclusion, against the rights of the employees to bargain collectively and to be free from the domination of their employer as to their terms of employment.

This is a fairly bad bill. It has skewed the original promise of Public Service 2000 to make our Public Service more efficient. It has done so at the expense of the rights of those who work for the people of Canada. We have an outstanding Public Service. A vital Public Service is important and vital to the quality of life in our country. The time has come for the government to stop dumping on its servants for political gain and using its power as government to abuse the rights and position of its employees.

This bill should be defeated, not proceeded with. We have to go back to the drawing-board in a process which properly and thoroughly involves consultation with the Public Service to build an even better Public Service in Canada.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his address. I feel as he does that a number of features are potentially very positive but they are outweighed by some of the negative elements.

I would have liked to have seen the whole question of employment equity addressed, appeals processes, merit principle, deployment, term employment and contracting out, as well as people who have been excluded from bargaining. Unfortunately that is not the case.

I feel very badly as well that too often the Public Service is used as a scapegoat by government. It is an appealing target because of the misinformation out there about the excellence of the Public Service. Let us not forget it carries out the orders it is given by elected politicians.

Perhaps my colleague would comment on the following two points. It seems to me there has not been sufficient consultation and perhaps there were some suggestions as to what might have been done. This is a massive set of changes that will have major implications for now and in the future.

Second, it would appear to me as well that the timing of this legislation is not good. We are not without knowing that there is some friction and conflict between government and the Public Service. That is the result, some people would say, of bargaining in bad faith, tough bargaining, or being insensitive to workers, as well as dumping on those workers.

Would my colleague indicate to me what he might like to have seen in terms of additional consultations? Would he care to comment as well on whether or not the timing was as sensitive as it might have been in view of the context within which we find ourselves?

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, I thank my friend for the question.

My understanding is that there was quite an uneven amount of consultation on this bill, particularly on Public Service 2000. Originally the idea was to have thorough consultation with the employees up and down through the whole system. In some departments that probably happened but in others it did not. Slowly over the process the confidence of the employees and their representatives began ebbing about what were the government's intentions.

My thesis, as I tried to express in my speech, was that what may have been a very valuable and important idea at the outset ran into trouble. It ran into trouble because in the higher echelons particularly in Treasury Board the interest was in giving Treasury Board managers tools to do what they wanted to do, often without regard to the rights, the attitudes and the position of employees.

That simply is outdated management. That is not a management that will produce efficiency because it undermines morale. In this day and age morale is the starting point for a highly efficient Public Service.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I am honoured to rise in debate on this issue today, especially since in my former life before coming to this place I was very much involved in employee relations, the need for employees and management to work in good faith with each other and on better terms.

Anyone who has been following the real world over the last two decades recognizes that this has become a major factor in all parts of the world, not just in Canada but in the United States, Britain and throughout Europe.

The bill we are looking at today, Bill C–26, represents the first significant change to the Public Service employment legislation in more than 25 years and as such it is long overdue.

I would like to talk today about one of the key features of Bill C–26 that was raised by the previous speaker, that is deployment. Before doing so I would like to spend a few minutes to set the scene to provide the context in which we developed the proposals we are debating today.

• (1250)

Madam Speaker, I do not need to remind you that the world has changed considerably since 1967 when the current Public Service employment legislation was introduced. At that time when the public asked for more services they were generally provided. The Public Service experienced tremendous growth, exponential growth, as new employees were added, but times have changed.

We are no longer able to add these new programs and hire hundreds of new employees to service them. We have had to and we still have to learn to maximize our resources, to get the most value from our dollar, to be more efficient and indeed more productive. To use the oft–repeated phrase, we have do to more with less.

That is the reality that not only our Public Service managers face today, but also all of the employees within the Public Service. We have to give them the tools that will allow them the ability to meet that challenge.

Managers in the Public Service will tell you and so will many of the employees that the staffing system is complex, cumbersome and time consuming. They will tell you there has been far too much emphasis on process, on faithfully following the prescribed steps on filling in the necessary forms. Managers will tell you, as they have told the Auditor General, that the staffing system as it currently operates is a serious impediment to effective management of the Public Service.

There is another very important factor. That is the need and the aspirations of the Public Service employees themselves. Public servants understand full well that the opportunities for advancement are more limited than in former years. However, they want the opportunities to learn new skills, to try out different functions, to meet new colleagues and clients. They want to be stimulated and motivated by new challenges and ideas.

We need to provide them with the flexibility to access these opportunities. This is not only so the employees can fulfil their own aspirations, but also because we recognize that employees who have a wider range of skills and abilities are more adaptable and more able to meet the challenging needs.

Our employees have tremendous potential, potential that in far too many cases has gone untapped. It will benefit all Canadians to unleash that potential.

In Bill C–26 we have tried to provide a reasonable balance between the need for greater efficiency and flexibility in our systems, to respond better to the needs of the public and to the legitimate aspirations and interests of our employee to develop their knowledge and skills so that they can continue to enjoy challenging careers. This is the context in which we developed our proposals for deployment.

It is important that we all understand just what the term "deployment" means. We are speaking effectively of lateral moves or transfers between jobs at the same level with no promotion, similar terms and conditions of work, and little or no change of salary.

The concept of deployment is not new. Such moves, generally called transfers in the past, have occurred and still occur today. What is being proposed is not then totally new but there are some important distinctions between deployments and transfers and that is where the discussion has taken place.

Deployments will be made under the direct authority of deputy ministers rather than as transfers are by the Public Service Commission itself or by managers under delegation from the commission.

This change recognizes that deputy ministers need the ability to deploy their employees to jobs or duties where they are required and when they are required. Let me repeat though that we are not talking about promotion. We are talking about a clerk at level four working in one division being moved to a clerk level four position in another division. It could be because of a challenging situation there or a change in workload.

We are talking about an engineer whose work on one project has been completed and who is now ready to move on to another. We could be talking about a lab technician who is assigned to a new higher priority research project.

Deputy heads need the authority which is available to most managers in most organizations to move employees in that way without going through a time-consuming competitive process.

In all the cases I have mentioned, the employees have been recruited or promoted to their current levels by the Public Service Commission which has found them to be completely qualified. In most cases, they have competed against a number of other candidates and have been found to be the best qualified. Little would be gained by requiring a complete re-examination of their qualifications every time they are moved to similar level jobs.

In our view, the merit principle is not compromised by deployments. Let me assure you that the merit principle will continue to apply on recruitment to and promotion within the Public Service. There is a misconception that this is not the case and I want to lay those fears to rest.

Deployments will require the expressed consent of the employee being deployed. This requirement will not only protect employees from arbitrary and unreasonable moves, but it will also give the employees and their managers the context in which to identify mutually satisfactory career moves.

There will be some instances where employees will be asked when they initially accept a job in the Public Service to accept the possibility that they may be deployed from time to time. I think it can be appreciated that this is required in certain occupations such as in the foreign service where the very nature of the job requires that employees be willing to be deployed.

In the cases which we expect to be exceptional, employees will know up front when they accept a job what the conditions are and what they can accept or reject on that basis.

Because deployments will not be treated as appointments as are recruitment and promotion, many of the procedural requirements of the current Public Service Employment Act will not apply. There will not, for example, be a requirement to conduct competitions to select employees for deployment, to solicit applications, or to establish eligibility lists.

That does not mean that the government in its role as employer will not provide adequate protection to Public Service managers on how deployment is to be managed. Policy directions and guidance will be provided.

Throughout the committee hearings and other discussions on deployment, many parties expressed the fear that managers would use deployment as a way to favour some employees and punish others. Although they profess to believe that the instances of abuse would be minimal, their proposed solution suggests that they have very little regard for Public Service managers.

In fact, the previous speaker tended to make the same implication. Somehow or other some people believe that public servants change after they cease to become employees and enter the management ranks. They do not. They still have the best interests of their colleagues and of the public at large at heart.

Many of the people who have questioned this process have suggested the solution to the anticipated problem they think is there is to provide all sorts of procedural prescriptions in law to tie the hands of all managers. They tie those hands so tightly that in fact they would be worse off today under the new legislation or under the recommendations than they have been in the past.

I have more confidence in the management's judgment and integrity. The Public Service management has had years of credibility behind it and it will not change. It has proven itself time and again to be committed to its employees and to the public which it serves.

Of course, there will be some poor deployment decisions. In an organization where thousands of such decisions are made every year, this is inevitable and we have to accept that. However, the solution is not to punish the vast majority of competent managers for the sins of the few. The solution is to ensure that the managers understand what is expected of them, to give them the tools needed to get the job done and then to hold them accountable. Managers who abuse their authority should be dealt with as needed. This is the approach that has been taken.

We have provided employees with the right of recourse on deployment decisions that affect them. If an employee believes that a deployment was improperly made or constituted an abuse of authority, he or she will seek a review of the deployment decision by their deputy minister. The deputy minister has the authority to review the decision and to take appropriate action to resolve any problem which may have arisen.

If the employee is still not satisfied, he or she may approach the Public Service Commission which will conduct an independent investigation. In the final instance it can require the deputy minister to take appropriate corrective action.

This recourse process is also available to employees who believe that they have been forced to give their consent to deployment.

We believe the approach to deployment that I have described meets the needs of all parties. Managers will have the scope required to meet their needs, but the legitimate interests of the employees will be protected.

In summary, deployment will be an important staffing tool which will enable Public Service managers to respond quickly to changing priorities and the needs of the public. At the same time, it will provide employees with fresh opportunities to learn new skills, try out different activities and explore career options.

We are confident that deployment will be managed well in the interests of all parties and above all to the benefit of Canadians through improved service delivery.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the member for Cariboo—Chilcotin for his comments. He addressed one very narrow part of the bill, but an important one. He gave us the government's position vis-à-vis deployment, or what we used to know as lateral transfers or lateral moves.

Bill C-26, if I understand it properly, will allow managers to move employees to any other position within a level to any other location or any other department without regard to merit or other employees' concerns, or for that matter to other employees who may be equally or better qualified on that same classification level.

Employees will have no right to appeal or recourse. The Public Service Commission will have no authority to exercise its responsibility to safeguard the merit principle. Employees fear this managerial discretion will lead to harassment, favouritism and further barriers to employment equity.

We all know the new classification system will group many more layered employees into one level. There will be a kind of homogeneous rearrangement made allowing managers to effectively make promotions and demotions without regard to merit through competition.

Employees will have no recourse to impartial review of deployment decisions. Deployment is theoretically voluntary but the bill contains no safeguards against arguments to be deployed becoming part of the standard conditions of employment.

The deployment measures do not include any provisions for accountability. It was a major concern of the public accounts committee, which I chair. In our report to Parliament we said so.

The Liberal Party, of which I am a member, proposed 13 amendments in committee to address the most serious concerns expressed by public servants over deployment. In our view, those amendments had they been accepted, would have improved and would have offered redress mechanisms for deployment.

It would have protected the merit principle and, in my view in all honesty and with all due respect to government members, improved accountability.

Why is the government so hard nosed, so difficult on this issue when it knows that these amendments, if they had been at least considered and accepted, would have addressed the issue of deployment and possibly made it a better bill?

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I think you can see the balancing act that is required whether you are dealing with the Public Service or free enterprise.

When you are attempting to bring a higher motivated work force to the task in this day and age, it requires the need for managers to have more flexibility. It requires that they be able to make decisions. It requires that employees be able to respond to situations without the tedious process that they now have.

There is the other side. There is the balancing, the potential abuse that the member refers to. He mentioned that we have not had a chance to go through a merit exam for each of these lateral moves. That is not necessary. He would have to agree that the employees that have arrived at a certain level have demonstrated their competence. They have shown that they have the merit to be at that level. I do not think that he would suggest that they have to reprove that every time they want to make a minor change in their position.

He indicated that the person could be required to move not only his position but possibly a change of location and even a change of department. My understanding of the bill is that this is correct. I also indicate that it is balanced with the expressed consent of the employee. In many cases it is in the employee's best interest that he be allowed the opportunity to take on a new position within the same level in a new different location or in fact in a different department.

The other point he raised which has to be corrected is that this cannot be done without the employee's consent. Second, the appeal process is there. The employee can appeal through the department. He has an alternate appeal if the answer is not satisfactory.

I maintain that although there is a balancing act being attempted here, and it must be attempted if we are going to deal with this problem realistically, it has been handled well. In fact a good balance will give the advantages to the employee to take advantage of new and motivationally interesting assignments and also for the manager to better deploy the resources within the department to meet the Public Service needs.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, to follow up on my discussion with the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin, I believe his comments are, in a certain context, accurate, except each civil servant must voluntarily—and that is in theory—accept a lateral transfer.

[English]

My only concern regarding the member's comments with regard to deployment is that indeed there is a voluntary connotation but it is theoretical up to a certain extent. It only applies to employees who are being deployed, not for others who are being affected. That was the point I was trying to make.

• (1310)

The bill contains absolutely no safeguards against agreements to be deployed becoming part of a standard condition of employment. I also want to remind my hon. friend from Cariboo–Chilcotin that the Federal Court of Canada in January of this year struck down the Order in Council giving deputy ministers the freedom to transfer any employee. In their view, and I quote from the court's decision: "This departs substantially from the merit principle". Is it me, is it the Liberal Party saying this? No, it is a judge. The judge said further regarding one of the government's arguments that to accept that position: "I would be defeating the whole purpose of the Public Service Employment Act, which is to ensure that appointments to the Public Service are made on the basis of merit". Therefore, I rest my case on that point. I was trying to make the point that employees are concerned. I think I have made that case and the argument will rest there for now.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, to go back to the legislation under review, namely the third reading of Bill C–26, according to its authors, the very purpose of Public Service 2000 and this bill which flows from, it is to improve the credibility of the government and to give more importance to service to the public.

What this legislation should do is streamline a public service that has become too complex and administratively cumbersome, and that is demoralized by downsizing, privatizing and contracting out policies.

The quality of services and the accuracy of information provided by civil servants play an important role in how Canadians perceive their form of government.

Does Bill C–26 fulfill the expectations of Canadians who want to have an efficient, effective and responsible public service once and for all?

[English]

My colleagues and I have some serious concerns about this bill. We said so at second reading, we said so in committee and at this stage of the bill we are going to repeat some of the concerns we have had because we know we are speaking for the majority of public servants and we also know that this process is flawed. If only the government had consulted more widely with public servants, the opposition and, most important, had seriously considered our suggestions, perhaps we would be here today hailing this proposed legislation as progressive, even ground–breaking. We are not. We are going to vote against this bill

An hon. member: With joy.

Mr. Gauthier: I am not going to say with joy. I would say with sadness because I was really hoping that after all these years we would come to grips with a reasonably good reform of the Public Service. This government favours confrontation and threats as an effective way to manage the Public Service of Canada while at the same time talking grandly about so–called Public Service reform. It is no surprise that many public servants are sceptical about Public Service 2000.

The need for reform is obvious but it is essential to ensure that reforms are made in the right direction in the right way, taking into consideration the context as well as the impact on employees and on their work. When this bill came before the House for second reading, we found ourselves urging the government to reconsider certain serious flaws. Today I am still deeply concerned about the undermining of the merit principle which will further lower morale within the Public Service of Canada and will do little, in my view, to improve the image of public servants among Canadians.

When the merit principle is not strictly applied, there is clearly a risk of patronage and favouritism. Furthermore, this bill does not address the urgent issue of accountability. The Conservative government proudly proclaims the extent of its contracting out as a way to save taxpayers' money. Contracting out means that the function within the Public Service is given to the private sector to do. Yet in many cases no accountability mechanisms are in place to determine whether there are any real savings with contracting out. As well, increasing flexibility for managers is not compensated, in our view, with mechanisms for increased accountability.

My hon. colleagues and I have done our best to try to convince the government to adopt certain amendments that we felt would improve and strengthen this legislation and the working conditions of the Public Service, one of the best in the world. The Public Service of Canada is known throughout the world as one of the most efficient public services.

The government did indeed listen to us on a very few points. The Liberal critic on the Public Service was successful in convincing the government to give Treasury Board, the employer, the same obligations as other employers, including the elimination of discriminatory practices, tabling of an annual progress report, and improving job promotion opportunities for the groups designated as the employment equity group or those who fall under the Employment Equity Act.

In virtually every other area that my Liberal colleagues and I proposed changes, and I did propose some changes, the government turned us down, defeated the amendments at every stage of study of the bill.

Amendments proposed by the Liberal caucus and defeated by the Conservative government touched upon the following: We wanted to give Public Service Commission members a clear mandate to investigate complaints of harassment and abuse of authority. We thought this was appropriate. The Public Service Commission should be the watch–dog over this very important field.

We wanted to protect the use of the merit principle, the merit principle being very important, which will be virtually destroyed by Bill C–26. We wanted to reinstate the current definition of an eligibility list because Bill C–26 would undermine the purpose of the eligibility list and let regulations used to determine how the lists would be made and applied, once again exposing the system to patronage.

We asked for deletion of clauses in this bill which restrict the right of an employee to appeal an appointment. We wanted to ensure that the Public Service Commission would be obliged to review appointments. We wanted to make sure these appointments were done properly. Without this review, there is no way of knowing that patronage and favouritism have not invaded the Public Service of Canada. I say it again: accountability does not exist at this time.

One amendment of the Liberals addressed the mistreatment of term employees by having them covered by the work force adjustment policy. We believe that many employees are extended continuously, be they term employees or people who are employed to do certain jobs but with restricted time frames. We believe that many of these employees are being extended continuously a few months at a time but ending up after a while, sometimes after many years, having absolutely no rights as employees, including the right to job security. Our amendment was to ensure that term employees would have the same rights as indeterminate employees which are full time.

In the case of deployment, and that was discussed with the member for Cariboo–Chilcotin a few minutes ago, we wanted to allow the same appeal process we proposed for appointments. We wanted to ensure that the merit principle as well as the need to provide services in both official languages applies to deployments. Again this was to ensure that managers would be accountable for their deployment decisions, accountable to somebody, accountable to this House and accountable to the people of Canada.

We proposed that complaints be addressed without undue delays, obliging the deputy minister to tell an employee within 90 days how the complaint was addressed and what measures had been taken. It is reasonable and it is good employee–employer relations.

We suggested changes to allow a person launching an appeal to have access to all the information the Public Service Commission uses in evaluating the appeal and that a person be given adequate notice of a hearing affecting their employment. This is only fair.

We proposed giving part–time employees bargaining rights and collective rights under the Public Service Employment Act and allowing unions or a group of employees to launch a grievance on behalf of employees. However, all of these proposals, based on the approach of providing a positive work environment, were flatly rejected by the government.

It is no wonder that during the Tory regime the Tory government, which has no respect for public servants, has seen the exodus of many talented individuals from the Public Service of Canada.

The Liberal critic on the Public Service, the member for Ottawa West, noted a few days ago in the House that the government had not even had the decency to make minor corrections to the bill which were, in our view, technically needed.

It is clear that the negative attitude and destructive politically expedient policies of this government have done far more damage to the Public Service of Canada than the reform process as currently envisioned could possibly repair.

A sea of change in government Public Service relations will be necessary. This change I submit will come only with the next election. We have had enough years with the current government to make it abundantly clear to public servants and to Canadians that public servants are at the bottom of the Tory priorities. The treatment of public servants during the past eight years has been unacceptable and it has been shameful. It is a time for change.

I submit that we can wake up our bureaucracies, that we can stimulate them by giving them the means to be accountable, by encouraging them to be committed and enthusiastic.

Taxpayers have a right to demand high performances from their government. They have a right to expect also that public servants and public funds be managed prudently, honestly, with integrity and with concern for equity, efficiency and effectiveness.

In my view the key to success is political will. Real political support is indispensable for implementing a new management model in the Canadian federal Public Service. Over the last 30 years there have been numerous attempts to reform the Public Service. If the Public Service were able to respond more effectively and efficiently to the needs of citizens, maybe the taxpayers would see public servants and politicians in a different light. If managers were able to get the best out of their resources while being openly accountable to Parliament and Canadians, I am sure that Canadians would have a less cynical view of government. That is what the challenge of Public Service reform is all about; accountability, efficiency and effectiveness.

However, public servants at this time are caught in a strait-jacket of rules and regulations which sometimes fosters managerial inefficiencies, and inefficiencies hamper bureaucratic innovation.

As chairman of the public accounts committee, I could go on for hours on end giving examples of managerial ineffectiveness. The Auditor General's report is full of them. Read it. It was tabled this week. It makes for heavy reading sometimes, but the case is there.

[Translation]

Public servants must be made accountable, and this must be done by introducing a new Public Service culture.

This new culture must instil concern for administrative efficiency, effectiveness and simplicity. From now on, the abiding concern must be performance, achieving goals and constantly improving services and customer satisfaction, as if it were their own business. Federal Public servants must have the freedom to act as if they were the owners. In fact, we all own these services. And just as the private entrepreneur will try to maximize profits while providing an efficient service to customers, the public servant has an obligation, as we see it, to offer his customers and major stockholders, the Canadian people, the best possible service at the lowest possible cost. To do this successfully, public servants must understand the two basic elements that should guide their performance: the organization's mission and its objectives.

I suggest we leave the responsibility for developing and determining policy objectives up to the politicians, to the members of this House, and that we leave good administration up to our public servants. However, we need certain criteria with respect to hiring policies and financial issues, to guarantee sound management free from any hint of favouritism or fraud. Merely delegating duties and tasks is not enough. However, if public servants are to strive towards optimum organizational performance, they must have the authorities to decide how to do that. We must rely on their judgment and trust their creative thinking.

This cannot be achieved, however, without more tolerance on the part of politicians for the mistakes and failures of public servants. The solution may be a concerted effort by politicians and public servants. It is undoubtedly a matter of mutual support and commitment.

The government proposes to make sweeping changes in human resources management. It intends to deregulate the bureaucracy to a certain extent and, I hope, give public servants the desire to do better.

No one can have any quarrel with these objectives. They are valid and they are praiseworthy. They are entirely in line with what I just said. Perhaps the reform proposed in Bill C-26 does not go far enough. The time has come to stimulate a public service that is demoralized and weighted down by constraints that restrict innovation.

[English]

We have had 30 years of discussions. We have a proposal in front of us which, in our view, is not satisfactory, not complete. We are not the only country looking at changes and reform; France, Australia, Great Britain and the United States are doing it.

I can tell the government, I can tell members of this House, that we may have to apprise ourselves of what is going on in other lands. I would hope that we would look around, because God knows we need some inspiration. We can do things better, we can improve the situation, we can get better services from our public servants only if we show confidence in their initiative, in their way of thinking, and we empower them to have this possibility of doing better and surpassing themselves.

I hope that we will come back to this subject in the near future, because this bill is flawed. I hope that the government will see its way through to bringing in some valid changes, some good profound changes so that we can reform the Public Service in a way that is constructive, effective, efficient and economical.

• (1330)

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak on this bill. Mind you, I am not extremely excited about Bill C–26. I am not even anxious to see it go through. It is my hope that once it goes on its way to the Senate, the Senate will have some fun with it and try to take it back to where it belongs and that is to the people who are going to be most affected by it.

There are a number of things in this legislation one cannot help but bring to the attention of the public. The legislation by itself does not deal with many of the questions that have been bothering the Public Service of Canada for a long time; these are the questions of job security and morale within the Public Service. I want to focus on those two points.

On the question of morale in the Public Service, never in the history of this country have we seen such a massive walk–out in front of Parliament Hill in which every public servant—it does not matter what his or her rank was—walked on to Parliament Hill in order to tell the employer they were extremely unhappy with the way they were being treated.

I would say that is a cause for alarm. Simply put, when a public servant decides to go on strike, something must be fundamentally wrong. These people are among the finest in our work force. They have picked the job of serving the public because they believed in it and also because they wanted to do something in the best interests of the people. To see them walking out one cannot help but say there has to be something fundamentally wrong in the system.

Why did they walk out? Simply put, it was because of harsh and foolish treatment on the part of the government vis–à–vis these competent people.

The government indirectly was incapable of managing its own employees. It was incapable of managing the consultation process with them to a point at which we had a breakdown in the communication between the employees and the employer and they walked out.

More and more what we are seeing is this government asking the public servant to do more for less. All one would have to do is look at any one department in the Public Service, for example, the department of immigration. This is a perfect example and fresh in the minds of the people and in the minds of the public servants and the members of the opposition party. The government is planning to centralize, and decentralize at the same time I guess, the processing of immigration applications and it is trying to put the centre somewhere in order to process all applications through that centre with approximately 200 to 300 employees.

The government is not remembering that it would in a way indirectly cause a lot of harm not only to the public servants who are trying to do their job, and they do not have the resources to do it, but also to the public at large. One of the most fundamental and important things in our immigration system is when an applicant wants to bring in his or her family, they would have a chance to sit with an officer to try to have an interview and the officer from time to time would provide the applicant with reasonable, fair and helpful advice. That whole system would be eliminated. As such, one would fill in an application, send it in the mail along with $350 and God knows what will happen after that.

That particular measure by itself was ill–advised. If anything, it is going to hit hard and affect not only the people who are working in that particular department but the public at large.

All one would have to do is go to any employment centre in Canada and see the number of people waiting in line to try to see an official. Immigration centres are no different. The government is sitting back and looking at this whole process collapsing before its eyes and putting more pressure on the public servants in order to produce more without giving them the resources.

I have in the past called on the government to set up a specific and independent task force with one mandate and one objective, to go out in the public domain, have a look at the Public Service and the kind of services it is providing to the public. It should find out whether we have enough public servants to provide services to the public or whether we have a surplus of public servants.

I call tell you this. I know it first hand because my staff works on a daily basis with constituents. We know there are shortages of manpower within our Public Service. We do not have enough resources. There are not enough people to provide the services that the public needs.

I will give another example. In order to obtain an application from a citizenship office, you may have to wait up to eight months. After you have obtained the form you want to have a little chat with an officer at the desk. Filling in the application, returning it and getting an interview will take you approximately another eight to ten months. The whole process takes in excess of one year and eight months from the time you call in to the time you are approved or rejected.

The reason for all the delay is because our citizenship courts all across the country have a problem with manpower. We have called every citizenship office and we always get the same answer. They need more resources and they just simply cannot deal with the problem at hand.

There are other problems. There is the question of security clearances. A flood of applications are coming into the system, whether from people trying to be hired or from people who are trying to get their security clearance, whether for citizenship or landed immigrants. It takes a long period of time. There is a tremendous waiting list. The reason for that is lack of manpower. There are not enough resources to deal with the problem.

These are three departments that I thought I should use as examples to show that we do not have enough manpower within our Public Service. I do not know how we can convince the government of this fact. Will every member of Parliament in an urban centre have to bring in all of his or her people to Parliament Hill in order to petition the government to take action on the issue of lack of resources within the Public Service?

We are not alone. The public servants are telling the government most directly and indirectly through the public at large, that they need more resources in order to deal with the work at hand.

What does the government do from time to time? It hires casuals for four, five or six months. What happens? Perhaps those people who are hired on the basis of a contract for five or six months are excellent people, but because of the government policy of not hiring anymore, at the end of six months the government lets these people go and hires somebody else to come in, someone who may or may not be qualified. Those people have to be trained for three months and by the time they are fully trained to do the job, they are let go. It happens over and over again.

What are we doing here? Are we trying to fool the public or are we fooling ourselves? The government is fooling itself. It is not going to solve the problem.

The second way of dealing with this problem is contracting out. I have no objection to contracting out, providing you get value for your dollar. The government has spent millions of dollar over the past few years contracting out work which in some cases could have been done within the Public Service. Perhaps it would have been done a lot better because these people know exactly what they are dealing with.

• (1340)

We put out a contract and company A or individual A will do the work. They bring it back and our public servants are forced to go over the work all over again. In some cases this is costing even more than it would have cost to hire the workers on a permanent basis.

What is the problem? Are we here really reforming the public service work force in order to make it more productive? In fact we are creating more red tape and bureaucratic nightmares for the public servant.

In reality that is exactly what the government is doing. They are complicating the situation, a situation that is super simple. Our public servants are fully equipped, fully aware, they are an intelligent group of people. I would say it is one of the most intelligent work forces anywhere in the world. All one would have to do is go to some of these departments and ask them about the kinds of services they provide, the qualifications they have, the kind of work they do.

I attended a consortium a few weeks back with the President of the Treasury Board. They brought in people from the different departments to share with the public the kind of services they provide. I was absolutely delighted to see the quality of work our public servants do, in terms of the vision for the future, the services they provide, and also the extra effort necessary in order to streamline their services to make it more efficient, more valuable to the public.

As I walked in between these booths one thing could not escape my mind. I asked myself, what is the government mind-set? What things would it like to see done better? Over and over the same problems came up. We have a morale problem. I am not sure the government appreciates what it is doing to the public servants.

It is time for the government to realize that we have an excellent work force. It is time for them to appreciate the quality and the qualifications of these people. It is time for it to reward those people, not by downsizing a department every second week or every third week or by moving them out of the national capital region.

I cannot believe why our government would—I would say probably politics—try to terrorize the Public Service. It moves one department to Winnipeg, another department to Saskatchewan, a third department here, a fourth department to Alberta. It is absolutely deplorable.

There are more people coming into the capital of Canada to work with the Government of Canada, not to get out of the capital of Canada. The government is doing it all wrong because some of these people who they move to the boonies still have to come here in order to co-ordinate their work with other departments. There is no cost saving.

Mr. Brewin: Is that what you think of Victoria?

Mr. Harb: The Minister of Supply and Services on the other side is a very fine individual. I know what he will do. At the next cabinet meeting he will stand up and defend the interests of the public servants in the national capital region and all across Canada as being one of the finest public services anywhere in the world.

I know somebody is going to ask what the Liberals would do. I will tell you what the Liberals will do.

Mr. Brewin: Same as the Conservatives, only worse.

Mr. Harb: Why does the NDP even bother attacking the Liberals at this time. It is beyond me. All we have to do is look at what happened yesterday in the province of Ontario, with the biggest ever assault on our youth in the history of Canada. The whole country is ashamed of what is happening in Ontario. They have attacked our youth by trying to cut student grants, the most important thing for a youth—

An hon. member: You sound like an NDPer.

Mr. Harb: God bless you, my friend. We should continue to appreciate that we have a work force that is efficient, that is productive, that is dedicated, that is loyal. We have to take the next step and continue to support the revitalization of our Public Service from within. Let them tell us what are the kinds of things they want us to do in order to help them.

The worst manager in the world is a politician. We were elected not to be managers, we were elected to be trustees of the Public Service. The government is turning everything around and switching from being a trustee of the Public Service and of the people of Canada to trying to manage these things. Over the past eight years it has mismanaged the economy, it has mismanaged the Public Service, it has mismanaged everything it has done. This is further proof to my theory that if you do not know something, listen to the experts.

Look at the track record of the Liberal Party since Confederation up until now. We always supported the public servants. We always stood up for them, we always provided them with the tools they needed in order to do the job they have done so well in the past and will continue to do in the future.

I do not know why my colleague from the NDP has to defend the record of the government. I do not know why he would want to do that, but then again nowadays you just cannot see the difference. Can you see the difference? I cannot see the difference.

Pay equity is another problem within the Public Service. Day after day—and the Minister of Supply and Services would agree with me, he would be receiving the same kind of information that my office is receiving—we receive the yellow slips that are a notice to us as members of Parliament that the pay equity legislation has to be put in place as quickly as possible.

When is the government going to get cracking on those issues and deal with them in an effective manner? I do not know when the government is going to deal with those issues and I do not even think it really cares about them. I mean, when you think of the NDP Government of Ontario, you think of its past associations with pay equity. I just learned yesterday that it is not proceeding with pay equity within the province of Ontario.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, as Liberals we are committed to the partnership between the public sector and the private sector. Also, there is a partnership between the government and its own employees on whom we rely for policy advice, to carry out program services and regulations as mandated by the Parliament of Canada.

I know my colleague from Nepean has a question for me and I am willing to listen to it.

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a feeling that some of the comments that have just been made are likely to be quoted fairly widely as a result of this speech. In order that we do that fairly, I think we want to be quite clear as to what it is the hon. member has actually said. I just want to be sure, because he said a couple of things and I want to make sure that I got them right.

I take it that politicians are the worst managers in the world. He puts himself in that class as one of the worst managers in the world, and therefore we should take his advice about management because he is one of the worst managers in the world—if I understood what he is saying.

• (1350)

Second, is it now the policy of the Liberal Party—I take it that is the extension of the member's comments—that all services should in fact be centralized in Ottawa where they can be best delivered?

I am sure this has nothing to do with the fact that the majority of the constituents of the member's riding are federal public servants; it is a policy view of the member and of the party. However I want to be clear that he thinks services should in fact be centralized in Ottawa and that, to quote him, "Winnipeg and Victoria" and I take it by extension Toronto and Montreal "are the boonies of Canada".

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I want to make perfectly clear that when I made reference to politicians being the worst managers, I meant politicians on that side of the House; certainly I did not mean our side of the House.

Second, when I mentioned the boonies, I was referring specifically to one decision of this government to move the department of immigration to the riding of the Minister of Finance.

An hon. member: Vegreville.

Mr. Harb: Vegreville. I have every bit of respect for every public servant everywhere in Canada. I am not saying that we should bring them all here. I am saying that for political expediency and political reasons we should not be moving public servants out of this region to other parts of the country without any proper analyses and reasons.

With those analyses and reasons I am sure they would come to the conclusion that public servants in the capital of Canada can serve Canada anywhere. They can serve the Canadian population no matter where they are.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the member was given an opportunity by the previous member to withdraw his suggestion on behalf of the Liberal Party that its view of Canada is that Ottawa is the heartland and everywhere else is the boonies. He did not take the opportunity to withdraw that.

I quite look forward to somebody from the Liberal caucus getting up and saying that is not its view. My constituents of Victoria will be interested in hearing that is the Liberal view of the rest of Canada.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, no part of Canada is the boonies. If that is what my colleagues understood, that is not what I meant.

I want to ask the member a question. Can he tell me if moving the centre of immigration to Hagarville is the right thing to do? That is the case in point I am trying to make. Is it Hagarville?

An hon. member: Vegreville.

Mr. Harb: Vegreville. That is the point I am trying to make. If that is what he understood, that is not what I meant. There are no boonies in Canada. Canada is a great land from coast to coast and from corner to corner.

I want to ask the hon. member on the opposition side, the NDP side, if he agrees with the decision of the government to move a centre to Hagarville. Is he in agreement with that? That is what I was referring to.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I have never seen such fast backtracking in my whole life, but we have now established that Toronto is not in the boonies and that Victoria is not in the boonies.

I want to know, on behalf of all the federal public servants in the riding of Lethbridge, whether or not it qualifies as the boonies. Remember, it is Lethbridge. I would appreciate the member pronouncing it correctly, because he certainly got Vegreville wrong.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, any public servant who works in any part of the country is a great public servant. Public servants are efficient, productive and magnificent. The case in point again—

An hon. member: Is that what your point is?

Mr. Harb: I can see it is Friday afternoon and my colleagues are having fun. We may as well have some fun. What is the name of the riding?

Some hon. members: Vegreville.

Mr. Harb: Vegreville. The move of the public servants to Vegreville, the riding of the Minister of Finance, is the wrong move and that is the whole case in point.

There is not a single public servant anywhere in the country who would like to see unfair treatment, the kind of thing that has taken place over the past four years.

Mr. Mills: That is abusing the Public Service.

Mr. Harb: Absolutely. My colleague from Broadview agrees with me.

My colleague has given me the word Vegreville. I am absolutely sorry for mispronouncing it about three or four times. Just to sum up this discussion, it does not matter where our public servants are. They continue to provide high quality, excellent, fascinating services to the public. There is no part anywhere in this land that is a boonie land. This land is a great land. This land is a magnificent land.

Just to go on record—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The Minister of Supply and Services and then the hon. member for Nepean.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, my good friend from Ottawa Centre is quite right. People in the House are having a bit of fun today. It is at his expense, but it is all meant in good fellowship.

Since he was talking about moving people out of Ottawa to other localities in Canada, which he originally described as boonies if they were outside Ottawa—he has withdrawn that now so there are no more boonies—is he saying that is a very bad move and should never happen? If so, does he disagree with the Liberal government of 1979 when it ordered 15 sections of the government to 15 different constituencies, 14 of which were constituencies of Liberal cabinet ministers? Does he disagree with that?

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, one thing I want to keep clear in the mind of the minister is that had I been here in 1979 I would have given him a much better answer than I will give him now.

I deplore actions that are not based on fact, actions that are not based on reason. I am not in a position to defend actions of previous governments. I do not think it is fair for us to stand up here and bash the governments of Diefenbaker and Mackenzie King. Those are governments from the past and we have to focus on the future. We have to talk about the future. We have to talk about the present.

Day after day in the House we see members on both sides of the House accusing one another in terms of what happened 10 years ago or what happened 15 years ago. In the meantime there are line-ups of people out there looking for jobs, looking for opportunities, looking for assistance.

If anything we have to stop talking about the past. We have to take an example from the past and keep it in mind so that we do not make the same mistake when it comes to the future. The past if anything is just a passing memory, to remember it so that we do not do the same thing.

I want to ask the minister a question, Mr. Speaker, if it is possible. It may not be possible—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No, it is not possible. The hon. member's time has now expired.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I know it is silly time and it is Friday afternoon. I hope that my comments will add some levity to the very seriousness of this situation and the seriousness of Bill C-26, the Public Service reform act. We keep talking about boonies this afternoon. Is it any wonder the public thinks that we are a bunch of loonies?

I am pleased to have the opportunity to address Bill C-26 once again, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada.

My colleagues and I on this side of the House continue to oppose this bill because if passed it will essentially change for worse some of the fundamental precepts on which our non-partisan and highly respected Public Service is based.

• (1400)

I have consulted with many public servants who happen to live in my city of Nepean. It was the general belief that the federal Public Service does need to be reformed. Today the Public Service is operating according to legislation developed in the 1960s. Surely the need to adapt to changing times is a must in order to adjust to the substantial developments which have occurred in the business environment over the last 25 years. Principles taken for granted in the 1960s are no longer applicable today in the 1990s and into the next century. However Bill C-26 as it now stands is definitely not the answer.

While Bill C-26 does have some positive elements, there are a number of reasons why we in the opposition party oppose this legislation. Among the most serious flaws are the following. Clause 10 as an example replaces the fundamental principle of hiring the best person for the job. It allows for a qualified person to be hired without having to compete against other candidates.

This could close the door on those most suitable and best able to perform the particular job. While clause 10 could close the door on the best candidate for the job, clause 19 opens the door to increase contracting out by this government, which in turn would decrease government accountability to Canadians.

If this bill is passed this clause will grant deputy heads the power to lay off employees if their work or function is transferred outside the Public Service.

A number of clauses in this legislation will permit decisions to be reached by regulation or policy effectively removing the right of Parliament to determine fairness and impartiality in employment in the Public Service.

Clause 23 allows the Public Service Commission and Treasury Board to create regulations regarding appointments without, among other things, competition and priority right of appointment. Clause 26 makes the Clerk of the Privy Council the head of the Public Service. This significantly clouds the separation between political control and a supposedly non-partisan Public Service.

Clause 22 allows deputy heads to transfer staff to other jobs without competition. This new system may make it possible to promote or demote under the guise of deployment thus increasing flexibility for management while not offsetting this with protection for the merit principle, safeguards against arbitrary exercise on new staffing authority and accountability.

Because the work force adjustment policy will not apply to lost jobs as a result of devolution of the functions to provinces, devolution may be used as a means of downsizing the Public Service.

Clause 16 adds a 90-day casual employee category. This clause could create a whole new subclass of public servants, those without rights or benefits. Furthermore, these casuals can be hired without any consideration given to qualifications.

Clause 48 allows for the appointment of a fact finder at the request of either party in dispute. But the fact finder's report is not binding. This would allow the employer to use the fact finder as a delaying tactic during negotiations.

Throughout the two and one-half months of the committee hearings on Bill C-26, witnesses outlined how the bill could be improved. A number of convincing and substantial arguments were put forward by many respected academics, unions and interest groups. Unfortunately the Conservative government majority ignored their views and voted down all but a handful of opposition amendments.

Indeed the Liberal Party put forward amendments which addressed the problems outlined above. We put forward an amendment which would impose obligations and define the responsibilities of the Public Service Commission. Another would have ensured full disclosure of information and adequate notice of appeal hearings.

We also introduced an amendment to reinstate the best qualified as the main consideration in appointments. We proposed expanding the grounds for complaint and investigation, protecting term employees in case of lay-offs and providing the bargaining agent with the opportunity to submit a grievance.

Recognizing that amendments shot down in committee by Conservative members not interested in improving the bill cannot be reintroduced here in the House of Commons, we on this side of the House have a number of new amendments that should be addressed and should be addressed here today. It is my hope that this time the Conservative members on the opposite side of the House will listen and decide that the interests of the Canadian people and their public servants deserve to be heard and acted upon.

I continue to oppose Bill C-26 at this third reading and I continue to support clauses of the bill that contribute to strenghthening the Public Service and its ability to serve the public and improve labour relations. I continue to oppose clauses of the bill that undermine the merit principle without adequate safeguards that destabilize the Public Service, that discourage the hiring and retention of highly qualified individuals and that reduce accountability.

I draw the attention of the House to the government's recent actions with respect to proposed budget cuts, the remarks of the Auditor General regarding the inappropriate use of the work force adjustment policy, which will be exacerbated by the provisions of Bill C-26, and the blatant attempts by the government to muzzle any opposition to the bill throughout the legislative process.

This government with regard to our public servants has been one of mismanagement. This government cannot govern or manage and service to the country is suffering. It caused the first ever massive walkout of public servants in the history of this country and I say shame on it. The morale of the public servants is at an all-time low. Its harsh arbitrary treatment is causing the loss of competent people within the Public Service. This government cannot be trusted. It does not listen to the Public Service. It promised employees consultation on reform of the Public Service and instead it has shut them out and ignored their advice.

This government has acted in a high-handed and dictatorial manner—"my way or the highway". Public Service 2000 has proceeded on the basis of top down, heavy-handed dictates that are out dated and do not work.

Let the managers manage is a 1962 theme from the Glassco commission and this is 1992. This government is dismantling another of the institutions of Canada's nationhood. Just as VIA Rail, Air Canada, mail service and the CBC have helped build Canada, the Public Service has provided services to Canadians wherever they are and carried out the will of Parliament in all corners of Canada.

We on this side of the House believe that Canadians deserve accessible quality services, delivered efficiently by a professional non-partisan Public Service that treats all employees with respect and fairness and is responsive to the needs of Canadians.

On employment equity, the original draft of Bill C-26 contained a provision on employment equity that was so vague and discretionary as to be meaningless, requiring no accountability.

I support strong provision in the legislation committing the Public Service to employment equity and to accountability for treating all applicants and employees equally on merit.

I have spoken at quite some length on the importance of the Public Service and I know that probably most members in this House of Commons do not have the same interests as I do when it comes to defending the Public Service. Public servants are not just here in the nation's capital. They represent Canadians right across this country in small towns and in big cities. Wherever they are serving, be it here in the nation's capital, Victoria, B.C. or Vegreville, Alberta, Halifax or St. John's, Newfoundland, those public servants are providing a valuable service to Canadians and we should be proud of them and we should be protecting them because those same servants are there protecting our rights in their duties to us as Canadians in this country. I do not believe that Bill C-26 adequately serves the public servants in this country.

• (1410)

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member who has just spoken a very straightforward question because there has been some discussion about where the public servants are located in this country.

Would the member agree with me that about 30 per cent of Canada's public servants are located in the national capital region and that the other 70 per cent are actually located in all the small towns and villages, in rural areas and in other cities spread right across the country? There are actually only 30 per cent located in the national capital region and the rest are in Halifax, Victoria and everywhere else in between.

Would that be about the right ratio?

Mrs. Gaffney: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his question.

I am not sure of the exact ratio but I believe it is in that percentage range. We can speak about the importance of some aspects of public servants remaining here in Ottawa. There is a reason why they are here. It is because whatever particular department they are with it is obviously pertinent that they are serving a larger group of people in this particular area, just as it makes sense that somebody connected with the oceans branch should be connected to the oceans. Someone connected to the wheat branch should probably be close to where the wheat farmers are. I certainly recognize that.

I am not too sure about this latest one on immigration. I cannot for the life of me see a move—and the previous speaker spoke to this—to Vegreville, Alberta when many new immigrants who are coming to this country are settling in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This is where we have to serve those people. They want to come to these two provinces, most of the jobs I suppose are here.

In defending public servants, I am defending public servants right across the country to the minister. I think we should all be considering that when speaking on this bill.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, first of all I did not have an opportunity earlier to make it clear to the member for Ottawa Centre who asked me a question in a circumstance under which I could not answer that I spoke earlier in the debate and strongly opposed the idea of establishing the particular immigration centre in Vegreville. As much as I have a great deal of respect for the citizens of Vegreville, it seems to me a backward decision and one that is clearly political.

My question for the member is simply what does she think of the contracting-out provisions of the legislation and the exclusionary provisions, especially applied to Treasury Board staff?

Mrs. Gaffney: Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned about contracting out. We have difficulty getting the figures to back this up, but from people I speak with in the Public Service, people are losing their jobs because their department head is telling them that their job is no longer necessary. The government, in turn, is turning around and contracting out that same position that was done in house by that certain government employee.

We have every reason to believe that it is costing the people of Canada far more money in contracting out and at the same time the people of Canada are not being served nearly as well. I am hearing this time and time again. We heard recently in the Auditor General's report that federal public servants were being given a pay-out and then were either being brought back into their job or they were being contracted out at great cost to the people of Canada.

Contracting out has its place, to the member for Victoria in answer to his question. In many instances it is not a cost-saving measure, it is at great cost to the Canadian people.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the speech by my colleague from Nepean and especially interested in the question that the Minister of Supply and Services asked the member for Nepean.

I would tell the member for Nepean that the figures given to her by the Minister of Supply and Services of 30:70 ratio were wrong. The ratio is not 30:70, 30 being in the capital and 70 being in the country, but rather it is 33 percent in the national capital region which is the Ottawa-Carleton area and the Outaouais area. This would be straddling on two provinces. The rest is not 70 per cent but rather 65 per cent. This is elsewhere in Canada, everywhere else in Canada. Also there are 2 per cent of employees working overseas in various aspects, for a total of 100 per cent.

He should also have told you that in each province, depending on its population, the Public Service has been divided proportionately. For example, P.E.I., which represents 2.5 per cent, has approximately 2.5 per cent of the Public Service employees.

The Liberal philosophy, and it has tried to follow that somewhat by the way it maltreats women in employment, has not looked yet at the aspect of improving the women/men ratio so that there is equality and pay equity. That is other information that he has not given you.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to rise this afternoon and address Bill C–26.

I want to say first of all that there is a myth across the country, and the country operates under all sorts of mythologies, that Ottawa is the fat cat city in that everybody in Ottawa is rich and they are all in the federal Public Service. We know that is not correct. It is roughly 30 per cent here and 70 per cent out across the country. That means probably 60,000 or 65,000 federal public servants in this whole Ottawa, Hull, Gatineau region, including Gloucester and Nepean, et cetera. The rest of them are out across the country.

It is also true that the number of public servants here in the Ottawa region is only about 15 to 19 per cent of the total work force here. The national capital region is becoming very much a high–tech silicon valley private industry place. That is quite encouraging. I am forever having to say to people in my own riding that Ottawa is not what they believe it is, there are very hard working and dedicated federal public servants we all deal with daily when we are pushing bills through the House.

Nonetheless, I want to also put on the record how very significant and important it is to have federal public servants in the small towns and smaller cities across the country. In the city of Lethbridge, for example, where I am from, there are 62,000 people. If we can get 25 or 30 additional employees, that means an enormous amount to the city and the stability of it. Federal public servants are paid well, whether you start at the secretarial level or the clerk level and you work up, compared with what equivalent people would make in private enterprise.

That is not true when you get to the very high levels of assistant deputy ministers and deputy ministers. They are underpaid compared with equivalent responsibilities in private enterprise. For example, take somebody in Shell Canada operating at a senior level. They make more money than an assistant deputy minister would here. For the most part, most public servants are paid better.

I am forever having constituents coming to me, whether they are doctors or lawyers or people in private industry, saying they cannot afford to pay a secretary because she can make so much more in the federal public service. What they do is act in a sense as a redistribution network as well where we tax everybody across the country and then the money flows back out through some federal public servant salaries.

Those 23 jobs in the city of Lethbridge are very important because those people are usually better trained than other people and they therefore get involved in a Kiwanis Club or a Rotary Club or a Lion's Club; they become part of the music festival, they become part of the theatre groups in the town or village or city and they add an enormous richness to our communities.

• (1420)

That, as much as anything else, is one of the impulses for taking federal public servants out of Ottawa. As my friend pointed out it has been done for years and years. Indeed the Liberals had a massive program of decentralization where some 15 sections were moved out, 14 of which went to the ridings of cabinet ministers of the previous Liberal government.

With respect to the immigration change to Vegreville, I must say Vegreville is a very nice town. The towns and villages on the prairies are under enormous stress because of the enormous move to microchip technology and bigger and better tractors and combines.

One option would have been to continue the past policies of the previous administration and just let them go out of existence. We have made a real effort to try and save some of the bigger regional centres. We know that just because there used to be a town every nine miles along the railway track to provide water and coal to the steam–engines that that can no longer prevail. Virtually hundreds and thousands of little towns and villages are disappearing. They simply have to disappear given the context of the economics and the way our system works today. We do not have steam–engines anymore and trains can go a long way.

We build these massive super highways and then we are surprised that people use them, getting in their big cars and driving to larger centres.

We are trying to move some civil servants to the larger regional towns across the prairies and indeed other parts of the country. That is why Vegreville was chosen. It will add an immense amount of economic stability to the region as well as some real skills. Whether it is in the arts or the sciences, it will help the school system. It will help the churches. It will help every aspect of Vegreville to become a much more enriched part of this country.

Remember that it is the young men and women from many of these small towns and villages who go on to achieve great things in this country. It is because they have a school system which is large enough to give them a concentration of studies on science and technology and that is what we really need.

That is the argument for the decentralization. I have absolutely no criticism at all about the immigration department being concentrated in Vegreville. For the most part, those applications are paper applications in any event. A few years ago we moved the Department of Veterans Affairs to Prince Edward Island because most of those transactions are paper transactions. People looking at a piece of paper can analyse the case just as well, whether it is in Charlottetown, Vegreville or Toronto.

That is the way the country should work and that is the way it has to work if we want it to stay together.

That is not to deride what Ottawa had, but an enormous number of our national agencies were created and set up in Ottawa because it was the easiest thing to do. It was felt that people had to be near government. That is not true today with the absolutely incredible sophistication of satellites, telephones, fax machines and all of that. We do not have to have everybody in Ottawa.

Indeed, within the next 10 to 15 years probably as high as 30 to 40 per cent of the work force will be in their own homes using fancy connections into a head office somewhere by way of faxes and telephones and interactive television.

A lot of the high-rises in the big cities will become absolutely redundant. They will not be needed because we will all network through the towns and villages and that will make this country a much richer place too. Again a lot of the very talented, highly paid officials will be moved across the country and we will all be a much happier family when that occurs.

This bill is long overdue. The Public Service cannot be isolated from the massive changes which are flowing over us. The little microchip is the equivalent of the internal gas combustion engine which in its day replaced and displaced an entire economy. It is exactly the same as the steam engine in its day. It totally displaced an entire economy and way of life in favour of a new way.

Our brains and our whole thought processes change. We become different people when we move into that new paradigm. We are not there yet but we are in the process of changing. It is a very difficult and traumatic process of change for many people.

The fact of the matter is that a whole bunch of us in our age group find it very difficult to make that transition. Therefore that causes us uncertainty. It causes us concern.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I could hear the conversation over on this side, but I cannot hear the speaker. Thank you.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I cannot attack the opposition over that because it was one of my own buddies over there. So I will be quiet about that.

As I said, the microchip is exactly like the internal gas engine in its day and the steam-engine in its day. It is causing the dislocation of many thousands of workers.

This past summer I toured through the maritime provinces. In New Brunswick I went through an old museum where it showed the number of people who were involved in a lumber mill operation in a town. It took 400 or 500 people to work that one little sawmill operation.

Then it showed as the technology came in first with the handsaw, then the buzz saw, then up into more complex pieces of equipment, and how the number of people required in that area dropped and dropped and dropped. The ultimate was one machine sitting across the highway. It would move in, grab a tree, cut it off at the bottom, saw all the branches off and cut it into 10 or 14-foot lengths, whatever it happened to be. Therefore the 400 people were not necessary.

That has happened all over. The problem is that the types of skills needed for this new economy are types which you and I do not readily have. In fact next week I am going to take three days to try and learn how to handle computers and word processors. I am scared to death about it because my brain does not work in the way it needs to work to handle that type of technology. Whereas my daughter and son having been raised with it, take to it like a duck to water.

The point I am making is that we need to have policies. I think we are working toward this albeit not as fast as some people would want to, but with very limited budgets federal and provincial governments are moving toward transition policies so that people can move from the old economy into the new.

For those who cannot make that transition, we need to have legitimate, decent and proper policies so they can live the rest of their days with respect and not have to go on to the dole.

Just as everybody else is having to move to that economy, so does the federal civil service. That is really what Bill C–26 is trying to achieve and in fact it will move some substantial distance toward it.

The federal civil servants I know, some in the senior management ranks and some below, when talking to them individually are pleased it is coming. They can see that they cannot be isolated from this broad wave that is moving in and indeed they want to play a role.

The ones I have talked to have always expressed regret that they came in with very good educations and were then put into narrow compartments where they could just move a little bit. They had no responsibility, no chance to be creative, and no chance or opportunity to take the consequences. They were prepared to be accountable. They wanted to have the responsibility and for that they would be accountable. This bill moves toward that in a substantial way.

I would like to end by simply reiterating how important these jobs are to the smaller towns and villages across the country. I hope we do not get into the situation of big city versus small town, Ottawa versus the rest of the country.

I have always stood up in my riding and defended the very high quality of federal civil servants we have. If we trust them and give them the responsibility, they will respond in kind. They will accept the accountability that has to come with this type of a system but at the same time they will deliver a much better product, much faster, much more efficiently, and much more professionally at a lower cost.

• (1430)

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my colleague for standing up for his constituency and his community. Obviously, he knows quite a bit about what needs to be done in certain ways.

We do not support the approach of moving public servants from the national capital region to other parts of the country for political reasons. Nor do we support the fact that we just decentralize for the sake of decentralizing. In other words, you rob Peter to pay Paul.

We believe that we should be focusing on creating more opportunities all across the country. We do not have to take from one part of the country in order to satisfy another. We do not have to pit regions against regions. What we are interested in seeing is a creation of wealth and not a redistribution of wealth.

I want to ask the hon. member something along those lines. This is a non–partisan call on the government and on the hon. member to respond. Would he support the creation of an independent task force to look at the Public Service to find out whether we have a surplus or a deficiency in the Public Service?

The people I have spoken to are probably not the same people the hon. member has spoken to. All the public servants with whom I have spoken have told me over and over again that they need more resources. In other words, to lay off employees just for the sake of the bottom line is not helping. It is not helping. It is decreasing the efficiency and productivity of the Public Service. It is demoralizing the Public Service and it is not helping the public as a whole.

In many ways we may not have a different vision in terms of providing quality service to the public. I guess where we differ is when we say that we have a problem. We do not have enough public servants as it is. To hit them again and again with a two–by–four by decentralizing, downsizing and contracting out work that otherwise public servants could have done is not the right way.

Would he support such a task force? Would he call on his colleagues, for instance, to set up such a task force to look at the whole aspect of the size of the Public Service?

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, the truth of the matter is that I do not know enough about the topic to be able to answer that question. I am not a member of that standing committee nor have I ever been on the standing committee that would develop some expertise. I trust my colleagues including members opposite who sit on that committee to make those types of judgment calls.

I would like to expand on his point about the creation of wealth. He was pointing out that our parties probably are not that different and I agree. It is probably a question of degree because if he were talking about the Liberal Party of the 1940s, 1950s and the 1960s we would be ad idem because our party was exactly like that. We believed there needed to be the creation of wealth and that creation of wealth had to be done by the private sector.

It was quite legitimate then, for government to tax a portion of that wealth back and redistribute it in terms of old age security, family allowance and people on social assistance. That was the proper role for government as well as to have some programs to direct industry and give it incentives to go into the have not regions of the country, if that is the proper phrase.

I fear, unfortunately, that the Liberal Party fell out of that. It got into an enormous taxing business but it was not creating the wealth. In fact, it was playing down the creation of wealth. Just for my friends opposite, if it were not for the national debt, we could actually have reduced taxes by $12 billion. Imagine what a $12 billion tax reduction would have done to this country.

Then we get back to the question: Why do we have the national debt? It was just that governments in the past spent more on people than they took away. We have not done that. For eight years we have taxed away $25 billion more than people have received by way of federal programs.

The $25 billion surplus normally would have been built up and used for diversification. Unfortunately, because of the huge national debt we were left with, it was all sucked up to pay interest on the national debt, plus more. If we could somehow get rid of this national debt, we could actually reduce taxes by $12 billion. It is an absolutely amazing thing. We cannot do it because of what we inherited.

We cannot be complaining about that forever. If my friend were to ask for a task force to take a look at this national debt, I think that is what we really need to put our brains to. Maybe it should have people from outside here, perhaps a royal commission even, to just look at the national debt and how we can handle it.

I know $22 billion is owing to the Bank of Canada. Maybe the Bank of Canada should write that off. There are many billions of dollars, which is a paper entry, owed to existing and future federal civil servants for their pensions. Maybe that should be handled in a different way. Maybe the national debt should be put into the hands of a Crown corporation or some corporation with outside boards of directors so that more than the GST could be directed to it.

I am sure with all of the brain power in this room that we could come up with some very creative ideas as to how to handle that national debt. Then we would have the operating budget on the side and we could honestly say to people: "We have got a surplus operating budget".

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): I realize, Mr. Speaker, that only one aspect of this bill talks about locating in smaller communities portions of the Public Service. As a form of a comment I must say that I support the fact that we have the Emergency Measures College of Canada in Arnprior, that the Cheque Redemption Centre was moved to Matane, Quebec, the former riding of Minister De Bane, the Minister of Regional Development, in the late 70s, that the Superannuation Branch was moved to Shediac, New Brunswick, which was the then constituency of Romeo LeBlanc, the minister of fisheries. I want to say that they are working very well in those areas.

I also want to say that for your social insurance number, you have to go to Moncton, New Brunswick. Of course, we moved the GST into Summerside.

Those are examples of how I think it is very well that other parts of the country have shared in Canada's public service. Those are good examples of sharing across the country. I am sure that Vegreville will fit in with those small communities and be an excellent centre providing excellent service.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, when we were presented with Bill C-26, of course we had many concerns. Hon. members opposite seem to be saying that their way of managing the Public Service will do nothing to hurt morale among public servants. That is far from true. I believe that their attempts to move departments blindly throughout the country are motivated only by political reasons.

I will stick to Bill C-26 and summarize the most important concerns not only of federal public servants but especially of those in the national capital region who have been established here for a long time and are making their careers here.

Essentially, the Liberal Party has always maintained the merit principle. It opposes any effort by the present government—and I will give it the benefit of the doubt—that would lead to favouritism and patronage, which have existed and still exist. That is the danger.

My colleague from Carleton—Gloucester pointed out the most blatant features of Bill C-26 when he said that the Public Service Commission's credibility is very much called into question, since the government and the commission itself admitted that clause 10(2) should be subject to certain conditions because of the potential for abuse. That is where the danger lies, because the risk still exists.

I find that the risk in the proposed changes is very great.

• (1440)

The bill lets managers select the candidate and examine his qualifications instead of judging among the candidates. But that is not what they do. Essentially, they say to themselves, for example, that five out of seven candidates qualify under the new public service regulations. So it is still up to the manager to decide who should fill the position. Of course that opens the door to abuse. Now if there is one organization that should ensure that there is no danger of favouritism and abuse and eliminate this danger beyond any doubt in employees' or public servants' minds, it is the federal government.

How do you expect employee morale, which is extremely vital for the administration and operation of government, to be good? Basically, of all institutions in the country, whether they are in the private sector or not, the government should set an example. This bill should rule out favouritism and patronage, as much as humanly possible, but we do not find any such measure in Bill C-26. That worries us tremendously.

The Public Service Alliance and the Professional Institute of the Public Service are right to be concerned. That is why I fear that the laudable efforts of the opposition, the Liberal Party in particular, will come to naught with these future changes, because the risks are too great with this bill and there will be difficulties.

I just wanted to take these few minutes to say that if they do not want to accept the opposition's amendments, we are inclined to believe that they are acting for reasons we do not like. Government employees have reason to be concerned and it is not surprising that these employees' morale has been affected.

It is never too late and I hope that the government will realize that what it is doing here will create problems rather than solve them. And if there is a time when we could do without problems, it is now.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to my colleague as he was addressing the whole question of merit principle and how one would approach the temptation that is put in front of us for the potential for cronyism and for the potential—I was going to use the word nepotism; it is not nepotism in the true sense of the word—opportunity to misuse one's office and one's ability to choose and to make selection because the temptation has been put before you because there is not a project, a bill that specifically frames the kind of principles that you would need to assure that where that temptation is put before you, abuse will not occur and the perception of misuse does not occur as well.

This is what I wanted to ask the member. What we are trying to do is to effect the cultural change in the mechanism in which the Public Service would operate. I would hope that like most people, the appreciation for the role and the function of the Public Service is equally important for Canadians as is VIA Rail and air transportation and all the other things that have been damaged by the Conservative government.

Is it your view that there was permanent damage done that (a) led to the first real major strike and (b) by the Al-Mashat affair that you now have the civil servants being the butt and the catch-all for problems out there when really the problem is the conduct of our political people rather than the civil servants themselves?

First of all, you have a lack of trust that has—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, I will let you finish your question.

[Translation]

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that the risk of abuse rises spectacularly if the temptation is there. I believe that is what has happened in the past. That is what contributed to a drop in confidence within the Public Service and morale was affected. We could talk about it for a long time because so much has happened to show the weakness and the danger in all that. Yes, that has contributed to it and that is what we must try to eliminate as much as possible. We do not say that everything can be eliminated, right down to the smallest suspicion, but perception is important and we must show that it is humanly possible to reduce the risks to the lowest level possible.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 2.45 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made Tuesday, June 23, 1992, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3) it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the third reading of the bill now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the recorded division stands deferred until six o'clock Monday, November 30, 1992.

May I call it three o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being three o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(6) the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROGRAMS

GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean) moved that:

in the opinion of this House, the government should restore funding at least to the 1989 level to all government youth employment programs and spread the funding in a fair and equitable manner to all federal ridings.

She said: Mr. Speaker, many different segments of the Canadian population have been adversely affected by the policies of this present government. Indeed, with the exception of the wealthiest Canadians and the personal friends of the Prime Minister, and those who are part of the latter group always seem to be part of the former, it is difficult to find a group which has benefited from eight years of Conservative government.

I want to take the opportunity this afternoon to discuss a group of Canadians who have certainly not benefited from this government and who are so often forgotten yet are so vital to the future of this country. In fact, they are the future of this country. They are our young people.

The motion I have put forward and which we are debating today states, and I quote:

That in the opinion of this House, the government should restore funding at least to the 1989 level to all government youth employment programs and spread the funding in a fair and equitable manner to all federal ridings.

Education is the cornerstone of our country. As Benjamin Disraeli wrote in 1874: "Upon the education different today than they did in 1874 and I do not think anyone in this House will refute this claim. Yet, this present Conservative government has spent the better part of eight years hacking away at the programs set in place to help our young people attain an education which will in turn enable them to get into the work force and make a valuable impact on Canadian society. The link between education and employment has long been demonstrated. Nearly two-thirds of all new jobs created between 1992 and the year 2000 will require at least 12 years of education and training, and 40 per cent will require more than 16 years of education.

Despite the evidence of the link between education and employment, the government has maintained policies which foster unemployment and increase the cost of getting an education. This makes education increasingly inaccessible and compounds the long-term crisis in both youth and adult unemployment.

Despite the aforementioned correlation between education and employment, the Conservative government has reduced its contribution to education funding on a number of occasions and in a number of areas. By cutting the rate of growth in transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education under the Established Programs Financing, the Conservative government will cause a cumulative loss of $9 billion between 1986 and 1994.

We heard this morning from the province of Ontario, which had the highest rate of youth unemployment in this country this past summer, that it can no longer afford to grant moneys to students or to increase funding to hospitals, educational institutions and municipalities. The two main reasons are that there is an NDP government that does not know how to govern and this federal government has not seen fit to provide the necessary funding to the province.

The negative effects of youth employment are compounded by the increased costs of education, which include higher tuition fees. The higher costs are due in part to cutbacks in federal support for education and the application of GST on books which is absolutely shameful. As a result an increasing number of students must now work while still in school. Between 1980 and 1990 the proportion of full-time students who were employed increased from 29 per cent to 41 per cent. These were students who had to be employed in order to complete their education. This has an adverse effect on the quantity and quality of time these students have to devote to their studies.

While many young Canadians are reeling from the effects of the higher costs of education and high unemployment due to the recession, the Conservative government continues to cut back on student employment programs.

Between 1985 and 1991 funding for the Summer Employment Experience Development, SEED, component of the Challenge program was nearly cut in half, going from $149.5 million to $80 million. The SEED program was implemented to provide career and study related work experience while enabling students to cover some of the costs of their education.

If I could be more specific I would like particularly to speak about the city of Nepean briefly. I was elected to this prestigious place in 1988. In 1989 the government allocated $123,000 in SEED funding to the riding of Nepean which I represent. In the following two years it was cut from $123,000 down to $21,000. How many students can be hired for $21,000? I am only talking about one riding out of 295 ridings in this country.

The budget of SEED was increased slightly by $3 million this year, yet in the national capital region—and I move away from Nepean to talk about the whole of the national capital region—according to the government's own figures the budget for SEED was reduced from a 1989 level of $1.4 million to $425,000 in 1990 and 1991. If we look at certain ridings in this country we see that one riding may receive $425,000. I am talking about all the national capital region, both sides of the river. We are probably talking of between 15 to 18 ridings: $425,000. If one thinks Ottawa-Carleton, the nation's capital, is not being penalized, I say we are. This amounts to a 70 per cent reduction.

The total Challenge budget fell from $205 million in 1985 to $143 million last year. The total numbers of jobs created under SEED fell from 94,115 in 1985 to 53,806 in 1991. As a result this program has failed to fulfil its original mandate. Growing student debt loads illustrate this point.

As a result of the cutbacks to SEED my office was inundated with calls and letters from students desperately searching for summer employment. Unfortunately, as the chairman of the Ontario Students Federation said this past September, many university students will have to drop out because of near-record student unemployment. Statistics Canada said 254,000 students were unemployed this past July, almost half of them Ontario residents.

This past summer's unemployment rate for students aged 15 to 24 averaged 17.9 per cent. That is the nation's average, 17.9 per cent and the province of Ontario's average was 20.3 per cent. Almost 97,000 students—11,000 more in this past summer—applied for assistance from the Ontario Students Assistance Program.

Unfortunately the attack on students by the Conservative government is, like most actions it undertakes, short-sighted. Spending money on our young people is an investment in the future.

The Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada stated that Canada's foremost assets in the future will be its human rather than its natural resources. Lack of support for students as well as lack of support for knowledge intensive industries may very well prove to be the most damaging effect of the Mulroney government's preoccupation with allowing market forces and market forces only to dictate Canadian economic policy.

When we talk of Canadian economic policy we must insist on talking about competitiveness. My colleagues on the other side of the House use this word at every opportunity: competitive this and competitive that. Unfortunately once again their rhetoric is only surpassed by their inaction. The World Economic Forum reported last year that of the 23 OECD countries Canada ranks 17th in over-all research and development efforts. This is a drop from 10th place in 1986. In future orientation which heavily reflects research and development performances Canada fell from 9th spot in 1986 to an abysmal 16th place ranking.

These statistics clearly underline the fact that the Conservative commitment to the principle of competitiveness they claim to be their trademark is unfortunately a sad joke.

Canada's research and development has deteriorated under this Conservative government. I do not know how much longer Canada can take that kind of competitiveness. Economic competitiveness is not like the Olympics and maybe the government thinks it is. Baron De Coubertin, founder of the modern day Olympics, used to say that it is not the winning that matters but the competing. Fine words but they do not encompass world economics.

The government must wake up to the fact that it is not just about competing and finishing wherever; an effort has to be made to finish first and that is competing. This government seems to be content with being in the arena to watch the real players go at it but we need to get involved.

If we are to make Canada more competitive with the U.S. and the global marketplace we must support our colleges, our universities and our young people. We must make a firm commitment to extra financial support for research and development activities within our colleges and universities. These are surely the cornerstone of a competitive society.

It takes commitment: commitment to our colleges and universities, commitment to our students. If this government is not ready to make a commitment to these things then it should commit itself to calling an election and let Liberals implement the policies. Canadians are truly committed to principles of education, of employment and of opportunity.

• (1500)

I thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to present this motion in the House today.

[Translation]

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, according to a motion from the opposition: "—the government should restore funding at least to the 1989 level to all government youth employment programs and spread the funding in a fair and equitable manner to all federal ridings."

Such a motion is far from the reality and I would like to take this opportunity to show that, on the contrary, since the implementation of the Labour Force Development Strategy, this government has never stopped adjusting its programs, based on the changes that occur among young people as well as among the national and international working communities.

During the fiscal year 1991–92, we spent $216 million on various programs for young people. This amount is in addition to the other funds allocated to the Canadian Jobs Strategy, of which half the beneficiaries are also young people. We do our very best to help those young people improve their chances of finding a job and prepare themselves to enter a learning culture in which they will have to continue, throughout their career, to renew their knowledge and their skills.

In 1991, the government allocated $80 million to the Summer Employment Experience Development component of the Challenge '92 Program, which is a summer employment program for students. In August 1992, this amount was increased to $85 million. I should point out here that when allocating these funds, we take into account the unemployment rate of the various regions of the country. The Challenge Program was developed to encourage employers to create jobs and help students gain practical experience. The goal of this program is to help young students gain professional experience and develop their knowledge, especially during the summer months. The program is particularly targeted to high school students, since they have more difficulties finding summer jobs than post-secondary students.

The Summer Employment Experience Development Program provides subsidies to employers who create summer jobs that enable students gain useful experience and be better prepared for their permanent job.

In 1992, we have encouraged, through the SEED program, the creation of jobs that are directly related to the interest shown by the government in issues such as drugs, alcohol and illiteracy, as well as information on AIDS, the environment and urban crime. We have also paid particular attention to the young people who belong to visible minorities or are members of aboriginal or handicapped groups.

We must also mention the Student Business Loans Program, which enables students who have original and innovative ideas and projects to create their own summer jobs. In 1991–92, the budget for this program reached $800,000, and it was the same for 1992–93.

On October 29, 1991, the Minister of Employment and Immigration tabled in the House a document entitled: "Learning Well. . . Living Well". This document presents some of the challenges that await Canada in the nineties, regarding learning. It puts the accent on a learning culture for the Canadian society as a whole, especially in the work place.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, Canadians and especially young Canadians, need to acquire the specialized skills necessary for numerous career changes, because they will have to make such changes several times during their life.

The document tabled by the Minister of Employment and Immigration is geared to the development of a learning culture. Our learning activities must be planned as seriously as our vacation. We must invest as much in the constant updating of our knowledge as in the maintenance of our homes. Employers must spend as much time on the development of their human resources as they do on the development of a new product. We must create at home an environment that is conducive to learning.

Mr. Speaker, on October 29, 1991, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology tabled a document entitled: "The Prosperity Initiative". What are the objectives of that initiative? They are to cut illiteracy rates in half; to ensure that 90 percent of Canadians attain high school diplomas or the equivalent; to double the number of post-secondary graduates in mathematics, the sciences and engineering; and to quadruple the training provided by employers to their employees, new and old.

To achieve these goals in an effective and realistic manner, we must bring about sound consultations and an efficient standardization of our work processes and evaluation criteria. We must set practical goals for the education and vocational training system in Canada.

If we are to develop a learning culture that will last for a lifetime, a correlation must be established between learning and school and on-the-job training.

If we want our children to be able to compete abroad as well as at home, we must better prepare them to enter the labour market. Finally, to ensure our prosperity, we must find incentives for our children to get into maths and science.

As part of this Prosperity Initiative, we are proceeding to nation-wide consultations on knowledge and training.

Education officials will participate in these consultations which will foster honest and open discussions on national goals to be achieved. By the time all these meetings have taken place, between 150 and 200 communities will have been consulted across the country on the issue of education and job readiness training. If we can see all sectors work together in new strong and efficient partnerships, it is thanks to co-operative education.

This action plan calls upon all levels of government, the private sector, labour, teachers as well as the general public. A number of themes are already emerging from the consultations I just mentioned, such as the search of excellence and results; a collective commitment for ongoing training; continued efforts to provide access to learning to every one; a better choice of study periods, teaching methods and educational tools; sharing new responsibilities and creating new partnerships.

The first thing we must do is to convince school-going Canadian children, especially those in high school, to stay the course at least and even to go further, particularly in the fields I mentioned earlier. That is what the Stay-in-School initiative is about, to encourage them to stay the course.

Launched in 1990, the Stay-in-School initiative is designed to reduce the drop-out rate and encourage students to remain in school. It is administered by Employment and Immigration Canada. In Quebec only, $3.2 million will be spent. The national budget was over $46 million for 1991-92, and over $73 million for 1992-93.

Some 140 projects in Quebec only were submitted in 1991-92, and government is constantly stepping up efforts to get the industry and academic sector to get into new youth training partnerships across the country.

Stay-in-School is a five-year program with three parts or main objectives. First, to provide financial support for a number of initiatives designed to encourage students to stay in school.

Second, the program seeks to involve the labour movement, business people, educators, parents and students alike in helping to find better solutions. The workers, their employers and other stakeholders have new agreements that allow the workers to upgrade their skills and to contribute more directly to the success of their firms.

Third, Stay-in-School is to create public awareness on the social and economic impact of dropping-out. In that area as in others, information is the key.

Government also reviewed the Labour Force Development Strategy. By modernizing its approach, it has refreshed its workers' programs. There are interesting prospects for young people with training problems in the Strategy.

All those concerned must take the steps required to ensure that the Canadian labour force adapts without further delay to modern requirements. Schools must unavoidably be involved, given the future of the next generation is at stake.

We have also expanded our programs and services to young Canadians yet further. We are allocating new resources to mobilizing business, labour, educators and provinces. We promote dialogue and urge all stakeholders to help us develop the most relevant and consistent solutions nation-wide.

• (1510)

We have developed an information program in order to heighten public awareness of the school drop-out problem. One of the main purposes of that program is to make people understand that we cannot put aside the economic realities of our world. Like it or not, we are now part of a global economy and we are going through a phase of technical and social turmoil that affects us all.

The individual, the company or the country that would refuse to adapt itself to this changing environment would be irremediably lost. Our way of life and our growth are closely linked not only with our working capacity, but also with our capacity to constantly keep up to date.

As we approach the 21st century and try to take our place in the economy, our government acknowledges the importance of education, professional training and retraining.

In that perspective, we have formed new partnerships with industry and labour, with the education and social services sectors because we want all Canadians to be aware of the greatest challenge of these times, that is the necessity to develop our human resources according to the rules of modernity and for the benefit of modernity.

Those countries which are successful today, those that will be tomorrow, share one common characteristic: they value knowledge. They also value continuing education, that is a learning and training that goes on for all your life.

Departments must also publish, in various shapes and forms, the information and data that young people need to stay in school and to choose a career. The government is striving to make sure that the sums allocated to the training and employment of young Canadians be distributed according to the decisions and priorities expressed by the people themselves simply because it must answer these very fundemental needs.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by congratulating my colleague from Nepean for putting this motion forward. When we see what is happening in our country today with our youth and the desperate situation in terms of employment opportunities, she is to be congratulated. The only problem we have with this motion, such a good motion, is the fact we only have a short time to debate it.

This is the kind of motion on which, I am sure, all members would agree we could carry on a productive, constructive debate for hours and hours.

I want to begin my remarks by referring to a report that was produced by my colleague, the hon. member for York North, who wrote a report on youth issues, "Background Information", in August 1992.

I want to refer to section 4 in this report because it deals specifically with literacy training. I am quoting from his report: "In February 1988 the Canadian Business Task Force on Literacy reported that the annual cost of illiteracy in the work place is roughly $4 billion. This is due to lost productivity, accidents and the necessity of increased supervision. The total social cost of illiteracy is estimated at $10 billion annually."

I refer to that specific part of the report because in my city, Toronto, close to 20 per cent of the youth are unemployed right now. I do not think we have ever had a situation like that in the city of Toronto. I realize that the national average, 17.2 or 17.3, is very high. However, in the city of Toronto when we talk about 20 per cent youth unemployment, we are talking about a real crisis.

The desperate situation that develops when we have that high a number of youth unemployed is so important to focus on, because it affects stress in families, it affects our crime statistics, it affects our statistics relating to the drug problem that we have in our city.

I listened quite carefully to the member opposite. I would not criticize any of her remarks. I think all of the programs of government that we heard the member put forward today are good programs. It is a good effort but it is just not good enough.

The point of the motion of my colleague from Nepean is that we have to restore the funding levels that we had in 1989 to this specific area of the budget. We are not putting money into a black hole when we put money into youth programs. We are putting money into an investment that is going to pay incredible returns over the long haul.

Again, I want to refer back to illiteracy. There is an organization in our city called Frontier College. By the way it is a Canada-wide institution. It is a volunteer organization based in Toronto. It is a literacy organization. It teaches people how to read and write. It has an outreach program.

This is an instrument that the Government of Canada could be supporting, that could put tens of thousands of our young people to work. It could put them in literacy courses, helping to train others to learn to read and write. This type of action is not only a productive and positive experience for our young people but it also addresses support and assistance for those older people in our community who are still able to serve in the work force.

The Minister of Industry, Science and Technology talks about his competitive strategy. Here is a terrific opportunity. He could take the energy of the young people of our country and target it into a very specific exercise that not only puts these young people to work, but also gives them a productive exercise in terms of helping to train the others in our society that are illiterate. It will serve all of us as a nation once they are brought back into the work force.

This government, and it is consistent on this, sees the deficit and debt and does not realize that as it cuts, it is actually exacerbating the situation. In the area of youth unemployment, it has good programs in place, there are good instruments out there, but it is not putting up the necessary funding.

The Minister of Finance said earlier today during Question Period that he was preparing for a debate on the economy next week.

• (1520)

He challenged us on this side of the House to put forward ideas where Canadians would support a constructive use of tax dollars. I am absolutely convinced that the Government of Canada next week should put large sums of resources targeting specifically the youth unemployment sector of our nation; not just throwing money at them, but giving them a very specific function.

I can remember back in late 1969, the early 1970s when Senator Hebert did the Katimavik project, a solid project where young Canadians interacted and did great work all across the country. They were not only productive in terms of their own self-fulfilment but they made a contribution to the community.

I would appeal through you, Mr. Speaker, to the government to come out strong on this and put money in support of the youth of our country. Restore those funding levels that my colleague for Nepean has talked about in her motion today and within that spectrum of youth support, put a very special focus on literacy.

I am sure if that is done that this side of the House will applaud that initiative.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the member for Nepean actually put this motion to the House. I believe it is a sincere motion. The substance of it dealing with the young people of this country is critical to all of us.

As the previous speaker indicated, it is not one that is limited to one party or the other. It is one that all of us not only would like to debate, but one that all of us would like to find some answers to. It is a terribly serious problem. To show the diversity of it, the mover of the motion is from Nepean. She represents these people basically and she talked a lot about Ottawa centre. The previous speaker talked about Toronto, the biggest metropolis we have in Canada. We had a speaker from Quebec indicating some of the unique situations there.

My riding of Cariboo—Chilcotin is unlike any of them. It is a huge area, 60,000 square miles of beautiful land that is sparsely settled, two and one-half square miles per family. Some constituencies in Canada are less than two and one-half square miles. This is what I have for each family in my constituency.

If there is a common theme from all of the ridings represented so far in this debate, it is that of our young people and the need for their education and to ensure that they do have a meaningful future through education.

I have a terrible concern. I have expressed it a number of times. The problem of not having sufficient work for the young people has gone beyond being an economic problem, it is quickly becoming a social problem. We as the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces have to address that situation and find solutions.

The motion indicates that we should restore funding to at least the 1989 levels. That in itself I do not think is sufficient. That was the intent that she intended. She argued that there should be increases in certain areas.

When I compare the expenditures and take all of the programs for the young people and pull them together, the levels of 1989 and the levels of last year and in fact this year have gone up. There has been nearly a 15 per cent increase over those years. Some have gone down and the hon. member has addressed those. Others have gone up. Some of those which have gone up are extremely important. The key element that the government has had to face is that of finding a balance between the resources that we have as a nation and the needs of the young people of this country, the future of our country. One of the areas that has taken the greatest increase, a huge increase, and I argue a very necessary increase, is that of addressing the young people that have dropped out of the school system. Our efforts are necessary efforts to get them to stay in school or to get back in school.

When I look at those numbers briefly, as a country we are in the neighbourhood of 30 per cent of our students dropping out before they have completed secondary school. There are some provinces that are better than 30 per cent, others are poorer than that, and a few in fact, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, up to 60 per cent. In the riding I represent it is a very high number.

In my opinion the emphasis that has been taken by the government has been a very appropriate one. It is absolutely essentially, not only for the young people but actually in terms of if you spend your dollars wisely, that is where they will go.

We had a group testifying in front of one of our committees last week which made the point that some of the people in poverty now that were not able to get their education when they were young require not months of retraining to enter the work force, but years of training. The cost to young people later in life to try to get them back into the work force is a quantum difference between the cost of trying to keep them in now. If we can do anything to keep them in now, it is worth while.

The Conference Board of Canada recently did a study of the drop outs in 1989. There were 137,000 young people that dropped out in 1989. The cost to Canada over their lifetime will be in excess of $4 billion.

The Minister of State for Youth in a statement recently put it as well as you can: "Education has a higher rate of return than almost any other alternative investment both for young people and for society".

There is an interesting number in terms of the need for these young people for training. Two–thirds of jobs created in Canada during this decade will require workers to have more than 12 years of education and training and 40 per cent of those jobs will require at least an additional five years of education beyond that.

If these numbers were not enough to convince me of the need to address it, as a drop–out I say to the students across Canada that are contemplating leaving school, do not do it. I was one of those that left school with just grade eight education. I did make out. I wandered around for several years and had several different jobs. I was terribly fortunate. I found my way back into school and subsequently completed university and ended up in this esteemed House with my colleagues. I was lucky.

I see some of my associates who in those days quit school at the same time and they did not make it. I can tell you that their life is not good. I can honestly say when I see people that are in a drop–out situation I think there but for the grace of God go I.

One of the programs, and it will be the last one I talk about before I close, is one of those that has been used to address the problem with our drop–outs in our society. It is the WOW program leading to SEED. It has in fact achieved significant increases in budget over the years.

Yes, we put the money there but does it work. I can tell you it is working in my area. I have a letter from a co–ordinator of a program addressed to me recently that is indicating the results of the WOW pilot project evaluation are complete. The response has been overwhelming in favour of continuing the program.

They go on to indicate that the pilot project program has been very successful in achieving its goals and objectives.

Of the employers surveyed, 87 per cent rated the program as good or excellent; parents, 93 per cent; students, 96 per cent rated the program as excellent. They go on to say: "I can assure you that all the results indicate that the program has been exceedingly worth while in motivating and redirecting the risk and drop–out students to continue their education".

A student from this program wrote to me: "It has taught me how to get a job and why school is important. The real world is not as easy a place to be in as I thought it was, but the WOW program sort of gives you a few extra bars to climb up the ladder. Right now I am going to go back to school and finish my education".

Another one wrote: "I was sitting at home doing nothing but partying a lot because I did not know what I was going to do with my life. I was scared, but the WOW program opened new and different doors for me and taught me that life was not a big party. I believe this program has helped me".

It is these that indicate to me that as a government, as a people of Canada, in spite of the fact that we have extremely tight restraint limitations on us now, the onus on us is to spend those dollars wisely, to allocate the resources that we have for the training of youth. There is a huge need. The funds are limited. We have to use them wisely and pray to God that we can find more we can allocate to this cause. If anyone deserves more dollars if we can find them it is the young people of Canada.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to congratulate the member for Nepean for having taken the leadership role in bringing about this motion to the House of Commons. She obviously understands and has an appreciation for the crisis that young people in this country are facing.

I had the privilege in the past year to travel throughout Canada as the co-chair of the Senate/House of Commons committee on youth. I can tell you that as I travelled across Canada, going to every province and the Northwest Territories meeting hundreds of Canadians, both young people and also those individuals in this country who are concerned with youth issues, I saw a sad reality, the marginalization of young people that is taking place in this country.

It is dangerous. We met with teachers, students, fishermen, farmers, police officers, people who run drop-in centres, representatives of aboriginal groups, multicultural groups. Through those meetings we learned a great deal about the state of youth in Canada. It is quite bleak.

Everywhere we went, whether it was to Moncton, Quebec City or Edmonton, the message was always the same: young Canadians have no confidence in their future. Young Canadians, their parents, their teachers and people in youth serving organizations all look to government for leadership.

Unfortunately this government has turned a deaf ear to their concerns. In the past two years our youth have struggled alongside other Canadians through the worst economic recession in memory, while the government cannot shake off its obsession on inflation and in the past on the constitutional deal.

When we speak about the future, when we speak about the concept of global competitiveness, getting Canada ready for the 21st century, it cannot end just with the rhetoric. What we need are programs that are going to address the specific concerns faced by young people. What is amazing about our country is that we set goals to achieve greater economic heights and social justice. We always strive toward building a fair and just society. Unfortunately, this particular government is not providing the tools, the vehicles of opportunities for young people to achieve those ends.

We in this country today face a severe crisis. Thirty per cent of our young people do not finish high school. They are high school drop-outs; 100,000 every year and one million in a decade. This should sound an alarm bell to this government to clearly understand that if it is serious about restructuring the economy, about meeting the challenges of the global market, then it must also be serious about developing the type of human resources required to bring about the positive changes in the structure of this economy that will result in prosperity for Canadians.

This past summer I met with many students that wanted to continue their post-secondary education but were denied that vehicle of opportunity by this government. In the past eight years it has literally taken away thousands upon thousands of summer jobs that would give ability to these young people to continue their education.

Once and for all the Conservative government must understand that the pillars to global competitiveness, to restructure our economy and bring prosperity to this country are education, training and research and development. Closely tied to these three issues is our ability to enhance our human resources. Young people are sick and tired of listening to this government's rhetoric about how young people are the future of this country and how this generation of Canadians depends greatly on their ability to carry the torch in the future.

I am telling you, that is not going to be possible unless this government really takes its responsibilities seriously and realizes that we must look at alternative ways of training our young people. We do not hear anything from that side about a serious approach to a national apprenticeship training program. We do not hear anything from the other side about a serious approach to co-operative education. We do not hear anything about youth programs, such as we had in the past, like Katimavik, a program that gave hope to so many young Canadians. That has been scrapped in the name of fiscal restraint.

There is also going to be a time when Canada will have to address not only the financial deficit but the human deficit this particular government has created. Perhaps programs, not necessarily like Katimavik, but programs that will relate to the present reality we now face have to be looked at. That is the only way we will bring about the positive change Canadians and particularly young people are asking for. From that side of the House we have heard: "We have to cut the SEED program. We have to deny young people jobs in the summer to continue with their education. We have to cut federal transfer payments that go toward post-secondary education and also deny them that opportunity".

I do not understand how the government thinks we are going to build a prosperous future if we do not invest in people. It is about time that we as the House of Commons start dealing with the real problems of real people. It is about time that this government realizes it must start putting people first and abandoning some of the agenda that has driven this country into one of the worst economic recessions in modern times.

Perhaps I can briefly summarize. I have travelled throughout Canada to listen to what young people had to say. The common theme was that they were discouraged and demoralized about the prospects for their future. They felt that this government had not given them the proper vehicles of opportunity and they want change. This change will be brought about either through some progressive measures that the present government must undertake, or I promise young Canadians that when we form the government positive change will occur for them.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, what surprises me in that motion is that the government has done a lot more than what this motion is asking for.

During the few minutes that are left, let me put this debate in context and describe for those who seem to know nothing about them, the many concrete and practical measures taken by this government to deal with this global issue of training young Canadians and putting them to work.

The nation is increasingly concerned about school drop-outs and wants to know what is being done to slow down this process. At the national level, 30 per cent of high school students drop out for various reasons ranging from lack of interest or success to the urge to earn money as quickly as possible.

In the province of Quebec, rates are even more alarming at around 36 per cent for the general population and 42 per cent for male students.

The school drop-out is often a child or a teenager who feels lonely or isolated from society. He does not talk about his problems with his parents or his teachers. One day they realize that he has dropped out and it is already too late. Deprived of support, our youth often become the victims of a society unable to provide the climate necessary to acquire the skills required for a bright future.

It seems to me that we should do the opposite with our human resources. Given the changes which are occurring in the technological world and in the industrial sector, we need more and more highly skilled workers. In an increasingly global economy, Canada will have to compete harder for the next few decades and must prepare for that.

The best way to prepare for a prosperous future is to make sure that our labour force will be able to meet all the challenges facing us. It is therefore by staying in school that our youth will best learn how to prepare for their future obligations.

We are well aware that at the end of this century and into the next, Canadian workers will have to have at least a grade 12 education to hope to find a job to their liking; and sometimes they may even have to stay in school for 17 years. We also know that they will have to retrain more than once throughout their careers in order to satisfy the new market requirements. Their jobs will be increasingly technical and will require not only some general knowledge, but also certain specialized skills. The federal government is well aware of its responsibilities in the matter and has implemented a series of measures to encourage young people to at least finish high school.

The government launched the Stay-in-School initiative in February 1990 in order to try to bring the drop-out rate down and to encourage youngsters to stay in school. Created by Employment and Immigration, this program will have spent more than $46 million in 1991-92 and the figure should be well above $73 million for 1992-93.

Quebec submitted almost 140 projects for 1991-92 and our government is increasingly trying to establish partnerships with industry and the education sector in order to achieve better training for our young people. Labour will also have to be involved. We can already see the day when training will be a priority in our culture and when our labour force will be on an equal footing with the other developed countries of the world.

It is a challenge; that is the key word in this issue and we have put it at the very heart of our initiatives. The sums allocated by government for the training programs, the work orientation programs, the bridging programs, the employment and labour force re-entry programs form a varied and tightly strung network which we modify according to need. It will always be a priority.

The funds spent by government in that area are distributed in such a way that both objectives, that is that our youth stay in school and that we have a highly qualified work force, will be reached in the short and long term. It is vital for our social stability and for our economic prosperity.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent) moved that Bill C-301, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act (financial administration), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise this morning to lead off Private Members' Business hour. We are here to discuss Bill C-301, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act. It is a bill that I thought would never see the light of day, just like many other very worth-while private members' bills that have great merit but did not get the luck of the draw.

I am very proud of this bill. I am in this House as an elected member of Parliament to duly represent the great people of Kent. It is their views, opinions, ideas and concerns that Bill C-301 expresses as legislation. This bill is in direct response to the concerns of my constituents. That is my job. I listen to the grassroots, and this bill is a concrete example.

A consistent theme in most every piece of correspondence I get is that people are tired of government spending that gives no thought whatsoever to the average taxpayer. They are fed up with paying taxes, while the deficit goes up and the debt soars. These letters from my riding are not from one certain income group, job category or particular area of the riding.

The notion of big government not managing our money properly is coming from farmers, factory workers, students, housewives, small business owners, teachers and the list goes on. I hear it in my riding and I hear it from other members of Parliament on both sides of the House. This bill will go a long way toward restoring accountability to federal programs. It is what the people of Kent are telling me. I believe it is what the Canadian people want. On top of that, it is what the Auditor General suggested last week after issuing his annual report to Parliament.

If we ensure a strict monitoring of funds spent by federal departments it will help recover and regain some of the lost respect for this institution of Parliament and for individuals members of Parliament. Therefore, it is in that light that I present this bill here today.

I believe I am merely reflecting the views of average Canadians who are dismayed and disheartened with lack of accounting for how taxpayer dollars are spent. I will not necessarily get into a debate on the merits of the current government's handling of our finances. There are spending horror stories from every party, whoever governed this country.

This bill does not debate the past, but concentrates instead on the future to make every department fully and completely accountable to Parliament and thus to the Canadian people.

I have called Bill C-301 the common sense bill. It is a votable bill. While it may not be perfect, I hope the government side will look at it carefully before rejecting it out of hand. When we think about it, the bill makes sense just about every way we look at it. It is what the taxpayers want and deserve.

• (1110)

How does the bill work? Quite simply. All government programs and expenditures would have to be costed out fully and completely before they are implemented. As well, any cost overruns would need special authorization. It requires long-term planning by cabinet ministers; they would be forced to present to Parliament a detailed report showing any program's cost and its effects on the economy, environment, employment and social programs to the extent that it is possible.

This would be done several months before any program is approved to ensure that taxpayers get value for their money. Furthermore, a minister would be required to report any spending above the budget estimate and the reasons for such overspending. All detailed financial statements to Parliament would be automatically referred to the Auditor General and the public accounts committee for close inspection. This would eliminate hiding the true costs, since we all have to pay taxes. Let us make sure the money is not wasted.

I believe that by forcing federal departments and projects to stay within their budgets or to be forced to deal with specific questions on their failure to do so, taxpayers will get more value for their money.

There is no question that if those spending the money know they are being watched closely and will have to answer questions concerning their actions, they will spend money more wisely. At the present time there is not that concern.

I know of a recent federal project which was budgeted at $30 million, and later came in at approximately $200 million. We need to know why there was such a cost overrun, but under the present accounting system it takes special effort.

If this bill had been in effect such checks would be done as a matter of course. There would be no need to go to great lengths to get the answers and no bureaucratic red tape hiding the facts. The bill would prevent the bureaucratic shell game. We would know exactly how much is being spent, barring any unforeseen circumstances like an emergency or something, with greater scrutiny of excess costs.

Currently I believe there is an inherent attitude in the federal system which encourages overspending and waste. Right now if a program was allocated $100 million, and by fiscal year end has actually cost only $80 million, the administrators of the program look for ways to spend the remainder so that the next year they will not have their allocation cut. We should be rewarding those people who bring in programs under budget effectively and efficiently. With no real check on how money is spent, we are in fact telling them to spend every penny, needed or not, if they want more next year.

I will now get more specific with regard to this bill. It provides Parliament with better historical and long-term information on financial planning. Subsection 30(3) of the Financial Administration Act would be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

> Every warrant issued under the section shall be published in the Canada Gazette within 30 days after it is issued, and a statement showing all warrants issued under the section, the amounts of those warrants, and a detailed statement of the purposes to which the payment was supplied and the reason for the urgency shall be laid by the President of the Treasury Board before the House of Commons within 15 days after the commencement of the next ensuing session of Parliament.

The only change from the current wording is the sentence on the detailed statement. The purpose of this amendment is to give Parliament more information on the special warrants passed.

The Financial Administration Act is further amended by adding, immediately after section 42 thereof, the following heading and sections:

Part 3 is "long-term planning". Section 42.1 involves the creation of a new program.

It states:

> Where a new program is to be established requiring the expenditure of money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund, the minister responsible shall, prior to the commencement of the fiscal year in which the program is to be continued or established, lay before Parliament a statement showing:
> The objectives of the program;
> The estimated total cost of the program over its proposed life, and the method by which the cost has been estimated; > the estimated funds that will be required over the first five years;
> the anticipated effects of the program on the economy, environment, employment, and social programs;
> the appropriation out of which the programs will be funded.

A new section 42.2 deals with excess cost. If the minister is informed that the cost of a program will be more than planned, he or she may lay before Parliament a statement showing the amount and reasons for the excess cost for the year, and all the alternatives that were considered before concluding that the excess was unavoidable.

A new section 42.3 would deal with the Auditor General. Judging from his recommendations last week, I think he would be very pleased with this section. It states: "Every statement shall be automatically referred to the Auditor General who shall submit to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts a report on the statement and the program".

As well, a new section 42.4 would require that when a minister submits his spending estimates to Parliament for a fiscal year, information must be included on how much was spent the two previous years and how much he will expect to spend in the next four fiscal years. This would prevent government spending boondoggles like the green plan. Here was a project costing $3 billion but we do not know how much is being spent along the way. It is as if the Tories were saving up for an election.

Money for a project is announced, great publicity is generated but nothing gets done. A project should start at zero, needs are determined, and then come up with a figure.

I mentioned before about how this bill could help the Auditor General in his efforts as the watchdog of the Canadian taxpayer. He said in his news conference last week that it was time average Canadians got the straight goods on our financial problems and that public servants and politicians had better start delivering. I have been hearing that message from my riding and that is why this bill was presented for first reading on September 24, 1991.

After tabling his second report on government operations, Denis Desautels said he was pushing for truth in budgeting. I quote:

> Too often Parliament is asked for spending approval in advance with no idea what the final tab will be. Things are done on a two-step basis: a little bit now, a little bit later. We want to get away from that.

I could not agree with him more. I believe Bill C-301 will make great strides in the direction that our non-partisan, independent, neutral Auditor General suggests. He has sharply criticized the Public Service and MPs for misleading Canadians about how their tax dollars are being spent. He said that the Canadian taxpayer is the victim of continuing bureaucratic waste and department sleight-of-hand, while serious cracks are developing in the essential services Canadians depend on.

I was very pleased to see that the Auditor General put his grievances into three categories: taxpayers' money that has been wasted with no justification; taxpayers' money potentially at risk because controls are not in place to do a proper accounting; and, finally, money misspent through bad planning.

I have said time and again that the people of Kent in southwestern Ontario and indeed people all across Canada want to know that their hard earned tax dollars are being put to good use. Bill C-301 is a step in the right direction.

The Auditor General said last week that some departments continue to ignore the rules by not properly tendering government contracts. Industry, science and technology was raked over the coals for awarding $3.3 million in contracts without bids in competition. The prosperity initiative entered into 22 deals without competitive bids for contracts of up to $1 million. No statement was laid before Parliament showing how much money was needed and why. It takes the Auditor General to tell us in an annual report all these things.

We as parliamentarians and as watch-dogs of the public purse should be told these things here in Parliament before the Canadian people. By not doing so and by adding to the examples the Auditor General has given us only adds to the cynicism and mistrust Canadians have for all politicians in general. By working together, we can change all that.

The Auditor General stated: "There is a general widespread breakdown of management controls, including fundamental parliamentary controls. Canadians are very worried about the impact of the annual deficit and the accumulated national debt on their standard of living. We must tackle this issue head on".

In conclusion, playing the game properly and bringing in projects under budget in the private sector means good news and added profits. In government it means next year's budget is reduced. I believe that most Canadians would not object so strongly to carrying a heavy tax burden if they were convinced the money was being properly spent.

I hope everyone can see this bill as a breath of fresh air. I know that many MPs are so-called ordinary Canadians when they are elected to office, but something strange seems to happen when they get to Ottawa. They seem to forget about being ordinary Canadians and instead become politicians.

I had the opportunity of being a councillor and the head of a municipality for many years before entering federal politics. To many members of Parliament, this level of government is known as the minor leagues, but whether it is industry, sports or politics one must have a solid foundation on which to build.

As a leader of our municipality, we would strive for a balanced budget so the ratepayers knew where we stood. Our plans were done five years in advance and updated every year. Whether it is federal, provincial, regional, county or municipal government the money comes from just one source, you and I, the taxpayers.

This is what Bill C-301 is all about. At the beginning of the year our budget was addressed and we kept it throughout the year. Many members will say yes, but what happens in an emergency? The budget would fail. This does not have to be the case. You have to adjust, whether it is municipal or federal.

We had three emergencies during my tenure as head of the municipality of Dover township. There were three floods, two of which were very severe, causing millions of dollars in damage. Nearly one-third of the township was below lake level. We were spending nearly $500,000 a year on repairing interior dikes and drainage ditches which were filled with sediment after every flood.

To solve this problem, under the initiative of council we built the largest drainage pumping works in Canada to service the area at a cost of approximately $1 million. Now there are no repairs needed to the interior dikes for drainage ditches. This pumping scheme was originally slated to be built six years earlier when the ARDA dike was built around the township at a cost of $17 million to the federal, provincial and municipal levels. The upper tiers of government disallowed the pumping works because of the great cost. It was about $450,000 at that time. We were able to prove a saving of approximately $300,000-plus a year with it in place.

Bill C-301 is designed to plan projects properly so that this does not happen in the future to other areas of Canada. I could quote many other government projects in our area of southwestern Ontario where funding was wasted by the millions of dollars.

I urge all members to support this bill. A vote for Bill C-301 shows support for the average taxpayer. A vote in favour shows support for the independent and non-partisan Auditor General of Canada. A vote for this bill is a vote for common sense for a change. This bill is a result of listening. I want to thank my constituents for enabling me to represent some of their views by way of this private members' bill.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on Bill C-301, proposed by the hon. member for Kent.

The bill seeks to amend the Financial Administration Act in three areas: special Governor General warrants, long-term planning and the tabling of public accounts. Each of these amendments seeks greater accountability of the government to this House. Each requires that the government provide further information in order for this House to deliberate where the taxpayers' money is being spent effectively.

At first glance, most hon. members from both sides of the House would be inclined to agree that adequate information and accountability are absolutely essential in the democratic government of the House to fully exercise its responsibilities. The intentions are worthy. The hon. member has given careful thought to the manner in which the Financial Administration Act might be amended to enable this House to keep closer watch on how money has been spent and how it will be spent in the future.

When we take a closer look at what the hon. member proposes, we will want to consider whether the proposed amendments are in the best interests of this House.

While this House might welcome new responsibilities and powers to oversee government spending, I do not think that we would want to invoke requirements that inhibit the ability of the government to govern effectively. Least of all, do we want to impose a regime that would inhibit the ability of the government to provide accurate and quality information to this House? These are issues that we must address in the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Kent.

In the case of special Governor General warrants, the amendments would require added information to be tabled in the House by the President of the Treasury Board and would change the time frame in which warrants can be issued.

I would remind the House that special Governor General warrants can be issued to provide the government with funds only when three conditions have been met. Those conditions are carefully spelled out in the Financial Administration Act.

First of all, Parliament must not be in session because it is dissolved, prorogued or adjourned. Second, there are payments to be made which are urgently required for the public good. Finally, there is no appropriation in which the payment may be charged.

The use of special Governor General warrants are restricted to situations in which all three of these conditions are met. The Financial Administration Act limits their use to these conditions in order to strike a balance.

On one hand, the government must not be left without recourse to funding when conditions spelled out in the act are in place; Parliament is not in session, the government urgently needs the funding or has no other means in raising available revenues. On the other hand, however, is the power invested in Parliament to vote supply. The rule that public expenditures require the authority of Parliament is the bedrock of our democracy. It means that government must call Parliament into session. It is similar in importance to the convention that the government cannot levy taxes without the authority of Parliament.

Some members of this House are concerned that irresponsible use of special warrants would detract from the ability of Parliament to hold the government to account. Special warrants have been used in different circumstances for over 100 years. The most recent examples involved the use of four warrants in 1989. This House will recall that prior to the 1988 election, the second session of the 33rd Parliament had met continuously for almost 24 months. Following the election, Parliament was convened for a mere three weeks in order to pass the free trade agreement legislation.

Parliament then recessed but not before the government had informed the House of the need for further supply in the 1988–89 fiscal year. It tabled supplementary estimates B on December 16, 1988. Later the House adjourned and subsequently prorogued and the government requested the Governor General to approve special warrants. The President of the Treasury Board tabled documents pertaining to the warrants after Parliament reconvened in 1989.

The use of those special warrants was consistent with the nine other instances that special warrants were used since the Financial Administration Act was passed in 1951. The system has not been abused. The government has acted responsibly within the parameters of the Financial Administration Act.

The bill before us today of the hon. member for Kent would have the President of the Treasury Board report to Parliament 15 days after resumption. The president would explain the rationale behind the issuance of special warrants, including the purpose for the expenditures and why the matter was so urgent that Parliament could not be reconvened to settle the matter in a supply motion.

This House will recall that in the resumption of the first session in April 1989 two such statements on warrants were issued. In the winter of 1989 they were tabled by the President of the Treasury Board and prepared in the general format of supply or of supplementary estimates. They provided an explanation for the requirement of the additional appropriation. However, they did not address why the need for supply was considered urgent.

Under the Financial Administration Act the appropriate minister determines the urgency. The President of the Treasury Board can attest to this urgency in his report to the Governor in Council before a warrant is submitted to the Governor General. The president is not required to include information regarding the urgency of the warrants in his report to Parliament.

This House might consider whether such a statement might improve the ability of Parliament to monitor government expenditures. The amendment would place additional pressure on the government to justify the use of special warrants. We might ask ourselves whether additional measures are needed as outlined in Bill C-301, but I would emphasize that any decision to amend the Financial Administration Act should not restrict the government's ability to issue warrants under conditions now specified in the act.

The government will continue to require access to supply at times when Parliament is not in session, when there is an urgent need and when no other source of appropriation is available. That is where I believe this bill may go too far.

The hon. member for Kent wants us to redefine the period that Parliament is deemed to be not in session when it adjourns. The current period is 15 days. The member for Kent would like to see this extended to 90 days.

I can think of many instances where Parliament might adjourn for up to 90 days for reasons that would receive the full support of this House. The recent referendum campaign is a case in point. Under the amendments before us this House would have had to reconvene in the middle of the referendum debate had the government run out of funds. This would not have served the interest of the nation.

Hon. members from all parties worked hard in the referendum campaign. It was important to us to work in our constituencies to explain the provisions of the Charlottetown accord. There are times when our duty to our constituents and our country is better served through our presence in the ridings. These are times when the government will need to use special warrants in periods where Parliament is not in session for two or three months.

I believe it would be a mistake to give away the possibility of using special warrants at any time that Parliament is not in session. It would be preferable to retain the current provision so that the government would not be constrained under any eventuality by supply provisions.

The second issue covered by the hon. member's bill concerns long-term planning. The question at hand is whether the government has the responsibility to prepare strategic plans or whether the plans should be submitted to Parliament for approval. The hon. member for Kent proposes that when a new program is established the government table information concerning a number of long-term considerations. He wants the government to outline the long-term cost profile and any changes to that profile. He also wants to give the Auditor General an opportunity to review and comment on the information.

This is a proposal that flies in the face of parliamentary tradition. It represents a significant shift in the balance between the government and Parliament. It would threaten the ability of governments to plan strategically. Worst of all, it could compromise the quality of information that governments now use to assess various long-term options.

The member's proposals means that specific decisions of the Treasury Board which are confidences of the Queen's Privy Council would be tabled in Parliament. The proposal requires that the Auditor General would rule on the validity of methods employed to estimate the cost of a program and to give an opinion on whether or not a proposal is reasonable.

The Auditor General serves this House very effectively by assessing whether value for money has been provided. I do not think that we should cloud this service by making the Auditor General a commentator before the fact on the government's long-term objectives. That is not a matter for accounting; it is a matter for political decision making.

The hon. member for Kent also proposes that a seven-year expenditure profile be provided for each vote in the estimates. This would be given information on two previous years, the estimate year and the four future years.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the main estimates—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member's time has now expired.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it seems particularly suitable that this bill come before the House shortly after the Auditor General's report because its aim is to start a process to control better cabinet money spending opportunities.

Back a few years ago a committee of finance called the Cooper committee after its chairman gave an opening statement entitled "The Proposal for Improvement". It read:

The present budgetary process of developing and enacting tax and fiscal measures is inadequate. It fosters uncertainty, discourages efficiency, obstructs progress and hampers the proper functioning of government. It is time to get on with the job of bringing much needed improvement to the process.

The process of financial control of government is the concern of all Canadian citizens. As a member of this House who is a layman relative to finance, I share the concern and the responsibility the member for Kent shows and I share the responsibility to do something about it.

First, we as members have an obligation to the people of Canada in regard to the use of public funds. Second, we as members therefore have a responsibility to scrutinize how the money is spent. Third, we have a responsibility to do something about it if we believe that it is not spent well. The third responsibility is where the process breaks down. Bill C-301 is a modest attempt to start doing something about parliamentary control of cabinet power.

Our present structure does nothing about sharing cabinet authority with Parliament. At present Parliament is asked to sign the cheque but not to question cabinet authority to spend it as it pleases.

Successive Auditors General have made statements which are really variations of Macdonell's statement that government spending was out of control. They have all given many examples to prove that statement. The most telling proof I suppose is the continuing and growing deficit of this particular government.

We could spend a lot of time discussing the reasons for the deficit but it is obvious that this government, as did the previous one, is finding it impossible to keep the spending under control and is forced to settle in most years for trying to limit the rate of increase of the deficit. This obviously is not enough.

The reason we have a budget is to lay down the strategy for revenue and spending. The budget does not have a life of its own. The budget is part of a continuum which includes planning, which is legislation, budgeting, estimates, expenditures and public accounts. As part of that continuum the budget should be a management tool which is used to implement the planning which has manifested itself in the legislation which Parliament has passed in each case.

This bill suggests that the budget and estimates should be linked in the planning process so that Parliament will have some knowledge of what items are being suggested and how much they will cost. It attempts to make the planning and costing process automatic in its reporting to Parliament.

• (1140)

At present the estimates seem to have a life of their own with no particular relationship to the budget. Nor do they have any relation to public accounts. In fact I would challenge anyone to follow through the three processes—budget, estimates and public accounts—and explain to any logical, sane person what is the relationship of the numbers in the three programs.

To follow through on the continuum, estimates are in no way reflected in public accounts. There are reasons for this. Most of them are taken from successive reports of Auditors General. They are things like supplementary estimates which keep coming down at almost any off time, $1 votes, revolving funds, net voting which is not inconsistent with the requirements of the particular project, vote transfers, the envelope system, acts which define accounting procedures such as UI and pensions, formula spending and statutory votes, spending changes started without parliamentary authority, one recommendation made by the Auditor General in his last report, and budget changes brought about after estimates are passed.

These items show two things. They show a lack of the continuum and a lack of any responsibility between spending and parliamentary authority. All those points I mentioned above contribute the government's spending being out of control.

Government and Parliament need to take a global look at the financial operations. The present piecemeal approach is incongruous and contributes to the out of control spending. Besides attempting to force the government to look at the costs of its actions ahead of time, a lesson it should have learned back in 1982-83 when the research tax credit scandal was in place, and restricting spending by cabinet without parliamentary approval, we should suggest more restrictive actions than there are in this particular bill, restrictive actions such as no supplementary estimates, restrictive actions such as no $1 votes and restrictive actions such as having all increases to statutory votes require enabling legislation.

Back in November 1982 the hon. Ron Huntington, MP, and the hon. Claude-Andre Lachance, MP, jointly produced a paper entitled Accountability—Closing the Loop. I recommend this paper to all members of Parliament.

This bill should be supported. It is one small step in an attempt to control all phases of finance. It is an attempt for Parliament to see what is going on so that the loop can be closed and that every phase of every department and agency fits into the continuum somewhere and can be scrutinized for its adherence to the plan and the spending within that plan. It suggests that departmental estimates be subject to the paper, Closing the Loop, that departments be subject to committee's veto if they have not spent the money well in the past. Without such action we are bound to have further Auditors General tell us that spending is out of control. That is his polite way of telling us that we do not know what we are doing.

Without action we are doomed to more deficits and more puzzlement on the part of the people of Canada about whether or not the government really has any control over its finances.

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to join in the debate on Bill C-301.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am just seeking clarification from the Chair. Does the rotation not come back to our side of the House after the NDP?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Yes. The rotation is between the two sides of the House.

I think you are right. It is Private Members' Business and I will give the floor to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. By way of clarification, it is my understanding that they will then have had three members speak from that side of the House and we will only have had one.

If I am not allowed to speak because of some standing order I will respect that. However, I thought it was two speakers from that side and then back to our side.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): This is a Private Member's bill, and since the mover is a member of the opposition I think it is not unreasonable, after recognizing a member with a different view, to recognize the opposition again and then immediately afterward, a member on the government side. In these matters the Chair always tries to encourage a balanced debate, and I think that considering the time we have left, we will have a chance to hear a range of views on this question.

I will recognize the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood and immediately afterward, the hon. member for Peterborough.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, through you to the government side of the House, when my time has expired government members obviously will have another opportunity to put their point of view forward.

I probably would have been a little bit more generous in giving up the time to the government had I thought that it was going to support the motion. In fact I was shocked when I listened to the member this morning, the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board, basically opposing the motion.

For the last eight years this government has been talking about this kind of accountability or control on reviewing and monitoring expenditures in trying to make sure that any waste or possible mistakes in the use of taxpayers' money are under a more rigid surveillance.

When my colleague, the member for Kent, approached me to speak on this bill, I said to him that I would not be surprised if there happened to be unanimous consent to pass this particular bill. As we were chatting about this this morning, I said: "This sounds to me like a motion that the government would put forward". Therefore, I was shocked. That is why I have to stick to my position here and support my colleague.

Speaking about him for a minute, the hon. member for Kent has been consistent on this point for the last four years, not only in this House but also in committee and in his community. I had the pleasure of working with him in his riding and speaking at one of his functions in Chatham just a couple of years ago. At that time he was talking about this kind of accountability in government. He has been consistent and unwaivering on this. This is the kind of thing the people of Canada want to see.

If the government had lived up to its campaign promises made in 1983 and 1984 before it came to power, that it was going to put the brakes on government expenditures and was going to streamline the government system, then perhaps there would be no need for a a bill like this. Government members said: "Listen, bring us to power and we will put control on government expenditure and we will look after the deficit and debt of this nation".

In 1984 when we left power there was a deficit of $180 billion. It must be remembered that half of that deficit was accumulated during the recession period of 1981 and 1982 and part of 1983. Is it not interesting that eight years later we are sitting with a debt that is probably close to $460 billion by now. I am not saying that it is not a difficult job to get a handle on the deficit and debt of this nation, but a creative idea has been put forward by someone on our side of the House.

The government is always challenging us to put forward new ideas and my colleague, the member for Kent, has put forward a constructive and creative idea that would be normal practice in a business environment or in any household. When a price has been given for building a new porch, for redoing a roof or for a paint or plumbing job, a bill for twice or three times the budgeted amount cannot be handed in after the job is completed.

We have had situations in this system, in the bureaucracy of government, time and time again where the budgeted amount has gone right out the window. The final amount is sometimes six or seven times the original budgeted amount. To think that there is no process for accountability on that until sometimes one or two years later is wrong.

My colleague's bill is very constructive. Once again, when we challenge the government to act on its words, it walks away.

I want to refer to a specific clause in Bill C-301. The opening sentence of paragraph 42(1)(d) reads:

> Where a new programme is to be established requiring the expenditure of money appropriated from the Consolidated Revenue Fund, the Minister who is to be responsible for the administration of the programme shall, prior to the commencement of the fiscal year in which the programme is to be continued or established, lay before Parliament a statement showing:

I want to go to part (d):

> (d) The anticipated effects of the programme on the economy, environment, employment and social programmes in Canada.

My colleague has come up with something Canadians would really expect. Why would we not be satisfied in approving a motion that would justify taxpayers' money being used in relation to factors such as the environment, employment opportunities and social programs, especially in the area of employment?

If Canadians saw that government was adding additional funds to programs directly linked to helping people get back to work, all sides of this House would be receptive to approving something like that. We could justify that action to our constituents. What is difficult to understand is when these increases to budgets happen with no rationale and no clear explanation. That is when we get blind-sided by our constituents.

The hon. member for Kent has put forward a reasonable and logical bill. I cannot believe the government is walking away from a form of accountability that it has been talking about for many years. In fact, this is the kind of bill expected from a Conservative member. My colleague from Kent is showing some of his honest, conservative leanings. Obviously, this is a good thing. I support it.

I am totally disappointed that the government cannot in its thought process get behind it. The Minister of Finance stood in this House a few days ago and said: "We are waiting for it. We are looking for ideas from the opposition on how we can improve the efficiency of government and how we can make it a better system of accountability".

Bill C-301 is an opportunity put forward by the hon. member for Kent and the government walks away from it.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will now recognize the hon. member for Peterborough, and I thank him for his courtesy and co-operation.

[English]

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, I really cannot do very much in one minute and 40 seconds, but I would like to use the time in the interest of all private members in the House on a point of order.

When I originally stood and my friend stood up and said that it was his turn and not mine, I understood the reason was that do we not usually go from side to side on a private member's bill. Then the Speaker stood up—if my memory serves me correctly and I would like to check the "blues"—and said that yes, it is the tradition to go from side to side during Private Members' Business.

I would just like to point out that is not what we did today. What we did is we started on that side with the Liberal member who presented the bill and that is perfectly in order. I am not questioning that. Then we moved over to our side to present another view. Then we moved back to that side for a view from the NDP and then we moved down to the other side for a view on an interjection by a Liberal member that it was really his turn and not mine.

I think there is a mistake there. I would like the opportunity to review the "blues". Then I would like the Speaker to perhaps have another look at the decision, which I believe was right, that we go from side to side on Private Members' Business. It is not three to one, three on one side and one on the other.

I think my time is up. If I am to fill another minute, the hon. member will never know whether I am for or against the bill. When he stood up his opening remark was that he assumed I was against it. I am in the government and I am a parliamentary secretary. I have not given my view that I was for or against it nor could I give and substantiate my view in the 33 seconds I have left.

I would appreciate it if the Speaker would again think about that three to one, three on one side and one on the other. Perhaps he could advise the House at this time if that is his understanding of the Standing Orders.

• (1200)

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I want the record to show that I was not debating your decision. I was seeking clarification before I spoke because had I sensed from the government side that there was any support for the bill I obviously would have taken a pass.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Perhaps I may offer some additional clarification. Our parliamentary practice dictates that the Chair recognizes, in turn, the three main parties in this House on any motion that is presented in the House. Usually the government speaks first as the mover of the motion. Subsequently I recognize a spokesperson for the Official Opposition and a spokesperson for the New Democratic Party, and we then go back to the mover of the motion.

However, this is Private Members' Business, and the motion was presented by a member of the opposition. We recognized the three main parties, in turn, and it seemed reasonable to go back to the party of the member who moved the motion, especially since the motion will be debated on two more occasions and there will be plenty of time for members to express their views.

I think that in this kind of debate, whether there was sufficient opportunity for expressing all sides of the question, it should be assessed at the end of the three sittings during which the subject is debated. It sometimes happens that during the first session one side of the question receives more attention than the other, but I think we should judge the debate in its entirety. The Chair intends to see to it that there is a balanced expression of views during the debate in the House.

[English]

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93 the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (FISCAL MEASURES) ACT, 1992

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday November 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak today to Bill C-76, a responsibility of the Department of Finance, which contains amendments to the Canada Student Loans Program. It is a fact—and I do not think this is news to hon. members and our listeners—that raising the level of education of our young people means increasing their chances of having a better income and a better quality of life. I would also say that better educated youth means a better future for this country.

The Canada Student Loans Program goes back to 1964, and since then more than two million Canadians have benefited under the program. Since 1964 the federal government has guaranteed $7.6 billion in loans. We have some idea of how the system works: the Canadian government guarantees loans made to students by financial institutions for post-secondary education. The government pays the interest on the loan while the student is at university and for six months after the course is finished.

The provinces—we must remember that education is in provincial jurisdiction—have the right to withdraw from this federal program and receive full compensation. At this time Quebec and the Northwest Territories have withdrawn from the federal program and receive financial compensation.

As for the other provinces, they receive the students' requests and decide how much to lend them. The students have nine and a half years to repay the loan when they complete their studies. Furthermore, they are entitled to an 18-month period after their studies in which they do not have to repay if they are unemployed for any reason.

We see that these are very attractive conditions and the problem which has been raised many times is that the federal and provincial governments, the financial institutions which lend the money and just about everyone are trying to help young people get a better education. We also see that the costs of those who do not repay are rising very rapidly.

In one of his reports the Auditor General said that the law was rather silent on the definition of "satisfactory academic performance", for example, because the assumption is that we will pay the interest and continue to cover the loan if the student's academic performance is satisfactory. That seems somewhat theoretical and left to the discretion of the student rather than the financial institution or the provincial or federal government.

It is probably a good idea—and this is what Bill C-76 sets out to do—to make three changes that will put the program on a financially sounder footing and at the same time help increase the amounts available for needy students. We must remember that the program is intended for students who would otherwise not be able to afford a post-secondary education.

The bill contains three changes which affect this program. It terminates the six-month post-graduation criterion. In other words, the student graduates, starts working and no longer has six months grace before starting to pay interest. I think everyone realizes the federal government and the provinces have substantial financial burdens, and if we endorse a loan and pay the interest on the loan to the financial institution for two, three or four years, and the borrower, in this case the student, has nine years to pay back, I think we can expect the student to start paying the interest as soon as he graduates, which means as soon as he has finished using the loan program.

We also want to have more clear-cut arrangements with the provinces that operate under the program and those that have opted out to ensure better co-ordination, better management of taxpayers' money, both nationally and with respect to the assistance our students will receive under this program.

Finally, and I think I speak for the entire government, we would like to simplify the program's administration. At the same time there is perhaps a desire to review the way financial institutions manage this program. When a borrower defaults, they call the federal government and say: "Pay up". Perhaps the program could be streamlined to make the financial institutions a little more, I wouldn't say responsible but perhaps more involved in student loans, because it is easy for a financial institution when the provincial government says that Mr. X and Ms. Y is accepted as a student who is entitled to a loan. Mr. X or Ms. Y goes to a financial institution and arranges for a loan. The institution knows the loan is 100 per cent guaranteed by the federal government and the government will pay all the interest for the duration of the courses taken by Mr. X or Ms. Y.

For the financial institution the risk is minimal. If the former student does not pay the interest or the principal according to the terms and conditions for one reason or another when his or her studies are over, the government pays anyway.

• (1210)

There may be a way to simplify and update this program's approach without cutting funds and reducing a student's opportunity to get an education by establishing a better, sounder administrative framework.

In 1985 the program cost $286 million; in 1991, $453 million. It has almost doubled in five years. I think that it was right and fitting for the Minister of Finance to say in the budget and in Bill C-76 that is before us today that this program will be better managed in a way that does not penalize students.

This also means a better agreement on this program between the federal government and the provinces because educating students is the provincial governments' responsibility. The federal government is there only to help. We must help, but I think that we must do so at a reasonable cost.

This is the thinking behind Bill C-76 that has been tabled and I know that the Department of the Secretary of State has already started to work with the financial institutions and with the various stakeholders. A document on student loans is being discussed with the provinces and they are being consulted on it. Federal and provincial officials have been working together on a new approach and better administration of the system so that again taxpayers' money will be spent to the best advantage and young Canadians will receive higher education which they could not afford alone or even with their families' help.

I ask the House to pass Bill C-76 as soon as possible so that everything will be in place in accordance with the provisions of the budget speech and the Canadian government will save money at the same time as it helps our young Canadians get an education.

[English]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak on Bill C-76. I would like to focus on the subject of the Canada Student Loans Act in particular.

The reason I wish to speak on this particular segment is because of the importance of the student population to Canada as a whole and to the future of not only our country but the whole world.

At the time the Minister of Finance was introducing his budget, a very progressive initiative was announced by the federal government which was called "Learning Well Living Well". In it are a variety of interesting objectives and statistics which I would like to share with my colleagues and with the public at large.

One point struck me at the time. I was quite impressed by an objective of the "Learning Well Living Well" proposals. The major purpose of that particular paper was to deal with the ongoing problems in our educational system, with the productivity within our society and with a variety of other issues that deal with the question of education.

For example, I am not sure what happened to one objective at the time, whether it is still on the books or has been put on the shelf. A 10-year goal was spelled out which included cutting adult literacy rates in half, having 90 per cent of Canadians attain high school diplomas or the equivalent by the age of 25, quadrupling the amount of learning that employers provide to students through structured work experience as well as quadrupling the amount of training employers provide to their regular employees, doubling community college standards and university post-graduates in science, engineering and technology, becoming a world leader in mathematics and science achievement at all levels of the school system, and finally having a system of life-long learning that would be among the world's best at setting standards of performance in accessing achievement.

One would ask why the government at the time was talking about those proposals. We on the opposition side know why there is need for some immediate action when it comes to the question of education and the question of literacy in Canada. At the present time on an annual basis we have in excess of 100,000 students who drop out before they finish high school. By doing so they are creating a growing number of functional illiterates who are largely untrainable and are increasingly an unemployable group of citizens.

Also in Canada now about 38 per cent of the Canadian population has difficulty reading or writing. That is cause for alarm. One would ask: "How can society move one step forward with these difficulties and these impediments?"

Even if we were to ignore those figures for a moment and look at what has happened in Canada from 1966 to the present, in 1966 about 25 per cent of the work force in Canada were youths. As we moved toward the 1970s and 1990s the percentage of youths in the work force began to shrink. By the year 2000, the percentage of youths in our work force will again decrease to approximately 17 per cent.

The number of students entering the work force is shrinking on a daily basis. One would say: "If that is the case something must be done". Even with these percentages approximately 30 per cent of youth are dropping out and not finishing their high school and 40 per cent of the population is functionally illiterate.

This is a very urgent matter and as we move toward the year 2000 the vast majority of jobs in Canada will demand at least 16 years of education. According to the 1990 statistics of Employment and Immigration Canada, 40 per cent of all new jobs in Canada will require more than 16 years of education. If we were to compare that with the jobs that require less than grade 12 education, about 35 per cent of the jobs would require less than grade 12 education.

In other words, unless one has a university degree by the year 2000 one's chances of finding a job in the labour force are going to be extremely slim. That is what I thought was the whole focus of "Learning Well Living Well" two years ago when the government came up with those initiatives, that something drastic had to be done.

We have seen very little in the budget to address not only the question of accessibility to post-secondary education but also the question of the quality of education we are providing to our students, as well as the kinds of accessory things the government is doing in order to make sure students are coming out of the educational system with the degree they need and are finding the jobs they require.

It is no surprise to me that the budget did not deal with that issue. In fact, if we look at the past four or five years, every time we had a federal budget one of the areas we saw being cut was that of transfer payments to the provinces for post-secondary education.

As such, if we were to look at the trend by the year 2004 there will be no transfer payments to the provinces from the federal government. To that extent one would only question the viability of the government proposal to address the question of education when in fact the federal government is cutting transfer payments to the provinces. By doing so it is minimizing the amount of flexibility that existed in the past in trying to pressure the provincial government to put more money toward education and to invest more in the area of education.

Student assistance in particular is a very urgent matter. As you know, Mr. Speaker, as a former student, as well as many of my colleagues in the House of Commons, many students who go to university to finish their degrees live to a large extent below the poverty line, and we are talking about way below the poverty line.

I recall from my student days—and I am sure the student population who is watching the parliamentary channel will share this point—that students live on very little money during the year as well as while they are taking their courses. In many cases they are eating food that is not nutritional enough. Perhaps it is really affecting their health to a large extent. As it is, we are not really investing enough in education. I was quite surprised to see the provincial government was cutting the grant to the student population altogether when the provincial Government of Ontario, the NDP government, had promised to increase funding to the student population.

I look at the federal government in this whole scene with all these alarming statistics and I think if this happened in any other G-7 country we probably would have seen an educational revolution of a very large proportion. However in Canada we seem to be content talking about it a little around budget time and talking about it whenever we have an opportunity to speak to a large group of people. In fact we are doing very little to deal with it and to address it in a tangible and effective way.

The government is not doing a lot in this area. In fact governments at the federal and provincial levels do not seem to consider it a priority. It is looking at it as a way to cut the deficit. It is looking at cutting assistance to students, cutting transfer payments to the universities and the post-secondary institutions and cutting the amount of money put into research and development. It is hoping to deal with the deficit but it is cutting off its own nose. There is no way we can deal with the question of the deficit unless we are investing in the most important sectors of our society: the educational sector and the research and development sector. Not only is the government not doing enough, the private sector does not seem to be doing a heck of a lot either.

According to information obtained in 1987, statistically only one-third of employers in the private sector have provided any kind of training to their employees when it came to education on the job. That is an extremely small percentage when it is compared with what is happening in Sweden, Japan and elsewhere.

One would wonder what is really going on in our society. We do not seem to be doing the things we should be doing to move forward and to continue providing the quality service we have provided our people over the years.

One would suggest that the federal government should try to address the fundamental problems we are faced with in terms of the educational system, in terms of research and development in industry and in terms of what the provinces are doing to address the problem.

I have seen nothing in the budget that addresses the question of transfer payments. In other words, in the past the federal government would give the money to the provinces hoping the provincial governments would use that money to invest in education. What we have seen in the past is the provinces taking the money and spending it pretty well on anything but education.

There is nothing in the budget. I have seen nothing over the past four years being done by the government to address this particular subject. As well, I have not seen anything from the government side to try to address the objectives or the promises made to the Canadian population and to the House of Commons two years ago when we talked about dealing with the questions of literacy, drop-outs and so on.

I would like to see the government moving very quickly on a number of fronts. First, the government should deplore the action of the provincial government that is in the process of cutting grants to the student population. Second, the federal government should look at the promises it has made over the past two years. In fact over the last eight years we have been talking about the questions of education, literacy and research and development, and we have not seen a lot taking place. The federal government has to go back and look at those promises and bring forth something tangible now.

The government should reinstate the level of transfer payments to a level that is accessible and consistent with the needs of the student population. Somehow the federal government has to look at the whole notion of financing post-secondary education.

On a number of occasions student federations have put forward some very good proposals to the federal government addressing the question of post-secondary education, the question of accessibility and the question of assistance to students while they are finishing their education. We on the opposition side, my colleague and I, have been calling on the government on a regular basis to take tangible steps to deal with the question.

For the information of members of the House and the public, I would like to mention that over and over again institutions in the private sector, and in many cases some provinces, have been moving toward the notion of establishing a national education standard. A national education standard is the only way for us as a government, as a society and as a people to move forward with a healthy, productive society in a healthy, productive country.

• (1230)

Without a national education standard we will continue to have 12 different educational systems in 10 provinces and 2 territories, 12 different ways when it comes to dealing with assistance to our student population, 12 different ways of studying Canadian history, 12 different ways of dealing with the curriculum and 12 different ways of trying to deal with any question that might be facing the nation not only today but in the future. The government is equipped now more than ever before with the tools it needs to address this question and this deficiency.

A national education standard, as it was proposed by myself in 1991 in a private member's bill, Bill C-318, will help the government to address this issue. I would like to share some of the suggestions in this private members' bill.

For instance, the national standard for education stated that every person who is interested in obtaining an education would be able to obtain one regardless of his or her age, level of income or background.

It deals with the question of improved standards in mathematics and science. It addresses the question of apprenticeship programs and partnerships with the private sector in co-operative programs. It addresses the question of a national strategy to deal with the recruitment and training of the people who are in the work force, as well as those who are educating the students to be out in the work force.

The bill also addresses the question of work-load and the question of the curriculum as a whole. It calls more than anything for a partnership among all of the different levels of the government, the students, industry and the different partners such as families, special interest groups and so on.

These are some of the things the government should be doing and has not done at all in its budgets. Nor has the government addressed it in any way, with the exception of saying it wanted to deal with the question of fiscal responsibility and with cutting the deficit and this is how it can deal with it. However, we have a problem now and the government says it will deal with it at a later date. We have been waiting for that strategy for quite awhile.

Another issue the government has to look at is the question of summer employment for students. Since 1985 the federal government has been cutting the summer employment budget on a regular basis. In fact, in excess of 50 per cent of the total government budget for summer employment has been eliminated.

Other issues include the continuing cuts of $3.2 billion over the past five years from the federal transfer payments to the provinces. The government is taxing books and that should be eliminated.

On a final note, the government could look at the accessibility of post-secondary education to women, aboriginal students, students with disabilities and students of different backgrounds in particular.

I can see my time is running out. These are some of the reasons we have concerns with this budget as it was proposed by the minister.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I have listened, as I usually do, to my hon. colleague in debate on this particular bill.

I have a couple of items I would like to put to him for his own views in the form of a question. The government seems to be pursuing a goal of prescribing fees in many areas. Most of them I guess are for cost recovery.

There have been areas where I have seen errors made by the government in assessing what the costs actually were. Most of the time it does get it right and I think we are heading in the right direction.

I am wondering whether my colleague believes that the government is adequately sensitive to whether the fees being charged and the structures being placed for government services, in this case in relation to the Lobbyists Registration Act, will structurally impair what we have always taken for granted in our society: that citizens can freely communicate with their government through MPs. Does the fee structure that is contemplated here, irrespective of the amount, impair the ability of citizens to adequately consult with their government through their MPs?

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, my colleague is referring to another section of the bill which deals with the Lobbyists Registration Act. I would like to thank him very much for his question on that particular segment of Bill C-76.

I would suggest to my colleague that any action taken to limit the accessibility of the public to their member of Parliament would be quite unfortunate because, in fact, we were elected to do just that, to talk with the people who have elected us. Groups, institutions, organizations such as the Red Cross or some of the distinguished national organizations that on a regular basis have to deal with their members of Parliament, need access to their members of Parliament.

I would suggest that if we were to impose fees on those types of organizations we would be making it extremely difficult for them to communicate with us in an effective manner.

To that extent, this particular amendment to the Lobbyists Registration Act would hinder the flexibility of these non-profit organizations to have access to their member of Parliament and to that extent I do not like that particular point.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, today in Canada, indeed all around the world, governments are being asked to think in different terms. Just as Canadians are themselves thinking about their own budget planning in different terms, they are demanding that government adopt a new approach to fiscal planning.

Such demands to think and act differently are very strong when it comes to matters of money, particularly in times such as these. Canadians want their governments to be stewards of public money, of their money, and not spend as though from a bottomless purse. Canadians want stewardship because they know, as do hon. members of this House, that responsible, prudent, financial management of the public accounts is vital to the health of the economy of this country.

In 1984 our government's aim was and continues to be just that: prudent financial management and responsible stewardship of our financial resources. This government has been pursuing the goal of sound financial management through deficit reduction. This government is working to bring the public debt under control and is reducing inflation through its monetary policies and budgetary measures.

One such budgetary measure is before us today for consideration, Bill C-76. Bill C-76 will empower the government to use another tool with which to control the deficit. It will allow us to address head-on a matter that must be of concern to any reasonable government, indeed to any enterprise, be it private or public. The concern is the cost of doing business and of providing service to the public, or should I say recovering those costs. Cost recovery is fiscal policy that is practical and fair. It is an important tool for a government working to provide service to the public without adding to the deficit.

Three years ago we decided that the legitimate profession of lobbying should be made transparent to the public and therefore we asked lobbyists to register their activities with the government.

This bill is a priority of the government because it will allow it to recover costs now being shouldered by the taxpaying public for services that are very focused and very sector specific. I am speaking of course of the services provided by the Lobbyists Registration Branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

While the beneficiary of such a specialized service is society as a whole, the cost of administering this service should be a cost of doing business as a lobbyist. I want to clear up any possible confusion that may exist about cost recovery as it pertains to lobbyists registration and the pending review of the Lobbyists Registration Act.

As hon. members will recall, when this House adopted the Lobbyists Registration Act three years ago we required that the act be reviewed after three years. What we are discussing here today, namely the recovery of costs for the registration of lobbyists, is on a completely separate track from the review of the Lobbyists Registration Act and it must be on a faster track.

Fiscal responsibility and cost recovery require prompt and separate attention. Accordingly my remarks today are focused on how best to contribute to achieving the government's economic goals as set out in the February budget and to fulfil the demands of Canadian taxpayers that their money be spent wisely and responsibly.

Bill C-76, which was introduced in this House in May, is one means of accomplishing that end. It will allow the government to establish a cost recovery structure and cost recovery levels under the Lobbyists Registration Act. Until now the cost of registration and the cost of the other services provided by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have been absorbed by the government. Given the government's priority to reducing the deficit, this clearly cannot be continued.

The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is now considering the options for the structure and level of the fees. Until this system is devised I cannot say what the charges might be or how they will be applied. What I can say however is that public consultations will be an integral part of the development of the registration fee structure and level.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, second reading is to debate the principle of the proposed legislative amendments, the principle of cost recovery and fiscal responsibility. If the House approves, hon. members and invited witnesses will have ample opportunity to offer their input and advice before the legislative committee. I can assure this House that we will give serious consideration to suggestions made at that time. In addition, the proposed regulations will as required be pre-published in The Canada Gazette, providing all Canadians an opportunity to comment.

In conclusion, I would like to tell the House that the registration fees must not be viewed as an attempt to regulate the lobbying industry, which plays an important role in the democratic process in our country and in the way it is governed. The fees in this bill should be seen instead as a cost recovery measure, nothing more, and certainly nothing less.

Registration fees will become a cost of doing business like any other business, as is the business of lobbyists. More important, the Canadian government and the Canadian taxpayer will recover the cost of ensuring that those who attempt to influence its decisions do so in the full light of day. Registration fees are not regulation. They are not a hindrance to access to government. They are integral to responsible fiscal policy: cost recovery for the benefit of every Canadian.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure on behalf of the New Democratic Party to open debate from our side on Bill C-76. For the benefit of the voters who are watching this debate, it is a bill which does four things. It increases the limits on business improvement loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act. It reduces the salaries of ministers of the government, including the Prime Minister. It requires that lobbyists pay a registration fee and, finally, the bill provides for certain changes in the Canada Student Loans Program.

It is on the latter that I intend to spend most of my time this morning. However, to call to the attention of the viewers what is involved and its significance, it should be pointed out that the Small Businesses Loans Act amendments would provide for an increase in the loan limits from $100,000 to $200,000, which is a change that my party certainly finds unobjectionable. The question really is whether it is of any great utility, considering the difficulties that small businesses have, even with the provisions of the Small Businesses Loans Act, in getting bank loans for the furtherance of their businesses.

This is an area of considerable concern. In fact the number of small businesses getting loans guaranteed by the federal government has decreased over the last few years as a result of the economic situation. Yet, the economic situation is somewhat dictated for a significant number of them by their inability to get loans.

Second, given what Canadians consider to be the proficiency of the ministers of the federal cabinet, for the benefit that has accrued to the populace from their activities, I do not think that this bill will be seen as enough. I think the average Canadian would prefer to see the salaries of the ministers cancelled. The only way in which one can do that is to have an election.

With respect to the registration fee for lobbyists, it makes good sense to us that services to which lobbyists have access be paid for. However, we have concerns, which have been expressed by others about the costs that might be imposed upon non-profit organizations for whom access to parliamentarians should be as free as possible. These are the people who are powerless and cannot afford to pay significant fees simply for the purpose of coming before Parliament or its committees. Talking to parliamentarians is difficult enough.

The significant issue in my mind is the portion of the bill that changes the Canada Student Loans Program. Part of it seems to be relatively trivial. It changes the conditions under which provinces that opt out of the federal student loans program will function. This does not seem to provide for any significant impact on the capacity of those provinces opting out to carry out the administration of this program.

The second part of the changes to the Canada Student Loans Program provides for the elimination of the presently existing six-month interest-free period that students have right after graduation. There was a six-month forgiveness period in advance of which the students did not have to start repaying their loans. This must be considered in the context of a number of changes which considered together are quite significant.

• (1250)

What is happening here must be viewed within the over-all context of what is now being said by just about everybody, which is that if Canada is to be successful in the global economy it must adapt to the nature of that economy. If there is one thing that is clear about the so-called new global economy it is the intense involvement and significance of knowledge in the new high value-added economies which are growing in the industrial world: in Europe, Japan and elsewhere. Any observer of the Canadian scene recognizes that if there is anything fundamental that Canada must do to compete in the new knowledge-intensive, global economy it is to provide that every citizen can attain the level of education, training and skills development that they can achieve.

It therefore follows relatively clearly that if we are to achieve this it must be by making it possible for everyone to have access to the kind of training or education which is most appropriate to their aspirations and aptitudes.

We should be talking about increasing training and retraining, and improving education at both the secondary and elementary levels, as well as the post-secondary level. The post-secondary level is very important to us. Our colleges and universities are of fundamental significance. They are a focus of a knowledge based economy.

We should be increasing the quality of post-secondary institutions and we should be looking for any way by which we can possibly increase accessibility to those institutions. However, what has happened? What has happened even as this government utters the rhetoric that education and training are so important? With respect to post-secondary institutions the government has cut back the EPF payments to the provinces so that there will be a total of about $11 billion in cutbacks over a decade to the post-secondary institutions. Commensurate with that there has been a marginal increase in research funds.

Meanwhile, these transfers have had an effect on what the provinces do. In Ontario just last week there was a tragic decision by that government to eliminate grants to students, grants which make it possible for low income university and college students to gain access to universities. Grants are important to students with low incomes because for students who come from the lower socio-economic strata of society the notion that they will have a huge debt when they exit from university or college is a considerable deterrent.

This series of decisions taken at the federal and provincial levels have led to changes which have made it more difficult rather than easier for students to gain access to universities.

With respect to the Canada Student Loans Program, just last year this government introduced a 3 per cent surcharge on the loans that students negotiate with banks. The ordinary voter out there should understand that the federal government guarantees loans to students which are negotiated with the banks and administered at the provincial level. All the qualifications are administered at that level.

Qualification by students for the loans is determined through their colleges or universities according to a set of criteria, one of which is that students must save 60 per cent of what they earned during the summer in order to qualify. There are also certain provisions for information on parental income and so on and the like. It has become more and more difficult for students to earn enough money just to keep themselves in food and clothing during the summer much less to contribute 60 per cent.

On top of these difficulties, this government is collecting $18 million from students who have negotiated a loan. A student who has borrowed $2,000 is going to have to pay out $60 right off the bat, and that is a hit. It is money out of the student's pocket. It is another deterrent to students, particularly to low income students who want to go to college.

With this bill the government will heap on top of that 3 per cent surcharge on loans an elimination of the six-month interest subsidy period during which it was understood that students were looking for jobs and would not be able during that period to begin immediate payment on that loan, in all probability.

The additional interest charges that will be taken from students will be $18 million a year. If it is true that education and training are so important to us and so important to our economy, even from the perspective of this government, then when will it stop doing things that are so negative in terms of those objectives?

There have been a number of recommendations to change the administration of the Canada Student Loans Program. The Canadian Federation of Students wants a movement toward tuition-free, grant-based access to post-secondary education.

My party would prefer to see a post-secondary educational environment in which students would not have to pay tuition. We know that economic circumstances at this present time make that almost impossible, but there are alternatives such as an income contingent student loan repayment program that could be looked at as a means of broadening access rather than restricting it as we are now.

Right now we have a situation in which practically every government, with the leadership and because of the actions of the federal government, is making it more and more difficult. How can that be consistent with building Canada into a nation that can, as the government would have us do, compete in the new global economy?

Mind you, the government did promise to eliminate the 3 per cent surcharge. If it is going to eliminate that 3 per cent surcharge why could it not at least have done that along with the elimination of the six-month grace period which is at issue in this bill?

We will oppose this element of the bill, as it should be opposed. We would ask that this government, rather than finding ways of taking more money out of the pockets of students, to find more ways of ensuring there will be more students, and that more students will have access to college, post-secondary education, training and retraining.

Indeed we should be looking at more and more ways to ensure that every Canadian has access to information, to the means by which we can learn. Why do we continually have this attack on those whom we are going to need most and who need us most, those who are trying by going to college or university to further their education and make themselves citizens who will contribute more to Canada than they could without their college or university education?

It is an abomination that this government continues to peck away at accessibility as it does with this bill. It certainly will peck away at accessibility. Students already accumulate an average loan debt per annum of $2,000. Many students will owe $15,000. With the promised increase in the limits on student loans students could be leaving university with $20,000 and $25,000 debts, which are going to be added to by the action of this government in Bill C-76.

This is unconscionable and unacceptable. I would say that this government, along with the provincial governments, should get together now to ensure that there are no more changes of the sort we have here, that there will be no more surcharges, no more actions to make student loans more difficult to get and more difficult to pay back and that there will be no more actions as there were in Ontario last week of eliminating grants that would allow poor students to get to post-secondary institutions.

We should not be looking at narrowing and restricting accessibility in terms of full or part-time as this government wants to do. We should ensure that even part-time people who want to go back to university and need the money to do so will be able to negotiate loans as well. What we need is a coherent program involving the federal and provincial governments to put a stop to this inconsistency and stupidity and engage in the co-operation necessary to ensure that universities are going to be properly funded and that students will have the financial means to get to university. We should make universities and colleges more accessible rather than less accessible. That is not going to be done by legislation of this sort. Therefore, we will oppose it and I hope all hon. members in this House will oppose it.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question. The member may want to expand a little further on the decision by the Ontario NDP government to abolish grants to university students, those who need help the most.

Second, he is an educator and I believe he taught in university as a professor. He might comment on information I have received from universities that feel many of the provinces do not pass on the funds they receive from the federal government for post-secondary education but rather channel those funds to other needs within the jurisdiction of the province. This has been mentioned to me by university presidents I have met. He might want to comment on that, either to reinforce that statement or come up with opposing views.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, if it was not clear to the hon. member, let me make it clear that I regard the changes, the elimination of grants to students in Ontario, as fundamentally inconsistent with what I consider to be the appropriate social democratic view of how we approach the new world economy.

If there is anything that is clear about the new world economy it is that it is an economy in which we have to vest as much investment in people as we possibly can. We must ensure that everyone has access to education and training commensurate with their ability and their need absolutely, and that there should be no financial barriers to that. That is clear to me, as it should be clear to everyone.

I am very much disturbed by the elimination of those grants. However, I understand the reason. Part of the reason is that this government has taken money out of the pockets of the taxpayers of Ontario at a critical time, contributed to its deficit and contributed to the economic catastrophe in which we presently find ourselves which has meant a demolition of revenue and an extraordinary growth in expenditures for the benefit of those people who have suffered because of the economic catastrophe this government brought about.

The hon. parliamentary secretary asked me about the issue of the provinces receiving funding for post-secondary education which in many cases was not actually spent on post-secondary education. This hon. parliamentary secretary knows that practically every day since I have been here I have raised the issue about the necessity of this government sitting down with the provincial governments to get an agreement on assured levels of funding which would recognize the responsibility of the federal government and the provincial government to fund post-secondary education at a level that would allow post-secondary institutions to function.

Of course, part of the problem originated back in 1975 when the then Liberal government unhooked the EPF from university expenditures. After that the money came in but it was not accountable in terms of the money going to post-secondary institutions. In many instances it has not.

The EPF funding consists of post-secondary and health funding. Health costs have escalated and unfortunately we in Parliament, not those who are otherwise concerned, have raised the level of the popular consciousness to the fundamental importance of what has been happening with the funding of post-secondary institutions which has led to the kinds of catastrophes that we see all across this country, not only in terms of the elimination of grants in Ontario, but the absence of adequate operational funding for universities even to keep their books in their libraries and lights on in their classrooms.

This is the responsibility that is shared at the federal and provincial levels. The federal government has not done a thing to undertake those initiatives that would have changed things. It is a lack of leadership as is demonstrated in this bill.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I respect the hon. member for Essex—Windsor for being so forthright in disagreeing with his counterparts in the province of Ontario on the cancelling of grants to students.

The NDP pretends it to be its tradition to constantly knock governments. No one would have ever thought that when it came to government it would have had the gall to cancel those grants. It now has to deal with the reality of government.

As the hon. member was throwing some criticism at the government's side of the House, he should as a member from Ontario mention that one of the reasons why we are having so much difficulty in raising revenue from our business sector in the province of Ontario is the fact that the small and medium sized business sector has such little confidence. There seems to be a feeling that the New Democratic Party is not really as supportive of small and medium sized businesses as it should be.

If there were a way that the NDP could instil some confidence in business in the province of Ontario, it might cause a possibility where we could generate some more revenue to address this problem of student loans. I wonder if he could address that a little bit.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that some significant elements of the small business community in Ontario share the same kind of irrational hysteria about the prospects of New Democratic Party actions over the next three additional years as this hon. member has displayed.

That is what it is. If there is a problem that small business has it is the horrible state of the Ontario economy. I do not understand why small business is running around hysterically blaming the New Democratic government for its problems while the federal GST, while the federal high value for the dollar, while the federal FTA generated recession and all of those things which have led to business bankruptcies at nearly the same level before the NDP ever came to government are largely responsible for its problems.

Mr. Mills: That is not how you instil confidence.

• (1310)

Mr. McCurdy Do you know the best way to instil confidence in Ontario? Everybody knows it. The hon. member down there knows it. It is to get this government out.

An hon. member: All right.

Mr. McCurdy: It is to get rid of the free trade agreement and keep the dollar down to 78 cents for another three or four years. This would allow us to bring about the industrial adjustment we should have had a long time ago.

Get rid of the FTA, hold back on NAFTA and make the investment in business, education and infrastructure that we need to make and you will be amazed at how much confidence will suddenly appear in Ontario, and even, I am sure, in the hon. member's mind as his hysteria, ill thought and ill gained hysteria, gradually mollifies.

An hon. member: I would have loved to be in your last university class.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words on this legislation. I was noticing that no other member was seeking the floor.

The bill before the House is a bill that deals with student loans, the lobbyists in Canada and the Small Businesses Loans Act. The Canada Student Loans Act, in the changes made here in this legislation, certainly does not address the major problem of Canada student loans in that they do not give students enough money to live on. Students, in order to go to university today in Canada, must either have money coming from relatives or the family or they must be working because the Canada Student Loans Act does not cover all of their living expenses.

Some students make do and lose a lot of weight during the year. Some of them do without adequate accommodations adequate food and this sort of thing. It is very difficult for anybody—impossible for anybody—to exist.

We now have the Government of Canada coming along, changing the law and making it worse than before by charging fees. Then we come to the section that deals with the lobbyists in Canada. I do not know why this section has been brought in requiring a fee to be paid. What we should be requiring is more information concerning the activity of these lobbyists.

Then there are changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. Here we are in Canada, with our fisheries in eastern Canada in disarray with substantial cutbacks in quotas, and the closing of fishing areas all along the east coast. There is a bill now before the House of Commons to change loans that are granted under the Small Businesses Loans Act through a bank and guaranteed by the Government of Canada and also loans that have been granted for fisheries improvements by the banks guaranteed by the Government of Canada.

What would you say would be the subject of an amendment brought today? Here we are coming up to Christmas with quotas just announced, substantial cuts all along the east coast of Canada, a moratorium on northern cod and fishermen are told they are not allowed to go fishing and are going to get $406 a week to sit at home. They have all of these bills to pay. They owe the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act of the Government of Canada substantial amounts of money on loans that they obtained for equipment in the form of nets, gear, boats, pick-up trucks and whatever, as long as it applied to the fishing operation. What does the Government of Canada do today in this House of Commons? It has changed the sections of the Small Businesses Loans Act and changed it all to $200,000 for both of the loans.

The government has not done anything for the fisherman who is having his home or his property seized and sold under this Fisheries Improvement Loans Act because the Government of Canada refuses to honour its commitment to the bank. No, it is not doing anything about that.

When a third party attachment is put on the man's other income or an attachment is put on his property by the bank, because the Government of Canada says it is not going to fulfil a guarantee under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act because it is out of money for this year, is the Government of Canada saying today: "We are going to forgive the interest on those loans or forgive the principal of those loans"? No, it is not. It is not doing that at all in this legislation.

The government makes sure that in two sections of the amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act it points out with regard to the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, with loans previously made to a borrower who is also getting a loan through the Small Businesses Loans Act, that the limit of those loans will be $200,000.

It is not the person who took out the loan under this section of the act who is at fault. It is not his fault that there are no fish in the ocean and he cannot make the payments. It is not his fault at all. Whose fault is it? It is the fault of the Government of Canada. Why is it the fault of the Government of Canada? It is the fault of the Government of Canada because it mismanaged the resource for which he was given a loan, the fishery.

It was the Government of Canada that gave licences year after year and even this year to allow foreign nations to fish the spawning grounds of everything that is in the Atlantic Ocean. Today, when I checked on the telephone, I discovered that there are 14 Japanese ships fishing inside our 200-mile zone with licences from the Government of Canada. That represents a 100 per cent increase in the numbers of their licences compared to last year.

Mr. McDermid: What are they fishing for?

Mr. Baker: The hon. member wants to know what they are fishing for. The hon. member is a member of the cabinet. He should know. It is the Government of Canada that issued the licences to the Japanese last week. I will tell the House what they are fishing for, since the hon. member asked. Right now on their licences it says: "Unlimited fishing of tuna", and then it specifies bigeye, yellowfin, and albacore.

The minister asked me what is on their licences. I am going to tell him. It gets down to the very valuable fish that is in the ocean. In fact, if we had one of them we could get $20,000 for one fish. Can you imagine getting $20,000 for a fish? Today we can. That fish is called the bluefin tuna. The average size off the Newfoundland and Nova Scotia coasts today is valued at $20,000.

The minister just asked what is in the licences and what they are fishing for. I am going to tell the House what they are fishing for. The 14 Japanese ships have as a by-catch in that licence 180 tonnes of bluefin tuna inside our 200-mile zone.

• (1320)

The minister just asked me: "What are they fishing for?" I am going to tell him what they are fishing for: five times the quota of Quebeckers, five times the quota of Newfoundlanders, five times the quota of Nova Scotians, five times the quota of New Brunswickers.

The minister asked me what they were fishing for. I am going to tell him. Five times the quota of Prince Edward Islanders.

We get 35 tonnes. It was the minister who asked this question and I am answering him. We get 35 tonnes in our quota. They get 180 tonnes this year. The Government of Japan was notified through External Affairs, through the Canadian embassy in Japan three weeks ago, in a diplomatic note: "You can have unlimited quotas". It says shark, swordfish, and incidental species to albacore, bigeye, yellowfin, skipjack and all these other different types of fish, unlimited quotas with no limit. Today there are 14 ships, 300 feet long, with helicopters on the front. Compare that.

Do you know what the largest ship in Canada is? The largest ship fishing today off the east coast of Canada is 170 feet long, with helicopters on the front, with unlimited quotas, with a by-catch of 180 tonnes; while Newfoundlanders have 35 tonnes and Nova Scotians have 35 tonnes.

How did that happen? I will tell the House how it happened.

The minister asked me the question so I am going to give him the answer as it relates to this bill, with regard to the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act in this legislation.

It happened because of a recent meeting called the International Tuna Commission, at which Canada sat down with representatives from Japan and the United States. They decided the quotas in the northwest Atlantic Ocean. The northwest Atlantic Ocean is off the Canadian coast. Oh, what negotiators we have representing Canada. Oh, boy, did they ever hang tough. They went in there and supported the U.S. proposal, which was 1,300 tonnes for the United States, 750 tonnes for Japan and 500 tonnes for Canada. That is for bluefin. That is not counting the unlimited species of all the other vessels.

This is at a time when our fishery is in serious trouble and when people cannot find the money to make the payments on their boats to satisfy the requirements of this bill under second reading and to be passed by this Parliament here today.

If the hon. minister wants to ask me any more questions, feel free to ask me anything.

The double standard in this Chamber and in the Parliament of Canada is glaring. The double standard I am referring to is that a student loan obtained by a student going to one of our universities, vocational schools or trade colleges is now subject to a fee under this legislation. There are substantial cuts everywhere.

Just compare that to this double standard. I received a letter Friday from the Minister of National Revenue in answer to a question I had asked. I wanted to know how many people, under this government, making in excess of $100,000 a year were getting the GST rebate? It is amazing. How do people get the GST rebate designed for "low and modest income Canadians" if they are making $200,000 a year?

The minister answered in writing that there were 5,336 individuals with a total income exceeding $99,999 and 7,145 families with a total family income in excess of $99,999 who were entitled to receive the credit for this past year.

Just think of the double standard. Should somebody making $250,000 a year be getting something that was introduced by this Government of Canada, designed for and on the income tax form for modest and low income Canadians? The family allowance is to start on January 1. Should it be so designed by the Government of Canada that wealthy people can get the full benefit? No, it should not be. Not when it is cutting back on students, not when it is allowing drug prices to go sky high for our seniors, not when it is cutting back the provinces on health and education and not when it is forcing the hospitals to close beds. No. However, that is the double standard that has been recognized.

I wondered at what point in our history that programs designed for the low and modest income Canadians became payable to the wealthy in Canada. It is easy to find out because all income-tested programs in Canada are based on net income. In other words, you check to find out what is taken off your gross to arrive at your net on your income tax return and then you find out how these people are getting these payments and you discover certain changes have been made.

A change was made in 1988 in the Income Tax Act. A new line was put in. The line said exploration and development of mining, gas, and petroleum in foreign nations. For example, if people invest enough in Colombia or Myanmar, as Petro-Canada is doing, or in Vietnam in the Mekong Delta as a great many companies are doing, they can get their income down far enough to get the GST rebate.

Just think of the double standard between the rich and the poor and the double standard between people who are struggling to get an education as is pointed out under this bill, the Student Loans Act, and those people who are struggling to make an extra $250,000 a year and given preference by the Government of Canada.

This bill before us today rather than including changes that say that the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act will be matched up with the Small Businesses Loans Act in instances where the borrower has money obtained under both acts and that there will be a new $200,000 limit should do what the provincial governments of Canada have had to do. Under their loan acts relating to fisheries improvement they have forgiven all the interest. They have said: "Forget about it, we are in a very difficult situation in Canada so we will not go after you for the interest. We are going to forgive all this interest".

The Government of Canada is responsible for the state of our fisheries today, for the terrible condition of our fisheries today, and it makes no such offer.

I would suggest that before this bill goes any further the government should introduce an amendment to forgive all fisheries improvement loans of fisherpersons who are found in areas in which there have been substantial cuts in quotas and all fisherpersons who have loans under that act in areas that are currently under a fishing moratorium.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, as usual I am always impressed by my colleague's speaking abilities.

I want to inform the member that in Ontario not only is the NDP government not considering students but it actually has decided to cut out the grant portion of any loans going to students. This will mean that the poorest of the poor now will have to finance most of their education through loans. Not only is there no forgiveness of any interest but the interest starts to accrue to the student the day he graduates.

I will tell you that many students in my riding who have graduated and have many loans have been absolutely unable to get jobs. Some of them are now living on welfare. This great and wonderful government of ours has set the collection agencies after them.

I repeat my story of people on welfare who are being harassed for the total pay-back of the loans. I am wondering if there is some way that we could consider with this particular piece of legislation a way of ensuring that those who have no jobs yet are not harassed. If they do get a high paying job, if they are lucky enough to get one, they should start repaying their loans and they should pay some interest. However, that is not the case in many homes. We have to start considering that.

We have to ask the government to consider that. Does the member think that perhaps he could give me an answer to that?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I cannot for the life of me understand how a provincial government could take the unprecedented action of withdrawing its grant portion. I do not know of any other government in Canada that has done that.

British Columbia I suppose has done it as well. It is funny. What do Ontario, British Columbia and Saskatchewan have in common?

I was looking at the bond ratings the other day of Standard & Poor's, New York. They tell an interesting story. The credit rating for the Government of Canada for foreign paper, which does not account for very much in our economy or the business of the government really is not the foreign paper, went down. However, it also published the ratings and its projections for the future for provincial administrations. It was rather interesting that the province of Ontario today has a negative rating for the future.

Mr. Laporte: What about Newfoundland?

Mr. Baker: Newfoundland has a positive rating. It sure is not like Saskatchewan because Newfoundland has an A rating whereas Saskatchewan is triple B. Why does Saskatchewan have triple B?

Mr. Laporte: Why?

Mr. Baker: Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Ontario. The Government of Canada is bad enough to have its rating drop and to lose an A, but it is another thing for the great province of Ontario, which we all have such faith in and hope for, the industrial centre of the nation, to have a negative credit rating by Standard Poor's.

It is interesting to examine how it sets those credit ratings.

It set the credit ratings by looking at the governments and what those governments are doing. That is why Newfoundland has a positive rating and we are very proud of that. It is in the As.

The other thing that the hon. member mentioned was collection agencies and this thing has really got to stop as far as student loans are concerned. This is really outrageous by the Government of Canada. This has got to stop. They are hounding students who just came out of universities, trade schools and vocational schools day after day. They are threatening them. They are threatening single mothers who just came out of school.

These collection agencies are hired by the Government of Canada. I would like to see the deal it has. It should have to put on the table of the House why it selected certain credit agencies and what the deal is for the collections and who gave the orders. It is a most outrageous thing.

Concerning Ontario, I cannot understand it. I am surprised to learn from the hon. member from British Columbia that the British Columbia government allows the same thing, not to have a grant portion in student loans. That is absolutely outrageous.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, this debate today is an interesting one because it is on a bill that arises out of the government's last budget which we had hoped the government might have seen fit to replace with a new one.

I guess we are going to get what is called a mini budget or financial statement on Wednesday which I know everyone in Canada will be gripping their chairs for. I am sure their knuckles will be turning white as they look forward to the next instalment of this government's financial recovery plan.

I wanted to refer to some of the government's initial attempts at economic recovery in my speech today by reminding the House of what its Minister of Finance has said in years past. Like my friend from Broadview—Greenwood, I was first elected to this House in 1988, so our first opportunity to hear a budget speech occurred on April 27, 1989 when the now Minister of Industry, Science and Technology delivered his budget on television.

That was the leaky budget, as I recall. He delivered his budget on TV the night before, but on April 27 he went through the formalities of reading his speech. I thought it would be useful to quote from the speech because a lot of the things he said were so important.

He intoned these words so piously at the time, as I recall, as only the minister can. Perhaps members would like to hear his words. He said: "When I became finance minister the $18 billion debt had risen to nearly $200 billion". It was under, and he said: "The annual deficit was more than $38 billion. By then Canada had built into its public finances a self-propelling force that threatened to undermine our valued reputation for fiscal prudence and responsibility".

"The sad reality of debt is that it feeds on itself. It places a nation on a treadmill. Each year, added effort is required from its citizens to produce new revenues that merely go to pay the interest on a growing debt. We must ask ourselves whether this enormous debt should be our legacy to future generations". I will not quote everything he said.

"We would be borrowing from our children but not paying our own bills. It is easy to borrow from future generations because they have no voice in this debate. They have no vote, yet it is they who must live with the consequences if we do not act". That is what the minister said in 1989, almost four years ago.

I hate to keep quoting because I know it must be embarrassing to my friends on the other side, but I would like to read some more. "We recognized the seriousness of the debt problem when we came to office", he said with a straight face. "We have been acting to get it under control", he said with an even straighter face, I have no doubt. "We have succeeded in reducing the growth of the debt from almost 24 per cent in 1984 to less than 10 per cent last year".

I think he was referring to the percentage of the gross national product when you consider that it was almost frozen and considering the debt was growing in percentage terms at a slower rate. That is not surprising. Once it gets so big the rate naturally slows down.

"Despite that progress the debt is continuing to grow more rapidly than our national income. On April 1, the debt was $320 billion". We know that it is over $420 billion now, thanks to the incompetence of the government opposite.

• (1340)

He went on and this is a great line. I invite the Chair to listen to this with care. I am sure the Chair will remember hearing it on the occasion of his great budget speech:

"The budget measures will cut the annual deficit in half to $15 billion by 1993–94. Financial requirements will be down from $20 billion this year to $3 billion. As the deficit goes down, the debt will shrink as a proportion of our national income".

We have just been told that for 1991–92, instead of going down, for the fourth consecutive year the debt went up.

Mr. Harvard: Of course, Tory economics.

Mr. Milliken: They said it was going to $15 billion. It went up to $34 billion last year and it is projected to be higher this year, although we will learn more about that on Wednesday. This is Tory mismanagement on a very impressive scale.

An hon. member: Tory economics.

Mr. Milliken: The Minister of Finance for Canada, with a battery of economists behind him, the whole group of economists of the Bank of Canada behind him, was uttering this utter rubbish in a budget speech in 1989. We still get the same answers from the other side on this issue.

Let me quote from the budget speech of February 20, 1990, the very next year. You would think that by this year the Conservatives might have figured out that perhaps things were not quite as rosy as they were pretending. They do talk about slower growth in the years ahead and so on. They did not tell us we were going into a depression.

The speech stated: "In today's world sovereignty is not threatened by military force or aggression. Our freedom and opportunity to realize our dreams for ourselves and our children rest on our response to the challenge of a more competitive world in the throes of economic change".

This is the kind of stuff that the minister spouts in his budget speeches, but at the same time he is unable to carry through on his predictions. This is what he said about his 1990 budget: "The decisive actions in this budget"—imagine talking about this budget being decisive—"bring us back to the fiscal track set out in the 1989 budget". In other words, he admitted they had gone off the rails in 1989. I will say they hit the ditch. He said: "We will cut the deficit to $28.5 billion in 1990–91". We know they did not get the deficit down quite that far in 1990–91. They have not got it down that far in 1991–92 and they are not going to get it down that far in 1992–93. It has gone up significantly ever since.

He continued: "This deficit includes the impact of the one-time transition cost of sales tax reform including prepayment of the GST credit, the transitional grant to small business and the rebate of federal sales tax on inventories". We know the minister was wrong in that speech as well. The Prime Minister then replaced him. He realized there was no use hanging on to a bad thing. You get rid of it.

The amazing this is that after all that incompetence you would think the government would have some ideas. However, it is clear that this tired old government has run out of ideas.

Mr. Harvard: Right.

Mr. Milliken: It has run out of time and it has run out of ideas. I see the minister is fleeing the House. I would urge him to listen to what the Prime Minister said the other day when he was asked a question.

Mr. McDermid: I am going to be sick to my stomach.

Mr. Milliken: I can understand if the minister says he is about to be ill. Hearing the litany of complaints about this government should make almost any Canadian ill.

The Prime Minister was asked a very sensible question about the economy by the hon. Leader of the Opposition:

> When will he realize that it is time to have a policy that makes some sense and that will be conducive to creating growth in Canada so that the Canadian people can work and have the dignity of working?

That is what the Leader of the Official Opposition asked the Prime Minister in Question Period as reported on page 14103 of Hansard. What was the Prime Minister's answer? He said: "What would that policy be?" He had no idea. He had absolutely no idea and he is the Prime Minister of Canada. His Minister of Finance was sitting right beside him and might have whispered an answer to him to tell him what the policy might be, but he had no idea either.

Just to his other side sat the the former Minister of Finance, the Minister for Industry, Science and Technology. He might have whispered an answer. He is the one who was giving us all these great ideas in his budget speeches in 1989 and 1990. I know he gave them for four years before that and put us into the pickle we were in in 1989 thanks to his incompetence. He did not whisper any ideas to the Prime Minister to give him some reasonable answer to this question.

It is clear that this government has run out of ideas. It is completely devoid of any sensible approach in any department, let alone the Department of Finance.

Mr. Harvard: It is spent.

Mr. Milliken: As my friend from Winnipeg—St. James says, it is spent. It has spent its time. It has wasted its time. It has ruined Canada financially. It is time for the government to resign and get out of office before it does any more damage to our economy.

I want to turn to the bill we are debating today. Of course when I read from that budget speech I quoted a few moments ago, one heard the former Minister of Finance intone in his very pious way about how those of Canada's younger generation were voiceless in this debate and it was unfair to saddle them with the debt and that they were going to have to pay. This bill is part of the evidence that they are going to have to pay for this government's economic mismanagement of our economy.

This government has increased the charges to students under the Canada Student Loans Act. Starting on August 1, 1993 the six month interest-free loan period will be cancelled on Canada student loans. Students who have borrowed money will start paying interest immediately upon graduation instead of six months later.

That would be bad enough if the economy were in the position where it was easy for these people to find jobs, but we are finding increasing numbers of students who graduated from Canadian universities and colleges are unable to obtain employment.

Mr. Mills: The national average is 18 per cent.

Mr. Milliken: As my friend from Broadview—Greenwood says, the national average unemployment rate in that group is 18 per cent. Jobs are extremely difficult for these people to find. Yet at that time, the time when it is most difficult for them to find employment, the interest-free period is taken away.

The purpose of it in good times was to allow some period for these students to find employment. Now there is no period to be allowed for that and jobs are harder to find now than they have ever been since the Canada Student Loans Program was implemented.

We have one group of men and women to thank for that situation and they sit right over there, when they are here. That is where they sit. They are the ones who are responsible for it. They should get out and allow an election to be held so they can be replaced.

The second thing the government is doing is getting in league with Premier Rae. Premier Bob Rae has decided he is going to go after the students as well and he is taking away the grant programs.

An hon. member: It is like a two-headed monster.

Mr. Milliken: As my friend says, it is like a two-headed monster. Two greedy, grasping governments putting a squeeze on the student population of Canada.

I do not know where Mr. Rae got those notions. When he was in this House he used to spout the old NDP line that there was always something for everybody and they would not think of cutting any payments to students let alone any other disadvantaged group, but boy, put them in office and they act just like the Tories.

I spoke about this before. I have said how NDP members act like Tories. Some people in my own riding thought perhaps I was talking through my hat. Perhaps they will not think that way any more after watching Premier Bob and his slash and cut proposals to try to control the profligate spending in which he has been engaging in the province of Ontario.

It was only a year ago when he announced his $10 billion deficit that he said it was fiscally prudent to do that. Now he has realized that it was very imprudent and the fact is that his government is driving business out of the province at record rates.

Instead of having a growing economy we have a shrinking economy. Tax revenues are going down and the government is finding itself under increasing financial pressure. What does the provincial government do? It turns to the disadvantaged who do not have much of a voice and takes away the rights they have, just as this government does.

The Minister of Finance in his budget speech in 1989 said that these future generations had no voice because they are not voters. Now because they are not, he figures he can take away this privilege they have and there will not be much of an outcry about it among the majority of voters. That is exactly what he has done.

It is the same policy pursued by Premier Bob. My bet is during the constitutional discussions last year the Prime Minister took the premier of Ontario aside and explained to him the advantages of Tory financial practice. The premier being an NDPer swallowed the story hook, line and sinker.

There he is believing everything the Prime Minister says about how to organize the economy of Canada. He has followed the same advice in organizing the economy of Ontario to the detriment of Ontario students and frankly to the detriment of the long-range idea of funding education which was to provide a better educated work force for Canada which would make us internationally competitive.

• (1350)

We have the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology now that he is in that new portfolio talking about the great advantages of Canada's work force because it is so well educated and so capable. On the other hand, his colleague, the Minister of Finance, the new one, is having to pay for the mistakes he made when he was in that portfolio by slashing and cutting all over the place.

What did he do? He slashed and cut the grants to students through the Ontario scheme and cut the interest benefit to students under this scheme and thereby deprived Canada of the advantage it might have otherwise had by having a well educated work force.

Why would the government cut back the spending on education and research in Canada when it is the thing which creates the advantage Canada enjoys in world markets? The government keeps talking about world markets and how we are a global economy.

That is one of the favourite expressions of ministers on the opposite side. They talk about global competitiveness and world competitiveness and how important it is that Canada be able to compete. At the same time, they take away that advantage of competition we have through a well educated work force when they trim the expenditures on education and that is where they have gone to do it.

The government also introduced the 3 per cent administrative fee on Canada student loans. We know how that works. If people in other businesses have to pay this kind of fee they always object to it quite vigorously. Students take it in the neck. The government charges 3 per cent when the student takes out a loan.

Mrs. Marleau: You have to pay it before you get the loan.

Mr. Milliken: As my colleague from Sudbury says, a student has to pay that before getting the loan. It is charged as part of the debt too. It is added in. The student promises to pay for more than he or she actually got.

An hon. member: A front end load.

Mr. Milliken: It is a front end load, as my colleague says. It is an unfair charge. It is gouging these people.

I suspect that the ultimate beneficiaries of all this are the banks. We of course have a case of record profits being made by the banks in Canada this year. That is not surprising given the bank charges and the height they are at which of course the government will not do anything about. It says: "Oh, no. That is private enterprise. We'll leave that alone. We won't touch that".

The provinces are pressed in many cases. Because of that of course no taxes are paid. We have these large write-offs for some of the banks this year because of some investments which have gone sour. One suspects part of the reason the investments have gone sour is because of the policies pursued by the government opposite. There seems to be a vicious circle going on. I am sorry that is the case. The government and the banks seem to be in some kind of league in this regard. One benefits while the other does not, but at least they help each other out.

Let us turn to the second part of the amendments we are dealing with today. I think there are three parts, but I am going to speak on only two. The second part concerns the amendments to the Lobbyists Registration Act to allow the government to charge the lobbyists for the cost of administering this act.

An hon. member: It is a farce.

Mr. Milliken: As my colleague says, this is a farce. The government brought in this act which is pretty weak. It forces registration on lobbyists. Big deal. These lobbyists have to file a little statement saying that they are lobbying for so and so. It is strictly cosmetic. It has no particular advantage. It does not require sufficient detail to enable the interested public to follow what is going on here.

This was a bow in the direction of reform of our institutions to ensure that people were not getting unfair advantage. It was a bow about that far, Mr. Speaker. You get my drift. It was not what you would call a humble bow in this direction.

The government introduced this Lobbyists Registration Act so that it would look as though it was doing something to correct what was perceived by the public at the time, and I suspect still is in some quarters, to be an abuse of the system, whereby these lobbyists charged thousands of dollars to arrange an appointment for a group to come and see the minister.

I see one of the ministers is in the House today. I do not know what lobbyists charge to arrange an appointment with her. It may be a high fee. Perhaps she could tell us in questions or comments on my speech. She could tell us what it costs to get to see her.

An hon. member: What speech?

Mr. Milliken: I am making a speech now. If the hon. member would pay some attention he might notice that a speech is in progress. I am sorry I woke him up.

The fact is that this is what is going on. There is this charge being made in order to arrange an appointment with a minister of the Crown.

What the government decided to do was rather than have that revealed it would have a registration. It would sound good to the public if it was announced that all these lobbyists had to register. So register they do under this act.

Now the government has to pay money to public servants to administer the registration book. Somebody has to write the material into the book and I guess it is a little complicated. I suppose there is probably a computer entry. Perhaps they do not do it in a book any more. Whatever it is, forms have to be designed, printed and sent out to the lobbyists, or the lobbyists pick them up at an office which has to be manned.

I do not know what is there. I have never been to the lobbyists registration office, not being a lobbyist myself. I do not know whether any of my colleagues have been. I do not know how many people work there. Whatever it is, it is costing the government some money and the government has decided to recoup the cost. How is that done? By charging the lobbyists.

I can imagine the Governor in Council when this regulation is passed will make sure that the fees are lowest for the big firms that employ the fat-cat Tories. The fees will be highest for the small firms that have relatively independent lobbyists running and working for them.

I can only guess that the power being requested in this bill will be abused, as has been the trust of the Canadian people by this government for the last eight and a half years.

It is time for the government to face reality. It must allow the people to pass judgment on the medicine it has been doling out to the Canadian public on the kind of legislation it introduces in this House that the Canadian public is sick and tired of. It should call an election and let Canadians express their views as to whether this government's record and its proposals are worthy of any support at all.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, since we are talking about a money bill, I would like to remind the House and the hon. member in particular that a lot of money is being wasted by the federal government because of duplication by federal and provincial departments. For instance, the federal government is again getting involved in manpower training and the education of our young people.

In Quebec we have a department of education that is particularly well represented and well organized. I keep wondering why the federal government wants to interfere with manpower training and with our secondary and post-secondary education.

We need colleges, especially in the technology sector, which meet the needs of Quebec small business, instead of letting the federal government interfere with education in Quebec.

It seems Ontario has decided not to do anything about education—remember, this is an NDP government—but I do not agree with its philosophy. In any case, in Quebec we have a responsible government and have had one for many years. If we really want to save money because the federal government has a cumulative debt of about $450 billion, it seems to me the first thing the government should do is to withdraw completely from this sector and let the provinces manage education. I am convinced the provinces would be able to operate more satisfactorily and be better able to meet the needs of small business. As a result we could increase productivity and meet the challenge of international competition.

I would like to hear what the hon. member has to say about this.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said that the federal government should drop its programs in the field of education. I disagree. I think the federal government has a role to play in educating Canadians. I believe the federal government should set a minimum standard for educational requirements. We need national standards because the provinces differ in this particular area. Of course that is good, but we must find another way to set these national standards for everyone in Quebec and in the other provinces which have different standards, as I was saying.

I would like to continue but my time has expired.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

THE 1992 GREY CUP

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, with due apologies to our colleagues from Manitoba, I am sure that all other members will join me in congratulating the 1992 Grey Cup champions, the Calgary Stampeders.

Doug Flutie was simply outstanding on Sunday, as he was the previous week. His teammates deserve the respect of all of us, as do the Winnipeg Blue Bombers.

This was the first championship for the Stampeders in 21 years. The team has provided fans with some of the most memorable football action we have seen in decades and certainly earned the honour.

I am glad to see there were many westerners on hand at the SkyDome to cheer on two western teams playing for the championship this year.

Among the real winners were the CFL fans. Despite the financial burdens many teams have been faced with, the players, coaches, managers and spectators of all eight teams have continued to enjoy quality football all season long.

There must be many more seasons for the league and many more memorable moments to be seen by CFL fans from coast to coast to coast. Most important, there is next year's Grey Cup game which I am predicting the Edmonton Eskimos will win.

WORLD AIDS DAY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, there is no cure for AIDS. Each day it afflicts new victims across the world, across income groups, across sexes and now even across generations.

We as a society need to be doing much more to raise awareness, raise money and conduct much more research and development in the cure for this disease.

AIDS is a tragedy that cannot be allowed to spread and flourish in Canada or in any country of the world. Tomorrow is World AIDS Day.

I ask each member of this House, each of my constituents and every Canadian to take a few moments to reflect on the magnitude of the task that confronts us.

AIDS is a disease which can be stopped and must be stopped.

DRUGS AND PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, we hear again that the pressure from multinational drug companies is driving Bill C-91 through Parliament by closure and by abridgement of the democratic rights of Canadians to be heard on legislation that affects them.

Now we read in today's The Globe and Mail that the Liberal opposition has also been toned down. First the drug companies were on the line to the Liberal consumer affairs critic to tell him to support the bill. Then the Liberal science and technology critic advised his caucus colleagues that he supported the provisions of Bill C-91. Now the Liberal leader has leaned on his consumer critic to tone down the criticism.

Just where do the Liberals stand on this important matter? Is it with the consumer affairs critic in the committee or with the Liberal leadership in the back room where the campaign funds are raised and deals are cut?

As with the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and so many other issues, the corporate elite in this country demand and get in one way or another subservience from both the Tories and the Liberals.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY ACT

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, today marks the beginning of a new era for businesses and individuals experiencing financial difficulties. Today the new Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act comes into force.

This is the first time in 43 years after six failed attempts between 1975 and 1984 that such important and crucial amendments have been made to the bankruptcy legislation.

These amendments will help Canadian businesses, big, medium and small, to be more competitive and to preserve jobs. Businesses experiencing financial difficulties will have more time to reorganize, protect jobs and address financial problems.

Unpaid suppliers will now have the right within 30 days of delivery of goods to a firm that subsequently goes into bankruptcy or in receivership to reclaim goods that are clearly identifiable as theirs.

There are also a number of other measures to help consumers, such as the opportunity to make arrangements with creditors to prevent bankruptcy, a simpler and less expensive bankruptcy process.

These reforms demonstrate the government's commitment to put in place economic policies that will enhance Canadian competitiveness and prosperity.

The minister and our members of Parliament should be congratulated for finally achieving these long, overdue reforms.

MUNICIPAL INFRASTRUCTURE PROJECTS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party of Canada has consistently requested the federal government's support of nation-wide municipal infrastructure projects as one means of kick-starting our failing economy. Instead ad hoc government policies of program cuts increase taxes. Expensive studies instead of action further weaken our economy.

Canadians need jobs. Municipal infrastructure projects will create jobs.

Northumberland, lying on the shores of the world's largest inland waterway, depends on harbour maintenance and development for a large part of its economic well-being. Trenton, economically hurt this year by unprecedented job losses, has an undisputed need for marine and harbour development. Port Hope's harbour is becoming unusable as a result of silting.

When will this government recognize these small harbour needs, support municipal infrastructure projects of all types throughout Northumberland and get our economy going? Employment and development spin-offs will soon compensate for costs through new taxable income and less unemployment insurance and welfare payouts.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, in 1991 the government awarded a large contract for the construction of 12 mine countermeasures vessels for the Canadian forces to SNC–Lavalin group with the ships being constructed at Halifax–Dartmouth shipyards.

I along with many people in my riding were disappointed with this announcement as St. Catharines is home to Port Weller Dry Docks which had bid on this contract.

There were many critics who claimed that this decision was purely political and that the government had interfered in the ultimate awarding of the contract.

The Auditor General in his latest report has examined this contract and at page 447 states: "We examined the planning phase and options analysis for this project. The department carried out an adequate needs analysis and fully analysed the options for meeting the needs as well as the vessel options presented by the bidding firms".

We are proud of the people of Port Weller and of their record for producing and repairing ships on budget and on time.

I trust that this report of the Auditor General will relieve concerns that this contract was awarded unfairly.

OZONE LAYER DEPLETION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, 1992 is the worst year ever recorded for ozone layer depletion. People are at risk of skin cancer, blindness and even a weakened immunity system because of increased ultraviolet radiation.

In response to this spreading global danger, last week the Government of Canada failed to take tough measures. Despite the UN warning that the ozone treaty is not enough, the government supported watered down measures.

The government accepted the timetable for the phase-out of hydrochlorofluorocarbons to be lengthened by 10 years, thus opening a loophole that allows further damage. It rejected a U.S. proposal to control harmful methyl bromide, a chemical 40 times more destructive to the ozone layer than chlorofluorocarbons.

We urge this government to launch programs that help developing countries eliminate methyl bromides, through increased research and the transfer of technologies.

It is time for this government to start practising what it preaches.

WESTERN DIVERSIFICATION

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, last week as I met with Albertans I asked for suggestions that I could pass along to the hon. member for Vegreville, the Minister of Finance, as he prepares for his statement in this place on Wednesday.

I received quite a few. However, nobody made the silly suggestion put forward by the Reform Party which says that we should get rid of western diversification but keep regional development operations that assist Quebec, Atlantic Canada and northern Ontario.

Maybe the Reform leader does not like the fact that western diversification requires businesses to repay their loans. We Albertans have learned that neither consistency nor the facts get in the way of Reform tactics and their so–called policies.

Albertans did have many constructive suggestions which I continue to pass along to the minister. A few examples are to cut all grants by at least 50 per cent, eliminate all government TV advertising, and reduce the number of government employees.

TRADE

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, whatever happened to the Liberal's fight of their lives over free trade?

First, they voted with the Conservatives to oppose an NDP motion to scrap the Canada–U.S. free trade deal. Then they voted with the Tories against having trade committee hearings in every province in Canada and to the proposed North American free trade agreement.

• (1410)

It is obvious why they did that. They had no idea who might be concerned about the proposed trade deal. They did not recommend a single witness for the trade committee hearings currently under way in Vancouver. It is obvious they want to conduct trade deals the way the Tories do, in secret.

Not to be outdone, the Liberals in the B.C. legislature voted against a government sponsored motion calling on the federal government to pull out of the NAFTA talks.

It is clear Canadians can count on only one party for clear and consistent opposition to the Tory trade deals: Canada's New Democrats.

CORN AND SOYBEAN PRODUCERS

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, the corn and soybean producers of Ontario are in a crisis situation this year.

Normally by the end of November all of the soybeans and most of the corn would be harvested. This year depending on the region, between 20 and 60 per cent of the soybeans and 80 per cent of the corn are still in the fields. Many farmers with no livestock have no source of income. Livestock farmers are faced with having no feed or very poor quality feed so that their cash flow is eroded.

The corn producers have proposed the adjustment to the Advanced Payments for Crops Program to include these crops not yet harvested but covered by crop and revenue insurance. The corn producers' request would cost no more than the normal advanced payments program and any risk is eliminated because coverage is ensured.

I urge the government to respond positively and quickly to this request for assistance.

CANADIAN FOOTBALL LEAGUE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join in congratulating the Calgary Stampeders and their fans on the Grey Cup victory last night.

If it could not be Winnipeg, I am glad it was Calgary. They added another illustrious chapter to the Grey Cup history which has been part of Canada for the past 80 years.

The game last night reminded us that the CFL is a cherished institution for Canadians who care deeply about its distinct rules, its players and what it means to individual communities. Too many Canadian institutions and traditions are disappearing. They are being swallowed up, each time chipping away at our own sense of identity.

I urge all members of Parliament to engage in a serious debate on the question of CFL expansion to the United States, rather than taking a hands-off approach. I will be introducing a private member's bill to engage Canadians and their members of Parliament in this debate.

Putting it simply, it is the fourth quarter with only minutes to spare. If we fumble we could lose the whole game.

VIOLENT CRIME

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to applaud the efforts of those action groups currently working on behalf of victims of violent crime, groups such as CAVEAT, organized by the family of murder victim Nina de Villiers, and Victims of Violence International, originally organized by parents and families of abducted and murdered children. These are only two of many groups in Canada working for change.

I believe we need to extend the minimum terms given to those offenders who commit crimes against women and children. We must reconsider the negative impact these offenders have had on our society and treat them accordingly.

I believe we need to take a new look at the Young Offenders Act. We need to reduce the minimum age from 18. We need to take a tougher stand with those young adults committing serious violent crime.

I have received and presented petitions containing thousands of signatures in support of such action.

I believe along with the majority of Canadians that the time has come for the government to take another look at the way we deal with violent offenders and to take action to improve the situation.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, Canada's airlines continue to suffer from the effects of deregulation and this government's mismanagement of the Canadian economy. They also continue to battle for survival.

In recent days, both Canadian Airlines and Air Canada have taken positive steps to improve their financial positions by raising fares by 5 per cent. These steps were only necessary because the airlines were engaged far too long in self-destructive and unneeded competition.

Raising fares will improve Air Canada's and Canadian's balance sheets, but they keep harming themselves by continuing to overlap departures and arrivals between too many city pairs.

The time has come for the Minister of Transport to sit down with the airlines and help them hammer out an agreement that will allow them to serve travellers in each market fully, yet effectively.

This may sound like deregulation to the minister. If it will save him embarrassment he can call it anything he likes. The critical need right now is for action that will allow the two airlines to compete fairly and sensibly.

VIOLENCE ON TELEVISION

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to pay tribute and express my admiration to Virginie Larivière for her determination and courage in trying to eliminate violence from television. As the adoptive mother of a 13-year old boy, I am able to see every day the kind of children's programming available, most of which has violent images or appeals to violence.

Second, I would like to ask the millions of people who signed Virginie's petition and all those who support her efforts to do something concrete in this Christmas period by not buying violent or violence related toys and music. Through their individual actions people will show manufacturers and legislators that we take this issue very seriously.

Once again, congratulations, Virginie Larivière, and do not give up.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Last week the Minister of Finance told Canadians that the recession was over in this country. This week, adding insult to injury, the Minister of Finance has declared that a 10,000-person lay-off at CN is, according to the minister, none of this government's business.

Will the Minister of Finance retract these cold and I suggest callous statements made just days before his mini-budget statement? Will he acknowledge that the recession and Canada's unemployed are real and are the primary responsibility of this government and this minister?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the hon. member that his conclusions are wrong on both counts.

What I did say in the House was that of last week we had five consecutive quarters of growth. With the third quarter GDP figures out today it is now six consecutive quarters of growth, registering 1.4 per cent annually in the third quarter of this year, a 5.3 per cent increase in domestic demand, a 3.5 per cent increase in consumer demand and major increases in investment and machinery and equipment. Those are all positive indicators for the economy.

With respect to the reference to CN, what I did say was that there were programs available and the Government of Canada would be working with these organizations to ensure that they could effectively utilize the programs available under Employment and Immigration and any other programs that might be utilized in cushioning the blow of this adjustment that was taking place.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister now wants to be a credible forecaster. Let us look at his record as a forecaster.

In last February's budget the minister forecast unemployment in Canada this year at 10.1 per cent. It now stands at 11.3 per cent. The minister forecast growth at 2.7 per cent and, as he just said, it now stands in the third quarter at 1.4 per cent. The minister forecast a deficit of $27.5 billion and in the first six months of this year it has already past $19 billion.

This minister is no forecaster and he is no Minister of Finance if he continues to insist that Canada's unemployed are somebody else's problem.

I want to ask this minister whether or not he will commit himself here and now in the House of Commons, before the people of Canada, to bring down a mini-budget or a budget or a budget statement, whatever it is called, in 48 hours that will quit wishing for recovery and will start putting people back to work in this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think all forecasters were left somewhat surprised at the projections that they made in all the industrial countries with respect to global growth. The world economy is growing at a rate of 1 per cent.

In 1992 the G-7 group of countries was expected to grow in the vicinity of 3 per cent. It is now probably something in the order of 1 per cent to 1.5 per cent. The Canadian economy is weak because the world economy is weak. Because we are a country that trades with the world global interdependence is a fact of life, globalization is a fact of life. We have to trade with other countries.

What we will be doing in the future is trying to take steps that will help the recovery that is occurring. The rate of growth in the third quarter is 1.4 per cent on an annual basis. That is six consecutive quarters of growth. We will do whatever we can to facilitate and encourage that.

• (1420)

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister is back to forecasting. Let me quote from the budget speech delivered by the minister last February:

> More than 500,000 jobs will be created before the end of next year—

That was from the minister's budget speech to this House. Mr. Speaker, 500,000 jobs have not been created in Canada. In fact since the minister uttered those words an additional 156,000 jobs have been lost in Canada.

Some hon. members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, we want to ask the minister whether or not he is prepared to commit to Canadians who see unemployment now standing at nearly 1.6 million that he will deliver an economic statement in two days that will put people back to work in this country.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as well I was not able to predict the massive depletion of the northern cod stocks in his own province of Newfoundland—

Mr. Tobin: We did.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: —and the consequences of that both with respect to the fishermen and the fish plant workers. This government took action to deal with that particular issue. A number of unpredictable developments have not only occurred in Canada but indeed have occurred throughout the world, and we recognize that.

If the hon. member just holds on to his seat and is a little patient I think he will be surprised as to what we will offer, bearing in mind that we have very little room to manoeuvre. It is very tight in terms of our manoeuvrability given the fact that the revenues are down. Because of the revenues being down we lack the flexibility to act perhaps as aggressively as the hon. member would like.

I will certainly take his recommendations into account as I put my statement together. It will be an economic statement on the future, on the fiscal outlook, as well as on the economic outlook.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance a question as well. It is about a confidential report prepared by his department which shows how business executives in Canada are focusing on the deindustrialization of this country. I quote:

> Some manufacturing companies have made a decision fairly easily after free trade to shut down Canadian activity, and just use sales staff in the Canadian territory.

Having had this report for over a year, keeping it secret and doing nothing about it, will the minister finally admit that the deal is working to lose jobs in Canada? Can we expect that in his report on Wednesday the Government of Canada will finally take its responsibility and have an economic policy that will encourage companies to stay in Canada, not drive them away?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the evidence at hand is entirely contrary to that.

With respect to the story the hon. member referred to, I am sorry to advise him the story is wrong. This was not a government commissioned study. It was an unsolicited report that was sent to the Department of Finance. We kept it on file and released it under the auspices of Access to Information. It was not, as the report has suggested, a finance department authorized study.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the fact that it was not prepared by his department perhaps means that it has more credibility, is more honest and is more objective.

Does the minister mean to say that unless his own officials prepared the document he will not even bother reading the report by a reputed academic from the University of Western Ontario which says clearly that we must find ways to minimize the negative impact in Canada and to provide serious adjustment programs to help the many workers who are losing their jobs?

Is it not time that the minister and his government started to renegotiate a bad trade deal and did something about workers who are losing their jobs?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was merely trying to point out the facts for the hon. member. I am sorry he is so worked up about it.

I must say that I would rather read the C. D. Howe report on the success of the free trade agreement, the fact of the matter that there have been jobs created, particularly in those areas of manufacturing.

Quite frankly the evidence is very clear that in the first nine months of this year exports to the United States have increased by 10.5 per cent. Since the free trade agreement came into effect I think the exports have increased to the United States by something in the order of 16 per cent.

What is really important is that in those high value added, job intensive areas exports have been increasing. That should be good news to the hon. member, even in Winnipeg, because it too is a very major source of manufacturing. It is a very good city and a very effective city in terms of manufacturing of exports to the United States of America.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the chartered banks in this country are reporting record profits: $676 million for the Bank of Nova Scotia and $640 million for the Bank of Montreal so far.

Today we just heard from the National Council of Welfare that Canada has made little real progress in the last 10 years in dealing with poverty. There were 3.8 million poor Canadians in 1990, over 1.1 million of them children, and there are probably an additional 800,000 poor Canadians as a result of this recession.

Is this the kind of country the Minister of Finance thinks Canadians want, where poverty is getting worse for people and bank profits are at record heights?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity many times to answer the question on child poverty and to emphasize what the government has done within its means for Canada's children. The National Council on Welfare report says today, among other things, that the government should be commended for the $15 billion it has invested in its departments, including the $2.1 billion increase over five years.

In answer to questions on child poverty last week and the week before, I said that governments and all concerned should do everything to try to overcome and eliminate child poverty as much as possible. Again I call on my colleague, as I have called on others, to give us all the measures we need to achieve these objectives.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact today's report makes a very important point that poverty gets worse when unemployment goes up.

I have here a confidential 1991 study on free trade effects prepared for the Department of Finance indicating that many company executives were warning finance that free trade would continue to lead to significant job losses for Canadian workers.

Why has this government pushed ahead toward North American free trade when it knew from its own studies that this would lead to increased unemployment and increased poverty for many Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a report issued by the C. D. Howe Institute, dated October 20, 1992. If the hon. member has not read it perhaps he should.

It starts out by saying:

> Three years after its implementation, the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement—is working to Canada's benefit—the data on Canada's external trade over the past three years do not support the view of critics that the FTA has led to widespread job losses or that Canada has become merely a provider of natural resources to the U.S. economy—.Canadian merchandise and service exports to the United States have thrived—both absolutely and relative to Canada's exports to the rest of the world—in most sectors that were liberalized under FTA. In fact, he says, Canada has gained most in exports of non-resource based, high value added manufacturing products to the United States—areas that are crucial for the—growth of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in the three years before the free trade deal came into effect the exports from Canada to the United States went up by over 7 per cent. In the three years that followed the free trade deal those increases were only 4 per cent. Moreover, Canada's trade deficit with the United States on issues including services and goods decreased during that period. The trade situation was worse.

• (1430)

[Translation]

According to this study on poverty which I quoted today, the largest increase is in the number of poor children. Often children are poor because their mothers cannot work. Is the minister prepared to announce an initiative to increase the number of child care spaces in his statement on the economy this week?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member wants to quote his evidence. If he did not get a chance to read The Globe and Mail editorial on November 28, perhaps he might be interested in what it has to say. I quote:

> Hewers of wood and drawers of water no more: manufacturing now accounts for fully half of Canada's merchandise exports, against less than a third just a decade ago.

It goes on to say:

> September's $13.1 billion in total merchandise exports was an all-time high, as was the $10.3 billion that went to the United States. Since the last quarter of 1991, exports have jumped 11 per cent to an annualized rate of $157 billion—exports as wheat (up 37 per cent so far this year) and natural gas (up 21 per cent), but also industrial machinery (18 per cent), office equipment (8 per cent), auto parts (19 per cent), heating and refrigeration equipment (19 per cent), electric lighting (16 per cent) and perhaps surprisingly—

Mr. Speaker: I think we will have to move on.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport was quoted in the Canadian press today as saying that he does not want to end up in jail by encouraging an end to the destructive competition in the airline industry.

If the minister is worried about jail terms, then surely so would the company officials be concerned with such a discussion.

Given this situation, how does the minister expect the airline crisis to resolve itself? Does he have a plan for re-regulation or changes to the competition law and, if so, when is he going to announce it?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we announced the government's position last week with a loan guarantee of $50 million to Canadian Airlines–PWA so that it can pursue all its options in restoring the company to profitability.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the government has given Canadian Airlines $50 million in order to buy its silence at the next stage in this affair.

Yesterday it announced it was not paying its creditors. Meanwhile, the minister says he is afraid of going to jail so he has to sit on his hands.

Is the government just going to sit back and wait until the next crisis puts one or both of these companies over the brink? Does it have a plan of action or is it ready to admit that what it really foresees is a one airline policy for this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that the nonsensical statements by the member for Ottawa South on this issue are more harmful to the stability and profitability of the two airlines. I would hope his statements will be more sensible.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Not since the depression have the Canadian railroads been in such difficulty. Since this government took over in 1984 one in three workers has lost his or her job. Now the government has failed in its interprovincial trade strategy, in its tax reform strategy, in its infrastructure strategy and it has not even responded to its own royal commission.

Can the minister not offer the workers of western Canada one single idea of how their jobs are going to be protected and enhanced in the next decade?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the previous MP mentioned that the government had bought the silence of PWA. First of all, I think it is an insult to the intelligence of the Canadian taxpayers. The Council of Employees that are involved in this transaction have also recognized that the government has made a good gesture toward the survival of the Canadian Airlines company.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what PWA has to do with the rail system but perhaps the minister will answer the supplementary question.

An hon. member: No wonder we are in trouble.

Mr. Walker: However, it is not just the airlines. It is the railroad. It is the roads. It is the infrastructure. The whole transportation structure in this country is falling apart because the minister does not know one component from the other.

I ask again, is it not time the minister brought together the shareholders, people who understand the industry, to come up with a game plan that makes sense for Canadians and starts to protect this industry again?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): I did not know the Liberal Party had endorsed the overturn of the NDP.

We are working with the different companies. Last year we worked with the trucking industry to reinforce its competitive aspects and survivability. We are working with the airline industry to put it back in its profitable state and we are doing the same thing with all industries in the transportation sector.

BILL C–91

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The present process for considering the new patent drug legislation does not allow for any meaningful representation by Canadians who are concerned about the price and availability of drugs. Some of these Canadians are demonstrating for low cost generic drugs on the Hill today.

The provincial ministers of health have formally requested a delay in order to allow for a full and thorough review of Bill C–91. Will the government delay the passage of Bill C–91?

Mr. Speaker: I have to advise the hon. member that I think it is quite clear that is a question that should go to the committee alone and cannot go to the minister. Perhaps the hon. member has a supplementary question.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the government: Why is there the rush to pass Bill C-91 in spite of the interests of Canadian families and seniors?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as you pointed out, the bill is now in committee. I think the government's policy is widely known. We believe that bringing Canadian legislation into line with intellectual property legislation in other industrialized countries will put Canada on an equal footing. Since 1987 our policy has attracted investment totalling $1 billion, and since last January commitments totalling $500 million across Canada, this coupled with a strengthening of the rules of the Drug Prices Review Board. I believe consumers stand to gain on all fronts.

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Over the last three years more than 200,000 metro jobs have been leeched into the Tory monetary sewer. Bureaucracy alone stands between 112,000 workers and $9 billion worth of local construction projects.

Is the minister leaving hundreds of thousands of Canadians without jobs during Christmas so that he can position his capital spending projects closer to the election?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I disagree entirely with the hon. member's allegation.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, we are waiting for capital spending from a spent force in the capital.

This government's so-called economic fundamentals have fundamentally strangled all growth and job creation in the small business sector. The government blames the banks for the credit crunch but it is its own low inflation policy that has made small business loans too risky for many lenders because company assets will not rise in value as quickly.

I ask the minister to accept that his policies have been a tragic miscalculation and to have the courage to reverse them before small businesses get even smaller.

• (1440)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I can take it from the hon. member's question that she is in favour of high inflation and more government borrowing and higher interest rates. If she is in favour of high inflation then she is in favour of higher interest rates. That is not a policy we support.

EAST COAST FISHERY

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The minister says that restructuring is a prerequisite to a bail-out in the east coast fishery. Could he be just a little bit more specific? Who is going to be affected?

Will the government continue its policy of driving fishermen and plant workers right out of the industry altogether with no place to go, or will he now commit to a long-term adjustment program that provides the necessary support to all affected fishery workers, fishermen and plant workers?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the government has no policy of driving fishermen or fish plant workers out of the fishing industry. However, the government does recognize, as does the government of Newfoundland and Labrador, as does the government of New Brunswick, as does the government of Nova Scotia and as does the government of Prince Edward Island, that there are too many fishermen in the industry at the present time.

There is too great a fishing effort being exerted on the fish stocks that are available to us. There are about 84 per cent more fish processing plants than the industry needs. The processing plant capacity in Newfoundland, for example, is 20 per cent used.

These are some of the reasons why the industry is having the difficult time it is having. We have to match all of those assets to the resources.

As part of the northern cod moratorium, we are attempting to provide early retirement packages for fishermen over the age of 55. We will be announcing a program of licence reductions in the future. We are going to professionalize the fishery.

An hon. member: Time.

Mr. Crosbie: This is all very interesting. You should not call time when I am trying to explain the program.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the minister loves to decry the excess processing capacity in Newfoundland. Why does he not 'fess up and tell the House that he was in the cabinet that approved most of the excess capacity when he was a provincial minister.

The minister's policies are creating two classes of fishermen, those who are getting some assistance in these difficult times, and those that are left to fend for themselves.

Despite his announcement last week, I have to say to the minister that fishermen and plant workers are still falling through the cracks, including those who are suffering terribly on the south and west coasts of Newfoundland and elsewhere across the Atlantic.

What does the minister have in mind? What further measures does he have to aid all those people who are the real victims of quota cuts and catch failures?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the hon. gentleman will acknowledge that I have made every effort to assist the fish plants and fish plant workers and fishermen in his own district of Burin-Burgeo.

As a result of the effort put into it—and in all modesty, I had something to do with it myself—the plant at Grand Banks was resurrected and is now in a different kind of fishery. The plant at Gaultois is operating.

We were able to find that Burgeo was a plant that would come under the northern cod recovery program. We cannot find the same with respect to Ramea because that would be contrary to the facts and because Fishery Products International took steps in 1991-92 that resulted in that plant not being eligible. The managing director of FPI is now trying to blame that action of his on me. I rather resent that. I hope that the hon. gentleman opposite will take up my cause.

DUTY FREE SALES

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue.

Can the minister inform the House whether information that Mohawks are selling items duty-free to white people was accurate and, if so, could he tell us about the steps he has taken to stop this unlawful activity which allows non-aboriginal citizens to purchase cigarettes or other goods without paying duty, unlike the majority of Canadian taxpayers?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am obviously aware of these concerns. That is why non-compliance activities for both natives and non-natives are currently being aggressively pursued by way of audits, on-site visitations, other audit schemes and so on.

However, the bottom line remains the same, that for the province of Quebec, Revenue Quebec as well as myself and Revenue Canada are committed to take every necessary step to make sure that compliance on and off reserves in Quebec is going ahead according to the laws and regulations of the policies of both the Government of Quebec and the Government of Canada. Likewise in the rest of Canada, Revenue Canada is going to be taking every necessary step to make sure that compliance is agreed upon by all involved.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Last week the Canadian Environmental Law Association testified that the North American free trade agreement continues the requirement of perpetual supply of all of our resources to the American market, including energy, under article 605, while granting an exemption to Mexico from the energy requirement, annex 603.6, and other resources, annex 316.

Where is the conservation strategy here? Where is the integration of the economy and the environment we have all heard so much about?

In short, how can this government continue to say that the North American free trade agreement is environmentally sound?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me state some of the facts.

There is nothing in the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States that commits us to continue to supply the United States with all of our energy. She knows that very well. What we are committed to do is to meet certain contract requirements. Nothing requires us to sign more contracts, but the NDP have never understood that.

With respect to the North American free trade agreement, there is an exception for Mexico because of the Mexican energy decree.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the government does not understand about the proportionality clause.

Under the Canada–U.S. and this new trade deal, water is treated as an ordinary good. This provision effectively cripples our federal and provincial governments' control of water exports.

Will this government finally admit that there is really no environmental consideration here, that a greedy bottom line will be the only real consideration in the future development of schemes to export Canadian water?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in reference to the hon. member's question and also the answer of my colleague, I would like to point out to her that in 1973–74 when the International Energy Agency was formed, countries that were in a net import position such as the United States, Germany and Japan had to develop what was known as a strategic petroleum reserve. In other words, they had to have reserves on hand in case of shortage. Countries, such as Canada, which are members of the International Energy Agency and which are in a surplus position did not need an SPR.

Mexico, which is part of OPEC, obviously as an exporter of oil does not fall into those proportionality requirements. So the long bow she then draws to water is just as false as her first premise.

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the government and the Governor of the Bank of Canada are so obsessed with fighting inflation by raising interest rates that this has caused a completely artificial rise in the value of the Canadian dollar and a recession that is destroying the manufacturing sector and tens of thousands of jobs.

Now that he has created a disastrous situation and is faced with the need to reduce interest rates in order to start economic recovery, is the Minister of Finance prepared to confirm today that his department intends to borrow American dollars to reduce short-term pressure on the Canadian dollar instead of pursuing his suicidal policy of high interest rates?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that the Governor of the Bank of Canada or the government created a policy that is keeping the dollar high. I do not know where he gets his figures. A little over a year ago, the dollar was worth 89 cents while today it is around 78 cents. Some increase.

• (1450)

As far as interest rates are concerned, we have explained on many occasions that the government must operate under the constraints of a very high national debt which makes the ability or will of lenders to lend us money a major factor to contend with. Interest rates are based on that factor and not on a whim of this government.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, how can the Minister of Finance tolerate the fact that last week the rate on Canadian Treasury bills was 9.05 per cent, while the rate on U.S. Treasury bills was 3.27 per cent, a difference of nearly 6 per cent?

Does the Minister of Finance realize that today, economic recovery is no longer being blocked by the value of the Canadian dollar but by the unacceptably high real interest rates we have to pay to attract investors who are afraid to lose money on the Canadian dollar? Is it not time the government sent a very clear message to the financial markets and indicated that it has confidence in the Canadian dollar by borrowing U.S. dollars? Otherwise, it should let the dollar go down and let interest rates go down.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, if it were as simple as all that, it would be very easy to manage the economy. However, investors base their assessment of Canada's economy on a range of factors. These include the deficit and the debt of the Government of Canada and that of the provinces and Crown corporations like Hydro Quebec and Ontario Hydro. That is the basis on which they decide whether or not to invest, and we respond to the laws of the market.

CANADIAN FORCES RESERVES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. It concerns the Canadian forces reserves.

In his report, the Auditor General in his chapter on the Canadian forces reserves made some disturbing revelations. He talked about accountability, rank structure and how heavy it was. He talked about equipment acquisition and talked more than anything else about availability of the Canadian forces reserves.

I would like to know whether the minister agrees with the allegations in the audit report and what he intends to do about them.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a very important issue. In Canada's military history reservists have always played a key role and very often a most important role when they took part in military activities. The Auditor General's Report raises some points of which we are quite well aware, and within the total force policy. The department and the forces are reviewing exactly how reservists fit into the total picture in Canada. This is a priority for us. Some of the points raised have already been dealt with and others remain to be corrected, but I can assure the hon. member that I share his concern.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The Canadian forces reserves are quite concerned about what was contained in the Auditor General's report. They do, after all, make up the total force concept which is a part of the minister's defence policy. I agree, it is a very important part of the defence policy. They volunteer. They give up their time. It is really quite a serious indictment.

Given that we spent $750 million last year on defence and given that availability is really important, can the minister at least give the House some indication of when there may be some legislation that will ensure availability by legislation to make them (a) available and (b) protect their jobs when they are serving their country?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the analyses that we are now undertaking include this issue of reservists' availability for call-up. In the present system of no advance notice in which nearly half answer the call for requirements with the professional forces in Cyprus, for example, or in the gulf war, I am told that is quite a normal response rate, approximately 50 per cent.

Now the idea of having a bill to assure reservists that they can leave their jobs and return to them has been discussed a lot in Canada for some time. There are pros and cons. The danger with too restrictive a law is that reservists will have trouble working in the private sector because it might be perceived by employers as a danger.

This question is still being discussed now and no decision has been made one way or another.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. It is about the wise use of taxpayers' dollars.

The Canadian Saltfish Corporation, an agency of this government, after lending $110,000 has leased a ship from Claymore Shipping, owned by the father and the daughter of Captain Morrissey Johnson, a former Tory member of Parliament, for $2,200 a day or $1.5 million. At the same time, the same Captain Morrissey Johnson sits as the chairman of another Crown corporation, namely the Fisheries Prices Review Board, where he makes a measly $91,000 a year.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he approves of those practices and what exactly he intends to do about it.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, it is quite funny how the network operates. This is a question that was raised in Newfoundland about 10 or 12 days ago by one Danny Dumaresque, a member of the House of Assembly of Newfoundland. At his press conference, the experienced reporters there who know what is happening laughed at him. The reaction he got from the press was not questions; it was laughter.

There was a vessel chartered some years ago by a company with which Captain Morrissey Johnson had been connected, the Canadian Saltfish Corporation. It was all quite proper and legitimate. When Captain Morrissey Johnson was a member of this House he had no connection with that company. The company was operated by his daughter.

He is an honourable person who gave four years of his life to this institution. Unfortunate he was not returned here.

The hon. gentlemen opposite, one of his colleagues, gets up with this scurrilous nonsense, which is outrageous.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, that proves again that sometimes when you lose, you win.

I want to ask a supplementary of the President of the Treasury Board.

The government contracting procedures say that government contracts, and I quote from the minister's own manual, "shall stand the test of public scrutiny, of prudence, probity, and encourage competition". The president of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation said about this contract: "We do not have to do things by public tender".

Which is the government policy, public tenders or sweetheart deals?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the government's policy is to operate in accordance with the regulations. In the case of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation, in those years it was operating a very expensive business in Labrador on the north shore of Quebec which no private enterprise would touch. We could not get a private enterprise firm to take over this work. It had to charter vessels to move salt bulk fish to and from Labrador as well as supplies and do all of the rest of the work that needed to be done.

The president of the corporation has already answered these questions publicly in Newfoundland. Everyone in Newfoundland knows there is nothing to this dastardly huffery of the hon. gentleman's provincial colleague. Nor is there is anything to what he is now getting up in this House and trying to—

BUILDING OVERPASSES

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Referring to the building of two railway overpasses for Henri Bourassa Boulevard on the border of Montreal north, the minister is reported to have said in an interview with the Montreal North Guide that these overpasses are in federal jurisdiction. Yesterday the minister said that the federal government had agreed to assume responsibility for building the overpasses.

I would like to ask the minister what he is waiting for to announce the beginning of the work and can we hope for construction to begin in early 1993.

Tributes

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member for Bourassa knows that these overpasses are to be built as part of the reconstruction of Henri Bourassa Boulevard. The main parties in this affair are the municipalities concerned and the Government of Quebec. As for the federal government, of course we will build the overpasses once construction on the boulevard has begun.

KEMANO PROJECT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Documents released from the minister's department indicate that pressure was put on departmental scientists to alter their evidence in a court case regarding Alcan's Kemano project.

Will the minister confirm that the RCMP in British Columbia is reviewing his department's operations as it relates to the allegations of the changing of testimony? Can he tell us when we can expect an answer on this investigation?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, if the RCMP is conducting an investigation it is not confiding in me as to how its investigation is proceeding or what the results of its investigation are. It would presumably report to the provincial minister of justice or to whatever authorities it is conducting the investigation for.

There has been some kind of an investigation into this matter going on now for a year or two, but we have never been put in possession of any information as to just exactly what the investigation is about or what results have occurred.

I can tell the hon. gentleman that no political pressure has been put on anyone in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans as to how they should testify in any particular case. With respect to this particular project there was an agreement entered into, as the hon. gentleman knows, dealing with these matters. I know of no pressure exerted on anyone in that connection.

HON. STANLEY KNOWLES

50TH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, today is the 50th anniversary of the election of the Hon. Stanley Knowles to the House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blaikie: On November 30, 1942, 50 years ago today, a by-election was held in Winnipeg North Centre to replace the late J. S. Woodsworth, first leader and founder of CCF, who had died earlier that year. Mr. Woodsworth had represented Winnipeg North Centre since 1921 after his defence of working people thrust him into politics during the Winnipeg general strike of 1919.

His successor and the one he wanted to succeed him was the young Stanley Knowles, a United Church minister and CCF activist who had run twice before for Parliament in 1935 and in 1940. Stanley would carry on the tradition of Woodsworth, picking up his concern for rail workers in Winnipeg and the abrogation of their pension rights, particularly by the CPR, that went back to the 1919 strike. In 1948 he succeeded in getting those pension rights back and protecting further abuses of that kind by the railways against striking workers.

The son of a railway worker himself, Stanley's base of support was to be found at both CN's Transcona shops and CP's Weston shops. Election after election and in between elections for over four decades Stanley could be found standing at the shop gate handing out Hansard, handing out not propaganda, not what he was going to say, not a simplified version, but all of what he had to say and all of what he had repeatedly said on behalf of working Canadians, someone who took Canadians seriously and did not try to influence them with catch phrases tested by focus groups. Stanley was out there the day after the election, too, saying thank you, something that I did with him after his last election in February 1980. I remember being there with Stanley in the cold of that particular month as the guys went in the shop gate and they said: "Congratulations, Mr. Knowles, way to go, kid. Look after him, Stanley, show him the ropes". And he did, as he showed so many other people the ropes in this place.

Stanley, you knew how to say thank you, but so many more Canadians owe a thank you to you for your persistence and precise use of the rules to advocate so many causes, like the end of the means test for old age security and the lowering of the pensionable age, two of your greatest accomplishments.

Stanley was and is a House of Commons person and it is a source of true joy to all of us who know him that unlike so many others he can have the real privilege today of celebrating his 50th anniversary and of being in the Chamber to do so, surely a unique achievement in Canadian parliamentary history.

Just the fact that Stanley continues to be present in this Chamber gives it a certain dignity. Canadians take comfort in knowing that you are here, Stanley. Time and again I am asked by people in Winnipeg about Stanley and how he is doing. Stanley, you occupy a special place in the hearts of many Winnipegers and indeed many Canadians.

As midwife to the birth of the NDP, as trusted adviser and House leader to M. J. Coldwell, Tommy Douglas, David Lewis and Ed Broadbent, as a friend to the hon. member for Yukon, as an early friend of women's issues, as an expert in parliamentary procedure and defender of Parliament during the 1956 pipeline debate, and at all other times, and more recently as an example to Canadians who have suffered a stroke, of perseverance and of devotion to the work of a lifetime, we salute you.

May God grant you many more years in this Chamber which you so ably served and in which you served the Canadian people in such an outstanding and selfless way.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a truly great Canadian, one who has inspired parliamentarians both past and present and indeed all Canadians with his dedication to the work of this House and to this country.

It was 50 years ago today that Stanley Howard Knowles was first elected to the House of Commons to represent the riding of Winnipeg North Centre. He worked hard on behalf of his constituents and served them exceedingly well. To prove this point they re-elected him 12 times—12 times, Mr. Speaker—between 1942 and 1980.

From the moment Stanley Knowles set foot in this House he fought tirelessly to improve social justice for all Canadians. He outlined his goals in his maiden speech on February 3, 1943 and remained loyal to those principles throughout his long and distinguished parliamentary career.

One of his key achievements was to succeed in having pension benefits for senior citizens improved. As a matter of fact, when he first came to Ottawa pensions were only $20 a month.

Mr. Knowles has worn many hats over the years, often at the same time. A few of those included that of worker, trade unionist, minister, scholar, social activist, family man and of course parliamentarian.

We are honoured to still have Mr. Knowles among us today providing guidance, advice and inspiration. He is arguably the foremost expert on parliamentary rules and procedures in Canada today. As a fellow octogenarian, it is certainly a privilege for me to have the opportunity to pay this tribute to a great Canadian and long-time friend.

Mr. Speaker—and you should pay attention to this; it is for you if you are listening or not—back in the seventies there was a controversial bill in the House of Commons to improve the pay of members of Parliament. Quite a sizeable increase was recommended. This may come as a shock to a lot of people, but I did not approve of it and I voted against it. There were other changes in it. There were increases for cabinet ministers.

• (1510)

One of the things that struck me was, with all due respect to cabinet, I felt there was one member in the House of Commons who was entitled to a reasonable increase and that was no other than the Speaker; it was Mr. Jerome at that time. I said the Speaker should be entitled to a cabinet minister's salary. I went over and talked to Stanley about it and he helped me word it. In any event it went through, but when it was over Stanley came over and said: "Stan, you are the only member of Parliament in the opposition who was ever able to get a money bill through" because that was an increase in salary.

Again, Stanley, it is a privilege and a pleasure to be here to invite all members of this House to join me in paying tribute to the Hon. Stanley Knowles, someone who makes us all proud to be part of Canada's parliamentary tradition.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join in the congratulations to Mr. Knowles in celebration of his 50th anniversary. I bring greetings not only of the Liberal Party but as the member of Parliament representing the same seat as Mr. Knowles did. I always say to people I have both the great fortune and the great lack of fortune to have the former member of Parliament sitting in front of me at all times.

I can say at times when I stand here I can see Mr. Knowles sit upright as he turns to see whether or not I am representing Winnipeg North Centre in his tradition. Despite our partisan difference I hope he feels the people are being represented.

On a personal note, Mr. Knowles' reputation has lived on and on in Winnipeg North Centre. When I go to many places in the community—and I do not mean just among the seniors or the elderly but I mean among all age groups—people ask me regularly: "How is Mr. Knowles, how is he doing, is he still in the House every day?"

It is real tribute to somebody who represents an area for as many years as he did that many years after people still inquire. Those of us who are now serving in the House aside from the Table understand just how difficult it is to be that well respected. It is a tribute to all of us that he continues to share with us every day what goes on in this House.

I know I will bring back to the people of Winnipeg North Centre his goodwill. They in turn will wish to hear from him that he continues to be interested in the House. On behalf of the Liberal caucus and the people of Winnipeg North Centre, I again say congratulations to you, sir, and it is fine to have you here.

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I too want to say a few words.

I remember when I first came here in 1968 that Stanley Knowles was then here about 26 years. I thought, boy, that is a long time to be a member of Parliament or to be associated with the House of Commons. Now it is 24 years later and he is celebrating the 50th anniversary of his election to the House of Commons in 1942.

Not only is November 30 the 50th anniversary of his election to the House, November 30 is the 13th anniversary of his appointment to the Queen's Privy Council on November 30, 1979. On both counts I want to congratulate the hon. Stanley Knowles, the former member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Back in 1942 when he was elected, he was elected with a majority of some 6,900 votes. His campaign manager in those days was David Lewis. Mr. Knowles has told me about that campaign when he succeeded J. S. Woodsworth. He told me about a fund raiser that was organized by the CCF in the old Marlborough Hotel in Winnipeg. It created a stir among CCF circles in Manitoba because he decided to charge $1.50 ticket for this fund raising dinner back in 1942. We can see how times have really changed since those days.

Not only was Stanley elected in 1942 but he was re-elected another 12 times. To be elected to the House of Commons 13 times is quite an honour for any person in this country.

Stanley was elected, as I said, 50 years ago and there is no one in this Chamber, either as a member of Parliament or working on our staffs, who was here at the time when Stanley Knowles first came to Ottawa. I guess you have outlived everybody Stanley. You have survived absolutely everyone.

One of my memories about Mr. Knowles was not only was he Mr. Parliament when I first came here in 1968, but shortly thereafter, in 1973 when he turned 65 years old, we had a celebration for him in the Speaker's room 16, just behind the Chamber. The Minister of National Health and Welfare of the Liberal government at that time presented Mr. Knowles with his very first pension cheque. He might be the only Canadian in history who actually had the Minister of National Health and Welfare come to him at a reception and present him with his very first old age pension cheque. I remember that like it was yesterday.

Mr. Knowles, we want to say to you from the bottom of our hearts: You have made this institution a much greater place. You made this country a much greater place, and there are an awful lot of us who owe an awful lot to you. We hope you are here with us for many years to come.

PRIVILEGE

CANADA POST

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege with regard to reports in the Canadian press of this document that was presented by Canada Post Corporation in which it suggests systematically denying members of Parliament information required to carry out their duties.

The document is a communications plan from Canada Post with regard to the retail postal outlets. The plan indicates that where there would be changes to postal services, retail postal outlets or retail postal outlets closing, in each case the government relations will decide whether to advise in advance individual members of Parliament as to what is happening within those ridings.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to take the hon. member away from his intervention, but when the hon. member refers to government services, I take it the hon. member is referring to that division or that group within Canada Post, not to the government.

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, yes. That is correct.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, the government services of Canada Post. Thank you for the correction. The excerpt was confirmed by Canada Post Corporation Government Relations superintendent, Mr. Thrasher.

This information clearly prevents MPs from obtaining information they require to scrutinize a Crown corporation, Canada Post, when asking questions here in the House and when dealing with their constituents' concerns here in the House as well.

As a result, I feel that it is a prima facie breach of privilege for members. If the Speaker finds this to be the case as well, I am prepared to move the appropriate motion.

I heard my hon. friend seek to establish a prima facie case of privilege. I listened carefully and I did not hear such a case being made. It might be that a Crown corporation would have a particular communications strategy vis-à-vis announcements to be made to the public and to members of Parliament for any number of reasons.

I do not believe that what we heard described here today would in any way inhibit a member of Parliament from performing his or her duties which is, as we all know, the only test of whether a privilege has been intruded upon.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I support the comments of my colleague.

I listened to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader indicate that it would not impede the work of a local member of Parliament as it relates to his or her particular Canada Post facility. That is absolute nonsense. In point of fact, it would affect most seriously their duties and how they carry out their duties in terms of the notice that one would get and the ability of the member of Parliament to organize with interest groups in that particular community. Knowing all of the information which Canada Post has at its fingertips would be very helpful to a member of Parliament in his or her role in representing their constituents.

I have examples in my own riding where Canada Post attempted to close post offices. It was only for the fact that we had the information and were notified and consulted beforehand that we were able to mount an attack and to provide the alternative for the government and for Canada Post.

I just wish to reiterate that this is a very serious breach. I believe it to be essential that members of Parliament have this kind of information and consultation, and are treated fairly and generously in this particular process. I would hope that the Speaker would find a prima facie case of question of privilege.

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the intervention of the hon. member for Essex—Kent, the hon. member for Cape Breton East—Richmond and the hon. parliamentary secretary.

I am not going to make a decision now. I am going to adjourn it. The hon. parliamentary secretary may want to consider whether there are more facts that should be in front of the Chair.

It seems to me it would be helpful if I knew a little bit more about exactly what this government relations group had in mind with respect to its particular approach in notifying members of Parliament as to actions that are taken with post offices in their particular ridings.

I am going to adjourn for the moment. The parliamentary secretary might want to give me some indication as to whether there is anything further to hear and at that time we will deal with it further. I thank all hon. members for their intervention.

POINT OF ORDER

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a very unusual request that I wish to make of the Chamber. I have not had an opportunity to consult with members opposite nor to my left, but I think what I am asking will be self-explanatory.

I have a letter here that I just wish to table with the House. It is a letter which is signed by the executive committee for the Westray families who are calling upon the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia to have a federal inquiry into the tragic events which occurred at Westray. I am wondering if I could have unanimous consent of the House to table this letter so that it may be on the record.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has asked the House for unanimous consent. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: So ordered.

PETITIONS

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. This petition asks that the government reconsider its decision with regard to the Court Challenges Program, a program as we know that has been abolished by the government, a program which allowed many individuals and minority groups to clarify to the courts their constitutional, linguistic and equality rights. These people would like to see access to our courts given to all Canadians and, to that effect, would like to have the government reconsider its decision so that it would be available to all Canadians at all times.

KILLER CARDS

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I have three sets of petitions.

The first petition has some 36 pages of signatures, collected for the most part in the Peterborough region but also throughout Ontario and Canada.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to amend the laws of Canada to prohibit the importation, distribution, sale and manufacture of killer card and to advise producers of killer card that their product, if destined for Canada, will be seized and destroyed.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, the second petition I have the honour to present to the House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, has three pages of signatures.

The undersigned are asking and praying and calling upon Parliament to take the actions necessary to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, the third group of petitions I have to present pursuant to Standing Order 36 totals some eight sheets of signatures. The petitioners request that Parliament revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated Juvenile Delinquent Act with a lowered maximum age of 13 rather than 18.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I too have three sets of petitions to present pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first petition is rather belated. Its 25 signatories were asking and calling upon Parliament to call a referendum. We now know that this has been done so I will file that petition.

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my second petition has 100 signatures. The petitioners are saying that it is desirable for all Canadians to provide senior citizens with the necessary support to live their lives as independently as possible and that the federal government has a primary responsibility to ensure the adequacy of seniors' pensions.

The petitioners therefore call upon Parliament to urge the government to ensure that Canadian old age security pensions are sufficient to meet the basic needs of Canada's senior citizens.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my third petition has approximately 700 signatures. This is a very important petition. The signatories are from Nepean, Ottawa, Smiths Falls, Kingston, Manotick, Renfrew and many, many areas throughout eastern Ontario.

The petitioners are speaking to the fact that two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who have been sentenced to 28 years each in a Brazilian prison, have suffered a miscarriage of justice and cruel and unusual treatment in Brazilian prisons.

The petitioners believe that Parliament should urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada immediately.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present today.

The first petition is from 51 petitioners in my riding who are opposed to the GST, particularly with respect to dance lessons. They say that the GST on dance lessons represents both a significant cost to those taking dance lessons and an additional burden for persons or groups operating dance schools.

The petitioners call for the government to remove the GST with respect to dance lessons.

PROUD TO BE CANADIAN

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): My second petition is from a number of constituents in my riding who want to promote the 'Proud to be Canadian' project which is sponsored by the Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs across Canada.

The undersigned support the 'Proud to be Canadian' project as an opportunity to nurture a positive life-long relationship with our heritage and our flag, to encourage stronger ties among Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles, and to promote a tremendous pride in being Canadian. It is a tribute to Kinsmen and Kinettes across the country.

ABORTION

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): My final petition is from 51 people in my riding who say that RU 486 is a drug which causes the abortion of the human foetus at an early age of development, and that the administration of RU 486 has caused the death of at least one woman to date. It has caused serious health problems in others during clinical trials in France and the only proven use for RU 486 is the abortion of young human beings. Therefore the undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament to withhold approval of RU 486 and prevent the marketing and/or testing of this drug to induce abortion.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise again today to deposit a large number of petitions asking that this House amend the Young Offenders Act. These were signed in memory of young Rosalynn Dupuis who was murdered last spring.

The petitioners ask that more serious sentences be allowed. They ask that programs of rehabilitation be started. They ask that all of these very serious crimes and the criminals who have committed them, especially if they are young offenders, be treated very seriously as the crime demands, and that we remember the victims of these crimes and give them as much consideration as we do the young offenders.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present two petitions on behalf of many dozens of senior citizens, individually and through their clubs, to ensure that old age pensions are secure in this country.

They say that many hundreds of thousands of Canadian senior citizens live below the poverty line, that over 80 per cent of single women over the age of 65 live in poverty. They know the federal government has the primary responsibility to ensure the adequacy of seniors' pensions and therefore call upon Parliament to urge the government to ensure that the Canadian Old Age Security pension is sufficient to meet the basic needs of Canadian senior citizens.

REFUGEES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to introduce a petition signed by Canadians from all across Canada: from British Columbia, Quebec, my riding of Ottawa Centre, and so on.

These constituents are calling on the government to show some compassion in dealing with refugee applicants from across the world, in particular those who come from unstable countries where civil strife is taking place.

I would join these constituents in calling on the government to show some compassion in granting them the refugee status required.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I ask, Mr. Speaker, that all questions stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (FISCAL MEASURES) ACT, 1992

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I was interrupted in my answer to the question I was asked just before the break. The member who asked it spoke about the situation of education in the province of Quebec. What he did not mention was the fact that Quebec is blessed with a Liberal Party government under which the people of Quebec have not suffered the way the people in Ontario are suffering under our current government.

Mr. Dingwall: Explain.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond is asking me to explain that.

It is a simple explanation. The NDP government in Ontario is driving business out of the province. The Liberal government in Quebec is attracting business to the province. That is the difference.

It used to be that businesses left Quebec for Ontario but since Ontario switched to the NDP the trend has reversed. We are finding that other provinces in Canada are the net beneficiaries of the election of the NDP. It was not long ago they called the premier of Ontario the citizen of the year in Buffalo because he had driven so many Canadian businesses out of Ontario into Buffalo.

Mr. Butland: Answer the question.

Mr. Milliken: I am answering the question. I am trying to point out the advantages that Liberal governments have afforded.

We do not hear complaints in this House about Liberal governments in Prince Edward Island—the hon. member laughs—Newfoundland, New Brunswick or Quebec that we do about governments in other provinces, particularly in Ontario where, as I indicated earlier, we would be out of the recession if we had any other government but that one.

An hon. member: Come on.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member is from Saskatchewan. He does not know. The New Democrats in Saskatchewan are a different kettle of fish. They are really Liberals out there.

In Ontario the NDP sadly are not Liberals and they are not Conservatives. They are neither fish nor fowl. Some would say foul. Of course, I am being very careful in my use of the word, spelling it very correctly. However, some say that the Government of Ontario is definitely a weak link in the chain of provincial governments in this country and I agree with them.

The hon. member is from Saskatchewan. He knows that business has been moving into Saskatchewan and out of Ontario because of the NDP government in Ontario. He must know that.

Mr. Laporte: No, Peter.

Mr. Milliken: Everybody else in Saskatchewan that I see tells me that is true. They tell me that business is booming in Saskatchewan compared with what it is in Ontario because they are moving. Ontario is suffering a decline. Just ask Bob Rae about the loss of corporate tax revenue. I heard him moaning about it in an article I was reading in the paper. There were quotations from Premier Bob saying that all his tax revenues were down so he had to cut.

I know why they are down. It is because businesses are moving out. He just has not figured that out yet. He will in due course. It will probably be year four of his mandate before that happens.

I am sorry that perhaps my time on that question has gone. What I was trying to point out was that the Liberal governments are the ones that help create the atmosphere in which economies prosper in Canada. Tory and NDP governments work together to destroy that prosperity.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to participate in this debate on second reading of Bill C-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992.

There are a number of items one could make reference to, but I will be fairly succinct this afternoon in directing my comments at a number of different aspects of this particular bill.

My first point concerns amendments to the Canada Student Loans Act. In my constituency this year has been an extremely difficult one for students, who last summer attempted to find summer employment and found that there were very few opportunities. Second, the proliferation of taxes over the last eight years has had an excessively negative impact on family income. Third, many families do not have the privilege of having meaningful work in that there are about 1.6 million Canadians now unemployed.

When we examine that situation and some of the provisions contained in the budgetary papers of the Minister of Finance—one of them being a 3 per cent administration fee on student loans, and also the elimination of the six-month interest-free period for students who have graduated and cease to be a full-time student.

To the casual observer these measures may not provide all that much difficulty. I am here to speak on behalf of my constituents who believe that these measures are regressive and are not necessary. They do very little to facilitate students who are going into the work force and those who are not there at the present time, nor do they assist students who are presently having to seek financial aid to go on to post-secondary education of some sort.

In my constituency I have met with literally dozens upon dozens of students who have come up against a brick wall. There is no summer employment and family income has been taxed 32 times by this administration in the last number of years. The Government of Canada is presently using tables for the purposes of calculating the family contribution dating back to 1983-84. They are vastly outdated.

• (1540)

The other aspect is that, as I said, many families and many bread-winners are now finding themselves without any form of work whatsoever.

To tell students who wish to pursue their post-secondary education that they will have to pay off the top—note that it is off the top—a 3 per cent charge is rather tough.

I know that there are members in this chamber who have children, daughters and sons and some even grandsons and granddaughters who are going to university and they do not find that to be a very burdensome fact of life. When I go back and trace my own roots going into post-secondary education, my parents were janitors. I had to borrow the money to go to university, and a 3 per cent charge off the top is a lot of money.

To some oil baron or some major contractor or lawyer or doctor, whatever it may be, maybe that is not burdensome. It is the kind of money that you can buy your books with, 3 per cent. It is the kind of money that pays for the aeroplane ticket to one's home at Christmas. That is what it means.

I cannot for the life of me understand the government of the day when it talks about a prosperity agenda and turning around and slapping students with a 3 per cent off the top administrative fee.

The government's retort to my assertion is the following: "Students who have gone on to university and who have received money from the Government of Canada are not paying it back, and we have to take measures to ensure that we are going to get that money back".

I have suggested to the Secretary of State and other ministers of the Crown that there is a way this can be done. Many students who leave university—and one of the great examples is in the city of Toronto—cannot find work. MBAs and students with BAs in education and the sciences cannot find meaningful employment.

What does the government do? It is taxing students today at a 3 per cent administrative fee. What does it do to the students who do graduate?

Mr. Milliken: It charges them interest.

Mr. Dingwall: Not only does it charge them interest, but it has eliminated the six-month interest free period. If you were to graduate in May of 1992, you would have June, July, August, September, October and November without having to pay any interest on your student loan. You would have a six-month free holiday. The government has done away with that.

Students cannot get the jobs; there are no jobs to be had. It is another burden given to young people and young students in this country.

If the Government of Canada finds itself in the precarious position on defaulted student loans in excess of $700 million, if that is the case, why does it not think? Is it the disease that has plagued this government for the last number of years and has been referred to in Question Period as this government being a spent force?

I would think that if you were in business and somebody owed you that kind of money you would look at the situation and you would say: "It is awful. We have to do something to recoup that money".

The first thing you have to do is send out notice to those students who have found meaningful work and have an ability to pay, that they should pay back. Nobody in this country who is reasonable would disagree with that. If the lawyers and the doctors are out there practising law and medicine and making money they should be paying the money back to the Government of Canada which loaned them the money to pursue their education.

What about the thousands and thousands of students who want to pay back the money they have borrowed but who cannot get a job? In my end of the country, in Cape Breton, many students have had to leave to go elsewhere to find employment, whether it be in British Columbia or in Alberta or in Toronto.

There are no jobs there. Those jobs are gone. What happens? This government says it is not going to give it to you interest-free for six months; it is going to ding you right away. You cannot get a job so what do you do? Your debt continues to mount and mount. What does the Government of Canada get out of this process? It gets nothing.

Students get something; they get more debt. Is that what we want to do in this country? The answer is obvious to most reasonable individuals except the crowd over there. Why does the government not think and say to students maybe there is a program that if you owe x amount of dollars we will take you as a business major and say you have to put in 18 months with the United Appeal; no salary, but then we will write your student loan off?

There is a contribution that the student is making. They are getting something back and the government will see something for its efforts in that it will have more educated, more experienced, talented young people who will have some semblance of experience because, as we know and we all have it in our districts, students are caught. They cannot get a job because they have no experience and because they have no experience they cannot get a job. It goes around like a vicious circle.

Why could the government not come up with some sort of a package? You are not going to get the $700 million by socking it to the students who do not have an ability to pay. Surely the Government of Canada has to be a little bit more imaginative. Maybe we can do something with the Canadian Federation of Independent Business.

Students are prepared to take the risk, to take the challenge, to take the opportunity to get the experience and to get their debt ratios down. I was very fortunate when I graduated from university. I was able to get a job and pay back the money I owed the Canada Student Loans Program, for which I am very thankful.

I have constituents who come to my riding office who are desperate, who have no form of employment, who cannot get an aeroplane ticket or a car to go to Toronto to get a job. As my friend will say, there are no jobs in Toronto. They have been terminated.

This thing about having a 3 per cent administrative fee on students today and then turning around and short-changing them with regard to those who do graduate come August 1, 1993 to eliminate the six-month interest-free period is absolutely nonsense and does nothing to resolve the problem which is facing young people in this country.

The other thing the government ought to do in terms of the tax, the 3 per cent, as well as eliminating the six-month interest-free period, is meet with the stakeholders in the Canada Student Loans Program and revise the program to make it meaningful.

Let us go back to the family contributions. How many members in this Chamber have heard from parents who talk about the proliferation of taxes, who say my husband or my wife has lost their job, the income has been reduced, the income has been further reduced by the number of taxes and yet the Government of Canada under the auspices of the Canada Student Loans Program is using tables that go back to 1983-84?

Surely the stakeholders, the students and parents would want to have a meaningful dialogue on how we can address some of the deficiencies which are numerous in the Canada Student Loans Program.

I am not going to get into what different provinces do or how they do it, but suffice it to say in my province of Nova Scotia and in my district of Cape Breton—East Richmond students are having a very difficult time and parents are having a very difficult time. They want to see their sons and daughters pursue post-secondary education but there is a system that continuously works against them.

• (1550)

I would hope that on second reading of this bill the government would see its ways and amend accordingly and get rid of these regressive measures.

The second point that I wish to raise is the whole aspect of amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act. The budget says: "The budget proposes that the broadening of the scope of the Small Businesses Loans Act by increasing the maximum individual loan amount from $100,000 to $200,000".

Are they in Disneyworld over there, mentioning $100,000 to $200,000? Have you ever talked to anybody in small business lately? They must be thinking of the Easter bunny and Santa Claus and the tooth fairy to think that this is going to have a major impact on small business in this country.

Small business is telling me that it cannot get $100,000 today. How is $200,000 going to help? It will also tell you: "Government, you promised to eliminate massive paperwork. You have not followed through on that". There is the proliferation of taxes on small business in excess of 32 taxes. When you have the consequential effect with regard to provincial government, it is even much more than that.

Finding capital is difficult. The banks are not lending money. The Minister of Finance gets up and does the Alberta two-step; one forward and two back. He tries to tell us there is all sorts of money out there for small business. It is not out there.

Theoretically $100,000 as opposed to $200,000 is a little bit better. However, that is theory.

An hon. member: That is the cost for a year.

Mr. Dingwall: That is right. The hon. member is mumbling over there and he will have an opportunity to participate in the debate. The first thing you should do is call an election so we can get rid of this crowd over there which has lost the will to govern.

An hon. member: Be constructive.

Mr. Dingwall: You have to instil in the system some sense of confidence as to where we are going. This government has not done that.

The hon. member, who will be an hon. member at least when the books are written, will no longer be a member of this House after the next election and he will then have an opportunity to understand fully and to appreciate what small business is having to go through in this country.

An hon. member: What should we do?

Mr. Dingwall: Look at the proliferation of the taxes that this government has put into place.

This is a government that argued and campaigned in 1984 that we had too many taxes then. We come in now and there are 32 new taxes. This is the government that took in the GST and said to the people of Canada that this was going to be the panacea to cutting the deficit as far as Canadian taxpayers are concerned.

It really cut the deficit; from about $180 billion it has gone up to well over $400 billion. That is the Tory way. The hon. member wishes to mumble, but he will have his opportunity and mumbling does not really resolve the problem. The fact of the matter is the introduction of the GST further facilitated the recession that we are now in.

Third, the GST has had negative consequences in terms of the revenue it was supposedly to produce for the Canadian government. Not only were those members wrong in theory, they were wrong with regard to how they implemented all of their tax changes as they affect the Canadian economy.

What better group in society has felt the pain than small business in this country? Therefore, I say to members opposite that Bill C-76 and the amendments are putting another $100,000 made available to small business which in theory is fine, but the reality is that banks and many institutions are just not lending the money.

This will do nothing to assist in that regard.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Be constructive. Do not just criticize. Give solutions.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the hon. gentleman in terms of the proliferation of taxes that there were too many. They brought in the GST at the wrong time.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dingwall: I am trying to respond to the hon. member's questions, but again he is one of those Tories who sits on the other side and reads the dogma which comes from PC research. They think they have the monopoly on all the answers to the ills of society.

My colleagues in this party and I know that we do not have all the answers, but we know that member over there and this Tory administration have brought in 32 new taxes when they promised they would not introduce any new taxes. They brought in the GST which further facilitated the recession we find ourselves in at the present time.

This is a government that has now put an additional tax of 3 per cent on students. This is a government which is attempting to eliminate a tax-free provision for six months for students who are no longer full-time students. That is contained in the provisions of Bill C-76.

I have offered solutions with regard to student loans. I have offered solutions with regard to small business which the hon. member has heard. However they do not want to hear answers. They do not want to hear alternatives. They do not want suggestions, and the reason is that they have lost the will to govern.

I can assure all members across the way that Canadians will reward them handsomely for not having the will to govern and to listen. Let us have an election and then they can be accountable to the Canadian citizens for all the wonderful things they have done for the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's speech was outstanding in terms of volume. Certainly it also deserves very high marks in the indignation category.

He was saying that the government was not interested in alternatives or any suggestions. Five or six minutes ago he was speaking how students were very enterprising and that perhaps something could be worked out with the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and so on.

I was not quite clear what he had in mind when he made that suggestion. I invite him to elaborate on it because on this side of the House, although he alleges that is not the case, there are people who are interested in alternatives and new ideas. Could he elaborate on that?

Second, while he is returning to the debate, could he say what he would have done in relation to student loans if he were the minister responsible and had read in the last few days the report of the Auditor General talking about some $400 million in defaulted student loans?

Mr. Dingwall: It is larger.

Mr. Boyer: It is a larger amount, he informs me. It is a very high figure. It is one that gives cause for concern as to the whole viability of the student loans program. I would like to hear his thoughts on that as well.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I thought I made some suggestions in my remarks as to what the Government of Canada could do. I do not wish to repeat it verbatim, but with regard to Canada student loans defaults, surely the Government of Canada has to send a signal to those individuals who have the ability to pay that they must pay.

I give as an example myself. When I graduated from university and went on to work, I had the ability to pay and I did pay. I paid my student loans off. There are those in the system who have the ability to pay. The government should be serious about getting that money back. We have seen some examples in other jurisdictions where governments have been serious with delinquent payments.

Many students have graduated and have no form of employment, no opportunity for employment, no likelihood of employment, particularly in the regions. I guess to a large extent students cannot find employment in some of the major urban centres of this country. I am sure the hon. member has, as I have had, numerous students with their MBA, BA, Bachelor of Commerce, et cetera, who cannot get anywhere.

• (1600)

The government has to be creative. It has to be creative with some players who are out there, for instance some of our national social agencies such as the Canadian Federation of Independent Businesses. I will use myself as an example. Perhaps it is not a good example, but I think the hon. member will see the point.

I graduated in commerce. If you have a student who does not have the ability to pay, perhaps that student can work for 12, 14, 16 or 18 months with the United Appeal. Make a contribution to the United Appeal. Maybe it is a marketing expert. Maybe it is a financial expert. You work to pay off your student loan. It is not written off at the taxpayers' expense. You have to make a contribution to the community, to those social agencies which are out there, in order to lessen the debt for students.

Maybe it cannot all be done through that particular national organization of volunteers. Maybe something can be done through the Canadian Federation of Independent Businesses in terms of some form of a wage subsidy that the Government of Canada will pay in lieu of the student getting moneys, and giving a proportion of that amount of money back to the Government of Canada.

It is not the spendthrift Liberals trying to write all these debts off. I think governments have to be creative and go to the stakeholders and speak to the students and volunteer organizations such as the cancer society, the United Appeal, the Red Cross, the Canadian Federation of Independent Businesses, economic groups, environmental groups across this country, all of those. If we can come to some understanding, some form of contract of service in lieu of the payment of the student loan, I think it will contribute substantially for the student in lessening his or her debt, and also contribute substantially to society and to the organizations they are to serve.

I want to tell my hon. friend that you are not going to get one hundred cents on the dollar through default student loans by doing what you are doing at the present time.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I want to recognize my colleague's good grasp of the situation. However, when he suggests that the government should become creative in attempting to collect this $700 million of outstanding debt, I am sure he is aware—I want to highlight it, I want to put it on the record—that the government has become very, very creative. It has in fact farmed out the collection of outstanding student loans to the sharks out there. I read where the various private collection agencies are vying for these very lucrative contracts to get their teeth into these students, or failing that if the students have no jobs, get after their parents.

I am not exaggerating. These people are like sharks. They harass these people at school. They say: When are you going to pay, and the student says I have no job, I cannot pay.

I cite the case of a 53-year old constituent who came into my office and borrowed $4,000 about 15 years ago. He said that he made a pact with the government to pay $20 a month. But he said: "As I pay my token toward the debt, it is expanding faster than I can pay it". He asks: "who is going to hire a 53-year-old?" He is not employable, he accepts that fact which is really a tragic statement for an individual to make. The government is not prepared to give him a chance. In fact, it goes one step further and puts it out to these collection people who harass and harass. In the case of young people, if they cannot pay it, they say: "Well, can't the parents pay it? Take money out of their RRSPs".

Surely there must be a better way. It is creative but it is certainly not acceptable. It is not compassionate in any way. Granted there are dodgers out there who they have to be come down on hard, but for every dodger I am sure there are 25 or more good, sincere, ambitious young people who want to work.

I ask the member to comment on this policy that the government has initiated.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for raising this aspect about the harassment which is taking place of students who have left university and who are attempting to find work. He is quite right.

The harassment which is taking place is totally unacceptable to young people, to me as a legislator and hopefully to this House. Some of the tactics which are being used are just unbelievable. If one were to use the code word from the movies loan sharks that is what it looks like.

These individuals are being called at home, receiving letters in the mail, called at work, even if it is part-time work as baby-sitters. There are uncles being called, grandmothers being called, family members being called. There may be a separation in the home, a father has gone or a mother has gone. They are calling these individuals to try to get their pound of flesh.

That is totally unacceptable. It underlines, in my view, the need for us to be creative. Let us remember that when you get a Canada student loan the bank does not lose any interest. The bank gets paid because it is guaranteed by the federal government. Perhaps there is a way in which we can do something on the interest with regard to these loans which are outstanding.

In my constituency there is a young person who is paying interest at 17 per cent because that is what it was at the time. Interest rates were high. He was locked in at that time. Therefore that person has to pay the money back.

We have to be more imaginative, more creative. Since the money is paid to the bank and it is owed to the Government of Canada, I think we have to look at ways to revise the rate of interest which is being paid. As the member has correctly pointed out, a constituent who has agreed to pay x number of dollars finds out after five or six years it has not done anything really to the principal because it is all going to interest.

Those are the kinds of things that I think we as a Parliament must attempt to do for students in this country who are trying to pursue their post-secondary education.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak to this bill, Bill C-76. As you know, there are four aspects to this bill. It makes changes to the Canada Student Loans Program. It makes changes to lobbyists who are required to pay a registration fee. It is going to reduce salaries of ministers and it is going to increase limits for business improvement loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act. I would like to make comments about all of these, some in more detail than others.

Very briefly, with respect to the increase in registration fees or providing registration fees for lobbyists, there is nothing wrong with that except that the government does not seem to be distinguishing between lobby groups. There are a lot of lobby groups in this country that are doing a good job that are lobbying for the disadvantaged. These groups tend to be non-profit groups or groups with very little funding. They can ill afford to pay registration fees.

Lord knows we need groups lobbying for women, minorities, native peoples, the disabled, the homeless, the poor, et cetera. There should be an exemption for those types of groups which are doing very good work, work that often is not done by this government, work that needs to be done in this country.

The next area I want to talk about briefly is with respect to ministers' salaries. We welcome the fact that salaries of ministers of the Crown will be reduced by approximately 2.5 per cent of their total income. That is a token amount and that is appreciated.

However, I would suggest a better approach would be the one suggested by my leader, the hon. member for Yukon, the Leader of the New Democratic Party who suggested that with regard to members of Parliament who have to pass any legislation that deals with members' income, members' pensions, perks, and the rest of it, it should pass by this House.

However, it is not appropriate for us to be doing this ourselves. As we have suggested, there should be a committee, an independent body set up that will make recommendations to this House with respect to MPs' salaries, ministers' salaries, perks, pensions, everything that surrounds a member of Parliament or minister of the Crown. That package would come to this House and would simply be passed by this House without any questions being asked. That is a more responsible approach to this issue.

There are two other areas I would like to spend a little more time on. One is with respect to small business. This bill purports to make changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act which will increase the amount of loans that are available under this act from $100,000 to $200,000. It is important to point out some of the background with respect to this bill.

Since its establishment in 1961, the objective of the Small Businesses Loans Act has been to encourage private commercial lenders to make term loans to small business enterprises for financing the establishment, expansion, modernization and improvement of specified fixed assets, equipment, premises and land. The rate of interest must not exceed chartered bank rates of prime plus one. That is all very well. As well, the federal government is liable to pay 85 per cent of any loss sustained by a lender as a result of a loan made under this act since 1985.

There is nothing wrong with that aspect of the act. There is nothing wrong with increasing the amount available under the act for loans. However, there are problems with this bill, the main one being that small businesses are having difficulty getting any loans under this act. In fact, trying to obtain a loan in the first place is a major task. One main reason is that the attitude of the banks is that most small business people are simply a bad risk. I have been told by people in my riding that if a small business entrepreneur has an opportunity and is a good credit risk, banks often time will not even mention the Small Businesses Loans Act and will offer them money under a different program. Of course, the goal of banks is to bring in the most revenue possible. As we have seen in recent days, bank revenues are at record highs for a number of the chartered banks.

It is interesting to note that the number of small business improvement loans made by lenders has decreased from almost 35,000 in 1985 to a little over 10,000 in 1991. That is a major decrease. The amount of money lent decreased from over $1 billion in 1985 to something like $413 million in 1991.

We have to emphasize that the banks have a responsibility to help end the recession. The problem with the Small Businesses Loans Act is that we need the banks to make it work. Small businesses create over 80 per cent of the new jobs in Canada, but the banks would apparently rather lend to large businesses than to small business entrepreneurs. Therefore, increasing the limit to $200,000 is simply not going to help the small business operator if he is trying to get a loan for $40,000 or $50,000. It does not help them.

Small businesses are hurting. Business bankruptcies are up again. In September over 1,200 businesses failed, up 18 per cent. While the banks are cutting back on loans under $100,000 to small businesses under the Small Businesses Loans Act, in the fiscal year ending March 31, more than 85 per cent of all funds for loans and guarantees by the Federal Business Development Bank were in the over $100,000 category. This government needs to provide more risk and venture capital for small businesses and simply not just to larger firms.

I think we on this side of the House would all agree that small business plays an integral, essential role in the economy of this country. Over the last several years the small business sector has been responsible for most of the new job opportunities. Between 1980 and 1989, Stats Canada indicates that almost 80 per cent of the new jobs created in this country were created by small businesses with less than 50 employees.

Small businesses are often the mainstay of many small rural communities. I know that from experience in Saskatchewan, having been part of a major rural paper for this party. In fact, it is the first federal party to have a rural policy. I travelled to many parts of rural Canada this last year.

Small businesses are a mainstay in rural communities. This government and other governments have not focused attention on the need to help small businesses in rural communities. Certainly, this measure is not going to help them either.

Full employment can only be achieved with the full co-operation of Canada's small business sector. There is an unfair tax burden in that small businesses still pay an average tax rate higher than Canada's largest businesses. The GST will add further hardships both in compliance costs and in accounting costs for the small business person.

Ninety-eight per cent of small businesses are Canadian owned. Their earnings are usually reinvested right back into the community and into the Canadian economy.

Small businesses operate under severe constraints in the Canadian economy which in turn limits their potential to produce even more jobs. Constraints, such as high costs for development capital, severe undercapitalization, high interest rates and higher taxation levels compared to corporations put small business at a real disadvantage in the Canadian economy.

What should we do about this? The federal New Democratic Party has suggested a number of alternatives including: ensuring that banks provide more loans to small businesses at the rates given to big corporations; establishing a more aggressive buy Canada program which includes government contracts and is targeted to the small business and community enterprises; providing risk and venture capital for small businesses; providing greater opportunities for women to establish small businesses including the commitment by the banks to treat women in an equal manner; and identifying areas in which small business could expand to meet consumer demand now covered by imports.

We should be providing small businesses with relevant financial marketing and management assistance through federal one-stop shopping centres to be organized in conjunction with local business communities. This is really important in rural Canada. Reform of the Federal Business Development Bank is needed to focus its activities on small business, especially those most in need.

Canadian Patents and Development Ltd. should be directed to work with small businesses to help them patent new innovations and to market those patents world-wide.

The tax system should be changed to make severance pay tax exempt and to allow the tax-free use of RRSPs to start up new small businesses. We must immediately move away from the high interest rate policy that this government has pursued and as well withdraw the GST.

Those are measures that the New Democratic Party has suggested. They are measures which would help small businesses.

Although the increase in the funding from $100,000 to $200,000 in terms of loans in the Small Businesses Loans Act is fine, it certainly is not enough. It is certainly not going to help small businesses that are struggling today or many individuals who are thinking of starting up small businesses.

We all know that small business people spend a lot of hours working at their small businesses. Many of these people do not spend 35 or 40 hours a week working in their businesses; they will spend 75 to 80 hours or more. Often that person is the manager, the accountant and the clerk. You name it, they do it all. Those people have not received the respect they deserve from this Parliament.

Those are some of the measures my party and I support. They are measures which are essential if small business is really going to survive in this country.

I would also like to make some comments with respect to the fourth area with which this bill deals. That is with respect to student loans. This government is planning to remove the six month interest-free provision that is presently in place for student loans.

I remember when I was a student. I studied education initially and I also studied law. I graduated in April and was fortunate to get a job. In those days, there was still a big need for teachers and my job started in September. I had all of May, June, July, August, September and October before I had to pay interest on my loan.

• (1620)

That was very important for me because at that point, having been a student for some four or five years, I had a lot of debts. I had over $10,000 in student loans to pay back. It was essential for me to allow myself to get established. I taught in a small town in Kipling, Saskatchewan. I moved to that town. I moved my family there and incurred debts moving to that community.

The interest-free provision was very much appreciated by me. There are lots of students today who, even if they do get a job after completing school, should have the opportunity to establish themselves in the work place. This is simply not going to happen now.

To be faced with an interest burden as soon as students graduate simply is not fair. Many students find themselves out of luck and do not get jobs with anywhere from $8,000 to $18,000 in loans. If they still do not have a job after a year or so, their best course is to declare bankruptcy. That is what I would advise them to do.

Why should they be faced with that burden? They come out of school owing $18,000 or $20,000 and that is rising at the rate of who knows what the interest rates might be because they seem to be going up and down like a yo-yo. The last thing they need if they start working after a year or so is to face that increasing burden. This government is simply encouraging people to avoid paying those bills.

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie also raised a very important point with respect to the fact that students are often hassled with their loans. I have had constituents come into my office as well. A number of times former students have come in and have said that they are working at a minimum wage job somewhere, or that they do not have a job yet, or that they are single parents. There is a whole host of situations.

In any case, they are being hassled by collection agencies. I have had occasions to deal with a few of those agencies on the phone and it is very difficult. It is not very pleasant nor very fair to have a collection agency harassing a student. This government should do something about that. If it wanted to help students, it could start with this.

The 3 per cent surtax now on student loans which the government said it was going to remove but is still being taken off the top when a student gets a loan is also a burden. Yes, it is a lot of money when you are a student and you do not have a lot of money to spend. You lose 3 per cent off the top of a loan that you have to pay back and that you are going to pay interest on as soon as you graduate.

It is true. As I listened to debate on this bill today there were some comments with respect to the fact that moneys given to the provinces for education are not always channelled to that particular goal or objective. The accountability is not there. This was something that was removed by the Liberals back in 1975 and has not been dealt with since. One of the ways the government could deal more efficiently and effectively with student loans would be to put that accountability in place. That would be helpful.

As far as students repaying the loans not only should we be providing a six-month grace period, we should also be providing a grace period until the student obtains a job. Then the government would get its money back. We would not have the $600 million or $700 million in outstanding loans that are not being paid back to the government. Students would be making payments on their loans. When a student has a mounting debt and is trying to make payments on the loan but is having a very difficult time just meeting the interest payments it does not make him or her very anxious to pay that debt off.

We should show a little more respect for our students. After all, if we are going to compete in this world and if we are going to be a competitive nation, we are going to need educated Canadians.

We want to encourage people to go to school. We do not want people to be detracted from going to school because of lack of finances. We want to be encouraging people to take out loans to get an education and contribute to society. When a student graduates and there is no job available, it is not that student's fault. What we should be doing, I would suggest, is providing an interest-free period until that student obtains a job.

Although there are derelicts in this country who will negate their obligations, the vast majority of students do not fall into that category at all. In fact, I would suggest that the vast majority of students would be more than willing and would want to pay back their loans.

Students should be treated fairly. Once they have a job and start making a contribution to this country they can pay back their loans and can start paying interest. However, to burden students with a debt load before they find a job is unfair.

What this government is doing with the proposed changes to the student loan legislation is not going to help the government or the students and that is unfortunate. Therefore, I certainly will not be supporting this portion of that legislation and I believe the rest of my colleagues in this party will not be supporting it either.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it seems that all of us who are getting up to speak on this have at one time or another had student loans and repaid them. I guess there is something to be said for the importance of this program over the years. It has helped a lot of us acquire a university education.

In the remarks just made by the hon. member he was outlining different parts of his party's policy dealing with this whole question. Certainly what he was saying about small business is not, as he was intimating it might be, just a concern to people on the opposition side of the House.

Anybody in public life in this country certainly understands the importance of small business. A lot of measures taken by the government bear that out that it is an enduring issue and an important focus for anyone in public policy in this country.

I would like to go on from that comment where I thought he was perhaps being too general to be really helpful in his assessment to a more specific point he raised. The member said that it was the New Democratic Party's policy to withdraw the GST.

I would like to ask the member what is in fact meant by that? Is it to revert to the pre-existing 10 per cent telecommunications tax that applied to phone bills and television cable services, that sort of thing, and the 13.5 per cent tax on manufactured goods and on building materials and so on?

In the alternative, if it is not to go back to that, is it simply to vacate that field entirely? If that is the case, how does he and his party propose to make up the shortfall in many billions of dollars of obviously needed revenue for the Government of Canada that any government needs to carry on the public service of the country?

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the question by my hon. colleague across the way, it is certainly very tempting with the GST and its some $18 billion or thereabouts which I believe it brings in every year to maintain that sort of tax. It is not a progressive tax; it is a regressive tax. The hon. member says it is a progressive tax but it is a regressive tax. We on this side of the House are opposed to regressive taxes.

This country survived for 125 years without a GST and it has only been in the last little while that we have had a GST. There are alternatives. Certainly the way the manufacturers' sales tax was put in place was not the answer. We all agreed it was not an appropriate tax. This government actually doubled that tax in the years before it did away with it. That is not the answer, unless it is a very small tax.

• (1630)

What is needed in this country is some true, progressive tax legislation. This government should do a complete revision of the Income Tax Act. The Income Tax Act is not designed solely for getting tax revenue from Canadians. It is an act that has all sorts of social programs, social initiatives and economic initiatives tied to it. The Income Tax Act is cumbersome. Corporations hire accountants, tax lawyers and others and pay them good salaries, $80,000, $100,000 or $120,000 a year to find loopholes in it.

The previous Minister of Finance said he was going to simplify the Income Tax Act. All he has done is complicate it. The first thing we should do is take the Income Tax Act and throw it out and come back with a truly progressive, simplified Income Tax Act that will tax Canadians fairly.

At least $27 billion in corporate profits were totally untaxed in recent years and hundreds of billions of dollars are taxed at an extremely low rate. I appreciate the comments made by the member that we all appreciate small business. However, small businesses get the fewest breaks and the most taxes.

If we had a revised Income Tax Act that would provide fairer taxation for all Canadians and take some of the burden off the middle class, we would have a more progressive economy. We would also have an economy that would recover faster, because the middle-income people are the ones who do the most for this economy. They are the ones who buy the goods and services and they are the ones who contribute back into the economy.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member would not wish to mislead the House in any way. I would ask him to consider comments he made about the regressivity of the GST. The GST is a tax on consumption and when during a recession consumption falls then the tax take on a consumption tax also falls and that is extremely progressive.

That is exactly the reason why the amount of money collected by the GST, now at roughly $15 billion, is almost $2.5 billion less than the amount collected by the taxes it replaced. Anyone can see, in effect, that has amounted to a $2.5 billion tax reduction for Canadians during the course of this recession.

It is not just that which makes it more progressive. It is also the fact that the GST credit is in place, pumping about $2.3 billion this year back into the pockets of lower income people. Certainly the member has to agree that the GST regime and a tax on consumption, particularly when the economy has been in decline, has been a much fairer and progressive way to raise funds.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, the GST is a regressive tax. It is regressive because it taxes everyone at the same rate. If I make $20,000 and I get a haircut I am charged 7 per cent tax. That 7 per cent is worth more to me than if I am making $60,000 and get that haircut. It is a regressive tax. There is a provision in it for the lower income group in our society to get something back. However, it is a regressive not a progressive tax.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to what the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore had to say and I want to put the question directly.

As I understand it, the policy of the NDP, if Canada was unfortunate enough to elect them as the government of the day, would be to abolish the GST.

If the GST is abolished—even if we accept the incorrect figures of the hon. member for Halton—Peel of $15 billion—we no longer have $15 billion that we are using to fund existing programs. Precisely what will the NDP put in place to replace that $15 billion if it is going to abolish the GST upon coming into office? What else will it do, or how is it going to cover these programs?

It is nonsense to say that we will have a complete revamping of the Income Tax Act because any rational person knows that to review the Income Tax Act is going to take, if not months, years. In the meantime, is he saying that while his party is reviewing the Income Tax Act, we are going to continue to have the GST?

If he is going to abolish it, what is he going to put in its place? What policies is he going to cut?

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to my Liberal colleague, the position of this party is yes, do away with the GST.

A New Democratic government, the date it comes into power, is obviously not going to remove the GST immediately because it is making $18 billion. That is true, but an NDP government will remove the GST. Certainly in its first mandate it will be gone, and a more progressive tax system will be put in place.

The hon. member might consider talking to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood who I believe has ideas on improving the Income Tax Act. There is one alternative.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I thought I was going to get a break today and get the NDP to endorse a single tax. I guess no such luck. I keep hoping.

I want to begin my remarks today by referring to that portion of the bill that deals with the Small Businesses Loans Act. I have stood in this House several times and have said that I believe this is good legislation, the fact that we are taking the Small Businesses Loans Act from $100,000 and doubling it to $200,000.

Most Canadians do not realize that essentially this means that if I ran a small business and I went to my local bank, and provided the bank manager knew about the program, I could be entitled to up to $200,000 in a loan from that bank on capital items. The bank is supposed to be progressive in its attitude of lending under this legislation because the bank is guaranteed 85 per cent of the loan if the company should go into default.

My problem with this legislation is the fact that very few bankers across Canada know about this program. I have been pleading for months with this government to try to do something to communicate to all the bank managers in Canada that this legislation exists.

If the government were to do this, it would go a long way in rekindling some spirit of hope and confidence in the small business sector. I will not go into a long dissertation on the importance of small business to the economy of this country because we all know that small business employs close to 80 per cent of the people.

We also know that the greatest hope for new job creation lies in this particular sector. The government needs to address the communications aspect of this particular part of the legislation, the Small Businesses Loans Act.

• (1640)

The second thing I find frustrating is that it has taken us almost a year to put this amendment to the Small Businesses Loans Act through the House of Commons. This is the kind of thing I really believe serves us poorly as legislators, as members of Parliament.

It is almost nine months since the Minister of Finance announced this legislation. The press reports would talk about the Small Businesses Loans Act going from $100,000 to $200,000. That creates an expectation with many businessmen out there that there is something in this budget for them. It is almost a year later and we still have not made this legislation come alive with the business community of this country.

Basically there is all-party agreement on this legislation. It seems to me that when we think about little things we could do that are not going to cost the treasury any money, things we could do to stimulate the economy, deal in some hope with the small business sector, here is legislation that could have gone through this House six months ago and there would not have been anyone on this side to say that we are against moving this legislation through too quickly.

As someone who comes from a small and medium-sized business background, I can tell you if there is one thing that tends to discourage an entrepreneur, not from time to time but often about the way this place works, is that we seem to take so long doing so many simple things, and this is a specific example.

The other thing I would like to deal with is that section of the bill which deals with the amendments to the Lobbyists Registration Act. The amendment gives the Governor in Council regulation-making power to enact regulations charging a fee to be paid by lobbyists when as required by the act they register under the act.

I am going to be critical of the government on this particular part of the legislation. The Lobbyists Registration Act is like smoke and mirrors. Basically we are amending the act so that from now on lobbyists are going to be charged when they register.

We need a full debate on how the lobbyists or the government relations people who are involved in that exercise in this city interact with members of Parliament, interact with officials, interact with the entire policy-making apparatus.

I watched the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore last night on cable 10 in Toronto where he was being interviewed on, I think, John Tory's show. The subject being discussed was the way lobbyists were basically manipulating the system from the bottom up in this town. I commend the hon. member for his straightforward remarks. They were right on the button as far as I am concerned.

I can remember back in 1980 there were a few lobbyists around this town but they tended to be people who would try and advocate a thrust that was more along the lines of policy-making or policy amendments.

In the last five or six years I have noticed the incredible industry of lobbyists that has emerged. It is like a whole new sector of the Ottawa economy. These various government relations vice-presidents and various associations not only work on policy but are now lobbying for grants and are lobbying for contracts for privatization of airport terminals. It is the most incredible thing.

It is at a point now where anything of substance that goes on in this city by-passes most MPs. Good lobbyists will deal with a cabinet minister's office. Let us say it is something to do with transport. They will deal with senior officials and with critics directly related to that particular issue. They will basically by-pass the whole parliamentary process.

We do not need some little tinkering amendment to the act which is contained in this particular bill. We need a full-blown debate on what goes on in this city and in this country with the lobbyists.

It is not that I am against the exercise of people wanting to advance their particular point of view, whether it be the auto sector, the oil sector or whatever. What bothers me about it is the way the whole thing is shrouded in secrecy.

In the United States all lobbyists are registered, but they also have to report their sales and their fees. In other words, if I was a lobbyist representing a particular client in the oil industry or the oil sector I have to register the amount of money that I received from that particular account.

If all of a sudden it is seen that I am representing a particular industry and at the end of the month or at the end of a six-month period I post that I received $10 million in fees from a particular sector of the economy people will certainly know where my thrust is coming from. It tends to make people a little more alert to what is going on in the process.

It is incumbent upon the government as it is preparing itself to do a little bit of a face-lift over the next 30 days—we understand that the government is preparing a Speech from the Throne and maybe right at the top of the list it could say that it is going to take a good hard look and review the lobby system, how it works and how it affects the parliamentary process in this country.

Maybe before this particular Parliament ends some of us can become relevant again. Right now, as most of us would agree, it seems that on any given day the lobbyists are more relevant than some of us.

Mr. Lee: They're outflanking us.

Mr. Mills: They are outflanking us, as my colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River has just said.

As for student loans, my government House leader said it all today when he talked about the fact that the credit collection system that this government has hired is very tough. We are talking now about student loans that are not necessarily in default, but people are a little slow or their payment schedule has been delayed.

• (1650)

Quite often that delay in payment schedule has been due to unfortunate circumstances. Maybe a young person who has graduated has not had the opportunity to find a job or maybe there were some other commitments in terms of family or whatever that had to be looked after right away. It is so demeaning when someone is just in the process of getting on their feet, and I have had single mothers in my own riding come into my office a couple of times almost in tears when they have received phone calls, letters and threats. In particular cases in my riding this agency was called Total Credit Collection. It was so aggressive in its approach that it just knocked the stuffing out of these people who were trying to get on their feet.

There is absolutely no reason why the government cannot send some signal to these collection agencies it has hired to be a little more sensitive. I can see these people using that technique if it is someone who has a healthy job, if they have assets and resources and are trying to default on paying the debt back to the Crown as a point of negligence. Fine. I can see the collection agency being a little bit aggressive with that kind of person.

However, I do not think it is very constructive to pick on people who are disadvantaged during a very tough time.

I know that even though we are trying to put across our point of view on some of these particular components of this bill here today the government will probably not do anything to amend it. We can only hope for some direction from it to the various agencies it is responsible for to ensure that they will be a little more sensitive. I challenge the government to address the issue of lobbyists.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the member for Broadview—Greenwood has given another of his thoughtful speeches. I want to pick up the challenge he has just issued to deal with the lobbyist issue.

I suspect that if he would have moved an amendment to the provision he has pointed to dealing with the fees it probably would have been one I would have gladly seconded.

As we are not going to have that exchange right now, at least the House has just referred to the Standing Committee on Corporate and Consumer Affairs the Lobbyists Registration Act so that it now undergoes its three-year review.

While I know that some members of this House and certainly most of the practitioners of the lobbying trade would say: "The present legislation is fine, leave it alone, thank you very much" there are certainly many of us—and I would hope most members of this House—who feel that the practices engaged in by those who insert themselves between the people and those in their government and extract a fee for doing so—and I speak here of the tier one lobbyists, not the tier two lobbyists. They finally have an opportunity before this committee to make their views known because we will certainly want to make our views known about what we consider to be something that is fundamentally undermining representative democracy and eclipsing Parliament.

The member for Broadview—Greenwood spoke of the minimal contact between these representatives of special interests in our society and those of us who are elected officials. A senior representative of one such lobbying firm told me not more than 5 per cent of all their contacts are MPs. That number is in the published literature as indicating where the contacts are made.

There are many things that have undermined the peoples' elected Chamber over the past two, three, or four decades. This is one of them.

The fact is that we as parliamentarians will now have a chance to review the Lobbyists Registration Act and deal far more substantively with the issues that are raised here about democracy in Canada and the conduct of public business than is dealt with in this one amendment, which only goes to the question of a fee that is charged.

It is time for us to look at other aspects such as the abolition of contingency fees, such as disclosure of the ownership of the lobbying firms, such as having elected officials report the contacts made by lobbyists, such as disclosing the exact nature of the lobbying transactions, such as disclosure of fees, random spot checks and verification, and such as the government bringing in Bill C-43 which was studied by a joint committee of this House and the Senate, recommendations now made to deal with conflict of interest.

All of this is uppermost in the minds of Canadians who like many of us here want to see some fundamental reforms in the way Canadian democracy is practised.

Mr. Mills: If that is a motion the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore is advancing, I would certainly second it on this side of the House. He has hit the nail right on the head in terms of all the things that have concerned me.

Let us work together over the next couple of weeks to see if we cannot get something in motion with the consumer and corporate affairs committee. I appreciate the member's comments.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, now that the question and comments period has focused on the lobbyist registration provisions I want to ask my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood whether or not he thought it might be appropriate in the context of this bill to think a bit about the issue of the contingency fee issue raised by the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore.

Many of the lobbyists now operate on contingency fees. A lot of them are not out there trying to procure government contracts. They are simply trying to steer government in a specific direction on behalf of their clients. However those who are seeking government contracts often do operate on a contingency fee and therefore end up piggy-backing on the taxpayers' dollars. We are talking about millions and millions of dollars.

Instead of just an entry fee or a registration fee for lobbyists, why would our government not require lobbyists of the Tier I category who now operate on contingency fees to publish their hourly rates? In that way when the contract was given, when it was over, we could calculate how much work they did and how much they could get paid instead of simply taking 5 per cent or 10 per cent from a multimillion dollar contract. Would that not be a good amendment to this bill?

Mr. Mills: I believe my colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River has once again addressed one of the essential problems with what is going on with lobbyists. Too many of them are using the system. They are treating a government grant like a real estate agent selling a home: the higher the price of the home, the greater the fee. In other words, they will take 4 per cent, 5 per cent or 2 per cent on a multimillion dollar grant, contract or transaction. It is not right. This is the kind of thing we will have to address when the matter is in committee.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to come back to some comments that the hon. member made regarding banks and small business loans.

He is quite right when he identifies the root of the problem as not necessarily being a legislative one but being one of attitude on the part of Canadian banks. He and I will both know that several banks over the last few days have announced some very impressive profit figures, which leads us all to the inevitable conclusion that it is not a problem of a lack of funds in the system. It is a problem of a desire or an ability to take any risks on the part of the banks or to share risks with those entrepreneurs who are willing to go out into the community and invest.

Certainly the legislation extending the ceiling from $100,000 to $200,000 is completely meaningless if entrepreneurs are not able to get their hands on the funds. It is incumbent upon us as parliamentarians to send the clearest and strongest message we possibly can, that we believe bankers need to loosen up their wallets and really put some of these funds into circulation.

I have a question for the member. Some of us have been kicking around the idea that perhaps there should be some changes to the Bank Act which would mandate certain percentages of the asset base of the bank to be forced into circulation for small and medium-sized businesses.

In other words, first an encouragement and if the encouragement does not work then perhaps some legislated way that we could require Canadian financial institutions, namely the big six banks, to make those funds available. After all, we have created an environment in which those bankers have grown large because of a lack of competition for a great period of time in this country.

Would that be something that the hon. member might consider looking into on his own?

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I say to the hon. member for Halton—Peel that would be a little too much regulation for me. I would like to see the banks give more autonomy to the branch managers. Often today one goes into a branch manager and he says: "Listen, I have a memo here from the head office and my hands are tied, even though I know and I recommend that you are a healthy, productive business, you have a great product, and you should be given the money".

We need to get the Minister of Finance, the minister of industry and the minister responsible for small businesses to call in not just the six banks but all the schedule B banks and use some moral suasion with all of them to make sure their branches exercise the legislation the House has created.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992.

There are four parts to this bill: changes to the Canada Student Loans Program, to the Lobbyists Registration Act, the Salaries Act, and the Small Businesses Loans Act. I wish to speak mainly to the Student Loans Act portions of the bill and to the small business provisions of the bill.

In the riding of Kootenay East we are about 1,400 kilometres from the closest university. When students make applications for their loans we know the kinds of problems they are facing when they come from that distance and the kinds of costs that are involved. To see what the government is doing I say is nothing worse than shameful. It is a tragedy.

It is a tragedy that this government comes out with these kinds of drastic changes to the Canada Student Loans Program during a time when it stands in this House and talks about competitiveness, about how we must retrain people and about how people must be better educated to be able to be competitive in the job markets that are going to be.

To say that a student, after he has completed his program, is not going to be entitled to the six-month grace period for interest on the loan when he pays it back at the end is nothing other than thievery. When these students come out most of them have spent their lives putting together and borrowing money to be able to go through university. They need a good six months to be able to re-establish themselves. They need the time to be able to adjust and find the locations where they are going to live and set up their lifestyle so that they can start to pay back their loans.

However, the government is saying no. It is saying that it is going to do away with the six months of grace. Immediately upon coming out of university they must pay them back. It is shameful. The government is talking about competitiveness and retraining. There are 1.5 million unemployed people at the present time, yet the government brings about these kinds of changes under the Canada Student Loans Program. At its semi-annual general meeting in May 1992 the Canadian Federation of Students adopted its policy. The federation is opposed to the government's abandonment of the original objective of the Canada Student Loans Program of enhanced access to post-secondary education. Again this is an attack on the students.

They oppose a statement for the Canada Student Loans Program based on speedy completion of the program. They oppose the establishment of a special operating agency to administer the Canada Student Loans Program. They oppose the elimination of interest subsidies on student loans for a six month cessation of studies, which I have already indicated. They oppose the government's move to divest itself of the public responsibility for providing 100 per cent guarantee of Canada student loans. They oppose the federal government's risk sharing arrangement with financial institutions as a means to guarantee Canada student loans.

They oppose the application of the commercial interest rate on Canada student loans. They oppose the increase from 60 per cent of full course load to 80 per cent in order to be eligible for a Canada student loan. They oppose the reduction of the limit of total borrowing from 520 weeks to 340 weeks under the Canada Student Loans Program. They oppose the government's move to end forgiveness provisions for students with disabilities under the Canada Student Loans Program. This is shameful. No wonder not many government members are speaking on this legislation. It is very hard to defend.

An hon. member: We did away with the 3 per cent.

Mr. Parker: You did away with the 3 per cent. The government added 3 per cent last summer. Students were trying to get their loans and they were told there was a 3 per cent cost on top of the loan.

An hon. member: No more now.

Mr. Parker: They say there is no more now, but it was brought in by this government.

Students from my area of southeastern British Columbia are going to be deeply affected. Many of them probably will not be able to carry on with their education because of the policy of this government which calls for 60 per cent of the wages they make during the summer to be put toward their education in order to qualify for a loan. Because students from my area have to travel all that distance and stay in the facilities available to them, it just cannot be done and the government should not bring in these kinds of fiscal policies at this time. This is not the kind of program that should be cut.

This is not the time for the government to cut off payments to the provinces to assist in helping students get their education. It should be done universally. The federal government should ensure that the loans are available universally across Canada so that everyone has an equal opportunity for the kind of education that will be required in the future. If these students do not get the proper kind of education, we are not going to be competitive. We are not going to be able to meet the needs of the coming generations. The government should know that and should act to do something about it.

I have students calling me saying they are not able to get their student loans. They are finding out that they cannot go to university because they will not have enough money to carry it through. In a country as large as Canada, because students happen to live far way from a university, they cannot afford to go. The government is making it harder for them to get the kind of financing required for them to attend universities.

An hon. member: This is one of the most generous countries in the world.

Mr. Parker: Our youth require that kind of education and we must provide it in order to compete. Members opposite have said that themselves, yet we are cutting back and it is wrong.

I would like to talk about the small business provisions of this bill where the amount has increased from $100,000 to $200,000. That is not the problem with the small businesses.

There is a situation in my riding in southeast British Columbia, in Elkford, Sparwood and Fernie, where the mines have been shut down. The mines have not been in operation for over six months. The small businesses are now finding that the banks are coming in and saying: "We are going to have to foreclose". They need some assistance and they need that help during this period of time until the industry can be restructured.

This is not going to bring about the kind of help required there. This is not the kind of financial help the small businessmen need.

The small businessmen who come to me with their problems are the same ones going to the bank. They seem to have the assets to be able to borrow the money but the banks are not willing to give it to them or the banks are not willing to readjust their mortgages to help pay over a longer period of time so that they can survive. To add another $100,000 to the amount of money they can get is not going to help any if they cannot get the money in the first place.

Small businesses are the ones creating the most employment across Canada. It is the quickest method of getting people to work. They create the most jobs and it is distributed equally throughout the country.

If this bill addressed that problem and set up a system whereby small businesses were treated with some compassion, with some sensitivity and some recognition of what is required by the banks, we would find that they would be in a much better operating state than they are under this piece of legislation.

Is it any wonder that many small businesses have gone bankrupt. Foreclosures have taken place. Loans are not available for inventory financing, working capital requirements or the refinancing of existing debts, but it can finance up to 90 per cent of the eligible cost of land and premises and up to 80 per cent of the cost of equipment. The rate of interest must not exceed chartered bank rates prime plus 1 per cent.

A small business enterprise is one operating for profit with an estimated gross revenue which does not exceed $2 million in the year of application for whose principal business is in communications, construction, fish, manufacturing retail trade, service businesses, transportation or wholesale trade.

The federal government is liable to pay up to 85 per cent of any loss sustained by a lender as a result of the loan made after March 31, 1985.

This piece of legislation is not going to address the problems of these small business people, the ones requiring anywhere from $20,000 to $50,000 to be able to bring about the kind of help needed to carry them through or possibly even for their inventory. Those provisions are not there.

As might be expected from the above, the main problem for small businesses is not the loan limits. It is trying to obtain the loan in the first place. The attitude of the banks is that most small businesses are bad credit risks. That has to be changed. Increasing the limit is fine. We are not against that, but the banks have to be more co-operative. There is no sense increasing the limits if the banks will not lend the money in the first place.

Over the last several years the small business sector has been responsible for most new job opportunities. Between 1980 and 1987, Statistics Canada data indicates that almost 80 per cent of new jobs created in Canada were created by small businesses with less than 50 employees. This was true even during the recession in the 1980s when many larger corporations were laying workers off.

Small business is often the mainstay of many smaller rural communities. That is certainly the situation in my area.

They are feeling the pinch now and they need help. They need it now. Full employment can only be achieved with the full co-operation of Canada's small business sector. With regard to unfair tax burdens, small business still pays an average tax rate that is higher than Canada's largest businesses.

The GST will add further hardships both in compliance costs and in accounting costs for the small business person. Ninety-eight per cent of Canadian businesses are Canadian-owned. Their earnings are usually reinvested into the community and the Canadian economy.

Small businesses operate under severe constraints in the Canadian economy which in turn limits their potential to stimulate the economy and produce more jobs. There are constraints such as high costs for development capital, severe undercapitalization, high interest rates and higher taxation levels than corporations. This puts small businesses at a real disadvantage in the Canadian economy.

That is the problem. Large amounts of money are available. The banks are only interested in loaning out the large loans. They are not interested in the small businessman who comes in with his little problems. They figure there is too big a risk. They have not got the time to spend with them so they let them go.

It is a tragedy that during this period when we are talking about competitiveness and governments are talking about saving money and cutting back, it is cutting back on the two areas that could create the best benefits for the government.

Student loans provide students with the capacity to come out fully trained to be able to meet the demands of our future. Small businesses need help now to be able to hire people and get the economy going. The government is doing neither.

In closing, I appeal to the government to rethink this piece of legislation, to reintroduce it with more compassion, with more desire to bring about the kind of training and education system that we all want in Canada where our students can afford to go to university, get the training they want so that when they come out they will be of benefit to our country and our people.

Our small business people should be able to go to the bank with dignity. They should be able to walk into the bank with some confidence that they will be given a fair and equitable hearing. They should have an opportunity to be able to either pick up some inventory money to assist them with their inventory or to carry them through some difficult times or to be able to get some money to be able to offset some adverse circumstances that have occurred in the economy.

Further, they should be able to reinvest or redo their mortgage and carry it over a longer period of time so that they can sustain themselves through these difficult economic times. If the government were to take that approach, this would be a much better piece of legislation. It would be legislation that we on this side could support. We certainly cannot support this legislation.

It is unfortunate that there are four pieces tied into this legislation because there are parts with which I can agree. I agree with cabinet ministers taking a reduction in pay during this period of time, as set out in the bill. I can agree to some of the lobbyist statements in the bill. However I have to say to my constituents that students in my riding and students across Canada are going to find it very difficult to be able to get the amount of money that is required for them to carry on with their university studies.

• (1720)

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just said that he agreed with the provisions that relate to the lobbyists. I would invite him to elaborate on that statement.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, the member has not exactly interpreted what I said. I said there are some provisions in this legislation which I can agree to. I said I could agree to the cutbacks in the wages of the Prime Minister. I said that I could agree to some of the provisions of the lobbyist parts of the bill.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, it may surprise the hon. member but I am not hard of hearing and I am not that slow witted. I heard him just repeat a second time what he said four or five minutes ago, namely as far as the lobbyists are concerned he supports the provisions that are in the bill.

I rose to ask him if he would elaborate on what he means when he says he supports the provisions in the bill that relate to lobbyists. I did not invite him to reiterate all of his speech. I want him to elaborate on the point that he made here on the floor of the House.

Mr. Parker: I am just getting my notes together, Mr. Speaker.

I guess the point I could make is that the government should be charging lobbyists. It should know who the lobbyists are. They should be registered. I agree with that. I have no problems with that.

I have no problem with the government knowing who the lobbyists are, what the charges are and if there are charges, the government should receive that money. I have no problem with that. That is the meat of what this lobbyist legislation is about. I have no problem with that.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am going to start my remarks by saying how profoundly I disagree with what I have just heard. It might sound to some people that it is a trivial matter to be charging a fee to lobbyists. I submit that it is not.

I have before me Erskine May Parliamentary Practice, twentieth edition. I want to read about the fundamental right of anyone to be able to speak to a member of this House without having to pay a fee. That is fundamental to a democracy.

Let me read some of it:

> The right of petitioning the Crown—

That means the right to make representation to any one of us.

> —for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the constitution. It has been uninterruptedly exercised from the very early times, and has had profound effect in determining the main forms of parliamentary procedure.

I read further:

> The rights of petitioners and the power of the House to deal with petitions were expressed in two resolutions of the Commons in 1669.

For 323 years people have been able to address Parliament without paying a fee. There is no reason why a lobbyist should be called upon to pay a fee today.

Sure, there are a few lobbyists that could make it into the list of the top 500 people in Canada. Sure, there are a few of them. That does not apply though to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Red Cross, labour unions or a small business in my riding or the riding of the hon. member who wants to have a meeting with any one of us to come and ask for a grant, to come and ask us for help.

Why should people have to pay to see an MP? That is wrong. I do not care what anyone says. That is wrong. No one should ever have to pay to see a parliamentarian.

The law we have now for lobbyists, Bill C-82, received royal assent on September 13, 1988 and came into force September 30, 1989, a year later. Let me tell what parliamentarians had to say at that time. This was a unanimous report of our committee. I ask the hon. member from the NDP to listen to what his own colleagues had to say in a report that we tabled in this House. On January 27, 1987 page 2-15 our committee said: that there would be no cost associated with the filing of information and lobbying matters.

On June 30, 1987 the Ministry of Consumer and Corporate Affairs outlined what it proposed to do. Here is what it said: "There will be no charge to lobbyists to register and there will only be nominal cost to cover the cost of photocopying and such for people seeking information from the system". That is what it said.

Let me tell you what the then Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and now government House leader said on June 30, 1987. He said, speaking to the Lobbyist Registration Act: "It addresses fairly and reasonably and effectively the public's need to know who is intervening and why". Listen to this: "It does so without placing any restrictions or burdens on the rights of Canadians to talk to their members of Parliament, or deal with the government on issues affecting them directly".

That is what the minister at that time said. It is an important issue. It is not just that we found a device here to get a few dollars out of someone that is rich. Even if they were all rich, which they are not, it would be wrong. They are not all rich.

Let me tell you what some of the groups have had to say about this measure. I read here a text that actually appeared in our parliamentary newspaper, The Hill Times. Sean Moore, a person who is quite familiar with the lobbyist registration system and has written more about it than probably anyone else save and except the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore perhaps, said: "In order to recover the costs the fee every time would have to be $54 per transaction". That is including registration and deregistration. Assuming you will not charge anyone to deregister, the cost would have to be $75 dollars per transaction. Can you imagine the Federation of Agriculture of my riding having to spend $75 for the privilege of talking to the hon. member sitting over there? Is that right to him? It is not to me.

Certainly the government can make a case for cost recovery on any other section of the bill. I would vote against it anyway because I will not agree, but on that section there is not just a principle of cost recovery. There is another principle far more important. It affects our rights as parliamentarians in this House and, more important, the rights of each and every Canadian to have the opportunity to address any one of us without having to pay a registration fee. That is the important principle, I submit.

I see my hon. colleague across from Etobicoke—Lakeshore. He is very knowledgeable in this area. He has worked on this in the past, has produced papers, has written about it and knows the issue very well. I worked on the committee that established our present lobbyist registration rules. I did so with the hon. member for Nickel Belt, the hon. member for Peace River and several others in this House. We produced legislation which is not bad.

It needs to be updated now because some people have found loopholes in it. As a matter of fact, as we are today debating this particular bill containing that clause, this same House has appointed another committee to review the lobbyist registration system. That is how wrong all of this is. It is absurd what we are doing right now.

• (1730)

Regarding the consumer and corporate affairs committee to which has been referred the Lobbyists Registration Act pursuant to the adoption of some years ago, we had a steering committee meeting the other day at which I recommended to our chairman, the member for Portage—Interlake, that both the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore and the member for Peace River be seconded to that committee because of their expertise so that we can all work together to improve the bill, to get rid of what I euphemistically call the MacAdam loophole or other loopholes that exist in the legislation and find ways of making it better.

I want to do that but I say to members of cabinet that if that is what they want, why do they not submit that proposal to our parliamentary committee, have it reviewed by all members of this House, test it out and listen to witnesses on it, not move it unilaterally and in the disguise of a cost recovery bill because that is wrong? That affects all of our privileges as MPs, both in this House and in the other place.

If no one from the government side—I do not mean from the benches other than the cabinet, but at least from the cabinet rows—listens to this today in this House, I hope that members from the other place will take this issue most seriously because it affects them individually and collectively as it affects us as members individually and collectively.

I say to all hon. members of this House read that clause in the legislation. Read it carefully. Read what others have said about it. I think you will agree as I do that this clause is not only bad in terms of cost recovery—you can argue, agree, or disagree on that point—but it is bad because it infringes upon our privileges as parliamentarians and upon the rights of those we are called upon to represent.

That is why we should not even be voting on that particular clause. It should be removed from the bill altogether and if the government wants to proceed with that approach—even though I happen to think it is wrong—it can make that submission to the committee looking at the bill and can argue it there. Witnesses can make representation. The anti-poverty group can come and say whether it thinks it is right or wrong to have a fee for lobbyists.

Big business can come and make the same pitch if that is what it likes, but that is the forum in which to do it, not this bill because that is not right.

If members were to listen to this testimony, not just mine, but that made by others who are experts in the field, they would know that this is not a good idea.

The only salvation I can think of at this time is that this particular clause is discretionary. It says the Governor in Council may make regulation.

My only hope today is if this government is so wrong-headed as to proceed with that particular clause, at the very least it will either not promulgate it or not file any regulations afterward, not gazette any regulations pursuant to that clause so that at least we will not be subjected to the clause in question before we have that rigorous test that we are going to have as an institution when we review the Lobbyists Registration Act in the time to come.

I know I have been given up to 20 minutes to comment on this but I feel so profoundly about this particular clause that I shall not address any other part of the bill. I will limit my comments to this and instead invite colleagues to question me on this. I feel it is an important principle, one that each of us should think about today. Hopefully the government will think about this again. If it does not choose to withdraw the offensive section in question, at the very least the next best thing will be never to promulgate it and next best to that is to never produce regulations prior to the testing of this whole idea by the parliamentary committee in question.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has made a very telling point in addressing this bill and focusing on the fee that would be charged to lobbyists.

It is the nature of legislation coming from the finance department that its perspective on this would be to look at the revenue possibilities of anything and everything and for a government that is facing deficits, as are all governments in our country at all levels, looking to find funds wherever it can.

It is abundantly clear, as the hon. member has just explained, that the narrow focus of simply revenue raising is inappropriate in several respects when it addresses the interaction of those with public government in Canada.

In the first instance, and he mentioned this as well, this is being referred currently to a parliamentary committee that is going to review the entire operation of the legislation that governs lobbyists in our country at the moment and can in that way begin to address some of the fundamental problems that have come to light over the past decade. That is the broad and proper context in which to review this, not simply in the narrow framework as one can understandably expect from the Department of Finance to look at cost recovery wherever possible.

The member could perhaps elaborate on another issue and this has to do with the points that I made earlier. I had listed six or seven points of fundamental reforms, radical changes that are needed dealing with the tier one lobbyists here in Ottawa; that it is a way of actually getting at the major concerns about undermining the operation of public governance. This exclusive measure of simply raising fees is an inadequate response to this much more deep-seated problem in the way that lobbyists are conducting themselves.

For Parliament at this time to be dealing with such narrow and limited aspects of the total operation of lobbyists does not reflect well on this place, given also the fact that we will have a parliamentary committee dealing comprehensively with the issue.

The member did very well to quote from Sean Moore, who is certainly an astute observer of what has been underway recently in Ottawa with respect to lobbyists. I see the Chair is impatiently wanting to hear from the hon. member in response, so I will permit that to happen by making a specific question.

Would the hon. member contemplate that a good measure for the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs, which will now be looking at the Lobbyists Registration Act, ought to have as its first step a resolution directed to the ministry to request that this permissive power given by the section in this legislation to make these regulations be put on hold, be placed in abeyance, certainly pending the final report from that committee on the Lobbyists Registration Act?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I want to respond to some of the points our colleague has raised.

First of all, I do not question that it is the role of the Department of Finance to produce legislation to raise funds. That is the role of the minister, too. It is our role as parliamentarians to sort through that. That is where I think—and I am not anticipating a vote of the House here—we will probably fail later today.

• (1740)

In my own mind I am trying to think that if this kind of bill were presented before the British House of Commons there would likely be a backbench revolt. What are we doing about it? Not much. In a few minutes we will be voting on this bill and the sad reality is that because it is included with other measures which will be largely supported by government members, which is understandable, this will likely carry with it as well. That is what is wrong. That is what is so terrible about this.

The failure is not one of the Department of Finance. Collectively and individually it will be ours as an institution in a very few minutes. That provision should be put in abeyance and it would certainly be a very worthwhile suggestion that the first motion passed by the committee be one to ask the government not to implement this change before a thorough airing before the committee reviewing the lobbyist legislation.

The committee will no doubt want to review this possibility of charging fees. It will want to review whether the fees of lobbyists should be made public or whether the disbursements to lobbyists should be made public. That is the case in California. It is a good idea to review that and discuss the merits for and against, what amount and so on, thresholds and what have you, and decide whether paid and unpaid lobbyists or paid lobbyists doing unpaid activities should be registered. That is a loophole that exists now.

All of this is not because lobbying is sinister, evil or wrong. There is nothing wrong with doing that. At least I submit there is nothing wrong. Every time a constituent phones any one of us asking for his rights, defending his rights, airing his grievances, that is lobbying. That is okay. Whether someone charges or does it for free it does not make any difference providing it is done legally and with all good intent and with the opposing party's right to know, being there. We have the lobbyist registration system so that the opposing side can be heard. The opposing side can know who is doing what to whom. That is proper. There is nothing wrong with that.

However, our role has to ensure that we have a strong system to preserve integrity; a system that will ensure that everyone can know what is happening in the best possible way and at the same time no one is hindered in his or her attempts to reach Parliament or, to put it in ancient terms, to petition Parliament, being any one of us individually or all of us collectively.

In conclusion, that is why I feel so strongly about this clause. I submit to all my colleagues that they should take a few moments to reflect upon it as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The first five hours of the debate have now expired. The length of the speeches now will be 10 minutes maximum without questions or comments.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to participate in this debate this afternoon because I think it marks a trend I see not just here in this House of Commons but across Canada and it disturbs me.

It is fair game for governments at all levels to turn to their senior staff and talk about revenue; how to generate more revenue for government, how it could be done in a creative way. I am disturbed by the outcome of the process, much like the previous member said in some of his remarks.

If the Parliament of Canada were given a long list of ways in which more money could be generated, that would seem to me to be a fair, open, reasonable and sensible process and we could somehow pass judgment on what is a good idea and what is a bad idea.

The process that I work with here and have worked with in other places does not really ever do that. This bill in its current form strikes me as being the most wrong-headed approach you could conceivably come up with; four rather disjointed notions about how to raise revenue all put together in one bill. Somehow it then gets translated into something that would be almost a matter of confidence. It is impossible to tear the four pieces apart and say that this might be supportable but this is not, or to examine the good and the bad of each one of the four sections of the bill, or to say that somehow this would be a sensible way for a government to raise revenue. It has all kind of bonded together in one bill. Therefore I think there is an error in process in that sense.

There is also something about this that whenever governments decide to squeeze the system it somehow always grabs the wrong person and squeezes that person. In this bill, for example, students are being asked to kind of give up a bit of an advantage in that they had a grace period, only six months and only for those who received Canada student loans. We are not talking about a lot of people, but surely of all those people in our society whom a government could raise a little more money from this is not the group to hit on.

This is not the only government in Canada to target this group. Whether it means to do that, whether there is a great deal of thought in going through it or whether this somehow just kind of pops up on a computer somewhere and makes it through an internal, quiet, secretive selection process that says get more money from this group, I cannot believe that a group of members of this Parliament would sit down in open debate anyway and say: "Here is a group you ought to get more money from, students. Let us nail them before they even have a job. Let us nail handicapped students in particular. They are unlikely to ever get a job so get at them right away". That does not seem to me to be a logical outcome of a process.

In my own province, for example, a young woman was in to see me about an ID card that she had received from the province of Ontario. Between the time she had sought the application for the card and actually filled it out the price of that identification had risen from $3 to $15. I know Ontario is in hard times and I know the government in Ontario is looking for all kinds of ways to generate revenue, but was that the outcome of a thoughtful process, that this is where you need to generate your income?

In this bill here, is this the outcome of a thoughtful process? I think not.

As the previous member went through the Lobbyists Registration Act portion on this, I would not mind touching on that a bit as well. I do not read anywhere in here that somebody who wants to come and talk to me is now going to be charged a fee. Nobody I know would be stupid enough to pay such a fee in the first place and there is nothing in this bill that I read that says they have to do that, but there is certainly a lot of open-endedness here. The actual fees may well be set by a government sometime at a later day and, if it thinks of it, it may even tell the Parliament of Canada what it has done. That is surely the wrong way to do that.

If there is a problem with lobbyists, and I would be one who would advocate that there is and who would advocate that you ought to have some kind of a registration act that worked, the current situation seems to kind of blow it all away. At the same time that the government is changing this act, another parliamentary committee is going to review it once again. That cannot be a logical process either.

If the general public is somehow saying it has given up on politics, perhaps this is one of the reasons why. Perhaps this is one of the things that makes people in their living rooms ask what is going on here; the government is passing an act and reviewing an act at the same. Different acts are being reviewed in different ways. Somehow to those of us who play the parliamentary sport it makes some sense if you turn your mind to it. However, to the general public it makes no sense.

There are changes in here about loans to small businesses as well. I found it interesting as I read through that section of the act that deals with small business loans, but that is not the problem that most small businesses talk to me about. They do not have a problem with limits, they have a problem with getting somebody to loan them money. If we were trying to turn this economy over one would think that whether the government in particular wants to directly provide loan moneys to small businesses, which would be one mechanism it could use, or even if it just wanted to help small businesses secure loans from private lending institutions which would be another way to do, that at least is identifying the problem and doing something about it.

The confusion in the public mind exists concerning the question of why raise the limits when nobody is going to get a loan anyway? That seems to be the problem. I can think of two or three federal agencies all purporting to help small business. I go to meetings and get briefing notes from all these agencies whose purpose in life is to assist somebody with a small business. I would have to tell members that I have never seen one of them actually help somebody. I am sure they do. I have just never seen it happen, but I have been in politics for only 20 years. Maybe in my 21st year in public life it will happen, but I have not seen it take place yet.

I know they have seminars on how to do this. I know they put out very attractive brochures on how to do this. I know they are very active at every reception I have ever been to, but I have never seen them perform what is purportedly their basic function: helping somebody get a loan.

I find it pretty difficult to defend when I see somebody who is supposedly out there assisting small business. People come in my office and say: "I have a small business. I would like to employ five more people. I have five in my work place now. I would like to employ five more and I cannot find anybody who will help me".

I will say: here is an agency of the federal government or an agency of the provincial government or an agency at the municipal level and they are all supposedly helping small business get started. Inevitably they all come back to me and say: "They seem to want to lend money to people who do not need it. They seem to want to help those who are already a success. They seem to want to buy into a winning idea, but nobody really wants to help a small business group that is just starting out".

I talked to a guy this morning who has just exactly that problem. He has some good ideas. He has some good products. He would like to employ more people, but there are no agencies in place to help him. Two years from now, if he makes a success of his business, there will be all kinds of people wanting to buy into that idea. That is the tragedy of this bill and many other bills of the same ilk that seem somehow to identify a problem and then get totally irrelevant when it comes to providing solutions. That is what I find ironic about this entire process.

This process, this bill in particular, does not make any sense to me. Somebody could say: "Why do you not take one of your parliamentary committees, some senior staff, and identify all the ways in which governments can generate more money? Let the parliamentary committee report annually, never mind once in its lifetime, on things that are stupid, on ways in which governments could either reduce their expenditures or raise some more money".

That would be a fair and open process that all of us could watch happen. We could understand the logic or the lack of logic that is the outcome of that, and we would at least know what is going on. This bill, it seems to me, is one of those classic examples of somebody turning to senior staff and saying: "Find me some more money somewhere in the system". The four solutions that are presented here do not do anybody any real good.

There is even a section in here that talks about the cabinet's salary. I am sure that is wonderful, but I am also sure that will not feed one family in Canada this year. That is a shame because there was an opportunity through this type of activity to rationalize governments. That perhaps is a contradiction in terms, but it seems to me that governments do not have to be this illogical, this irrational.

There are ways and means in which members of this House could serve a useful purpose, could identify areas where governments are spending money that they do not need to spend. They could probably even identify some ways somewhat like these that could generate a few more funds and would not really hurt people.

It seems to me that at the nub of this bill the wrong thing is being done. It is attacking the wrong people and doing something that really will not help anybody. It seems to me that is wrong.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

ACT TO DISSOLVE OR TERMINATE CERTAIN CORPORATIONS AND OTHER BODIES

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Thursday November 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-63, an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to order made on Wednesday, November 25, 1992, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on third reading of Bill C-63, an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There may be a disposition in the Chamber to apply the vote which has just taken place on Bill C-76 to the deferred division on Bill C-63, as well as to the deferred division on Bill C-26.

Miss Grey: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like it recorded that I am certainly in favour of that. I would just like to put my position on the record for the Table. On Bill C-63 I would be voting yea and on Bill C-26, nay.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, I abstained from the vote on Bill C-76, but I would like to have my vote recorded as in favour of both Bill C-63 and Bill C-26.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent for suggestion of the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 109, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women, entitled "Foetal Alcohol Syndrome: From Awareness to Prevention".

WORLD AIDS DAY

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, today is World Aids Day, an annual occasion when all countries and all the citizens of this world are asked to consider the impact of this terrible disease and co-ordinate their efforts in finding better ways to fight HIV infection and AIDS.

The World Health Organization has chosen community commitment as its theme this year, to emphasize how important it is for all communities to take action to fight AIDS, both nationally and internationally.

The HIV AIDS problem concerns health care authorities in particular. However there are also broad political, social, economic and legal implications, as well as some major consequences with respect to human rights and this applies to all countries.

According to the World Health Organization by the year 2000 as many as 40 million people will be infected by HIV and nearly 10 million people will be living with AIDS. Canada is fortunate to have certain resources and therefore has a duty to contribute to international efforts by working with other countries.

• (1010)

We have taken on that responsibility in a number of ways, in addition to our ongoing support for the WHO Global Control Program on AIDS.

Canadians have become leaders in the activities of international bodies such as the Global Control Program on AIDS and the WHO advisory council on HIV and AIDS.

[English]

The Canadian International Development Agency plays a key role in Canada's response to the AIDS pandemic. CIDA provides AIDS related assistance through contributions to the global program on AIDS and direct assistance to developing countries.

The International Development Research Council supports AIDS related research in developing countries. Canada also contributes to the global response to HIV AIDS through the expertise of our medical and scientific communities. One contribution that has received world-wide recognition is the development of a simple inexpensive test for the presence of HIV in infants. This test which is now used world-wide requires only a drop of dried blood to test for the presence of the virus.

Our expertise is also shared through the Laboratory Centre for Disease Control at Health and Welfare Canada which acts as a WHO collaborating centre for AIDS research.

[Translation]

We must not only continue to support international efforts but carry on the fight against AIDS in this country. AIDS is a preventable disease.

The national AIDS strategy will give the government and its partners the resources to continue to provide Canadians with the information they need to make healthy decisions and adopt the kind of behaviour that will protect them against HIV and AIDS and protect others as well.

We must continue activities that focus on teenagers and pursue efforts to encourage behaviour that will reduce the risk of contracting or transmitting HIV. We must continue to ensure that people who are living with HIV or AIDS can count on the support and concern of the community.

[English]

Canada's national AIDS strategy has emphasized the importance of partnerships and collaborative action at all levels in achieving our common aims. It has also recognized the importance of ensuring strong active communities in addressing HIV AIDS issues in Canada. The AIDS community action program of the National AIDS strategy funds community efforts in the areas of prevention, care and support.

[Translation]

This government has promised to renew the national AIDS strategy and I will make a public statement in this respect very shortly.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, once more Canadians and citizens of the world dedicate today as World AIDS Day. It is right and proper that we make this dedication to continue to reflect on the continuing impact of this disease on people and how we can help.

In Canada alone AIDS had killed over 3,000 Canadians by early this year. One in every 10,000 Canadians is living with the disease and one in every 1,000 Canadians, that is nearly 30,000 Canadians, is infected with the virus.

Among the thousands of Canadians who have died from AIDS in the past 10 years is one man from British Columbia known as Dr. Peter. With a television camera he chronicled the courage it takes to live and die with this terminal illness, finally succumbing a few weeks ago. As television viewers we could share with him and his family the fear and horror of this disease, a scourge that is killing tens of thousands of people yearly throughout the world.

From this one Canadian we go to the dying in Africa, the epidemic proportions of the HIV infection in Asia, to the continuing tragedy in Canada or to the babies born throughout the world with HIV, with this hated virus.

The minister said: "Canada's national AIDS strategy has emphasized the importance of partnerships and collaborative action at all levels for achieving our common aims. It has also recognized the importance of ensuring strong active communities in addressing HIV AIDS issues in Canada". He also went on to say that he intended to make an announcement on renewal of the AIDS strategy soon.

I would like to remind the minister that only four months remain before the current funding commitment on the part of this government expires. The people who work for those infected and taken ill by AIDS remain in limbo. They do not know when to renew the leases on the premises they are using or what programs they have to commit to the people that they serve. Why does the minister hesitate?

I would like to remind the minister that on November 13 of this year the Canadian AIDS Society, the Canadian Association for HIV Research, the Canadian Haemophilia Society and the Canadian Public Health Association jointly brought to the attention of the minister their proposal on the need for a renewed federal commitment against AIDS.

They have asked for a commitment on the part of the government of slightly over $55 million per year for the next five years. A positive response on the part of the government to this proposal will be the ultimate test of federal leadership and commitment. It will be the ultimate measure of the government's dedication to World AIDS Day.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I too rise on this World AIDS Day to call upon the government to renew on behalf of all Canadians our commitment to fight this epidemic both in Canada and globally.

The figures on the impact of AIDS globally are staggering. Some 100,000 people a year die of AIDS, a toll which is expected to rise to over 400,000 by the end of this decade. It has been estimated that by the end of the decade some 40 million people will be living with HIV and some 10 million will be living with AIDS. Jon Gates of the Canadian Council on International Co-operation, himself a person living with AIDS, has pointed out that this was one of the major challenges facing the global community, particularly in Africa and Asia.

In Canada over 30,000 people are living with HIV and according to the most recent figures over 4,000 people have died of AIDS. Today in art galleries, theatres and other cultural places around Canada we are commemorating a day without art to remember the tragic loss of so many cultural workers to AIDS.

We salute the families, the lovers and the friends of those who also feel the pain and helped to bear the crushing burden of this disease. We know as well that over 80 per cent of those who have died of AIDS in Canada to date have been gay men. For this reason I want to underline the importance of the unanimous recommendation of the Canadian AIDS Society, and indeed many others, to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation so that in addition to the terrible pain of this disease the sting of discrimination does not have to be faced as well.

• (1020)

AIDS is a preventable disease and we desperately need funding to fight it. Its community organizations are on the front lines. Indeed people living with HIV and AIDS have been central in this struggle. As Don DeGagné from the Vancouver Persons with AIDS Coalition has pointed out: "We do not want to be anybody's patient or client. We have firsthand experience with cause and treatment of AIDS. We have to be involved at the highest level of research and decision making".

As the Canadian AIDS Society, the Canadian Association for HIV Research, the Canadian Public Health Association and the Canadian Haemophilia Society have all pointed out, it is long overdue for this government to renew and increase its commitment to the battle against AIDS.

We have just learned today that the numbers are significantly higher than had previously been estimated. Perhaps as many as 11,000 people are now living with AIDS. It is essential that there be adequate resources to deal with this struggle. In fact the groups that are involved in the front lines have said it will cost some $55 million per year. That is less than the cost of one helicopter.

I appeal to this government to recognize its moral responsibility, not only to those who are living with HIV and AIDS, their families and loved ones but to all Canadians and all those around the world suffering and living with AIDS. There has been too much pain and suffering.

It is time our government ensured the resources which are necessary are there. We need resources to support those who are on the front lines, in communities such as Thunder Bay, the AIDS Committee of Thunder Bay or in larger communities, la ville de Montréal, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Montreal and elsewhere. We must have the funds, and I appeal to this minister to not only renew but to increase the level of funding in this struggle against AIDS.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the co-operation of the House in making a brief comment which I am sure members will appreciate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Is there unanimous consent to give the floor on this statement to the hon. member?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Crosby: The recognition of World AIDS Day by the House of Commons provides a unique opportunity to bring to national attention a particular case of a brave couple who are suffering.

Today in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, as my colleague from Halifax will have noted, there was a disclosure by Randy Conners and his wife Janet Conners that they are victims of AIDS by virtue of his use of Factor 8.

I want to call members' attention to this. By making this disclosure publicly, by focusing attention on their case, Mr. and Mrs. Conners will help us overcome any animosity or any negative attitudes among Canadian people. Mr. Conners has discovered that by the use of a drug in a very innocent way to correct a medical condition, he contracted the HIV virus that has blossomed into AIDS. His wife now has the HIV factor and they face a very difficult and uncertain future.

By sharing their difficulties with the public I know they will attract a great deal of support to the cause which hon. members have addressed today and help us overcome any difficulties that are obstacles in the way of resolution of this problem. We all ought to congratulate and honour Mr. and Mrs. Conners for their contribution to a successful campaign against AIDS.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

NATIONAL DAY OF REMEMBRANCE AND ACTION

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address a solemn matter of national importance.

This Sunday, December 6, will be the second year that Canadians will observe a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women. The date marks, as colleagues know, the third anniversary of the tragic death of 14 young women at L'Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal.

This terrible event shocked Canadians so profoundly that we have been transformed by its horror. We have looked violence against women in the face and we have been confronted by our own reflection.

In declaring December 6 as a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women, Parliament challenges Canadians not only to remember but to act to prevent violence against women.

[Translation]

Canadian men and women realize that violence against women is not only a cause but a consequence of women's inequality. Full and complete equality cannot be achieved if women are threatened with violence every day.

[English]

Thankfully Canadians are also acting to end such violence by charting a course for fundamental social change, building upon the many years of efforts by women's groups across this country, operating in small towns and large cities. Not only women but men are joining in this cause to make these changes.

In the House today a number of our colleagues are wearing white ribbons as part of the second annual campaign to publicly signal the concern of men against violence against women. I congratulate the organizers of the white ribbon campaign for their courage and their dedication in helping us achieve a common goal.

I am pleased also that so many of the provincial status of women ministers that I have been working with over these years are also joining in this concerted effort. They have been making various announcements and providing additional resources for shelters and sexual assault centres and counselling.

On behalf of all Canadians, the Government of Canada has also taken action. Our focus is on the area of education and prevention, and during 1992 a number of important initiatives have been undertaken. I cite specifically the work of the Canadian Panel on Violence Against Women. That panel has travelled across the country and heard from more than 4,000 individual Canadians representing 1,500 organizations. In its progress report published in August it reported that the magnitude of violence against women across the country is even worse than we have so far documented. It also recorded the strong desire of women for prevention become a priority.

In its very work the panel itself has been a catalyst for change. It has enabled women in many small communities to speak out for the first time on violence and for the communities to start to take action to deal with that violence. I anticipate receiving the panel's national action plan early in the new year. That plan will help all governments and organizations chart our course on this very important journey toward ending violence against women.

Another very important initiative which my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, announced recently, and I had the pleasure of joining in that announcement, is the establishment of five innovative federally-funded centres of excellence dealing with family violence and violence against women. These centres, which are based in British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick, really bring a whole new focus. They bring together front line experience with research expertise to really answer some of the underlying questions, provide support to front line workers, and contribute to enduring solutions as well.

Legislative initiatives are also important. My colleague, the Minister of Justice, has brought forward two important initiatives this year, including the passage of stricter gun control legislation, the firearms amnesty, and the new sexual assault legislation which legally defines consent in sexual relations for the first time in Canada. This legislation really is a world leader.

Perhaps the most overlooked and under-valued part of the contribution of the federal government has been the $136 million family violence initiative. Many people are not aware of the tremendous range of activities that are being conducted as a result of these efforts that support front line workers in my own province. Mosaic Success, the B.C. Association of Transition Houses, helps them work on education and prevention projects at the grass-roots level; work with immigrant and visible minority women; work to train women to actively support victims of wife assault, for example; work in a multi-disciplinary program at the Vancouver General Hospital to identify, treat, refer and provide follow up for battered women who visit the emergency department.

It is not only governments or organizations that can bring about the fundamental changes that are required. Individual actions by all of us are required. As the federal Minister responsible for the Status of Women I am calling on all Canadians to contribute to this change. As parents, educators, employers, community activists, and policy makers in this House each of us has both a role and a responsibility to prevent violence and change the attitudes and behaviours which give rise to the many forms of violence against women in our communities.

Let us honour the memories of all female victims of violence in Canada. Let us honour that memory by acting individually and collectively to put an end to violence against women in all its forms throughout Canadian society.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is three years ago next week since a gunmen killed 14 young women at L'École Polytechnique in Montreal. We remember them, we grieve and we mourn, but most important we must maintain our anger. While it may be more comforting to dismiss this man's actions as those of a deranged individual acting at the margin of society, doing so only blurs the link between individual actions and societal values, between individual beliefs and societal responsibility.

We are angry and we must maintain that anger because three years later one in ten women is still battered by her male partner. We are angry because 40 per cent of assaulted women were beaten for the first time during their pregnancies, because one in four women will be sexually assaulted in their lifetimes, half of them before they reach the age of 17.

We are angry and we are frightened because 32 per cent of male American university students say they would rape a women if they thought they could get away with it. If the word rape is replaced with the words sexual assault the percentage increases to 50 per cent.

The daily eulogies in our newspapers are even more poignant reminders of unspeakable acts of violence. In my own province of Nova Scotia nine women have been murdered so far this year by men they once loved. Three of those women were murdered while peace bonds, unenforceable, were hanging over the heads allegedly of the men who killed them.

Violence against women in all forms, emotional and psychological abuse, sexual harassment or sexual assault, continues to be experienced daily by women precisely because for so long too few have spoken out against it.

[Translation]

Each one of us has a responsibility to address the issue of violence against women. We must unequivocally denounce sexual discrimination, harassment, violence and, even worse, murder.

[English]

Conjugal violence has been considered a domestic issue and all forms of violence against women were considered to be women's problems. This myth is not yet shattered but it must be. It is not enough only to state this; we must provide those engaged in the struggle the means to achieve this goal.

The actions we must take include the mandatory training of judges in our judicial system and a stronger enforcement of peace bonds. The actions we must take include providing money for shelters and counselling programs and harsher sentences to those convicted of violence against women.

We must end the economic discrimination which leaves many women with few or no alternatives to ending an abusive relationship. Any solution to violence against women will be as multifaceted as the problem itself. The first step is to stand up and state one's opposition to violence in all its forms. The next step is to take one's convictions and act upon them. We have heard the statements made. It is now necessary to act.

[Translation]

We will remember.

[English]

Let there be no more symbols.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, today we stand to commemorate the lives of women and girls that have been lost to hatred and violence. We stand to remember the 14 young women whose lives were senselessly ended in a classroom in Montreal three years ago. We also remember the two women who are killed every week in Canada by their husbands or partners; over 100 each year.

I have a list of names of some of the women who were killed at the hands of those who claimed to love them. Even though it is only a partial list for this year, it is far too long to read in the short time allotted here in the House for statements on violence against women.

My emotions and the emotions of many in this House are always close to the surface at this time of year. But today I want to focus on hope for the future and hope for change. Let us imagine a world in which women and girls are safe in our homes, in our schools, on our streets and in our work places. Let us imagine that women never have to fear for their bodies or for their lives. I want to share that vision and work together for positive change.

I am pleased that the members of this House supported my private member's bill to establish December 6 as a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women. I think it is important to mention that the bill passed with unanimous consent of this House because only if we as parliamentarians and society as a whole work together to eliminate violence will we be free of it.

Last night I looked over many speeches I have made about this issue and found a litany of woe. I found horrific statistics, painful experiences and criticism of government inaction.

This year the Status of Women minister has issued a fact sheet on federal activity on violence against women. It mentions funding for shelters through the Canada Assistance Plan which has been capped and decapitated by this government for the past several years. It mentions the women's program funding that has been reduced by millions of dollars over the years. It mentions the panel on violence which is spending $11 million according to the recent government estimates. On top of the millions for this study, there are more millions for research. Yet we continue to see cutbacks in services that provide the direct assistance abused women and their children so desperately need. We have been told to expect more cutbacks this week. It is difficult to be hopeful.

The B.C. government last week announced $10 million to help eliminate violence against women. The bulk of that funding is providing much needed services across the province, including 10 new sexual assault centres and help for aboriginal communities in dealing with the pain and prevention of violence. Funding has been set aside to assist groups which face additional barriers in accessing services and problems which magnify their experience with violence, such as aboriginal women, women with disabilities, women of colour, older women, prostitutes, lesbians, poor women and women who are living in isolated areas.

Although December 6 is our national day on violence, November 25 was an international day on violence against women.

We have seen an increase in the number of refugee cases brought to our attention by women facing deportation, even though they fear for their lives as a result of military or domestic violence. Canada does not recognize persecution on the basis of sex as a valid ground for refugee status and refugee board officials are sometimes insensitive to the perspectives and lives of women.

Since September I have called on Canada to recognize and help women in fear for their lives and hold an inquiry on women and the refugee process to identify the structural problems within the refugee system.

• (1040)

Violence against women is a global problem and we must have a global outlook on the issue.

Women commit a small minority of violent crimes and yet are as likely as men to be the victims of violent crimes and more likely to be victims of sexual and spousal assault. Something must change in our society.

A few things have changed already. People are now more aware of violence. We now have ribbons and monuments and memorials, but it is time to do something beyond the symbolic. I have outlined in other speeches what individuals and groups in our society can do to reduce and eliminate violence against women. The government has heard many times what should be done, not only from me and other members in this House, but from women's organizations which have been working on this issue for over 20 years.

The hopeful part is I do believe it can be done. It will not be done tomorrow, but the wounds can heal and we can teach our children to respect each other. We can break down the inequality and racism which divides us and oppresses some of us while assigning privileges to others.

All of us have the right to be safe and have social and economic equality in our society. It is sometimes difficult to look beyond the necessary crisis management of services at the long-term solutions to violence. Changing the structures of power and inequality in our society will reduce violence. Ensuring that every child has enough food, opportunity to learn and grow and a loving home free of violence will reduce violence. Changing the definition of masculinity to include gentleness rather than power over others is essential.

These are tall orders and will come about only with hard work, commitment and a willingness to change. We must reach a stage of development world-wide in which women and men of various races and all nations look at each other as free and equal human beings and not targets or not objects of hatred and derision, not any less or any more than ourselves.

Our Parliament has declared December 6 a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women. It is a day to honour the lives of 14 young women who will never again greet a friend on a sunny day, never laugh, cry, hope to honour all the women who are killed in Canada at the hands of male violence.

We must see the action in the title of that bill. We must see concrete action by this government and action by all in society to finally end this cycle of violence. Only then will we truly honour all of the women who have died.

CANADA–JAPAN INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

REPORT ON THIRD ANNUAL MEETING

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to report on the third annual meeting of the Canada–Japan Interparliamentary Group. This interparliamentary group was formed in 1984 through the efforts of the Prime Minister and former Prime Minister Nakasone of Japan.

The organization has now completed three annual meetings whereby members of Parliament and the diet have exchanged and come to know one another. Our organization has grown like trade between Canada and Japan. Japan is now Canada's second major trading partner.

It also focuses on the changing world, the new world where growth and development are taking place throughout Asia. We have only established a Canada–Japan parliamentary association. I am pleased that former Prime Minister Nakasone is now forming an umbrella group of Asian parliaments. That umbrella group can lead us to our future and our new destiny in the Pacific.

I urge that all members of Parliament support the growth and development of interparliamentary associations in Asia. We are very proud of the work that has been done and the success of the meeting this year, made particularly successful by the hon. member for South Shore and Don Oliver, members of our organization that in fact have sponsored and taught the Japanese more about eastern Canada, moving them across the country.

I am very pleased to present this report and look to future successes of this and other Asian parliamentary organizations.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to table today the seventh report of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations.

Through no fault of the committee, the fourth report of the standing joint committee tabled earlier this year contained erroneous information on a financial matter relating to the central registry of divorce proceedings fees order. That erroneous information had been furnished to the committee by officials of the Department of Justice.

Following the tabling of the report, the Minister of Justice informed the committee of this fact and undertook to provide the correct information. The minister has done so and the committee is now relaying this information to the House in this report.

In closing, the report acknowledges the minister's apology for her official's failure to provide accurate information and in turn the committee expresses its regret for any inconvenience caused to both Houses of Parliament.

PETITIONS

PENSION INDEXING

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 4,741 citizens. This petition which comes from my riding also covers the Montreal area.

This petition is from our seniors who point out that pensions should be indexed to reflect their needs adequately.

[English]

The general cost of living index today does not accurately reflect the true financial needs of our seniors. An overwhelming number of our seniors is living at or below the poverty level.

We ask Parliament to urge the government to re-evaluate Canadian Old Age Security pensions so they truly reflect the real needs of our Canadian seniors.

FRESH WATER EXPORTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to present a petition this morning on behalf of a number of constituents and others throughout western Canada who are aware that the Mexico-U.S.-Canada trade deal does not exempt fresh water.

They are also aware that there is a present plan to divert water from the North Thompson River which is a tributary of the Fraser River system in central British Columbia in an effort to sell the fresh water in the San Diego, California area.

They point out their opposition to this and are asking the government to reintroduce legislation which was never proceeded with that would prohibit this. They are asking the government to take action immediately.

SEXUAL ORIENTATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have petitions to present this morning on behalf of constituents on a number of issues.

First of all, I have a petition which is signed by residents not only of my constituency but also a number of constituencies in Ontario and Nova Scotia.

The petition notes that in March 1986 the Conservative government agreed to take whatever measures necessary to ensure that sexual orientation is a prohibited ground of discrimination within federal jurisdiction.

It also notes that the government has yet to introduce a legislative amendment to the Canadian Human Rights Act a number of years after the promise was made, despite the fact that a number of provinces have acted on this. Indeed the Canadian Human Rights Commission has called for this action.

Therefore the petitioners call upon the government and Parliament to bring forward immediately an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

CHRISTINE LAMONT AND DAVID SPENCER

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition which is signed by residents of British Columbia from Langley, Surrey and Kamloops and a number of residents of my constituency.

The petitioners note that two young Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, have been sentenced to 28 years each in a Brazilian prison. They have suffered miscarriages of justice, cruel and unusual treatment in Brazilian prisons and discrimination in sentencing and parole. They note that the only relief available from these severe punishments is for Canada to request expulsion in accordance with Brazilian law.

• (1050)

Therefore, the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada.

STEPHEN OGUNWUYI

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): My final petition, Mr. Speaker, is signed by hundreds of residents of Burnaby—Kingsway and communities throughout and even beyond British Columbia.

The petitioners point out that Stephen Ogunwuyi, a young Nigerian, was awaiting trial for having been implicated in an unsuccessful coup attempt against the unelected President of Nigeria, General Ibrahim Babangida. They note that he managed to escape from Nigeria and make his way to Canada. He has applied for refugee status. His life is at risk if he is returned to Nigeria.

Therefore the petitioners urge that the Minister of Employment and Immigration allow, on compassionate and humanitarian grounds, Stephen Ogunwuyi to remain in Canada.

THREE GORGES DAM PROJECT

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to offer to the House several petitions signed not only by constituents within my own riding of Northumberland but also Canadian citizens from across this country. They are very concerned about Canada's involvement in the Three Gorges Dam on China's Yangtze River.

Canada was involved in a feasibility study and the petitioners are concerned about the fact that so many people in China would be displaced if this project were to develop and the very serious environmental impacts it could have on the area.

The petitioners urge the Government of Canada to refuse to participate in or provide technical assistance, loans, grants, guarantees or subsidies in any form for any aspect of the Three Gorges Dam project from this day forward.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): My second petition, Mr. Speaker, is from Canadians who are very concerned about the situation in Rwanda and the deterioration of human rights there.

The petitioners urge the Canadian government to apply pressure on the Rwandan regime to immediately stop killing innocent Rwandans. They urge the Canadian government to stop economic aid and other forms of assistance to the current Rwandan regime. They urge the Canadian government to support the EEC resolution on Rwanda issued on February 20, 1992 in Santa Domingo.

BILL C-86

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is my pleasure and honour to present a petition.

The petitioners are residents of Canada, all law students at Osgoode Hall, and petition the House of Commons that they are concerned with many of the proposed amendments to the Immigration Act in Bill C-86.

In particular, they strongly oppose the wide powers given to immigration officers at ports of entry as well as the provisions relating to the country of first asylum which would allow newcomers to Canada to be removed from Canada without a hearing or a right to council.

Therefore the petitioners, call upon Parliament to urge the government to withdraw these amendments.

Supply

FRESH WATER EXPORTS

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table a petition in the House today signed by residents from British Columbia on the important question of the diversion of water to the United States.

There are two proposals that these people in British Columbia are concerned about. One is a current proposal to divert the North Thompson River into the Columbia River system for eventual piping to California. The other is the proposal from the North American Water and Power Alliance program which plans to have a conference in mid-February in California to start promoting this plan.

These British Columbians urge the government to state categorically that it will not permit our freshwater rivers to be dammed and diverted into the U.S.A. and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—TRADE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved:

That this House reject any North American free trade agreement.

Mr. Angus: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Just before we commence the debate on the opposition motion, I wish to advise the House that my caucus in each of its allocated time slots will be splitting the time between two members. There will be a 10-minute speech followed by five minutes of questions and comments. Then there will be another 10-minute speech followed by five minutes of questions and comments before we rotate to the next party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(a), because of the ministerial statements Government Orders will be extended by 32 minutes beginning at one o'clock.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today asking that this House reject any North American free trade agreement and on which we will have a standing vote is an effort by the New Democrats in the House of Commons to state categorically that we oppose completely, totally and unanimously the Mexico-U.S.-Canada trade deal.

This government's neo-Conservative corporate agenda which is designed to support Canada's largest corporations and the most powerful and privileged in Canadian society has obviously failed Canadians.

The most obvious reflection of that is if Canadians were asked whether their lives were better today than they were when the Progressive Conservatives assumed office in 1984, the response of 99.9 per cent of Canadians would have to be: No, my life is not better today and the future looks bleaker than ever before.

The evidence of that is woefully obvious. It is reflected in those 1.6 million unfortunate people who have lost their jobs and are desperately seeking employment today. There are the two million Canadians who are seriously underemployed and working a few days a week or a few hours a day. There are the two million Canadians who are presently living in this country below the poverty level.

We have over 6,000 bankruptcies every month, month after month after month. We have a farm and a fishing crisis and we have seen the deindustrialization of the country.

It is also reflected perhaps most aptly in the statistics that in 1980 Canada had one food bank. Today there are more than 400 active food banks in this country. This is a reflection of the ruin that this corporate agenda has brought to the people of Canada.

We have seen what the neo-Conservative corporate agenda, including deregulation has done now to the transportation industry. We have privatization and we have seen what that has brought to a whole number of sectors in terms of massive lay-offs.

The GST is ruining any hopes we had of a consumer led recovery from the recession. It has devastated the small business sector.

We have seen serious, callous, thoughtless cutbacks that have brought pain and suffering to an increasing number of Canadians. There is the erosion of the principle of universality of social programs and an extremely biased tax structure in favour of the large corporations and the wealthiest people of the country.

The cornerstone, however, to this corporate agenda, this Conservative agenda has to be the notion of free trade. It is embodied first in the Canada–U.S. trade deal and now it is embodied in the Mexico–United States–Canada trade deal.

The reality is that we have seen the reshaping of Canada as part of a continental order. There has been the turning over of everything to the marketplace where the toughest, biggest and meanest survive. There has been a shift of power from national, provincial, local and regional governments to the powerful corporations of the country.

That limits our ability as governments and as Canadians to have some say in the future of our country, to have some say over the direction of the economy. Increasingly now the decisions about the economy of Canada are being made in Chicago, Dallas, Los Angeles, New York and soon, in Mexico City, Guadalajara and the Maquiladora zones in northern Mexico.

I think this is best reflected in a number of quotes, not from the New Democrats but from others. I go back to our Prime Minister before he took office. He seemed to be speaking much more thoughtfully than he did after 1984. He said:

> Free trade with the United States would be like sleeping with an elephant. If it rolls over, you're a dead man.
> And I'll tell you when it's going to roll over. It's going to roll over in a time of economic depression and they're going to crank up those plants in Georgia and North Carolina and Ohio, and they're going to be shutting them down up here.

• (1100)

Up here means Canada. In other words, the Prime Minister was right on when he spoke in a very honest way to the people of Canada. He said: "Free trade as a notion means that our plants close in Canada. They reopen or expand in the United States, particularly the southern United States". Now we can take that one step further. They will be moving even farther south into Mexico.

Ronald Reagan, upon signing the free trade deal with the United States, had this to say:

> This agreement will provide enormous benefits for the United States. It will remove all Canadian tariffs, secure improved access to Canada's market for our manufacturing, agriculture, high technology and finance sectors, and give us additional access to Canada's energy supplies.

Ronald Reagan went on to congratulate our Prime Minister on the signing of this agreement for the obvious gain for the United States which he represented.

I refer to one of the major trade officials in the United States, Clayton Yeutter who had this to say:

> Canadians don't understand want they have signed. In 20 years they will be sucked into the U. S. economy.

A little closer to home, Frank Stronach, chairman of Magna International announced plans a few months ago to move his plant to Mexico. He had this to say:

> Profit means money. Money has no heart, no soul, no conscience, no homeland.

On the west coast Jimmy Pattison, Vancouver millionaire and industrialist, had this to say:

> Free trade with Mexico is coming—. We can manufacture in Mexico and ship to Vancouver, including duty and freight, cheaper than we can manufacture in Vancouver.

He went on to say that he planned to move operations to Mexico.

It is obvious what is going on. This government has decided to deindustrialize our country. This government has decided to integrate us into an economy where we will attempt to harmonize our regulations, laws and standards with those of the United States and now with those of Mexico.

On behalf of the New Democrats in the House of Commons, we abhor the process now under way in terms of dealing with this very critical piece of legislation, the economic constitution of this country, which will determine for generations the laws and regulations in terms of the basis of our trade.

This government has allowed five hearings in Canada. There have been no hearings in Toronto, the industrial heartland of the country, no hearings in the province of Saskatchewan and no hearings in the north. Five hearings to allow public input on the most important trade deal this country has ever faced is unconscionable. It is something that as New Democrats we think is completely inappropriate. As a result we will be conducting our own public input sessions across the country in the days and weeks ahead.

I want to mention two things. As we attempt to harmonize our situation with Mexico, let us recognize that we will now be seeing increased pressure for our men and women to approximate wages and conditions found in Mexico; to be more specific, in the Maquiladora zones.

I quote from an excellent publication entitled Take Back the Nation: "The Maquiladora workers, two-thirds of them are women, have been described as unspoiled labour. Companies hire and fire at will and weed out unproductive or troublesome workers. Women are routinely dismissed when they become pregnant. The burn-out rate is five to ten years and very few last past the age of 25. Help wanted signs are everywhere. It is not uncommon for a facility to see its entire work force turn over in a year".

It goes on to say: "Low wages would not attract the world's national corporations to the Mexican Maquiladora area but because companies are able to bring with them sophisticated industrial processes and equipment, workers are turning out quality goods and high levels of productivity. The traditional sweat shops still exist but modern efficient plants are increasingly the norm". Business guru and Claremount University professor Peter Drucker says: "It takes three years at the most for Maquiladora zone plants to attain the labour productivity of a well run U.S. or Japanese plant even turning out highly sophisticated products. The gains to the corporations from this high productivity at low wages are dramatic". We are not talking about simple labour here. We are talking about sophisticated plants that can compete anywhere.

In closing I simply want to say that this is a dastardly trade deal.

This goes against everything we believe in terms of the Canadian economy and hope for the future, particularly as it deals with fresh water. Fresh water was not exempted from the Mexico-U.S.-Canada trade deal. Other areas were explicitly exempted. This means we are now agreeing as a country, or our government is agreeing on our behalf, to sell fresh water to the United States and Mexico. This is something Canadians have indicated very clearly they cannot and will never accept.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops on his opening salvo in this very important opposition motion today. I want to ask the member a question about something he has had some experience with. It relates to the closing comments in his speech and the whole question of water under the North American free trade agreement.

The member knows there is a current proposal on the North Thompson River in his riding, and it touches mine, to divert water into the Columbia River system for eventual export into California. The headlines in the morning newspapers from the trade hearings in Vancouver indicated that a witness appeared there and pursued the whole question of water under the North American free trade agreement.

I would ask the member to expand a bit if he could in terms of the question of water under the North American free trade agreement. In the previous House prior to the 1988 election the government was under a great deal of pressure during the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement negotiations. It introduced but never passed, perhaps purposely, legislation to make very clear the question of water exports from Canada. I believe it was Bill C-156. I would ask the member what his views are on that legislation.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my colleague's questions.

All Canadians were rather astonished when the government introduced at first reading only the Canadian Water Preservation Act. If that act had passed Parliament it would have at least sent a very clear signal that we were concerned about the future of our fresh water. Hopefully it would have prohibited very explicitly any sales to the United States other than bottled water and so on.

However the government did not proceed with legislation. In other words, it created a phoney war. It introduced the legislation but did not proceed with it even to second reading and committee stages. That gave us the first clue.

The second one was the fact that while we had a memorandum of understanding with the United States regarding softwood lumber we did not have one regarding water. There was a lot of pressure for the government to have a memorandum of understanding with the United States which would specifically limit the provision of the FTA to bottled water only. But that did not happen.

Now, after the negotiations have been concluded with the Mexico–U.S.–Canada trade deal, we notice that in the tariffs there are long lists of exemptions: school buses, all sorts of bits of machinery, all different sectors like cultural industries and some medical services. They are very explicit and do not apply to the provisions of the Mexico–Canada–U.S. trade agreement.

We wonder why water was not exempted. It was obvious the government was prepared to exempt a number of items but water was never clearly exempted. For that reason we are very suspect. While saying one thing the government has actually initialled an agreement that will result in something quite different, that is the ability of entrepreneurs to sell Canadian water to the United States or to Mexico.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I point out something my hon. friend has just said which is quite contrary to the truth.

Like the FTA, NAFTA will have implementing legislation to underscore the government's policy on water diversions or exports. He knows perfectly well that the policy of this government has been stated and reaffirmed in the FTA legislation. Water diversions or large water exports are simply not acceptable under the FTA. That is very clear.

• (1110)

My hon. friend said that NAFTA, and FTA presumably as well, goes against everything the NDP stands for. Yet we have seen under the free trade agreement with the United States an increase in manufacturing products, an increase in value added products, precisely the sorts of things I thought the NDP stood for. The NDP is calling for increases in the amount of value added we do within Canada. That is precisely what the FTA has encouraged. The tariffs on those products in the United States have gone down, providing Canadian products with greater access and a preference in comparison with other countries exporting into the United States. This has resulted in a clear increase in the amount of export activity, up 10.5 per cent in the first nine months of this year.

I should also point out that The Globe and Mail of last Saturday indicated that the share of manufacturing goods going to export markets has doubled from 40 per cent to more than 80 per cent, clearly a fulfilment of an objective I thought was one of the NDP policy approaches. It is something we cannot just wish for. We have to put in place the policy environment to allow that to happen. That is precisely what the FTA and now the NAFTA will do. Could my hon. friend comment on that?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, to take the first point my hon. friend raised, he said we should have faith and trust the government when it says Canadian water is not for sale. He did not refer to the provisions in the text that would protect water.

This is the same government that said our social programs were a sacred trust and dismantled a number of programs: family allowance, pensions and so on. This is also the government that said it would never sell Air Canada and we know that Air Canada was sold. In other words, to ask Canadians to trust this government when it says it is going to do something is asking a little too much, to be fair to my hon. friend.

My hon. friend also said that enabling legislation would include comments regarding water exports. He knows full well, as does everyone else, that the international trade deal we will enter into, if it passes, will take precedence over legislation at a provincial or federal level.

I will provide an opportunity later to my hon. friend, particularly when we get to Question Period, to point out explicitly—I guess this is a notification of what is to come—that water is exempt from the trade deal, which he has said to me on a number of occasions. I will provide him with an opportunity during Question Period today so he can be very explicit to point out those sections of the Mexico–Canada trade deal that say water is exempt. He will not find them in there and he knows that.

The latter part of his question refers to what he says is increased trade with the United States. He knows full well that over all the United States wanted access to our raw materials and our resources and it has received it. If he looked at the increase in trade prior to the FTA and afterwards, he would know that things were healthier prior to the signing of the FTA.

He would also know that the FTA has been at a tremendous cost to Canadians. Literally tens of thousands of jobs—we could say hundreds of thousands of jobs with no exaggeration—have been lost in this country permanently. Men and women who at one time had decent incomes at $15 or $17 an hour to raise their families and provide for economic growth in the country are now selling hamburgers at McDonald's for $5.50 an hour. That is the kind of economy we have moved toward.

We in this party oppose that approach. It has failed us by all accounts. We want nothing to do with the notion of turning over everything in our country to the free market, which is a nice way of saying turning over everything in this country to the law of the jungle.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I took for granted that hon. members gave unanimous consent to extend that five-minute questions and comments period.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the resolution reads:

> That the House reject any North American free trade agreement.

We have to admit that we had some difficulty with the wording of the agreement. We know where the government side is going.

It is good to see the minister here. We know his course; we know the direction they have set. However, we are a little concerned about the Official Opposition. We are not sure if it is going to be on side with this or not. We have used the word reject because we cannot abrogate the North American free trade agreement, as it is not yet signed.

It will be interesting to see where the Liberals vote on this particular resolution. We have used a euphemism for abrogation and we are going to say reject. The Liberals might be able to weasel out of this one as they have been doing for quite a while and go on both sides.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Where is Lloyd?

Mr. Butland: I know there is considerable dissension among the Liberal ranks as to whether or not they are in favour of a free trade agreement or a North American free trade agreement. Once again we have allowed them an out with this motion before the House.

I turn directly to the free trade and North American free trade agreements. I suggest this is no longer a trade deal. These are deals about sovereignty. These are deals about our water and energy supplies and the control of our own economic determination.

We say that the free trade and North American free trade agreements are so interrelated, to suggest that you can renegotiate free trade is incredulous, incredible and ridiculous. The North American free trade agreement is the renegotiation of the free trade agreement. I suspect the Liberals are saying now they have to re-renegotiate the original agreement.

The Americans would not, have not, and will not accept any negotiation of a free trade agreement because they said they are well off with this agreement. They would not even consider it. Let us be realists and say abrogation is the word. However we are into the North American free trade agreement.

What was it to buy us? Again I have to talk about free trade because of the inter-relationship. It was going to buy us access to the American market. Certainly in my riding steel rulings have always gone against the Canadian steel industry and I have belaboured that point. Things have not changed.

Have the rules of the game changed? Gordon Ritchie, the deputy negotiator under the free trade agreement who testified at the trade committee just last week said we were duped. We were duped the first time around and nothing has changed. I want to quote directly from Mr. Ritchie's remarks: "These changes reflect a considerable negotiating triumph for the American team that has obtained some but not all of their objections (thank God not all of them) but they out-negotiated us the first time around and we benefit not at all from the negotiation of the North American free trade agreement".

"On the central issue of disciplines on unilateral application of American fair trade laws, the NAFTA reflects the American negotiating agenda, not Canadian objectives". This is the negotiator for Canada. "The permanence of the new system and the guarantees of compliance are illusory. The FTA regime for unfair trade disputes has clearly not been strengthened and arguably may have been weakened by North American free trade".

The rules of the game have not been changed. The panel decisions, games and rules by which they come up with dispute settlement decisions have not changed. These are not sandbox games; these are trade games.

The Americans say they want to take their products and go home and we cannot participate in this game with them. It is most unfortunate and most damning when a negotiator on the Canadian side says we lost. We lost two times around.

I want to talk about the environment just for a few moments. First of all, President-elect Clinton says he wants to have some side agreements on labour adjustment and environment, for instance. Our government has said nothing. It is silent on that issue. Should we not get involved with the president-elect and say: "We are with you". At the very least, if we are not going to reject the agreement, let us start processing some side deals. The environmental laws in Mexico are the most stringent in the world but no one is there to monitor or regulate them.

I have before me a report from the Texas department of health with technical assistance from the Center for Disease Control. It is from Cameron county, Texas which is on the border of Brownsville and Matamoros. The report talks about the prevalence of birth defects beyond the wildest expectations of any area, let alone in the Maquiladora zone.

I was at an environment conference in Monteray, Mexico and the government official from Mexico said: "The environment is the business of the entrepreneur, it is not the business of government". However last week I heard the president of a multinational corporation say: "Environment is not our business, it is the business of government". Government says business is responsible and business says it is government. Who is in control? Who is going to look after the environment in Mexico?

Here is the package. I would ask the minister to take a look at it because this is proof that the environment of Mexico and the United States is at risk and as a result the standards of Canada will be downgraded.

The member for Kamloops talked about input from Canadians and I think it bears repeating that there will be no hearings in Toronto, the manufacturing heartland of the province of Ontario. It has been decimated.

An hon. member: They are afraid of it.

Mr. Butland: Exactly. They are afraid of it. Parts I, II and III of the documents are not available. I just brought along Part II. We as MPs had to deliver copies of the agreement to the libraries in our cities so if Canadians wanted to read them they could. There are some diskettes out there, so if you have your computers, you can pick them up or worse still you can call Washington, D.C., because they have extra copies. I am assuming that the minister has looked after this shortfall of documents.

It is difficult reading; it is drudgery. In particular I have taken the time to read over and over again Institutional Arrangements and Dispute Settlement Procedures. It is an exercise in futility. It is an exercise in conditionals. The parties should get together once a year and if they can come to some consensus, they shall at times endeavour to agree on the interpretation and application of this agreement. They should try, they should endeavour. It goes on for about 10 pages. The time limits of free trade are of no concern to Americans. They disregard the time frames.

We urge the other two parties to reject any North American free trade agreement. We would like to be able to say in the same resolution that we ask the other two parties to abrogate the present free trade agreement. Why we are asking them to do this is very simple. It is because Canadians are saying: abrogate, reject. That is what Canadians are telling us to do, not the New Democratic Party. At the behest of the Canadian citizens let us reject.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, so far we have heard two speakers from the NDP. They have not brought much new to the debate. All we have heard so far is rhetoric about rejecting both the free trade and the NAFTA.

I would like to ask my colleague from Sault Ste. Marie a question. He requests that this House vote to reject both agreements. How can he explain why we should vote on the NDP motion when between 1988 and 1991 there was a substantial increase in Canada's merchandise exports to the United States? Records show that in 1992 we will do even better.

We are reaching all-time records of exports with the United States. Figures show that for the first three quarters in 1992 our exports to the United States are up by close to $90 billion.

I would like to ask my friend from Sault Ste. Marie why and on what basis he is requesting the members to vote against the trade agreement that we have concluded with the United States and Mexico, while statistics and figures show that we are increasing our exports to the United States and that Mexico offers great opportunity for our manufacturing sector to increase our exports to Mexico? In light of those statistics, on what basis is he asking us to reject the trade agreement?

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, it is a reasonable question from a reasonable member, so I am happy to attempt to answer it.

The government keeps referring to these statistics. Of course we all know that statistics can be used to its own advantage and I will come back to the statistics in a moment.

The reality is that Ontario has been deindustrialized. I am sure the member would concur with that. In Ontario we have lost these manufacturing jobs. Just recently in Orillia and Penetanguishene people have said: "We are going to Mexico". Do you know the reason, Mr. Speaker? Because the wages are lower. They are unrestricted now. They are coming out and saying it. For a while they would say there are all sorts of reasons but now they say labour costs are lower.

The problem with this and the statistics he indicated, as the member from Kamloops pointed out, is that there is no doubt our exports to the United States have increased, but they also increased before 1988. They probably increased in 1982. There is no change. I believe statistics would show that the percentage of increase has decreased. Also statistics show, which the member did not point out, we have become totally dependent on the United States and our exports to Japan and Europe have decreased substantially.

There is no doubt that our exports are going to increase, but there are several giants left and all those little folks have been eaten up.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I could not let the member's statement toward business go on the floor unchallenged. He said and business is not concerned about the environment and it is not its business. He made those remarks during his speech. He should be very careful because right now there are thousands and thousands of small, medium sized and large businesses in this country that are working on environmental review systems within their corporate charters.

That kind of blanket statement causes concern with the business community. Businesses are all of a sudden taking a very intense interest in environmental concerns and we should not be knocking them in this House. We should be encouraging them.

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, the member took my quotation totally out of context and put a completely different slant on the whole thing.

I did not criticize business at all. I took up one indication that in Mexico the government said the environment is the job of business. The entrepreneurial spirit will look after the environment.

• (1130)

One chief administrator of one multinational company said it is not their job; it is the job of the government. What the member has done is totally misconstrued and I think he does this regularly in the House.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the two speakers from the New Democratic Party and there is a certain aura of unreality about the rhetoric they fly around.

I asked a question of the member for Kamloops. My colleague asked a question of the member for Sault Ste. Marie about these record exports. Let us get it on the record again. We have seen an increase in exports to the United States of some $18 billion since the start of the FTA.

In the first nine months of this year compared with the first nine months of last year, there has been an increase in exports to the United States of 10.5 per cent; a new record practically every month. On our surplus of trade, we sell more goods and services to it than it sells to us and that surplus has gone up during the same period of time.

We have increased our share of exports to the United States compared with Japan, Germany or the United Kingdom as well as other countries. We ask these direct questions to the New Democratic members and they totally disregard them. They throw some rhetoric at us saying we can play games with statistics. We are not playing games with statistics. We are reporting directly what Statistics Canada has reported month by month since the free trade agreement has come in.

There is a recent study by the C. D. Howe Institute which showed very clearly that exports have increased in most of those sectors that were liberalized by the FTA. In other words, the FTA has provided the access and the preference because our tariffs have gone down on exports to the United States and that has created opportunities for Canadian companies.

They have taken advantage of them and translated them into business as well as jobs back here in Canada. There is a University of Toronto study that said very clearly the FTA has moderated the impact of the global recession we have been a part of here in Canada. It has moderated the impact, and I underscore those points. It has contributed to Canada's economic growth during this period.

The New Democratic Party says we should scrap the FTA, scrap NAFTA, get rid of them all. What have we heard from it as a replacement? What are the alternatives? I did not hear any alternatives from the two lead speakers of the New Democratic Party. They do not have an alternative here. They are flailing away with their high blown rhetoric, saying the FTA is bad. However, when they look at the statistics they walk away from them.

An hon. member: Do not confuse the facts.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Do not confuse the issue with the facts.

Let us look at the results here. Concerning exports to the United States, our trade surplus has gone up. During that time our exports have gone up. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association did a survey that was released in June 1992. It concluded that Canada's export industry has prospered since the FTA. There is a DRI Research Institute study that indicated 97 out of 108 Canadian industries surveyed either gained or maintained their U.S. market share.

More than half said they had not lost market share in Canada. This is not a government survey. This is a private sector survey of 99 commodity categories tracked by Statistics Canada. Exports increased in 60 of those. There are a number of success stories in high value-added products.

Telecommunications and related equipment exports to the United States are up 151 per cent. Office machines and equipment exports are up 50 per cent. Electrical machinery exports are up 74 per cent and railway equipment exports are up 126 per cent. Aircraft and spacecraft exports are up 77 per cent. Optical equipment is up 14 per cent. Tools and implements are up 39 per cent. Pharmaceuticals are up 90 per cent. Wool, a market that people said would get killed, is up 66 per cent. Tanning extracts are up by 103 per cent and so on.

There is a whole list of successes by Canadian companies in the free trade agreement.

Let me quote some studies here. I referred to the C. D. Howe study a minute ago: "Canadian exports to the United States have risen most sharply in high-end manufacturing products and in services. These broad trends are inconsistent with detractors' predictions of the FTA's impact on the Canadian economy. They do, however, fit the scenario of longer term gains to Canada put forward by the supporters".

This is not a government study. This is the C. D. Howe Institute study and it draws on experts from across the country when it comes to these conclusions.

Let me further quote from this: "In areas where they have secured better access to the United States' market, Canadian firms have been able to sustain large gains in a number of sectors", and I have just indicated a number of those successes. "It is unfortunate that this crucial information about the gains from free trade remain essentially untold". That is why a debate like this is important, and I thank the NDP for putting the motion on the floor so we can have this debate.

Let me give one example that makes it very clear exactly how companies benefit from this. Babcock & Wilcox, a company in Cambridge, Ontario that makes steam generating equipment, invited me to an announcement at which it announced $250 million worth of orders from two United States electrical utilities. To put that into context, its total sales for a year are in the order of $250 million. It is very important business for them. It has never before been very successful in the American market. I asked it what the secret was. It replied that in 1988 the tariff was 6.5 per cent; in 1993 it will be zero. It is now on a level playing field. It has the work force, the technology and the access to markets now. It can compete and is now showing it can compete with these orders.

There are other success stories like this. I was at an office furniture show last weekend and I asked people as I walked around and met the different exhibitors from Canada what their exports to the United States were. They said 65 per cent of their business, 70 per cent and 75 per cent.

This is why it is so important we have this access to the United States market. It gives these companies the ability to turn those opportunities into business here in Canada and create jobs here.

People have commented about investment. What has happened to investment? Here again the detractors said that investment in Canada is going to go right through the floor if we have a free trade agreement. Again let us look at the facts.

The cumulative net foreign direct investment into Canada in the period 1989 to 1991 totalled $15.1 billion, an average of $5.3 billion. That compares with the previous three years' average of $3.5 billion. In 1991 it was $5.9 billion. This sharp increase in this type of investment shows me two things: first, that Canadian companies are investing and restructuring so they can take advantage of the opportunities there; second, that people outside of this country have confidence that Canada continues to be a good place to do business, a good place to invest.

The CMA, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, did a survey of 325 companies earlier this year and found that nearly half the companies said they increased their capital investments in Canada after the FTA was implemented. Only 9 per cent reduced their investments.

This indicates very clearly that the FTA has helped the Canadian economy.

Let me quote from the Canada West Foundation: "The rationale to locate investment in Canada for cost and access considerations in serving the North American market has now improved as a result of the free trade agreement".

There is a new study done by KPMG Peat, Marwick. It suggests that the free trade deal helped prompt Canadian firms to cut back on investing in the United States and put more of their dollars into Canada".

Members opposite probably saw my picture in the Financial Post the other day eating potato chips. Why was I eating potato chips? First of all, they were not potato chips, they were sun chips. This is a new product of Hostess Frito-Lay that has created 60 jobs in Cambridge, Ontario. It has access to the United States market through the free trade agreement and for every one per cent that the tariff drops—and its tariff was 10 per cent—it increases its market, the radius it can serve, by 100 miles. That has now given it the mandate to serve the Canadian market as well as the northeastern United States.

• (1140)

We have had some reference in the debate here to the dispute settlement system. The NDP would reject this. That is a pretty sweeping statement for it to make because I do not think it has thought about what its constituents would say about that because periodic disputes are inevitable in a trade relationship of some $250 billion a year. What is needed is a way of resolving these disputes and we have seen in the free trade agreement the panels are acting in a very expeditious way about half the time that it takes to get these resolved under the GATT.

It results in a final decision and let us look at some of the wins we have had. The red raspberry market is not a big one for most people but for the red raspberry farmers it is very important. The panel ordered the U.S. agency to recalculate the dumping duties. Non-mortgage interest is a very important win for us to help particularly the automotive sector. On live swine, the panel found that the Canadian national tripartite stabilization program was not a countervailable subsidy. What happened? Some $10 million went back to the Canadian exporters.

It was the same thing in pork, and that was upheld by an extraordinary challenge. It resulted in $20 million back to the Canadian exporters.

I ask my friends from the NDP what they are saying to the live swine farmers, the red raspberry farmers, the pork producers who now have $20 million and $18 in their pockets which, without the free trade agreement, they would still be paying.

Let us look at some quotes here again. "The mechanism has created a system allowing for a more conciliatory, equitable, orderly and rapid resolution of disputes", said the Royal Bank in February of a year ago. It continued: "The mechanism goes considerably beyond the powers of dispute resolution in the GATT", considerably beyond the GATT. I stress that point to my friends from the New Democratic Party.

It went on to say it is superior to the GATT because it has a fixed timetable. It has increased the objectivity and conciliatory nature of the decision-making process and the decisions are binding. Countries cannot walk away from those decisions.

Have we something special that others do not have? Let me quote again from Gary Horlick, an American reporting on the FTA and GATT settlement procedures, from "The Litigant's View":

> (Chapter 19 panels) are in agreement by the United States and Canada to have binding binational panel review administrative decisions in the two countries. This is a very unusual thing for the United States government to agree to. Chapter 19 is considered a huge success.

Is this a Canadian speaking? This is an American speaking, looking objectively at the way the dispute settlement system has served both countries.

He goes on to say the FTA panels' admirable performance makes them a model for other types of dispute resolution. It will be a model because there are going to be elements of this dispute settlement mechanism which, if we are successful with the Uruguay round of the GATT, will be adopted in a number of ways in the GATT.

Let me give another example. This is a report from Peter Morici entitled "A new Special Relationship—Free Trade and the U.S. Canada Economic Relations in the 1990s": "The benefits of the FTA reach much further than removing existing barriers and avoiding new barriers to trade and investment. It establishes processes", the dispute settlement mechanism, "and a context for better management of the U.S.-Canada relationship".

We have seen how tariffs have come down and how that has benefited Canadian companies. Let us look at what the free trade agreement including the Mexicans would do because this is what the NDP wants to throw away. It wants to throw away all the benefits I referred to in the free trade agreement with the United States and then its says rip up the NAFTA before it is even settled, before we have even signed the agreement.

What does the NAFTA do? First of all, let me make the fundamental point that any time there is an opportunity for Canada to get good access to another market, a growing market, this government is going to be at the table looking after Canadian interests, looking at possibilities and opportunities for us to spread the markets for Canadian exporters.

My friends say we are getting too strong a relationship with the United States. Fine, then why not broaden the relationship to Mexico? Why not expand our access into the fastest growing market on the North American continent: Mexico? What they are asking of the House today is completely illogical. We are doing something here to try to spread our markets better, not focus them totally on the United States, as they are concerned about, and they tell us to reject the agreement and rip it up.

They are sitting on the sidelines and not accepting this with a market of 87 million people, a fast growing market, with a significant middle income market of some 20 million to 25 million people. The opposition says to reject that too. A market of 20 million to 25 million people is a good sized market in the context of the Canadian economy.

We are not going to sit on the sidelines and be spectators. We are going to be in there mixing it up with our trade partners, trying to get better access for Canadian companies into the United States and Mexican markets and other markets where we can get that opportunity.

Duties are going to come down. Mexican duties on average are 10.5 per cent and some go as high as 20 per cent. We are going to get those down to 0 per cent in 10 years and some of them immediately. Those immediate reductions open up opportunities on January 1, 1994.

Let me give you some examples. Mexican tariffs on passenger cars and light trucks are reduced by 50 per cent immediately and the remaining duties are phased out over five years for cars and 10 years for trucks.

We have a booklet which gives Canadian companies an opportunity to learn how they can get into the Mexican market to their benefit.

I want to just draw people's attention to these figures taken from Statistics Canada. On motor vehicle parts, our exports to Mexico in 1990 were $82 million and $153 million in 1991. In 1991 the first half to 1992 first half, again they doubled. Therefore we can compete in that market and that is against high tariffs, import duties and managed trade.

It is one-way free trade because Mexican auto production can come into Canada almost duty free. Of Mexico's imports into Canada last year, 86 per cent were duty free. Therefore we are opening up this market. We are opening it up for exporters. There is much improved access as far as investors are concerned.

In the face of the benefits we gain from this our detractors have said: "Yes, but you are not going to be able to protect some of the important things that you gained in the free trade agreement with the United States".

Here again we did. We got the continuation of the auto pact and the continuation of the exemption, I would argue a strengthening of the exemption for cultural industries. Canadian social services and health services are protected. Our high health safety and environmental standards and our protection against water exports have been retained.

There are the improvements in intellectual property rules, clear North American content rules which are very important for the automotive industry, greater disciplines on energy regulators and improved dispute settlement processes. We have maintained and I would say enhanced our access to investment dollars in Canada.

In closing I want to just draw—

Mr. Boudria: Oh, so soon?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): By unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to continue, but I am not sure that the hon. members opposite can take all this good news.

Members of the NDP say they would scrap the free trade agreement with the United States. They are going to say we want to hide from the rest of the world and go back to those comfortable days of the 1960s and 1970s. Well it is folly to expect that can ever happen. The world is changing and it is changing fast. It is not going to wait for Canada to get on the bandwagon.

Government policy on this side of the House has said we have to recognize that reality. The policies we have brought in since 1984 have done precisely that. They have recognized change and tried to put the Canadian economy, Canadian individuals and Canadian companies in a position to be able to adapt and adjust to that change.

• (1150)

Members of the NDP say: "Let us go back to the 1960s because it was nice then". We cannot do that and NDP members owe the Canadian people an explanation as to why they want to go back to the 1960s and whether they can go back to the 1960s and what their alternatives would be. How would they manage the economy? How would they encourage Canadian companies and individuals to move into the real world of the 1990s and beyond and help the Canadian economy in that way?

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): I would like to raise two issues with the minister with respect to the negotiating position taken by his government in the context of the NAFTA talks.

The first issue is with respect to dispute settlement which he talked about with obvious pride and the fact that under the FTA there is a dispute settlement mechanism which has resulted in a number of highly publicized decisions in favour of Canada. What that of course points out is that the United States has continually and consistently used its trade law as a weapon against Canadian exports to the United States, most times unfairly, which is why the trade panels have been deciding in Canada's favour.

Given the fact that the dispute settlement mechanism is really the only defence we have against these unfair practices in the U.S., why have the NAFTA negotiators agreed that technical changes in the dispute settlement mechanism increase the likelihood of the United States challenging decisions by the panels? Why at least did the government of Canada not stand firm to protect what we did have out of dispute settlement, acknowledging even that it falls well short of stopping U.S. subsidies for production within the United States for its domestic consumption, which is a major barrier to Canadian exports to the United States?

The second issue is that back in March I asked the minister about the U.S. Jones Act and its protection for service in the maritime sector in the United States. He said: "One of our objectives is to break open the Jones Act. That is one of the key objectives of the policy".

If the government failed to get one of the key objectives of its negotiating policy, why is the government not still at the table demanding protection for the dispute settlement mechanism and breaking open the Jones Act?

We are giving up our surface transportation to the United States. At least we should get access to the maritime transportation system.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me caution my hon. friend that trade disputes are not all one way. I have mentioned the ones we have won because the NDP has a responsibility to those people who have been participants in winning disputes to explain to them why it would scrap the agreement.

We have lost some too. It has not been a two-way street. My hon. friend asked: "Why were we not negotiating harder?" We have a good dispute settlement mechanism. I am just interpreting what my hon. friend had to say and he can correct me if I am wrong, but he said that he would like to have a greater discipline of subsidy. Fortunately that will be there in a Uruguay round settlement. I hope we will be able to report positively on that as we go through the final stages of the negotiations there.

The United States was very clear. It said it wanted to negotiate the definition of subsidy in a broader way involving all the major trading partners it has to ensure that the best possible agreement is obtained. We have agreed to that approach because it is in our interest as well to have the best possible agreement.

That is possible with the critical mass of the GATT negotiation in a way that is not possible when there are only three countries involved in the negotiation.

We tried to break open the Jones Act and get access for our shippers into the United States but we were unsuccessful.

My hon. friend says we have failed. People on the other side are saying the Americans have failed because we maintained our cultural exemption. People in the United States are saying the U.S. negotiators failed because we retained the auto pact. We retained the right by Investment Canada to screen large investments. That is part of negotiations. These were important to us. We were not going to give on those. I do not know what their strategy was but maybe the Americans said: "If we are not going to get access to the Canadian market in those areas we are interested in, we are not going to give on the Jones Act either". That is part of negotiations.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to comment and question the minister. We cannot let him get away with making some of the comments he has made about where the trade strategy is from the New Democrats. Here is where it is.

It is a trade strategy involving economic development and jobs. Our leader is consulting with Canadians across the country on a trade paper, the Canadian trade and investment act which we propose. At the very least it is quite unlike my friends in the Liberal Party who presented no alternative to the GST when it was brought in by this government and present no alternative now but to saddle up with the Tories on this whole free trade deal. The alternative is there. It will be a very clear choice for Canadians in the next election campaign.

My first question to the minister is on softwood lumber. This is important and relates to our debate today. We heard in evidence at the trade committee that the North American free trade agreement is of no advantage and of no gain, given the current dispute panel that is hearing the softwood issue. In fact one of the panels has collapsed due to a conflict of interest. At least as of this morning I am aware of no date that has been set for its commencement. It again pushes the resolution of this issue ahead.

The evidence was that regardless of how weak those panels are, the Americans will likely challenge us further. That point was made by another member in this House. I ask the minister to assure this House that he still has a united front from all Canadian provinces in fighting this softwood dispute with Washington, D.C. and that he will meet shortly with the trade minister from British Columbia on this very point. I believe an assurance to the House in that regard would certainly be helpful.

I differ with the minister on his suggestion that our governments back down on the description of subsidy and countervail as a positive note. I have letters on file from this minister praising the five to seven-year process. We have lost that. NAFTA is a step back for those provinces which rely on our trade and export with the United States to define that countervail and dispute settlement process. It is a step back and it is going to hurt provinces like British Columbia.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear that the New Democratic Party is consulting to try to develop a trade policy. Where has it been since 1987? All it has been saying is: "We are against it. We are against it. We are against it". Now it is going through this little charade sending people around the country and calling it consulting. I hope this time it comes up with a trade policy that looks forward into the 1990s and the year 2000 and beyond and not try to slide back into the 1960s and 1970s.

I agree with what the NDP says about the Liberal Party. The Liberal Party is trying to ride two horses. That is clear. It does not know which way it wants to go. I will not mention those members but they are in the House today and they want to have greater liberalization of trade. Others, I think, are probably more in the camp of the New Democratic Party and, quite frankly, are not sure which way they want to go.

My friend is quite aware of the position we have taken on softwood lumber with the encouragement of the provinces including the province of British Columbia. We terminated the Memorandum of Understanding on softwood lumber and since then we have been fighting the Americans on a resolution of this dispute.

Let me remind my hon. friend that in 1986, the last time there was a dispute on softwood lumber, there was no provision to take that decision to a panel to get that dispute resolved. Now, with the free trade agreement with the United States, we do have that panel. What does the NDP want to do? It wants to scrap the panel so we can keep this dispute going on for ever and ever; make sure there is a continuation of uncertainty that the lumber industry in B.C. has to operate under, make sure that we pay thousands and millions of dollars to the lawyers as the dispute continues because we do not want to have a dispute settlement mechanism, we do not want to have a free trade agreement. Let us scrap it all. The NDP owes an explanation of its position to the B.C. forest products industry.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker I am puzzled by the motion presented to us today by the NDP.

I am puzzled for two reasons. First of all, the NDP has repeatedly said here and elsewhere that it is eager to see the sub-committee on trade hold meetings across Canada to hear the views of Canadians on the proposed North American free trade agreement.

Those hearings have begun. They are underway now. They are being conducted in five major urban centres across our country and those who wish to appear from Montreal and Toronto are being invited to appear before the committee here in Ottawa.

Having said that the NDP wanted these hearings, in the very midst of the hearings not yet two weeks old it tells us it is not interested in what Canadians have to say about the North American free trade agreement. It presents a resolution today, and this is my second source of bafflement, that says it would scrap any North American free trade agreement, any North American free trade agreement. What the public has to say is obviously of no interest to the NDP. The NDP has made up its mind. It knows what it wants to do. It is going to reject, scrap, tear up any—not just this proposed—North American free trade agreement.

So much for the NDP's repeated statement that it wanted to hear what Canadians had to say about the North American free trade agreement.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With the greatest respect, I think the debate in the committee was very clear about which party wanted to have wide-spread hearings on the North American free trade agreement all across the country.

Mr. Blenkarn: You know better than that.

An hon. member: We are going to be here all day if we have that kind of behaviour.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, the second point that baffles me in this bizarre resolution brought forward by the NDP is that it would scrap any North American free trade agreement.

If that is the position of the NDP I am glad to hear it because it reveals the NDP as a protectionist party. This is pure protectionism.

Mr. Mills: Even if it is in our interest it wants to.

Mr. Milliken: Yes.

Mr. MacLaren: It is saying whatever the content of a North American free trade agreement, the NDP wants nothing to do with it. It is going to try to build walls around Canada and seek protection from those global changes that are everywhere evident.

Mr. Boudria: Like Cuba.

Mr. MacLaren: I have to think that the NDP has some vision of a golden age in the past when Canada benefited from its export of raw materials and seemingly benefited from the protectionism that was provided for branch plant manufacturing in Canada. That age is gone. If it ever was a golden age, it certainly is not here today.

What has happened in the world, what has happened everywhere is that change in technology has meant a global investment and trade marketplace. Global investment can move readily across the world; global trade is growing everywhere.

In the face of that the NDP would say scrap everything. Free trade is out. It does not want anything to do with anything.

The second thing that this resolution says, and it is quite evident from its tone, is that the NDP does not recognize the importance of trade to Canada. One-third of our Gross National Product arises directly from trade. The private sector is heavily dependent on exports. Canadian workers are heavily dependent on our ability to achieve secure and enhanced access to international markets.

It is for that reason that the leader of the Liberal Party said some time ago: "In today's world protectionism is not right or left wing. It is simply passé. Globalism is not right or left wing. It is a fact of life".

The federal NDP does not seem to recognize this. I am not sure, however, that the NDP provincial governments do not recognize it. Each of those three NDP governments, heavily saddled with their deficits, is seeking international markets, improved access to markets, scurrying about the world trying to drum up business for its products. I do not hear the premiers saying reject improved access, reject enhanced access to international markets as the federal NDP members are doing.

I would have thought that those two parts of the NDP would get together. I would also add that the trade critic of the NDP, who is not here today for this debate said recently that the NDP has no alternative trade policy. The NDP would first scrap the North American free trade agreement and then later announce what its policy is.

Surely the NDP does not think the Canadian people are quite that silly, to buy a pig in a poke.

What is the NDP telling us with this resolution? It is against all regional freer trade arrangements? Is it saying it is opposed in principle, for example, to the growth of the European Community or that it is opposed to the incipient regional arrangements in Asia? Is that what it means when it says it would scrap any North American free trade agreement because it violates its concept that we should put all our eggs in the multilateral basket, that is to say, into the GATT? That may be an argument if it wishes to pursue it, but let it say so clearly.

If it is going to adopt that as its trade policy, then would it answer the question of whether in turning its back on the freer access to a market of more than 360 million people, it will support the GATT, including the proposed international trade organization that is a central element in the Uruguay round now nearing completion? Is that its policy?

I do not know that it is. I do not think it is. One of its members in this House has called for the withdrawal of Canada from the GATT. The NDP would tear up not just this but any free trade agreement in North America and at least one of its members thinks at the same time that Canada should withdraw from the GATT.

We cannot turn the clock back any more than we can turn our back on a North American market with improved and enhanced access.

Our view was from the beginning of the proposal to negotiate a North American free trade agreement that Canada had to be at the table.

• (1210)

We believed that Canada had to be at the table to protect our own interests in North American trade. Otherwise, among other things, if there were a U.S.-Mexico free trade arrangement and a U.S.-Canada free trade arrangement separately, only one country, the United States, would have access to the other two countries on a tariff free basis.

That hub and spoke arrangement was certainly unacceptable to us on this side of the House. For that reason, among others, we thought Canada had to be at the negotiating table. However, the result of Canada's negotiation of the North American free trade agreement is that we have an accord which is both incomplete and flawed.

I want to recall to the House that the leader of the Liberal party said some time ago with reference to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement: "The free trade agreement must be modified. A Liberal government would go back to the negotiating table to achieve the necessary changes as well as to deal with the definition of subsidies. I have always said that we would rather renegotiate the free trade agreement than abrogate it. I would expect that our American partners will join us to find solutions. It is in their interest as well as ours". That same thinking has now been transferred to the North American free trade agreement which is pending before the three countries.

More specifically we on this side of the House, in pointing out repeatedly that the agreement as negotiated is both incomplete and flawed, drew attention to the fact that it lacks a subsidy and anti-dumping code. There is no clear statement of subsidy definition. There is no subsidy definition at all or a parallel anti-dumping code in the proposed North American free trade agreement.

Second, we urged repeatedly that increased environmental protection and, perhaps more important, enforcement should be a central part of a North American free trade agreement. We looked for revised energy provisions, taking into account the varying commitments on behalf of Mexico and Canada. We sought in the context of the NAFTA negotiations improved labour standards, including the safety of workers.

We would seek, as my colleague from Ottawa South commented a few minutes ago, dispute procedures that would be more binding and effective. We have not seen that come out of the negotiations. Finally, it is a domestic issue, but we sought and have sought repeatedly on this side of the House that the government recognize that freer trade inevitably brings a degree of dislocation.

Therefore we sought and have repeatedly urged the government to match its commitment to freer trade with adjustment assistance to help Canadian workers and firms adapt to a greater trade liberalization globally. That commitment is still lacking and there is no evidence yet that this government is taking seriously the real need in Canada to provide that range of adjustment assistance to help Canadians become more competitive globally as well as in the context of the North American free trade agreement.

I have spoken for a moment or two about some of the changes that we thought NAFTA should include, but I want to draw to the attention of the House that the president-elect of the United States has been saying much the same sort of thing.

I want to quote Governor Clinton who in October stated: "As president, I will seek to address the deficiencies of the North American free trade agreement through supplemental agreements with the Canadian and Mexican governments. I will not sign the legislation implementing the North American free trade agreement until we have reached additional agreements to protect environment and labour standards".

There is the opportunity for us on this side of the House to realize our ambitions to see the North American Free Trade Agreement modified, improved, changed and renegotiated to provide for those provisions which the president-elect has in mind and the other provisions which I touched on a moment ago.

The real question is simply this: Beyond the North American free trade agreement there are forces at work. Basic issues have arisen that this facetious resolution of the NDP does not address. What are they talking about? They are going to scrap any freer trade agreement in North America. Yet, behind that movement to freer trade in North America are the same challenges that face Canadians on a global basis. What do they think we should be doing in Canada to render ourselves more competitive? I do not hear anything from the NDP about interprovincial trade barriers. Obviously we have to achieve a true common market within our own country, provide for the free movement of goods, people and services if we hope to compete effectively abroad. Are they deterred by the fact that they have three NDP provincial governments at loggerheads quite often with the federal NDP? Is that what their problem is? If it is, let them say it. Otherwise let them share with the Canadian people what their policy is, what domestic measures they think are required to make Canadians more competitive.

We on this side of the House have repeatedly shared with the Canadian people our commitment to improved education, to better training and retraining, to a greater commitment to research and development, to better science and technology support, and to the elimination of interprovincial trade barriers. These are a range of issues that are within our own mastery. They are our problems in Canada to deal with.

The motion fails to convey to the Canadian people what the NDP would do in the face of the global challenges that are everywhere evident.

For that and other reasons, I want to move:

That the motion be amended by removing all the words after the word "reject" and replacing them with the following:

—all North American free trade agreements that fail to promote Canadian workers and jobs, and fail to safeguard the environment.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to my hon. friend's comments. I want to thank him for clarifying the Liberal Party's position that it supports the notion of free trade with some changes perhaps to the Mexico—United States—Canada agreement it would feel comfortable going along with that. That is what he wanted to clarify. I guess he is complimenting his colleague in British Columbia wherein they had a chance to vote on the Mexico—United States—Canada trade deal and voted in favour of it in its present form, which I thought was an interesting clarification because there has been mystification around the Liberal position.

I want to clarify for my hon. friend that while his party thinks that putting all of our export eggs into the American basket is a good idea—as a matter of fact in 1988 72.8 per cent of our exports went to the United States and this past year it was increased to 76.3 per cent—presumably as time goes on this trade deal will essentially make us completely and totally dependent upon the fortunes of the United States. I think that anybody who looks around at the world economy will realize that hanging our future onto the falling American star is probably not a good idea, at least that is not what we want.

I am reading from a publication from the Congress of the United States that has done a thorough analysis of the agreement. It had this to say, and I ask my hon. friend if he would concur with the United States Congress when it says the following:

The greatest danger of NAFTA is that it could bring out the worst in each country. Trade and investment liberalization could reinforce commitment to low-wage business strategies among U.S., Canadian, and Mexican firms; destabilize the attempt to foster less adversarial relations between labour and management; weaken the commitment of U.S. corporations to train less educated U.S. workers; reduce incentives for small and medium-sized U.S. firms to construct and participate in co-operative networks aimed at fostering innovation and technology diffusion;

It goes on to say:

The combined effect would be to encourage growing numbers of U.S. firms to pursue business strategies depending on or compatible with production in Mexico.

—a low-wage path would widen the gap between workers' aspirations and the jobs available to them. It would likewise widen the gap between the rich and the poor.

Those comments came out of the examination of the Congress of the United States. I wonder if my hon. friend who just spoke would agree with those sentiments.

Mr. MacLaren: If the member had listened to what I said instead of attempting to put instructions on it he would have understood the policy of our party is to seek change to the proposed North American free trade agreement in the areas I enumerated earlier. We seek change in those areas. We do so in full recognition that only in that way can the agreement work to the benefit of all Canadians.

Second, we parallel that commitment with a commitment to global freer trade. We support the current Uruguay round of the GATT. We support the diversification of Canadian trade. We seek, unlike this present government with its continental obsessions, a broader base for our trade through much more active trade promotion and development in Asia and Europe. That might include the possibilities of new institutional arrangements between Canada and Asia or Canada and the European Community, but all would be directed to that diversification of our trade base which can only bring benefit to Canadians.

However, neither of these points do I hear from the NDP, nor is there any indication it recognizes those two parallel developments: changes in the proposed North American free trade agreement and a real commitment to diversification both through the GATT and bilaterally of our trade interest will ensure Canadians have a sound and sensible international trade policy.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): I was wondering if the member who just spoke understands, if he listened to the minister, this debate today is on the North American free trade agreement and not on the GATT. The minister is heavily involved in the GATT and he knows that. This party and this government are 100 per cent in favour of expanding our trade to the world. To suggest we are only in the North American basket, as evidenced by the New Democratic Party is just so much drivel.

I wonder if the member would really come clean with us. Does his party like an agreement with Mexico or does it not like an agreement with Mexico? He says he has problems with certain parts. He wants certain parts of the agreement renegotiated. The government has negotiated and negotiated and negotiated. The question is: Do you take the deal as it is or do you leave the deal up the river? The answer is this: You cannot unilaterally amend a negotiation. You negotiate and get what you can while protecting the interests you want to protect and maybe not getting all the things you would like.

The issue really is whether we keep the agreement or not. I think it is time the Liberal Party came clean.

After all, this is really a terrible agreement. We sell $500,000 million worth of goods to Mexico. It brings $1.5 billion worth of goods into Canada. The agreement is not going to hurt labour or hurt anybody in Canada. It will only open up markets.

Surely the Liberal Party has to come out in favour of an agreement that would open up markets for Canada. We have everything to gain from this agreement and nothing to lose. Why does he not come out and say the Liberal Party is in favour of an agreement? Sure we would like it to be better, but we are in favour of the agreement.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member for Mississauga South is unable to follow the argument which I have presented today. He seems to see things in very black and white, yes or no terms.

That is not the point. He must know it is not the point. He should listen when I say our policy is to seek change and improvement to the nature of a North American free trade agreement. Now who happens along with that same basic policy? No one else but the President-elect of the United States, who would disagree with the hon. member for Mississauga South.

The hon. member for Mississauga South says: "The agreement is just fine the way it is. In fact, it is absolutely perfect the way it is." That is a reckless course. It is as reckless as the NDP saying any agreement is out of the question, however it might benefit Canadians. Those are two reckless courses to pursue.

We are saying we will seek change and improvement in the proposed agreement. It is the very thing the President-elect of the United States has been saying about the provisions regarding environmental protection, worker safety and employment standards and their enforceability.

Those two major issues must be addressed. The President-elect of the United States has committed himself to not proceed with the signing of the legislation implementing the North American agreement until such improvements and changes are made.

We will be there too with our proposals and changes. I assure those on this side of the House when this party forms the government, we will deliver freer trade for Canadians matched by domestic commitments that will bring real benefits to every Canadian.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to my hon. friend and I think he inadvertently misled the House. I know he would want to clarify what he just said when he told us the New Democratic Party was opposed to any trade agreement.

We have always supported trade agreements like the auto pact which was in Canada's best interest.

Mr. Blenkarn: You didn't support that either.

Mr. Riis: A free trade agreement is what we oppose. That is a clarification.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I think the point raised by the hon. member is a matter of debate.

After consideration, I declare the amendment tabled by the hon. member for Etobicoke North in order.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to join in this very important debate today about North American free trade and Canada's role in its trade policy with other countries, in particular of course with the United States and Mexico as is being laid out in the North American free trade agreement and the discussion we are having in the House today.

• (1230)

I second the motion of my colleague, the member for Kamloops, calling on this House to oppose the North American free trade agreement. That raises just a couple of questions as to where we are at with this particular treaty. What is the committee doing which is presently holding hearings into this? What are a couple of the important subject matters under the NAFTA that we have to deal with?

First of all, we now have the North American free trade agreement in our hands and that is the subject of our debate today. We expect the government to introduce some time in the spring, at least from what the Minister for International Trade has said, enabling legislation to implement and change the laws of Canada as they relate to this particular treaty. We will have a very extensive debate on that in the new year. It will be a very important debate because that is when we will see the substance of the changes made in the laws of our land because of this treaty. I suggest that is where the meat and potatoes will be.

After some debate the committee hearings have begun into the North American free trade agreement with the reluctant participation of the Liberals who supported the government and opposed holding hearings in every province in the country on this issue. It was only after some debate and argument by the New Democrats that a bit of money was expended to advertise so that people in the provinces where hearings are being held could have an opportunity to present their views on this agreement to the committee.

A very important point was made by my colleague, the member for Sault Ste. Marie, about one of the provinces that has been clearly impacted by the free trade agreement and will be impacted by the North American free trade agreement. The Liberals and Conservatives refused to hold hearings, even in the part of Ontario represented by the Liberal trade critic in the Etobicoke area, thus denying many of the people of Ontario that important opportunity to debate what many have come to say is the start of the formation of the economic constitution of our country.

I am pleased to say that in discussions in a meeting this morning with the B.C. minister of trade, the hon. David Zirnhelt, the British Columbia government is certainly doing a better job than this government in allowing the residents of British Columbia to express their views and concerns about this treaty. It will be holding wide hearings into this agreement. It will be travelling throughout the province of British Columbia. I invite it and I trust it will come to the major community in my riding, Prince George, and other communities in northern B.C. so it can hear from British Columbians about this issue.

It is interesting to note the difference. We are not sure but we think we are finding out where the Liberals stand on trade. Of course, their colleagues in the B.C. legislature have made it very clear that they have voted completely in favour of the North American free trade agreement as it is, thus rejecting the views of their colleagues here in the House of Commons. I congratulate the government of British Columbia for being open about its views on this issue and for really giving the people of British Columbia a chance to participate and have their views heard.

I want to turn to two areas that are important to this debate. One is the issue that has become evident on the hearings that started yesterday in Vancouver on the whole question of water under this treaty. I am not going to get into specific concerns that were raised by Wendy Holm, who members certainly recognize as someone who has some expertise in this field.

Prior to the 1988 election, the government knew it was under considerable public pressure with the impending free trade agreement and what to do about the water issue. It did introduce Bill C-156, the Water Preservation Act, to give more certainty to the Government of Canada's views on this particular issue. We invite the government to do the same thing as we enter the next election campaign on yet another trade policy.

I now want to turn to an issue as it relates to a trade matter very important to northern British Columbia and all of Canada. It is the question of softwood lumber because it relates directly to what we are talking about with the North American free trade agreement and whether we have made any gains or losses because of this treaty. The evidence that was submitted to the trade committee hearing last week was very revealing and interesting on two points. First I asked the witness, Mr. Ritchie, deputy chief negotiator under the free trade agreement—a free trader himself—a question, and the other five witnesses later in the week, concerning the current state of the dispute panels in softwood lumber.

At least one of them has collapsed right now because of the conflict of interest, thus pushing a possible, and we only underline possible, resolution of that issue to sometime in the middle of next year. I asked them whether this treaty, the North American free trade agreement, would give any added benefit to us now to assist us in resolving this dispute.

Every witness said it would not. They outlined what they felt was one of the losses under this treaty that is very important for a province like British Columbia in particular and the rest of our provinces that rely a great deal and perhaps too much on exports of our raw resources. That is certainly the subject of more debate as we go: the work that we can do in that particular field.

The agreement under the free trade agreement, and I have this in letters from the trade minister praising what he was able to do, was that the question of subsidy and countervail, which is what for us in British Columbia trade issues are all about, would be set aside for five to seven years with a deadline and with the negotiations and ongoing debate at the GATT to try to determine what is a subsidy, what is countervailable by each country in protecting its domestic industries.

Under the North American free trade agreement, as reported by these witnesses, the deadline for a decision has been left out and now it is for ongoing consultations to settle who knows when. As I said, I have letters from the minister praising what he accomplished in the free trade agreement and to those witnesses that was a significant setback in the North American free trade agreement. I believe it is as well because I think most members regardless of their views about trade and NAFTA and the FTA would recognize that.

At some point we have to resolve these matters. I argue and suggest that the setback we now have under the North American free trade agreement is that we will never resolve these very important issues. They will be left for some time to come to be dealt with.

The important information that these witnesses had for us in the evidence and their work they are doing with American people in Washington, D.C. and other areas were the parallel accords from President-elect Clinton.

The member for Etobicoke, the Liberal trade critic, is quite wrong. From all the evidence we have the Americans will be approving this. It is the parallel accord where we will be seeing more.

I suggest to Canadians this is just the start of our trade nightmare. We have much more to see in that area.

In conclusion, for Canadians out there who want to learn more about this issue, I offer the trade treaty itself. To get copies you can write to me so you can see for yourself what it means and what impact it is going to have in your area. It is important that all Canadians understand the importance of this particular agreement, what this government is getting us into and what options we have for the future.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the member made much of the holding of committee hearings to hear witnesses on the NAFTA. I did not interrupt him with a facetious point of order as the NDP made a practice of doing earlier this morning. I wanted to wait until now to raise this point which to me is quite mystifying.

• (1240)

The NDP has brought in a motion today saying that we should reject any North American free trade agreement. What does it want to hear from witnesses about the North American free trade agreement, having already made up its mind that no matter what was put to it, it would reject it?

What possible additional evidence does it wish to hear? It has shut its ears and closed its mind to any further discussion on trade issues, demonstrating clearly once and for all for the Canadian public that it is in essence a protectionist party.

We know the NDP members like to travel. Perhaps that is why they want to hold hearings. What else could they hear that would open their minds to further discussion on the topic, given the context of the motion they have put forward this morning?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for that question.

As I said in the debate, maybe it is about time somebody stood up and protected Canada. I think that is an important point to be made. The hon. member asks what we are about to hear and I think my colleague, the member for Kamloops, the framer of this motion, made that very clear in the point we are making in this debate today.

He asks, and I think this is the crux of the point, why we would want to hold hearings and hear from people. There are two issues alone that I certainly welcome the member to hear from British Columbians. I am not very familiar with his part of Ontario. Perhaps he does not want the people of Ottawa to submit their views on the North American free trade agreement.

Perhaps the Liberals and the Tories did not learn this lesson during the referendum debate. Canadians know in their hearts and their minds that when they see the information for themselves they can make up their minds. In British Columbia yesterday and today water and softwood sum it up and say it all. The Liberals would deny the people of British Columbia the right to relate directly to parliamentarians, who will be voting on this particular issue, their views about how the softwood lumber issue is so important to British Columbia. The water export issue is important to the people of British Columbia as well.

Shame on the Liberals for wanting to shut down any opportunity for Canadians to have some say in the debate surrounding this treaty.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, when I hear members of the New Democratic Party talk against any free trade agreement with the United States or any North American agreement, I am reminded of the Communist system which I think is quite outdated. Communism is a protectionist system that prevents people from working freely in different countries.

I think that the best way to have peace in the world is through trade, first and foremost. It is through trade that we learn to live and work together. Their proposal seems to be completely contrary to today's reality, especially in Quebec where we have a tremendous potential with the United States. Montreal is within 1,000 kilometres of 100 million people, 100 million consumers. That is where we must do business and that is how we can make our small and medium sized businesses profitable. That is how we can raise our standard of living, especially in Quebec.

In Quebec, 18 per cent of the population is now considered poor. I wonder how we can promote our economy and create jobs if we cannot trade with the United States.

That is why I completely disagree with this NDP motion that says we should completely cut off our trade with the United States.

[English]

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, there is some irony in a member of the Bloc Quebecois suggesting to this House that we are being protectionist about our country. Regardless of whichever view we might have about North American free trade or the free trade agreement, aside from some members of this House, we see Quebec playing an important and open role in this country.

The member made some references about outdated and entrenching. I suggest that in fact that is exactly what this North American free trade agreement is going to do. It is going to entrench an outdated system that we have now, a system in our economy that relies on Canada's role as the hewers of wood and drawers of water.

We will not be given the potential and opportunity for the added value components to our forest industry and other areas. It is in the big picture of things from somewhere that our job is to provide those raw resources to cheap labour in Mexico to serve the U.S. market. That is the entrenched and out-of-date system we have to change.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, all of us should think, as we debate this important subject of North American free trade, back to the period of the late 1840s. The Government of Canada at that time and the people of this country faced some very serious problems economically. There were people within the country who looked to build in Canada an economy that would serve our people, be built on Canadian resources and seek to develop this country as a place where a good society could grow and exist.

There were others who looked for an easy out. There were others who said: "We will give up the dream of an independent country and we will establish ourselves as the tail of a North American dog. We will establish ourselves as little appendages of some great North American scheme". This group was led by the merchants of that time, the most powerful business people in the community of Canada in the late 1840s.

They proposed what they called a scheme of North American annexation. They called on the United States through the annexation manifesto to come and take over Canada and create one great North American scheme that would destroy the independence, individuality, and potential for a future of this country.

Fortunately for us the annexation manifesto was rejected by Canadians. That theme and the thinking of Canadian large scale business have persisted throughout the years. There has been a viewpoint on the part of many elements in the Canadian business community that if we could just attach ourselves to the rest of North America somehow this would give Canada a secure future.

This theme found expression through the Liberal Party for many years and the Conservative Party opposed it. The Conservative Party took a position with the national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald. It took a policy with the attempt to develop this country which some at that time called protectionist. Those in the Liberal Party called it protectionist. It was not protectionist. It was about development. It was about developing this country, building railways to the west and bringing in new settlers and establishing new industry. It was establishing in this country the basis for an independent society that would live differently, have different values and in which the people of this country would direct what happens to us.

The great election of 1911 of course was fought on this issue with the Conservatives saying we will stand up for Canada and the Liberals saying no, we will see to it that Canada becomes part of a free trade arrangement with the rest of North America.

In that election, fortunately for the future of our country, the Liberals were defeated and the Conservatives were elected. We then proceeded to follow further a course of development in our country that emphasized building in Canada a society of which we could be proud, a society marked by national institutions like the CBC which the Conservatives brought into being, a country marked by national institutions such as an unemployment insurance system across the country, a national pension system for older Canadians which the Liberals brought into being. But always this theme persisted, this theme of let us tie ourselves to the rest of North America and somehow that will make us better.

In the last election the Conservatives took this theme forward. They said let us have a free trade agreement with the United States, a free trade deal which was not so much about freeing trade but about tying the hands of the Canadian government so far as its ability to direct, influence and lead economic development in this country.

We have seen the result. We have seen the longest and, for Ontario, the deepest recession in this country since the Dirty Thirties. The government occasionally gets up and tries weakly to defend itself by saying well, agreed, it has been a disastrous recession but we have it somewhat better because of the trade deal than it otherwise would have been.

The reality is free trade meant that Canada went into recession first, before the United States. That has never happened historically before. The free trade agreement meant that whereas our exports in the three years before free trade went up by 7 per cent to the United States annually, our exports in the three years after free trade came into effect went up by only 4 per cent.

Whereas in the three years before we had a trade surplus with the United States of $6 billion on an annual basis, in the three years after the free trade deal went into effect that surplus dropped to an average of $4.5 billion.

Each year free trade meant more imports coming from the United States and proportionately fewer export increases to the United States. The consequence of that was lost jobs. The most recent unemployment statistics show over 200,000 fewer Canadians employed in August 1992 than at the start of the free trade arrangement. In the manufacturing sector there are over 400,000 fewer Canadians employed.

Now the Conservatives want to take us into NAFTA, a North American free trade deal which would have the effect of making the U.S. free trade agreement even worse. It would have the effect of making job losses even more certain to hit us. It would have the effect of making even more difficult guaranteed access to the U.S. market. We abandoned one of the things the Conservatives said we had to have in the previous free trade deal: the commitment to the development of common subsidy rules between the two countries. That has been lost.

I hope the House of Commons will today recognize that we have the chance to send a message to the people of Canada and of North America that this country opposes any North American free trade arrangement. We see ourselves as part of the world. We see ourselves as being able to trade with every country. We see ourselves not as setting up special protective barriers behind which we will tie ourselves to the United States and Mexico, but as a country that is part of the world and not simply an appendage of North America.

I hope that in the end at least the Liberals will join with us in supporting this motion.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was intrigued with the historical report of the member from Windsor on the election of 1911 where he complimented the Conservative Party on opposing a trade agreement with the United States and thought that the national policy developed by John A. Macdonald and continued through the last depression would be the policy for Canada. I assume then that it is the policy of the New Democratic Party to reinstate the national policy and to impose on Canadians a high tariff policy with very serious trade restrictions to build the nation of Canada in order to make sure that Canadians are treated differently and act differently than every other people in the world.

I was wondering, with this new national policy, how high does he think he will have to put tariffs? Does he think with the new productive systems that it means you can skip a tariff barrier of 10 per cent or 15 per cent? Would he advocate 50 or 60 per cent tariffs? Does he think that would be enough? Does he think, as a member of the New Democratic Party, that its goal to go to the world with high tariffs would be the way to encourage world trade or would he just abandon all tariffs? Would he abandon all restrictions? Would he not have any kind of trade agreements, just a complete withdrawal of all tariff barriers and no agreements at all?

Where does his party stand? Is it in favour of the national policy he spoke of so eloquently? Will he tell us about the new national policy of the New Democratic Party or the new dinosaur party?

Mr. Langdon: I am always pleased to see the member for Mississauga South get up and speak in the House of Commons. I would have thought that as a member of the Conservative Party he, like me, might have looked back to the history of his party and to the history of the country and seen that the national policy in its time was an important contribution to Canadian economic development.

I certainly am willing to recognize that. If he wants to turn his back on Sir John A. Macdonald that is of course his privilege. I respect that period of history in which we in Canada decided to build our own society. How we decided to do it in 1872 when Macdonald announced the first elements of the national policy and how we do it in 1992 are quite different. If the member has not noticed, the world has changed dramatically in the last 120 years. Because of those dramatic changes, the strategies adopted in 1872 are certainly not the strategies that one would choose to adopt in 1992. One would instead look to achieve the same objectives of building an effective, independent future in which Canadians can be proud through more progressive, efficient and effective means.

• (1300)

These means have to include commitments such as we have under the auto pact which have helped the constituency of Mississauga South just as they have helped the constituency of Essex—Windsor, insisting that when companies have the right to import duty-free into this country that the consequence of that right is that they also have a commitment to generate certain levels of value added in this country and therefore certain jobs in this country.

We must have a commitment to fair trade for Canadians that will give us a chance to compete with the rest of the world. It is our goal not to hide away here in Canada, but to grow effectively in the future.

The problems of 400,000 unemployed manufacturing workers seem not to matter to this government across the aisle. I am proud to say that for me and my party these jobless Canadians are right at the front of our concerns and we will continue to fight for them.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to accept my hon. friend's invitation to begin my comments by going back to Canadian history and back to the 1840s, 1850s, 1860s and 1870s and share with him the fallacy of his very partial reading of Canadian history.

First of all the member reminded the House that in the 1840s and 1850s the provinces of Canada and eventually the Confederation of Canada in the 19th century were against, except for the annexation movement, free trade with the United States. There were some people who wanted free trade with the United States who called themselves annexationists.

All that is true, but the member overlooks some very important facts. If he will take a look at a recent book by Gary Wells in the United States on President Lincoln there are an interesting three pages of a visit of Sir John A. Macdonald to see the President of the United States, Abraham Lincoln. Nothing appears in the book about their conversations, but what struck Macdonald when he left Washington the next day was how many American troops were amassed in Washington. All along the roads all the way back to Canada he saw nothing but troops, troops, troops.

Canada of course became a country in 1867 and this all happened during the American Civil War when the amount of troops under mobilization in the United States was over one million. Under no circumstances could Macdonald, or any responsible political leader in British North America want to have any annexation or free-trade with the United States with that particular reality.

We then had the Fenian Raids in the 1880s. We then had the problems between the British Empire, of which we were a part, and American priorities when it came to Europe.

What I am saying is that in the 19th century it made no sense at all to have free trade with the United States for geo-political reasons or for economic reasons. For this member to go back to that period and say that is an example for us in 1990s or as we move into the 21st century is absolutely incredible. The situation now between Canada and the United States is totally different than it was 100 or 140 years ago and this is what he overlooks.

I am interested in economic historians who take up his theme of protectionism and who have examined it, especially those on the left in Canadian historiography and he would be very interested in this. Two very fine studies have been done by Robert Mailer and Glen Williams that have taken a look at the effect of protectionism as it persisted into the depression, as our friend from Mississauga South reminded us.

These two studies point out the extent of protectionism in Canada. By the mid-1950s protectionism in Canada led to the protection of a kind of oligarchy or economic elite in Canada. These distortions started to develop and we were not being competitive any more because we protected our business elite. The Mailer study takes a look at three volumes of all of these elites that were artificially kept alive through the protectionist strategy. I am surprised that the NDP wants to keep certain economic elites alive today through a protectionist strategy.

The Glenn Williams book, entitled Not for Export, takes a look at how under protectionism the Canadian market was not encouraged to export back to the British Empire or the United States. In the 20th century we started to see the rigidities and prices we were paying for protectionism. They were very high. Even historians on the left recognized this. I invite my NDP friends to read these left wing historians, Glenn Williams, Robert Mailer and others, who make it very clear there was an ossification, a paralytic, no progress kind of reality in the Canadian economy in the first half of this century. To some extent it was caused by the excessive protection we gave to various industrial groups in this country.

After World War II, and this brings us to our speech, suddenly we had movements to liberalize trade internationally. That is what is new and that is what the NDP overlooks. We have the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, but we did not have it in 1840, 1850, 1860 or 1870. What has happened now in international commerce affecting the second most trading country in the world, Canada, perhaps more than any other country, is that tariffs have come down, quotas are disappearing, everybody is competing against everybody else.

The suggestion from the hon. member from the NDP that we can somehow hide from that is absolutely ridiculous. We could hide from it in the 1840s. We could hide from it in the 1860s. We could perhaps even hide for a few years in 1911 but today we cannot. Today we have a General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. World-wide tariffs are coming down and this is a reality they have a great deal of trouble understanding.

What does this have to do with NAFTA? We have now such a liberalized trade agreement that when we brought in the free trade agreement already 80 per cent of what Canada was trading with the United States was tariff free. The free trade agreement with the United States liberalized the final 20 per cent and also gave us something we never had before and that was a dispute settlement mechanism with the United States.

That dispute settlement mechanism has always impressed me because I will never forget a conversation I had with the Japanese minister of trade about three years ago who asked me to explain this aspect of the free trade agreement. He asked me to explain how the binational panels work. I explained it. Then he said: "Just a minute. I want to get this straight. The United States is ten times bigger than Canada in terms of economic power". I said yes, but whenever there is a dispute under the free trade agreement and it goes to a binational panel, there is equality even though Canada is one-tenth its size. He said that is a pretty good deal and that he would like to get that for his country.

This is what the mechanism gives us. It gives us equality, protection and an access we never had before. When we talk about getting rid of the free trade agreement or NAFTA that kind of protection against a power ten times bigger than we are will be gone.

• (1310)

The dispute settlement mechanism together with the liberalization of trade into the United States has led to spectacular gains. First of all, our exports have grown from 1989 to 1991 five per cent. We are now at record exports of manufactured goods and merchandising goods. Our export levels in 1992 are running at record levels. All of this in part is because of the trade agreement.

This access clearly is paying off. Our sovereignty has been strengthened through the binational panels. It is interesting that on the binational panels of the dispute settlement mechanism, I think we have won ten and lost nine or vice versa. The United States is 10 times bigger than we are, but when we get ourselves into a dispute we do pretty well. Because we have equality, we have won as much as we have lost. That is tremendous.

Before, we were totally at the mercy of an extra-judicial process which cost millions of dollars and took years to accomplish. They could just deplete a corporate treasury to make sure that we bled to death before the agreement was settled. Under the dispute settlement mechanism now, all agreements have to be made in 315 days. Decisions have to be rendered. They have to be followed. This is an important addition to our trading relationships with the United States.

Who would not take that cup of tea if it were being offered? We did and we are very proud we did. I think NAFTA is a further building on the free trade agreement in a number of important senses. The one important sense which the member for Mississauga South pointed out quite ultimately on television when I heard him about an hour ago is that most of our tariffs are gone against Mexico now.

We have no quotas against Mexico. We started to do this as hon. members will know over 10 years ago when we started to help developing countries by removing our tariffs against their imports.

Now we have a situation in which when it comes to auto parts almost 86 per cent of everything made in Mexico comes into Canada tariff free. What is NAFTA about when you talk about Mexico? It is not about our getting rid of our tariffs. We have already done that. It is not about our getting rid of our quotas. We do not have any against Mexico. It is about Mexico's getting rid of its tariffs and quotas against us.

People ask if it has any. It does. Talk to Northern Telecom. When it wants to export telephones into Mexico, it runs into a 20 per cent tariff in quotas. Talk to our forest products companies. Talk to our financial institutions. All these are impeded in their access into Mexico today either through tariffs, quotas or outright prohibitions as exist in the field of financial services.

What is NAFTA about? NAFTA is about access to the Mexican market. I have to say that I admire the Mexicans for entering into this agreement because what President Salinas was recognizing was what I recognized at the beginning of my speech when I talked about Canadian economic history.

If you protect a small oligarchy of business leaders with huge tariffs and quotas and prohibitions against outsiders that oligarchy gets fat, uncompetitive, cannot produce and everybody suffers. He said he is going to make sure there is a breath of fresh air that blows through the Mexican economy called competition because that is what Mexico needs. That is exactly what we did when we agreed to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, when we took leadership on Uruguay and other rounds of GATT. That is exactly what we believed in when we brought forward the free trade agreement with the United States.

I have to say that the hardest message to get across right now is what Mexico is giving up to Canada in NAFTA. I think it is important that we put this on the record. First of all, most of Mexico's tariffs and non-tariff barriers such as import licences will be eliminated in 10 years. This is quite an achievement when one thinks back to a decade ago when Mexico's economy depended on those kinds of protectionisms and licences.

Second, we are going to have a set of clear and more predictable rules of origin. This is a big problem. You want to find out what is made in Mexico, what is made in the U.S. and what is made elsewhere as well as what is made in Canada. Let us clarify the rules of origin so we know what the proper tariff rate is.

This is being made clear and more predictable. It is undeniably going to be a plus to traders and investors both inside and outside NAFTA who are seeking an environment more certain and one less susceptible to disputes.

There is something else. We all know that the economies of all industrialized countries that service business as well as consumers are growing as a proportion of our economy. In this agreement a wide range of services are now being covered in NAFTA. This reinforces the movement toward a big services liberalization package in the GATT. As matter of fact it is kind of a living laboratory that the GATT can use to liberalize services.

Government procurement is another one. In my riding there are a number of companies that would like to sell to governments around the world: Washington and Mexico City. All three countries have agreed to a large government procurement package which covers not only goods which we are familiar with, but also services, including construction services. This will be encouraging to those who are seeking a big procurement package in Geneva. It dovetails very well with the GATT negotiations there.

Also, we have improved transparent standards, including for the first time standards for transportation and telecommunication service.

We have a stronger dispute settlement mechanism. I spoke at length about the great advantages brought to us under the FTA. It is being strengthened. Exporters and investors around the world will be reassured that their interests will be defended in a more transparent and enforceable dispute settlement mechanism.

Finally there is an accession clause providing for other countries to join the NAFTA.

These are the things we are getting from Mexico. There is something else which is also difficult to get out as a message but probably the most important. Take the example of a Swiss entrepreneur or as I met the other day a German entrepreneur with a large manufacturing enterprise who wants to locate for North American production. He is looking at Canada, the United States and Mexico. He said to me six months ago: "If we do not have access to the Mexican market out of Canada, I am really going to have to be in either Mexico or the U.S. I have taken a look at Canada. We can be very competitive. This is where I would like to make the product but you have to get access to the Mexican market. You had better get this NAFTA".

Here we have the hon. members opposite disagreeing with any North American free trade agreement. Even one of perfection put together by Mother Teresa they would not support.

In this access to world-wide investors for the North American market, 360 million people, we can either be left on the shelf or we can be part of it and that is what this NAFTA agreement will bring us.

Frankly people say nobody is interested in Mexico; it is too far away; there are very few business people interested. This is not the case. The Minister for International Trade has given the House numbers this morning on how many business visits there have been at the embassy. They have almost quadrupled in the past year. Two-way trade between Canada and Latin America exceeded $8.5 billion in 1991, up 9 per cent from 1990.

Then in the first six months of 1992 our exports to Latin America were up 15 per cent from the year before and the asset value of our investment in Latin America now tops $6 billion. We have Canadian companies. Northern Telecom employs Canadian union members, people who are going to benefit from joining NAFTA. Nova Corp., Bank of Nova Scotia, Bombardier, General Electric, Bell Canada, Systemhouse, Cominco, Alcan, Falconbridge, Petro-Canada, Noranda, Moor and Teleglobe are all redoubling their efforts in this region.

NAFTA fits in with an overall strategy for improving and increasing our exports to Latin America. It also fits in with the leadership that we are trying to give through the GATT.

Finally, it fits in with the view that Canada's sovereignty can best be protected by increasingly becoming wealthier through trade and by having a dispute settlement mechanism which gives us equality with countries we are in dispute with even though they are ten times bigger than we are or three times bigger than we are. That is what these dispute panels will do.

I find this agreement notable for what it brings Canada and notable for the opportunities it will bring us. I call upon the House to reject this motion calling for no free trade agreement ever within North America and to support the government in its efforts to build a great burgeoning market of $360 million in North America.

• (1320)

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to ask my colleague from London West a question.

I agree with him that Canadian business could be competitive if it truly had a level playing field and a government that got off its back and was very supportive.

With respect to the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement I have to comment on the fact he says it has been the greatest thing since sliced bread, especially as it relates to the dispute settlement mechanism. He points out our sovereignty has perhaps been made more secure because we have equal representation on these binational panels.

The fact is those panels are adjudicating on American trade law and not on Canadian trade law or international trade law. I do not see how he can say our sovereignty is protected when those people are adjudicating on the basis of American trade law and not Canadian trade law.

He indicates one of the most positive steps in the U.S. free trade agreement is we do have such a dispute settlement mechanism.

Let me ask the minister why we continually get this harassment from the Americans. Most recently they have essentially taken us on with respect to steel, auto, lumber, pork, ice cream, yogurt and you name it. The minister says it is much less expensive for our businesses to have to counter those harassment tactics by the American administration.

I would very much like the minister to be able to reconcile for me and the Canadian people how we can have such a fair agreement when in fact the Americans keep taking us on with respect to those areas of trade where they obviously think we are taking advantage of them.

With respect to NAFTA, the minister says it merely builds upon what we manage to achieve through the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Why could the minister and his government not rectify a real problem in the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement, which is the lack of a definition for subsidy and the fact we could not get an anti–dumping code?

Those issues have still not been resolved with respect to the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. They continue in NAFTA where we do not have a subsidy definition and we still do not have an anti–dumping code. If we did, Canada could protect itself from the Americans dumping stuff into our country at lower prices than they would in their own or accusing our steel industry of dumping into the United States.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Other members want to ask questions. I give the floor to the hon. minister of state.

Mr. Hockin: My hon. friend from London East raised a number of points. Maybe I should stand up now and start to respond to the first part.

My hon. friend and I usually get on the airplane Monday morning to fly from London to Ottawa. There is usually someone on the plane with us from Northern Telecom who tells us they want the North American free trade agreement passed, or somebody from Joh Rubber Inc. in Leamington who will have 60 per cent of their production go to Mexico if we get this agreement passed. What are we going to say to them on the aircraft about NAFTA?

Siemans Electric is expanding just outside of London. It makes motors and electronics for automobiles and is looking forward to a big Mexican market as well as American and Canadian markets. What are we going to say to these companies on the plane, my hon. friend from London East when they say they want us to join the NAFTA?

Also what do we say to Smith Industries, which has a whole series of new contracts for wheels. There is a company just outside Barrie and most of its exports will go to Volkswagen in Mexico. It goes on and on. There are just dozens of companies waiting for this agreement to put people to work in my hon. friend's riding as well as my riding. This is the reality.

He asked about American trade law. He said the problem with the American dispute settlement mechanism is they are asked to make adjudications on American trade law. Now I am not going to skate away from the point he is making because it sounds very damaging.

Let me tell about American trade law. Just about everybody who takes a look at American trade law, including academics on the left and right, says Americans trade law is a model in most fields, although not its application. The problem is Americans do not consistently enforce their own trade law.

Have you taken a look at our trade law? Compare our trade law with American trade law and tell me in what ways theirs is better. The fact is both of our trade laws are really quite good. The Americans do not enforce their trade law on a proper basis. They play all sorts of games to avoid enforcing the logic of their own trade law.

We put the binational panels in place to make sure they could not do this anymore.

That is the answer to the hon. member's question. If he threw out this binational reality and put us right back into bed with American trade law being unevenly and unfairly applied, we would be right back to where we were before 1988. We would be in deep trouble.

That leads me to his point about harassment. I believe we will always have harassment but we will have much less harassment if we have this dispute settlement mechanism. It will be able to bottle up harassment and deal with it in an expeditious way so we will have equality. Lacking that we will have even more harassment.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Regardless of our views about the North American free trade agreement we all accept that President-elect Clinton has told the Prime Minister, according to what the Prime Minister said in this House, that he has accepted the North American free trade agreement as it is. He will sign it along with this government and eventually bring forward enabling legislation to implement it.

What President-elect Clinton has seemed to have suggested, and the trade minister and the Prime Minister have made reference to this in Question Period in this House, is he is perhaps interested in pursuing some of his campaign commitments by way of some parallel accords, perhaps on the environment and in particular on labour adjustment.

My question to the minister is this: If we are to expect enabling legislation from this government on the treaty as it is now, and if President-elect Clinton starts a negotiating process of parallel accords on the environment and labour adjustment, does he expect we will then see further enabling legislation brought before this House to implement any subsequent changes this government may end up having to negotiate with the new president in the United States and Mexico?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): We are talking about a country by the way when we talk about Mexico. We are talking about a country that very often has to send everybody home two or three days a week from industrial enterprises because of excess pollution being created or brown-outs or lack of power and so on.

Mexico has severe environmental and power problems. It has a real incentive to get this right or it cannot be productive and will never be able to participate in a meaningful way in a trading relationship with the rest of us. I would hope the Mexicans would want to have a parallel accord on the environment, as well as President-elect Clinton, but what should we do?

We have our own course which is frankly a model for most countries and we are going to stick to that course. If we can improve it in some small way under the NAFTA arrangement and get others to improve theirs, I am very much in favour of that.

I know my hon. friend, the member of Parliament for Parry Sound—Muskoka has worked hard on acid rain. He finds a lot of this acid rain does not come from Canada but from elsewhere. He would support it too. Sure we will be there to help with any improvement, but frankly I do not think we have as much to accomplish on that front as the Mexicans and the Americans.

On the topic of labour adjustment, there was an article two weeks ago in The Economist that said no country spends more money per capita on labour adjustment than Canada. It is the same for education, by the way, and I wonder whether we are getting our money's worth. But I have to tell you on labour adjustment we have such a huge array of programs, I am sure we can deal with this one per cent of Canadian trade, which is our trade with Mexico. If not there will be some adaptations made to meet that.

• (1330)

The burden should not be on us but primarily on the Mexicans and the Americans.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 1.32 p.m. I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

The House took recess at 1.32 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

WORLD AIDS DAY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, December 1 is not Just another Day, the title of a recent hit song by singer Jon Secada.

Today is World AIDS Day, an international day of action and mourning in response to the AIDS crisis. Although intended as a romantic song, Just another Day reminds us what it is like to be without someone and today we are without many people from the artistic world.

Canada's artistic community observes a day without art designed to celebrate and remember the achievements of colleagues and friends, while mourning their loss in our creative communities decimated by AIDS.

I call upon this government to do everything in its power to commit the necessary resources and to promote understanding to remove the stigma of misunderstanding about this serious disease affecting so many of our friends and families.

The red ribbons you see today are a message that our thoughts, deeds and actions are with those suffering with AIDS or are HIV positive, that we care and must find and promote the needed prevention programs against infection to stop this epidemic.

This day without art is certainly not just another day.

PATENTS FOR PHARMACEUTICAL PRODUCTS

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform hon. members that the Conseil du patronat du Québec supports the bill to amend the Patent Act for four reasons.

The bill brings Canadian legislation up to world standards. Considering the importance of its trade with other industrialized countries, Canada must bring its patent legislation into line with that of its economic partners.

This bill will attract substantial investment in Canada and Quebec. Pharmaceutical companies are committed to investing $400 million in research and equipment between 1992 and 1996 which will create more jobs.

The industry is an innovative sector that is vitally important to Quebec because it invests large amounts of money in research and development and helps discover new drugs for the treatment and cure of disease.

The bill consolidates the achievements of the 1987 reform. By and large, the industry has met its commitments with respect to research and development. In 1991 R & D represented 9.6 per cent of its business volume.

We must not forget that the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board guarantees that prices will not be excessive and that sales of generic drugs have increased by 100 per cent since 1987.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada recently reported that the current recession has hit the housing construction industry as hard as the recession of the early 1980s.

Industry analysts say it was only with the help of various government incentive programs, combined with low interest rates that home construction industry improved slightly in 1992, but it is still in a dismal state. The use of RRSPs for down payments and a 5 per cent down payment were promoted by the Liberal Party and finally introduced this year.

Despite its success, the federal government plans on eliminating the RRSP program on March 2, 1993. This is not the time for the federal government to abandon the home construction industry and potential home buyers.

There was an 11 per cent decrease in housing construction last month and interest rates are proving unstable as they continue to climb. This faltering level of housing construction is proof that the cost effective RRSP program is still absolutely necessary and the government should reconsider its decision to abandon it on March 2, 1993.

325TH ANNIVERSARY OF LA PRAIRIE

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, La Prairie, a small but important town in my riding on Montreal's South Shore, and one of the first towns founded in Quebec, is celebrating its 325th anniversary this year.

I would like to stress the hard work and incredible dedication of the municipality's organizers and volunteers and the fantastic job they have done to organize a celebration worthy of the name, by offering a program including social and cultural activities, gourmet dinners, and garden parties in period costume.

A special word of congratulations goes to the three authors and all contributors who helped write a book that makes a vital contribution to our knowledge of the history of La Prairie. Congratulations and a warm thank you to everyone in my riding.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture continues to try to change the Crow rate from a transport subsidy to a farm subsidy.

Last winter Saskatchewan farmers rejected this idea by a margin of more than three to one. The proposal then was to pay the farmers a one-time payment of about $80 an acre and have them pay all shipping costs thereafter. This money would last less than four years.

Our current cash rents in Saskatchewan are about $25 an acre. Production is about one tonne per acre and extra shipping costs for that tonne would be $25 to $28. Therefore the market value of rents would sink below zero with this proposal. That explains why Saskatchewan Wheat Pool delegates voted unanimously, something unprecedented for them, to leave the rate issue alone and use other means to improve shipping efficiency.

The government should heed that good advice.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to apologize to my constituents. I have been assuring the people I represent that the national government would be able to meet certain targets for the deficit.

I told them that this year it would be under $30 billion with more reductions expected in the coming years. Until sometime around 1995, Canada would no longer be adding every year to its accumulated debt. It is now clear this is not going to happen.

We have made mistakes. We can do better and simply put, I am sorry. I believe the Minister of Finance has tried hard to stick by his word. He is an honest man. I believe no other Canadian could have done better, given the circumstance of a recession across the whole western world.

However that is just an excuse and my constituents deserve more. They deserve a balanced budget, deeper spending cuts, less borrowing, less government, more jobs, good health care, a better environment and a decent life.

I pledge to continue working for those things.

UKRAINE

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, last year on December 1 approximately 92 per cent of Ukrainians voted yes in a referendum which affirmed the Ukrainian Parliament's August 24, 1991 declaration of independence.

My colleagues and I, and especially the one million Canadians of Ukrainian ancestry, were proud that Canada was the first western nation to recognize the independence of Ukraine.

Today in my riding the Ambassador of Ukraine officially launched the opening of Ukraine's very first embassy in Canada. I had the pleasure of attending this event at 331 Metcalfe Street, the new location of the embassy.

The first Ukrainian Ambassador to Canada, His Excellency Levko Lukianenko, spent more than 25 years in Soviet prisons for his belief that Ukraine would one day become an independent nation.

On behalf of all Canadians, I welcome Ambassador Lukianenko and his colleagues from Ukraine and wish them all the best with their new responsibilities in Canada.

EXTRADITION ACT

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have risen many times in this House to express my outrage with foreign criminals who come to our country and the delays in our extradition process that has kept them here as guests of the Canadian taxpayer.

Hundreds of my constituents have petitioned the government to change the Extradition Act to prevent Canada from becoming a haven for criminals fleeing justice in their own country.

Today is a satisfying day. The amendments to the Extradition Act have come into effect.

The hon. member for Peterborough must be happy. He was instrumental in making this issue a priority. I also give credit to the Minister of Justice for listening and for acting upon the petitions of thousands of Canadians.

The new act sets time limits on the steps in the extradition process. Certain appeals will be heard concurrently and charter arguments will be made earlier.

As of today, any criminal who comes to Canada and thinks he can use our Extradition Act to drag out his time in Canada for years is sadly mistaken. The wheels of government may turn slowly, but at least in this case they turn in the right direction.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, it has been almost seven months since the tragic Westray mine explosion took 26 lives in Nova Scotia. There have been four formal requests for a parliamentary examination into this tragedy, all of which have been brushed off by those opposite.

If the government will not listen to members maybe it should listen to Bernadette Feltmate of Antigonish, Nova Scotia who is the wife of a deceased miner. She writes:

> We lost 26 husbands, sons and fathers on May 9 in the Westray mine disaster. Our elected officials in Nova Scotia and Ottawa have turned a blind eye and deaf ears to our heartache and our questions.
> A provincial inquiry into possible wrongdoings has been quashed, charges of labour safety infractions are still up in the air, and an investigation into the cause of the explosion has not taken place. We as taxpayers paid $134.9 million to the company directly involved with this destruction. Surely someone must be accountable. If our government can back private industry to the tune of $134 million, surely they can afford to pay for a fair and unbiased investigation into the Westray disaster.
> Please help us. We need some answers so that when our children ask us in the years to come, we will be able to assure them that we did every thing humanly possible to find out what happened to their fathers.

FOETAL ALCOHOL SYNDROME

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, today the Minister of National Health and Welfare tabled the government's comprehensive response to the report of the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women on foetal alcohol syndrome.

Foetal alcohol syndrome is a preventable disorder with significant consequences for individuals, their families and communities. Alcohol related birth disabilities can be prevented through education awareness that there is no safe level of alcohol exposure to the developing foetus and a commitment by communities to encourage and support a woman's decision to avoid consuming alcohol while pregnant.

• (1410)

At the same time, we all must become more aware of the special needs of those coping with foetal alcohol syndrome. In compiling the response, the government had the benefit of helpful advice from many sectors by way of a national symposium held in Vancouver in October. The government wishes to give a special acknowledgement to the personal energy and commitment shown by the parents and the caregivers of people affected by foetal alcohol syndrome.

CFB MOOSE JAW

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, on November 5 of this year Barbara Essex went out to check cattle on the family farm near Chaplin, Saskatchewan. She did not return. The all terrain vehicle on which she was riding upset, causing a severe head injury. A ground ambulance arrived but was unable to transport her the 150 kilometres to Regina because she could not survive the trip.

Barbara's life was saved because CFB Moose Jaw was able to dispatch a helicopter to pick her up and transport her by air to Regina. Thanks to the base rescue flight, Barbara is making a miraculous recovery.

Had this accident happened a year from now we would be mourning the loss of Barbara and not celebrating her recovery. The reason is that as of this summer, the base rescue flight is to be removed from CFB Moose Jaw.

CFB Moose Jaw is a training base for pilots. In terms of take-offs and landings only Toronto's and Vancouver's international airports are busier. The loss of the base rescue flight not only puts CFB Moose Jaw personnel in danger but is a tragic loss for the entire province.

This is termed a cost-cutting measure. The question I have for the Minister of National Defence is: What is the value of human life? Perhaps he should ask Barbara's parents.

WINNIPEG BLUE BOMBERS

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, this weekend saw a re-enactment of that great Canadian football classic, the Grey Cup. The Winnipeg Blue Bombers represented the east and Calgary represented the west in the battle of the titans.

I am proud of the Bombers. My confidence in their prowess has never wavered for a moment. They played the game like true champions and knowing that Calgary had not won the Grey Cup for over 21 years, they played the game like gentlemen.

However, due to pressure exerted on me by the hon. member for Calgary North, I am forced to state that for this one game only, Calgary was unequivocally the better team.

Next year, I know that the Bombers will be back and take the Grey Cup again.

HIBERNIA PROJECT

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General of Canada has shown that the federal government is a very poor manager. One example was the money wasted on the Hibernia Project. We in the Bloc Quebecois were the only members against this far-fetched megaproject.

The federal government is putting Quebec into debt at the rate of $6 billion or $7 billion dollars per year. On behalf of all Quebecers, I condemn this kind of mismanagement.

WORLD AIDS DAY

Mr. Ross Reid (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the theme for this year's World AIDS Day is community commitment.

I hope that all of us in this House and in this country will renew our commitment to prevention through education and research; to treatment through medical care and new drugs; support for the sufferers of AIDS and HIV and their families; support for those communities of professionals and volunteers that work with HIV and AIDS patients.

I hope also today we can renew our commitment to stop the discrimination against those with HIV and AIDS. All of our communities need to come together to deal with this tragedy.

LOCKPORT BRIDGE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the Lockport Bridge committee in the federal riding of Selkirk—Red River is furious that the federal government has reneged on a November 10 commitment to repair the bridge before demanding a full agreement on divestiture to the province.

This bridge will have to close on January 2, 1993. It has been neglected for years by its owner which was then, and is now, the federal government. The closing of the bridge and the delay of repairs will decimate the town of Lockport, threatening 428 jobs and impeding the traditional weekend pastime of many Winnipegers who drive to Lockport on one side of the Red River and return to Winnipeg on the other.

I call on the government to stop making the citizens of Lockport potential victims in its negotiations with the province. It is a federal bridge. Fix it first, then negotiate as long as it takes.

Yesterday we heard about overpasses to be built by the federal government in Montreal because they were in federal jurisdiction. This bridge is in federal jurisdiction. If the Minister of Finance is looking for worthy infrastructure projects, the Lockport bridge should be at the top of his list.

PERLEY BRIDGE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the Perley Bridge between Hawkesbury, Ontario, and Grenville, Quebec, was built in 1931. The bridge, which is 2,284 feet long, has provided this connection between Ontario and Quebec for 61 years.

Unfortunately, the bridge is old, too narrow and should be replaced. Since 1984 I have been begging this government to act in co-operation with both provinces and replace the Perley Bridge.

Let us not wait until it is too late. Let us stop dragging our feet.

I therefore ask the Minister of Finance to include in tomorrow's statement an announcement that he will replace the Perley Bridge between Hawkesbury, Ontario, and Grenville, Quebec.

CANADIAN FOOTBALL LEAGUE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Football League is looking beyond our borders to gain access to new markets. I, for one, would support that initiative. Legislating where a professional Canadian league can or cannot expand would be the death of the CFL.

Wayne Gretzky said it best. He said he did not want government legislation, or regulation or government money to keep the CFL alive.

Wayne Gretzky, one of Canada's greatest athletes and ambassadors, can stick handle better than any politician. He has invested in the Canadian Football League but knows that professional sports needs no boundaries. Government does not belong in the playbook of the CFL.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance repeatedly said in this House that the economy is doing better. This morning Manpower Temporary Services made an announcement. This company surveyed across the land employers in the 10 important sectors of our economy. It reports today that 87 per cent of all companies in Canada are planning either job freezes or job cuts in the first quarter of 1993.

Does the Prime Minister realize what is going on out there? If so, has he instructed his Minister of Finance to change his policy of fighting inflation at all costs for a policy of growth and job creation so that 1.6 million Canadians unemployed today can have a decent Christmas?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance will be making an economic statement tomorrow. I know that once the Leader of the Opposition has listened to the statement he will want to rise in the House and, to the extent that he may disagree with the Minister of Finance, offer very clear-cut, specific alternatives if he disagrees with the statement tomorrow by the Minister of Finance.

The Leader of the Opposition mentioned some figures this morning. He may have been inadvertently selective in his references because he failed to note that the figures also indicated that the Gross Domestic Product grew by 1.4 per cent in the third quarter, which is the fastest quarterly growth in the GDP since the spring of 1991.

There were stats this morning also indicating that domestic demand is up 5.3 per cent in the third quarter and consumer spending is up by 3.5 per cent.

Much more important, as my hon. friend knows as a former Minister of Finance, the composite leading indicator on a quarterly basis is now up 3.9 per cent in the third quarter. These are all elements that ought to encourage my hon. friend.

What would be encouraging as well for the House would be to hear a statement of some encouragement from my hon. friend along with some specifics that he may care to offer the Canadian people.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we made suggestions in the House, but they were always ignored by the government. According to the same study published this morning in Montreal, Quebec's main city and economic motor, 93 per cent of the companies indicated they would either lay off employees or freeze hiring during the first quarter of 1993.

Could the Prime Minister tell us whether he can tolerate the fact that 93 per cent of employers in the Montreal area are not in a position to offer a single job to hundreds of thousands of unemployed workers, in a city where the situation is now desperate?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I obviously share the concerns of my hon. friend about the economic situation in Montreal. In fact, steps have already been taken and more will be done, in co-operation with the Government of Quebec and the city of Montreal, to get the economy back on track.

This morning there were also some figures that were encouraging for Quebec and Canada. The leading composite index increased by 3.9 per cent during the third quarter and investments by companies in equipment and machinery increased by 30.3 per cent. Investment growth in advanced technology was 80 per cent, which is after all very encouraging.

However, the Leader of the Opposition could help economic recovery in Montreal now by asking his party to approve immediately the bill to amend the Patent Act. This bill has created 3,000 new jobs in Montreal and attracted investment worth more than $1 billion. The bill was endorsed by Quebec's francophone universities, by McGill, by the City Council of Montreal and by the Chambers of Commerce. The Leader of the Opposition should urge his troops to immediately endorse the bill on drug patents, which would help Montreal and Quebec tremendously.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the Prime Minister that with every file we have to look at both sides of the ledger. There are a lot of poor people in Canada who will suffer a lot if the Prime Minister is not prudent in the action he wants to take.

It is very nice to be on the side of the wealthier multinationals but we have to care about the little people of Canada and we want to make sure that medicare will survive in Canada, because it is a nice way to kill it.

Yes, we favour creating jobs, but we need an economic policy that will be conducive to the creation of jobs, not fighting inflation at all costs. We are being given figures. When will the Prime Minister realize that we have not yet recuperated from the drop we have experienced in the last two years? We are not back to where we were in 1990 so we need some growth to at least get back to where we were and start to create new jobs for Canadians.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): My hon. friend is quite right when he says that we need economic growth and here is an indication that does not come from the government. It comes from a group that is not in any way hostile to my hon. friend. I quote: "Economic recovery in Canada that will persist through most of the 1990s may already be under way, Peter Dungan of the University of Toronto based Institute for Policy Analysis told the conference on Friday. The institute's upbeat forecast calls for real Gross Domestic Product to expand 4 per cent next year, followed by an even stronger 4.6 per cent in 1994".

My hon. friend said we have to look at both sides of the middle. He is quite right. There are some encouraging signs and there are some that are less encouraging. I do not know why it is that my hon. friend always persists in looking at those that are less encouraging. My hon. friend from Newfoundland should be impressed. I hear the Leader of the Opposition say we should not side with the multinationals. That is not what he was saying when he was on the board of directors of the Toronto-Dominion Bank.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister likes to quote figures. According to the report of the Canadian Welfare Council, Quebec has the highest poverty rate of any Canadian province. For two years the government has been doing a snow job to please the banks. However, there are some people the Prime Minister cannot fool all the time: 1.2 million poor people in Quebec in addition to thousands of homeless people in downtown Montreal.

Will the Prime Minister and the government promise to introduce specific measures tomorrow to deal energetically with the poverty that is devastating Quebec?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The government has always been as opposed to poverty as the hon. member and his party.

In the particular case of Montreal, three months ago we announced a specific measure involving $150 million in co-operation with the city of Montreal and the government.

The hon. member referred to the report of the Canadian Welfare Council. I would like to draw the hon. member's attention to the conclusions of this report. First, the committee says: "Poverty cannot be eliminated overnight. It is a lengthy process". Second, there is no easy way to deal with the causes of poverty. Saying the government should do this or that is not the answer. Third, and above all, the Council said: "This requires the co-operation of all parties, all governments, the private sector and the various organizations".

I repeat that is what we are doing and our position is that poverty cannot be tolerated. However the fact is it all takes time. While we must do everything that is necessary to be successful, we must be realistic about our goals.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): The minister is attempting to say that his government has the fundamentals right and the fact is it has them wrong.

This government must do much more than simply attempting to fight inflation or to push for jobless exports. The government boasts of having created jobs in the services sector. According to this report on the poverty profile by the National Council on Welfare, 40 per cent of the individuals working in those jobs that this government boasts of having created live in poverty.

When will this government admit that it cannot solve the financial deficit by creating an ever-widening human deficit? When will this government announce a change of course? Will it give the country a chance tomorrow?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe I would be impressed by the speech by the member if I had not heard his leader before.

For me the first answer to poverty is jobs, but the Leader of the Opposition does not want jobs created by big companies. He said before they do not want to hear about big companies and the pharmaceuticals. We want jobs and Canadians want jobs created by anybody, including the pharmaceuticals. We want jobs created by pharmaceuticals.

The member for LaSalle—Émard should tell his leader that is the way we fight poverty. I was not impressed by what was said by the Leader of the Opposition, nor were Canadians.

WATER EXPORTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister who will know full well there are a number of American entrepreneurs actively promoting schemes to divert Canadian water into the United States and northern Mexico.

The Prime Minister will also be well aware that yesterday a water expert in Vancouver indicated that the Mexico-U.S.-Canada trade agreement facilitates the inter-basin transfer of water to the United States and Mexico.

My question to the right hon. Prime Minister is this. Since NAFTA explicitly exempts a number of items like raw logs and unprocessed fish, why did his government not at the same time as those negotiations were taking place make the effort to exempt fresh water so that Canadian water will not be sold to the United States or Mexico?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me just quote from the legislation that brought in the free trade agreement with the United States.

Article 7(1) says: "For greater certainty nothing in this act or the agreement except article 401 of the agreement" which is bottled water, "applies to water." Nothing in this act applies to water.

Article 7(2) says: "In this section, water means natural surface and groundwater in liquid, gas use or solid state but does not include water packaged as a beverage or in tanks".

An hon. member: What about Coca-Cola?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Let me repeat: "Nothing in this act applies to water". It will be precisely the same provision that will be in the North American free trade agreement which my hon. friend will have a chance to consider in this House some time early in the new year.

• (1430)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it looks as though Simon Reisman's water dream continues to this very day as we now address NAFTA.

The government refers to the water policy it introduced back in 1987. The water policy says that the government will do everything possible to make sure inter-basin water transfers will never occur.

In 1988 it introduced Bill C-156 which would have prohibited inter-basin water transfers and then refused to proceed with this legislation. It knows full well that NAFTA and FTA will take precedence over that piece of enabling legislation.

My question to the hon. minister is: Will this government now show its good intention and reintroduce this legislation to prohibit water transfers? We will expedite this legislation to ensure that it passes before Christmas to give Canadians that assurance.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend talks about the NAFTA taking precedence. Let me repeat what the FTA says: "And it will also apply to the North American free trade agreement". Nothing in this act or the agreement applies to water, water being defined as natural surface and groundwater.

My hon. friend and some of the people who support him in his constituency have something in their mind that says we are going to export water or we are going to allow the export of large bodies of water. If my hon. friend could show where this has happened over the course of the last four years, I would be interested in knowing because it is counter to the policies of this government. If this provision says nothing in the free trade agreement would apply to water, could my hon. friend tell us how the free trade agreement would force us to authorize the export of water which would be counter to the policies of this government?

Please, Mr. Speaker, could you ask the hon. member to help us out here?

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the minister lives up to the old adage you can lead a minister to water but you cannot make him think.

We have heard assurances from this government before, like the sacred trust of social programs and that Air Canada would never be sold. We have heard these things before.

However I am going to give my friend the benefit of the doubt. I am going to ask a question of the Minister for International Trade. President-elect Clinton has indicated that he is prepared to open up a number of parallel discussions to NAFTA. In other words, he wants to have some add-ons to the NAFTA discussions.

Will the Minister for International Trade bring comfort to Canadians from coast to coast to coast that when the opportunity presents itself to have add-ons to NAFTA he will ensure that water becomes an add-on and it will clearly be exempt from this trade deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it sounds like my hon. friend has water on the brain.

Quite frankly my hon. friend is saying: let us put water on the table, let us negotiate water. For a number of years now my hon. friend has said: "Don't put the auto pact on the table, don't put culture on the table, don't put social programs on the table". Now he is saying: "Let's negotiate water".

Where is the NDP coming from?

AIDS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

This morning the minister said he would soon make an announcement to renew the national AIDS strategy, but he knows that current federal funding dries up in four months. Meanwhile AIDS groups from across the country are in crisis.

Why can the minister not make this announcement today? Is someone in cabinet opposed to it?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the AIDS strategy will be over by April 1. At this time we are looking at the program. I made a commitment to renew the strategy and we will.

However, we have to consider the assessment of what we have done and what we intend to do. From that perspective, as soon as it is possible to make the announcement I will but it certainly will not be today.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the government must recognize there is a crisis today. AIDS has already killed over 3,000 Canadians and 30,000 more are infected with the virus.

Last November 13 front-line AIDS organizations asked this minister for a firm commitment of $55 million a year for the next five years. Will the minister announce today that his government is ready to allocate this $55 million immediately?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first, I said that I would not make an announcement today and I will not.

Second, the strategy is ready now. April 1993 is just in four or five months so we still have the money to run the strategy until April 1993.

Third, in the meantime if my friend wants to move Bill C-91 forward we will help other people.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, reports today indicate that the elimination of compulsory drug licensing by this government will cost the Canadian health care system, consumers and provincial governments in excess of $7 billion over the next few years.

How can the Minister of National Health and Welfare possibly stay in cabinet and support a $7 billion gift for multinational drug companies at the very time that Canada's health care system is falling apart?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first, the health care system is not falling apart. The member knows that very well. He knows that our health care system is considered one of the best in the world.

Second, he still has phoney figures; $7 billion is lunacy. It is wrong. I have already said that when we talk about the cost of drugs we have to consider the number of prescriptions, of beneficiaries, and the cost of new drugs.

It has nothing to do with Bill C-91. Once again it is just because opposition members, as they were against Bill C-22, are against Bill C-91. In the meantime, a lot of the jobs his leader talked about are not being created because they are stubbornly opposed to a bill that will get Canadians working.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister.

The lunacy in all this are the policies this government has been pursuing for the last number of years that the Canadian public has had to pay for.

The retroactivity alone of this policy bears a price tag of over $2 billion, with over half of that $2 billion going to one multinational drug company, Merck—Frosst. When will the government stop following the agenda dictated by big multinational drug companies and start following the agenda dictated by the Canadian consumer and abandon this obscene and objectionable piece of legislation?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is amazing the Liberal party should consistently object to jobs being created by the big corporations. While the Leader of the Opposition keeps talking about creating jobs, members of his party are saying they are opposed to those jobs being created by the big corporations.

I think they should try to be consistent and tell Quebecers, tell the people of Montreal today that they are against investment by big companies in Quebec. Tell them right now!

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity to review the letter signed by the Minister of Transport to Rhys Eyton, Chairman, President and CEO of PWA corporation, along with the government loan facility term sheet which outlines the conditions the government has demanded of Canadian in return for the initial $50 million assistance.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of State for Transport, this document seems to suggest a government that does not believe in intervention has intervened in a number of weird and wonderful ways, including a veto over the security of assets, sale of any equipment or assets and the amalgamation, merger or consolidation of the company with a non-partner. The one area the government did not ask for a veto on is the proposal by American Airlines to acquire 40 per cent of Canadian Airlines.

• (1440)

Why did the government choose not to ask for a say in this very important strategic decision by PWA?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, indeed there were conditions along with the loan to make sure that we as a government protected the taxpayers' investment in this particular situation.

As far as the agreement with AMR is concerned, anything that comes forward on that would first have to go to the National Transportation Agency to see whether or not it would be acceptable.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. At some point in time the Government of Canada must take responsibility for the decisions or the future of the industry.

The other item that was included in this document makes it very clear that the Government of Canada wants Canadian Airlines and Air Canada to meet with the government to try to find a long-term solution to the crisis that affects the industry.

Has a date been set for that meeting? Could the minister explain to this House and to the people of Canada what proposal will be on the table from the Government of Canada to the two carriers for the rationalization of the industry?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, no, a date has not been set on that particular meeting. The discussions that will take place will look for input from the airlines themselves to see what suggestions they have as far as the industry and the growth of it are concerned.

CANADIAN NATIONAL

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, CN has announced that it will lay off 10,000 workers. This means that 70 per cent of CN workers in Atlantic Canada will be walking the unemployment lines in the near future.

What if anything is the Prime Minister prepared to do to stop the haemorrhaging of jobs in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, the announcement of the loss of 10,000 jobs came from a discussion that CN has had with its employees.

CN is making decisions for their future. It is doing what any good management team should do, and that is discussing it with the employees first.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that CN's employees did not suggest that it cut 10,000 jobs. Maybe it is time for the government to make some suggestions in its place. These cuts are the result of recession and the results of unfair taxes.

CP and CN Rail are taxed 54 per cent more than U.S. carriers. Deregulation has devastated the Atlantic region.

What specific fiscal and regulatory proposals is the Prime Minister prepared to make in order to level the playing field for once?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, work has been taking place to help level the playing field in the trucking industry, the air industry and the rail industry.

If the hon. member will look at the tax structure, she will find that there are far more taxes municipally and provincially than there are federally.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, now that the media have made available to us a copy of the terms of the government financial assistance to Canadian Airlines, we know for a fact that the government sought and obtained the agreement of PWA not to seek any further financial assistance from the Government of Canada.

My question therefore is: Will the government now advise the House of the basis upon which the Minister of Justice last week promised employees of Canadian Airlines International that more loan guarantees may be forthcoming? What exactly is this government's airline policy?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, PWA and its hard working employees would have a much easier time of making their company grow and be successful if they had more co-operation and less looking for nefarious plots on behalf of the work that is trying to be done to help the employees and the company.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the terms of the loan agreement also provide that the government will be entering into further discussions with the lender to consider alternatives to address financial difficulties on the part of PWA as well as the meetings with Air Canada that were previously referred to.

I would like the government to be clear on one thing. Is it that the Government of Canada believes the possible merger of the two national airlines is the best solution to the airline problem that confronts Canadians?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the work that we are doing is to assist PWA and its employees who are trying to help the company. We are working at this time with PWA.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for the Environment. The minister of state will know that over a year has passed since the environmental hearings concerning the expansion at Pearson International Airport.

The minister will know that the report has not been out. There is at least $1.6 billion worth of work in needed construction, with construction workers out of work in Toronto, that could be done now if that report was available.

Will the minister do something to get the report out as soon as possible? Will the minister, while she is at it, organize a new statute to alter the environmental rules so that environmental hearings can be heard and reports can be out from those hearings in a month after the hearings are complete?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, the environmental assessment process indeed is sometimes a long one in order to have a comprehensive review, to give the public an opportunity to make submissions and to allow for the gathering of information and the panel receives that information.

I am pleased to report to the member that the review on the Toronto international airport assessment is in our hands now. It is in the process of being translated and will be available to the member and to the House in the next few days.

AIDS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare which follows up earlier questions today on World AIDS Day. It is less than four months until federal funding for AIDS runs out.

Unfortunately, the uncertainty about continued funding for AIDS is already having a very adverse impact, particularly on community-based groups funded under ACAP.

In view of the fact that we learned today that the number of people with HIV and AIDS is far higher than previously estimated, why has this government still not made a commitment, still not responded to the urgent call for $55 million a year over five years for the Canadian AIDS Society, the Canadian HIV Research Foundation, the Canadian Public Health Association and the Canadian Hemophilia Society? Why this silence when too often silence equals death?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I said before and I say again that we will continue to support the national AIDS strategy after April 1. That has nothing to do with the problem we face today.

By the way, ACAP has been increased by $7 million to help community organizations to be able to fight against AIDS.

Canadians should be aware that it is a collective action by all Canadians against AIDS. We will once again support the strategy, but it has nothing to do in terms of what happens today because the strategy runs until April 1. The money is there and we are doing what was committed to be done.

I do not understand why the hon. member wants a commitment today about something which will run until April 1.

SEXUAL ORIENTATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are wondering about the morality of a government that can find $4 billion for attack helicopters but cannot find the basic funds necessary in the battle against AIDS.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Justice. The minister will know that gay men living with AIDS have to confront not only HIV, but too often also the virus of discrimination, fear and violence.

In light of this, and in light of the recent Ontario Court of Appeal decision in Haig and Birch, why has this minister and this government betrayed the promise that was made to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the commitment of the Government of Canada in 1986 was to do everything in its power to remove sexual orientation as grounds for discrimination in areas of federal jurisdiction.

That has in fact been accomplished, as a result of the decision in Haig, and it was our conscious decision not to appeal Haig, and the changes made in the policy of the Department of National Defence. I have every intention of moving ahead with this in terms of legislative changes. As a result of some of the events over the summer, in particular the Leshner decision in Ontario and Ontario's decision not to appeal it, I want to ensure that legislation I bring forward to this House will be consistent with the charter.

• (1450)

I believe there is a matter before the Supreme Court of Canada that will give the government the guidance it needs in order that I may be assured I have done my duty in terms of the legislation I bring forward.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): My question is directed to the minister responsible for small business.

It does not matter how low interest rates are or how much the government encourages small businesses to expand and create jobs if the country's banks will not make loans. Entrepreneurs in my riding are complaining bitterly that bankers will not take a risk on them. I think small business needs action now.

What is the government going to do to make the bankers get off their assets and make more loans to small business?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, if I thought it would help I would give the banks a swift kick in their assets. Instead, I have passed on the very message the hon. member passed on to the banks just two weeks ago.

The Canadian Bankers Association and the heads of the major chartered banks reported to me that there is a slight increase in loans to small businesses and that they have frozen service charges. That is not enough. There has to be a major expansion of credit.

The Federal Business Development Bank has increased its loan levels by 16 per cent during this past year. We are going to bring in an improved Small Businesses Loans Act, as the House knows, to do our part. All of our regional agencies are also helping small businesses. Those include ACOA, WD, FEDNOR, the Aboriginal Economic Programs and our program in Quebec. We will continue to press forward with all of those programs.

WESTRAY MINE DISASTER

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I tabled in the House a letter signed by a group of Westray draggermen and the executive committee of the families of the deceased Westray miners, personally appealing to the Prime Minister to establish a federal inquiry into the Westray mine disaster.

Will the Prime Minister today demonstrate compassion and a sense of justice and rise in this House to call for a parliamentary inquiry into the events that led to this tragic occurrence?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that this government is concerned with the plight of miners, not only those of Westray but also those of Devco.

We announced yesterday, by the way, an acceleration of the unemployment insurance payments to the Devco miners laid off because of the natural disaster there.

As for Westray, the standing committee on industry has taken this request and, as is its privilege and responsibility has made a decision on the hon. member's question.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): My supplementary is to the Prime Minister.

I have in my hand, which I am prepared to table, a letter from the wife of a deceased miner, and it reads:

> I was astounded to learn just how much financial involvement this government had in the whole affair, but, in retrospect, it explains why there has been such a deliberate attempt to quash any inquiry into the whole Westray disaster and the further decision not to investigate the financial hugger-mugger which took place.

I wish to table that, Mr. Speaker, for the House.

I ask the Prime Minister again, on the basis of compassion and fairness to those individuals, will he not do the honourable thing and order a parliamentary inquiry into this tragic occurrence?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know that my hon. friend will want to state to the extent that he has inadvertently misled the House, that the inquiry was quashed not by any degree of involvement by any political party or any government, but by the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal. As I understand it, the decision was rendered by the chief justice of the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal.

My hon. friend can correct me if I am in error, but that decision is now being appealed by the Nova Scotia government. To interfere in any way with this appellate decision would be a very serious violation of the judicial process and is not one to which this government would subscribe.

That being said, we of course want to work very closely with the Government of Nova Scotia and all appropriate authorities to ensure that the tragic circumstances that surrounded the deaths at Westray be brought to full public attention and examination by an appropriate judicial inquiry.

That has been our position from the very beginning and the position of this government will be to a full and complete co-operation with the public authorities in Nova Scotia in respect of the examination of this very important matter.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada and the constitutional proposition is that nobody, not the government in Nova Scotia and not the Government of Canada, has any right to put persons on trial in anything but a criminal law forum. That was the thrust of the decision which the member brings to the attention of Parliament.

Is the Government of Canada willing to disclose to any vested authority in whatever forum is available its position on the matter of Westray mines, what our involvement was and what role we played? Have we anything to hide?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this very pertinent and important question by the hon. member for Halifax West is in the affirmative.

UNITED NATIONS PEACEKEEPING FORCES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

As he knows, tomorrow the UN Security Council will be considering a proposal by the secretary-general to authorize the use of force and combat forces in Somalia, including the possibility of some 30,000 U.S. combat personnel. This development raises serious questions about the mandate of existing UN forces and the state and condition of the NGOs in that area.

What is our own government's position in relation to these proposals to begin to use combat forces in Somalia? Do we envision that our own troops who are being sent this week to Somalia will be part of that combat force? Will the Prime Minister assure this House that there will be a full parliamentary debate before any decision of that kind is taken?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, our position is to support the secretary-general of the United Nations and the Security Council in the execution of its mandate. Governments such as the Government of Canada have been asked to be helpful both in terms of supplying food and supplying peacekeeping. We have done both.

Now the secretary-general is urging a new course of action upon the members of the Security Council. We will see the results of this and listen and consult with our friends and allies and make a determination of course in consultation with members of the House of Commons.

We will be happy to respond to any questions and accept any suggestions that my hon. friend has with regard to any engagement of our military assets in any way outside of the country.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Prime Minister's willingness to call Parliament back as long as it is clearly understood that there must be an open debate.

The Minister of National Defence said last week that he is contemplating a substantial reduction in Canadian commitments to UN peacekeeping because of a lack of resources.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: In tomorrow's economic statement, can we be assured that if necessary, the Government of Canada will re-allocate and re-prioritize the resources necessary so that Canada can continue to maintain its international obligation as a peacekeeper? It is a very important commitment. Can we make sure that commitment will continue?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first of all I just want to indicate to my hon. friend that I did not say that we would call the House back in any way. I never said that and I want to set the record straight for my hon. friend.

In regard to peacekeeping, Canada has been involved in every peacekeeping initiative undertaken by the United Nations with one quite small exception. Our contribution to the United Nations in peacekeeping and multilateral associations is in the neighbourhood of $1 billion a year. There is not another country in the world that in any way matches our per capita basis of this very important record.

On behalf of Canadians, we have to ask some questions in regard to the duration of some undertakings. In one case, the Canadian forces have been engaged for almost 30 years in the same spot, whereas other places around the world are crying out for assistance from Canada.

We plan to maintain a very vigorous and important role in peacekeeping under the aegis and guidance of the United Nations. We do have questions we would be happy to discuss with the House with regard to the duration once troops have been over.

IMITREX

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health and welfare.

Under considerable pressure from the manufacturer, the migraine drug Imitrex was approved by health and welfare despite the concerns of its chief expert about its possible side effects. Now the drug has been shown to cause spasms, chest pains, and angina-like symptoms. The whole situation stinks of government interference.

My question to the minister is: Who does this government represent, the drug companies who get what they want, or the people the government is supposed to protect?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, that decision has nothing to do with the company. That drug is used in over 20 countries in the world.

When the drug was given approval under the system, the side effects were well known and were on the monograph. Instructions to physicians indicated very well the side effects for people with heart disease and asthma.

It was recommended very specifically to follow the directions and the guidelines. At the same time, the drug is considered to be the best drug in the world for the treatment of migraine. For that reason the drug is on the market in Canada. When cases were reported, the department again directed physicians to follow the instructions in the monograph of the drug.

Everything has been done according to the policy of the department to ensure that what he calls the side effects were known by those who make the decisions and the physicians.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of the Hon. David Zirnhelt, Minister of Economic Development, Small Business and Trade for the province of British Columbia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

CANADIAN AIRLINES

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege this afternoon arising out of the fact that last week, on November 26, in Question Period I raised a question with respect to the government's financial assistance announced to Canadian Airlines.

I felt it was important that the government disclose the conditions that were imposed upon the loan because this contributed both to the stewardship of public money and to an indication of perhaps what the government's airline policy truly was.

I asked the minister, as recorded at page 14106 of Hansard, why the government had not tabled a copy of the loan agreement in the House of Commons. The Minister of Transport, in addition to other comments, said:

> In order to get access to mathematics and figures of the company, we entered into a confidential agreement, which we will not divulge until the appropriate time.

I did not make any further request for tabling of the document, although I did ask questions based on media reports as to what was in the agreement.

This morning a member of the media delivered to me a copy of Privy Council Order 1992-2447 which I was told was given, not leaked, openly to the media, attaching to it the government loan facility term sheet disclosing all of the terms and conditions attached to a $15 million bridge loan by the Government of Canada to PWA Corporation.

I understood and appreciated the reasons the ministers gave for not disclosing the details of the loan. However, I feel it is in breach of the privileges that we have as members of Parliament when we ask a straightforward question, receive an answer such as that that was given, and then discover that the very information we were seeking in this House with respect to the disposition of public money was made available to the media quietly and outside this Chamber, which I feel is at least an abuse of our privileges and at most a failure to—

Mr. Andre: I rise on a point of order. It was obvious in the first couple of sentences it is not a point of privilege since in no way, shape or form was the hon. member prevented from fulfilling his duties as a member of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. government House leader is rising as a consequence of an intervention brought by the hon. member for Ottawa South. The argument that he is about to make is it is not a question of privilege. It is certainly an argument the government House leader is open to make.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, clearly, if the hon. member for Ottawa South will examine Beauchesne he will see that in respect of Question Period there is no obligation on the part of the government to answer a question at all; none whatsoever.

Mr. Kilgour: Come on, Harvie, get serious.

An hon. member: Have you ever been in court?

Mr. Andre: The hon. member for Edmonton Southeast says get serious. The hon. member asks if I have ever been in court. I would be laughed out. This is the House of Commons and Beauchesne is the rule. Read the rules. It is very clear the rules of Question Period do not require—apparently the members of the Liberal Party are—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. A question of privilege has been raised by a member of the Official Opposition. I have listened to it.

An hon. member: He has not finished.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry if I have made an error. I thought he had finished. I certainly listened to the argument. I gave the floor to the hon. government House leader and now I will hear the end of his argument.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, clearly there is no breach of privilege since the rules of privilege are very clear. A member's privileges are breached when he or she is prevented from fulfilling their responsibilities as a member in terms of coming into the House, expressing their points of view and so on.

In no way, shape or form did any actions of the Minister of Transport prevent the hon. member from asking his questions, from standing up in the House today and making his point, and indeed repeating his point by virtue of a supposed point of privilege. He has not had his privileges abused.

In terms of whether there is an abuse of order in respect of Question Period, I humbly submit that an examination of Beauchesne will show in fact there is no obligation on the part of a minister to even answer a question, if in fact you examine the precedents.

The member for Edmonton Southeast keeps interrupting. I would suggest he read Beauchesne and he will see the accuracy of what I just said.

Moreover, there certainly is nothing to prevent the Minister of Transport or his officials from issuing any document they choose to issue at any time they choose to issue it. It is suggested that somehow the issuance of that document which apparently was issued by officials of transport—I am not sure of that or not—is somehow a breach of the member's privileges. I think a simple fair examination of those facts will show that in no way, shape or form have the hon. member's privileges been breached in this situation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa South is indicating he had not finished his argument. If there is something I should hear perhaps he could proceed but as a matter of fact I was rising ready to rule. I can do so but if the hon. member has something which he feels is absolutely essential for the Chair to hear, I will hear it very briefly.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I did sit down because the minister was shouting point of order.

The issue that I sought to raise is simply this. In order to carry out my duties as a critic, in order to hold the government accountable for what it is doing within this portfolio, it is necessary to assume that where answers are given, not where they are declined to be given, but where answers are given that we can rely on those answers.

• (1510)

In this case, the minister said that there was a reason for not releasing the document. He proceeded to do it, really forcing us to work over the course of the days between then and now in a kind of darkness about what issues exactly were out there and how to present them on behalf of the people of Canada.

That simply is the point.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I understand the position of the hon. member, but I want to remind the House that privilege is properly raised only when something has happened that makes it impossible or nearly impossible to carry out the obligations that a member has as a member of this House.

The hon. member may have a grievance. He may have something that he wishes to complain about, but I have to say that it is not a question of privilege. For that matter, I am not even sure that it is a point of order. It is a matter that can be pursued in the House during Question Period as the hon. member did today. However, it is not a question of privilege.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—TRADE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Riis (p. 14316); and the amendment of Mr. MacLaren (p. 14331).

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising to my feet in this debate I was reminded when listening to the last several speeches of going to Tokyo a few years ago and watching a sumo wrestling match. There were two gargantuan wrestlers in a small ring almost immobilized, grappling each other in some kind of death hug; no movement, no change, no flexibility, just total and complete paralysis and immobilization.

Listening to the representatives of the government and the New Democratic Party, they could be our equivalents of parliamentary sumo wrestlers. There is no ability to provide any change, adaptation or ability to look at the conditions as they are. We are grasped in a death hug, sweating and hugging with one another in the hope that one will expire out of sheer exhaustion.

In listening to the speech that we heard before the break from the secretary of state for minor financial affairs when he tried to defend NAFTA, he used the same lexicon that his counterparts to the south and the Republican Party used in the last election. Stay the course. Things are great, things are looking up. It could not be better. "Look at the figures", he says. "Look at how wonderful we are doing."

Never did he take any sense of responsibility for the hundreds of files in the manufacturing jobs. There is deindustrialization going on. There was a report prepared by Professor Conklin of the University of Western Ontario that we raised in the House of Commons yesterday which quoted a series of senior representatives of corporations in Canada saying exactly that numbers of jobs were being disbanded in this country. They were moving away, never to be seen again.

Yet, there was no acknowledgement whatsoever in the remarks of that hon. gentleman that there was a problem there, a problem that was predictable because of the harmonization, because of the change in terms of the subsidiary plants or whatever it may be.

Take the Minister of Finance who was one of the authors of the original free trade agreement rushing to Washington to sign on an emergency energy agreement to get the Americans to sign on the dotted line. He said: "Look, things are looking up. Our exports are great".

The real test of the health of a nation's economic relations with another country is not its merchandising trade figures, it is its current account balance. It is the full change of money, and goods and services between countries. Look what has happened.

In 1984, we had a current account balance of plus $6.7 billion. We were on the plus side of the ledger. That includes trade, tourism, dividends, management fees and all the rest of it. In 1992, in the first six months it is minus $3 billion in the current account deficit of Canada. One of the reasons we are facing the whipsaw effect of having to buy our way through high interest rates to preserve the stability of our dollar and other exchange rates is because of haemorrhaging in our current account deficit.

Once again the government is saying that things are looking up. Things are great. Could not be better. If you are running this kind of deficit in your current account, you are making yourself a captive to foreign financial interests and you have lost control of your own fiscal and monetary policies.

How can we accept the glowing, rose-coloured picture painted by ministers opposite when we know one of the contributing reasons is a trade agreement in which we no longer have the power to set some rules about those dividends and under NAFTA it becomes even worse. We will no longer be able to set any conditions on the transfer of management fees, never mind inter-corporate transfers. Management fees are now part of the NAFTA agreement. A problem we pointed out under the foreign investment provisions of the FTA has been enhanced and enlarged under NAFTA. That becomes a good argument for renegotiating the agreement.

My colleague and others have already spoken about the other problems dealing with the NAFTA that provide serious restrictions and handicaps for this country. For a moment let us turn to our friends in the New Democratic Party and the motion they brought forward.

If the motion had said that this House is not in agreement with this North American free trade agreement, we might have had a fair and honest debate because we would be dealing with a very particular, very precise set of arrangements made between the three countries. However, what did they say? This House is being asked to support a motion that opposes any North American free trade agreement. It is the ultimate statement of protectionism. This ultimate statement is saying, we will have no truck or trade with anybody, anytime, anywhere on any topic.

Even if tomorrow the United States and Mexico through some divine intervention came forward and said: We have made a big mistake with NAFTA. We are going to offer to buy Canadian products at premium value. One does not expect it to happen but it could. The New Democratic Party would say: "No, no agreements of any kind".

In fact, under the provisions of this resolution the auto pact agreement which was negotiated back in the 1960s and fueled a major expansion and growth of the auto parts trade and the automobile trade throughout Canada would not be eligible for negotiation. We could not provide any kind of trade agreement whatsoever. What total nonsense and irresponsibility that they would preclude, prohibit any negotiation of any agreement dealing with any measure whatsoever. Even the kind of sectoral arrangements such as auto pact which have benefited the country would be precluded under this resolution.

Mr. Parker: Under your version.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, under my version? The fact is it is up for interpretation and I read the words specifically. It says any free trade agreement, not this free trade agreement, not free trade agreements dealing with this or that topic. It says any free trade agreement.

It puts Canadians into some great confusion about the standing of the New Democratic Party. Previously their leader in an interview with The Financial Post said on the matter of the original free trade agreement that we would have to sit down and talk to the Americans and see if something could be done about it. Representatives of the party previously talked about the need for improved, expanded agreements on automobiles.

All of a sudden there has been a fundamental reversal of New Democratic Party policy. Members of that party have always tried to say they are not protectionist. The cloak has been taken off. The mantle has disappeared. We now see them exposed in the cold, glaring light of day. They are the ultimate protectionists, the ultimate fortress builders. They do not want to trade with anybody.

We are now faced with dogmatism on both sides. We have a form of economic determinism from the right and from the left. One side is saying that the free trade agreement will lead us into Valhalla, into the land of milk and honey. The other side, the New Democrats, are saying that we can never, ever contemplate in any way, shape or form any kind of trade agreement whether it is in our good interest or not.

Thankfully I represent a party that has a pragmatic point of view, a practical point of view, that talks about opening up trade opportunities, which over the tenure of its various governments has been responsible through the GATT for renegotiating a whole series of tariff reductions and, at the same time, being able to protect vital Canadian interests which allow Canada to be able to put forward its own industrial policies.

Mr. Parker: Sit on the fence, Lloyd.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I have just heard a New Democratic member, in his benign wisdom, say this is sitting on the fence. Pragmatism is not a quality that member obviously espouses. Using common sense is something the New Democratic Party has now forgone. "Why should we consider any trade agreement and why should we be looking at the opportunity to bring tariffs down in a GATT agreement", they say. No, no, they say nothing at all, and do not deal with the problem.

Somehow we are an island unto ourselves, turning John Dunn on his head, poor fellow. They are back to the sort of fireproof house that Canadians thought they had back in the 1930s when they created one of the great depressions and when we were putting up walls, not tearing them down.

The clear alternative that we have been talking about in this House of Commons and at the forums and platforms across Canada is that we need neither the Tory position of a dogmatic, fixed commitment to continental trade policies nor the fortress-like protectionism of the New Democratic Party. What we need is a good, solid international trade agreement under the GATT. Do you know something, Mr. Speaker, we are going to get it.

We are going to have an international trade agreement based upon multilateral principles that will supersede anything that is being offered under NAFTA. It will make all those trade agreements that the Tories negotiated, at enormous costs to this country and at enormous pain and suffering to countless thousands of workers, totally irrelevant because all of the kinds of proposals that they say are benefits of a trade agreement we can achieve under the GATT.

We can get reductions of tariffs. We can get access to markets. We can get a subsidy code that sets out a fair, broad-based, international set of rules. We can get a dispute settlement mechanism that is substantially strengthened under the GATT which will allow us to have resolution of trade conflicts, as we should have done years before with softwood lumber and other issues. It will allow us to pursue compulsory licensing if that is the choice of the Canadian Parliament because the GATT allows for exceptions. It will allow us in cases dealing with agricultural products to find ways of protecting our farmers which we cannot do under the NAFTA agreement.

It seems to me that when it comes down to a choice, and that is what Canadians are going to be contemplating in the few months in the future, then they want a party that is based upon idealism without illusion, not illusion without idealism, as we find in the other two parties. They want to see a party that understands that a country like Canada, which bases so much of its growth on international trade, must be constantly on the lookout for new trading opportunities, for reducing barriers, for getting rules in place but, at the same time, for preserving and protecting its own interests.

Experience and history have shown that the best and most effective way of achieving that is to have new and improved, constantly evolving international trade agreements. We have supported that. We said that in 1988 when the Prime Minister and his friends were poisoning the airwaves with their ads saying there is no alternative to the free trade agreement. The Liberals were offering an alternative. We said, put the emphasis for negotiation on a multilateral trade agreement. We could not compete with the enormous weight of money that went into that program.

Mr. MacLaren: The NDP has no policy at all.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): My colleague has said that the members of the NDP have no policy at all. No, no, they have a policy. We now see it in the resolution. Let us not have any trade agreements, they say, none whatsoever, no trade agreements, no truck or trade.

Frankly, in saying that, is it not a curiosity that the great friend and benefactor of the New Democratic Party, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, Bob White, who was for many years the president of the CAW in Canada, the auto workers, used to laud to the skies the advantages of an auto sector agreement in North America as being one of the stimulants for growth?

Now his own party, his own acolytes are now rejecting him. Where is Bob White going to go after today? Who is he going to be able to adhere to when his own people have rejected what he has been preaching as a gospel for the last 30 or 40 years?

I must say that I sympathize with Bob White because I certainly would not want to be represented by that hoard of protectionists sitting over in the rump corner to the left.

I say to Bob, we are always open for discussion. I am not saying we are going to have an agreement, but at least we are not like the NDP. We do not reject agreements out of hand. We will negotiate and that has been our position.

I have listened to the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, who is a very highly regarded member of Parliament, the former premier of British Columbia, but when we talk to him about negotiation, he goes silly. He goes into a catatonic fit as if somehow negotiation has turned into an awful word; that somehow the idea of being able to sit down with trading partners and working out mutual, agreeable common interests—

An hon. member: Give it away.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): They say give it away. No. There is a difference. The New Democratic Party is not only protectionist, it is defeatist. There is a feeling it can never go to the table. It is no wonder that poor Bob White is about to reject them, because they do not even understand the basic principle of collective bargaining; that you go to the table and you negotiate and you find a mutual basis of interest and come to an agreement.

If it works in collective bargaining between labour and business, why would it not work in working out trade agreements? But no. Somehow the New Democratic Party has been captured and I know what the disease is. I know what strange virus it is. It is called 14 per cent. It is more potent than the Asian flu. It really makes your knees buckle and your stomach turn queezy when you think that you are running at 14 per cent. What do you do? You go to the barricades and you raise the flag and say: "No truck or trade with the Yankees; no truck or trade with the Mexicans; no truck or trade with the world. We will go it alone". Except their own workers will not be going with them. The members of their own trade unions who have based themselves on the idea that growth industries in Canada depend upon proper, good, effective trade arrangements will not be with them.

The case I make to you, Mr. Speaker, is that Canadians do have a clear, unmistakable alternative. They can reject the dogmatisms of the left and the right. They can get rid of the extremities and begin to look at how we can rebuild this country based upon good, serious, practical trade policies which look toward finding agreements on a multilateral basis; that we can look forward to having a GATT agreement that supersedes the FTA and NAFTA and makes much of this kind of explosive debate that has rocked this country from one end to the other irrelevant.

We can begin working within that large international set of agreements on common codes, common dispute settlement mechanisms and work to define our own industrial strategy, our own economic policies and use it in the way that the GATT is made to be used, which is to allow countries to formulate and shape economic and domestic policies that suit their interests, that suit their geography, that suit their character, but at the same time understand that we are all part of a global economy; that we are all in mother ship earth; that we all share a prosperity based upon international trade.

That is going to be the option and choice Canadians will have in a few short months, as soon as the Prime Minister gets the courage to end his own veil of tears. Then we can come down and say to Canadians: "Let us come down to a trade policy that really seeks to open up Canadian opportunities to the world, based upon a common set of rules where nations large and small have equal rights within that agreement that is not dominated by one or two countries".

That has been a principle which has served this country well since the end of the Second World War when we helped to build the economic international framework. It has served us well generation after generation as we have brought tariffs down. We fought and we have defended Canadian trade interests.

So I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you mightily for your patience in hearing me out, that the option and choice Canadians have is a real one, a common sense one, a practical one. Thank goodness it will be given that choice.

That means when the time comes, when people put their ballots in the box, we will see whether they choose to once again be seized by the entertaining spectacle of two sumo wrestlers from the left and the right grappling in a death hug, squeezing the life-blood out of this country or whether they choose a new style, a new approach to trade, one based upon experience and history that will work in terms of what is real and serious to help Canadians get jobs. That is having an international system of trade from which we all benefit.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I just got the tail-end of the hon. member's peroration. I heard him talk about Asian flu. I heard him talk about real policy. I heard him talk about sumo wrestlers. I heard him talk about everything except the North American free trade agreement and the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

He implied that our party was opposed to multilateral free trade, but I am sure I heard him say that GATT ought to have supersedence over the free trade agreement. I suppose he also means that with respect to the North American free trade agreement. I suppose that means that neither of them really ought to exist if they are going to renegotiate them.

I just have no idea where this man is going. Probably he is not going anywhere because he is doing that little dance to try to figure out which side he is on in the Liberal Party. There are those among that party who are opposed to the free trade agreement dancing on one foot and then there are those such as the hon. member here in the front seat. Actually, he is dancing on the right foot and the others are dancing on the left foot. The Leader of the Official Opposition looks like Muhammad Ali trying to figure out which punch to throw and cannot make a decision.

Where does the Liberal Party stand? It sounds like the Liberal Party is a mat under those two sumo wrestlers. I do not know. But it was about as empty a cloud of rhetoric as I have ever heard.

The hon. member's party talks about renegotiating the North American free trade agreement. In terms of what specifics? How is that going to be advantageous to us over what he has said in his speech, the supersedence of multilateral agreements such as GATT? Where does his party stand on the North American free trade agreement? What would it change with respect to that in renegotiating it?

How does the hon. member's party expect that anybody is going to understand what it expects, actually? Would he tell us what he expects will be accomplished through that renegotiation? On what basis does the hon. member think the Americans will agree to it not to speak of the Mexicans?

Let us leave sumo wrestlers alone. Let us leave Asian flu alone and all of those other things that he talked about so eloquently. Let us hear about the Liberal position.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it always gives me immense pleasure to provide any assistance I can to those who are not so much hard of hearing as difficult in understanding.

I would be more than willing to provide, if I could, what is clearly missing in the make-up of the hon. member. That is comprehension. I did spend 20 minutes saying exactly what a serious trade policy is all about.

First, a serious trade policy does not totally and completely reject out of hand any agreement such as the auto pact as the hon. member's party clearly does today.

Mr. McCurdy: That is nonsense.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Now, adding to his problem of comprehension is a literacy problem. He clearly cannot read his own resolution. It says that never, ever will we ever agree to any kind of trade agreement in North America. That includes the auto pact. Here is the hon. member from Windsor. Do you know who he represents?

How many auto workers would vote for the hon. member from Windsor? There may not be many left. At 14 per cent, there could not be an awful lot left. Those who are left are going to be very interested in learning, come tomorrow when the Windsor Star has on the front page: "McCurdy votes against auto pact: No longer any agreements". I want to see those clippings. Then I will take the hon. member off my Christmas list because I know he will not be around next year.

The fact of the matter is that we are clearly putting forward an alternative. That is what Canadians want. Canadians want to get away from the rigidities, inflexibilities, dogmatisms and doctrinaire approach that we have seen expressed time and time again by the right and left of this country.

Canadians want to get back to good government. They want to get back to practical judgments. They want to get back to a trade policy which understands that you can walk and chew gum at the same time, that you can have an open trade policy and still preserve your identity and independence as a country. That is the Liberal position and I am glad the hon. member finally understands it.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, it is nice to see the member from Winnipeg with the trade critic of the Liberal Party. Sightings of the two of them together are not that often.

I have often admired the hon. member, but this speech was full of smugness. It just was not up to his standard. It really was a vacuum of rhetoric that could not be supported by the Liberal trade critic.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I ask for collaboration on language.

[Translation]

I would appreciate it if all members would co-operate. I am afraid that in the heat of the debate, some members may go too far. I would therefore appreciate your co-operation and a certain amount of restraint.

[English]

Mr. Butland: I am appropriately admonished, Mr. Speaker.

I want to say that the member from Winnipeg did a study in etymology, in semantics. I only wanted to talk about the wording of the resolution. Everyone out there who is watching this knows what we are talking about.

The hon. member says that this party is against any North American free trade agreement, that it is against any agreement. He knows full well that is sophistry, it is fallacious reasoning. Would the hon. member from Winnipeg indicate whether he and the Liberal Party are for the North American free trade agreement or not? Would they abrogate the free trade agreement that is in place?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker first, let me say that I am a great admirer of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

In that admiration I only assumed he had some sense of history, that he understood the background. I thought he was an effective representative for the interests of his own community which deals very much with the steel industry.

I can recall the times when we were in government when we did sit down with the Americans and others to work out arrangements and agreements on steel. Under the terms of the resolution presented by his colleagues today, that could not be done. Therefore he better not vote for it.

It says any North American free trade deal, any at all. So here all of a sudden not only do we have the hon. member from Windsor totally and completely rejecting the interests of the automobile workers, we also have the member from Sault Ste. Marie saying he will not defend the interests of the steelworkers.

• (1540)

I bet you next we are going to have the hon. member from Vancouver Island standing up and saying he does not believe in selling lumber to the United States anymore. So we will build it all ourselves. Nothing would surprise me anymore but I am flabbergasted.

When it comes to the question I would simply repeat the words of my leader if he does not want the words from the hon. member, the trade critic. He said that we do not agree with this North American free trade agreement. Furthermore, our leader and our party have offered the alternative of an international multilateral trade agreement based upon principles of equity, equality, fairness, judgment and that is what is going to make this country grow.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, I was just wondering if this amounts to a divorce between the Liberals and the NDP or just a short lover's tiff?

An hon. member: This is ridiculous. Why do they get recognized when they make these stupid asinine points? NDP members have been doing it all day.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, I bring to the attention of the House that such interventions are unwarranted and unnecessary and not in the spirit of the House. This is a very serious debate and the weakness of the issue, of the NDP's position has to be pointed out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): And now that both sides have made their point, I will recognize the hon. member for Brandon—Souris.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate and discuss this very important issue. I am pleased as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment to take some time to discuss the environmental aspects of the NAFTA proposal which is being considered in the House today and will be considered in greater length probably in the new year.

In August of this year after more than a year of negotiations, Canada, the United States and Mexico agreed to the North American free trade agreement, which we generally call NAFTA, providing a new set of rules to govern investment and to govern more than what would be $300 billion in annual three-way trade.

For Canada, NAFTA means access to the fastest growing and one of the most promising economies in the world, that of Mexico, while ensuring that Canada at the same time remains a very attractive place in which to invest.

NAFTA marks the first time that a developing country has entered into a free trade agreement with two industrialized countries. It is not surprising therefore that it has raised many questions about the effects of liberalized trade on the environment. In fact NAFTA is the first trade agreement to recognize explicitly the inextricable relationship between the environment and trade and represents a very important touchstone on the road to sustainable development.

To this end the Government of Canada adopted a comprehensive four-pronged approach to integrate environmental considerations at NAFTA.

First, trade-related issues were dealt with in NAFTA directly. NAFTA sets out precedent setting environmental safeguards to protect Canada's right to set and enforce its own environmental standards and to participate effectively in co-operative international actions to address global problems.

Second, the environment was an essential element of the consultation process. The Canadian environmental community had direct input into negotiations as did business, industry, labour and other interests.

Third, NAFTA has undergone an environmental review. This is the first trade agreement in Canadian history and the first major economic initiative to have undergone such a review.

Fourth, environmental co-operation among Canada, Mexico and the United States has been intensified. These efforts will help Mexico further strengthen its enforcement capacity and ensure effective co-operative action to protect the North American environment.

There has been much discussion about the environmental safeguards in NAFTA. NAFTA has been criticized for not including such measures as minimum and enforceable standards across the three countries. Comparisons are sometimes made with what we see happening in the European community where nations are working toward economic, and to a significant degree, political integration.

It is important however to remember that continental or global environmental protection as sustainable development is very often best pursued through international environmental agreements such as the Montreal protocol or the Convention on International Trade on Endangered Species which we normally refer to as CITES.

NAFTA is not an agreement for the economic, social and political union in North America because Canada maintains its sovereign right to protect the environment according to its own standards, priorities and values. Nonetheless, were it not for NAFTA we would not have a number of key environmental safeguards governing North American trade.

NAFTA is the first trade agreement to recognize the principles of sustainable development and environmental protection. The preamble in NAFTA explicitly identifies the promotion of sustainable development and environmental protection and enforcement as fundamental goals of the agreement.

The economic and trade objectives of NAFTA are to be achieved in a manner consistent with environmental protection and conservation.

NAFTA protects trade provisions of a number of key international environmental agreements. The trade obligations under CITES, the Montreal Protocol, the Basel Convention, and any other future agreements agreed to by all three countries will take precedence over NAFTA.

Again, NAFTA affirms the right of each country to choose the level of protection in the environment that it considers appropriate to its own circumstances and according to its own priorities. Furthermore, it affirms the right of each country to adopt standards that are more stringent than international standards to secure such protection.

This agreement provides that no NAFTA country should lower its environmental standards to attract investment. This is a far reaching provision. It can be found in no other trade agreement.

NAFTA provides for a more environmentally sensitive dispute resolution process. For example, the responding party in a trade dispute involving either one of these international environmental agreements or a measure taken to protect its environment has the right to have the dispute considered exclusively in NAFTA which among other things provides input from environmental experts and puts the burden of proof on the complaining party.

Some Canadians have expressed the concern that NAFTA may lead to large scale exports of Canadian water. Large scale exports of Canadian water would clearly violate Canada's 1987 federal water policy. Canada did not entertain any discussion of large scale water exports during negotiations of either the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, known as FTA, or the North–American free trade agreement, NAFTA.

It is important that both agreements maintain Canada's sovereign right to manage its water resources in the national interest in an environmentally sound manner. Both the FTA and NAFTA apply only to water packaged as a beverage or in tanks. For greater certainty, Canada's implementing legislation will include an FTA like reaffirmation of the exclusion of large scale transfers of water from the terms of NAFTA itself.

From an environmental perspective, NAFTA is precedent setting. It is the first trade agreement to include explicit safeguards for the environment. It provides a new benchmark for an environmentally sensitive trade policy, one that Canada will build on in future trade negotiations.

Canada's environmental community was a key participant in the formal NAFTA consultative mechanisms. Representatives from environmental organizations and environmental experts participated along with business, labour and other groups on the international trade advisory committee, which we call ITAC, and on the sectorial advisory groups on international trade, which are commonly referred to as SAGITS.

ITAC and SAGITS report directly to the Minister for International Trade. ITAC and SAGITS members were consulted regularly and had access to both the draft text of the agreement as well as the environmental review. Their energy, efforts and ideas helped shape Canada's position in these negotiations.

Environmental groups outside the formal consultative mechanism of ITAC and SAGITS were also consulted on the environmental review, its nature, scope and content.

Again their views were invaluable in guiding the difficult and complex task of doing the first environmental assessment of a free trade agreement.

Consistent with this government's commitment to the environmental assessment of policies, NAFTA has undergone an environmental review. The purpose of the review was two–fold: first, to ensure that environmental considerations were integrated into the decision making process at every stage in the negotiations; second, to identify and document the potential effects of NAFTA on Canada's environment.

This environmental review which was released on November 3 concludes that: "NAFTA establishes a new benchmark for environmentally sensitive international trade and economic relations. The environmental provisions of NAFTA go beyond those of any previous free trade agreement".

• (1550)

NAFTA is not expected to have a significant impact on Canada's environment. The anticipated volume of trade between Canada and Mexico as a result of NAFTA is unlikely to significantly increase environmental pressures on Canada's air, land, water or natural resources or to add to its generation of toxic substance and waste.

Canadian business generally does not anticipate that environmental regulation will adversely affect its overall competitive position in the future. Studies indicate there is normally little competitive advantage in ignoring environmental standards as pollution abatement costs are typically small compared with total production costs and polluting companies are usually less efficient.

The review committee determined there is little evidence to suggest that Canadian companies will move to Mexico to take advantage of less stringent enforcement of environmental laws.

The concerns of Canadians on the impact of the trading environment will continue to be addressed through NAFTA as well as through both trilateral and international initiatives including the proposed North American commission on the environment.

We have been working with Mexico on an ongoing basis to address environmental problems. Under the aegis of our March, 1990 agreement on environmental co-operation, we announced in March of this year that we would be providing Mexico with an additional $1 million of environmental assistance.

Mexico has a sound environmental legislative framework and this program is aimed at assisting the enforcement. The program consists of approximately 20 projects addressing six areas: compliance and monitoring, hazardous substances and waste management, air pollution control, environmental impact assessment, environmental education, and threatened species.

Increasingly, however, we are recognizing the important links among trade, economic growth, and the environment, and the need for stronger and more effective environmental co-operation. To that end environment ministers from the three NAFTA countries met on September 17 in Washington. They agreed there was need for increased trilateral co-operation and in particular they agreed to the creation of a North American commission on the environment.

Canada's Minister of the Environment will be meeting with his colleagues from the United States and Mexico early in 1993 to finalize an agreement. The commission will ensure sustained long-term and effective North American environmental co-operation and play a vital role in supporting the environmental goals and provisions of the NAFTA.

In conclusion, NAFTA represents a milestone in Canada's efforts to better integrate the environment and economy and make sustainable development a reality.

It is the first trade agreement to recognize explicitly the relationship between environment and trade. Trade related issues were addressed in the NAFTA.

For the first time in policy making history in Canada the environmental community has had direct input into the negotiations of a trade agreement along with business, industry, labour, and other interests.

The review of the NAFTA was a precedent setting exercise, demonstrating our commitment to sustainable development by integrating environmental considerations from day one in the NAFTA process.

We will build on the progress made in the NAFTA and continue to work with our counterparts from the United States and Mexico to address environmental issues of continental concern. In addition, we will press for the environment to be a focal point for a post-Uruguay round of the GATT.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, in 1987, as a member on the government side, I had an opportunity to do some serious work on the proposed free trade agreement with the United States. I was vice-chairman of the external affairs committee and had an opportunity to travel across Canada and listen to the complaints of the people who appeared before the committee at the time.

Last week, I started attending the sittings of the external affairs committee and heard what the witnesses who appeared before the committee had to say. They are still sending more or less the same messages. Business people, the people who promote products agree with three-way free trade, while those who represent employees, in other words the unions are definitely against free trade.

People associated with the NDP said they were against free trade mainly because they would lose their political sovereignty. They imagine that if we sign a three-way free trade agreement it will restrict the Canadian government's freedom to change its policies in the future. Does the hon. member on the government side believe that signing a three-way free trade agreement with Mexico and the United States will restrict the government's ability to set policy in the future and be harmful to the social policies we in Quebec are intent on maintaining?

[English]

Mr. Clark (Brandon–Souris): Mr. Speaker, I think the key point to understand is that this is a trading agreement that has resulted from negotiations in which environmental factors were very much taken into consideration. It is not a proposal for economic union. It is not a proposal for a political union. In that sense it is a very different kind of agreement than that which is being contemplated at this moment in Europe.

Consequently it is very clear to me as I read this agreement, as was the case with the FTA, the trade agreement with the United States, that each of the participating parties, each of the three countries in this case very clearly retains its right to act as a sovereign nation. As I stressed during the course of my remarks, it is very proper and to be expected that the countries will use their sovereign powers to enhance their rights to safeguard their environment.

What is provided for in this agreement is an opportunity for co–operation, for shared trade, for a more liberalized trade agreement so that each of our countries can benefit from access to a greater market. I recognize the fact that the impact on Canada will in many instances be less than some anticipate. What is very clear is that each of the countries, and certainly Canada included, retains the right to be a sovereign nation and there is no impact on that, no fear of that being endangered in this particular agreement.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I noted with great interest the comments of the hon. member across. I could not help but remember the last time I bought a used car. I met the sales person and he said: "Have I got a deal for you". We went to the lot and there was car No. 1 made in 1988 and car No. 2 made in 1992. Car No. 1 could only run to Buffalo. Car No. 2 had a little bit more engine and could run all the way down to Mexico.

I asked how much for No. 1 and how much for the other. He said one will cost me zip, no jobs, nothing. After four years there are almost 1.5 million unemployed. Then I asked about car No. 2. He said not to worry about that one, it is not going to cost me a single penny.

This is what I am hearing from the member across. If car No. 1 had a little engine and a little bit of gas and it cost 1.5 million unemployed, this one has more gas and a little bit bigger engine and can run all the way down to Mexico and will probably cost us 4 or 5 million unemployed.

I heard the hon. member talk about environmental co–operation, promising the economy of the world for Mexico. The Mexicans made $26 a week. He has talked about environment, trade, environmental review and co–operation. Mexico ships the finished products on one side and opens the back door and pollutes. Does he realize what his Prime Minister and his government want to put us through?

I want to ask a simple question. Four years have lapsed. In that four years my constituents have suffered. Before he stands on his feet and gives us a song and dance, is it not time he tells his boss to call an election and put it to the people?

Mr. Clark (Brandon–Souris): Mr. Speaker, I spoke to the House on the implications of the NAFTA and I did not realize my remarks were so extensive and far–reaching as to produce a question of this nature. I am not so sure that there was any question about jobs in the course of my remarks.

Let me make it very clear. There will be an election during the course of the next eight or ten months or whatever the time may be. It may well be that the same sense of bravado we hear in the House today, which I remember being repeated prior to the 1988 election, may well be reiterated once again. My hon. friends opposite who are so encouraged and positive today may prove to be disappointed in the future as indeed they were after the 1988 election, which of course was fought primarily on the issue of the FTA.

• (1600)

During the course of my remarks I talked about the relationship between environmental protection and NAFTA. I am very convinced as I stand here we have made history. For the first time in Canada, environmental protection was an integral part of these negotiations. It is a party of the trade agreement itself.

If my hon. friend is as interested in environmental protection as he should be, he should focus on that in the course of his remarks and support this agreement.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): I welcome the opportunity to question the member with regard to the environmental portions of the motion because he spoke quite extensively on that.

I want to speak specifically about water. In Vancouver at the hearings Wendy Holm, a director of the Agriculture Institute of Canada said Canada would be powerless to restrict water exports even in times of shortages. I want to say to the member, in May of this year in my riding of Kootenay East the water on Koocanusa Lake, which is a reservoir in British Columbia was increased from 4,000 cubic feet per second to 22,000 cubic feet per second because the Americans wanted the water. Our people in that area had to sustain that kind of release of water.

Mr. Michael Walker of the think tank for the Conservative Party in Vancouver sees no problem according to the hearing. Michael Walker of the executive-based Fraser Institute, a Conservative think tank, said: "Canada has nothing to lose from increased trade in water".

There were environmental effects from that kind of draw-down on the lake. Fish two feet long were going through the turbines into the United States.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, as you know, and as was indicated during my remarks, the type of water export to which the hon. member refers is not possible under Canada's water policy. It is not possible under the free trade agreement and, as the Minister for International Trade explained in the House today it is not possible under the proposed NAFTA.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am here in the House this afternoon because I read the motion by the New Democratic Party which was on the Order Paper. I thought we would have a very interesting and very useful debate. However, to my great disappointment, we have yet to hear what the leader of this party and the party's international affairs critic have to say. I thought we would have a really serious debate, but even the principle players did not have the courage to show up and face the House to explain what, according to the New Democrats, was so devastating about the subject of this motion.

I was delighted when I read the motion, but in all my life, I have never or hardly ever come across a motion in this House that turned out to be such a non-starter. I will read the motion again:

> Let this House reject any North American Free Trade Agreement.

I started wondering what this really meant. A number of questions came to mind.

[English]

There must be a valid reason why they made such a big mistake. If they had said we reject this deal, we could have voted yes or no. We would have voted with the NDP members on that because we do not like this deal, but they said any deal.

I read the paper the last few days and I understood very well. The Premier of Ontario made a great confession that he has so many problems running the Government of Ontario because he is vested with the problem that nobody, including himself, has any experience at all. It is evident today in this House there is no agreement of any kind with North America.

I have been around a few years. Some think it has been too many years, but we have a Prime Minister who had never been here before and look at the mess. I will not apologize for having been around for a few years. I thought about it and wondered what the words "free trade agreement" meant. I remember when I was a member of Parliament and we negotiated the North American trade agreement on the auto pact. We had long discussions with the Americans and signed a pact that created thousands and thousands and thousands of jobs in Canada. When you are in a business such as ours and represent a country that per capita exports the most in the world, you cannot build a wall. The trade between Canada and the United States is $130 billion a year. If we had a wall we could not sell to them. Therefore the notion is to have good trade deals. It is not to say that we will never have a deal with anybody in North America. That is a sign of incompetence at its best.

If Mr. Rae in Ontario confesses that then I think the NDP is bound to stay where it is for a hell of a long time.

In many ways we need a round-the-world free trade agreement. Trade is very important to our nation. This nation of ours has been built on trade. One of the reasons is that we have to sell. In my district of Beauséjour, New Brunswick, and my former district which I am going back to, Saint-Maurice, we need trade. We produce fish in Atlantic Canada and we need a market for that.

When I was the Minister of Finance I negotiated with the Americans to have access for the fisheries of Canada. I managed to open the market in the United States by making some concessions to the Americans, but it was billions of dollars of market for the fishermen of eastern Canada that I opened in reducing those tariffs. That is what I call intelligent trade.

It was the same when we negotiated the free trade agreement with the United States on automobiles. We eliminated the tariffs. Before that we were making all Canadian cars in Canada and the Americans were doing the same thing. Therefore, we decided that we would eliminate the tariffs. We made the decision that there would be no tariffs, but we made an agreement which called for fair and just trade. We told the Americans we needed managed trade. We agreed to no tariffs, but we said we would keep enough protection for Canada to keep the number of jobs needed for our employees. We decided on a share of the market and a share of the jobs.

Mr. Riis: Is that free trade?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, it is free trade and nobody praises it more than your friend Bob White. We did not sell the store. We told the Americans it was good for them and it was good for us.

Mr. Riis: It is not free trade though.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, it is free trade. There are no tariffs. You do not want a deal with anyone so you have to shut up and let me make my speech. We just wanted to show you how to negotiate when you are in government because I know you will never get there, but just in case. However, you may pass it on to Mr. Rae.

I said we wanted an agreement with the Americans. On the FTA, we told them we were not happy with the agreement and we would have to renegotiate it. It is the same thing with the NAFTA. We are not happy with it. It is not a good deal. We need trade, but this is not a good deal. We know exactly what we want to renegotiate. We want to renegotiate, for example, the definition of a subsidy because we have to know.

Look at what is happening now in our trade relations with the Americans. Every time we try to do something in a Canadian way if the Americans do not like it they call it a subsidy. We have this problem in the production of softwood lumber. In Canada we have other ways of taxing corporations but the stumpage fee was not part of our policy. The Americans said we had to have the same rules as them. We said it was not a subsidy because in Canada we have climatic conditions that are different than in the United States and we have tax policies that are different. It is not for them to tell us how to tax our people; it is not for us to tell them how to tax their people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: If we let them do that, eventually they will claim that having medicare in Canada is unfair competition. It is not unfair competition because it is the best system in the world and, as Liberals, we will protect it.

Some will argue that because for every car built in the United States, compared to a car built in Canada, they save at least $1,000 or $900 because they manufacture it in Canada and we have a medicare system. But it is paid in another way. It is not paid by the company but by the taxpayer. It is the Canadian way of doing things.

We need a definition of subsidy and we say we will renegotiate that. Some say the Americans will not agree. They have to agree. It is part of the FTA agreement. They said that in the seven years after the enforcement of the FTA they would negotiate a definition of a subsidy so we will negotiate. We will have to negotiate what is dumping because it is related to what is a subsidy.

That is our policy and we want to clarify it. We will negotiate and we will renegotiate. That is clear, that is our clear position: first what we want to do in terms of subsidy and then dumping. There is a third thing we want to renegotiate. It is not very complicated.

The Americans signed an agreement with the Mexicans on energy that is different from the one the Americans signed with us. We want to make sure that in case of a major crisis we can keep some of our resources for Canadians first. There is nothing wrong with that.

The Americans have huge reserves for what they call "national security". They have built up reserves over the years that are owned by the states that will never be touched. They will never be available to Canadians or Mexicans. They are there for their national security.

We too need reserves for our national security but the Tories gave them away. What is unbelievable, because I have talked with some of the negotiators, is that the Americans were not asking to have a deal on energy. There was no problem for the Americans on energy. The problem was that we did not want to sell to them; it was never that they did not want to buy from us. There was no problem there. We had a policy that provided for reserves for our future. Security of supply, we called it.

The government gave it away. It is very reasonable to go back to the Americans and ask why they do not give us the same deal on energy as the Mexicans. The decided to keep control of their energy policy within the international context. There is an international agreement there, but there was no need to put it on the table in the free trade agreement.

Now there is another opportunity. The American administration is changing. We will have a president there who says "what about labour conditions; what about environmental protection?" Right on. It is what we were asking in this House for a long time.

The member for Davenport and the member for LaSalle—Émard have been asking these questions for a long time. The coming American administration is of the same view. So we have a great opportunity to renegotiate. The President-elect said he wants to renegotiate some aspects of NAFTA but the Tories want to sign right away and the NDP will not sign anything, ever.

There is a very solid, common sense position right in the middle of that. It is the Liberal position. For me, it is very important in this debate. I would offer a good opportunity to members of the NDP because they blundered that so badly I feel a bit sorry.

An hon. member: Don't be sorry.

Mr. Chrétien: They do not want me to be sorry. If they would just change one word and rather than say "any agreement" they should say "this agreement", we could vote with them because we do not like this agreement either. However to say "any agreement" I can see their embarrassment.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: I think we have a very good position on this matter. We understand that trade is very important for Canada. As the member from Winnipeg and the member from Etobicoke were talking about, we need globalization in a way and we need international rules. That would be best.

We have to be careful as a nation that the world is not moving in big blocs. That could be very dangerous. If the common market is to become a big bloc that would be protectionist, if there were to be in North America a big bloc that would be protectionist and if there were to be in Asia another bloc that would be protectionist, it would be terrible for the world. It is the poor of the world who would pay the price of that type of protection. I am worried about it so I do think that we have quite a good position.

For that matter, I enjoyed very much some months ago the position of the NDP that likes to claim it is so solid it never ever changes its mind. The leader of that party, as reported in The Financial Post of October 28, 1991, said: "If elected", and that is a hell of a big if, "we would sit down with the Americans and say how can we make this thing work? If not, we will give them six months notice".

Never in my life have I seen anybody take a page from my book that quickly. It is exactly our position. We would renegotiate, and if the Americans were not reasonable we would abrogate.

[Translation]

Those who believe we can go back to square one are mistaken. When we take power, five years will have passed since this agreement was signed and some decisions cannot be changed then. Companies that moved to the United States will not come back to Canada just because we pass a bill in Parliament asking them to. That is not how it works. But I can understand how naive the New Democrats are, as the premier of Ontario could not have shown more clearly when he said the problems of NDP governments across the country are due to inexperience and incompetence. To that, the people in my party say amen.

[English]

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it was interesting to listen to my hon. friend, the Leader of the Official Opposition clarify his party's position on the North American free trade agreement.

I have two questions. First, does the Leader of the Official Opposition believe that the auto pact is a good example of free trade? In other words, is that how he defines free trade, by the auto pact with all of its components? Second, is it the Liberal Party's position that with some renegotiation of the Mexico–U.S.–Canada agreement the Leader of the Opposition could see himself entering into a free trade deal with Mexico and the United States?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, yes, because we have no tariffs between Canada and United States on cars and parts. That is free trade. We got some guarantees in that deal. That is the difference. We said we had to maintain jobs in Canada and the Americans said: "Yes, you will have it". When we look at the record over 25 years, we virtually had more work than we deserved. Sometimes it was pure luck; sometimes it was good management.

• (1620)

I remember when I was minister of trade and I sat down with Mr. Iaccoca of Chrysler. The member for Windsor West was there. We were negotiating with them. They wanted to put their van operations in Canada. I was not too keen on vans because they were nothing in those days. I told Lee Iaccoca he was perhaps giving us a bum rap. It turned out that vans became extremely popular and the big guzzling cars disappeared. We gained that way because we got the best part of the deal.

That is a form of free trade but with guarantees and mechanisms to repair it if it is not working. But it worked pretty well. What was the second question?

Mr. MacLaren: If we improved the agreement, would you go with it?

Mr. Chrétien: Of course we will improve it. If there is no possibility of improvement we can abrogate. I will do what the leader of the NDP said.

An hon. member: Read it again.

Mr. Chrétien: I will read it again in case the member has not read it. In an interview in The Financial Post on October 28, 1991 the Leader of the NDP said: "If elected we would sit down with the Americans and say how can we make this thing work?"

Mr. Boudria: Who said that?

Mr. Chrétien: The Leader of the NDP. "If not, we will give them six months notice". Who said that? The leader of the NDP and I.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure to support our NDP motion:

> That this House reject any North American free trade agreement.

First I wish to quote from today's papers to show the attitude of Canada's elite toward working people. The Globe and Mail banner headline says: "Economy shows turtle-like advance". What it emphasizes on this page is primarily the strong points: the total value of goods and services produced grew at 1.4 per cent; there was a 5.3 per cent increase excluding inflation in spending by Canadians as final domestic demand and so on.

In The Financial Post hidden away where working people are not likely to find it unless they get to ride an aeroplane in the morning: "Employment outlook getting darker, says the study according to Manpower Temporary Services Limited. For the first time all 10 industry groups surveyed predict employment cutbacks and most industries are near or below the levels of the glum first quarter of 1982. The survey shows no end in sight for an employment drought that has lasted 3.5 years".

In other words, for the elite of this country it does not matter if the workers are unemployed, it does not matter if workers starve, it does not matter if workers do not have a roof over their head. What matters is sales and profit and somebody, at least the rich, having money to spend. If the rich have money to spend then somebody will find things to sell them. That is an illustration of the attitude of the elite in Canada.

I want to illustrate something else that shows the attitude and practice of the elite in Mexico, the people the Canadian elite want to join up with and with whom they want to share the Government of Canada.

In Mexico there has been violent suppression of workers, unions and opposition leaders for years and for decades. In the three to four years since President Salinas was elected—he was elected in an election that was criticized by the Organization of American States for its improprieties or irregularities or fraud—over 100 opposition leaders and 20 journalist have been assassinated in Mexico with almost no police investigation let alone trial. There is very little police action to curb that sort of thing.

We now have a former member of the Congress of Mexico who has been driven to find refugee status in Canada. Mario Rojas Alba was a congressman of the Mexican congress, the national congress. He was one of the leaders of the Party of Revolutionary Democracy led by Cuauhtemoc Cardenas. While he was a congressman he was many times over the years physically attacked or burgled by people who he found, by investigation, were criminals and drug traffickers under the protection of the justice officials of the state of Morelos which he was representing in the Mexican congress.

In fact in January 1992 Mario Rojas was continuing investigations of the killing of Jose Ramon Garcia, an opposition leader of his party, the DRP, in the state of Morelos, who had been killed three years before. He finally, on a tip, went and interviewed three prisoners in the Morelos penitentiary, former policemen with knowledge of the kidnapping and killing of Ramon.

The contents of the interview were reported by officials to the justice authorities of the state of Morelos, the same ones who had been protecting the criminals and drug traffickers that were attacking Rojas. There were then further threats and attempts immediately made on Rojas' life. He asked protection of the attorney general of Mexico who provided a protective escort and eventually in his own investigation ratified the results of Rojas' investigation which showed that the police and the state justice authorities of Morelos were implicated in the kidnapping and murder of Ramon.

The attorney general of Mexico then refused to proceed against the Morelos state officials who were responsible for that kidnapping and murder indirectly and he withdrew the protective escort from Rojas. When Rojas saw what was happening, with the help of friends he had to escape from Mexico and he has now been accepted as a refugee in Canada.

Rojas will be here on Thursday to speak to members of Parliament who are interested to know what is happening in Mexico. His case illustrates once again what I saw in a small way when I was in Mexico a couple of years ago observing the state elections in Morelos. I observed that there were practically no voting booths at which there was any secrecy of the ballot. You do not need a secret ballot. Everybody accepts the fact that the policeman standing beside the table and all the other people standing around see how you mark your ballot. That is how unfree elections are in the state of Morelos in Mexico.

It also illustrates the state condones and even orchestrates violence against anybody who opposes the government. That includes anybody who opposes the government run trade union structure which dominates the majority of the unions in Mexico. Anybody within those unions who tries to change things is intimidated. Anybody who tries to start a new union is intimidated, and some of them have been killed by police without punishment to the police.

My point is that although we do not have anything approaching the state of violence in Canada at present that they have in Mexico, the attitude of the elite says that it is all right, as long as the economy is booming and there are profit figures and sales figures, we are selling more abroad and so on. It does not matter whether the majority of the people are growing poorer and becoming unemployed.

If we form any kind of North American so–called free trade agreement with Mexico, we begin to give up control, not only of our wage levels because our workers will have to meet the conditions of slave labour in Mexico and child labour by the millions, but we also have to begin to give up control over our natural resources, our investment policies, private and public, and our technological development, including the transfer of technology into our country.

It really means, at the bottom line, that we are inviting slave labour to dominate Canada if we sign this free trade agreement as this present government and the Liberals interpret a free trade agreement. They do not mean something like GATT. They do not mean what Adam Smith meant, simply a reduction of tariff barriers or the elimination of tariff barriers. What they mean is giving the multinational corporations total control, unlimited by any government, over the resources, the investment, the technology and the working people of our country. That is why we are opposed to any North American free trade agreement.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member and the negative reaction from the NDP about the NAFTA.

I would like to cite for the hon. member something which ties into the environmental concerns which he has. I want to talk about Sarnia—Lambton, my riding, and what the free trade agreement has meant to my community. As we know, we had a five-year count down on the free trade agreement on tariffs in the petrochemical industry. As of January we will have no tariffs at all.

Ted Newall, the CEO of Nova, said that that has meant to them something in the area of $50 million in tariffs that they have not had to pay. Of course, for that company it has meant that it has been able to invest very heavily environmentally in our area to upgrade themselves in an environmental way as have Shell, Polysar, Dow Chemical and all the other companies that are located in Sarnia-Lambton. Nova, Esso, Suncor, Dupont, St. Clair Chemical and BASF and Polysar division of Bier, a German company, are all investing very heavily in environmental updates and decreasing to zero discharge into the St. Clair River.

That is because of their business stability and exports to the United States. Ted Newall the other day in a speech said something quite profound that maybe our friends who are against free trade should think about. He said a week or so ago that 50 per cent of what we use in Canada is imported and 50 per cent of what we produce in Canada is exported. That is the kind of environment that they were all in. We need agreements that will foster and help us maintain those kinds of export situations.

Again, I am somewhat surprised that the NDP is against the enhancement of Mexican people through their own business environment to upgrade themselves in a way where they will have meaningful jobs and bring themselves to a higher level of income and economic stability by having good stable employment and by exporting products to other places in North America. I am very surprised that is not in the minds of members of the NDP party.

Mr. Heap: With what time the member has left me, I want to say two things.

In speaking with the hon. member for Sarnia—Lambton, I have congratulated him on the work he has referred to that is being done by many of the industries in Sarnia to control pollution. I know about it from a source other than he which he also knows.

That happens to be one good example. There are many others that are not good in all countries, Canada, the United States and Mexico. There is nothing about the free trade agreement that requires Mexico to bring its very bad environmental and labour practices up to the level of Canada's environmental and labour practices.

Nothing requires it at all and therefore there will be other companies which have already sought to go to Buffalo, Alabama and Mexico to get the lower environmental and labour standards available there. That is the big hole in the hon. member's theory.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I have a very short question.

The member for Trinity—Spadina has taken a very moralistic position with respect to why we should not have a trade agreement with Mexico. I wonder whether he would follow that to its logical conclusion and advocate that we have some kind of trading ban with Mexico. If so, what other countries should be included in such a ban whose standards do not measure up to ours?

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I have not talked about a trading ban because that is a distinctly different subject from what the government calls a free trade agreement.

The free trade agreement we have has nothing to do with Adam Smith or has nothing to do with GATT. It is essentially an attempt by the United States to control our natural resources, our investments and our technology. That is what I am not willing to give up to the control of the United States or to the control of Mexico.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to say how very pleased I am that the New Democratic Party has put this opposition day motion against the North-American free trade agreement.

This is the first actual debate that we have had in this House with regard to his agreement that has already been signed by the Prime Minister. There are going to be a limited number of hearings which will take place across Canada. The Liberals voted to make sure that happened. They voted with the members of the government in committee to make sure there was only a limited number. I can well understand why the Liberals are feeling so itchy about the comments of the New Democratic Party. We are opposed to this agreement and we are saying so in no uncertain terms.

Under the free trade agreement with the Americans, we were told there would not be any effects on our social programs. We saw what the government did when it came back after the free trade agreement went in. One of the first things it did was to do away with the government's participation in our unemployment insurance programs because that was seen as a subsidy.

We saw it start the clawback of our Canada pensions because that was seen as a subsidy. We have seen the disallowance of our family allowances because that was seen as a subsidy. We know what the government's agenda does. We saw the government's proposals to cut back on social programs to the provinces, and directly attack our medicare to try to bring in extra billings, the American style.

We want no part of that. If the Liberals want to participate in that kind of program, we saw the losses of jobs and so on. The Liberals are saying that the NDP is against trade.

We recognize trade as well as anybody else. That is a pretty weak argument for the Liberals to be making, that any political party is against trade. We are against the American free trade agreement and we are against the North American free trade agreement. Well we should be.

I come from a riding in southeastern British Columbia where the people know what is on the government's agenda. They know the Americans are after our water. They know that Mexicans are after our water. They know what they are after. We are definitely opposed to the wholesale sale of our water to the Mexicans. We saw what the Liberals did when they were in government in the 1960s when they signed the Columbia River treaty. That was a deal made by the Liberals.

• (1640)

We are paying dearly for that deal right now in southeastern British Columbia. They know what happens when you make deals with the Americans. We always seem to come out second best.

If we sign an over-all deal with the Americans and with the Mexicans with regard to free trade, we know exactly where we are going to be. We have seen that over the past three years. We have seen the lay-offs across Canada.

At CN Railway 10,000 employees will be laid off. There is talk of abandoning tracks from the Atlantic provinces to here. Do you not think this has something to do with free trade? We built a railway system across Canada. We made a decision that we were going to run from coast to coast, east to west.

All of a sudden under the free trade agreement, everything is going to start going north to south. Naturally the railways are going to defend themselves in very difficult situations. Yes, it is a direct response from free trade. The workers across Canada are paying that price.

I want to continue with the line I started with regard to the export of water. In my riding of southeastern British Columbia, they increased the flow from our reservoir in May from 4,000 cubic feet per second to 22,000 cubic feet per second. Can you imagine the environmental effects that has throughout southeastern British Columbia? Can you imagine how that affects tourism in that area? Can you imagine how it affects the environment in the area, or the people living in the area? Yes, those are the ramifications when these kinds of agreements are made without any consideration for the areas and the environment which we are trying to protect.

The free trade agreement with the Americans has been a disaster. There was talk during the free trade agreement negotiations that there would be adjustment programs to try to help these workers during these difficult times. They have been abandoned by this government. That is the kind of thing we will see if we get into the free trade agreement with Mexico under the North American free trade agreement. It is just expanding something that has already proven to be a disaster.

This agreement must be abolished. The North American agreement must be abolished, and we must sit down and deal with our trading partners in an open way. We should not give away our whole country, all of our assets and all of our social programs just because we want to trade with our neighbours.

We can do this on an equal basis without having to sign away our country and our resources to the extent that we have done. We are a young country. We have only 26 million people living in it. We can produce. We can compete. We can do it in an open market, and we can do it through a system without making special deals with the Americans or the Mexicans.

Our premier from British Columbia has gone to the Pacific Rim and has tried to expand trade there. There are other areas of trade in which we can expand. We can do this in a way that Canadians normally do, in an open, equal, and responsible way to ensure that the programs we have in place are able to be continued and to ensure that the resources we have are going to be managed by Canadians for Canadians and not follow the corporate elite like the Liberals and the Conservatives want to do.

They want to have everything done and the decisions made by the corporations. Michael Walker, executive director of the Vancouver based Fraser Institute, a Conservative think tank, said: "Canada has nothing to lose from increased trade in water".

He told MPs that Canada has such a competitive advantage over the U.S. and Mexico where water is concerned that it could become a valuable export. "We have a superabundance of water", Walker said, "Perhaps it makes sense to export it to California and import their fruit and vegetables". Is that not something? Send our water down there so we can import their fruit and vegetables. It is ridiculous for Walker to suggest we should export water and import food.

That water is the life blood of Canada's agricultural sector. We urge members of Parliament to recommend Ottawa take three specific steps to ensure Canada retains sovereignty over its water supply.

That is the essence of what this agreement is all about. The people in my area of southeastern British Columbia know what is behind the free trade agreement with the Americans and the Mexicans and that is our water. We will not allow that to take place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Five minute questions or comments period, the hon. member for Longueuil.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, we have a trade deficit with the world. In particular, Quebec has a trade deficit of around $4.7 billion a year. That is why the Government of Quebec is for free trade with the United States and Mexico. That is also why the official opposition in Quebec agrees with it. That is also why just a few weeks ago the Government of Quebec sent delegates at its expense to Quebec companies, asking them to do business with Mexico.

That proves we in Quebec have confidence in our skills and entrepreneurial and leadership abilities. We are not afraid to face North American competition, because we have enough talent and ability. We have enough natural resources and industries that can produce good products at good prices for the North American market.

That is why we in Quebec are for this agreement, even though we find it weak on the environment and respect for human rights in Mexico. But with time, I think the Mexicans will manage to improve their standard of living and quality of life. They must be given the time it takes and I think there is good will in that regard.

The main difficulties facing us in Quebec and in Canada with the Free Trade Agreement signed in 1988 are because once it was signed we let the dollar rise artificially or deliberately. The dollar was worth 78 cents U.S. when the agreement was signed. We let it rise to 89 cents at the same time as we let interest rates rise. That is why we have trouble exporting to the United States, not for the reasons mentioned by the NDP. The high dollar and high interest rates hurt the exports of our small and medium-sized businesses to the United States.

So I warn the NDP not to systematically block trade with the United States and Mexico, because it is our livelihood especially in Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): I sympathize with the member from Quebec, but the fact remains the free trade that was imposed on us by this government was created because Quebec supported this government to the extent it did. The rest of the country is bearing the brunt of that support. We have seen the results of this government. Some of the Quebec members even had to leave that government because they could not participate there.

If we are dealing with the deficit as he has said, let us deal with the deficit. Let us get rid of that one billion dollars in entertainment tax large corporations are able to write off across Canada. Let us start addressing those kinds of deficiencies. Let us not give away our country, our resources, our programs and our social programs to another sovereign nation because we are trying to deal with our deficit. Let us deal with our deficit in a sound and economic way. Let us deal with some of those improprieties that are taking place. Let us not have the large corporations tell us we must go into a free trade agreement with these other countries because they have created the problems we have at this very time.

• (1650)

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to join in the debate today and, as my colleagues say, to provide some straight goods. I noticed occasionally here this afternoon, as I have been trying to follow the debate, the goods have been anything but straight.

I believe the free trade agreement is good for Canada and the North American free trade agreement will be even better for Canada. The agreement opens up a market Canada needs. It builds on the foundation we created with the free trade agreement with the United States and continues to ensure that Canada is a good place in which to invest.

Today I would like to address a number of those themes:

First, the benefits arising from the free trade agreement with the United States; second, the NAFTA negotiation process, the outcomes and what we accomplished; and, third, the anticipated benefits arising from the North American free trade agreement.

There is no doubt the free trade agreement with the United States has been beneficial to the Canadian economy. We have out-performed the United States in the bilateral trading relationship. We have gained an increased share of North American investments and North American shipments. More importantly, Canada's share of North American employment has held constant despite all the rhetoric you have heard in this House today.

Many traditional Canadian industries have made inroads into the United States market as tariffs have fallen according to the negotiated schedule.

In my part of the country, Waterloo Furniture Components for example provides an impressive display of what can be done under the free trade agreement. That company now exports 50 per cent of its production to the United States and is now exporting to over 22 countries world-wide. Exports are the reason the company has grown from a metal stamping shop employing four people in 1953 to the world's largest manufacturer of computer keyboard products.

Another great success story of a traditional industry is the Ganong Brothers of St. Stephen, New Brunswick. As you know, they have been manufacturing chocolates now for something like 118 years. When the FTA was signed, the company president, David Ganong, made a commitment to restructuring the operation to meet the challenges of not only the United States marketplace but a global marketplace. In 1990 they experienced outstanding growth in export sales of 180 per cent to the United States as well as some of the other countries they have entered.

All high value Canadian industries, except printing and publishing, have made major gains in the United States' market. Every single sector except those two have made major gains in the United States' market.

Consider the case of the Cambridge division of Babcock & Wilcox in Canada. That company recently won contracts valued at over $250 million to design and produce advanced steam generators for the United States Energy Utilities. This project ensures the continuation of many jobs and adds even more to the manufacturing base in Ontario. That improved climate of the Canada–U.S. free trade agreement was what allowed Babcock & Wilcox to move in and obtain this very large contract.

While we have traditionally run a trade deficit with the United States in advance technology products, the situation has improved markedly since the free trade agreement came into being. In particular, and I will give you some of the specifics, exports of computers, telecommunications equipment and electronics equipment grew by almost 21 per cent per year between 1988 and 1991 to reach a level of $9.4 billion this year. We experienced a 90 per cent reduction in the trade deficit for those products since the FTA came into being.

I have no doubt one of Canada's best kept secrets is that our exports have set an all-time record again this year. Is it for real? Will it last? The answer to both questions is yes, it is for real and yes, it will last because of the base we have created.

Over the last six months we have seen commitments by General Motors (Oshawa) and Chrysler at Bramalea to extend or expand production in Canada. Our export success is rooted in the elimination of tariffs and the ability of Canadian companies to be competitive. That is what this government has been trying to do and that is exactly what we are doing.

One of my favourite success stories is Linamar Machine Limited of Guelph, which was the 1991 winner of the Canada Awards for Business Excellence. It provides specialized vehicle builders and component suppliers with high precision machining. The company attributes a large measure of its success to its total quality concept. A tuition improvement program allows employees to advance in employee training over a wide range of options, including such courses as statistical process control.

It likes the FTA. It is prepared to compete anywhere in the world and is doing so very successfully. I could stand up here for the rest of this afternoon and give you company after company after company that are doing tremendous jobs as a result of the FTA. They are increasing exports and leading us out of this recession, export driven for a change.

Let me move to the NAFTA. That process began over two years ago. We had to make a decision. Is it in our best interests to participate in this discussion or not? Clearly the FTA has given us a preferred position with respect to the United States. Some would argue, and we have heard all afternoon, we should have stayed out of the NAFTA discussions. The question for Canada was simple. Did we want a fragmented North American market or did we want one with the U.S. being the focus of two separate bilateral agreements? No.

From any kind of perspective, investment, technology or whatever, the answer is clearly no. Those who say yes have no faith in Canada or the Canadian ability to compete. We do. We believe Canadians can compete anywhere in the world and wink. That is why we said we will enter these talks gladly.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winegard: We want to ship into the Mexican market.

Mexican exports to Canada already enter Canada either duty free or with a minimal tariff. In contrast, our exports to Mexico have tariffs of 10 per cent and 15 per cent. In some cases it has decrees against us and we cannot ship there no matter what we do.

I know I have heard the argument Mexican wages are low. So are their production capabilities in most areas. It has always surprised me when the opposition says "oh you should not have entered into an agreement with the United States because they are so big and powerful that they will run over us poor Canadians."

• (1700)

The same people who said that are saying we should not enter into an agreement with the Mexicans because they are so poor they will run over all these Canadians.

The North American market will link 360 million people in one free trade zone with a gross domestic product of over $7 trillion. That is the kind of market that I believe Canadians want and Canadians can compete in.

We know the negotiating process was long and difficult with two years of hard bargaining, but our positions were always reasonable. We knew exactly what we wanted when we went into the negotiations and we got what we wanted. We used the free trade agreement with the United States as the source, the base, and we made changes when necessary if we felt they were to our advantage.

People ask what Canada has accomplished. I say quite a bit. The agreement goes right to the heart of our nation as a trading nation. It provides access, competitive challenges and a fair set of trading rules. We wanted better access to the Mexican market. We got it. We focused on strengthening in the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. We did that as well. We wanted to guarantee our location as a place for investment in North America generally and we did that as well. We believe the North American free trade agreement will help Canadian companies take advantage of Mexico's very explosive economic growth.

Let us look at the specifics of the agreement. Let us begin with tariffs. Canada and Mexico have agreed to virtually phase out all tariffs within 10 years; eliminate the tariffs as quickly as possible subject to the various domestic problems we know exist when some kind of trade agreement is signed.

In no case did Canada agree to early phase–outs which would impact negatively on Canadian interests. We gained early access to Mexico for a host of things, including many of the things of direct interest to the people in this Chamber such as fish products, some grains, metals and minerals, fertilizer, sulphur, telecommunications equipment, machinery, medical equipment and I could go on.

The rules of origin which have always been a difficult part of the free trade agreement have been revamped to make their application more transparent and more predictable.

There have been major disagreements over the administration of the FTA rules with respect to rules of origin. The automotive sector has been the most visible one of these and we are beginning to see problems in the telecommunications industry, computers, industrial machinery and office equipment.

With the new rules of origin of NAFTA, clearly defining what is and what is not counted as value-added content, we will have a formula that everyone agrees upon, clear in terms of its interpretation and no more Honda type disputes.

Under the FTA duty drawback programs were to be terminated by 1996. To assist Canadian exporters, these are being extended for another two years. Furthermore, a modified drawback program continues for goods still subject to U.S. or Mexican tariffs. This protects our exporters from what I call double taxation.

The safeguard mechanism of the FTA is maintained. That protects producers from sudden harmful import surges. That is still in place in this agreement. We made a very special effort to provide Canadian manufacturers with protection from a sudden influx of Mexican Maquiladora goods because this is what the industry said it wanted. This is what we have produced.

The proposed agreement also provides for the elimination of Mexican import licences that have hurt our ability to trade with Mexico for years and years and been a constant source of irritation. Those are being eliminated. The agreement also contains a very detailed provision on customs administration. This will help us not only in Mexico, but will ensure a degree of consistency in the treatment of Canadian goods entering the United States.

NAFTA also provides major improvements in the government procurement sections. NAFTA opens up a very substantial portion of the Mexican government procurement to an open bidding process. The proposed agreement covers a number of U.S. government service and construction contracts not previously covered under the FTA.

For example, the U.S. Corps of Engineers is included as is the U.S. Rural Electrification Program. Each of these provides new opportunities for Canadian manufacturers. NAFTA also provides special provision for a number of specific sectors.

In agriculture the agreement enables Canada to maintain our supply management regimes and provides us with easy access to the Mexican agricultural market. As we know, the market in Mexico for our exported food products is growing very rapidly; pork, apples, potatoes. Import restrictions on wheat, barley and potatoes are replaced with very low tariffs.

The agreement opens the highly protected Mexican energy sector. Most petrochemical trade restrictions are eliminated. Also important is the fact that energy is protected from interference by regulators: That is of particular concern, as this House knows, to the Canadian natural gas exporters. They have been plagued by that problem for many months.

Changes in the automotive rules of origin, let me repeat, provide a higher North American content rule than we had previously. We believe that helps Canadian part manufacturers in terms of allowing them to have more chance at that big North American market. We also believe, as I said earlier, that it will help resolve some of the current difficulties between Canada and the United States over the content rules.

Let me turn in the final moments of this discussion to services. Many people forget that services now make up over 60 per cent of our GDP and almost 20 per cent of international trade. The FTA was the first trade agreement that included special provisions for services. The temporary entry provisions contained in the FTA have been now extended to Mexico.

These provisions provide right of access to business travellers and professions. They do not undermine in any way, as we kept saying during the FTA debate, our traditional immigration procedures.

On service contracts, the service provisions provide an important liberalization in the financial sector, the telecommunications sector and in part the transportation sector. We tend to forget how good Canadians are at providing these services, whether they are financial, telecommunications, consulting engineering or many other of the professions. We do a very good job.

This should help us gain access for those people which is exactly what we want.

In conclusion, let me state again that our objectives for the NAFTA negotiations were to secure better access to Mexico, to safeguard and improve the gains made in the FTA and guarantee Canada's position as an attractive investment location in North America. We have gained all of those objectives. It is clear to me that Canada wanted the FTA. It is good for Canada to have NAFTA and it is going to build on the success of one to make a success of the other.

We, unlike the opposition, believe in Canadians.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am most interested in the speech on the North American free trade agreement.

• (1710)

More so, I am interested in putting a fairly broad international trade question to the minister of science. Over the last couple of weeks we have been severely impacted by the advertising by foreign financed animal rights activist groups unfairly targeting the seal industry, which has a very negative impact on Canadian citizens, particularly the Inuit citizens of this country who have suffered under the impact of this particular advertising campaign.

I know that the minister would be particularly interested because a lot of what happens with the trapping industry has to do with science and research technology.

There is a deadline that the trappers of this country face that has been imposed internationally to meet humane standards. I want to know why the government is using a go it alone policy. External Affairs made a very meagre attempt to deal with these multi-million dollar ad campaigns which are being masterminded, by the way, in London, England by the animal rights activists. Its ad campaign is $20 million. None of that money will reach the people it will severely impact on. It will not reach the Newfoundlanders who have been put down by this attempt. It will not reach the Inuit who have been severely impacted, who experience in many cases high unemployment; both groups do.

I would like to know what the government is going to do in light of the fact that there is no indication of any funding for Indigenous Survival International, the sole voice for the fur industry in this country that goes abroad internationally. Why is it that these animal rights activists have been successful in their countries in getting representatives to numerous trade commissions that have direct impact on trade policy? We allow these groups to rip the guts out of any kind of sustainable activities that these two groups undertake to survive and to struggle to survive in a very weak economy. What is this government going to do to combat this?

I would like to see the minister respond because he has a direct responsibility. Are we going to counter-attack by using an ad campaign that is as effective, that will put down these people who have precious little regard for the aboriginal people of this country, for this country and our government, and for the people of Newfoundland? I would like to know what this House and this government are prepared to do in terms of international trade to combat these people who are totally insensitive to the human species and who have put before us a question that would make us appear to be totally insensitive to the animals. We will not pick and choose.

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will find there is considerable sympathy for her position on this side of the House. She knows that. We believe that many of these ad campaigns have gone way too far. We are making representations and, although it is clearly outside of my personal jurisdiction as a minister, I will unquestionably take her representations to the two ministers most involved as soon as this debate is over and before the vote.

I thank her very much for the interjection.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the Minister for Science when he was speaking on this question of the NAFTA. He made some comments on the free trade agreement and he sang the praises very loudly of the benefits of the free trade agreement thus far.

I apologize to the minister if it is harmful to his ears but the fact remains that we still have 1,700,000 people, approximately, unemployed in Canada. The minister claims that the free trade agreement has done so many wonderful things and has created so many opportunities and so many jobs. I wonder when he will admit that there are some deficiencies causing 1,700,000 to be unemployed in Canada.

He talks about training opportunities for workers that should have been there all along. We should not need a free trade agreement to create training opportunities. This government failed when it did not ensure that employers should have or will have opportunities in place to upgrade the skills of their workers and to keep up with technological change while the people are employed. The government failed to do that.

This is not going to be rectified with free trade of any kind, either North American free trade or Canada-U.S. free trade. There are no guarantees that I have heard from this minister as a result of these negotiations that Canadian jobs will be protected as a result of any content regulations.

I have heard no guarantees from this minister in his speech with regard to Canadian manufacturers having some form of legislation to ensure that they remain in Canada, so they do not remove themselves and go to the Maquiladora and manufacture goods to try to sell back to unemployed Canadians. In essence, that is what is going to happen.

I would like the Minister for Science to make a further declaration in regard to what he has already said. I would like to ask him one final thing. Where in the North American free trade agreement is there any kind of language that would ensure we have proper opportunities for research and development in the areas needed in this country because we are in fact a resource based economy?

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, I will try my best to respond to the many questions that were asked. First of all, with respect to the number of unemployed, no one in this country is pleased to see 1.5 million Canadians unemployed.

The implication from the question however is that this is a result of the free trade agreement, which I deny. This is a world-wide recession. In fact, we have many studies by independent organizations which indicate that the recession would have been significantly worse had it not been for the free trade agreement that is now in effect.

The Institute for Policy Analysis of the University of Toronto just released a study last week which said precisely that. The C.D. Howe Institute study says precisely that. There are many studies that say this has been good for Canada.

With respect to labour, wages and the guarantees, let me take the guarantees first. My colleague does not want free trade. He wants managed trade. That has always been his party's position. It takes that position because it does not trust or feel confident about Canadians. It always wants to make sure that Canadians are protected somehow because we are not good enough to compete in the world market.

I have never believed that. I do not believe it now. I am certainly not going to believe it when I see the success stories that we have of company after company making it in world-wide competition. We do not want to move backward as the Neanderthal parties would have us do. We are going to go ahead.

With respect to NAFTA and the labour component, we know that wages are one factor. As I have said previously, they are only one factor in terms of what makes a company competitive. Manufacturing ability and the technology they use, the administrative ability, the management ability, all of those things become very significant. Surely, even the NDP might agree that Canadians are better at those things than the Mexicans. Therefore we continue to have an advantage.

In terms of adjustment, we know very well that there have to be training programs in place, not because of NAFTA or the FTA. It is simply because we are going to have industries go up and down over a period of time. We have to be able to give those people some hope and some training so they can participate fully in the job market as they wish to do.

That has always been the policy of this government. We will do our best to continue to live up to those kinds of things because we want Canadians to be out working. We do not want to put them behind the wagons drawn around in a circle like my colleagues over there would have us do.

• (1720)

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to participate in the debate this afternoon because many of the things which the previous speakers said are a little confusing for those interested in this debate.

The New Democratic Party's motion reads as follows:

That this House reject any North American free trade agreement.

[English]

In other words, the motion that the NDP has put forward today and upon which this debate is sought to be framed is one which does not seek to go to the merits or problems of the North American free trade agreement which was negotiated and initialled in August 1992 by Canada, the United States and Mexico.

The motion does not seek to go to improvements which could or ought to be sought by the Canadian government or changes which ought to be resisted by the Canadian government in the face of argument put forward by the other parties to the agreement.

Instead, the motion is framed and set forth as a clearly protectionist resolution which I believe represents the point of view of the New Democratic Party that free trade agreements should not be entered into by the Government of Canada under any circumstances. That is the way it has framed the debate.

People watching should also understand that we have amended the motion in order to try to frame it somewhat differently by saying that the rejection of the North American free trade agreement should occur if the agreement fails to promote Canadian workers and jobs and fails to safeguard the environment.

We are trying to focus the attention of Canadians on the essential issues that need to be dealt with by Canada, its government and its people in moving forward in this world economy, dealing with the powerful economic influence of the United States as it emerges on this continent.

I suppose all of us who were engaged in the great free trade debate of 1988 and the election campaign are always eager to resume that battle. I suppose it is not surprising in light of its position in recent polls that the NDP tries to use a debate such as this one in order, not so much to attack the government as to try to attack the Liberals because it hopes it can somehow resurrect its standing by taking support away from us.

It is important that Canadians understand that the issues at stake in developing the Canadian economy to confront the problems that are besetting us cannot be trivially dealt with in the polarized context of a debate over the free trade agreement or NAFTA simply of themselves.

In the 1988 election campaign we sought to persuade Canadians that a move in the direction of a free trade agreement with the United States was a move toward a continental strategy and there were other and better strategies available for Canada to follow.

That was the essence of our argument in 1988. Canada would not exist as a separate country in the northern half of the North American continent if a continental policy had been pursued by Canadian governments going back 125 years. In fact much of Canadian policy over that time, regardless of who was in power in the federal government sought to resist the strong magnetic pull of the United States and to build an independent Canadian policy that preserved our identity and our differences as a nation.

We always had a foot somewhere other than the continent. For many years it was our ties to Britain and the Commonwealth that gave us an outlook which differed from that of the United States. As the importance of that bond has faded over the years, the pole of the United States has become increasingly strong. Our ability to forge a policy of independence in economic terms in the world, and perhaps also in political terms, has become greater and greater.

What is needed from government then? What is needed is a counterweight strategy. It is a strategy that enables the Canadian economy to continue to grow but to resist that powerful pole from the south that seems to influence day after day more and more of our decisions.

The choice to simply follow a continental strategy that was taken by the Conservative government in 1988, is a choice that shuts down our other alternatives.

In raising this issue now in the context of the North American free trade agreement, we are right to continue to ask where the strategy for the counterweight is. Where do we find opportunities for Canada to pursue an independence in economic and political terms that will enable us to resist being sucked into the vortex of the U.S. policy? That is not in the interests of the United States.

A strongly independent Canada that may go its own way is not in the interests of the United States. We know what the U.S. strategy is and the U.S. strategy makes a good deal of sense for the United States. The U.S. strategy is to build an American trading bloc which may comprise both North America and South America to enable the U.S. to be the strongest element in a trading bloc which in itself resists the powerful influences of Asia on the one hand and Europe on the other. That is the U.S. strategy.

It is a simple, effective strategy. It is one that works well for the U.S. It is one that will work well for Japan which will be the base point of the Asian trading bloc. It is one that would work well for Germany and for France if they could combine their interests as the strongest components of the European part of that bloc.

It is not in Canada's interest because Canada as part of this American bloc is simply too weak a partner to have the role we could play as part of a broadly based multinational trading system such as we have pursued as part of our policy for generations since the war.

That is where Canada can play the greatest role. That is where Canada's interest is and the interest that Canada shares with many other small trading nations in Europe and in Asia as well as in America. Canada's interests are best protected in a multilateral system.

I want to say a few things about the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and why we need to look critically at what the government is doing. As I said earlier, our opposition to it fundamentally focused on what one might call non-trade issues in the 1988 election campaign, on sovereignty issues. However there were trade issues involved in it as well.

Fundamentally, the trade issue that was raised at that time was if the objective of the free trade agreement was to guarantee Canadian firms secure access to the U.S. market, the free trade agreement failed to do so because it failed to give Canada exemption from U.S. trade laws.

The gain we made under the free trade agreement was the power of a bilateral panel to arbitrate disputes that arose under the trade laws of the two countries. Canada has had some significant success in arbitrating cases before those panels. The decisions have favoured Canada, in many important cases. However we did not get exemption from the U.S. protectionist trade laws.

What do we gain, if anything, out of NAFTA? We have to look very critically at what the government has failed to do in this negotiation. First of all, let me say that we supported Canada engaging in the discussion. It was important that Canada's interests be protected and that Canadian negotiators sit at the table in order to do whatever was necessary and possible to preserve Canada's interests.

We should also be aware of the risks Canada faced in the event that the U.S. concluded a free trade agreement with Mexico to the exclusion of Canada. That would create a problem for Canada in attracting investment to this country to enable Canadian producers of goods and services to compete in that new zone from which we were excluded. So there were very important reasons for Canada to be at that table.

At the same time, however, we had to follow a strategy that opened up other opportunities for Canadians to compete in what is becoming an increasingly global economy. Canadians should and must understand the degree to which Canadian prosperity is dependent on trade. Canada may be a small player in world trade terms. It represents something less than about 3 per cent of world trade, but Canada's output from the private sector is close to half dependent on export trade. One in five Canadian jobs is directly dependent on exports. Another way of expressing that is that every billion dollars of exports from Canada translates into about 15,000 Canadian jobs.

We cannot afford to close our eyes to the importance of Canada's role in international trade. Nor can we afford to be ignorant of the problems that have been emerging over recent years in succeeding in that all-important trading environment. Our merchandise trade surplus fell from $19.8 billion in 1984 to $11 billion in 1991. Our current account balance has gone from a $2 billion surplus in 1984 to a deficit of $27 billion in 1991. In 1979 we had a 5 per cent share of world trade. As I have already said, it has dropped to about 3 per cent.

The signs are not encouraging for a country whose prosperity is so dependent on trade. We have to ask what is going wrong and what strategies we intend to employ to address the problems. Some of the problems are evident and relate to our ability to compete in an economy and a world which is becoming increasingly ignorant of borders and increasingly sensitive to the ability to produce goods and services inexpensively and quickly and to meet the needs of customers. In other words, innovation, research and development, skilled people and training programs have become the hallmarks of good trading countries. Canada cannot afford to fail in those areas. Instead we seem again to be focusing, if the NDP have its way, on a debate not about the crucial, basic problems in the Canadian economy, not about the problems that are evidenced by a 30 per cent high school dropout rate and approximately 35 per cent enumeracy rate among our young people, high problems of illiteracy. We are not focusing on issues of declining productivity of our work force. No, we are debating too often arcane principles of international trade law which are no more the source of our problems than many of the other things we seem to talk about indefinitely at great length in this place.

We need to take the time to focus on what is at the core of our problems in the Canadian economy because we are going to be losing the race for markets and jobs that are crucial not only to our continuing prosperity, but in the final analysis to our future as a nation.

The free trade agreement was never a strategy to deal with any of those things. The free trade agreement was an accession to the U.S. strategy of continentalism. Why has it not created the prosperity which was promised by the government? There are a variety of reasons and there are mixtures of reasons. No one can claim that all of the job loss was due to the free trade agreement, nor can it be fairly said, as the Minister for Science tried to say few minutes ago, that job losses were only caused by the recession. The problems are intertwined.

Understand this, Mr. Speaker, that when the free trade agreement was negotiated with the United States in 1987 the Canadian dollar traded at 76 cents U.S. About a year ago in November 1991 the Canadian dollar hit 89 cents U.S., a very significant revaluation of our currency.

How on earth can one expect to implement a free trade arrangement without having concern for the relative value of the currency? How can business carry on as though currency had nothing to do with an important trading relationship such as that?

Much of the recessionary impact was felt in Canada earlier than the United States. That is not typical for recessionary periods in North America. Usually the U.S. enters recessions first. Why? Partly because we pursued a monetary policy that resulted in very high real and nominal interest rates and accelerated the decline of the Canadian economy into the recession.

We hit first. We had a high dollar which made it difficult for us to sell into the U.S. market. When the recession hit the U.S. as well and the trade barriers had gone, what happened? Instead of having a growing market on both sides of the Canada-U.S. border we had a shrinking market for domestic goods and services. As a result branch plants in Canada closed and supplies for the entire North American market could easily be accomplished from the U.S. plants.

Why has the Canadian manufacturing sector lost somewhere, depending on whose estimate we accept, between 200,000 and 350,000 jobs over the course of the last three to three and a half years.

One of the reasons is that the recession combined with the free trade agreement has made it quite easy for production in the U.S. to satisfy the needs of the Canadian market as well as the U.S. market.

These are problems for which there was no strategy to deal with and they have exacerbated the problems of the recession in Canada.

Where do we go from here? We have been given an opportunity by the election of a president in the United States who talks about not passing the law implementing the North American free trade agreement until other aspects are negotiated. Governor Clinton said on October 4 and I quote: "As president I will seek to address the deficiency of the North American free trade agreement through supplemental agreements with the Canadian and Mexican governments. I will not sign the legislation implementing the North American free trade agreement until we have reached additional agreements to protect the environment and labour standards".

• (1740)

The completion of these supplementary agreements provides us with an opportunity and I hope that the government pursues it.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member for Ottawa South. I think what he had to say illustrates the value of moving a motion like this today because this motion is directed primarily at the Liberal Party. We make no secret of that.

We would like it to become clearer to Canadians just where the Liberal Party does or does not stand with respect to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement or the North American free trade agreement. I listened for 20 minutes to the member for Ottawa South and he never said what the Liberals would do with respect to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

He was very critical of the agreement. He said it was a concession to continentalism. He noted all the things it had done to Canada, he did not say that the Liberals would move to abrogate that agreement or not agree to progressing with the North American free trade agreement.

You cannot have it both ways. You cannot say these things are as bad as the hon. member has just said they are and at the same time be unwilling to take the position with respect to the Canada-U.S. FTA that these are things we either need to get out of or not get into with respect to NAFTA.

What is the position of the Liberal Party? What is its strategy for counterweights, as you mentioned? It is not enough to just get up and tell us what is wrong with these agreements. We need to have the political will in this country to get out of these agreements. The fact is the recession you mentioned, the world-wide recession, is a result of 10 years of the same philosophy that is enshrined in these agreements; the neo-Conservative free market laissez-faire agenda.

That has created the problem we are in. Why on earth does the hon. member not face up to that and change the position of his party and say it will abrogate these agreements and not enter into the NAFTA?

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the hon. member had so much trouble understa□Bnding what I was saying. Unfortunately the world is not as simple as NDP members would like it to be. They would like it if we could simply say, let us abrogate this, let us tear up that, let us close this off and then everything will go back to where it was before. There are many powers that governments have. One of them is not the power to turn back the clock.

What we have in the context of both the free trade agreement and NAFTA is essentially a problem of how we manage our relationship with the United States. I think even the NDP would agree that the trading relationship Canada has with the United States, being the largest two-way trade relationship of any two countries in the GATT is of vital importance to our country, to our economy.

Therefore, managing that relationship probably becomes the most important issue we have to deal with in terms of international politics and international trade. What strategy do you take to the management of that relationship?

You can on the one hand, as I suggest the government has done, simply pander to the United States. You can go fishing with the president every chance you get. You can do pretty much whatever they want.

Or you can take the approach the NDP members suggest which is essentially to be very confrontational. Instead of trying to deal with the relationship, be very aggressive and say we are going to tear up our agreement with you. We do not care who has invested based upon it. We do not care what the rules are. We do not care what is happening. We do not care what the status of the trade disputes that are currently before arbitration is going to be. We will simply abrogate the trade agreement. That is an option. I agree it is a clear option. There is no doubt about where they stand. If clarity is what you want, then clarity is what you will get from them. It is a discredited policy but nevertheless, there it is.

What we are saying essentially is far more complicated. It is more difficult to explain, but our relationship with the United States is a very complex one. Managing it is a very important issue. I think Canadians can understand the fact that over the course of time we must reclaim bit by bit the sovereignty that was lost in 1988 and assert policies—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply pursuant to Standing Order 81(14).

The first question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think you would find consent for the following motion:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order of this House:

1. On Wednesday, December 2, 1992, the House shall, when Government Orders are called, proceed to the consideration of a bill entitled "an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1992" at the second reading stage;

2. That, during such debate, the first speaker shall have unlimited time and the second and third speaker shall have equal time as the first speaker.

3. That, on Wednesday, December 2, 1992, the hour provided for Private Members' Business shall be from 10.00 to 11.00 p.m.

4. That, on Wednesday, December 2 and Thursday, December 3, 1992, the House shall continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment, but not later than 12.00 midnight, provided that no dilatory motion or quorum calls shall be deemed receivable during the extended hours of sitting;

5. That, on Thursday, December 3, 1992, the Adjournment Proceedings be held at 6.00 p.m., at the end of which the motion to adjourn the House shall be deemed withdrawn.

6. That, no later than 12.00 midnight, on Thursday, December 3, 1992, all questions necessary to dispose of the bill at the second reading stage shall be deemed to have been put forthwith without further debate or amendment, and a recorded division shall be deemed to have been requested and shall be deemed to stand deferred until Monday, December 7, 1992, at 6.00 p.m.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, there have been some consultations with opposition parties with regard to the content of the motion as read by the parliamentary secretary and I am prepared to give the consent of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I know that our House leaders agreed to the motion. However, I am sure the government would allow more than just one hour of debate on my private members' motion tomorrow night on a limit on third-party advertising during elections.

Perhaps you would like to amend the motion to allow three or four hours debate on this important issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I negotiated with the government House leader so that our party's leader could speak after the NDP representative in reply to the speech by the Minister of Finance tomorrow. It would seem that the Liberals do not agree. I would really like the Liberals to agree to this before I give my consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House is not the place to negotiate in public. I must put the question.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 30(7), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

EXCISE TAX

CFC-FREE AIR CONDITIONERS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): moved

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should remove the $100 excise tax on CFC-free air conditioners.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion gives the House an opportunity to debate what I think is an important issue and that is to the extent to which the tax system in this country should be used to promote certain goals.

We have often used the tax system in this country to promote certain social and economic goals. What I want to maintain by way of this motion and the arguments I make in supporting it is that we should now consider the tax system to promote certain environmental goals.

We have some history of this in the sense there was a time, for instance, with respect to leaded and unleaded fuel, when the tax system was not neutral. We argued in the House many years—I see the hon. member for Toronto Davenport here—that there should be no price differential between the two because we did not want leaded gasoline to be cheaper than unleaded gasoline. We were eventually able to achieve that and of course leaded gasoline is no longer an issue.

I am not suggesting that we eliminate disparities which might favour the more environmentally harmful product, but that we actually consciously try to use the tax system to discourage the use of the more environmentally harmful products and to encourage the use of environmentally friendly products.

This has been called a number of things but it has generally been referred to in the eco-venacular as green taxes or the green tax movement. For instance, you could imagine a number of things from removing sales taxes on things that do not produce greenhouse gases to encourage people to use canoes and bicycles and other things that are non-polluting over things like the internal combustion engines which produce hydrocarbons which then go into the atmosphere.

What I am talking about in this particular bill is removing the $100 excise tax on CFC-free air conditioners. There is a growing consensus world-wide that many of the things we talk about in this House will become very irrelevant, at least very trivialized, if we do not address the larger, planetary environmental problems of ozone depletion. All the parliamentary and extra parliamentary talk about recession and free trade agreements, budgets and deficits and everything else will become dangerously relativized.

We must do something about a situation which seems to portend that at some point we may be dealing with a situation that could threaten life itself on planet earth. At the very least, it could threaten it with a transformation that would so change our way of living that it would not be comparable to what we now know as organized human life on the planet were it to reach a point where crops were no longer able to be produced in the way they are now or where people had to stay indoors all the time or whatever the case may be.

I think that this is just one small opportunity we have in the House—we do not have very many of them—to address the issue of ozone depletion. The bill not only provides us with that opportunity, but also with the opportunity to address some of the practical ways in which we can actually address the issue.

I go back to a time when I was just finishing my stint of three years as the NDP environment critic and it was just before the conference in Montreal on ozone when the so-called Montreal Protocol was developed in September of 1987.

I did not get to attend that conference because there was a change of responsibilities and the then member for Broadview—Greenwood went in my stead because she became the new NDP environment critic. I took over as the external affairs critic.

At that point the world first turned its collective attention to the question of ozone depletion and developed what has come to be called the Montreal Protocol. There were people at that time who said the Montreal Protocol did not go far enough and unfortunately those people were proved right by subsequent scientific research and discovery such that a new protocol, if I understand it correctly, or improved global regulations were required to be reached just in the last few weeks.

There is some debate about the role Canada played at that conference and whether we took a strong enough position. Maybe there are some here who know more about that than I do who might be willing to comment.

Some international protocols are reached for the elimination of ozone depleting substances, the capturing of existing ozone depleting substances and their storage in the way that they are not released into the atmosphere and the production of new technologies and new products which replace the kinds of things that formerly were CFC producing like refrigerators and air conditioners, et cetera.

I am told there is a new refrigerator on the market. I think it has been developed in Germany and does not depend on CFCs. In spite of all these things we need to use the tax system as I have suggested here to encourage the development of certain habits and the use of certain products. We also need to develop a personal ethic in this country about the use of these substances.

We are all still too blase about our own personal responsibility when it comes to the environment. We can have protocols, laws and taxes, all of which are designed to produce a certain result. In the end, individual Canadians are going to have to start to make the right personal choices every time they are confronted with whether to use air conditioning, for instance, if they know that air conditioner depends on CFCs.

I have wrestled with this myself. I have a car which has an air conditioner in it.

The freon gas escapes into the atmosphere but now I am faced with what I think is a genuine decision. Do I replace the gas in that air conditioner, knowing full well because it has escaped before that it will probably escape again and therefore make a personal contribution to what I know is an accumulating and serious environmental problem? All of us confront those kinds of decisions, not every day, but certainly frequently in the course of our everyday lives.

Although CFCs have largely been removed from aerosol sprays, it is an example that existed at one time. It may not be relevant now but I can remember as a young student preaching a sermon at Windsor Park United Church in Winnipeg. It was about 1976. I was concerned about ozone then. I remember suggesting to the congregation that perhaps we should have a Sunday when everyone brought in their aerosol sprays and we would dump them at the front of the church and renounce their use because they were contributing to the CFCs which are now in the atmosphere eating up the ozone layer.

Needless to say in 1976 this was not an idea that was well received. This was seen as the sort of, to put it bluntly, lunatic ravings of some university educated idealist who did not understand the practical realities of the world.

The practical reality of the world in 1992 is that the ozone layer is depleting because the so-called idealists of 1976, 1978, 1979, 1982 and 1983 were not listened to in time. There was always some commercial or business priority, some commercial or business practicality that had to be heeded. It may well be too late when it comes to the ozone layer, although let us all hope not.

I can remember when we first mentioned the ozone layer in this House back in the early 1980s. The member for Regina—Qu'Appelle was the first member here to raise the whole question of greenhouse gasses and the greenhouse effect. People thought he was talking about growing tomatoes, I think.

When we raised the issue of the ozone layer even back during the time of the Liberal government there was no willingness to hear about the significance of these problems at an early time. We always seem to wait until the last minute and we cannot afford to wait until the last minute when we are playing with the life of the planet, when we are literally playing with creation, to put it theologically.

We are playing God when we put our own economic self-interest or even our own convenience ahead of what we now know is the well-being of the planet.

It truly is a moral and ethical question of the utmost severity and yet it does not seem to be treated that way. Maybe it is hard to treat it that way. Maybe it is hard to go through life trying to think of things in these terms but that is what is at stake.

There is such a thing as inter-generational morality, inter-generational responsibility and what we have seen in the post-war industrialized world is a complete abdication of that sense of inter-generational morality. Everything has been measured in terms of what is best for the next quarterly profit margin, or at best the yearly profit margin, without taking into account the long-term effects of the kinds of products we have been putting on the market and the kind of damage that may be done to the environment by those products.

We cannot go back to 1976. We cannot go back to the early 1980s. The CFCs that could have been prevented from going into the atmosphere then cannot be taken back. I wish they could, but they cannot be.

All we can do now is what has to be done as quickly and as decisively as we can. That means having a massive governmental effort to replace those products in the marketplace today which are still dependent on CFCs and using the tax system, as I have suggested, in the interim to discourage the use of certain products and to encourage the use of other products.

At the individual level, as I have already said, we have to begin to place these choices before us constantly and see them for what they are, the many times we are choosing individually and collectively for our own convenience; not our necessity, not our survival, not our daily bread or something like that, but just our convenience.

What a horrible thing it will be if 100 years from now, it is said that for the sake of comfort the industrialized world of the 1950s, 1960s, 1970s and 1980s brought into peril the entire human prospect. Yet that is what may be said if there is anybody around to say it, if we do not smarten up and smarten up very soon.

There was a time when the children of the world, and I was one of them, felt the nuclear cloud hanging over their heads. People who were born after 1945 lived with the notion that someday they might be blown right out of existence altogether, obliterated, especially if you grew up around the Cuban missile of 1962 crisis when people were practising how to hide under their desks and head for bomb shelters and do other things. It never really leaves you.

It has sort of left because of the end of the cold war, et cetera. I was greatly relieved that young people, children, may never have to live with that threat again. I hope that is so, although I am concerned about the proliferation of nuclear technology and nuclear weapons.

But the children today have an even greater threat in some respects hanging over them. That is the threat of environmental destruction. The nature of that threat is different because with respect to the nuclear threat we always knew that if the world could just come to its senses it could destroy those nuclear weapons. It could put them out of commission, and it would only take one day to decide not to do this any more. The problem with the environmental threat is we could decide today not to do this any more and it might still happen because of what we have done already and the unintended and still unknown effects of what we have done already.

There is lead time involved when it comes to the environmental threat. That is why it is absolutely imperative that those of us who live now, those of us who have influence now, those of us who are members of Parliament now, those of us who are cabinet ministers now, do what we must do and what we have a responsibility to do now so the people of the future can have some chance at living a normal human life.

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to the private member's motion. My comments will focus largely on the consideration of economic instruments for environmental protection and how the government is proceeding in this area.

This motion proposes that the excise tax on auto air conditioners be modified so that the tax would only be applied to units using CFCs, chlorofluorocarbons. Accordingly this proposal represents an example of using an economic instrument for the purpose of helping to achieve an economic environmental objective. In this case the environmental objective is the phasing out of ozone depleting CFCs.

It is interesting that when the tax was placed in the first place it was to try to discourage people from using air conditioners. Apparently there is an acceptance now that this is not going to work and we have to fine-tune it so that they can use air conditioners if they are of the right type.

I think we have maybe an even bigger problem and that is to harvest the CFCs in the old car air conditioners that are so common in our community. I think there is a program in place now forcing that very issue.

The use of economic instruments for environmental protection is identified in the green plan as an important area for further consideration. There is a number of different types of economic instruments including environmental charges which are designed to increase market prices to reflect the environmental costs of certain decisions. The proposal contained in this private member's motion is one example of this type of instrument.

Another example is the emissions trading programs which are designed to create a market and price for the access to an environmental resource. Another is subsidies which are designed to encourage certain decisions that benefit the environment and still another are deposit refund systems which include the systems used for soft drink containers in most provinces.

All economic instruments work through the market to encourage producers and consumers to make choices that are better for the environment. Some of these instruments such as environmental charges work through the market by having a direct effect on the prices facing consumers and producers.

The emissions trading programs by contrast involve setting a ceiling on the total allowable emissions of a pollutant. The total allowable emissions are then allocated in the form of permits which authorize sources of the pollutant to emit up to a specified amount during a specified time period. These permits may be bought and sold. In this way a tradable permits program creates a market and a price for the use of certain environmental resources.

As stated in the green plan, economic instruments have a number of potential advantages when compared to the traditional regulatory approach which is often referred to as the command and control approach.

One of the main advantages of economic instruments is that they can achieve environmental objectives at lower cost to the economy. Changing market signals mean that producers and consumers have the flexibility to decide how best to modify their activities to protect the environment. As a result these decision makers can select the methods that involve the lowest cost given their own circumstances and the various options available to them.

A second important advantage is that economic instruments provide a continuing incentive to develop and apply new methods to control pollution. By comparison, regulations offer no comparable incentive for the user of cleaner products or processes once the regulatory requirements are met.

At the same time the green plan indicates that the practical application of economic instruments requires careful consideration. There is a number of reasons for this.

First economic instruments are not suited to all types of environmental issues. In the case of an extremely dangerous substance, for instance, the more rigorous controls of a regulatory program would be a more appropriate approach.

Second, environmentally effective applications of economic instruments can involve complex issues of design and implementation.

Third, some applications raise difficult issues regarding their potential effects on certain sectors and regions.

Finally Canada has had little practical experience with the use of economic instruments.

Recognizing these considerations, the green plan stated that the government would release a discussion paper and hold discussions on the use of economic instruments for the environment. It also stated that the government would establish a program to support practical research in the use of economic instruments in Canada.

The discussion paper entitled Economic Instruments for Environmental Protection was released by the Minister of the Environment in May 1992.

• (1850)

At the same time the minister announced a $1.4 million contribution to the establishment of a university based research program on economic instruments. This program is to help address practical issues associated with applying economic instruments in Canada. It also provides opportunity for training researchers and students in this area and supports the development of a research network.

The discussion paper on economic instruments presents a technical discussion of a number of areas. It discusses the criteria for assessing and designing economic instruments. These criteria include environmental effectiveness, the realization of economic benefits, international competitiveness and distributional impacts.

It discusses a full range of non-tax instruments such as emissions trading programs, users charges and deposit refund systems. It discusses a variety of tax instruments including emissions charges, input charges, product charges, tax incentives and measures that would combine environmental charges with tax incentives.

For each type of economic instrument, the discussion paper highlights some of the potential advantages and some of the practical issues in applying these instruments in a Canadian context. In general, the analysis takes a balanced approach and does not prejudge the final conclusions on economic instruments.

The release of the discussion paper has several objectives. On one hand, it is an educational document for groups and individuals interested in learning more about economic instruments. It provides an information base for advancing research and debate in this area. It also provides a starting point for seeking public input on the use of economic instruments.

The details of the consultation process are currently being developed with input from a variety of interested groups. Through the consultation process, interested groups can provide input on practical considerations and on next steps. This approach will also increase understanding about economic instruments and at the same time help to address issues regarding the practical use of these instruments in Canada.

While the specific example of an economic instrument presented by the member today may be taken as an input into this process, it would be premature to judge this proposal as one that should be implemented. Also the proposal contained in this motion raises a number of difficulties. Examples of these are as follows.

It is unlikely to have an effect on the pace with which ozone depleting CFCs are currently being phased out. I wonder if there is a practical CFC-free refrigeration unit to use in air conditioners in cars.

It would involve phasing out the current tax over the next few years as the auto sector switches to the CFC units. Phasing out the current tax would reduce government revenues by $60 million to $70 million per year. At the present time the loss of these revenues would have adverse implications for efforts to manage the national debt and build for sustainable growth.

To sum up, the potential for making effective use of economic instruments is an area that is receiving further consideration under the green plan. While the private member's motion is one example of an economic instrument, it is not at all clear that this example in itself would provide benefits to the environment or benefits to Canada.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I intended to make an intervention on the proposal made by the member for Winnipeg Transcona tonight, but having heard the intervention of the member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo I cannot help but focus on the remarks he just made.

I wonder whether he has read the document he talked about extensively, namely the discussion paper on economic instruments. If the member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo had a chance to study the discussion paper on economic instruments he would not have quoted it in the House. It is an insignificant catalogue of potential measures. It has had no impact since its publication last May, as witnessed by the fact that public consultations have not even started.

What can you consult about if you produce an insignificant catalogue of measures without any indication what the government might be prepared to consider or what the potential is of each instrument?

That economic instrument paper of last May which the Minister of the Environment produced with a one year delay on the originally intended schedule is a joke. To come into this House and say we cannot proceed on this very modest measure because it would reduce government revenue by implementing it, shows the bankruptcy of ideas on the part of the government on whose behalf the member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo is speaking.

The hon. member gave us a beautiful speech on tradable permits and on economic instruments. Then he told us that in Canada we have little experience with economic instruments. Well, no wonder. We are doing nothing about applying them.

Year after year, since 1987, we have asked the Minister of Finance to apply certain economic instrument measures from an environmental point of view. Our requests have fallen on deaf ears.

When the announcement was made in 1990 that the government would produce an economic instrument document under the auspices of the green plan, we were very glad. It did not come out in 1991 as planned. It came out in May of 1992, as the member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo quite rightly indicated. When we saw it, it was a non-document, an insignificant catalogue.

One has to ask how on earth can we collect practical experience if we do not introduce the measures. What is the government waiting for?

The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona has proposed a good measure which he explained very well. In essence, it says that the $100 excise tax should be removed on cars which are free from chlorofluorocarbons for air conditioning. It is a beginning. It is a modest measure, but as the member indicated, it is a way of using the tax system to protect the environment and actually to enhance it. It is a way of meshing and integrating taxation with environmental goals.

When one does that, the answer is that it cannot be considered because we have little practical experience. So the question is: When are we going to get the experience?

Will the Minister of Finance in his statement tomorrow introduce some measures which will allow us to gather some experience? We will hold our breath, of course, but I doubt it very much. Because the experience has been over the past five years that every suggestion which has been made from the opposition benches to the Minister of Finance to introduce certain economic instruments from an environmental point of view have been happily ignored.

I am therefore asking what this government has on its agenda. What is its real green plan because when ideas are proposed they are rejected?

This evening, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona gave us a good example of meshing and integrating transport and the environment. In that respect he has done us a good deed, to use his vocabulary. He is saying we should use tax incentives to encourage and drive technological change. An incentive of that nature of course would encourage the buyer to favour a car which has an air conditioner that does not use chlorofluorocarbons.

• (1900)

We would not want to stop at that. We could introduce excise tax incentives in favour of cars with a lower number of cylinders and a higher performance per litre of gas and so on. This could also apply to the GST. The GST could be biased in favour of environmentally friendly products, from the bicycle to the canoe.

In other words, this concept could be applied in a variety of ways in a manner that would indicate what we are trying to do here is mesh environmental goals with taxation measures, with fiscal measures and with transportation activities using all possible instruments available.

Unfortunately this is not falling on receptive ears. The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona has given a leading practical application of the concept of sustainable development by meshing a taxation measure with a transport instrument.

As I said, it could be applied in a variety of ways within the transportation sector but you would not want to stop there. You could mesh environmental goals with energy policies. You could mesh environmental goals with agricultural programs. You could mesh environmental goals with any sector of programs and policies that governments have at any level. You could do the same within the jurisdiction of a municipality if you had a council that was inspired and committed to sustainable living and sustainable growth. You could do that at the provincial level as well as at the federal level.

The sky is the limit to the scope of practical applications that could be made in integrating environmental goals with the policies and programs that exist at all levels of government.

I see that my time is up. I would like to conclude by congratulating the member for Winnipeg Transcona for his fine idea and saying to the government it is high time to move from the rhetoric and preaching to the practical application of sustainable development if the government is really serious about it.

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to respond to the private member's motion requesting the removal of the excise tax on automobile air conditioners that do not use CFCs.

I support the motion as far as it goes. In fact just after I arrived here four years ago I considered bringing this sort of motion in myself because at first glance it looked like an excellent idea.

Certainly the idea of the change to automobile air conditioners that do not use CFCs is a good one. Unfortunately this particular motion cuts two ways because it also has an energy use element to it and the excise tax on air conditioning was originally brought into place to try to conserve the use of energy.

The removal of this tax, while it may benefit the environment in relation to the use of CFCs, does not necessarily benefit the environment when one considers the energy use side.

In my deliberations some time ago, I decided not to bring in a motion of this type because, as the member from Davenport said, we need to consider more than just this particular element in this motion.

Had it gone into several of the areas he mentioned, I would have supported it. I will come back to that subject at the end of my presentation. I want to first discuss some of the actions the Canadian government has already taken in the area of control of production and use of CFCs in the past and actions that will be taken in the future.

The federal government has taken a number of these important steps to address the issue of ozone depletion. In particular, the federal government has committed $25 million of green plan funds to address the ozone layer protection program. These funds support implementation of controls over ozone depleting substances as well as several research and monitoring initiatives.

I would like to take a few moments to elaborate on several specific initiatives that have been undertaken in this program. Under the ozone layer protection program, Canada has taken action to control ozone depleting substances, including CFCs. Under this program, a number of regulations have been introduced under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act including controls on CFCs.

Certain applications of CFCs are banned, including aerosols, small refillable cans and plastic foam food packaging. These regulations represent only one of the mechanisms used in Canada to reduce consumption of ozone depleting substances.

Environment Canada has also undertaken educational programs and extensive consultations with other levels of government, industry and environmental groups and the Canadian public. One of the outcomes of the consultation was the decision to target the phase out of ozone depleting substances by sector, including the phase out of the use of CFCs in automobile air conditioners by the 1995 model year.

In addition to these regulatory and non-regulatory measures to control ozone depleting substances, the ozone layer protection program provides a national action plan for the recovery, recycling, reclamation and destruction of ozone depleting substances.

The strategy proposed under the national action plan is to reduce CFC emissions by managing the existing supply through a comprehensive framework of education, regulation, political co-ordination and other incentives, thereby reducing the production of virgin ozone depleting chemicals.

In March of this year at a meeting of the Canadian ministers of environment, all jurisdictions committed to implementing the recovery and recycling program by the end of 1992. In addition to these actions on controlling ozone depleting substances, Canada is very active in research and monitoring activities relating to the ozone layer.

Earlier this year the Government of Canada announced the establishment of a permanent high Arctic ozone observatory on Ellesmere Island, which will contribute to domestic and international ozone research. Specifically intended to study Arctic depletion, the observatory will provide an increased understanding of how changing conditions are affecting Canada.

The observatory is also intended to create partnerships among Canadian universities and the international scientific community. In addition to the Arctic observatory, Canada is contributing to international research as a participant in a joint research prediction and impact program with the U.S., Japan, Europe, and the Commonwealth of Independent States.

In the area of monitoring, Environment Canada launched ozone watch in March of this year, which provides Canadians with a weekly report containing the most up-to-date information on the status of the ozone layer. In May of this year the UV advisory program was launched to provide daily information on the intensity of the sunlight's ultraviolet rays. Last month the federal government announced that the World Ozone Data Centre in Toronto will be expanded to include a new world data centre for ultraviolet radiation. The data collected will contribute to international scientific understanding of the relationship between UV radiation and the ozone layer.

The government is also committed to its strong and active participation in international activities designed to protect the ozone layer. Ozone depletion is a global problem that requires a global solution.

You may recall that Canada was the first country to ratify the 1985 convention on the protection of the ozone layer. The Vienna convention established a framework to protect the earth's upper atmosphere through co-operative international effort. Canada also played a key role in the development of the Montreal protocol to the Vienna convention. The Montreal protocol was the first accord of its kind and set up a global precedent for the safeguarding of both the environment and human health. Canada signed the Montreal protocol in 1987 and pledged to cut its use of ozone depleting chemicals in half by 1999.

In 1990 the parties to the Montreal protocol met in London, England, where they agreed to phase out CFCs by the year 2000. At this meeting Canada and 12 other nations further agreed to phase out CFCs by 1997, three years in advance of the revised protocol.

The fourth meeting of the parties to the Montreal protocol took place last week in Copenhagen. I am pleased to report that the treaty was strengthened for the second time. On the matter of the CFCs, the parties agreed to phase out 75 per cent of their use of CFCs by January 1, 1994, leading to a total phase out by January 1, 1996.

I am pleased to report that this government's ozone layer protection program is successfully achieving results. The Government of Canada announced that the country had achieved a 58 per cent decrease in CFC use by June 1992. This said, the scientific evidence regarding the ozone layer continues to be compelling.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize but your time has expired.

There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

WESTRAY MINE DISASTER

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, as the labour critic for the Liberal Party and following the tragedy at the Westray mine, I have received many letters from the families who have been affected by the events. I would like to read one of the letters. It is from Mr. David Sample, a draegerman:

> The inquiry is quashed, the federal government has voted four to two not to investigate the financing into Westray mine. Now the company wants to flood the evidence of the explosion. This reads like a cover-up.
> The top seven managers of Westray seem to have all the rights. What happened to the 26 men? Is this of little importance? When they died did their rights die with them? Are other miners going to die because it was or is against some people's constitutional rights to find out the truth?
> The wives of our deceased comrades were told in court by Westray lawyers that they have no legal standing as to whether or not the mine should be flooded. If they have no legal standing, who does?
> We the miners, draegermen, and the family members will not be pushed aside. We will be heard and will not let this issue go until our questions have been answered.

I ask this House to demand an inquiry into the Westray mine disaster.

TAXATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in a study on sustainable economic development published in November 1992 the Conseil du Patronat du Québec asked the federal government to drop a proposal in the 1991 Wilson budget whereby businesses would no longer be able to deduct provincial payroll taxes, which are used to finance health services, and provincial capital taxes from federal corporate income tax.

The Conseil du patronat commented that at a time when the economy is in bad shape, payroll taxes are a particularly regressive form of taxation because they mainly penalize labour intensive businesses. Implementation of this tax measure would inevitably result in a loss of jobs in Quebec.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the public hearings on the North American free trade deal are a complete sham. The government has failed to provide Canadians the opportunity to debate the future of our nation. These hearings have been intentionally structured to limit public debate and scrutiny of this trade package.

At the subcommittee hearings this week in Vancouver participants repeatedly rebuked the government for its blatant attempt to stifle debate and minimize opposition of this deal. Participants did not have time to prepare detailed critiques. They did not have time to adequately present them. They could not even get printed copies of the trade agreement.

During testimony the interpretation by the telecommunications workers' union of a particular chapter arose and, surprise, surprise, committee members could not even get a copy of the agreement to refer to.

During the referendum Canadians demanded opportunities to learn about and participate in purposeful debate. Once again, this government is selling Canadians short by keeping us in the dark on the rewriting of our economic constitution through the North American free trade agreement.

REPUBLIC OF SKOPJE

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, at the upcoming Council of Europe meeting in Edinburgh there could be a tendency toward reversing the Lisbon decision which states that the Republic of Skopje would not be recognized if it insisted on the use of the word Macedonia as its name.

Macedonia is a Greek name. It has always been part of the history of Greece and of the Greek people. It is not to be usurped by others including the Slavo-Albanian country of Skopje which has neither ethnological nor historical relation to Alexander the Great's Macedonia.

A reversal of the Lisbon agreement would not only be dangerous but would also wound the European Community's credibility and prestige. It would also loosen the solidarity among its numbers and create greater destabilization in the Balkans.

However, the compliance of Skopje with the Lisbon decision not to use the name Macedonia in its name would go a long way toward the establishment of security and friendly relationships between the two countries, Greece and Skopje. Let us hope this will be the case.

BREAST CANCER

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, this past Saturday, Jill Jackson passed away after a courageous battle with breast cancer. She was 33 years old.

A co-founder of Breast Cancer Action, Jill was determined to do something about this dreadful disease. Those who knew Jill talked about her tremendous energy and optimism, and about her efforts to ensure that the government not only agree with the June 1992 report of the status of women subcommittee on breast cancer but indeed act upon its recommendations.

Jill helped design the ribbon I am wearing today. The tear-drop shape represents the tears shed when we or our loved ones are diagnosed with breast cancer. The rose pink colour represents the 15,000 Canadians diagnosed with breast cancer each year and the black lining is in memory of the 5,000 women who lose their lives to this disease every year in Canada.

Today across Canada 40 women will be diagnosed with breast cancer and 12 will die. Thus, there are 52 families who are today devastated by this disease for which there is no prevention, no known cause, and for which the treatments currently being offered fail thousands of patients each year.

Breast cancer must be a national priority. In 30 years the probability of getting this disease has risen from one in 20 Canadian women to one in nine.

As Jill said: "The time for action is now".

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, yesterday The Toronto Star announced that a group of women were coming to Ottawa to prevent the Prime Minister from wearing the white ribbon symbolizing the campaign against violence against women. These women claim the government has not done enough to fight violence to earn the privilege of wearing that ribbon.

I would like to ask these women, who intend to invade the private residence of the Prime Minister and his family, where they were when the Prime Minister's own daughter was verbally assaulted in a local rag. Did any of these women come to Ottawa or demonstrate against this kind of humour, which is degrading and humiliating for all women?

An hon. member: Not one.

Mrs. Gibeau: Before accusing others, these women should make sure their position is consistent. I would urge them to show some compassion and support for their sisters before preaching to their brothers.

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the massive lay-offs at the Lingan and Phalen collieries in Cape Breton have resulted in 1,000 miners out of work just before the Christmas holidays.

Given the urgency of this situation, it is absolutely critical that the Government of Canada work with the provincial Government of Nova Scotia and assist the Cape Breton Development Corporation in getting the Donkin coal mine in operation.

As an international coal supplier Devco cannot afford to lose any of its market.

The Donkin mine was launched in 1980 at a cost to the federal treasury of approximately $55 million.

• (1410)

I call upon the minister responsible for the Cape Breton Development Corporation as well as the Minister of Employment and Immigration to open the Donkin mine immediately and to put a program in place to assist the displaced miners who are affected at the Lingan colliery, to clarify immediately when exactly these miners will be in receipt of the unemployment insurance benefits they so desperately need.

At the present time, these workers have been receiving conflicting information with regard to their unemployment insurance.

The situation is critical. On behalf of the miners and their families, I urge the minister responsible to process these claims and get some money out to these men and their families before the Christmas holiday season.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for the Environment has asked me to report to the House an unprecedented event that occurred last week in Aylmer, Quebec.

The federal government's green plan made commitments for protected spaces and species, including the completion of the national parks system by the year 2000 and the establishment of a national wildlife habitat network.

In the spring of 1991 there was a unanimous House of Commons resolution calling on the federal government to consider the advisability of preserving and protecting in its natural state at least 12 per cent of Canada by working co-operatively with the provincial and territorial governments and assisting them to complete the protected areas networks by the year 2000.

In support of the foregoing and in recognition of Canada's 125th anniversary the Canadian Council of Ministers of Environment, the Canadian Parks Ministers Council and the Wildlife Ministers Council of Canada met jointly for the first time ever.

They supported ratification of the biodiversity convention and agreed on a plan to develop the Canadian biodiversity strategy. They endorsed a statement of commitment to complete Canada's networks of protected areas.

This meeting of three councils of ministers received support in their actions from the Canadian Council of Forestry ministers and representatives of the four major aboriginal organizations in the country: the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, the Assembly of First Nations, the Native Council of Canada, and the Métis National Council.

The recurring theme throughout the session was the emphasis upon the need for co-operation and strong working relationships between all jurisdictions and interested parties.

CAROLINE TEGHISADEH

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, Canada is again deporting genuine Iranian refugees.

Last year it took a public outcry to prevent the removal of a woman who was flogged in Iran because she did not wear the traditional veil.

Now Caroline Teghisadeh faces removal on December 7 because the IRB disputes her claims of torture and does not consider sex discrimination a ground for refugee status.

Amnesty International, the European Parliament and the United Nations Human Rights Commission have condemned Iran for public flogging and stoning of women in accordance with the Iranian Penal Code.

Sixty-two United States senators have written to the UN Secretary-General, Boutros Boutros-Ghali, condemning these gross violations of human rights in Iran.

In view of this public information, I call on the immigration minister to intervene in Caroline Teghisadeh's case, stop her removal and land her in Canada.

I call on Canada's Parliament to protect women who have escaped from harsh discrimination against their sex.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, on Sunday I will be attending a candle light vigil at the Markham Peace Garden. I will be joining Jacquie Cushing-Dill and other people who have organized this annual vigil to honour the 14 women who were murdered in Montreal in December 1989.

All levels of government are working to tackle the insidious and widespread problem of abuse of innocent women. There is, however, much more to be done to alleviate the problem of violent and emotional abuse of women.

As a society, we must have zero tolerance for the mistreatment of women. We must eliminate this problem that touches the lives of so many Canadians.

My dream is that our daughters and granddaughters, the children of tomorrow, will be safer than our wives, sisters, mothers and children are today. We must not leave them with a legacy of brutal pain and violence.

INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister first ran for office, he promised Canadians jobs, jobs, jobs. However, it seems that what he really had in mind were lost jobs, lost jobs and more lost jobs.

In a speech two weeks ago the Prime Minister outlined a number of initiatives which he said would contribute to our prosperity. One such initiative would be to increase the budget of the National Research Council's Industrial Research Assistance Program. He said that this program has been judged an unqualified success especially for smaller firms and that it will be expanded.

This decision while welcome is long overdue. In 1985 the Neilsen report concluded that IRAP worked. Yet since then the program's budget has been frozen, its network of technology advisers cut back, and the real value of contributions to the private sector across Canada has declined by 30 per cent.

Seven years have gone by. Jobs, sales and exports have been lost. This is the real legacy of this government: lost jobs, lost sales and lost opportunities.

SMALL EXPLORERS AND PRODUCERS ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, the Small Explorers and Producers Association of Canada represents 300 firms involved in oil and gas exploration and development based in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

This group, known as SEPAC, approached the Progressive Conservative Alberta caucus some time ago with a proposal designed to help small operators take advantage of current changes in the upstream energy business. Alberta MPs worked closely with SEPAC to refine these proposals.

We are talking here about firms with from one to ten employees which are part of the entrepreneurial small business backbone of the nation. These are the kinds of businesses led by men and women who are not afraid to take risks which will generate jobs for Canadians, generate wealth for a nation, and help lead this country into a strong and resilient recovery.

My colleagues from Alberta and I call upon the Minister of Finance to respond positively to these proposals in his comments later today.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GUN CONTROL

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

As we approach the third anniversary of the Ecole Polytechnique massacre we must recognize that our gun control laws are still seriously inadequate. Last year the number of Canadians killed with hand-guns doubled from the previous year.

Last week the mayors of Canada's largest cities recommended that the regulations on hand-guns be substantially tightened. They made specific recommendations including an operational principle that when in doubt officers issuing gun permits should say no.

To respond to the 80 per cent of Canadians who want better protection against firearm violence, will the minister implement the excellent recommendations made by Canadian mayors last week?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think the comments made by the mayors and in fact their ongoing contribution to this file have been very constructive and very helpful.

With respect, I think the measure they are recommending to be put in place can quite properly be put in place by the provinces. It is not something that requires legislative change. In fact it is not something that really lends itself to a legislative or regulatory formulation although I am happy to examine that.

It is my view that it is more properly within the domain of the provinces. I am quite prepared to raise that with my provincial counterparts when I meet with them about a month from now.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the minister is quite correct in that this is a regulatory or administrative matter, and I would appreciate her taking some leadership.

The three handguns used in killing four professors at Concordia University last August demonstrate the continuing weakness of our present laws. Two of those hand-guns belonged to the killer's wife who obtained them for target shooting and then gave them to her husband. The third belonged to the killer who had also been issued a permit, although he had been refused on two previous occasions. Concordia University had warned the police about his threats.

Is the minister satisfied this is the best we can do in preventing violence with guns? There is overwhelming evidence that where guns are less available there is less crime with guns.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, not all of the legislation and regulatory measures that this House has worked so hard in creating have been fully implemented.

The provisions with respect to the new firearms acquisition certificate and the capacity for very intense screening there, for example, will come into force on January 1.

What I am trying to do as a first priority is to get all those provisions implemented so that the gun control regime in Canada is what Canadians think it is, so that it corresponds exactly to what they have read about in Bill C-17 and its regulations. At that point I am very happy to look to see if there are other things we might do to make the system work better.

I know the hon. member would agree from his long experience with this file that it is an ongoing issue that has to be dealt with in the light of changing aspects of Canadian society. I will certainly continue to address it as minister.

[Translation]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, according to a recent study 47 per cent of women murdered by their husbands were killed with a firearm, and 70 per cent of those firearms were legally obtained by these criminals.

• (1420)

Is the minister satisfied with this intolerable situation? Can she give us one good reason why an ordinary citizen who is not a policeman or a member of the armed forces can legally own and use a revolver? If not, why will the minister not accept the excellent recommendations made by the mayor of Montreal and other Canadian mayors?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, if I am not mistaken, the mayors did not recommend an outright ban on hand-guns. I agree that firearms are a problem where family violence is concerned.

[English]

In my opinion the provisions we have put into the legislation dealing with peace bonds and bail hearings in order to provide powers for the courts to make prohibitions of the possession of firearms in any circumstance, particularly the circumstance of domestic violence where somebody is seeking a restraining order or peace bond, I think will go a very long way toward taking firearms out of those very dangerous situations.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Justice. The minister will know that youth crime has increased by 20 per cent in the past five years and in fact youth violent crime has doubled in that same period.

The minister has for more than a year been speaking with attorneys general across Canada to develop some changes to the Young Offenders Act. She promised that we would have these changes by September. It is now December and these amendments have not been brought forward. When is the minister going to bring forward much needed amendments to this very important legislation?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is a source of regret for me in this file and a number of others that the business of this House and the business of the government were interrupted by the referendum process, a necessary process but one which unfortunately drew attention away from some of the other ongoing files we were dealing with.

Obviously there is very little time left in this sitting to enable us to do this, but I hope in the spring to be able to do this. I will be announcing in coming days a very important national consultative process with respect to community safety and crime prevention that I hope will contribute measurably to the quality of what we bring forward with respect to young offenders and other issues concerning the safety of Canadians in their communities.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, we have been waiting two years for these amendments. While we did have the referendum with which to deal the House was not sitting and surely that would have given the department more time to work on this.

Also the important initiative the minister talks about is in March. If that was an excuse, which it is not, then that initiative would certainly be more relevant if they had something to consider.

We should not have to wait till the spring for these important changes. Canadians are concerned that they are losing the fight against crime. They want to be able to protect their homes and their streets. When is the minister going to realize that and do something to bring forward more meaningful legislation to deal with this problem?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I will bring forward measures for this House to consider as soon as I am convinced I have measures that are the best considered and the best reasoned measures that will actually do something to change the situation in Canadian society and not simply satisfy those with an urge to make rhetoric on that subject.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I understand that later this afternoon the Minister of Finance will make an economic statement to this House. Certainly Canada is in great need of hope when we see 1.6 million unemployed, 2.3 million people using food banks, and one in six of Canada's children living in poverty.

There is a tendency to blame the Minister of Finance for this solely, but a disastrous record like this takes a team effort to achieve so I would like to ask the Minister of Transport a question.

He will understand, I am sure, that the economic base of any country is an adequate transportation system to move our goods not just north and south, as his policies seem to indicate, but east and west and to the north.

When is the Minister of Transport prepared to bring forward a policy on transportation for this country not based on the crisis of the day, on the airlines, or on wiping out jobs in the rail sector, but a real transportation policy for this country on which the economic base can be built?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe our transportation policy does provide that the transportation industry must give Canadians a system that is effective, reliable, competitive and safe.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is clear the Minister of Transport does not have a vision for transportation in this country.

I would like to direct a supplementary question to the minister of trade. There is no doubt about the results of the Canada–U.S. trade deal. The statistics indicate that we have 350,000 more people out of work. There are plants closing and there are many effects of the trade deal on Canada. Yet the minister persists on proceeding with taking Canada into a NAFTA deal, taking the bad Canada–U.S. trade deal and making it worse. This is a strategy which is designed to move jobs out of Canada and to make it more accessible simply for capital.

When is the minister of trade prepared to bring in a trade policy based on job creation, not job loss?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised my hon. friend would ask that question. Yesterday the House in a resounding fashion approved the trade policy of this government which is to bring in the free trade agreement and then the NAFTA.

If my hon. friend would read the speech that I made in the House yesterday she would see that I said the exports to the United States as a result of the free trade agreement had resulted in an increase in exports this year of some 10.5 per cent. I do not know what sort of arithmetic my hon. friend would use if she cannot translate that 10.5 per cent increase in exports this year over last year and the $16 billion plus that we have had since the free trade agreement came in.

Every billion dollars of increased exports represent 15,000 new jobs. That is 225,000 new jobs. That is a job creating trade policy.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that Canadians are much less interested in reading the hon. minister's speech than they are in having jobs. If the minister would go across this country he would see the job loss and the devastation being caused in this country because of the trade deal.

[Translation]

I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. The Prime Minister told us that the basic elements of his economic plan are in place. The Minister of Transport says that deregulation is working. The minister of trade says that free trade is working. My question is: If all these things are working well, where are the jobs?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member noticed, there has been growth in job creation in six of the last seven months. Full-time jobs are being created though not at the pace we would like them to grow.

I want to remind the hon. member of a number of things. "Canada is seen leading the G-7 growth" and "Economy starts to speed up", those are the kinds of stories that are happening now as a result of some of the measures we have taken at the federal level.

Later this afternoon the Minister of Finance will deliver an economic statement that I am sure in one hour's time the hon. member will be applauding.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Dr. Stephen Schondelmeyer, a world renowned economist, testified:

> The cumulative cost of Bill C-91 from 1993 to year 2000 will be $4 to $7 billion for each and every penny coming from the taxpayers and health care systems in Canada.

How can the minister possibly pretend that he is protecting Canadian consumers when he is nothing short of an accomplice in a $7 billion drug heist?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, it is surprising that the opposition parties, which are always against free trade and the North American agreement, have used two Americans, one yesterday and another one today, to give Canadians a lesson.

In fact the Canadian system in place since 1987, with the foundation we put in place, lets Canadians have drugs for a third less than the Americans pay.

• (1430)

What we have maintained with our very strict controls on drug prices will be reinforced as a result of the new powers being given to the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board, which means that from now on controls will be even tighter.

In the United States, the Americans are looking at setting up a system like ours, including a drug prices review board, and appropriate legislation is now being considered. I invite the Americans to keep looking at what we are doing and benefit from our experience.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister for International Trade. In exchange for giving $7 billion from the health care system in Canada this government has received only vague and unenforceable promises of some future investment by these multinational companies.

Why has the Minister for International Trade caved in to the multinational drug lobby in Washington, and why is a Canadian minister more concerned about the profits of these companies in Washington than he is with the integrity of the Canadian health care system?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is wallowing in such an incredible amount of misinformation about this legislation with his use of that $7 billion figure. He knows that the experts from the Department of Industry, Science and Technology have refuted that figure and last night gave the committee point by point reasons why that $7 billion figure is totally out of reality.

My hon. friend has not referred to this, but we also tabled last night a study which stated that the increased cost of the drugs would be $129 million over a five-year period.

Just to give my hon. friend some sense, and you, Mr. Speaker, about some of the—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I just wanted to make sure I was addressing the Chair. There is an article in The Toronto Star today by Dalton Camp. He refers to increases in drug prices on about half a dozen drugs. Not one of the drugs mentioned is subject to patent protection. All of them are off patent protection.

That is the difficulty we have in getting the true message out about why this legislation is good for the country, will create jobs, create research and development and will result in protection on price.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, according to the terms of the loan agreement between the government and Canadian Airlines the government has demanded of Canadian Airlines that it restructure its finances, meet with the government and with Air Canada, and permit a representative of the government to sit in on its board meetings.

My question for the minister is this: What is the government doing to address the structural problems in this industry that prevent the companies from being profitable?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have been very clear on this. A certain number of the problems experienced by our airlines over the past few years are exactly similar to the problems experienced by all airline companies around the world.

I mentioned in my statement last Thursday that we are examining the possibilities to make sure that after Canadian Airlines has restructured we will be in a position to put in place some calibration of the situation so that we can maintain a viable airline industry in Canada.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, if the minister thinks that the problems of the airline industry are going to be self-correcting he should not have put taxpayers' money at risk.

The minister talks about—and he used the word again today—recalibrating the regulatory framework. When is he going to stop using this bureaucratic mumbo-jumbo and translate it into plain language and real action?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, again the hon. member, I presume not deliberately, is trying to mislead the Canadian taxpayers by saying that we have put money at risk. He pretends that he has seen the loan conditions. If he has seen the loan conditions he should be telling the Canadian taxpayers that their government has taken care of their interests.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

This year a lot of the grain produced on the prairies was frozen. Farmers are having difficulty with crop insurance because the value of that frozen grain is only about 60 per cent of what the coverage level was. The farmers have mostly produced the right volume; it is only a grade loss crop insurance should be paying. Crop insurance is offering 17 cents when the loss is more like 40 cents.

Can the minister report to the House any progress he has made in getting that loss ratio more realistic than what crop insurance is offering.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, and I agree it was and is a difficult year in grain production, one province removed protection for revenue insurance. Other provinces, Alberta and Manitoba in particular, have that protection. Each province has a contract that has a formula for assessing the quality loss under crop insurance.

The province of Saskatchewan put forward a suggestion that we change that contract retroactively. It would cost the Government of Canada some $60 million and the Government of Saskatchewan, $20 million. Saskatchewan also suggested that we should pass that on to the farmers in the form of higher premiums over a number of years.

I remind my colleague that not all farmers in Saskatchewan have suffered a quality loss. We have attempted to work with the province of Saskatchewan. I will provide $40 million in a yield protection program if the province will join us in making a contribution so that we can assist the producers in Saskatchewan. Alberta and Manitoba producers do not appear to have the same problem.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, a short supplementary.

The minister will know that very little of Manitoba's crop was frozen. Alberta still has the problem. The crop insurance program is what we are talking about. That was not changed by Saskatchewan.

The minister should remember that these farmers, most of them in northern Saskatchewan received the frost but it did go into the south, have been paying their premiums for years and years and watching the benefits of those premiums go south into the drought zone. This is the first year most of these people have had a loss. They will barely collect their premiums back and he is telling us this is fair.

The only loss they have, and it is not going to change the loss register for those farmers a great deal, is on the yield. It is not a huge loss to the whole program but it is about $20 an acre or more to each of them. They have been paying assiduously into the program and never taking anything out of it. The first year they need insurance the minister disappears on them. Why does he not change it and make sure that 100 per cent of coverage is paid when they have 100 per cent loss? He is reducing it by $20.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggests that there were not any changes in crop insurance from 1991 to 1992. I would suggest to the hon. member that going from 100 per cent coverage under GRIP down to 80 per cent coverage under crop insurance is a dramatic change.

Contracts were sold with a formula for quality insurance in crop insurance. I have offered, with the province of Saskatchewan, another way of addressing loss. The province of Saskatchewan is suggesting the way to address loss is to have us retroactively change the contract formula again and the federal government provide $60 million and the provincial government provide $20 million.

I am prepared to discuss changes with the provincial government so that the producers in Saskatchewan can have a program that gives them insurance and protection when they need it.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Associate Minister of National Defence.

The minister's advisory board on women in the Canadian Forces reported last week saying: "Harassment has been reported by women everywhere in the Canadian Forces". Is the minister, at the very least, prepared to implement the recommendations of that board today?

• (1440)

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the members of that advisory committee. I specifically asked them to look into the issue of harassment, not just sexual harassment but broader issues relating to personal harassment and abuse of power. Their recommendations are going to be very helpful to us.

We have already put in place a number of changes that respond to those recommendations and over the coming months we will be addressing the majority of them.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the women in the Canadian forces and women across Canada need something a little more concrete than that. To quote from the report itself: "The message that sexual harassment is unacceptable still has not been effectively transmitted to all male personnel after three years of a policy that clearly does not work".

Will the minister tell us what she plans to do? Does she plan to implement these recommendations or does she have another plan of action that will deal this dreadful situation a death blow and stop the at least 40 phone calls a day I have been getting from women in the Canadian Armed Forces?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the Chief of the Defence Staff has recently sent out a message to all armed forces personnel dealing with the issue of sexual and personal harassment, indicating this is not acceptable and that we are taking strong measures to deal with it.

Some of those measures include mandatory education for all of our personnel within air command and the establishment of independent assistance, people to whom personnel can go to lay a complaint. It is dealing with a whole new policy which we are bringing forward in terms of enforcement and monitoring.

There are major changes taking place that are going to ensure that women and all members of the armed forces can operate in an environment that is free from all forms of harassment. Our goal is zero tolerance and we are going to achieve it.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works.

All traffic lanes over the Lockport, Manitoba, lock and dam will be closed January 4. That closure would mean certain decimation of the business community of Lockport and threaten over 400 jobs.

To prevent this disaster emergency repairs are needed now. It was understood that repairs could be made immediately if the province of Manitoba committed itself to negotiate with Ottawa on the federal divestiture of the bridge and dam.

I would like to ask the minister whether Manitoba has made this commitment.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we had the privilege of meeting with the Minister of Highways for Manitoba, Mr. Driedger, and other important officials from his province. I understand there will be a meeting taking place tomorrow with my colleague the minister of energy and the premier.

I can assure him that ongoing discussions are taking place. The preliminary engineering work is being done and I think we can reach a mutually satisfactory arrangement soon.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. As far as we are concerned, Manitoba has already made its commitment and we are asking the minister to live up to his.

I have a letter which states that Manitoba is willing to consider federal divestiture and that it has promised to enter into meaningful negotiations, as requested by the federal Minister of Public Works. To me, Manitoba has met its commitment and repairs should now proceed. I ask the minister again, will he keep his commitment?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any question about us keeping our commitment. Of course we will. However, I have just told my colleague that there will be talks going on tomorrow and that preliminary engineering work is going on. I see no basis, frankly, for the tenor of the question at this time.

PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Canadians everywhere are constantly sickened by the stories of sexual abuse of children. There is strong evidence all over the place that sexual abusers manifest these deviant tendencies very early in their lives and that most of these behaviour patterns are well set by the time the abusers reach their adolescent years.

It is also very evident that adolescent perverts or deviant sex offenders feed off pornography. I would like to ask the justice minister today just what steps we are taking to completely stop child and kiddy pornography and what has happened to Bill C-51 that was passed a few years ago to deal with pornography.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member means Bill C-51 or Bill C-15 relating to the sexual abuse of children.

I think it is Bill C-15, which was legislation proclaimed in 1988 which created new Criminal Code offences relating to the sexual abuse of children. Part of that legislation called for a review five years later. The Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General is reviewing that legislation now. I am looking forward to its report on whether it has been implemented in any province. It may suggest new legislative initiatives.

With respect to child pornography, the hon. member will know that the Butler decision of the Supreme Court of Canada held that even explicit sexual representations that would not normally be considered pornographic would qualify as the undue exploitation of sex if they employ children in their production. That has expanded the scope of the existing law which referred to child pornography. I am now examining provisions I would like to go into the Criminal Code to make possession of such pornography an offence in and of itself.

INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. Regarding the elimination of interprovincial barriers to the free movement of people and goods, despite the failure of the Charlottetown constitutional accord the minister said that he intended to pursue the objectives set out in that accord and to eliminate trade barriers by 1995.

Will the conference this week in Toronto of the minister's provincial counterparts be exploratory or will it make decisions on eliminating certain trade barriers? Also, could the results of this conference have an effect on labour force mobility and therefore influence the conference of employment ministers on labour force training in January?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my colleague is correct. We are going to be having a meeting starting tomorrow with the Federal-Provincial Committee on Internal Trade to study this very issue.

I think the issue has a good deal of support among the provinces as well as many in the private sector. Our approach tomorrow is not necessarily to reach decisions. Where we can I hope that we will, but our approach is to try to see whether there is a way of dealing with the comprehensive nature of these interprovincial barriers and to deal with them within the time frame that the first ministers have indicated this past month that they would like us to.

On the question of labour mobility, my guess is that there would be some limited discussion on this but certainly no decision making and nothing that would conflict with decisions or considerations at the meeting in January.

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post and it is in relation to Canada Post communication plans on regional postal outlets.

The document talks about putting service at risk in rural areas, reducing many small businesses postal revenues by up to 13 per cent and 300 businesses refusing the new arrangements while others will go under.

Why in these tough economic times is Canada Post hurting small businesses and putting service at risk in many rural areas?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what document the member has but I can assure the House that Canada Post is continuing with its program of opening some 6,000 new retail postal outlets to better serve its customers. Indeed, there is a line-up of applications from small businesses desiring to have a postal outlet in their business because it attracts customers to their store. It is something on which surveys by the post office have indicated a 90 per cent approval rating.

I am not sure why the hon. member would be opposed to something approved by 90 per cent of the users and for which small businesses are literally knocking on the door to have.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the minister is closing his eyes to the reality of the situation.

My question is for the same minister. According to Canada Post's own discussion paper, by making retail postal operators responsible for their own inventories and freight costs this policy will lead to the elimination of up to 300 of these independent retail operators and drastically reduce incomes of the survivors.

• (1450)

Since the government knows that small business creates most of the new jobs in Canada, why is it allowing Canada Post to proceed with a policy that will force retail outlets out of business while increasing the financial hardships for small businesses, particularly in rural communities where service will be cut?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, service will not be cut. Obviously, the member had his question prepared before he heard my answer to his colleague.

The post office is opening 6,000 new postal outlets and small businesses are literally knocking on the door asking to be included. There is no question that the nature of some of the operations is being changed. If the hon. member has checked into any of these new franchise operations he will see that they have changed physically. They are much more attractive, and customers to the tune of 90 per cent plus like the new system.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and it concerns RCMP recruitment policies.

In his 1992 report, the Auditor General criticized these policies saying: "We estimate that training and salary costs were almost $2 million for members who left the force during 1989 and 1990 for reasons such as poor interpersonal skills, immaturity, lack of assertiveness and low learning ability".

What specific actions is the RCMP taking to correct these inefficient and costly recruitment procedures?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am appearing in the House today on behalf of my colleague, the Solicitor General. I think a question of that sort is a question that is more appropriate for me to take on notice on behalf of the Solicitor General who will provide an answer to the hon. member at the earliest convenience.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. minister for her undertaking.

The Auditor General has also recommended that the RCMP require applicants to know first aid, swimming, CPR, computer skills and take some basic college courses before they are accepted for basic training. He has stated that this measure could save Canadians between half a million and one and a half million dollars in training costs.

I would ask the hon. minister to inquire as well whether the RCMP is going to implement these cost-saving measures. If so, when, particularly in view of these tough economic times?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, particularly in light of the statement to be made today by the Minister of Finance, I know my colleague the Solicitor General would be grateful for any recommendations to reduce costs in the RCMP.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

In the role of the Prime Minister as the minister responsible for the conflict of interest code, the Prime Minister's own appointee in cabinet in the other place has confirmed the hiring of a lobbyist on contract for the government at the same time as the lobbyist in question was lobbying the government on behalf of the communications giant, Unitel.

This is in clear contravention of the conflict of interest rules and the Treasury Board guidelines. I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister: What does the Prime Minister intend to do to ensure that his appointees in cabinet respect his own guidelines?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the conflict of interest code is applicable to public office holders, not to contractors of the government.

However, as a matter of practice, professional service contracts in these circumstances normally contain a clause requiring those engaged in the course of carrying out the contract to conduct themselves in accordance with the principles of the conflict of interest code. Such a clause was included in the contract with N. J. Jamieson Strategic Consulting. There is nothing to suggest any of the code's principles have been breached in this circumstance.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister will table that document.

I want to ask a supplementary in response to what he has said. I quote here from the contracting manual of Treasury Board: "The particular clause must be included in every contract for the services of an individual 'Personal Services Contract' in regard to conflict of interest". Therefore, the conflict of interest code does apply. It says so in the minister's own rules.

What is this minister and what is this government going to do to ensure that the rules are obeyed for once?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as I said in my answer to the first question, such a clause was included in the contract. There was no breach of the rules whatever, no breach of the conflict of interest guidelines.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the minister responsible for inland waterways and fisheries.

The minister is aware of the proposal by the Government of Ontario to situate a huge mega dump to take all of metro Toronto's garbage in Georgina. The proposed site is located on prime agricultural land less than two kilometres from the shores of Lake Simcoe. Besides its devastating impact on the environment this proposal would also have a very negative effect on tourism in the area.

The underground and surface water from this area flows directly to the delicate, sensitive spawning grounds in the lake. Will the minister assure this House that a federal evaluation will be undertaken and that every possible effort will be made by the federal government to stop this proposal and eliminate the potential risk of destroying the fish habitat in this federally regulated, highly crucial body of water in southern Ontario, Lake Simcoe?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I suppose we will be lucky if, by the time the Government of Ontario is finished, the whole province is not a megadump.

With respect to the hon. member's question, I know the hon. member is very concerned about preserving the purity of the site in question. I am advised that when the final selection of funds is made it is going to be submitted to a full environmental review by the province of Ontario.

As we all know, when the NDP is out of power it is a tremendous exponent of environmental reviews. So I do not see how the Government of Ontario could fail to have an environmental review. When it does, we will be vigilant under the Fisheries Act to ensure that there are no negative impacts on fish or fish habitat.

We will certainly do our duty. I thank the hon. member for keeping us informed of what is happening in his area. We shall certainly do our best to stop Ontario from becoming a mega dump.

B.C. SALMON FISHERY

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

As the minister knows, the B.C. salmon catch was half the average of the past three years. The canning season was the worst in decades, the pink run came in $13 million below expectations and the Fraser River was closed three weeks early. Some 1,500 fishermen, shoreworkers and tendermen do not even qualify for UI.

Has the minister considered offering for the west coast a program in terms similar to his November 25 Atlantic emergency response for UI qualifications?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, as you know, when necessary there is an emergency response failure program that can go into effect to deal with catch failure situations.

There has been no catch failure situation in British Columbia this year, thank heavens. Although this is a low cycle year, I believe it is the best year in 80 years in a low cycle year, particularly with reference to the sockeye salmon.

There has been no fishery failure. There is a problem that certain workers did not get the necessary 17 weeks work which they need to qualify for UI in the lower mainland because of the lower unemployment rate there.

Since there is no indication of catch failure in any of the four major Pacific fisheries I believe that the conclusion is that there can be no emergency response program. That situation is not comparable at all to the situation on the east coast of Canada where there have not only been catch failures but no fish at all, in connection with the northern cod moratorium.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, with answers like that, they will consign the large portion of the Tory caucus to that mega dump.

The Pearse–Larkin inquiry into the alleged disappearance of up to 1.2 million Fraser River sockeye was due to report to the minister by November 15 last. Can the minister assure the House that the report will be made public and made available to the fisheries committee prior to the proposed rising of the House on December 11?

• (1500)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the report of Dr. Pearse and Dr. Larkin, it has been received and is, of course, now being translated.

The report is a first–class piece of work in my opinion. It certainly explains what happened with respect to the Fraser River this summer.

I intend to be in Vancouver on Monday at which time the Pearse–Larkin report will be made public. Dr. Pearse and Dr. Larkin will be available to answer questions, as will I. I will give the reaction of the Government of Canada with respect to their report. I think the hon. member will find it a very interesting report.

The situation, of course, is not nearly as bad as had been painted during the summer. Nevertheless, there are steps to be taken to ensure that nothing of this sort occurs again next year.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

The minister knows that tens of thousands of farmers are facing the worst cropping conditions in a generation. For instance, 90 per cent of Ontario's corn crop is still in the fields and this is December.

Is the minister willing to respond to the representations he has received from the Ontario Corn Producers and other groups to provide interest-free cash advances up to 50 per cent for unharvested grain, the same as grain in a bin?

Is the minister willing to provide this assistance to these producers who are facing a most desperate situation this fall?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I recognize the difficulties my colleague brings forward. We have had discussions with the Ontario Corn Producers. As my colleague knows, in the prairie cash advance payments program there is recognition for unthrashed grain left in the field after November 15. There is a cash advance that can be made on unthrashed grain.

Unfortunately, we do not have legislation under the Advance Payments for Crops Act for Ontario that is equivalent. I am working to try to have equivalency through the commodity group, the Ontario Corn Producers, that would provide equal opportunity for those producers who have not been able to thrash their grain, but yet still encourage taking grain off if possible.

POINTS OF ORDER

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would just like to comment on a statement by the New Democratic Party.

It was complaining that a text is not available for the NAFTA. I would like to advise the House that since the House leader of the New Democratic Party raised this point in the House texts are available through Info-Export for anybody in the House or others who wish one.

CAROLINE TEGHISADEH

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I rise to correct part of the statement I made during statements by members concerning Ms. Teghisadeh of Iran.

When I sat down, I received a phone call saying that the minister had intervened last night on her behalf to land her. I congratulate the minister on his exercise of compassion.

The phone call was late after my statement because the minister's information to Ms. Teghisadeh's lawyer came after my statement and the phone call to me followed on that.

I thank the minister very much for his action.

PETITIONS

FRESHWATER EXPORTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents.

The petitioners point out that agricultural goods are included under the FTA. They also point out that section 22.01 indicates that water is in fact a clear element as part of the FTA agreement on which NAFTA is based. They point out that from their determination NAFTA includes FTA and FTA includes water as part of the trade deal.

Therefore, they are asking the Canadian government to reintroduce legislation that would prohibit the transfer of inner basin water to the United States.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition signed by a number of constituents. They point out that Canada ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and has a moral obligation to seek the elimination of child poverty in Canada.

The petitioners go on to say that the success of political commitment to eliminate child poverty in Canada requires public commitment and initiative among broad sectors of the Canadian population at local and national levels.

They call on the government to take the actions necessary to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I also have the pleasure of introducing a petition before this House which calls upon Parliament to take the actions necessary to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

ILLEGAL DRUGS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to present three additional petitions, three of many that have come from my riding of York West, which address the drug plague that is unfortunately in the middle of communities in Toronto and across the country.

The petitioners call on the government to amend the Narcotics Control Act so that all the assets that are seized from drug seizures not only flow back to general revenues in Ottawa, but are shared with front-line operations like police forces and local organizations which are on the front lines of that battle in the hope that we will win the war.

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I welcome this opportunity to table a petition on behalf of the Armenian community in my riding and also on behalf of other residents of Montreal, Laval and Pointe-Claire. Further to a resolution passed by the Quebec National Assembly to acknowledge the importance of the anniversary of the Armenian genocide, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the government to express its sympathy to the Armenian people, and especially to Canadians of Armenian origin who servived the genocide of April 24, 1915, and to support international pressure on the Turkish government to acknowledge the events of April 24, 1915.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from a number of constituents.

The petition notes that Bill C-91 seeks to end the licensing of further no name generic drugs in Canada and also will allow brand name drug companies patent protection for up to 20 years. It also notes that Bill C-22 which allows 10 years of patent protection has already driven up prices of drugs to individuals and provincial and private drug plans.

They therefore call upon Parliament not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22 passed in 1987 so that Canadians will have the full benefit of lower priced generic drugs and so that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees or provide less coverage.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, a second petition notes that at the present time the Income Tax Act allows self-employed professionals and business people to make deductions for operating expenses and the improvement of their offices or businesses, but unfairly refuses to allow teachers deductions for the expenses which they incur in order to better their teaching abilities.

They therefore call on the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue to amend the present Income Tax Act to allow teachers and educational institutions to deduct the cost of their expenses in the course of their employment.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would like to table a petition from residents of Val-d'Or, Amos, Vassan, Sullivan, Val-Senneville and Saint-Edmond-d'Abitibi, stating that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and unacceptable because they encourage further violence.

They also point out that all toys that are an incentive to violent games are unacceptable and that production of such toys should be banned. Freedom of the press should be restricted when reporting acts of violence. The repeated reporting of acts of violence on all television channels and on radio may encourage similar acts of violence.

Therefore the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass legislation dealing with the above, to wipe out violence in our society, protect our children and guarantee everyone in this country a better quality of life.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

REFUGEES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, this petition concerns refugees who are suffering from personal economic hardship. Many of these refugees come from unstable Third World countries and they are trapped in the immigration processing backlog.

These petitioners are calling on Parliament to urge the government to exercise compassion and step up its action on refugee cases.

FRESHWATER EXPORTS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I have another in a long series of petitions. This one is signed by residents throughout British Columbia and Alberta who are concerned about the proposal by Multinational Resources to dam a portion of the flow of the North Thompson River and to divert that water through the Columbia River system into the California market.

These petitioners urge the government to state categorically that it will not permit our freshwater rivers to be dammed and diverted into the U.S.A. or into Mexico. It asks the government to state categorically that Canadian waters are not for sale.

IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to present a petition signed by 111 people in the Trinity—Spadina area and nearby who are concerned with many of the proposed amendments to the Immigration Act in Bill C-86. In particular, they strongly oppose the provisions that allow decisions to be made retroactively. This would cause many individuals and families who have already relied on earlier decisions to be affected in a serious manner.

Therefore, the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to withdraw these amendments.

REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I have a further petition from 59 people in the Toronto area who are very concerned with some of the decisions being rendered by the refugee board.

The petitioners point to UN decisions and UN guarantees of refugee status determination under the UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights which requires that their rights be guaranteed without discrimination.

In accordance with UN principles, they call upon Parliament to enact legislation which would provide a meaningful appeal on the merits for refugee claimants whose cases are rejected so that they have appeal rights comparable with everyone else in Canada.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): My final petition, Madam Speaker, is from over 30 people who are concerned that there may be too long delays for people who are detained by immigration authorities. The petitioners ask for legislation which would provide for a detention review by an adjudicator within 48 hours, and with two further reviews conducted at least once in each of the next seven day periods and thereafter at least once every 30 days so as to ensure that no one is detained without unequivocal proof that he or she is a danger to the public or would not appear for immigration proceedings.

CORRECTIONS CANADA

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Madam Speaker, the petition I am presenting today concerns Corrections Canada's announcement that one of four new prisons for women will be in the Kitchener–Waterloo area. I must say thousands of people have signed this petition.

The petitioners protest this decision primarily because of the failure of Corrections Canada to consult with the immediate community where that prison is going to be located.

They call upon Parliament to urge the government to move the proposed women's correctional facility to a location that will provide a more harmonious existence between any community and this particular correction facility. I will repeat that there are thousands of signatures of people who will be directly affected by the location of this prison.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty and pleasure to present a petition from a number of people throughout British Columbia and Alberta, and as a matter of fact from Ottawa, Ontario.

These people have one thing in common. They are all concerned about the intention of diverting waters from Canada into the United States, and particularly the North Thompson River diversion and the U.S. proposal under the North America Water and Power Alliance to divert Canadian waters into the United States and northern Mexico.

The petitioners are asking the government to make very clear its position that it will not allow the diversion of freshwater rivers into the United States or the damming of these rivers for diversion and to indicate to everybody that freshwater rivers are not for sale.

POVERTY

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I have petitions from the communities of Bruno, Wakaw, Cudworth and surrounding districts which point out that poverty of Canadian children will yield ever–increasing costs to the administration of health care, justice and social welfare, and poverty among children inhibits learning and preparation for employment constituting a cost to future national productivity.

The petitioners point out that Canada ratified a United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and has a moral obligation to seek the elimination of child poverty in Canada and calls upon the government to develop such a plan for immediate implementation.

BILL C–91

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by over 600 people from my constituency protesting the introduction of Bill C–91, the drug patent bill.

The petitioners are appalled that this government would be ramming through a bill which will cost Canadian consumers, particularly the sick, at least $6 billion over the next 10 years in exchange for some vague promises of a few jobs in a few places for a few people.

Therefore, the petitioners call upon parliamentarians to not proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22 passed in 1987 so that Canadians will have the full benefit of lower-priced generic drugs and so that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees or provide less coverage.

• (1520)

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, this government likes to brag about what it is doing for rural Canadians with respect to postal service and it is saying that rural Canadians appreciate that service. Well, that is not the case.

Certainly not in the town of Outlook, Saskatchewan, in my riding, where approximately 150 people have signed this petition because they are upset with Canada Post's policy of only providing residents of rural communities free delivery at the post office nearest to their place of residence. They say that this ignores the fact that for many rural residents the nearest post office to where they live may not be the easiest post office to travel to and may not be in the community where they conduct their other business.

They say this is a ludicrous policy. It does not cost Canada Post any extra money to allow people to go to the post office of their choice.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1992, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon our country and this Parliament open an important debate on the future course of economic policy. In these times of challenge and opportunity, it is most appropriate that full discussion be undertaken by all members of this House.

Parliament is where the diversity and complexity of Canada are brought together in one place by the representatives of the people from every region. This is where differing political and philosophical approaches can be put forward for public consideration.

Over the next two days I expect all members opposite to state clearly and directly what their proposals for economic policy would be. Canadians expect this of us and they deserve no less.

For my part, I will make it abundantly clear where the government stands. I will provide to the House and to the country an update on Canada's fiscal and economic situation, and I will announce a number of measures to contain the deficit and to enhance economic recovery.

This debate occurs at a time when our economy is undergoing profound change. A new economy is emerging around the world, offering new opportunities that require adjustment and restructuring.

In this environment, Canadians are seeking greater security and greater economic opportunity, for themselves and for their children. That is the overriding goal of our economic policies.

Our economic policy is to build confidence, enhance growth, create jobs, and help Canadians adjust to this period of transition and take advantage of new opportunities.

All of our efforts have been directed at investing in growth through sound monetary and fiscal policies, the opening up of markets, streamlining government, building the skills of Canadians, and encouraging private sector enterprise and initiative as the basis for economic progress.

In response, Canada's economy performed particularly well from 1984 to the onset of the recession in 1990. We led the G-7 in job creation and were second only to Japan in economic growth. However, our most recent economic progress has been slowed by a stubborn worldwide recession, and world recovery has been weakened by economic restructuring, excessive debt, and trade uncertainties.

All this has contributed to a painful adjustment which has slowed world economic growth from 4.3 per cent in 1988 to only 1 per cent this year, the lowest rate of growth the world has seen since 1982.

Canada is not immune to these realities. Next to Germany we are the major industrial country most dependent upon exports. When world growth slows, when commodity prices fall, when world unemployment increases, Canadians cannot escape these consequences.

As a result, far too many Canadians are without work. Far too many others fear for their future as economic restructuring takes place around the world. We need to act to restore confidence and to rekindle hope.

There are those who would have us believe that an economy weakened by too much government debt can be strengthened by creating even more government debt. This approach was wrong in the 1970s. It was wrong in the 1981-1982 recession. It would have been wrong last February. And it would be wrong today.

The simple fact is that large government deficits, federal and provincial, and high foreign debt limit our room to act.

We must act responsibly. That does not mean that we cannot respond. The essence of governing is choosing. There are choices to be made and we are prepared to make them in the best interests of all Canadians.

To make intelligent choices, we must face facts. We must deal with the world as it is, and not as we might wish it to be. We must recognize that globalism is a fact of life. This increases our choices in the goods and services we buy. It increases our opportunities in new markets that we can sell to. But it also increases our interdependence and our competition.

In this increasingly interdependent world countries that turn inward and cling to the old ways of doing business will finally have no future.

The new world economy brings intense pressure to compete. Those who can, will prosper. Those who cannot, will stagnate.

This is not an ideological statement. It is a fact. Some may think that competition is a dirty word, but if we fail to recognize reality we will miss new opportunities. We will sit on the sidelines while the world marches forward.

It is because Canadians can compete and win that we have a duty to encourage that competition. If we face facts, realistically, pull together, and address our challenges head on, we will continue to grow and to prosper.

As I have made clear, this government is not prepared to sacrifice steady, responsible progress for quick fixes that promise relief today at the price of misery tomorrow.

Canada's experience has clearly demonstrated that higher spending and greater deficits will not create lasting jobs. They lead only to higher interest rates in the short term and higher taxes down the road.

• (1530)

Our government will continue to work to put in place a sound fiscal structure and to address the issues of productivity and competitiveness. This is the approach that was recommended by the private sector task force on prosperity.

We will achieve this by continuing to invest in growth on behalf of all Canadians. We will continue to invest in policies to make our economy work better. We will further strengthen our investment in people. We will make additional investments in public infrastructure and we will continue to invest in open trading markets. We will continue to invest in sound monetary and fiscal policies, and we will invest in partnerships for growth with the provinces, with labour and with business.

These kinds of investments take time to bear fruit. They are not easy, change never is. However, there are pay-offs and they are starting to appear. At 1.4 per cent, we have the lowest inflation rate among the G-7 countries this year.

With productivity up by 2.6 per cent so far this year we have made major gains in controlling costs, and this improves our competitiveness. Our trade performance is showing the results. Canada's merchandise trade surplus, one of the keys to reducing our current account deficit, is up by almost $2 billion from last year.

We all recognize that recovery from the 1990-91 recession is painfully slow, not only here in Canada but around the world. Therefore, I expect average growth this year to be about 1 per cent. We know that we cannot have a powerful recovery when world growth is stagnating, but our investments in growth are positioning Canada for renewed world growth.

Some of the encouraging signs are as follows: real output increased by 1.4 per cent in the third quarter of 1992; domestic demand, including consumer spending, housing and investment in machinery and equipment, has increased by about 5 per cent; the composite leading indicator continues to improve; employment has increased in five of the last six months; consumer confidence is rising—it has now reached its highest level since the fourth quarter of 1989; real exports are up by more than 6 per cent over the first three quarters of this year; and exports to the United States are at record levels, up by 10.5 per cent this year over last.

However, we must interpret these signs cautiously. The world economy is still going through a difficult period. The recent instability in financial markets will hurt Canada's fourth quarter growth numbers. However, as the fundamental strengths of Canada's economy become more apparent the exchange rate should become less at risk and interest rates should come down considerably during the course of 1993, with short-term interest rates averaging about 6 per cent over the year.

Our improved competitive position, the easing in interest rates that our excellent inflation performance permits, a pickup in the U.S. economy, and the measures that I will announce today will contribute to stronger growth next year. I expect average growth of about 2.5 per cent for 1993.

I expect inflation will remain below 2.5 per cent in 1993. I expect improved employment prospects with an increase of about 300,000 jobs over the course of the year.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I now wish to turn to a number of measures that I am proposing to assist economic recovery and invest in economic growth.

One of the things that we will continue to do is to make government leaner and more efficient. We have made government smaller and more supportive of the private sector in a number of important ways. For example, government operating costs after inflation are more than 20 per cent lower than when we came into office.

In the last budget 46 agencies, commissions and boards were eliminated or restructured. The Prime Minister has instructed all ministers to identify further candidates for action by February 1993. Since 1985 we have dissolved 14 Crown corporations and undertaken 23 privatization initiatives, and we intend to proceed with further privatization.

We have deregulated critical economic sectors to increase competition and we are modernizing all federal regulations. We are eliminating those that no longer serve a public policy purpose and we will streamline others so that they will not stifle creativity and efficiency.

Agriculture Canada, Transport Canada and Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada were directed to review and publicly justify their regulatory regimes in the last budget. All three found ample room for improvement, and as an example Agriculture Canada reviewed 58 sets of regulations. Fifteen were eliminated in whole or in part, four are being sunsetted, and 38 will be modernized. Building on this result the Treasury Board has announced that 19 other departments, along with six agencies, will complete their own reviews by April 1993. What we are seeking in all of these areas is a lower-cost, more efficient government that can work in partnership with the private sector to benefit and serve all Canadians.

I now turn to tax reform. An important part of modernizing and streamlining government has been to modernize our tax system. For the long-run competitive health of our economy our single most important tax reform initiative has been the replacement of the outdated and economically destructive manufacturers' sales tax with the GST. The old tax favoured imports, hurt Canadian exporters and penalized new business investment. The GST has helped our manufacturers and our exporters.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association reports that the GST has saved its members $3.5 billion. This is important assistance to activity and jobs in difficult times. The Canadian Exporters' Association reports that the tax has improved our competitive position. This has contributed to our strong export position. Major retailers have confirmed that the prices of the majority of their goods dropped after the introduction of the GST.

The GST is not raising more revenues than the old tax. By law every penny of net GST revenue goes to the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account, where it can be used only to pay the interest on the debt and ultimately to reduce our debt. We are continuing to work to simplify the GST. Last week my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, announced changes to streamline the administration of the GST. I will soon be announcing further measures to make the tax fairer and easier to comply with.

The government will also act to ensure that those who owe tax—both sales tax and income tax—make their payments, and do so in a timely way. We will give careful consideration to the Auditor General's recent comments in this regard.

Sales tax harmonization represents a major opportunity to reduce the burden of government on the private sector, particularly on small business. I therefore urge my provincial colleagues to join with me in a renewed effort to align our sales taxes, not only with each other but with the reality of the tough, competitive world in which our business people must operate.

I now turn to the small business sector. Small businesses are the primary engine of employment growth. Between 1979 and 1990 small business created more than 2 million full-time jobs. This is more than 80 per cent of the total created during that period. Over-all, Canada's federal tax system for small business is one of the most favourable in the world. Compared to the United States our tax rates are lower, our R and D incentives are more generous, and our taxes on dividends and capital gains on investments in small businesses are much lower.

Yet today the small business community is undergoing serious financial and competitive pressure. Much of this pressure, as I indicated before, comes from the need of the provincial and federal governments to get their act together, whether it is on the GST, other taxes, government spending, or regulation. Some small businesses are finding that the over-all regulatory and tax environment is friendlier south of the border and we must deal with that.

The fact is that much of what needs to be done to address this problem is in the domain of provincial and municipal governments, but the federal government can do something and we will assist small business where we can.

Therefore, I am proposing today a small business employment and investment package to help small businesses across the country modernize, attract financing, grow and create jobs.

For the next year I am proposing that most small businesses increasing employment will be able to do so with no increase in unemployment insurance premiums. New businesses starting up in 1993 will pay no UI premiums in that year. This assistance will reduce the cost of additional employees by up to $1,600 each. It will be delivered in a simple way with a minimum of paperwork. More than 900,000 firms, indeed 95 per cent of all firms in Canada, will be able to benefit from this measure. The government, not the UI fund, will finance this measure.

• (1540)

I am also proposing a new 10 per cent investment tax credit for small business. It will apply to investments in machinery and equipment for small businesses engaged in manufacturing, construction, farming, fishing, mining, oil and gas and long-haul transportation. It will apply to investments made after today and before 1994.

I am also announcing measures to help small businesses secure financing. In the February budget I proposed that the ceiling for loans to individual businesses under the Small Businesses Loans Act be doubled from $100,000 to $200,000. I am announcing today that this ceiling will be further increased to $250,000. As well, the government will work to broaden the application of the act to include some forms of working capital.

I am also announcing changes to simplify and expand investment in small business by RRSPs and Labour-Sponsored Venture Capital funds.

The Small Business Financing Program announced in my budget last February will be extended for two more years until the end of 1994. This provides low interest commercial financing for viable small businesses in difficulty. I am serving notice to Canada's banks that I expect them to make a special effort to play a constructive role in ensuring the success of this program.

We all know that small and medium-size businesses play an important role in Canada's home building industry. In my last budget I introduced a home buyers' plan to allow Canadians to use RRSP savings to help buy homes. This program has been an unqualified success, generating economic activity in all regions of Canada.

More than 130,000 withdrawals have been made under the plan. I am announcing today that in view of the positive response I am extending the plan for another year.

I am also announcing measures to assist activity in the resource sector. The first $2 million of Canadian development expense by junior oil and gas companies will be treated as Canadian exploration expense for the purpose of flow-through share financing, raising its write-off rate from 30 per cent to 100 per cent. This will be a welcome measure.

Changes will also be introduced to benefit the mining sector. New mines or major expansions of existing mines are now allowed to fully recover their capital investment before paying any federal income tax. The Income Tax Act will be amended to provide more flexibility for mining and oil and gas companies to utilize their non-capital losses. These measures will help to put Canada's small businesses in a better position to meet their competitive challenges, to grow and to create jobs.

I now turn to research and development. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association recently noted: "The next ten years will bring about more changes in the way business is done than we have seen in the past 50".

Therefore effective R and D will be a key to successfully meeting the challenges of the next decade and the next century. Canada now has more generous tax incentives for R and D than any other G-7 country. In my last budget I proposed to improve them even further, after consulting with R and D performers.

I am today announcing changes to allow the tax rules to better reflect how R and D is actually performed in the business community. As indicated in the February budget, they will provide additional support of $230 million over the next five years to Canadian companies undertaking research and development.

In addition, there are several other areas where the tax system can be modified to help Canadian businesses adapt and grow. Some problem areas have been identified.

The first is the tax treatment of equipment, such as computers, that becomes obsolete quickly due to rapid technological change.

Second, the ability of some firms to use their R and D investment tax credits fully.

Third, the ability of Canadian firms to gain access to new technologies.

Fourth, tax based impediments to growth of small innovative companies.

These concerns have been raised in our discussions with the business community as part of the prosperity consultations. In consultation with industry, we will examine modifications to address these areas in the coming months and actions will be announced in the budget. I have set aside $400 million over the next five years to finance changes to address these issues.

In addition, funding will be increased for the highly successful Industrial Research Assistance Program which provides technology support and financial assistance to businesses. My colleague, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, will also be taking steps to streamline delivery and ease of access to federal technology programs and services.

Funding will also be extended for long-term research, building on the best of the results achieved under the networks of the Centres of Excellence Program, a very good program I might add.

We will strengthen our investment in people.

In a world where capital, information, goods and even services flow easily across national borders a nation's competitive advantage is increasingly being found in the skills of its people.

As has been recently noted, nations once competed for control over natural resources. Today they compete to produce the best educated labour force.

Keeping up with this competition is a major challenge. In one generation, Canada's young people have been exposed to more scientific and technological advancement than their parents or grandparents in their entire lifetime.

We have invested in skill development and training by setting up the Canadian Labour Force Development Board and by refocusing the UI system from passive income support to active skill building.

The $3.5 billion we spend on training and adjustment does make a real difference to the lives of hundreds of thousands of individuals across the country.

Our programs have helped individuals cope with change, while assisting the adjustment to new opportunities. A good example of this is the Northern Cod Adjustment and Recovery Program. The collapse of the northern cod stock in Newfoundland required a moratorium on fishing to rebuild the stock for future years. Over 20,000 Newfoundlanders were affected. The government is responding by supporting incomes in the short run, by helping individuals build new skills so that they can become self-reliant, and by helping restructure the fishing industry to put it on a sustainable basis.

As the Prime Minister recently announced, support for the Unemployment Insurance Development Uses Fund will increase to more than $2.2 billion next year from $1.9 billion last year and from a level of $500 million in 1990. This fund invests in people by helping them to upgrade their skills. This program has been a real success story. This year 450,000 people will benefit from the program. This will increase to more than 500,000 next year. The additional funds will be used to provide special services to workers who lose their jobs after a long-term attachment to the labour force.

I am announcing further measures today that will strengthen our investment in people and the future of this country.

To lay the foundation for a stronger training culture in this country we need the joint commitment of employers and workers to develop training strategies. To facilitate this the government will make funding available to help create permanent skill councils in particular sectors of the economy. Priority will be placed on the important task of developing occupational standards so that training will be more relevant to industry's needs. Government funding of $250 million over five years will be used strategically to lever a national private sector driven effort. The government will develop tax incentives to help defray the costs of training workers to meet these occupational standards.

My colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, will be elaborating on the government's labour market initiatives later in this debate.

We will make additional investments in public infrastructure.

The quality of a nation's infrastructure can provide an important competitive advantage in the new global economy. Highways, rail lines, air services, communications and information systems can become critical factors in location decisions.

Further strategic investment will be undertaken in all regions to strengthen our national transportation systems and communications networks. In order to ensure work begins in 1993 the government will commit $500 million over the next two years to a strategic investment program.

• (1550)

Federal assistance will be provided for an immediate start on priority highway projects in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. With the co-operation of these two provinces we anticipate a significant beginning can be made toward the development of the Atlantic expressway.

Advanced engineering and environmental work on the Prince Edward Island fixed crossing project will be undertaken to allow construction of this $800 million project to begin in the spring. This will directly create an average of almost 1,000 jobs each year over the construction period and will provide enormous spin-off benefits for the economy of Atlantic Canada.

[Translation]

Federal bridges in Montreal will be upgraded. In addition, funding will be made available for co-operation with the Government of Quebec on strategic improvements to the highway system in that province.

[English]

Federal roads and roadworks in western Canada's national parks will be upgraded.

Grade separations and other investments will be undertaken to improve the efficiency and safety of our national rail system, particularly in southern Ontario.

Air navigation systems across the country will be improved. The federal government will provide resources for early procurement and the first phase of installation of microwave landing systems in Canadian airports.

Airports in the north will be improved.

The Prime Minister recently announced the government's commitment to developing one of the most exciting and most important infrastructure projects: a high speed national electronic highway. The government will set aside funding for the Canadian Network for the Advancement of Research, Industry and Education project, which will use fibre optics to allow the rapid exchange of vast amounts of information among Canada's scientists, engineers and educators. It will expand Canada's technological capabilities and benefit many sectors in the Canadian economy.

Over the next five years this initiative will result in investments in national infrastructure of more than $2 billion. It will directly generate 4,000 to 5,000 jobs each year.

In addition, we are ready to proceed with a successful proposal to upgrade terminals 1 and 2 in Toronto using private financing. This project will be undertaken at a pace which will not undermine the airlines' effort to return to profitability. This project is expected to create between 2,000 and 3,000 direct jobs each year throughout construction. My colleague, the Minister of Transport, will be providing further details on this important initiative.

We will continue to invest in broadening trade opportunities.

As we in this House all know, trade is our lifeblood. Exports generate 30 per cent of Canada's economic activity and account for one in four jobs. Our ability to trade successfully makes us a wealthier country, with greater choices available to Canadians.

Broadening our trading opportunities requires improved access to markets, under clear and fair rules.

The Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement has proven a success. Canadian exports to the U.S. have increased by $16 billion since the FTA was introduced and are now at record levels. This strong export performance was achieved in spite of slow growth in the U.S. economy and a strong Canadian dollar.

The free trade agreement is providing opportunities for the industries of the future.

A recent study by the C. D. Howe Institute showed that Canada's export performance was strongest in those sectors which the FTA has already liberalized, with big gains in high-tech machinery and equipment and other value added products. Exports of manufactured products outpaced exports of resource based products, leading the C. D. Howe study to conclude that "many of Canada's manufacturing sectors seem to have performed remarkably well in the U.S. market under the FTA".

I am reiterating and strengthening our commitment to open trading markets.

The North American free trade agreement improves and strengthens the free trade agreement. It also gives Canadian exporters better access to the important Mexican market of 85 million consumers. We will take early action to introduce implementation legislation for the North American free trade agreement.

The GATT Uruguay round is one of utmost importance to Canada and to the world. The OECD has estimated that the reforms envisaged in the Uruguay round would eventually lead to annual income gains for the world economy of $250 billion. We can share in that economy and so it is important that this be proceeded with.

To protect our competitive position we must seek to lower costs wherever possible. One way we can do this is by lowering tariffs on goods that we import. In response to the recommendations of the Canadian International Trade Tribunal, I am announcing that the government will reduce textile tariffs effective January 1, 1993, bringing them more in line with those of other industrialized countries.

We will continue to invest in sound monetary and fiscal policies as the only basis for sustainable economic growth.

Not so long ago Canada had one of the highest inflation rates among the G-7 countries. This year we have the lowest rate. This means that the prices of goods and services we buy are rising more slowly than in other leading industrial nations. And that is excellent news for the Canadian economy.

Low inflation protects people's purchasing power. Here is an example: Between 1980 and 1984 food prices rose about 8 per cent per year. This meant that a basket of groceries cost 40 per cent more in 1984 than in 1979. From January to October of this year the price of food has risen by only 0.8 per cent. At this rate it would take 40 years, not 4, for a basket of groceries to increase by 40 per cent.

Another example: Low inflation protects those on fixed incomes. A pension of $10,000 would be worth only $4,420 after 20 years of inflation at 4 per cent. With 1 per cent inflation it would be worth almost $8,200.

It is very clear our own history and experience in other countries demonstrate that there is no lasting trade-off between higher inflation and a strong economy. Nor is there a relationship with lower unemployment. While it takes time to adjust fully to a low inflation economy the continuing benefits make it one of the best possible investments in our economic future.

Our investment in price stability is paying off. Canadian interest rates moved down from a peak of 14 per cent in May 1990 to under 5 per cent in September as inflation and inflation pressures were reduced. These rates were among the lowest in the industrialized countries. Among the G-7 countries only the United States and Japan had lower rates.

Since September uncertainty in markets and downward pressure on our currency have pushed up interest rates, but they remain well below historical peaks. Continued good inflation performance is the clear basis for lower interest rates, and as pressure in the currency market subsides we should be able to achieve these lower rates.

Excessive government deficits, both federal and provincial, have contributed to a level of net foreign debt far higher for Canada than for any other G-7 country. This large net foreign debt, public sector and private sector, means that Canadians paid more than $22 billion in net interest last year to foreign lenders. That is money that Canadians cannot use to develop our own economy. This adds to the economic damage done by the higher interest rates and higher taxes that result from higher government deficits.

Lowering government deficits means that more of Canadians' savings are available for private investment. It means we can invest in our future without mortgaging it to foreign lenders. The way to reduce deficits is by controlling spending, not by raising taxes. Now is not the time for any government to raise taxes. Canadians can make better, more productive use of their money than governments can. The more we can leave in people's pockets, the better it will be for our economy. That is precisely why I cut spending in the February budget to reduce the personal income surtax by 2 per cent: 1 per cent last July, and a further 1 per cent on January 1, 1993.

• (1600)

This measure will add $1.8 billion to Canadians' disposable income this year and next. The January decrease will proceed on schedule, as will the reduction in the manufacturing and processing tax rate, from 23 per cent to 22 per cent. In total, the measures announced in February's budget will provide a timely stimulus of about $2 billion in tax reductions to support economic activity over the coming year.

We also took steps to provide additional assistance to lower and middle-income families with children through the new Child Tax Benefit program. Beginning in January, this initiative will provide $2.1 billion in additional assistance to families over a five-year period. This means, for example, that a working single parent with two children and an income of less than $20,000 will receive about $600 in additional assistance.

Consistent with this over-all approach, I am announcing today that the 1993 unemployment insurance premium rates for employers and for employees will be held to their 1992 levels.

We will manage spending to stay within the Spending Control Act limits. This will allow us to reduce the slippage in the deficit resulting from weaker revenues and to finance the additional investments in growth that I have announced today.

We have to keep our spending in line with our incomes. When our credit card bills get too high we have to cut back on our current spending. For Canada, the objective of this restraint is to preserve for the long term the benefits that we have all gained and continue to gain from this great land.

We are not cutting simply for the sake of cutting or because we think Canadians have not made real sacrifices. We know they have and we know that these cuts will require further sacrifice. We are asking everyone to do a bit more so that a stronger recovery and sustained growth can be shared by all Canadians.

For the current fiscal year, operating budgets of all departments are being cut by a further 2 per cent. This has resulted in many departments imposing a hiring and discretionary spending freeze.

I am also asking my colleagues to reduce the spending on their grant and contribution programs for the balance of the year where possible. Over the balance of this fiscal year, and the next two fiscal years, almost $8 billion will be cut in a broadly based expenditure restraint program.

Expenditures for a wide range of programs will be either frozen or reduced from planned levels. Let me elaborate.

Salaries will be frozen for the Governor General, the Lieutenant Governors, the Prime Minister, ministers, members of Parliament, senators, the federal judiciary, public servants and the employees of non-commercial Crown corporations for the next two years. Commercial Crown corporations will be asked to keep their wage settlements in line with this policy. In addition, appropriation-dependent corporations will be funded as if their wages were frozen.

Government operating budgets will be reduced by 3 per cent as of 1993-1994. Including the savings from the salary freeze, operating costs will be 5 per cent lower than planned levels in 1993-1994 and 1994-1995. These reductions are on top of the many operating cost reductions implemented over the last eight years.

Average unemployment insurance benefits will also be frozen. To do this, the UI benefit rate will be reduced for new beneficiaries from 60 per cent to 57 per cent in April 1993. The effect of this reduction will be to freeze the average benefit per recipient.

As well, persons who voluntarily quit their jobs without just cause or lose their jobs because of their own misconduct will no longer receive UI benefits.

Grants and subsidies to most organizations and interest groups will be cut by 10 per cent in each of the next two years.

Some programs will be exempted. These will include programs for the elderly, the guaranteed income supplement, spouse's allowance, programs for the disabled, war veterans' allowance, and veterans' disability pensions.

Canada will not reduce its famine relief around the world.

In addition, I wish to inform the House and my provincial colleagues that no further restraint will be imposed upon major federal transfers to the provinces. These programs are already covered by the expenditure control plan introduced in the 1990 budget and extended in the 1991 budget.

The actions I have announced today will bring the estimated deficit down to $34.4 billion this year and $32.6 billion next year. The slippage relative to the February 1992 budget is largely due to the shortfall of revenues caused by a weaker than anticipated economy.

With the actions announced in this statement, program spending over the next two fiscal years will be similar to that projected in the budget. The savings from the expenditure reductions, net of the initiatives for investing in growth, rise substantially each year through 1994–95.

This will mean that spending will continue the pattern since 1991–92 of being well below the limits set out in the Spending Control Act despite the enormous economic pressures.

The expenditure reductions announced in this statement provide a considerable reduction in the structural component of the deficit. As such, the deficit should decline rapidly through the medium term on the basis of the tight control over spending in place and the stronger economic performance and the lower interest rates. It remains the government's objective to attain zero financial requirements over the medium term.

We must and we have to recognize, however, that Canada's deficit problem is a total government problem and not just a federal one. By far the larger share of government operating costs in Canada is provincial and not federal. Therefore, it is vital that all governments review their operations to cut costs, to reduce deficits and to lighten the burden on taxpayers.

Finally, we will invest in partnerships for growth with provincial governments and with the private sector. The recent constitutional discussions diverted attention from what the federal and provincial governments can do together to better co-ordinate economic policy in the interests of growth and jobs.

We will take a leadership role under the existing Constitution and urge better co-ordination of fiscal policies. We are prepared to act with the provinces to develop acceptable frameworks for public sector compensation, to eliminate waste, overlap and duplication, and to harmonize our tax systems and to reduce compliance costs on business and individuals.

The federal government has made specific proposals to achieve this in a much more co-ordinated and open fashion in its document of September 1991. These proposals do not require constitutional amendment and we are prepared to act on them together with the provinces as soon as possible.

As well, it is time—in fact it is long past time—for concrete, comprehensive action to reduce interprovincial trade barriers with a fixed agenda and a timetable.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the federal government has pressed provinces to remove all barriers and impediments to internal trade by 1995.

I am encouraged by the progress that has been set in place by the Canadian Ministers of Agriculture. Further progress across a range of areas can only strengthen Canada's position at home and abroad.

Our emphasis on a partnership approach with other governments and the private sector reflects the reality of the economic challenges facing Canada, but it also reflects the reality of the federal government's impact on the national economy.

The federal government accounts for less than half of the total government spending in Canada. This fact should be kept in mind by those who continue to pretend that the federal government alone can turn around Canada's economy. Not even a fiscally strong federal government could accomplish that by itself. That is why we must all work together more effectively to get our economy moving strongly forward again.

• (1610)

I am therefore tabling documents, including Notices of Ways and Means Motions. Details of the measures are included in the documents. I have introduced today a bill seeking supplementary borrowing authority for 1992–93. I am asking that an order of the day be designated for these motions.

In conclusion, the question that we must ask ourselves is: How can we best deal with economic change to ensure that Canada can meet the needs and fulfil the hopes of its citizens in the years ahead?

I believe the answer is clear. We must prepare ourselves to take advantage of the opportunities that the new world economy is bringing. That has been the consistent objective of the policies the government has followed in the past eight years. I firmly believe that Canada is now in a strong position to seize those opportunities.

We have all made a considerable investment in making Canada a country that can survive and prosper in a new world economy of the 21st century. This is a country where we can generate the wealth to sustain the social programs and the safety nets that are fundamental to our sense of identity and community.

There are those who would follow policies based on the world as they would like it to be rather than as it exists. But I challenge them to show how an inward-looking Canada could help Canadians to gain new jobs and opportunities in a new world economy.

There are also those who believe that more government spending and higher government debt can solve any problem, any time, any place. I challenge them to show how deliberately driving up the debt that has weakened us can make us stronger.

Today I have announced actions that will help position Canada for renewed economic success and will assist economic recovery and strengthen the basis for sustained growth and job creation. Through these actions, we are expanding our investment in the growth and vitality of Canada's small businesses in research and development, in training and adjustment for Canadian workers, in improved infrastructure and in a sound fiscal and monetary framework. These actions will help us to deal with global interdependence, but we must also recognize our own interdependence as Canadians in business, labour, government and learning institutions in the continuing effort to modernize our economy.

I appeal to all Canadians for their co-operation as together we pursue the task of securing a positive and vibrant economy for the future for ourselves and for our children. That is, remains and must be our priority as Canadians and as Canadians' representatives in this House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, in all my years in this House, I have never seen a Minister of Finance who so misunderstands what his job is all about.

At this time this minister's job is to attack unemployment, to attack the lack of economic growth and to attack the recession. Instead, what this minister is doing is attacking the unemployed.

[Translation]

Instead of attacking the recession and unemployment, the minister is attacking the unemployed and the jobless, those who suffer as a result of these policies.

[English]

The minister is attacking the jobless by taking $2.4 billion out of the pockets of unemployed Canadians through cuts in their unemployment insurance benefits. This minister is not getting more revenue from closing the tax loopholes identified by the Auditor General. Instead, he is literally reaching into the pockets of unemployed Canadians to try to achieve his budgetary projections which were so wrong in the past so many times.

This is not an act of courage or conviction. It is a vicious attack on those least able to help themselves. The Liberals will not stand for this and certainly Canadians will not stand for this.

What is the net effect of the minister's statement? Over the next two years the Minister of Finance will take some $7 billion out of the Canadian economy, but what is he putting back? He says he will have an infrastructure program of $500 million over two years. He says it will create 4,000 to 5,000 jobs a year. In one day last week we had announcements of losses of three times as many jobs as this minister says he will create with his infrastructure program. In one day. The announcement was a loss of 10,000 jobs at Canadian National, hundreds at Pratt and Whitney, thousands at Dofasco. In one day this minister heard how jobs are going to be wiped out, three times as many as he intends to create over years of his infrastructure program.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Even at the minister's best in a previous existence he would have recognized that the latest mini model that he is trying to peddle of his failed economic policies has absolutely no wheels.

Getting back to his infrastructure program, we do not quarrel with the projects mentioned, although I must say they have all been announced before as far as I can recall. However, I ask the minister, where is the municipal infrastructure program that the Canadian Federation of Municipalities and Provinces has been calling for for years? Where is it? There is nothing in this program for municipal infrastructure, nothing for clean water, nothing for sewers. There is nothing to put people back to work almost immediately, using projects that our towns and cities across this country have on the shelf ready to put in place and ready to put people back to work right now.

This budget is so lacking in imagination it does not even present a good attempt at sleight of hand.

The minister talks about the budget and what it does for small business. He talks about creating a higher ceiling for government guaranteed loans to small business. Small business cannot get loans from banks now under the existing ceiling.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): What good will the higher ceiling do? The minister should have listened to the Minister of State for Small Businesses who said just the other day in this House that the banks needed to be kicked in their assets. Is that not what the minister of small business said? I do not know why, if the Minister of Finance wanted to listen to somebody, he did not listen to his Minister of State for Small Businesses who in effect said that the proposal for a higher ceiling for small business loans guaranteed by the government is meaningless because the banks have not been lending the money. His weak-willed pleading today will not make one bit of difference.

• (1620)

Our regions are suffering from the effects of this government's weak and failed policies. Yet the government cuts hundreds of millions of dollars, $350 million, from programs for regional development. There are cuts for ACOA in Atlantic Canada. There are cuts for FEDNOR in northern Ontario. There are cuts for western diversification in the prairie provinces. What is it doing for regional development? What a failure, what a flop.

There are cuts for farmers. There are cuts for transportation. There are cuts for the native people about whom the Prime Minister said they have such a great need for justice. Where is the justice in this budget for our native people?

There are cuts of $172 million in the green plan. That is the supposed miracle plan to help clean up our environment.

All these cuts mean lost jobs and lost opportunities.

A previous Conservative Minister of Finance promised short-term pain for long-term gain. But all this minister is offering Canadians is long-term pain for more long-term pain.

In this statement, over two years the government is proposing cuts for defence of $1 billion. I searched through the budget papers. I asked the officials in the lock-up and I could not get any details of these cuts. I was wondering if the minister of defence had lost the information about the details in his hotel room in his last trip to Paris, because the details are not there.

This suggests that there will be no cuts in the gold-plated helicopter program, but there could well be cuts in personnel. How can this government maintain its peacekeeping commitments, its current obligations, with these kinds of cuts? If this is not a correct understanding of what is proposed, then why were details not provided in the budget papers?

Two months after forming the government in 1984, the Prime Minister stated: "We have been in power for two months. I can tell you this. Give us 20 years and you will not recognize this country". It took the Prime Minister and his government only 8 years to change the face of Canada and the change has not been for the better.

Let us look at the Canada created by this government: 1.6 million Canadians are out of work; more than 2.3 million Canadians are on welfare; 3.8 million Canadians are living in poverty, over one million of them children; over two million Canadians are forced to rely on food banks.

The eyes and ears of these Canadians are watching and listening to this House on television across this country. They are looking to this government for constructive change. They are looking for constructive change and they are looking for signs of compassion and help and economic growth. What should have been a battle against unemployment and recession has turned into a declaration of war against the unemployed and those suffering the most from these failed Conservative government policies.

I want to ask again, as I asked in this House during Question Period a few days ago, if the Conservative medicine is so good, why is the patient, the Canadian economy, still so sick?

The Minister of Finance told Canadians in his February 1992 budget that real economic growth would be 2.7 per cent, the unemployment rate would be 10.1 per cent and the deficit would be $31.4 billion.

The Minister of Finance has failed to even come close to his projections. He admitted today the economy will grow at a rate of only 1 per cent. That is not enough to even have the economy move barely sideways instead of bringing the growth and jobs Canadians need.

The unemployment rate has surpassed 11 per cent for the last six months while the deficit, as he said today, has gone up to $34.4 billion. Even if his forecasts had been met they still would have painted a sad picture of this government's economic mismanagement and failure.

The minister was wrong. He missed every one of his projections and forecasts. Canadians will ask how the minister can be believed when his forecasts were so wrong last year and in earlier years. How can he be believed when he talks about what his policies will do next year and the year after?

Well, of course, we know that this government will not be here the year after next because Canadians listening to this budget will only be confirmed in their desire to get rid of this government at the first opportunity.

An hon. member: Why wait for spring? Let's do it now.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, Conservative policies for economic growth and recovery have failed. The Minister of Finance's statement today is an admission of his failure. At the same time it is a plea for mercy from the Canadian people that will not be accepted by them.

The minister boasts about the success of the trade deal and the GST. Canadians know better from their everyday experience and Canadians will pass a summary judgment on this government in the next election.

Both the United Nations and the OECD have recommended that governments of developed countries break the economic stalemate by loosening their purse strings. Japan, Australia and now the European Community are embarking on major capital and infrastructure programs to stimulate their economies out of recession.

This economic statement is lacking in many things but it is especially lacking in a commitment to strong economic growth and the job creation that goes with it.

The Minister of Finance seems convinced that there are no costs associated with inaction on the economy. But he need only ask himself why the deficit is nearly $7 billion more than he said it would be just last February.

Nobody needs a Ph.D. in economics to know that government expenditures on unemployment insurance have increased and government tax revenues are down because of the recession. Each individual unemployed Canadian is costing taxpayers $15,000 in unemployment benefits and welfare and approximately $7,000 in lost tax revenue. These are only the economic costs. The social costs are much higher in terms of the potential for increased domestic violence, increased crime rates, poor health and loss of individual dignity. The vicious cycle can only be broken by sustained economic growth, strong economic growth and the job creation that it brings.

For Liberals the ultimate objective of economic policy is to build a value-added economy that will create permanent jobs for Canadians and protect and enhance our social fabric.

This Conservative government has spent $500,000 on the Porter study and another $26 million on the prosperity agenda to study our competitiveness problems. Canadians and Canadian companies do not need more studies. They need a government that will act to create an environment that will foster economic growth and strong job creation right now.

This country needs a new economic vision, a vision of change that will create jobs for the future and revitalize our communities all across this country. We need a new economic course for Canada, one this government is incapable of giving, one that is responsive to people and to our environment. We need one that will provide the basis for rebuilding our industrial and resource base.

Top priorities for Liberals are job creation and economic growth with a more balanced approach toward inflation and the other economic variables.

High real interest rates have taken a heavy toll on the Canadian economy in recent years. If Canada is to compete on a global basis we must have monetary policy that puts Canadian firms on a level playing field with our major competitors.

We believe that instead of the limited, incomplete and likely failure of an infrastructure program proposed in this budget we need a real infrastructure program, a national one in partnership with provinces and municipalities, to help revitalize our communities all across this country and create substantial numbers of jobs in the near term.

We believe that the small business sector which is crucial for Canada's long-term economic health must be revitalized. It is the sector that has proven to be the source of most new jobs for Canadians.

We believe governments must assist individuals to deal with the restructuring going on in our economy and the world. This government must come through with its oft-made but oft-broken promises of massive adjustment programs.

We believe there must be a true Canadian economic union eliminating provincial barriers to movements of goods, services, capital and labour.

Liberals believe there must be a full and dynamic research and development strategy that would truly enhance Canada's ability to create and reap the benefits of new technologies.

Liberals believe that Canada must have a global trade strategy to aggressively exploit the potential for export sales to growth areas such as the Pacific Rim and Latin America.

Liberals believe that we must foster economic growth and foster economic growth as a priority. This will help reduce the deficit by creating more government revenues without raising taxes and by saving the government billions through lower unemployment and welfare payments instead of taking them from the pockets of those people who are unemployed.

This government is not up to the challenge of creating the better Canada of tomorrow. It is a government in a state of paralysis. It is a tired government incapable of dealing with the economic problems facing this country.

[Translation]

This government is incapable of preparing Canadians for the challenges awaiting them at the turn of the century.

[English]

For months, Liberals have been urging the government to present a new budget, to replace the minister's discredited and failed budget of last February. We wanted a clear signal from the government that rather than stay the course it would change course, but we what got today is nothing more than a rehash of tired old policies from a tired old government.

Now that I have heard this economic statement, I realize this country does not need another economic statement or budget from this government. What this country needs is an election that will allow Canadians to choose a better economic path for their future. They need a path that will bring them hope, confidence and change. They cannot get that hope or confidence or change from this tired and failed government.

Let us respond to what we hear across this country. Let us respond to the calls of Canadians for an election now to get rid of this failed government. Canadians cannot take much more of the damage done to them by the Conservatives. They want to get rid of this government and go on to elect a better one as soon as possible.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, if the shouting back and forth between those twin parties would cease we perhaps could offer some comments on this.

This economic statement today is terribly disappointing. It is a classic and complacent trickle-down budget. Its benefits are concentrated on businesses. The victims of this statement are the unemployed and some of Canada's poorest citizens who will be hit by cuts affecting the key programs that assist them.

It is made in the face of immense economic distress. There is 11.3 per cent unemployment across this country. There is long-run joblessness which has doubled in the past two years in this country. There is growing poverty. A report just this week said that 3.8 million Canadians were poverty stricken in 1990. The situation is worse in 1992.

By the government's own statistics income distribution is worsening. There are more than 2.5 million people on welfare in this country. Right across this nation human distress is getting worse and worse, and this government has presented us with a plan that does nothing. It does nothing except make life somewhat tougher for those who are losing their jobs.

By this plan which the government has brought forward today the officials of the government conceded to us that the unemployment rate will still be 11 per cent or higher by the end of the 1993-94 fiscal year. By the end of March 1994 unemployment will still be 11 per cent or higher. It is shameful that a government should bring before this House a plan for economic recovery which would leave us with 11 per cent unemployed in 1994.

This is not a solution. This is an excuse for inaction. This is a cop-out. It does nothing for the people of Canada except create more tears, more pain, and more human damage across this economy. Even in the government's own terms it is a massively irresponsible budget, almost a laughable budget.

The Minister of Finance rose in the House today and talked about the seriousness of the deficit problem. If he had talked about the seriousness of the unemployment problem maybe we would have seen something done about it. However, what he talked about was the seriousness of the deficit problem.

I have the statistics here. They are not from a budget two years ago or from a budget five years ago, they are the projections from the budget which this government brought down in February of this year.

Do you know what that budget said that the deficit would be for 1993-94? It would be $22.5 billion. That is what the deficit would be. Yet, the Minister of Finance boasted today that he is reducing the deficit to, get this, $32.6 billion for next year.

Perhaps the Minister of Finance missed an arithmetic course somewhere along the line. Perhaps, like Dan Quayle, the Minister of Finance is not very good at arithmetic. In the case of Quayle it was spelling.

The Minister of Finance must be kidding us when he says he has reduced the deficit from what it was supposed to be, $22.5 billion, to what it is now going to be, $32.6 billion. I would laugh except that this is not a laughing matter. This government has been in power since 1984. It cannot blame others for the deficit problem it has created.

At the end of 1992 we are facing a deficit for the next fiscal year as a consequence of this government's action that will be $10.1 billion higher than it projected just nine months ago. This is not a projection from some time in the past. As for five years ago, maybe it would be unfair to take one of the present Minister for International Trade's budgets and look at it. By his projections we were supposed to be down to a deficit of about $6 billion for next year. I am not even going to refer to his budgets.

I am just going to refer to the present Minister of Finance's budget which promised us faithfully in February of this year that we would have a deficit for the next fiscal year of $22.5 billion. In this economic statement that he expects us to endorse, what has he brought in? A deficit of $32.6 billion. Somehow he expects the House to take him seriously when he says that he is committed to reducing the deficit and putting finances on a sound basis. It was as much as his caucus could manage sitting beside him there in self-congratulatory poses not to break up laughing at that point.

It certainly was heard enough for us, with some respect for the truth, not to break down crying as we listened to the minister talk about reducing the deficit when what we saw in front of us was a government which through its own inept economic policies has taken this country to a deficit this year of almost $35 billion and a deficit next year that will be close to $33 billion.

I see the President of the Treasury Board sitting on the front benches and I see the Minister for International Trade who I know is concerned about these deficits. I am surprised that these ministers permitted a budget as irresponsible and laughable as this to get through the cabinet. I am surprised that this government would even be prepared to come before the Canadian people and expect to be taken seriously, having promised us nine months ago that next year's deficit would be $22.5 billion and now expecting us to cheer because that deficit has been brought down to $32.6 billion. This government must be made up of clowns to expect us to accept that kind of faulty arithmetic.

What should we have done? What should this economic statement have presented to the people of Canada? It certainly should not have presented an increase in the deficit.

We have reached a stage under the irresponsible financial management of this Conservative government and the previous Liberal government at which the deficit level in this country is simply impossible to sustain as a nation.

We should not have seen an increase in the deficit. Instead, we should have had a government come before us and say three things. This government should first have said that it recognizes that it has been financially irresponsible and it is going to plug those corporate loopholes, those tax escape hatches that have permitted this deficit to rise to such unsustainable heights. It should have come before us and said it has listened to the report of the Auditor General, who said there was upward of $1 billion in taxes escaping this government because of companies sending money out to tax loophole countries where they could write things off and then send dividends back to be untaxed in this country because of tax agreements we have with these tax loophole countries.

It should have introduced something to stop that from happening. It should have introduced something to deal with the immensely unfair escapes that wealthy people in this country have under the present capital gains tax loopholes which this government put into effect.

Over 60 per cent of the $3 billion in tax relief which is given to people by this capital gains tax loophole goes to people whose individual income, not family income, is over $100,000 a year. These are not exactly hard up farmers, hard-working small business people or people who are selling their only house, all of whom we would want to see continue to get exemptions from capital gains tax.

These are people who are taking advantage of our tax system. As a result we have a deficit in this country which is sky-high and unsustainable. It is causing massive income disparities and massive increases in the interest rates in this country. Frankly, this government looks like a fool when it comes before us to talk about a $32.6 billion deficit for next year when it promised a $22.5 billion deficit.

It should have closed the loophole for entertainment tax deductions. That would have given us another billion dollars in revenues. It should also have looked at the deductions that a Canadian corporation can make for interest payments on a loan it takes out here in Canada and uses to buy up new assets or create new jobs not here in Canada but in Germany, the Caribbean, the United States, or any place except this country.
